DEBATES

OF THE Convention to Amend the Constitution.

FORTY-SIXTH DAY.

TUESDAY, February 18, 1873.

The Convention was called to order at seven minutes after ten o'clock A. M. by the President.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. J. W. Curry.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

THE CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION PHILADELPHIA—1876.

OFFICE CENTENNIAL COMMISSION, }
No. 904 WALNUT STREET, }
PHILADELPHIA, February 17, 1873. }

Hon. WM. M. MEREDITH,

President Constitutional Convention :

SIR :—The joint committees having in charge the arrangements for Pennsylvania's grand mass convention to provide for the celebration of the Centennial Anniversary of American Independence, on the twenty-second inst., at the Academy of Music, respectfully ask your honorable body to be present on that occasion. Trusting that you will send us an early reply,

We are respectfully yours,

D. J. MORRELL,
ASA PACKER,

Commissioners for Pennsylvania.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. President: I move the invitation be accepted, which was agreed to.

THE SOCIAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION.

The PRESIDENT also laid before the Convention the following communication :

No. 532 WALNUT STREET, }
February 17, 1873. }

Hon. WM. M. MEREDITH,

President Constitutional Convention :

DEAR SIR :—I am instructed by the executive committee of the Philadelphia Social Science association to invite the Constitutional Convention to attend the next stated meeting of the association, on Thursday evening, February 20, at eight o'clock, when Mr. Sydney Biddle will read a paper on the work of the Constitutional Convention, at the Mercantile Library hall, Tenth street, between Market and Chestnut.

Very respectfully, &c.,

J. G. ROSENGARTEN,
Secretary.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. President: I move that the invitation be accepted, which was agreed to.

WRITS OF ERROR.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication from the prothonotary of Erie county, which was referred to the Committee on Judiciary.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. CARTER presented a petition from two hundred citizens of Lancaster county, in favor of a clause in the Constitution prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. ANDREWS presented a similar petition, which, on motion of that gentleman, was referred to the Committee on Judiciary.

NEW COUNTIES.

Mr. PUGHE presented a memorial from certain citizens of Luzerne county, relative to the division of said county, which was referred to the Committee on Counties.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. LEAR presented a memorial from the monthly meeting of Friends, asking for a Constitutional provision against traffic in intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. LEAR also presented a petition from the same meeting, asking that its members be excluded from taxation for military purposes, which was referred to the Committee on the Militia.

Mr. NEWLIN offered the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Executive:

Resolved, That the principal officer of in each of the Executive departments shall have the privilege of discussing in either House any measure pertaining to his department.

THE FORM OF THE BALLOT.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. Lawrence in the chair, for the purpose of further considering the article reported from the Committee on Suffrage.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment to the second section, offered by the gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Boyd.) The amendment will be read.

The CLERK read: "Strike out all after 'section' and insert as follows: 'All elections shall be by ballot, except those by persons in their representative capacity, who shall vote viva voce, but in any city, borough, or town containing a population of at least fifty thousand inhabitants, the ballots shall be numbered by the election officers, when received, and each shall have endorsed upon it the name of the elector, written either by himself or by another citizen of the district, who shall not be an election officer.'"

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Chairman: I desire to withdraw that amendment, and substitute the following:

The CLERK read: "All elections shall be by ballot, which shall be numbered by the election officers, when received, but in any city, borough, or town containing a population of at least fifty thousand inhabitants, the ballots shall be numbered by the election officers, when received, and each shall have endorsed upon it the name of the elector, written either by himself, or by another citizen of the district, who shall not be an election officer; and all persons voting in a representative capacity shall vote viva voce."

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Chairman: The substitute that I have offered is the same as the original one that I offered, except that the ballots throughout the State shall be numbered. The reason that I have so modified it is because that arrangement will, in no wise, interfere with the convenience or inconvenience of the voter. The duty of numbering is imposed upon the election officers. I can see no objection to that, because, throughout the State, it may be the means of preventing fraud, and if fraud is perpetrated, it will enable an investigation into the regularity of the election, to ascertain by these numbers what otherwise might not be ascertained. Therefore I see no objection to it throughout the State. As I said before, inasmuch as election officers are to perform a duty, but when you come to the cities of a population of fifty thousand and upwards, it is provided that the ballots shall also have the names of the voters endorsed upon them.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman: I propose to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Boyd.)

The CLERK read: "Strike out the words 'containing a population of at least fifty thousand inhabitants.'"

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman: I have only a word to say, and I will preface what I have to say with the statement that I entirely sympathize with every effort to inaugurate reform in the matter of conducting our elections. I believe, sir, that I am prepared to go as far as the farthest. There can be scarcely any one upon the floor of this House who would give his entire acquiescence to the proposition as submitted originally by the Committee on Suffrage and Elections as cheerfully as myself, if I did not deem that, in many respects, in certain portions of the State, it would be entirely impracticable. I believe the proposition is a good one, but I believe it is one that would be better adapted to the large cities and the large towns of the State than the rural districts. Hence it is that I submit the amendment to strike out the population qualification, and make the proposition of the committee to apply entirely to the incorporated boroughs and cities of the Commonwealth, and leave the election laws of the State, as regards the rural districts, to stand in future as they have stood in the past.

Now, sir, I very well understand that these gentlemen who represent large towns and cities have felt the necessity for reform. There can be no doubt that they have felt it, but in the rural districts we have not felt it. Where the elections are conducted in the rural districts, they are generally held in school houses.—These school houses are isolated, and the voters come there, perhaps, from widely separated farm houses, and other places of abode. They come there alone, and they will find no facilities for complying with the requirements of the section. They may find no person there, if they are unable to write themselves, who can place their names and numbers upon the tickets, and whether any one may be able to write or not, no elector may be found to attest his vote. Election officers are forbidden to do so, and they will be thrown upon their own resources, and may not be able to comply with the requirements of the section.

In addition to that a majority of the people who live in the rural districts are the laboring and toiling population. Their days are spent in labor, and they do not go to the polls until after dark, and, in many cases, they will find it difficult to comply with the provisions of this proposed section. There will be no facilities furnished, and perhaps no adjacent houses or offices, and they will be utterly unable, in many cases, to vote; so that I fear that the effect of this proposition, instead of tending to effectuate reform, will operate to the defeat of the Constitution, for, by reason of its insertion, it may make it unpopular with the masses.

In view, therefore, of these difficulties, I have proposed this amendment. The gentleman upon the other side may reply that there may be a want of symmetry and uniformity in the Constitution if this amendment is adopted. They may say that it is adapted to the large cities, and should adapt itself to the country. I might pursue the same line of argument, and say that the present Constitution is adapted to the State at large, and therefore it ought to be adapted to the cities.

If they say it would largely prevent fraudulent votes in the cities, then I might urge it would tend greatly to prevent legal votes in the country districts. With a desire, therefore, of obviating the difficulties, as well as providing for the necessities of the case, and with the hope that conflicting views may be reconciled, I offer this amendment, believing that we ought to embody such a provision in the Constitution as will adapt itself to all portions of the State, although I am opposed, upon general principles, to the enactment or embodiment of special provisions in our Constitution.

I am very well aware that the tendency of this Convention is to adopt this clause, and they may do it, but I desire, before that is done, to make a stand here in behalf of the people who live in the rural districts, who do not like this provision, and who do not, I believe, so far as they are concerned, wish to have it embodied in the Constitution. I will therefore call upon those who are its special advocates to be careful before they conclude to adopt it, without making any effort to adapt it to the country districts. They may defeat the very object for which they are laboring—the accomplishment of reform.

MR. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman: I have, in common, with many others of this committee, been a quiet listener during the two weeks that this subject has been under consideration. I will not now propose to enter into anything like an elaborate argument, but simply to refer, very briefly, to what has been said by one or two gentlemen during the progress of the discussion. The gentleman from Erie, (Mr. Walker,) for whom, personally, I have great respect, asked, yesterday, whether "our present Constitution regulating elections had proved a failure?" And he repeated the question, and, as it seemed, in rather a defiant tone, as much as to say, who dare assert that it has? I will take the affirmative of this proposition and say here, and now, that, so far as securing an honest expression of the the popular will is concerned, in some locations it has proved not only an utter "failure," but a miserable farce. Within the past few years it is notorious that the most wicked and stupendous frauds have been perpetrated in open day; the voice of the people has been ignored, and men "counted in" who had been repudiated by the honest voters of the Commonwealth, and others "counted out" who had received a clear majority of their suffrages.

These frauds have become so infamous that they are a stench in the nostrils of all decent men, without regard to party affinities. This committee need not be told that it is believed, by many of the best informed men of the State, if not, indeed, by a majority of the people, that more than one Governor, to say nothing of minor officers, has been inaugurated who did not receive a majority of the honest votes cast, but whose claim to the office was based on the doings of the infamous "ballot-box stuffer," perjured "repeater" and forged certificates of election officers. And, in the face of this deep-seated conviction on the minds of hundreds of thousands of the honest people of this Commonwealth, we are asked, with an air of triumph: "Has our present Constitution proved a failure?" It is true, the estimable gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Knight) admitted that there had "been some slight irregularities in a few of the precincts in the city."

It may seem, to some gentlemen, a very small matter to have these irregularities practiced, notwithstanding they may be and have been the means of setting at naught the expressed will of six or seven hundred thousand honest voters, by taking from one candidate for Governor a few thousand votes and giving them to his opponent, and thus defeat the will of the people in the balance of the State. But those of us who come from the rural districts regard it as a very important matter, and one which calls loudly for redress; and, for one, I am inclined to apply an adequate remedy, if that be possible. The section before us may not accomplish all that is desirable, but seems to be a step in the right direction. I would prefer that the proposed change should be confined to cities, as I believe there is not much necessity for it in the country; and it must be confessed that the writing of the name of the voter on his ticket would be attended with considerable inconvenience. But rather than not have it required in the cities I would be willing to vote for its general application. I will go further; I would say, in full view of my responsibility as a delegate of this Convention, if I must choose between having the elections conducted as they have been for the past few years, especially in Philadelphia, or abolishing them altogether, I would prefer the latter; and whenever I become convinced that nothing can be done here for the protection of the people against those Heaven-daring frauds, then I will vote for a final adjournment any hour; for the idea of a candidate for a high office, Governor, for example, receiving a majority of the legal votes cast, and then, by sheer chicanery, the office be awarded to another, renders the election a most solemn mockery.

To my mind, the worst feature in this deplorable state of affairs is the apparent indifference with which men of high position in society, socially, morally and religiously, seem to look upon these enormities.

When I reflect upon this demoralized state of public sentiment I tremble for my country, and sometimes mentally exclaim: "How long! Oh, Lord! how long shall we be compelled to endure this system of fraud and corruption?"

Mr. CHARLES A. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: I was willing to wait until the gentleman who had the matter especially in charge, should be heard, and then, perhaps, cast a silent vote upon this section. And even now I shall do little more than give such vote, without indicating what shall be my course in Convention upon second reading. I shall say now, however, that I am willing for the friends of this proposition to get it out of committee of the whole, as reported by the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation. I think this much, at least, is due to them. They have advocated the proposition so gallantly, and ably, that so far as my vote is concerned, I am willing to assist them in getting the section on second reading. Nor can I see how this concession will at all affect the ultimate fate of the proposition. If we vote it down now, it will of course be submitted again, upon second reading. We cannot, if we so desired, escape a direct vote upon it, and by suffering it to pass, we get it through one reading, which may be regarded as doing a good deal towards substantial progress. Gentlemen who regard the defeat of the section in committee of the whole as a matter of such great importance should bear in mind the length of time we have been occupied upon its consideration. Doubtless the debate, or a greater portion of it, will be duplicated on second reading, and if this is to be the case, it certainly will be a matter of economy of time, at least, to suffer the section to pass as it is. I shall so vote, without regarding myself as bound to vote the same way upon the second or final reading. As to the amendment of the gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Boyd,) I do not regard it with much favor. It proposes to confine the operation of the section to cities containing a certain amount of population. I am opposed to the principle of the amendment. If the report of the committee is right, and contains a new and valuable improvement upon the present Constitution, it should be adopted and made applicable to the entire State. It is a species of sectional legislation, to which I am opposed. One purpose of this Convention will be to provide for general laws in all cases possible, and it really seems to me that we set a bad example by proposing to incorporate in the fundamental law the very thing we so much reprobate. I think the plan proposed by the committee should be general or not at all. I can boast that there is, in my opinion, but little fraudulent voting in Fayette and Greene counties—the district I in part represent. Certainly not as much, if the charges on this floor be true, as other sections of the State complain of. But whether there be or not, the rule—if a sound one—should be as applicable to these counties as to other parts of the State. I shall, therefore, vote against this amendment, for the reasons I have given.

It contains in my judgment a false principle, and should not be adopted. Then upon the section itself, as reported by the committee, I shall do more than this. I shall vote for it, for the reasons already stated, that is, to get the report on second reading, without any indication whatever, as to what shall be my course upon second reading in Convention. This much, I repeat, is due to the gentlemen who have so well and so thoughtfully considered this matter, I must say this much, however, that notwithstanding they have so well maintained their position, and so ably defended this important proposition, my judgment has not yet been convinced as to the propriety of the measure. I am not by any means sure that this plan is the cure for the evils complained of. I apprehend that they tell us what is true about the frauds in this city. Now, without being an apologist of fraud at all, but wishing to extirpate it by all practicable means, I will say this, that if we read history aright, fraud has always existed, especially after such great civil convulsions as we have had in this country. Whoever reads, for instance, the history of England, especially after the restoration and settlement, will be startled at the great frauds that existed in that country, always, in my opinion, the inevitable result of the convulsion and disturbance of a great civil war. It would be a curious, if not very profitable, inquiry to trace the parallel between the developments of fraud and corruption in that country at that period, and in ours at this time. We would find the same enormous abuses in high places, but with the striking difference, however, that in England, even so long ago as the great settlement, public officers were punished sharply and promptly for corruption. Members of Parliament, and even a speaker, were expelled for bribery, and government officials in high places were impeached and punished for the same offence. Here, under a more advanced civilization, fraud and corruption exist as extensively and notoriously as there; but we do not punish.

But, Mr. Chairman, I did not rise to debate this question. I do not wish to anticipate my position, nor the arguments I may be constrained to use hereafter. I only desire to say now that however deeply I may be impressed with the necessity of some remedy for the evils that doubtless exist, I cannot, just now, see how this proposed one will answer the purpose. It is admitted upon all sides, and without distinction of party, that the most enormous frauds have been perpetrated in the elections in this city; that repeating and personating are openly and systematically pursued; that the tickets of honest voters are destroyed before they pass from the hands of the officer to the ballot-boxes; that the boxes themselves are stuffed with spurious ballots; that they are clandestinely opened after the close of the elections and the tickets destroyed; that the lists and tally papers have been taken from the boxes and destroyed, or so emasculated as to change the result of the poll; indeed it is charged and believed that the result of a great election was entirely changed by the frauds in this city. Now it may not be surprising that this fraud exists, but it is certainly matter of astonishment that it exists in such a city as Philadelphia. Can it be that this state of things can long continue in community famed for its refinement, its wealth, its culture, its admitted high character for religion and morality? Surely a people like this can, by a spontaneous effort, correct this evil, great as it is, without asking us to impose upon the other portions of the State a remedy of very doubtful efficacy or expediency. Instead of standing back, as if afraid of these desperadoes, let the press, the great organ of the people, the pulpit and every public official speak out, independent of party or party influences, and most surely the trouble can be remedied. To my mind it is with the people themselves, or at least with the aid of such remedies as we may prudently adopt, to cure these evils. If I thought it were not; if no other plan could be devised than this, to save the purity of the elective franchise; to arrest the tide of fraud and corruption which, if left unchecked, may, ere long, subvert the very principles of our republican form of government, then I would support the proposition, notwithstanding the formidable impediment it would, in my judgment, interpose against the free exercise of the right of suffrage. Upon such contingency I would not pause to inquire whether or not the measure would be popular, believing, as I do, that the people themselves would freely make the sacrifice if they believed it necessary to the preservation of our free institutions. We should not, I admit, look to the mere popularity of a proposition in framing an organic law for the people, but exercise the best of our own judgment under the responsibility we have assumed. Having done this, it will then be for the people themselves to ratify or reject the result of our labors; but, in view of such action on their part, it would, in my opinion, be prudent at least, if not a duty, to obtain some expression, either from the press or the people, as to the popular sentiment upon this matter. Unquestionably it would impose a great burden upon the voters in the counties where the population is scattered; indeed, it would be burdensome everywhere, but especially where we have least right to impose it—in counties where fraudulent voting has never been heard of, at least to any extent. It is a political axiom that "the country is best governed which is governed the least;" and if this be so it certainly would seem to follow that in providing a fundamental law it should be so adjusted as to produce the desired result with the least burden or inconvenience. The aim here is to prevent fraud and corruption in the exercise of the elective franchise; and, as already intimated, I am not at all convinced that some other plan cannot be devised which would be less burdensome to the people. And whilst consenting to assist in taking the section out of committee, I shall certainly reserve my right to oppose and vote against it in Convention, unless I can be convinced that it presents the only adequate remedy, or receive such expression from the people as would indicate a willingness on their part to make the sacrifice. I have had no expression whatever from my own district. Gentlemen from adjoining districts seem to think such sacrifice would be freely made for the public good.

Gentlemen seem to regard the defeat of this proposition as a fatal blow at reform, and almost despair of these evils being ever cured. I have no such fears. I have an abiding, unalterable faith in the people. It was the creed of a great American statesman, that "their sober second thought is never wrong," and upon that belief I am willing to risk the future of this country. With such judicious and popular aids, as I feel assured this Convention will furnish, the people themselves will arrest the tide of corruption and hurl the plunderers from power. I will, then, Mr. Chairman, vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Boyd.) I think it asserts a false principle, and is withal a grain cowardly in its nature. I shall then vote for the section, for the purpose I have already indicated, without, however, compromising my purpose to oppose it in Convention, unless I am satisfied that the plan proposed is the only remedy the friends of reform can devise.

Mr. CORSON. Mr. Chairman: I do not exactly know who is entitled to the credit of the invention which the committee has given to us, but I do not find in any Constitution in the world any such proposition as this which we are now discussing. As an improvement upon the report of that committee, I would support, of course, the amendment proposed by my colleague (Mr. Boyd.) I do not think, however, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Blair (Mr. Landis) is any improvement on the amendment proposed by Mr. Boyd; but I understand my colleague prepared this amendment because the distinguished gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) asserted that its citizens looked to the people of the country to save the city, remembering, I suppose, that "God made the country and man made the town." We are prepared by this amendment to save the city, and also to save ourselves from all the disgrace of a defeat before the people, for I firmly believe if this proposition, as it comes from the hands of this committee, should be adopted, that the Constitution will fall unless that proposition could be separately submitted to the people and separately voted upon. This can be done, of course, but I suppose every man who is a member of this Convention would like to see the whole Constitution, as it shall fall from our hands, go out before the people as a whole and be accepted as a whole. If we are wise in what we prepare to submit to the people, it will be adopted intact, but no such proposition as is now proposed to be incorporated in the Constitution will ever purge the city of Philadelphia from its corruption—nothing but fire and brimstone, rained down from Heaven, will ever do it, and its citizens will either have to submit or move out in the country. Let them go out to Montgomery county or some other pure spot where election corruptions are unknown.

I infinitely prefer the principle enunciated by the gentleman most at large from Philadelphia, (Mr. Woodward,) in regard to viva voce voting. It is infinitely preferable, and I remember well the words of the Senator from Missouri, (Colonel Benton,) delivered in the Senate of the United States, nearly forty years ago, and which I read when a mere boy, when he described the sublime spectacle of a Roman citizen advancing to the polls and proclaiming: "I vote for Cato to be Consul." The Athenian—"I vote for Aristides to be Archon." The Theban—"I vote for Pelopidas to be Beotrach," and the Lacedæmonian—"I vote for Leonidas to be first of the Ephori;" and why may not an American citizen go up to the polls and proclaim, "I vote for Thomas Jefferson to be President of the United States."

Are the aged men, the old Quakers of Montgomery county, who have been voting for the last fifty years, to be compelled to stand up at the polls, in the bleak winds and snows of February and write their names upon their tickets? I will never submit to such a proposition as that, and I know the people of Pennsylvania will never submit to it. Rather than establish such a provision as this, let us plant a school house on every hill and at all the polls in Pennsylvania. What is wanted in Philadelphia, and in the State, are Quaker meeting houses on every corner of the streets. It would be better to build these, and teach men that they must be pure in all their transactions. What does all this revelation about the poor miserable rounders and repeaters amount to? Are they any worse in their rush for money than the men who jostle each other in the stock gambling rooms in this city, and who, in their mad frenzy, fight over stocks that have no real existence? They are not a bit worse, and they are only one set of scoundrels that ought to be rooted out in this country. I do not think any particular proposition like this is required to correct one particular evil. God Almighty has never descended to the earth every year to change his ten commandments to correct some new evil which has been discovered. We need some broad, fundamental process. I would have the Constitution concise and to the point, but I would leave general principles to the Legislature. Corruption after corruption has been charged upon the Legislature, but henceforth its sessions will be held every two years, and its members will come fresh from the people, and the people will have a better opportunity to correct the corruption if it should exist. We must have a Legislature. It is the means whereby the will of the people is expressed, and I will say that the two gentlemen who represent Montgomery county in the Pennsylvania Legislature are as pure and incorruptible as any two delegates in this Convention. I will say, further, that although one of these gentlemen represents the party to which I am attached and the other the opposite party, and our Senator from West Chester, yet representing, as they do, the counties of Delaware, Montgomery and Chester, they are as pure as any three men upon this floor. So much, then, for our Legislature, and so much for the proposition which is now pending. I hope that not only the amendments, but that the proposition, as it came from the committee, will be voted down, and that we shall have nothing but the good old secret ballot, by which a man can go and vote in secret just as he goes to his closet to pray in secret, that he may be rewarded openly.

Mr. MACCONNELL. Mr. Chairman: I only propose detaining the Convention a very few moments, and in rising I do not propose to say that I am not going to make a speech, and then make a lengthy one. It has seemed to be a very important matter with many of the members upon this floor, that they should define their position in regard to this question, in order that their constituents should understand the position that they hold. I do not think it is very important for me to do this, because I am very certain my constituents know exactly where to find me on a question of this kind. Nevertheless, in order to make assurance doubly sure, I will say that I am opposed to this whole section, as reported by the committee. I shall vote against it in committee of the whole, and I shall vote against it in Convention. During this discussion the frauds which have been perpetrated in Philadelphia have constituted the principal topic. It has been Philadelphia all the time, and if the descriptions which have been made by some of the representatives from the city, concerning its political affairs and election matters, are true, I think its inhabitants are not only unfit to vote, but that the ballot should be taken away from them entirely. If the representations which have been made upon this floor are correct, the city must certainly be exceedingly corrupt, polluted and vile, and I think the only thing that it is fit for would be to make a penal settlement of it, where all the convicts in the State would be sent, and where they would be governed by officers appointed by the State. I would then build a stone wall around it, and I would not permit any Philadelphian to go outside of it, unless he was provided with a passport. Various representations have been made upon this floor in regard to the election that was held in this city on the second Tuesday of last October. It seems that a lot of officers were elected, part of whom settled on Chestnut street, and part came down here to Spruce street. It seems that the part that settled on Chestnut street are a miserable set of rogues, but the gentlemen who came down here to Spruce street are all pure, upright and honest. Now I understand that every district outside of the city of Philadelphia is to be considered in a rural sense. I know that we are very rude in my portion of the State, but we have got a notion that chickens of the same brood are very apt to be alike, and that twin brothers, especially, are apt to have a family resemblance. I do not believe—with all respect to some of the gentlemen in this Convention—that any necessity exists for all the excitement which has been created in the Convention about the dishonesty of the city of Philadelphia. I believe there are enough honest people in Philadelphia to put down all this dishonesty if it really exists. I believe the honesty of the people of Philadelphia is rated here entirely too low, but I think that they are indifferent in a great extent to matters which certainly ought to occupy a large share of their attention. I believe there are more than seven-eighths of the people in Philadelphia who are honest, but that they are too much absorbed in the various pursuits of life to make an effort to put down this corruption. If the seven-eighths of the honest community cannot eradicate the corruptness of the remaining one-eighth, why I say God help them. Now, Mr. Chairman, if it would not be considered impertinent in a member from a rural district to make a suggestion to the representatives of the city of Philadelphia, I would suggest, very humbly, that we have heard just about enough of the corruptions in this city. In speaking for the district which I have the honor to represent, I know that our citizens do not require any such provision, and that it is not needed in any of the rural districts of the State.

We have been debating this thing for several days, and the echo of it has come back from my district to me, and that echo is this, sir: That if you will put it into the Constitution and send it to the people of Allegheny county to vote on it, they will vote against it in a mass. They will not divide on it at all. And more than that, the echo is, that if it is sent to them in the whole Constitution to be voted upon, that, good as the Constitution may be, they will vote it down, rather than have this saddled on them.

Now, sir, I am opposed to the whole thing. I will vote against it, as I said, here and every place where I may meet it.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: I rise for the purpose of giving a very few brief reasons why I think neither of these amendments should be adopted. I shall not go into a general discussion. I had supposed that we had made some progress yesterday, and that this morning we had under consideration propositions to which the debate was to be confined.

I am opposed to the adoption of either of these amendments, because it is an inauguration in the Constitution itself of a species of local legislation—special legislation, if you please—against which the people of Pennsylvania have cried out, almost in mass. We have acted against the principle, so far, in this Convention.

Mr. NILES. Mr. Chairman: I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Have not the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation themselves introduced special legislation in this report, when, in the last section, they have directed that cities having more than one hundred thousand inhabitants shall be divided by the courts of common pleas.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: That is not special legislation, and if the gentleman will wait until we come to the discussion of that subject I will be pleased to answer his question. But, I say here, it is not, in my mind, included in the principle against which I now protest, and I think that the gentleman will be satisfied of that when we come to argue that question.

For the reason given, then, I am opposed to either of these amendments. I cannot appreciate at all the difficulties suggested by my friend from Blair (Mr. Landis.) I have never seen an election district in Pennsylvania in which there was not pen and ink and paper, or, rather, pen and ink, for that is all that is necessary. The paper is furnished on the ballot itself, and only pen and ink will be required. The difficulties are imaginary. I have never seen at any election poll a lack of political servants. Not one man, but twenty men can be found to aid every voter on either side in getting in his ballot, so that these objections are entirely unfounded. But there is another objection to the proposed amendment which has not yet been mentioned. It is this: These ballots will be prepared in view to such endorsement as the Legislature in their wisdom shall prescribe. The ballot will be printed with that view, so as to afford the necessary blanks at the proper places for the endorsement of the name and the attestation. Now these ballots are prepared often in Philadelphia or Harrisburg, and sent out through the State; or, if not, they are prepared in the county towns and sent out into the district. Now mark the confusion which would arise in having two classes of ballots, one for an endorsement and the other without an endorsement. It would lead to difficulty and confusion in the distribution of the ballots, and would result in evil, and only evil, with no corresponding beneficial result. I am therefore opposed to either of these amendments, and hope they will be voted down.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I should not have troubled the Convention with any further remarks, but for the amendment now before the committee. It is proposed now to exempt the greater portion of the State from requiring the electors to write their names on their ballots, and apply it only to the large cities, or boroughs and villages of fifty thousand inhabitants. That embraces, sir, the city of Pittsburg, from which I come, and as one of the delegates from Allegheny county, I protest against this Convention, and I especially protest against the delegates from Philadelphia forcing such a provision upon the city of Pittsburg.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: The amendment was moved by the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Boyd.)

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I am aware that the amendment was offered by the gentleman from Montgomery, but although moved by him, yet it is known that this is advocated mainly for the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: I would like the gentleman to know that I am from Philadelphia, and I am utterly opposed to it.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I am glad to find many gentlemen coming from the city of Philadelphia opposed to this measure. But we have heard from other delegates from the city of Philadelphia that this is necessary for their salvation, and an appeal was made yesterday, if I understand the report in the newspapers, by a distinguished delegate from the city of Philadelphia, to the country members to come up and save them, for they could not save themselves. They were a little better than Sodom and Gomorrah. They have a few more good men here than those cities had, but I understand they cannot save themselves, and the country members are earnestly entreated to come forward and save Philadelphia.

Now, sir, coming from the western part of the State, from the second city of the State, I protest against such a thing being applied to Pittsburg; and I agree with my colleague, (Mr. MacConnell,) that if you force into your Constitution the amendments proposed and now before the committee, our county will not sustain such a Constitution. Why, sir, I venture this assertion, that not one man in the city of Philadelphia ever dreamed that such a proposition was to come before this Convention, until it was introduced here. Who ever heard tell before of a provision in the Constitution that the elector's name should be written on his ballot? It is a thing unheard of. It is new under the sun. Yet we are made believe here, or the effort is made to convince us, that this Convention was called for this very purpose; that the great body of the pure men of Philadelphia, that have been at the mercy of repeaters and scoundrels for years, called this Convention in order to compel the voters to write their names upon their ballots. Why, sir, look at the vote in this city on calling this Convention. Not one out of six of the voters of Philadelphia voted on the question of calling a Constitutional Convention. Not one in six of the voters here voted on the question at all. Whether there should be a Convention to revise the Constitution or not, was not a subject of any interest in this city.

Mr. D. W. PATTERSON. Only seventeen thousand out of one hundred thousand voters voted on the question.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Only seventeen thousand voters out of one hundred thousand and upwards, Mr. Chairman, that have the right to vote in this city, voted on the question of calling a Convention, and yet we are told here that this was the great thing in Philadelphia. I do not believe it, sir. I do not believe a voter in Philadelphia thought of such a thing. I do not believe they thought they were so woefully oppressed and injured, as has been represented here, or they would have turned out at the election and voted for the Convention. I doubt very much if some of the gentlemen from Philadelphia who have appealed to us to come forward and save their city, voted for this Convention themselves. I should like to know if that is not so. I should like to know how these very gentlemen voted on this question? Why, if Philadelphia is to be redeemed, disenthralled and regenerated, it must be a different plan. When these gentlemen will consent themselves to go to an election and stand there during election day, watch the polls, detect the scoundrels and the repeaters, and punish those who commit frauds, when they themselves consent to act as election officers, then, and not until then, will you purify your elections in Philadelphia. When you agree to do what we do in Pittsburg and Allegheny county, and in the rest of the State, when good men, pure men, true men, the best men in the community, will feel it to be their duty on election day to attend the polls, then you will have pure elections, and I repeat it, not until then in Philadelphia. But when these men that from their mothers' arms have been trained up to purity and everything else that is good, will go only once in a while to the election, and when they deposit their ballot run away and never do anything to preserve the integrity of the ballot-box, what else can they expect but that the elections will be controlled by dishonest men? As they have said here, they know of these frauds, these immense frauds perpetrated, and yet they do nothing under the heavens to bring these men who commit them to punishment, and want to shuffle all of that responsibility from themselves on to some imaginary thing like this to save them.

Why, sir, this will not do it. I have found here that those gentlemen who are opposed to the ballot wholly and totally, are for this provision. Every gentleman who wants the viva voce system of voting goes for this. Why? Because they want to destroy the secret ballot, and, sir, if they could do so, will they purify their elections or make impossible the frauds of which they complain? Why this morning I read in the paper of immense frauds perpetrated in the town of Lexington, Kentucky, where this viva voce system is practiced. The election officers excluded from the ballot-box the votes of over one thousand qualified electors, although they have there this open ballot. And, sir, if you have that mode in Philadelphia, frauds will be perpetrated just as long as you let that class of men control your elections. This amendment will not save you.

Mr. WORRELL. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman will permit me to ask a question, will he please tell the Convention why these one thousand votes were excluded?

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Well, sir, the gentleman wants to know the reason of the refusal of these votes in Lexington, Kentucky. I will answer him. They were "niggers;" that's the reason.

Mr. NILES. A good reason!

Mr. WORRELL. Mr. Chairman: Was it not on account of a tax qualification?

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. No, sir. Just because they were "niggers."

So it will be here. You may write your names upon your ballots. If you let rascally men have control of your elections, they will perpetrate frauds notwithstanding that. They can do it. How, sir? Why they can destroy the whole ballot-box. They can destroy the whole tally list and put in other names when it is necessary. They can make the returns of the election declare that certain men have received certain votes, and then somehow, mysteriously, the whole ballot-box, the whole tally list will disappear. They can perpetrate frauds as well with this as without it.

Now there are thousands of men in Philadelphia, there are thousands of men in Pittsburg, and in every other city that has now or soon will have fifty thousand inhabitants, that cannot write their own names, and yet they would feel it a burden to be compelled every time they vote a ballot to write their names upon that ballot, apart from the fact that it is a destruction of the ballot. They would feel it a burden, sir, and many good men would be induced to stay away from the polls. But I object to it further, sir, and here it applies with peculiar force to cities and towns, with this plan of compelling every man to write his name upon his ballot what a power you give to the politicians of the city, these men that control elections, to control the voters. If you let them have the power of ascertaining how every man votes, by merely looking at his ballot, it will be one of the most powerful engines in the hands of politicians to make members of their party vote the party ticket. Both sides and all political parties attempt this thing of getting every man in the party to vote for the party candidates. I say both parties, because I do not discuss this on party grounds at all, but I appeal to the members of this convention to say whether on this plan the strong partisans, the party leaders, cannot most effectually whip in, and whether they will not whip in, all the members of their party and compel them to vote their ticket, or "spot" them.

Mr. NILES. Mr. Chairman: I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

The question being upon the motion of Mr. Niles, it was agreed to.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. I thank the Convention for this courtesy. I shall not trespass much longer upon its time. I wish merely to call attention to a few facts. It has been said that this vote by ballot has been a myth in this city. The gentleman from Philadelphia, on my left, (Mr. Gowen,) who is not now in his seat, said that in the city of Philadelphia they could always tell at the close of the polls how the vote was, that nine out of every ten men could tell how the vote stood; and the distinguished gentleman from Centre (Mr. Curtin) declared that in his town, where there were six election districts, they could at the close of the poll always tell precisely how the vote was. They therefore argue that the secret ballot is a myth.

I reply, sir, that if these are facts, and I take them to be true, what under the heavens do you need this mode of detecting frauds, for when you know how every man votes at the time the polls close? Why do you need this system to detect frauds? The very facts which the gentlemen adduced completely answer their own arguments and defeat their logic.

Mr. WORRELL. Mr. Chairman: The matter of the vote in Kentucky, at which a large number of voters were denied the exercise of the elective franchise, as referred to this morning by the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. J. W. F. White,) was one of the instances to which I referred the other day, in my remarks in opposition to the tax qualification, because in that place, as well as in other sections of the country, it was alleged that the provision of law, which required that the payment of tax should be a pre-requisite to the exercise of the elective franchise, had been so used as practically to disfranchise a large body of electors. And for the reason that such a provision of law might be used in that way I then opposed that provision as reported by the committee, or as inserted by the decision of the Convention.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I have already spoken a few minutes upon this proposition. I do not know that I should have said anything more to the committee if it had not been for the remarks of my colleague from Allegheny (Mr. J. W. White.) I have listened to his arguments upon this section, as I always do, with very great respect, because I certainly have a very high regard for that gentleman, for his intelligence and ability. But I cannot let the statement pass upon this floor that I understand the gentleman to make, that Allegheny county is going en masse against this Constitution if we shall require the voter, as a means of detecting fraud, to endorse his ballot with his name.

Now I understand that our delegation upon this floor is just about evenly divided, and the gentleman therefore speaks, I suppose, for himself. I speak, sir, for myself. I know that the people of this Commonwealth did understand that great frauds have been perpetrated upon the ballot-box, and they did require of this Convention, and it was one of the main causes of the call of this Convention, that it should purify the ballot-box, and they expect this Convention to provide for the people a means of doing it. Of course we understand the means were not pointed out in detail beforehand, but the great evil was pointed at very clearly. It was understood by every man in this Commonwealth. I understand the gentleman (Mr. J. W. F. White) to say that every man upon this floor who supports the report of the committee is in favor of viva voce voting and opposed to the secret ballot. Now I must, in view of this remark, say that I suppose the gentleman did not hear the remarks I made upon this subject, because I said distinctly that I should favor, and would, at the proper time, offer an amendment that the officers of the election board should be sworn to preserve the ballot a secret; that they should not make known the manner in which the voter had cast his vote, unless they should be called upon to disclose it in some proceeding to investigate the fairness or legality of that election; and I understand that to be the view of perhaps nearly every person who has spoken here, with the exception, possibly, of one delegate.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the people of this Commonwealth, and I believe the people of Allegheny county also, are just as much in favor of meeting this question of fraud and purifying the ballot-box as the people of Philadelphia: and when the people of Allegheny county are told: "Gentlemen, we come to you, as citizens of Allegheny county, and say that we have submitted this proposition to you, requiring you to endorse your name upon your ballot, because it will purify the ballot-box, so that each ballot can be identified, and so that the ballot-box stuffers and fraudulent election officers and others cannot substitute any other ballot for your ballot, and thus cheat you out of your rights;" when we tell the people that this practice of stuffing the ballot-boxes and repeating will be destroyed by this plan, they will acquiesce very heartily in the means we thus provide for the detection of fraud. What are these means? A man is registered in his right name; he votes on that name and goes away; he comes back to that poll and personates another voter, whom he finds has not been at the poll. Now by this plan, when this man comes to repeat, if he can do it at all, he has got to add the crime of forgery to repeating. He is obliged to write on the ballot the name of the person whom he attempts to personate.

I understand perfectly well why certain gentlemen are in favor of the secret ballot; I do not mean to apply the remark to any gentleman upon this floor. I believe every man here has the courage to deposit the ballot openly, if it were necessary to the detection of fraud. But, sir, I know, and every man upon this floor knows, that, throughout this Commonwealth, there is not a single political division, or a single election district, where we have not got a race of politicians, from the meanest political rats up to the highest officers—men who make it a rule to promise every man that comes through the district that they will vote for him, and if they can get through with telling five hundred lies during one political campaign, they do very well. Then if they can hide all these lies under the secret ballot, it is a good thing for them. Many of them take money from these candidates for whom they promise to vote. This class of men all want the secret ballot. It will be a terrible thing for them if we shall take it away from them, that we might be enabled to detect frauds, and that honest voters might have their ballots counted for the purpose for which they put them into the ballot-box.

When this matter is considered thoroughly, what is it, this taking from a man the secret ballot? I would like to know whether that ballot is given to that voter as his right? It is given to him by a society. He is bound to cast it for the benefit of that society. He is interested in it only as a member of the community; and if society demands of him, in order to preserve the purity of the ballot, that he shall indorse his name upon it, so that he can identify it, so that he can swear to it, if it becomes necessary, in the investigation of fraud, then it is his duty as a good citizen to say: "I will do so."

I understand, sir, that, when you boil down this matter, fairly and squarely, it just comes to this: If you take away the secret ballot, you will destroy the great right of every one of this class of men that I have spoken of, who promise to vote for everybody that comes along, to hide, by the secret ballot, all their falsehoods.

Reasons have been given for adopting this change in the Constitution, and I believe the people of the Commonwealth, and the people of Allegheny county, are reasoning men, and honest men, and I say, unhesitatingly, what I believe for these people, as I believe for the entire Commonwealth, that when it is explained to them, and when they understand there is a sound reason for it, each man will say at once: "If it is necessary to preserve the purity of the ballot-box I well endorse my name upon my ballot; it is no hardship at all." If frauds are perpetrated in Philadelphia, if in large cities repeating and ballot-box stuffing are perpetrated, why, sir, it contaminates the the vote of the entire Commonwealth. The gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Boyd) limits his proposition, as I understand it, to cities of fifty thousand. If he leaves the door open for the ballot-box stuffer and repeater in this manner they will be transferred from the cities, and will find their way into the country, and the same class of politicians that have manœvered and used these tools in the city, to defeat the honest vote of the people of the Commonwealth, will use them in the country and in the smaller towns. The reason it has not been practiced more extensively there already is only because they could do it better in the larger cities. I know, however, that it has been done in the country. I know perfectly well that one Senator lost his seat because in one of the townships, perhaps the most honest, in this State, in Somerset county, he was just "ballot-box stuffed" out of it. The voters voted right; they swore that they voted right, to the best of their knowledge and belief.

It was in a township composed of these long bearded men, men who would not even put buttons on their coats, but had them all hooked up with hooks and eyes, men who never thought of cheating in their lives. They voted right enough, but they could not identify their ballots, for they had not written their names on them, and the result was that the men for whom they cast their ballots did not get the benefit of them. They only knew that they cast the secret ballot. I know that these frauds are not confined to Philadelphia, but are, to some extent, practiced in the country also, and the instance mentioned I know well, for I happened to be appointed on a committee to judicially investigate it. I should not have spoken again on this section, only because my friend from Allegheny, (Mr. J. W. F. White,) in expressing what no doubt is his honest, and earnest, and sincere conviction, (because I believe him to be an honest and earnest man, and willing to do what is right,) has undertaken to say for Allegheny county what I do not believe; and, sir, I claim the same earnestness and honesty for myself, and I believe he speaks for himself only, and not the sentiments of our people. I speak for myself. I do not know the individual opinion of every man, nor of one-quarter, nor of one-tenth of the men of Allegheny county on this subject. I only reason as a reasoning man, that they are reasonable people, and that they will believe this to be a good measure to detect frauds, and that they will be just as willing to accept it as any other people in the Commonwealth.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Chairman: I have just returned, after spending a few days with my constituents, and I rise to say a few words on the subject now under consideration. I made it a point to converse as extensively as I could with the people of my section on this question. With scarcely an exception, sir, I found them opposed to any change which so effectually destroys the great right of the secret ballot. The allegation of those who favor this radical change from the present order of things is, that it will prevent fraud at the polls. Now, sir, I will go as far as the farthest in advocating and adopting any necessary measure that will insure the purity of the ballot without encroaching too far on established rights. But I regard this measure as unnecessary to prevent frauds upon the ballot, and a serious invasion of rights long established by successful and satisfactory usage. I cannot see from the arguments which have been presented here, and I have been an attentive listener this morning, as I was in the two days in which I was present last week when this subject was debated, which satisfy my mind that this change is either necessary or proper. I say, sir, that I have listened in vain to hear any sufficient reason why we should compel the voter to publish for his friends and neighbors how he votes. I will not travel over the ground which has been gone over by those who preceded me in this debate, the section as reported by the committee. But to my mind there is more than one be sufficient reason why every man should be protected in the exercise of the secret ballot. My neighbor, my companion in business, my most intimate friend, it may be, is a candidate for some local office. I have reasons which satisfy me that I ought to vote against him. Is it necessary, is it desirable that I should be compelled by constitutional enactment to go to the polls and vote so that my neighbor, companion or friend, as the case might be, would know just how I voted, and thus disturb pleasant social and business relations? If such necessity exists, those who style the secret ballot a failure ought to present some all sufficient reason for thus invading the social and business relations of friends and neighbors.

But I deny that the ballot is a failure under our present Constitution. It has been used by most of the great and minor societies with success and satisfaction. Composed as these societies are, of the intelligent, the thoughtful, the secret ballot is firmly adhered to by them because it is the safest and most successful mode yet tried, for expressing their preference in the election of their officers and managers in quiet harmony. Again, take religious conventions. They ought to be, and are, usually, composed of conscientious and intelligent men. How do they vote in selecting such of their number to fill positions in their gift? Usually by ballot. And why? Because it is a better method of maintaining harmony and friendly relations among those who compose such conventions. Take most of the secret societies, many of which are bound together by the closest ties of brotherhood. All of which I have any knowledge, when they come to express their preferences in the selection of the officers who shall govern them, without exception, use the secret ballot. In my judgment, if we embody this proposition in the instrument which we shall finally agree to submit to the people, it will greatly endanger its ratification by them at the polls, and I think we ought not, for the purpose of experiment in a matter involving so important a change, and one of such doubtful expediency, to run the great hazard of having essential reforms, upon which we all substantially agree, defeated. I, for one, will not consent to put them in jeopardy by incorporating either the section as it comes from the committee or as it would be if the amendment were adopted. I shall therefore vote against both the amendment and the section.

MR. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I, too, have been home consulting my constituents, and I did not meet a man who was not in favor of this section as reported by committee. It depends entirely upon how you put it to the people. If you go to a man and say to him: "Now are you in favor of doing away with the secret ballot, and going up and showing everybody how you vote?" They will say "no," as some have to my colleague, (Mr. Ainey,) who just spoke. It all depends upon that. I think it is all nonsense and bosh to say that the people are going to reject this Constitution on account of this provision being in it. I do not believe it at all. I believe that we are sent here by the seven hundred thousand people of the State of Pennsylvania to do this very thing of purifying the ballot-box, and to purify the Legislature. I believe that as sincerely as I believe that I am here. It is a very easy matter to get a public expression in one way or another from people that you meet upon these subjects, by putting the question in a certain way to them.

I did not tell the people that we are going to destroy the secret ballot, because I do not believe it; we are not going to destroy it at all; we are going to leave it as secret as it ever was; we only ask the man to write his name upon it, and we expect the election officers to be sworn to to keep that secret, as much as it is now. If you put it to the people in that way, they will be very ready to do anything to stop the corruption; ready to do anything to root out this sore that is eating us up.

Whilst I am upon my feet I desire to say one word in relation to the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Blair, (Mr. Landis.) I like it very much better than I do the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Boyd,) because it comes nearer to the report of the committee, and the nearer you can get to that report the better I will like it. That is the reason why I like it better, but it is faulty, and I will show where it is faulty. This corruption is not all in the large cities and towns. By no means. I know of a case which happened in a rural district, in a county not more than a hundred miles from Philadelphia, where the whole ballot-box was changed, every vote in it, after the election was closed, and counted for another man, whom it elected to Congress. That was within the last six years. I say I know it. I know it in this way; the man who was elected by the fraud, told me so himself. Now I want to get rid of that sort of corruption. I think if we come to the report of the committee, and put to the people with the rest of the good things that we shall lay before them, I have no doubt they will accept it.

MR. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: When I came into this Convention I recognized the fact, which I have observed in all conventions of which I have been a member, that Pennsylvania consists of the city of Philadelphia and the county of Allegheny; but I do object, as a neighbor of Philadelphia, though not a Philadelphian, that Allegheny county should set up for all the purity in political morals, and undertake to read to Philadelphia a lecture upon their mode of conducting business and upon their behavior. The gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. J. W. F. White) says that if this provision, as reported by the committee, be incorporated into the Constitution which we shall submit to the people, it will be voted against by the people of Allegheny county en masse. I do not believe that, although they proclaimed through one of the organs of the people of that county, after we adopted the provision in the Constitution as to when the election should be held, that our work would be repudiated by the people, and they commenced at that early day to set up for us the opinions of Allegheny county through that organ, which is controlled, it is said, by a hand inspired by the political purity of Robert Mackey and Russell Errett.

I repudiate them as the censors of the political morals of Pennsylvania, and when the gentleman talks about the corruptions of Philadelphia, let me say that the chairman of one of the parties in Pennsylvania, at the last election, who came from Pittsburg, told a member of that committee, when he was asked what would be the loss to a certain candidate in Pennsylvania with regard to his position before the people, and was informed that it would be from five to ten thousand, "we can make that up, here, in fifteen minutes!" That was the information communicated to our county by a gentleman who came from Pittsburg to conduct a political campaign, having his headquarters in this city.

Were those five or ten thousand votes that were to be made up in Philadelphia, to be made by an honest change of sentiment and opinions of the people of this city to the extent of five or ten thousand, or were the ballot-boxes to be stuffed, or the returns manipulated, and through frauds and corrupt practices, to be resorted to for the purpose of defeating the will of the honest people of this great city? Because I believe the honest people of this great city could not thus have been changed. When I refer to the city of Philadelphia, and to what the people here are, I refer to the merchants and manufacturers, and professional men engaged in their daily and lawful occupations as honest and upright citizens, not to those men who make politics a trade, and who have brought Pennsylvania to the condition that we are in to-day, that requires the radical action of this Convention, for the purpose of going down to the foundation of the corruptions and frauds which have been inaugurated in this Commonwealth, and which seem to have their principal seat in this city.

In passing through the streets of this city and looking at the palatial places of business, and upon the honest countenances of the people you meet when you go to their stores or dwellings, it is certainly a matter of surprise that there exists here somewhere out of sight, in the back slums or underground, a power which is capable of bringing disgrace not only upon the city of Philadelphia but the State of Pennsylvania. It seems, however, that this is so, and although this provision, if it is adopted, may subject the citizens of our country districts to many inconveniences, yet I believe they will be satisfied to put themselves to this inconvenience in order that their honest wishes by the ballot shall defeat the machinations of the politicians of Philadelphia who have taken possession of the politics of the State and destroyed the intentions of the people in the rural districts. Now, Mr. Chairman, with regard to this change which has been regarded as radical in its character. Gentleman upon this floor have asked: Has this republican experiment of ours been a failure? Shall we say that the Constitution under which we have been living for the last thirty years has been a failure? Gentlemen upon this floor have said that these old gentlemen in the rural districts who have been accustomed to going to the polls for years without registering, and without endorsing their names upon the ballot, will now be subjected to so many inconveniences that they will never vote. Why, let me ask the gentlemen of this Convention, how can it be known who will be the voters under this Constitution? When this Constitution that we are deliberating upon comes to be submitted to the people, about the year 1895, these old men of the rural districts will be dead, and their children, who will be educated under the common school system of Pennsylvania, will be able to write their names upon their ballots. I speak advisedly in regard to this question, for the gentleman to my left, (Mr. Mantor,) who is skilled in arithmetic, made a mathematical calculation the other day by which he found, according to the progress the Convention has made in the number of sections passed upon in this article under consideration, that it will require a period of twenty years and six months before we have a Constitution framed to submit to the people of Pennsylvania. I say then, by that time the people of Pittsburg will be changed, and the people of Montgomery and the people of Bucks will also be changed, and fifteen or twenty years hence the members of this Convention will still be here discussing this article after it comes out of the committee of the whole. This being the prospect which is before us, I hope the members of the Convention, when they address their remarks to this committee, will reflect upon the condition of affairs that will exist, and that unless more rapid progress is made, that it will be a considerable length of time before the Constitution is submitted for the ratification of the people.

I am in favor of every improvement that will make voting practicable, and that will correct fraud in our elections. I know that we shall not be entirely successful in the end, but we may be able to check these corruptions and defeat the plans of designing politicians for a few years. This same principle has found an illustration in the criminal history of our country. It has not been many years since the Frankinite or chilled iron was invented for the purpose of protecting valuables against the skilful operations of the burglar. This protection, which has been considered impregnable, will only answer the purpose until the energy and skill of the depredator devises some new plan to overcome this protection and secure the business man's books, papers and money. This will be the case with regard to the measures that we may devise to protect the community against that class of corrupt men who make it their business to prey upon the State; and the people of this State will discover that whatever plans may be originated to defeat the accomplishment of fraud upon the ballot-box, skilful politicians, who hold their midnight caucuses in grog-shops, will contrive a plan to overturn and circumvent the wisest provisions of the best statesmen in this or any other Convention.

It is impossible to cure the evil heart. We cannot make men honest, but we can make the accomplishment of these frauds exceedingly difficult. It is the duty of this Convention to devise the most practical plan to ensure the protection of the ballot. I think it is a sacred right, and is of sufficient importance to require men to protect their ballots, either by writing their own names upon them or having their names written upon them by an elector of the district and attested by him, in order that it may be identified in the box as one of the means of preventing this fraud. I understand a great many objections have been urged against this provision. I confess I have not heard much of the debate on this subject, but I understand the principal objection which has been urged is: That it is one of the means by which a man will be controlled in the exercise of the elective franchise, and will be prevented from voting as a free and independent citizen, by reason of the powerful influence which will be exerted by the great corporations of the State. I deem the privilege of every man to vote just as he pleases, and without his neighbor knowing the nature of his vote, to be one of the most important elements in the exercise of the right of suffrage; but I find, in glancing over this provision, that it does not require an elector to unfold his ballot and exhibit it either to the boss or to the owner of any department of business. It does not require an elector to vote an open ballot. He may vote openly or secretly, just as he prefers; but when the ballot is deposited in the box, and fraud is alleged to have been committed, then his name may be referred to, in order to discover the manner in which he voted, and this is the only way in which it can be said an elector is required to vote an open ballot. There certainly can be nothing wrong in compelling a man to vote an open ballot. I say this principle has a tendency to make an elector independent in character, and that instead of the capitalists of Pennsylvania governing and controlling the laboring men in rendering their votes, that it will enable the employee to govern and control the capitalist. One of these branches of our community is as necessary as the other. The laboring man is as necessary to the capitalist as the capitalist is to the laboring man, but while scattered all over this State there are immense numbers of our laboring classes employed by large corporations in iron manufactories, railroads, and in mining operations, yet it will be found that these employees are not controlled by these corporations in the exercise of the elective franchise, but that they take pride in casting a ballot which will, in its aggregate quantity, finally overbalance the power of those who control the purse and treasure of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. Everywhere you will find that these men assert their rights, and take pride in thus showing that they have the power by which to put their veto upon the vote of the men who would control their destinies.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask the gentleman a question, and it is if he had in his employ a man who persistently, and perhaps consistently, voted against his employer's interests, would he or would he not retain him in his employ?

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: Upon political grounds I would undoubtedly permit every man to act according to his own feeling and views, and I would permit him to vote for whom he pleased and for what he pleased. I believe this to be the general feeling which pervades the minds of those who have large numbers of men in their employ. I do not believe that the great corporations and monopolies, or the wealthy firms, or individuals in the State of Pennsylvania, make it a practice to control the ballots of the people that are employed by them. I do not hesitate to acknowledge that there may be exceptions, but I believe it to be the general rule in all these instances that every man's vote is controlled solely by his own volition, and he votes as he thinks best. In presenting these views I have endeavored to be as brief as possible, and in conclusion I can only add that I hope the amendments which have been offered to the report of committee will be voted down, and the article as reported adopted.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Chairman: I shall vote against the report of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, for the reason that I believe that a majority of this Convention can never be secured for such a section. But I desire to say that I was induced, on my own responsibility, to offer the amendment that I have offered, with a view to assist Philadelphia and other large cities, where corruption is said to exist; and I beg to state to the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. J. W. F. White) that no gentleman from this city had any consultation or hand in the getting up of the amendment that I have offered, and that if it is to damage Philadelphia in any way I will withdraw it most cheerfully. I believe that a remedy of that kind, applied to a great metropolis like this, might assist the good people of this city to work out a reform, and cure the evil that is said to exist here. I do not mean by this that I wish it understood that I am one of those who believe that this great metropolis of the State, as much our city as it is the city of the citizens of Philadelphia, contains within itself as much of fraud and corruption as the gentleman (Mr. Simpson) would have us believe. I do not believe that that gentleman, who has undertaken upon this floor to represent all the integrity and morals of this city, is exactly the fit one to do it. I observe he is not in his seat, for which I am half thankful and half sorry. He seems to be speaking all the time for the city of Philadelphia, as if there was nobody from the city who could speak for it. If one-tenth of his experience with regard to the corruption and pollution of this city be true, then indeed she is defiled. But, as I said, I believe these statements to be highly colored. I think the gentleman puts considerably too much paint on his brush as he pictures up the rascalities of this city; and I am, although not a resident of this city, but as a citizen of this State, just as proud of Philadelphia as if I were one of her citizens. I feel as much humbled and humiliated when I hear her thus depreciated as the best of her citizens can possibly feel. I regret and deeply deplore that she should have a representative upon this floor who should take a special delight to make his city appear in the worst possible light, and even to magnify her corruptions.

So with regard to the city of Pittsburgh. I do not suppose for a single moment that even the eloquence and the popularity of the distinguished gentleman from that city (Mr. J. W. F. White) could ever get that city to do a wrong, or get it to vote against a Constitution that we shall submit to the people, simply because the action of this Convention did not entirely accord with the desire of that city in regard to the ballot. I cannot believe that of that great city. She, too, is a proud city, and a city that we, in this section of the State can well afford to be proud of. I do not think there is any corruption there to need any such provision about the ballot as is included in my amendment, yet, at the same time, even if there be nothing there to reform, if the provision will work a good for Philadelphia, that is working a good for the State. I would have no objection, if I thought there were frauds existing in the rural districts, to adopt the section reported by the chairman of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation; but I do aver here that, after thirty-five years of actual observation and experience in the county of Montgomery, there never has been a contested election, nor has there ever been any allegation of fraud, throughout the length and breadth of that county; and when the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Simpson) stated upon this floor that frauds had been committed in Norristown, he was exceedingly unfortunate in fixing that locality. If he had put it in some remote corner of the county, where few of us seldom get, he might have had some hope of escape, for we would not have known whether he was correct or not. But to make that positive statement, in the face of a man who has lived there for thirty-five years, and who has known, from day to day, the acts of the voters of that community, was, to say the least of it, rash. If the gentleman stated it upon information he should give his author. If he said it upon his personal knowledge and responsibility, then I deny it; and if there is no more truth in his statement with regard to the frauds in Montgomery county than there is with regard to the frauds as he, I believe, magnifies them in this city, then I say that his testimony should be wholly and entirely rejected; because, while there has been fraud in this city, and must be, in the nature of things, because it is to be remembered that the very worst men from the country settle down here in the city, where they can have a greater field to carry on their nefarious practices, just as most all the best talent of the State comes to the city because it is better compensated in the city than in the country.

So that I say it is no argument to say, as has been urged here by the gentleman from Allegheny, that the citizens of Philadelphia were regardless of their duty and unpatriotic, when only seventeen thousand of them voted in favor of calling this Convention. I will declare and sustain here upon this floor that this was the strongest evidence of intelligence of this great city that possibly could be produced, because they were entirely sensible to the fact that there was no necessity for this Convention. Although I am here as a member of it, yet I voted against the calling of it. Although I have cried aloud for information to know what the Convention was called for, I have as yet been uninformed, because every reform that has been proposed meets with a warfare which amounts to a defeat. The veterans, the most experienced men upon this floor, are against any material change in the organic law, and the few that are proposed as necessary, could have been just as easily obtained in the usual mode by a resolution of the Legislature, submitted to a vote of the people, just as we have been adding amendments ever since 1838. This would have answered every practical purpose in my humble judgment, and when the gentleman from Allegheny points his finger of scorn and ridicule at the city of Philadelphia, because out of its one hundred and twenty thousand voters only seventeen thousand voted in favor of calling this Constitutional Convention, I say Philadelphia was wise, as she always is, intelligent in everything that she does.

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to longer take up the time of this Convention. I know that everybody is wearied with this debate, but I will remark that if any considerable number of gentlemen from the city of Philadelphia will say that they prefer that my proposition shall be withdrawn, I will withdraw it. If my friends here, Mr. Knight, Mr. Fell, Mr. Cuyler, Mr. Biddle, Mr. Dallas, or any of these gentlemen, will say that they prefer to take the chances on a vote upon the section as reported by the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, I will withdraw my amendment, but I assure them at the same time that they may count upon the fact that this Convention will never adopt the section as reported by the committee, and if it does not, then, as a matter of course, Philadelphia will be left to conduct her elections in the future as she has done in the past.

As I said before, this amendment was a voluntary thing on my part, and I simply repeat, Mr. Chairman, that no member from the city of Philadelphia is to be held responsible for any odium or misapprehension or mistake that can arise from its presentation; the whole responsibility rests upon myself, and was intended for the good of Philadelphia, and any other city of the State where election frauds are known to exist habitually.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I could not help but think this morning, in listening to the course of debate on this subject, that we are certainly making haste slowly in the work committed to our charge. It seems to me that if we are desirous of coming up to the full line of our duty, which the voters who sent us here expect, we should change our course. We certainly ought to take up the sections which have been reported to us in rather a different spirit, so as to arrive at a good result. Now, sir, we have taken an hour and a half to-day to discuss the frauds which may or may not have been committed in the city of Philadelphia, and I have been surprised as I heard all over the State the delegates of county after county, in their places, asserting that in their county fraud does not exist, that in their county the ballot-box is kept open, that in their county elections are the honest expression of the people, and that party tyranny is unknown. I confess I am somewhat astonished at the declaration. At the same time I look with some caution upon any section that claims for itself peculiar privileges in regard to honest elections, and fear that when a delegate claims for his section that "I am holier than thou," the language should be taken subject to some discount. The delegate from Allegheny has said a good deal about the election frauds in Philadelphia, and from his remarks I should judge that we in Philadelphia were in a deplorable condition, in that regard. I admit to the correctness of the charge, but deny the right of any section to make it unless their skirts are clear of fraud. I deny that the county of Allegheny is free from election frauds. I deny that the ballot-box is pure in that county, and therefore in reply say, "physician, cure thyself." A great deal has been said in regard to the want of interest which was shown by the people in regard to the calling of this Convention. Was this want of interest confined to Philadelphia alone? No, sir. The taxables of the State of Pennsylvania number nine hundred thousand; therefore about eight hundred thousand votes for or against this Convention should have been cast. How many votes were cast in the State of Pennsylvania upon this subject? Only about three hundred and fifty thousand. Therefore, if the voters of the city of Philadelphia did not take that interest in regard to the calling of the Convention which they should have done, is not the blame equally applicable to about four hundred thousand of the voters of the State of Pennsylvania who did not see fit to exercise that privilege? Take the county of Allegheny, for instance, about which we have heard so much. Why, according to the gentlemen who represent that county, I should suppose that every man in that county came up to the polls and voted against the calling of the Convention, but the figures do not show it. The taxables of that county amount to about sixty thousand. Only twenty thousand votes were cast for or against the calling of the Convention; therefore about forty thousand votes of that county did not take sufficient interest in this Convention to vote in favor of calling it. About one-third of the electors of the county of Allegheny did not believe it to be necessary that this Convention should be convened. A great deal has been said in regard to the election frauds in Philadelphia. Is this not so, more or less, in all large cities? Is the city of Pittsburg free from it? We in Philadelphia number in population about one-fifth of the State. Concentrate in a given number of acres a like number of any part of the remaining four-fifths of our people, and would not that fact, alone, cause the existence of the same party tyranny that exists here? I therefore conceive it to be in extremely bad taste for any one to rise in his place and say that the people upon the given number of acres that he represents are purer, and more free from fraud, than the people upon any other given number of acres in the State.

I do not judge fraud by quantity. If fraud exists in any county in this State it is not right to judge of it by the quantity committed. The crime itself is just as bad, if committed by forty as by a few thousands, and the remedy should be applied. I therefore do not think that any man has a right, representing any county in the State, to say that his district is pure, because a very little amount of fraud exists in it. I feel it my duty to say, with regard to this matter, that holding up the city of Philadelphia, as it has been held up by this Convention, is not accomplishing the purpose for which we were sent here. The gentlemen from Allegheny county were not sent here to dictate to the delegates from Philadelphia, as to how this city should be governed. That is entirely outside of their province, and I say that there is no disposition upon the part of the Philadelphia delegates to do so either, for if the gentlemen will look over the list of members of the Committee on Suffrage and Election, they will find that out of fifteen but three are from the city of Philadelphia, and they do not favor this section as a measure they wish particularly to be adopted. I say to the gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr Boyd,) in my place, I am opposed to all special legislation, nor do I desire this special legislation for the city of Philadelphia. If it is not a suitable section for the State, then I do not want it adopted in Philadelphia. We can take care of ourselves. We neither ask or desire assistance in any quarter. We demand our fair and equal rights; nothing more. Neither is fraud confined to the boundaries of the city of Philadelphia; fraud exists throughout the length and breadth of the land. As we find it in our State, it is our bounden duty to strangle it, by a process confined to no section, or applicable to no locality, but broad enough and comprehensive enough to grasp and destroy it whenever and wherever found. Do not let us single out any district in specifying where fraud exists, and where it does not. In my opinion the Philadelphia delegates have been at fault in, upon every occasion, bringing into the Convention the disgusting details of party corruption here; I think that their dirty linen should be washed at home. We are here not to legislate for Philadelphia or for Allegheny county, not to correct fraud in either locality, but to correct it throughout the State; to frame an organic law applicable to the wants and requirements of the whole people, and in my opinion the delegate who takes a less comprehensive view of the duties which are incumbent upon him, is not coming up to the full line of his duty.

MR. STRUTHERS. Mr. Chairman: It appears to me that the greater part of the debates which have been had here, have been wide of the mark. I believe it is the design of the members of this Convention to do what the people sent them here for, with regard to this matter of the fraud, and to pass such amendments as will purify the polls as much as possible. It appears to me, however, that there has been a great deal more time spent for the purpose of convincing us that frauds have occurred, and do occur, in various localities, than has been necessary. I think the delegates of this Convention have had experience enough to know that frauds occasionally do break out, and are experienced, and ascertained to exist, not only in Philadelphia, but throughout the State, more or less. The largest aggregate of people being here, it is natural enough that the greatest amount should be here. But that does not matter. The question is whether it does exist. That fraud does exist, we may all take for granted; and yet the time of this Convention has been occupied, for several days, in discussing whether it does exist.

Now the proposition which is made in this report is to cure all this difficulty by attacking the ballot. I would like to know how it has ever been ascertained that the ballot was a failure in this State. The evil which is so much complained of is not traceable to the ballot at all, but to the perverse use made of it to the frauds practiced upon it; and these frauds are what we want to arrive at, not to destroy the ballot. The ballot is an ancient and honorable institution. It is one of the main columns of the temple of liberty. It has long been in existence here, and long been revered, not only in this State, but all over the Union. I think the viva voce vote existed in several States down south. We all know what that lead to. It brought about an aristocracy—a departure from this democratic system of government altogether. It resulted in that, and it resulted in the great war of the rebellion. Now, regenerated, we find that these States are adopting the very thing that we, of Pennsylvania, are to-day contemplating, and devising means and measures to destroy, to tear up by the roots; because it is nonsense to talk about a secret ballot when you require every man to put his name upon it. And it is contemplated by this section that, in certain cases, it shall be signed by a witness. How can that be a secret ballot? The very class who are imposed upon and made use of, for the purpose of effecting these frauds, are that class of persons who will have to go to somebody who can write their names, and get them written. In such a case it is exposed, and it is no longer a secret ballot. Gentlemen of purity, and of independence, care not so much, whether their ballot is open or secret. But the ballot itself, in the manner in which we have used it, is such that any person may make it secret if he chooses; but, on the contrary, if he chooses, he may proclaim it, or he may put it in open. He may vote openly if he chooses; but it allows the timid, and those who are under influences that they do not like to confront, to go and put their ballot in quietly, in such way as their judgments dictate to them as right.

In this connection, for fear I may be misunderstood, I will say that I do not think the ballot is intended so much to guard and protect laborers and the poor and weak from the oversight and the influence and power, brought to bear upon them by their landlords and employers, generally. That is not it. There is no part of the people of Pennsylvania, I will venture to say, that will vote so directly against all such influences as the employees. Miners are not governed by their employers. The employees in the manufacturing establishments are not influenced in that way. The employees of almost all the manufacturing establishments of the country like to have it proclaimed that they vote right against the interests of their employers. They take a pride in doing it.

That is not what the ballot is for so much. It is not to protect them from the power of their employers. It is for the purpose of protecting them from the influence of the manipulators, and the ward politicians, who receive their hire for going about and imposing upon their men, and using them. The ballot should be secured to them to guard them from the foul influences that are attempted to be wrought upon them by that class of men whose business it is to go around and manipulate for a price. Such men as are thus bought up are generally employees.

How do these ballot-box stuffers and that class of men come to be so active? They are all paid for it, sir. And how are they paid for it? How do they get their compensation? They are not candidates themselves; they are not elected to office; yet they are the busy men. They are the busiest bees in the whole hive. The men who, apparently, have no interest in the result, no hopes to be attained. Why is it? The candidates for office furnish the means; they furnish the money; they send these manipulators out to buy up these men.

Now what does this proposition, to put the names of all these parties upon the ticket, lead to in the end? It enables them to go around in advance of the election, sometimes, and secure all these men without doing it in the hurly-burly of the election upon election day. They have months to go around to secure these men; and when they bring them their tickets, and have them put their names upon them, they promise them their pay or pay them. Then, instead of furnishing the means of reducing or in any way putting a stop to all that kind of thing, you are furnishing facilities for the purpose of committing these frauds. You are furnishing facilities to these very men who manipulate these voters.

Now, sir, I only want to say one word farther. I think we are brought here, not for the purpose of tearing to pieces this old, venerable Constitution of ours, but for the purpose simply of revising and amending it? Whoever heard, in Pennsylvania, that we wanted a revision of the ballot? Nobody on earth ever heard of it, at least I never did, and I have looked through the newspapers and never seen it in print anywhere. Nobody ever heard of it until after we came in here. I never heard of it until I saw this report.

I think if a plan were being devised for the purpose of defeating the doings of this Convention, however good and beneficial it may be in other respects, this section would be enough. This very thing would kill it as dead as a nit. The people never would stand it. I do not speak of the people of my particular district or any place else. I have traveled across the State from one end to the other, and seen a great many gentlemen, and this thing has never been intimated to me. I never heard of it. I do not think any man in the State ever did until it was conceived and brought out by this committee.

I hope we will move in a cautious, careful way, making amendments that are desirable, and submit to the people a Constitution worthy of their approval, one that we can hope for the approval of. How can we arrive at that? These frauds I would check as much as anybody; and I would put into the Constitution, as far as can possibly be put there, all the checks that can be put there in the strongest shape. There is a section or two in this same bill pointing to it. You want to reach frauds, not through the ballot, but by watching and protecting the ballot. You want to make it severely penal upon all men who will use money, in any shape or form, for the purpose of affecting elections. You want to make void the elections that they may secure by it, disfranchise the guilty parties from holding office and subject them to fine and imprisonment. The receiver of any such money should also be severely punished by fine and imprisonment. That is the way to get at that matter, in my opinion, and not by attempting to destroy the pure and simple ballot.

I am not in the habit of speaking, Mr. Chairman, but I have felt it my duty to myself and my constituents to state my position in regard to it. My ideas have gone a good deal further and varied very much from those of a large number of the gentlemen who have spoken on the subject upon either side. I shall favor an amendment proposing for the new Constitution the provision as existing in our present Constitution, verbatim et literatim. I see no reason whatever to change that, and to raise up, in that way, a weapon for the purpose of killing it before the people when we lay our report before them.

Mr. M'MURRAY. Mr. Chairman: I desire to make a few remarks on this subject. I notice that the members of the Convention are becoming somewhat impatient and doubtless weary of the subject, and therefore I will be brief. I have occupied, probably, five minutes of the time of this Convention since it convened and shall not occupy much more than that now.

I have observed this discussion as it has progressed from day to day, although I have been absent. One remark I noticed, that was made by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) some days ago. I believe it was this in substance—I saw it in the newspapers of the day—that could he control an earthquake he would hurl it at those persons who would take away or disturb the secrecy of the ballot. That was a grand sentiment; but, sir, I think I can conceive of a grander one. It is this: Could I control ten thousand thunderbolts, and had I the strength of Jove, I would hurl them, were it possible, with the power of Omnipotence itself, against every man, and every set of men, that would attempt in any way to pollute the ballot-box.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the section, as it now stands, will go further to purify the ballot-box than anything else that has been offered in this Convention. When I saw the proposition of the gentleman from Bradford, (Mr. Patton,) relative to electors endorsing their names on their ballots, it challenged my judgment immediately as a thing that would go far to purify elections.

I have heard much about the election frauds in Philadelphia. I want to say this for the comfort of the gentlemen from Philadelphia: That election frauds are not confined to that city. I believe too much has been said about the city in that matter. I believe that my county, in honesty and intelligence, is equal to the average of the counties in the State; and I do know that election frauds are perpetrated in the rural districts of Jefferson county, among the simple inhabitants of the "pines and hemlocks," and we want such a provision as this to prevent them there. It will go far to prevent them there, and to prevent them here, too.

The strong argument that has been made here against the section is that it destroys the secrecy of the ballot. There are several answers to that argument. The first is that the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. J. W. F. White,) a member of the Committee on Suffrage, is in favor of numbering the ballots with a number corresponding to that written opposite the elector's name on the tally list. If that provision is carried out honestly, it destroys the secrecy of the ballot just as effectively as writing the elector's name on the ballot would do. But it is open to this objection. That without this additional safeguard proposed, by writing the elector's name on his ballot, it would only make it easier for election officers to commit fraud than at present, because all they would have to do would be to throw out the genuine ballot and put in another, and write on it the corresponding number. Another answer to the argument is, that there are men here, and excellent men too, who are in favor of taking away the secrecy of the ballot entirely. Another answer is, that by writing the name on the back of the ticket, if there are frauds perpetrated we can ascertain exactly what frauds they are and who perpetrated them. I would say here that if it were necessary in order to prevent frauds on the ballot box, I would, without hesitation, take away altogether that secrecy. The argument, however, that this section would take away the secrecy of the ballot is an ad captandum argument; it is intended simply for the ear of a certain class of the public; there is nothing in it. It is the argument of the politician, and not the argument of the man who, in the honesty of his heart, would go down to the root of the disease and take away the cause itself.

I repeat, sir, that if it were necessary, in order to do away with these frauds, I would take away the secrecy of the ballot altogether. I would say further, that the very fact that we have voted by secret ballot has been the cause of more fraud, corruption, and injury to our government, than any other one thing that can be pointed to. It is not difficult to prove this. I will refer to an instance that has come under my own observation. A man is a candidate for a county office, for instance. Those political friends whom he has known for years he depends on for support. One of these—a man of influence in his locality—leads him, if not by promise, then by other means, to believe that he will support him, and vote for him. The candidate, therefore, depends upon him for support, for he has always been his friend. What is the result? The opposing candidate comes along, and with five, or ten, or fifty dollars—if he is a man to use money, and the other to take it—or with the promised future reward or support, buys the influence of that man against the man whom he had promised to vote for, and this entirely through the secret ballot. Because no one can ever know how the elector votes, he makes a promise to the candidate (or his friends) that he never means to fulfil, and never does fulfil. The secret ballot offers a premium for just such frauds and dishonesty as this. If you take away the possibility of that thing, you take away a powerful means of fraud. Sir, I have known these things to be, and I claim that the section reported by the committee will prevent this almost entirely. But why will it prevent it? Because it will induce men to vote honestly. They cannot pretend one thing to a candidate or community, and then go to the ballot-box and do an entirely different thing. Why? Because their names are written upon their ballots, and it is a guarantee that their votes, as deposited in the ballot-box, redeem the promises they made to the candidates and the community. I mention this because I have not observed that anybody else had mentioned it in the course of the discussion. There is another point that I will mention, which, to my mind, is in favor of the section. Secrecy is associated with the most offensive and revolting crimes. The murderer is in favor of secrecy. If anybody in the world favors it more strongly than another, it is the man who would take the life of his fellow man. The man who commits arson, and the burglar and the thief seek the cover of darkness and secrecy for the commission of their crimes, in the hope and belief that the secrecy and the darkness will give them immunity from detection and punishment. The honest man, on the contrary, will do what he thinks best for himself and others, and do it in the light of day. He is not afraid that people should see or know what he does. He needs no secrecy to protect him.

In making these remarks, however, I do not wish to be understood as favoring an entirely open ballot. I do not favor it, but I go so far as to say, that if I thought it were necessary, in order to prevent fraud, I would favor an open ballot. I do not think that is necessary, however. The present section, requiring the names to be written on the ballots, does not necessarily constitute an "open" ballot. It is only in case of urgent necessity that it becomes known how men vote. The election officers can be sworn not to divulge how any elector votes; and I take it for granted that if this section is adopted, the Legislature will enact a law requiring that the election officers shall be sworn not to divulge how any elector votes at any election. Then the secrecy of the ballot will be observed, except in case of a proper and legal investigation.

In contested elections the value of the information to be gained from the writing of the names on the ballots cannot be over-estimated. We all know that the great difficulty in these cases is to find out which are the true ballots and which the false. It is apparent to the mind of every intelligent man how, with this help, you can arrive with almost unerring certainty at the conclusion, which votes are true and which false; and if the election officers should attempt to erase any name from a ticket, you can tell exactly which name has been erased, and which substituted for it. It is, therefore, a means of inestimable value in correcting frauds when they are perpetrated.

We have come here, sir, for the purpose of getting at these frauds and correcting them, if possible, for we know they exist, and not to make long speeches, or grand speeches, or to cover up or excuse wrong. Here is a practical prevention of fraud and wrong. Let us adopt it.

I have just returned from my home in the country. I have, on my visit to my district, conversed with a large number of persons in reference to this matter, and I have not met one man who was not in favor of this proposition. I have had people to say to me that it is just what they had desired for many years, and that this was the first time they had seen it in any practical form. They told me it would meet the evil and be of inestimable value.

Mr. PATTON. Mr. Chairman: I just rise to state that I have received letters from a number of my constituents, all of whom express themselves decidedly favorable to this section now under discussion, and I hope the section, as reported by the committee, will be adopted.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Landis, to strike out the words, "containing a population of at least fifty thousand inhabitants," to the amendment offered by Mr. Boyd of Montgomery, and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. Boyd of Montgomery.

MR. WHERRY. I call for the reading of the amendment.

The CLERK read as follows:

"All elections shall be by ballot, which shall be numbered by the election officers when received. But in any city, borough or town containing a population of at least fifty thousand inhabitants, the ballot shall be numbered by the election officers when received, and each shall have endorsed upon it the name of the elector, written either by himself or by another citizen of the district, who shall not be an election officer, and all persons voting in a representative capacity shall vote viva voce."

The question was taken upon the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

MR. JOHN M. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following substitute in place of the section, which I think will obviate all the difficulty which has been referred to by some of the gentlemen in the Convention. It is to strike out the section and insert the following: "All elections by the citizens shall be by ballot, and each elector shall write his name upon his ballot or ballots for officers elected by the State at large and for members of the General Assembly, or cause it to be written thereon and attested for him by another elector of the district, who shall not be an election officer; and the ballots for said officers shall not contain the name or names of candidates for any other office."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the substitute.

MR. JOHN M. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman: It is not my desire to prolong the debate upon this question. When it was first reported by the Committee on Elections I was decidedly opposed to the whole principle of the open ballot, but I confess, from what I have heard already upon this floor, that I am personally a convert to it, so far at least, as the substitute which I offer commits me. It has been said in this Convention, and I can assert the same of the district which I represent here, that frauds in the rural districts are, to say the least of it, very rare. In fact I believe there are none at all. There may be mistakes on both sides by the election officers, but these mistakes do not affect the result of the election one way or the other. We are told that frauds are of frequent occurrence in places where large populations exist, and that they cannot be avoided. I believe they are not confined strictly to the city of Philadelphia. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Somerset, (Mr. Baer,) who said if these large cities cannot prevent the commission of these election frauds that they ought to bear the yoke. I think, however, in the elections of State officers, in the election of officers at large, and in the election of members of the General Assembly, the yoke would be borne by all of us, but where municipal officers, prothonotaries, clerks of courts, registers and recorders are to be elected, the burden should be borne by those who permit these villains to bind it upon their shoulders. It has been said that seven-eighths of the people of Philadelphia are ruled by these villains who constitute the other one-eighth. This fact has been admitted in this Convention by gentlemen from that city, and as long as it does exist I would let the seven-eighths of the people bear the burden they have let the other one-eighth bind upon their shoulders; but whenever that burden has to be borne partially by my district, and partially by the whole State, I object to it, and say that the villains of Philadelphia shall not bind their burdens upon our shoulders. I am in favor therefore of applying this provision only to the election of officers affecting the State at large. We must take the people of the State as nature has made them. We cannot make them to suit the Constitution, and we must therefore make the Constitution to suit the people. Now then how are the people constituted? I knew some are strong and independent in feeling as well as in action, but there are others who are timid and weak, and who would not vote as they wished if their neighbors were aware of the manner in which they cast their votes. This feeling applies, perhaps, to only a particular class of officers elected. It has been within the observation of all of us in the districts which we represent that the people usually do not care who knows how they vote for Governor, for a judge of Supreme Court or any of the officers elected at large, but when it comes down to an election of a supervisor, clerk of court, register or recorder, the people do care, and they are particular that their neighbors shall not know how they vote. It strikes me that the substitute I have offered obviates all these difficulties, and where a community allows itself to be ruled and controlled by a minority let them be controlled by it; but when that minority attempts to control the balance of the State, I say my district shall not be so controlled. Let us then adopt all the benefits which accrue from the section as it comes from the Committee, so far as it affects officers at large and members of the General Assembly. Frauds in elections are not so much attributable to the elector as they are to the election officers, and if these gentlemen in Philadelphia, these reformers, instead of sitting at home, in their velvet chairs and with kid gloves upon their hands, would go out and beard the lion in his den, at the proper time and at the proper place, and elect such officers as would carry out the wishes of the people, we would not hear so much about these frauds. Let them meet the danger where it occurs. Let them meet the difficulty where it exists, and not stay in their offices and pour out their paper bullets upon the fraudulent voters and upon the fraudulent election officers, which have no more effect upon them than they would have upon the hide of an alligator.

Let pure and upright election officers be appointed. It has been my observation in the county in which I reside, and in all the rural districts, that the election officers there would as soon think of picking your pocket as to commit a wilful fraud upon the ballot-box. These reform gentlemen in Philadelphia could carry out the same principle if they would take care that the proper men were selected for election officers, and we should not hear so much about these election frauds. The good citizens of Philadelphia are entirely to blame for this condition of affairs, and I would let them bear the burden themselves. I am in favor of the proposition of the committee, so far only as it applies to the officers of the State at large, and to the members of the General Assembly, but for the reasons which I have given, I shall feel compelled to vote against the proposition as it comes from the committee.

The question was then taken on the substitute offered by Mr. John M. Bailey, and it was rejected.

Mr. NILES. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following proviso, to come in at the end of the section: "Provided, That so much of this section as directs that the name of the elector shall be endorsed upon his ballot shall only apply to cities having more than twenty thousand inhabitants."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the section:

"And the election officers and clerks shall be sworn or affirmed before entering upon the discharge of their duties, that they, or either of them, will not, in any way, make known how or for whom any elector shall have voted, except when called as a witness in a lawful proceeding to investigate the validity or regularity, or the alleged frauds in such election, and the violation of such oath or affirmation shall be perjury, and punished as shall be provided by law."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following substitute for the section:

"All elections by the people shall be by ballot. The election officers shall enter and number the names of the electors on the list, in the order of their voting, and number each elector's ballot with his number on the list. All elections by persons in a representative capacity shall be viva voce."

The substitute was rejected.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the section:

"Provided, That in elections for borough, city, township and ward officers the endorsement of his name upon his ballot shall be optional with the elector."

I wish to say, with reference to this section, that I am entirely in favor of the section as it stands; but it must be remembered that the people in the rural districts have no interest in the spring elections. We have an interest, however, in preserving the purity of the ballot-box at the fall elections, because members of the Legislature, Governors, &c., are elected; and in their election we have, of course, a common interest. In view of this fact, we are willing to submit to the inconvenience which will ensue by the creation of such a revolution in the manner of voting as is provided for by this section; but I can see no reason why this inconvenience should be inflicted upon us at the spring elections. In voting for our borough officers, it makes no difference to us how the people in Philadelphia vote, and I can, therefore, see no good reason, as far as the rural districts are concerned, why this provision should be made to apply to all our elections. I have said that we have no common interest in the spring elections, and for this reason I have offered this amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment to the section: "To insert before the word "each," in the concluding sentence of the section, the words "at the November election."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAZZARD. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following as a substitute for the section:

"All elections of the citizens shall be by ballot. The ballot voted may be open or folded, as the elector shall prefer, and they shall be numbered by the elector in the inside, and the same number shall be put on the tally list, and when the votes are counted the tally shall be sealed up. Voting in a representative capacity shall be viva voce."

The substitute was rejected.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following as an amendment, to come in at the end of the section:

"Persons in a representative capacity shall vote viva voce."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following as an amendment, to come in at the end of the section:

"And that every elector shall be required to affix his photograph to his ballot before he deposits the same."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GILPIN. Mr. Chairman: I offer to amend the section, by inserting the words "the back of" between the words "upon" and "his," in the concluding sentence of the section.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following as an amendment to come in at the end of the section:

"Provided, That before this provision shall go into effect the Legislature shall provide by law the form of oath to be administered to the election officers and clerks to keep and maintain the secrecy of the ballot, in all cases except in lawful proceedings to enquire into the irregularity or alleged frauds in the elections."

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I have previously in this debate, Mr. Chairman, stated to the committee that I should support this proposition as it came from the Committee on Elections, provided, however, that at the end of the section there should be added a provision whereby the election officers and clerks should be sworn and that the vote of the elector should be kept secret except when it was otherwise necessary in the investigations of elections. Now this oath is perfectly right and proper, and with this addition which I have proposed to this section the ballot is rendered just as secret as it is now. I do not understand why the friends of this section are not willing to incorporate this oath in its provisions. It seems to me this oath is necessary to the completion of the section, and in order that the citizens of the Commonwealth may know that it will be beyond the power of the election officers and the clerks to divulge the manner in which they have voted, I take it that this oath is perfectly right and proper, and that we should put it in right here, for if we do that we can then say to our constituents: "We have given you the means of voting and have made the ballot as secret as it is now."

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: I desire to state, in explanation, that the committee in their discussions supposed that this question was one resting solely with the Legislature. The secrecy to be enjoined upon those officers having charge of the election is a proper subject for legislative action, and it is one which can be properly referred to that body.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I am of the opinion that this amendment, if adopted, will preclude all action by the people, under the section, at the election to be held upon the adoption of the amendments to the Constitution, and that it will preclude voting under the section at the next general election, when, possibly, very important questions will be decided. If the amendment shall be adopted in its present form, no election under this section of the article can be held until the general election of 1874. For my part I have no objection to voting upon second reading in favor of an injunction to the Legislature to adopt such a provision, but I do not desire to take any step which shall interfere with the adoption of our amendments to the Constitution when they come to be voted upon by the people, or to lose the advantages of the section at the very important election to be held next fall. For the present, therefore, I shall vote against the amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Howard, and it was rejected.

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following substitute for the section:

"All elections shall be by ballot, except by persons in a representative capacity, who shall vote viva voce."

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I rise to a point of order. That amendment has already been voted upon, and has been rejected by the Convention.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken, and the amendment cannot be considered.

Mr. RUNK. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following substitute for the section:

"All elections of the citizens shall be by ballot, open or secret, as the elector shall prefer. The ballot shall be numbered by the election officers when received, and the name of the elector endorsed thereon by the officer, in the presence of the elector, who shall furnish the elector with the number of his ballot."

The substitute was rejected.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following substitute for the section:

"In all elections by the people, and also by the Senate and House of Representatives, jointly or separately, the vote shall be personal and publicly given viva voce: Provided, That dumb persons entitled to suffrage may vote by ballot."

The substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the section.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I call for the reading of the section.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION —. All elections of the citizens shall be by ballot. The ballots voted may be open or secret, as the elector shall prefer, and they shall be numbered by the election officers when received. Each elector shall write his name upon his ballot, or cause it to be written thereon, and attested for him by another elector of the district, who shall not be an election officer.

Mr. TURRELL. I move to strike out all after the word "ballot."

The motion was not agreed to.

The question being then taken upon the second section, a division was called for which resulted: Affirmative, thirty-nine; negative, fifty-seven. So the section was rejected.

The CLERK read the third section, as follows:

SECTION 3. Electors shall in all cases, except treason or felony and breach or surety of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance on elections, and in going to and returning therefrom.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. I move to amend, by striking out "or," in the first line. It is a typographical error.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question then being upon the adoption of the section, it was agreed to.

The CLERK read the fourth section, as follows:

SECTION 4. Whenever any of the qualified electors of this Commonwealth shall be in any actual military service, under a requisition from the President of the United States, or by the authority of this Commonwealth, such electors may exercise the right of suffrage in all elections by the citizens, under such regulations as are or shall be prescribed by law, as fully as if they were present at their usual place of election.

Mr. ROSS. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment:

The CLERK read:

Strike out all after the word "election," in the fourth line, and insert, so that the section shall read:

"Whenever any of the qualified electors of this Commonwealth shall be in any actual military service, under a requisition of the President of the United States, or by authority of the Commonwealth, such elector shall exercise the right of suffrage, in all elections by the citizens, only when present at the respective places of election of which they are residents."

Mr. ROSS. Mr. Chairman: Before the vote is taken upon this amendment, I desire to say a word or two in explanation of the reasons that induced me to offer this amendment, and why I think it should be adopted. After the very extensive debate which took place in regard to the question of female suffrage, I think it is pretty generally admitted here that there is no such thing as a right to vote; that it is a conferred privilege; that it is a grant, and not a right; and therefore, sir, I want to start out in what I have to say by assuming that position to be correct.

In the second place, it is well known to all of us that the law-making power has restricted and modified the exercise of this privilege of voting; and again, it is well known that arbitrary restrictions—restrictions which have had reasons for their passage existing only in the minds of the law-makers—have been passed. Why is it that no man can vote until he is twenty-one years of age? Why is it that a residence is required? These are arbitrary restrictions.

Now, sir, I am aware that the character of the amendment which I have offered will, perhaps, strike gentlemen in this Convention as being one which will not be popular throughout the State. I am aware, sir, in view of the recent war which took place in this country, that it was thought right then that the citizens who left their homes at the call of their country, and who went away and were fighting and were located in different places at the time that election took place, should not be deprived of their right to vote because they had been animated by a patriotic spirit, and had left their places of residence at the call of their country, to fight for it. I know that at the time a vote was taken in this State as to whether soldiers should have the right to vote when away from their places of residence, that it was thought to be an unpopular movement to oppose that right to vote; but I submit to this Convention, and I submit to the common sense and sound judgment of the people of this State, whether it is not an extraordinary provision to put into a Constitution, that a man not at the time a resident of the district in which he has to vote, or where his vote is to be counted, and the district which will be affected by that vote, who may perhaps have been absent from that district for a period of a year or more, who, perhaps, has been so situated that he is not familiar with the requirements or the wants of his district, shall have the right to vote, perhaps a thousand miles away from his home, where there is no opportunity for his fellow electors to challenge his vote, to ascertain whether he has complied with the other requisites which the Constitution requires. Such a provision has always appeared to me to be of an extraordinary nature, and contrary to intelligence and sound judgment.

There is a well known maxim, which says inter armis silent leges, and I think it applicable to this very question. Who has pretended to say, who can pretend to say, that the votes that were cast, in a number of instances during the war, by soldiers away from their places of residence, were the free, untrammelled expressions of their sentiments upon the occasions upon which they were voting?

In my own Congressional district, composed of county of Bucks and a portion of Philadelphia, I recollect very well that in 1864, after the Philadelphia wards had voted, and after my own county had voted and after all the votes had been counted and the result was known, there came from the south a parcel of votes, which, when counted, completely and entirely changed the result of that election. It was never pretended; it was never even asserted by the gentlemen upon whose side those votes were counted, that they were the honest, the legitimate votes of the persons casting them. We all know, and can very readily appreciate the circumstances under which a private soldier, away from home, under control and discipline, would cast his vote.

I sincerely hope that this country may never again be plunged into a war such as we have lately gone through; but still, it is possible that it may occur again; it is possible that our citizens may be required to leave their homes as they did before, and then this provision in the Constitution will be called into exercise, and the sentiments of voters at home will be affected and changed by the action of voters at a distance, who may or may not have cast the ballots which are represented to have been cast by them.

I hope that this Convention will seriously consider this section before voting, to adopt it as reported by the committee. I hope that you will ponder well upon the effect and upon the consequences which a provision of this kind may have upon the result of our various elections. A soldier stationed at Wyoming territory, who claims a residence in this city, or who claims a residence anywhere in the State of Pennsylvania, may, under this provision, cast his vote out there and have it counted here, and that vote may or may not materially affect the result of our election. I submit that it is unwise; I submit that it is contrary to the spirit of our Constitution; that it is contrary to the spirit of the enactment in relation to the right to vote, that a provision of this kind should be inserted into our Constitution.

Why, sir, the right to vote is an arbitrary right. The privilege of voting is a privilege which is exercised under arbitrary restrictions, and all this is simply doing nothing more than saying to the military man, who is away from his home, that he must come back to his home to vote with his other fellow-citizens, or he cannot vote at all. It is not hard upon him, no harder upon him than it is upon other persons who are regular electors, who have been compelled to move out of their districts, and who, by reason of moving away, have lost their votes.

I do not suppose any gentleman in this Convention will pretend that the sections of this Constitution which will be adopted will always work well, and will always be right and proper. We do not, certainly, arrogate to ourselves more power or comprehension than the Almighty himself has exercised in his laws, and no gentleman will pretend that the divine laws always, and in all instances, work properly and work correctly. The Almighty governs us by grand laws, and in the individual working of some of those grand laws great apparent personal injustice and harm is done. In the law of gravitation I submit there are individual instances where great individual harm and great individual injury result in consequence of the workings of that great law of gravitation. A little child, standing balancing itself at a window, without being conscious of the danger of its situation, without being old enough to recognize its peril, loses its balance, and in consequence of the law of gravitation, is thrown down upon the ground and its life destroyed; yet, who would say that, because in that individual instance, the law of gravitation worked an injury; therefore the law is wrong, and that it ought not to exist? So I say that, even if this amendment, which I offer in an individual case, did harm and worked an injury to the individual, yet, for the sake of the general good, for the sake of the community, it is required, and it is necessary, and I think it should be made a part of this section, and the section should read as I have amended it.

Mr. HUNSICKER. Mr. Chairman: I trust that this committee will not act hastily upon this section. I would suggest that here is one of the widest doors that could be opened to fraud. The article which we are now considering is copied from the old Constitution, or rather from an amendment to that Constitution. It was passed in a period of great public excitement, and I know, as an individual instance, that when the question was voted upon by the people, there were stationed around the poll where I voted—not exactly stationed, but there were standing—soldiers wearing the United States uniform, one of whom declared that somehow or other if any voter saw fit to vote against the soldiers voting, he fell down. He could not account how it happened, but he said that was the result.

It was adopted, therefore, in a period of great excitement, and without proper consideration. We are now living in a time of profound peace. We have but very few soldiers wearing United States uniform in actual service, and these are stationed out at the frontiers, and different places, taking care of the government property; but we may have another war. Nations are not exempt from that calamity, and I would like the committee to consider. You have adopted provisions to prevent frauds. You have defined the qualifications of voters, and have prescribed a penalty against those who would pollute the ballot-box, either by fraudulently voting or by a fraudulent count, or by fraudulent returns. I ask how would you enforce these laws against the election officers who are holding the election within the confines of a military camp? I would like to see that constable who would go, armed with a warrant of this State, into the State of South Carolina, when that State is in a condition of actual war, to arrest the judge of elections and to bring him to Montgomery county for trial. Is it not well known, in this State, that in the contested election case of Ewing and Thompson, it was the fraudulent manipulation of the soldiers' vote that determined that election; and we all know—I know it, and I presume every member on this floor knows it—that the ballots were cast for one party in the field, and were returned for the other party when they came home. I would ask, if you have a war, and you have five hundred thousand electors in the army—if you could get so many into it—and put them into actual service, and you were to have an election poll in each company, with as many officers of course as there are companies—and if these officers are to be bound by the election laws which we have passed, how are you going to punish either the soldier who illegally votes, or the officer who commits a fraud upon the election?

If the elective franchise is to be valuable, if it is to be a reflection of the public will, it must be pure, not only at home but everywhere; and it is utterly impossible for the private soldier, who will even black the boots of his captain (if ordered so to do)—although in violation of the articles of war—to vote against the wishes of his superior officer. He has not the moral courage to do it. Is not that true? Do we not all know that to be true? If even he has the moral courage and does cast his ballot, there are no guards that can secure that from being altered. I want the soldier to vote, but I want his vote counted for the party he voted for. We have had one election law allowing soldiers to send their ballots home and vote by proxy; and it is said that General Hancock voted in that way for General McClellan, and when it reached home it was voted the other way.

I have cited these individual instances to direct, if I can, the attention of the committee to what I conceive to be as important a question as this committee can have before it. I therefore trust the committee will ponder well the subject, because it is one well worth considering.

Mr. NILES. Mr. Chairman: If the committee desires to vote I will not take up time in discussing this question; but I must say I am surprised at the amendment offered by the gentleman on my left (Mr. Ross.) In effect it is simply this, that every man who has patriotism enough to volunteer in defence of his country is to be disfranchised. If his proposition was simply to strike out this section, which was the result of the great difficulties of 1863 and 1864, it would have been a more manly proposition, it seems to me.

We all understand the origin of that amendment. We know very well why that was incorporated into the organic law in 1864. We remember, sir, that at that time a hundred thousand of the brave boys of Pennsylvania were absent from their homes, from their voting places, fighting in defence of your country and mine. We believed that the crisis had come, and that it was dishonorable for us to remain at home, around our peaceful firesides, to vote when these men who were upon the tented field were deprived of the privileges of voting; to say who should rule and reign over them.

Now comes the simple proposition to do away with what we did in 1864, because if the amendment is to prevail, and if the soldier is only to vote when he is at home, we may, it seems to me, just as well blot out this whole section, which simply means to annul the section of 1864. I am opposed to the amendment, and in favor of the report of the committee.

In reference to frauds, I believe, sir, that the experience of 1864 and 1865 shows that, as honest elections were held in the army, there was as fair an expression of the qualified voters there as there was in any of the rural districts of Pennsylvania, to say nothing of our great cities. The gentleman who has spoken in favor of this amendment, and against the provision of 1864, says that the soldier has not the moral courage to vote against his superior officer. Well, sir, in answer to that, I undertake to say that the man who will leave his home and his fireside, and leave everything but life, and fight in defence of his country, has the moral courage—if he has the physical courage to enter the battle field, he has certainly the moral courage to vote according to the dictates of his own conscience. If any man is deprived of the right to vote it ought to be the man who sits supinely at home, and not he who leaves everything and fights in defence of his country and flag.

The question being upon the amendment offered by Mr. —, it was rejected.

The question then recurring upon the section, it was agreed to.

The fifth section was then read, as follows:

“The Legislature shall enact a uniform law for the registration of electors, but no elector shall be deprived of the right to vote by reason of not being registered.”

Mr. NEWLIN. I move to strike out all after the word “electors,” so that it shall read: “The Legislature shall enact a uniform law for the registration of electors," and let it stop there.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: In view of the discussion likely to ensue upon this subject, I would ask that it go over for the present, because I consider that the amendment offered by the gentleman is a very important one, and I have no doubt many gentlemen will like to speak on it.

The question being upon the amendment offered by Mr. Newlin, it was rejected.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, by inserting the word "qualified" before the word "electors," so as to read, "qualified electors;" and also to amend the latter clause, by adding at the end the words "in his district," so that it shall read, "by reason of not being registered in his district."

The question being upon the amendment offered by Mr. Edwards, it was rejected.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: Since we have adopted the tax qualification as one of the qualifications of an elector, I feel very strongly inclined not to vote for this section. I concur in the report of the committee, and am in favor of requiring the Legislature to pass a registration law, after we had taken away the tax qualification. I believe, sir, that tax lists will answer all purposes of a registration law where that registration law is as null as could be, under this section.

What is the use of a registration law, when the omission of a voter's name from it does not prohibit him from voting? I apprehend the use of it will give an approximate list of the voters. If we have a tax list prepared by the tax collector, I think we will have a better list of voters than we can obtain under the registration law which is proposed by this article reported by the committee. I think, however, the registration of electors will be of very little use, and therefore, since the first section of the report of the committee has been modified, I shall vote against the section. Some of the members of the committee were opposed to any registration law, because it would be conclusive upon electors, and they therefore insisted upon the proviso being inserted that no man should be deprived of his right to vote, simply because his name was not on the registration list.

Mr. McALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: It was the decided opinion of the Committee on Suffrage that the registration law should not deprive a person of the right of suffrage, who had that right by reason of being a resident of the district, and that the neglect of the officer in putting his name upon the list should not deprive him of the right of suffrage, when he should prove to the satisfaction of the election officer that he had the right independent of the registration. It was shown clearly to the committee that under our tax prerequisite instances had occurred in which the neglect of the officer to assess the citizen had deprived him of his vote, and this, although the voter had gone to the officer at the proper time, and desired to be assessed, and the officer had then and there promised to assess him; yet not having been returned by the assessor he was in consequence deprived of his right to vote. It was to prevent a recurrence of such injustice and wrong that this section was framed and reported to the Convention. It seems to me the mere retention of the tax prerequisite to the right to vote does not supersede the necessity of this registration of voters. The registration is desired to give notice to the electors of the district who claim the right to vote, in order that inquiry may be made into their character, how long they had resided in the district and where they resided before they came there. This is all necessary, whether the tax qualification be stricken out or retained. Tax-payers are not all voters, nor are all voters necessarily tax-payers.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman: I think, as the section reads now, it is rather incomplete. I think the difficulty can be remedied by means of the proposition which was suggested by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard.) His suggestion was that the words "otherwise qualified elector" will remove every possible objection which could be raised to the section. I move, therefore, to amend the section, by inserting the words "no elector otherwise qualified shall be deprived of the right to vote."

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: I think this proposition might as well be voted down. It is nothing but a mere matter of legislation, and I am opposed to putting anything of the kind in the Constitution. The Legislature can, if it sees proper, pass a law prescribing the form and manner by which voters may be registered, and I cannot see the necessity of placing any such provision in the Constitution.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: It is well known to many members of the Convention that the mere fact that a man is a tax-payer does not entitle him to vote, and, in many instances, tax-payers are not electors.

Mr. Kaine. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. Howard. Certainly.

Mr. Kaine. I desire to ask the gentleman whether that will prevent the Legislature from passing a law upon the subject? The mere fact that some citizens are tax-payers would certainly not prevent the Legislature from passing a law upon the subject. I have no objection to a registration law, but I am opposed to placing in the Constitution a subject which is a proper one for legislative action.

Mr. Howard. Mr. Chairman: The remarks of the gentleman may be very true, but, if this provision is placed in the Constitution, this trouble can be remedied before the Legislature can act in the matter. I have risen, however, for a single purpose, and that is for the purpose of correcting the idea, if any such idea prevails at all, that the tax list would be a criterion by which the electors of our districts could be determined, because there may be tax-payers who are not electors at all. The word "elector" describes a qualified elector, and it embraces all the qualifications of a voter.

Mr. D. N. White. Although tax-payers, yet are not the names of all the electors found on our tax lists?

Mr. Howard. That may be, but the object of registration is for the purpose of giving notice to all other electors of the district, in order that they may ascertain who have been selected and placed upon the list as electors. If their names have been wrongly entered, it at once furnishes the information to the other electors.

Mr. Minor. I would like to inquire whether the registration of voters gives them any advantage which they would not otherwise possess.

Mr. M'Allister. Mr. Chairman: It is a duty imposed upon the Legislature to make this registration of voters. The gentleman from Crawford (Mr. Minor) asks the question whether any person can be a voter who is not a tax-payer. I answer, certainly. If the citizen has paid a tax within two years, and has resided in the district two months, he will be entitled to vote, although not a tax-payer of the district at all, so that the assessment of a tax in the election district is no criterion of the right to vote, or of a just claim to the right to vote. It is for the purpose of giving notice of this claim of right to vote to persons who are interested that registration is rendered necessary, and it is, therefore, enjoined by the section under consideration, as a duty upon the Legislature to provide this means of preventing fraud and corruption.

Mr. Carter. Mr. Chairman: I cannot agree with the gentleman from Fayette (Mr. Kaine) and others, when they assume that the Convention, on a second reading, will decide to retain what I regard as a most odious feature—property representation—of which the tax qualification is the tail end, and which I hope will be cut off in this body.

In reference to the provision which is to be made by the State, in which all the voters of the various districts are to be placed upon record, I would only remark that I do not agree with the gentleman from Fayette, (Mr. Kaine,) that this is a matter which should necessarily be left to the Legislature. I regard this provision as one of those which the committee has reported for the purpose of establishing guards around the sacredness of the ballot-box; and I think it might be said, with just as much force, that the Legislature should provide for the purity of the ballot-box in other respects.

It has been remarked that there appears a sort of contradiction in the wording of the section, where it is provided that a citizen shall not be deprived of the right of suffrage in the event of not being registered. This is a question which was fully debated in the committee, and it was decided that this provision was necessary to protect the voter, in case the registering officer omitted some names from the registration record. I think it is eminently proper that there should be some such provision of this kind made between the State and the voters, and that there should be a proper registration law.

Mr. Newlin. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to, and the President resumed the chair.

IN CONVENTION.

The committee then rose, and the chairman, Mr. Lawrence, reported progress and asked leave for the committee to sit again, which was granted; and to-morrow was named and agreed upon.

Mr. Dallas. I move to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

So the Convention thereupon, at two o'clock P. M., adjourned.

FORTY-SEVENTH DAY.

WEDNESDAY, February 19, 1873.

The Convention met at ten A. M. Prayer was offered by Rev. James W. Curry.

JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

VISITING PENITENTIARY.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will observe that a few days ago an invitation was received from the officers of the Eastern penitentiary, asking the Convention to visit that institution, which was accepted. Upon a subsequent day a motion was made to fix the time. Pending that motion the Convention adjourned. If any gentleman will now make a motion in reference to the subject it will be received.

Mr. HAY. I move that the time be fixed for Saturday next at two o'clock P. M.

Mr. TEMPLE. I move to amend by inserting "Friday" in place of "Saturday."

Mr. KNIGHT. I move to amend the amendment, so that it will read "Saturday week at two o'clock."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question being taken upon the motion as amended, it was agreed to.

PRIVATE CORPORATIONS.

Mr. D. W. PATTERSON presented a memorial from citizens of Lancaster county, asking for a change in the Constitution respecting private corporations, which was referred to the Committee on Private Corporations.

PROTHONOTARY'S REPORT.

Mr. CLARK presented a report from the prothonotary of Indiana county, showing the number of cases outstanding and upon the docket, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. CARTER presented a petition from citizens of Mar'etta, regarding the subject of liquor license, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

PRINTING CONSTITUTION.

Mr. KAINE offered the following resolution, which was read twice and agreed to :

Resolved, That the Clerk is hereby directed to have the Constitution of the State correctly printed, in bill form, and placed upon the files of members, so that its amendment may properly be considered by the Convention.

VIVA VOCE VOTING.

Mr. HEMPHILL offered the following resolution, which was read :

Resolved, That the Committee on Suffrage be instructed to report a section providing for viva voce voting at all federal, State and municipal elections.

The question being to proceed to a second reading of the resolution, it was not agreed to.

CITIES AND CITY CHARTERS.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Cities and City Charters, presented the following report, which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed, namely :

SECTION 1. The Legislature shall pass general laws whereby a city may be established whenever a majority of the electors of any town or borough, voting at any general election, shall vote in favor of the same being established.

SECTION 2. Every city now existing or hereafter established shall be governed by a mayor and a select and common council, in whom the legislative power shall be vested.

SECTION 3. The mayor shall have a qualified veto on all the acts and ordinances passed by the councils, shall see that the duties of the several officers are faithfully performed, but shall exercise no judicial functions, civil or criminal.

SECTION 4. The Legislature shall pass no special law enacting any municipality or regulating its form of government, or the management of its internal affairs, or altering the charter of any city now existing, or creating a public commission for any purpose, unless such law is specially asked for by a majority of each council for a definite object; nor shall such special law prove any force or effect unless accepted by a majority of each council, and by a majority of the legal voters voting at the next municipal election after the acceptance by the councils. Every municipality shall have power to pass laws for its own regulation not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States or of this Commonwealth.

SECTION 5. No city shall have the power to create hereafter a debt exceeding two and one-half per cent. upon the assessed valuation of the real and personal estate within its corporate limits, except to suppress rebellion or repel an invasion of the State.

SECTION 6. Every city shall create a sinking fund, which shall be inviolably pledged for the redemption of its permanent debt.

SECTION 7. No city shall, by a vote of its citizens, or otherwise, become a stockholder in any company, association or corporation, or obtain money for, or loan its credit to any corporation, association or party.

SECTION 8. A municipal officer who has not accounted for and paid over money officially in his hands shall be ineligible to any municipal office.

SECTION 9. The Legislature shall not except any property, real or personal, within any city, from municipal taxation, except such as is exempted throughout the State by general law.

SECTION 10. The select and common councils, or either of them, shall have power to appoint a committee of their bodies or body to investigate official misconduct, with power to subpoena witnesses, compel their attendance, examine them under oath, and require the production of books, papers, documents and vouchers, and in case of the neglect or refusal of a witness to appear, the court of common pleas of the county in which the city is, upon proof of the service of the subpoena, shall issue an attachment and compel the appearance.

In case a witness shall appear, but refuse to testify, upon the same being brought before the court, it shall commit the witness for contempt, and impose such fine as in its discretion shall seem meet.

If the charge is established, and the finding is approved by the councils, or council appointed by the committee, then the office shall be declared vacated, and the officer shall be ineligible to any office of trust or profit under the municipality, and may be prosecuted in the criminal courts.

Wilful false swearing before such committee shall be deemed perjury.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. CORBETT presented five memorials from citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the insertion of a provision in the Constitution prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, which were referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. JOHN N. PURVIANCE presented two petitions from citizens of Butler county, praying for the insertion of a provision in the Constitution prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

THE PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the consideration, in committee of the whole, of the article submitted by the Committee on Suffrage.

The Convention then, as in committee of the whole, Mr. Lawrence in the chair, proceeded to the further consideration of the article submitted by the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation.

THE CHAIRMAN. The amendment now pending is that of the gentleman from York, (Mr. Gibson,) which will be read for the information of members.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

Insert after the word "elector," the words "otherwise qualified," so as to make it read:

The Legislature shall enact a uniform law for the registration of electors, but no elector otherwise qualified shall be deprived of the right to vote by reason of not being registered.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman: Perhaps I did not hear the amendment correctly read, but it strikes me the language is not proper to put in here. It seems to indicate that registration is a qualification of an elector, which is not the case.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman: I am opposed to the amendment, because I think the idea can be better effected otherwise. I think the registration law is needed, and I also think it is eminently proper that this Convention should do something about it.

It was said yesterday that this was not necessary, that it might be provided by legislation. I took occasion to look over the various State Constitutions, and I find no less than twelve of them in which there is a registry provision; those being mostly recently formed Constitutions.

I hope this amendment will be voted down, and one which I shall offer will be adopted, which will remove the chief objection that I have heard urged. Therefore I shall vote against this amendment, and hope it will not prevail.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. I want to say just one word in reference to this. We have defined, in what we have already done, what we mean by elector. If the word were "citizen," then it would be proper to say otherwise qualified; but it is clearly set forth that an elector is a person entitled to the right of suffrage, so that the words of the amendment would be superfluous.

The question being upon the amendment of the gentleman from York, (Mr. Gibson,) it was rejected.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman: I offer my amendment now, to strike out all after the word "of," where it occurs the last time in the section, and insert the words "neglect, intentional or otherwise, of the registering officer."

I will occupy but a very few minutes of the time of the committee. I consider this an important question. It is true that the citizens of this city, and perhaps of Pittsburg, have had a law which has not given satisfaction. I think that arises more from the defects of their law, defects that could be remedied, than the defects of a general registry law. I do consider that it is the true idea that a registry of voters is necessary, because it is the only means of connection between the voters of the State and the State. The tax list is for another purpose. That represents, as it were, the property of the State—the other the children of the State—the voters of the State. I think it is absolutely necessary. I am strenuously in favor of this, because I hope the Convention will remove the tax qualification, which I think wrong in principle. I am a democrat dyed in the wool—not in the partisan sense of the term, but in its broader sense. I would remove all restrictions upon the right of a man to vote. This tax qualification is a relic of the old property qualification. It is only retained in four or five States. Now, it might be of interest and profit to examine those States who have retained that qualification, to see whether they are worthy of imitation or not. Delaware is one, with its whipping post; Rhode Island is another; Georgia is another.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman please explain what connection he proposes to establish between his remarks and the amendment under consideration.

Mr. CARTER. I would simply explain, sir, that the connection I will make is this: That the registry law is necessary, in default of a tax qualification. I do not think it is very far from the point under consideration, but bears somewhat on it.

The CHAIRMAN. When that question comes up, the gentleman will be able to get the floor and give these views at that time.

Mr. CARTER. I have then only to say that I hope the section, as recommended by the committee, with this amendment, will pass. I have this to say about the section, that as it reads, as reported, the section is somewhat contradictory in terms. As it reads now it is:

The Legislature shall enact a uniform law for the registration of electors, but no elector shall be deprived of the right to vote by reason of not being registered. Now this contingency may occur, and doubtless will, that designing men may refuse or decline to register, and, in that case, men otherwise "duly qualified" should not be deprived of this right.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I desire to ask whether it is in order to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I then offer the following as an amendment to the amendment. Add after the word "elector" the following words: "But no law shall hereafter be passed by the Legislature in relation to the registration of voters which shall not be applicable to all the counties of this Commonwealth."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that as the amendment of the gentleman does not appear to be an amendment to the pending amendment, it had better be withdrawn.

Mr. TEMPLE. I will then withdraw the amendment for the present.

Mr. McCLEAN. Mr. Chairman: I have listened attentively to all the arguments which have been offered in support of this section, but if I had the power to induce the Convention to coincide in my views, I would offer a provision prohibiting the Legislature from passing any registration law whatever. The only merit which the section possesses, as it has been presented by the Committee on Elections, consists in its saving clause, that no elector shall be deprived of the right to vote by reason of not being registered. If the pending amendment is not adopted, I shall move to amend the section by leaving it a discretionary matter with the Legislature, and not imperative, to pass a uniform law for the registration of electors. From all the observation I have had in the working of our registration laws, I have found them to be burdensome, as well as expensive, and a great nuisance to the voters, while they have produced no good results whatever. I have been unable to see how they can prevent the commission of election frauds. In connection with this matter I desire to take this occasion, as the first opportunity I have had, to deny the assertion of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Gowen,) who asserted, on Monday last, that Adams county was included among other counties wherein election frauds had been committed. I deny this assertion entirely. The fact may be that there have been illegal votes cast there, as they are everywhere; the votes may have been cast by voters not fully qualified, but there has been nothing like deliberate and intentional fraud anywhere in our county. I cannot see how the adoption of registration laws is to prevent frauds in any portion of the State. What has been the history of our registration laws? Every member of the Convention knows the operation of the registry law in Philadelphia which was adopted in 1869. It has proved a stigma upon the city, and has been productive of the greatest mischief. It has provided for a board of aldermen and an apportionment which has resulted in the greatest wrong, not only to the people of Philadelphia, but to the entire State. For this and other reasons, Mr. Chairman, I shall oppose the amendment now under consideration.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman. I desire to call for the reading of the section by way of preface to what I have to say in connection with the proposed amendment.

The CLERK read as follows: "The Legislature shall enact a uniform law for the registration of electors, but no elector shall be deprived of the right to vote by reason of the neglect, intentional or otherwise, of the registering officer."

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: It is by no means clear to my mind that this Convention should insert a provision upon this subject in the Constitution which would be mandatory to the Legislature and require the passage of a registry act. I do not doubt the power of the Convention to insert such a section, but I cannot see the wisdom of doing so. Whether or not a registration law may be required is a matter, in my judgment, which can be very safely left to the Legislature. It is not a subject which warrants a provision in the nature of a mandate in the Constitution of Pennsylvania; but, sir, if we are to act upon this subject, I conceive that there is one provision which might very wisely be made in this connection, and that is a provision—not in the nature of an absolute direction to the Legislature, requiring the passage of a uniform registration law, but simply a restriction upon the power of enacting a registration and election law, except such as shall be uniform in its operation throughout the entire State.

Mr. Chairman, I claim the distinction, if it is a distinction, of not having yet intruded upon the committee the peculiar claims of Philadelphia, in any respect, and I do not now propose to do so. I think that many of the attacks Philadelphia has received from gentlemen, who have held their position here, apparently, as missionaries from the west to teach us in the east how to perform our duties, are due to the statements which have been made by some Philadelphia members themselves, and we can hardly complain if we have been considered as heathens by these philanthropic gentlemen from Pittsburg and Montgomery, when some of our own delegates have given some warrant for the suggestion. The gentleman from Venango (Mr. Corbett) in the course of his remarks upon another subject, said that Philadelphia had forced the registration act upon the State, and that the honest people of his borough complained that they were subjected to a registry law, because the election evils in Philadelphia made one necessary for this city. Now, sir, I was surprised at such a statement. It was certainly made without due consideration or examination, for if the gentleman had examined the registry law he would have found that the first twenty sections apply, exclusively, to Philadelphia, while the balance of the sections apply, exclusively, to the counties outside of Philadelphia, so that there could have been no possible necessity for the imposition of this registry law upon the entire State for the benefit of Philadelphia. Whilst this city is not entirely blameless in many matters, and has many sins to answer for, yet I hope she will not be charged with more sins than properly belong to her. I respectfully submit, sir, that all future election laws, and all registry acts, should be uniform, in their operation, through out the State; and then there will be a hope of its being impossible for a few men from any one section, and I care not from what section, in the State, to petition the Legislature, successfully, to enact provisions for their own purposes and for their own particular localities, in order to perpetuate their power and the power of their friends.

Now perhaps the best evidence of the correctness of the view I take is to illustrate by the present state of the law upon the subject. We have, as I have said, twenty sections of the registry act that apply to this city, and to no other part of the State whatever. They apply only to that section which the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. MacConnell) would wall up as a penal settlement. Sir, if those gentlemen who have come amongst us as missionaries—these great Stanley's of the west, who have penetrated into this Africa of Philadelphia—wish to discover the Nile source of the corruptions that we suffer from will only glance at Harrisburg, and the Legislature who gave us this law, they will find there the proper subject for their christian purposes, and a realization of their hopes of important discovery.

I say, sir, that the best argument upon this question is a review of the present special provisions of the registry act. In its application to Philadelphia it is simply this: The board of aldermen, consisting of all the aldermen of the city of Philadelphia, meet together under the provisions of this law, and appoint all the election officers for every division in the city of Philadelphia. The law provides that they shall appoint a certain portion of them from the party in the majority and a certain portion of them from the party in the minority. This seems perfectly fair, and it would be so if the practical operation of the provision were such as might be anticipated from its language; but the majority of the board of aldermen have assumed the power of designating both the majority and the minority election officers, and the result has been precisely what to all reasonable men must be obvious.

MR. HANNA. I would like to ask the gentleman if each political party did not select their own election officers, when the supplement to that act was passed. The law, without the supplement, was that under which several elections in the city of Philadelphia were held. That was the special election law for Philadelphia, applying nowhere else, and it was under that law, given to us, and to us only, of all the State of Pennsylvania, that many of the frauds, and the worst of them, have been committed. And if a proper title had been given to that act, it would have been "An act for the protection of corruption and the organization of fraud." It amounts to nothing else.

That was the act as to election officers; but it went further, and provided that the canvassers who make the registry lists of the city of Philadelphia should also be selected by the board of aldermen. It provides, it is true, that two of them shall be of the majority party and one of the minority party. But here again, sir, the majority of the board of aldermen claimed to and did exercise the power to say who should be not only the majority canvassers, but also who should be the minority canvassers, and the members of the minority party of that board were not allowed to name who should be the officers to represent their own party, so that we had the majority in Philadelphia represented by a majority in the board of aldermen selecting the men to count our votes, and the sentinels to watch them. That we owed, sir, to a law of the State of Pennsylvania, and not to any pre-disposition to fraud on the part of the people of Philadelphia.

MR. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Why was this registry law passed originally? Was it not because of frauds which had been committed in this city, because more majorities had been returned for certain candidates in certain districts than there were voters in those localities? Was it not found necessary to pass this law to prevent such a recurrence of fraud?

MR. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I answer that the reason that law was passed, in my opinion, was that certain men in Philadelphia, certain combinations of men, holding particular local offices, and seeking to control political power, wanted to fix their power indefeasibly by force of an act of Assembly, and they were able to secure its passage. That is the reason, in my judgment, which led to this registry law. It is not to be wondered at that these canvassers, appointed in the manner I have said, leave off numbers of legal voters of the city of Philadelphia, and having the power, eight days before the election, to erase names that had been already registered, should erase the names of many lawful voters! An effort was made through the courts to assert and maintain the rights of those who were so treated, and we received the answer from the judges, and I do not say it complainingly, for my education teaches me to accept, as legally right, whatever falls from the courts of my State; but we were there told that these canvassers—politicians confessedly—and appointed all by one party, in omitting, and in striking off and erasing names, were acting judicially, and that their acts were not to be reviewed, and that no man had any redress against them. But this act, as applicable to Philadelphia, provided, further, that when the elector steps to the polls, and offers his ballot, the shall be told, although otherwise qualified, that if his name is not on that registry (so miserably compiled!) he cannot vote; his right to vote is taken from him by these irresponsible three men, appointed all by one party, who, as canvassers, are high judges on this question, from whose decree there is no appeal whatever.

Now, sir, such was the registry law. But, says the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Hanna,) it has been amended, and power has been given to the minority of the board of aldermen to name their own canvassers. I have no hesitation, now that I have come to that, in answering his question, and I am prepared to say that such an amendment was recently passed, but what does it amount to? "It keeps the word of promise to the ear to break it to the hope." For we have had it decided by our courts, that not only do these three canvassers act judicially, and that their decision is final, but that two of them absolutely control, and what is the use of saying to me that I can have one-third voice in a question if the two-third voice absolutely controls the decision of it? That is the answer to that gentleman from Philadelphia.

But, sir, there was such an outcry against this infamous act by the honest people of Philadelphia, and they made so strong and hearty effort to induce the Legislature to repeal it, that, at last, we secured—what? Why, sir, we thought we were getting a great deal when we were told that the Legislature had enacted that the acts of these canvassers should no longer remain beyond review by the courts, and we had great hopes that there would at least be some opportunity for the voice of justice to be heard, but when the act came we found again how deceitfully we had been used. The section upon which we hoped for everything gave us nothing. It was only this:

"SECTION 2. That it shall be lawful for the court of common pleas of the county of Philadelphia, upon the petition and personal application of any citizen whose name has been erased from the registry list of any election division of said city, to examine such citizen touching his right to vote at the election next ensuing, and if the said court shall be of opinion that said applicant is qualified to vote, the said court may order the name of said applicant to be restored to said registry list: Provided, That said applicant shall give twenty-four hours' notice to the canvassers of said division of his intended application, and no such action shall be taken by said court within three days immediately preceding said election.

Now, sir, so far from that giving us the free access to the courts of justice to which we thought we were entitled and for which we had been led to hope, if my name were left from the registry list I had no redress under that amendment any more than I had before, and we were startled to find it only applied to men whose names had been erased, and that all that was necessary was for the canvassers to leave men's names off the list, and for that there was no remedy whatever more than before. But in addition to that, this section is so trammelled with form and the mode of procedure as to be practically useless. It requires that twenty-four hours' notice should be given to the canvassers, and provides that the court shall not act under it within three days of the election. Now, the erasures are made upon the eighth day preceding the election, and consequently just four days is allowed for the assertion and maintenance of the rights of over one hundred thousand voters before a crowded and busy court of common pleas. It was found utterly impracticable to do anything under this amendment.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I rise to a point of order. Is it in order on the pending proposition that the gentleman should discuss the details of some statute which happens to be on our statute book at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman to be discussing the section which refers to registration and so refers to the law upon this subject. The gentleman is in order.

Mr. DALLAS. I am sorry, sir, that the gentleman from this city finds the details of this act distasteful to him, and I am glad to say that I am entirely done with them. I proposed to make my argument upon this question in form of illustration, and I have done so. I have contended that we should have no election law, no registry act in this city that is not uniform and general in its application from the river to the lake, from our northern to our southern boundary, and I have endeavored to prove this by showing what injustice can be perpetrated when a few bad men from any section can unite for their own evil purposes in fastening special laws upon their own districts. It will be for this committee to say whether this endeavor has been successful.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I rise simply for the purpose of making an explanation and putting myself right, for it seems I was misunderstood in what I said yesterday, by the gentleman from the city who has just taken his seat, (Mr. Dallas.) by another delegate from the city, on my right, (Mr. Wetherill,) as well as the gentleman from Bucks (Mr. Lear.) I do not come here as a "missionary from Pittsburg," to lecture Philadelphians upon these frauds and corruptions. I said explicitly, a few days ago, that I did not believe in the wholesale denunciations of fraud and corruption at the elections in Philadelphia. I do not believe the Philadelphians are one-tenth part as bad as some of the delegates here say they are. But there are gentlemen from the city who pronounce elections in Philadelphia utterly corrupt, who declare that all honest men are deprived of the right of suffrage, or so interfered with that only repeaters, and rounders, and scoundrels control the elections. Now I believe no such thing. I did not, therefore, lecture Philadelphia for her frauds. There are members from the city here who deny these sweeping allegations. I merely took these gentlemen who make such allegations at their word, and if things are as bad as they say they are, and both of the gentlemen from the city referred to, represent things in Philadelphia in that way, I say, if they are as bad as they represent, the remedy they wish us to adopt in the Constitution will not help them. This is not the mode to reach these evils. I was merely turning their own guns upon themselves; that is all.

I respect Philadelphia, sir. I do not believe these frauds and corruptions are as great in extent and magnitude as represented. No doubt there are frauds here, but I do not believe they are one-tenth part as bad as represented. Neither will these special regulations for the city remedy them. All our election laws ought to be general and uniform throughout the State. One of the evils, permit me to suggest, one of the evils in Philadelphia has been her special legislation on every subject. She is not in accord with the State on any subject whatever, but has a distinct system in reference to taxes, election laws, election districts, schools, and almost everything else. Her true policy is to put herself in harmony and sympathy with the whole State, for the rural districts take pride in the city of Philadelphia and feel a deep interest in her prosperity.

MR. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: It appears to me that, in committee of the whole, we had better adopt this section as it stands now, and the reason that leads me to that belief is this: We have adopted the first section of this report with a tax qualification. On second reading in Convention it may be, possibly, that that part of the section will be amended or stricken out. If it be stricken out, it appears to me that the Legislature should be required to pass a uniform registry law; but if that section stands as now amended in committee of the whole, and remains so on second reading in Convention, then I am in favor of leaving this matter of passing a uniform law to the discretion of the Legislature. That can be effected by a very simple amendment on second reading of the section, in Convention, by changing the word "shall" to "may." Therefore, I think it better that this section should pass in committee of the whole as it now stands, until the first section, as reported by the committee, is perfected on the second reading.

MR. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: When this section was first read, yesterday, I thought that I discovered the importance of it, and for that reason I invited discussion upon it when I believed it was likely to pass in great haste. My colleague from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas) has stated many reasons why this section should not be adopted, which I would have stated had he not stated them. I desire to state to the committee that the reasons I would express for not supporting this section, or anything like it, I believe are the reasons of nine-tenths of the honest voting population of the city of Philadelphia. Before this Convention assembled in Philadelphia, and since its assembly here, every man we meet upon the street who is interested in honest elections, asks us whether we can get rid of the Philadelphia registry law. Now if there is any member of this Convention, particularly if there is any from Philadelphia, whose experience is different upon this subject, I challenge him to state it. I make the broad proposition to this committee that nine-tenths of the honest voters in Philadelphia are in favor of getting rid of the present registry law which applies to this city.

I am somewhat surprised that the delegate from Philadelphia, (Mr. Newlin,) who interrupted my friend, (Mr. Dallas,) should express himself as against hearing the details of this registry law in this discussion. I say that the attempt to place a clause like this into the Constitution which we are now making, invites the fullest and broadest discussion upon the laws which we now have, with regard to the registration of voters.

If in speaking upon this subject we are obliged to speak of a certain class of men who do not reflect any portion of the public sentiment of this great city, if we are obliged to give reasons in support of the arguments against this section which fall heavily upon some persons who are the authors of this measure, we cannot help it. I undertake to state, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Carbon, (Mr. Lilly,) that the frauds that existed in the city of Philadelphia prior to the passage of this registry law were not the reasons which led to its passage. I undertake to state to him and to this committee, that prior to the passage of the registry law of 1869, the frauds that then existed did not give rise to the necessity for the passage of that law, and inasmuch as he is desirous of knowing the reasons which led to it, I will take the liberty of briefly stating them. I state that in 1869 there were certain politicians in the city of Philadelphia—and I am only stating what is the reflex of public opinion and the universal sentiment in this community—who were then out of office, and who had met the disfavor of their own political organization, and were unable to secure an election by means of an honest vote, rushed off to Harrisburg to secure the passage of a law in order to reinstate themselves and revive their fallen fortunes. I say that it is a notorious fact that one politician, above all others, in the city of Philadelphia, was the author of this registry law, and other gentlemen, who believed their political fortunes depended upon its success, heartily and cheerfully embraced it and it has well nigh wrought the ruin and destruction of the tax payers of this city. Why, then, was the registry law of 1869 passed? Was it demanded by the honest citizens? Was it because of frauds which had been perpetrated here? I answer no. But it was for the only purpose of reinstating into power those who had been driven from power by the unanimous opinion of all honest men, and we are asked everywhere upon the streets why we do not get rid of that registry law.

Now if this registry law of which we are speaking has been so productive of good; if the officers who are appointed by the board of alderman to conduct our elections are good, honest and capable citizens, why, let me ask the advocates of this measure, is it necessary, upon the top of this, to compel the court of common pleas to appoint watchers to watch over the deliberations and the actions of these very men appointed to conduct our elections? It is a notorious fact that in the city of Philadelphia, for the last three or four years, we cannot hold an election without additional officers or watchers, to conduct our election and supervise the action of those men who are appointed to supervise and conduct elections by the board of aldermen. To the gentleman from Philadelphia, who calls attention to the amendment of that act, let me say that he dare not stand up in the face of the community and of the citizens of Philadelphia and advocate a continuance of that registry law by this body.

MR. CHARLES A. BLACK. I wish to ask my young friend one question.

MR. TEMPLE. Certainly.

MR. CHARLES A. BLACK. Admitting that the present registration law is all wrong, how can he remove that by voting the section down, because they passed the registration law under the old Constitution, and they can do so again.

MR. TEMPLE. I will state, in answer to that, that I am in favor (and I state it for the benefit, not only of the gentleman, but of the committee) of the passage of a uniform registry law for the registration of voters, and I am in favor of the passage of such a law which shall apply to every county within this Commonwealth, and, as the chairman knows, such an amendment was offered by me prior to this discussion. I say that I am in favor of a proper registry law, but I am in favor of the passage of a registry law which shall apply to every county in this State. Now what has been the result of this? Some gentlemen say leave the result to the Legislature; and leave it for the Legislature to say, whether there shall be a necessity hereafter for the passage of a registry law at all; and then, if they do, it shall be uniform throughout the State. The gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Corson) yesterday declared that their representatives were honest. I do not deny it, and I am not here to deny that all members of the Legislature are honest; but I state to him, as a question of fact, that when delegations go from the city of Philadelphia and demand the passage of a registry law, applicable only to this city, in which the people of Montgomery county have no special interest, and in which the legislators from other counties in the State have no particular interest, such legislators are ready and willing to accord to Philadelphia what certain delegations and politicians may require. If the legislators from other counties would see to it that they carried out their principles of legislation, as well as those of honesty, if they would mete out equal justice to all counties alike, this registry law never would have been a disgrace to the statute books and an insult to the intelligence of the people of this city.

What is the character of the people who have been appointed to select our election officers? There are some distinguished delegates in this Convention who are not in the habit of coming in contact with that class of people known as politicians. They rely, mainly, upon what they see in their own business transactions and every day life; but I say that when they are thrust into contact with these people, and see by means of an investigation into these frauds and corruptions that exist, they cannot, as honest men, undertake to advocate any such measure.

Again, in the passage of this section, is it right, says some gentlemen, to object to the insertion of a section in this Constitution which says that the election laws shall be uniform? My answer to that is that it is no more specific than the old Constitution upon this subject. There could be nothing more specific than that; yet we find that when the first registry law was approved and passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, that it was declared unconstitutional and void by the Supreme Court of this State. Then it is a fact, asserted by hundreds and thousands of people, that the original drawer of the first registry law sought the counsels of persons high in authority, who were to pass upon this law, and drew another registry law which would come immediately within the ruling of the Supreme Court.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we will see that unless there is some specific provision placed in our Constitution that there shall not be a special law passed for the city of Philadelphia, that we will have the same scenes, the same legislation, enacted over again that we did under the old Constitution. Therefore I am in favor of voting down this section as it now is, and the amendment thereto, which seems to me to be vague and uncertain, and placing at the end of the word "electors" the following: "But that no law shall hereafter be passed by the Legislature which shall not apply to all the counties in this Commonwealth." Let such a provision as this stare the Supreme Court in the face, let such a provision stare the trading politicians in the face, let them know that, when they go before the Supreme Court, the language is so indubitable, so positive in its character, that it would bring down upon that court universal opprobrium and disrespect if they were to undertake to gainsay it or set it aside. For these reasons, and for others which have been given by gentlemen more competent than myself, I am not in favor of this section unless it is amended as I have suggested.

Mr. MACCONNELL. I rise to say that I am in favor of this section, with the amendments which I propose to offer at a proper time, and which I hope will meet the views of the gentlemen from Philadelphia. I would add to the section, "and no law for the regulation of elections shall be passed, which shall not apply to the whole State." As it is here, it is confined merely to laws regulating registration. I would make all laws in relation to elections uniform throughout the State. I am opposed to the singling out of any part of the State, either at Philadelphia, or Pittsburg, or Luzerne, or any other portion, and treating the people of that portion as sinners above all other sinners. We are all human; we are all liable to err; we are not only liable to err, but liable to sin. We are all alike. I would, therefore, treat all alike. I would put into the Constitution a prohibition of all these special laws which single out particular places, and treat them as particularly liable to perpetrate fraud.

Just here let me say, that some gentlemen appear to think I made an attack on Philadelphia yesterday; they are entirely mistaken. I certainly made no attack on Philadelphia. I did what I thought was vindicating Philadelphia against what seems to me as unworthy aspersions made against it, on this floor, by some of its own representatives. That is what I did, and all I did. I do not think Philadelphia is worse than other parts of the State. I think if you will gather together eight hundred thousand inhabitants of any other part of the State, and place them in such small bounds as the eight hundred thousand in Philadelphia are placed, you will probably find as many rogues among them as are crowded in Philadelphia.

As I have said, I dislike this singling out of places and charging them specially with fraud, particularly so when this charging is done by their own representatives. I think it is not in good taste, and we ought to eschew it if we can manage to do so.

I think, sir, that these registry laws are wholesome, and I think that strict and severe laws to regulate elections are good. But they should apply to the whole State. We should have them uniform throughout the State. Philadelphia, Pittsburg, and every other section of the State, should be all under the same laws, in this respect. We should cut up this matter of special legislation, not only in regard to matters generally, but in regard to matters relating to elections; and when it is in order, unless some gentleman will do it who can conceive the idea and present it better than I can, and I hope my friend from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas) will do it. I will offer this amendment.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman: I have been informed that the Committee on Legislation have a provision relating to this subject under consideration. If such is the fact, of which we can be informed by some member of the committee, it will be as well to do in this matter as we have done in some other instances, vote this section down, so that this consideration may come up when the report of the Committee on Legislation is before us. The whole idea of the gentlemen who have spoken seems to be that the Legislature should enact a uniform registration law. The language of this section is objectionable in making it imperative on the Legislature. The language, perhaps, ought to be: "The Legislature may enact a law for the registration of voters, but shall not enact such a law unless it be uniform throughout the State. That would be subject to the provision that if a man could prove that he was otherwise qualified, he would have the right to vote, but I think that if the Committee on Legislation—and it is a matter within their province as much as within that of the Committee on Suffrage, it will be better not to adopt this section as presented now, but vote it down and take it up again when the report of the other committee is before the Convention.

Mr. DEFRANCE. Mr. Chairman: I have listened to the arguments of the gentleman about this section, and either I am exceedingly blind or exceedingly senseless, but it seems to me that the section just as it stands is what is wanted. "The Legislature shall enact a uniform law for the registration of electors." What does that mean? Does it mean that they can enact a special law for Philadelphia, and another special law for Pittsburg, and different laws for other sections? Why if it means anything at all, it means that the Legislature shall enact a uniform law throughout the whole State, applying, of course, equally to Philadelphia and every other place. If it does not mean that then there is no sense in plain language. It seems to me that the section as it stands, is just what we want exactly. "The Legislature shall enact a uniform law for the registration of electors," that is, uniform throughout the State; "but no elector shall be deprived of the right to vote by reason of not being registered."

Mr. CHARLES A. BLACK. "If otherwise qualified."

Mr. DEFRANCE. Of course, "if otherwise qualified." That is what it means and that is what it says. I think it is just what we want.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I am sorry to say I cannot see my way clear to vote for this question without, at least, some further explanation of it than I have yet heard. I would vote for a registration law with great cheerfulness, but I would make registration a precedent qualification to the casting of the ballot. I would see that I would gain thereby very great and material advantages. I would ascertain in advance of the date of the election by a public list open to everybody who were the qualified electors of that election precinct, and to put in the Constitution a mandate upon the Legislature that they shall enact a registration law and then qualify it with the provision that, notwithstanding such a law, no voter shall be obliged to register or see that he is registered, nor shall the fact that he is not registered impair in any manner his right to vote. It seems to me, sir, that the provision annuls itself in effect. If it is merely to prevent special legislation upon the subject, that belongs to the Committee on Legislation, and at the proper time, doubtless, some provision to require uniformity in this matter will be adopted by the Convention. I cannot see the advantage, however, of requiring a registration law and then declaring that it shall not be the duty of any voter to see that his name is upon it, nor that the fact of his name not being on it will impair his right to vote.

Mr. HUNSICKER. Mr. Chairman: I prefer having no registry law at all. The registry law is an innovation. It is only a few years old. Its practical result, instead of preventing frauds, has been to increase the facilities for perpetrating them.

In the consideration of this section, I know no safer rule than the old legal mode of constructing new laws, viz: By considering the old law, the mischief and the remedy.

Under the old Constitution of the State we have a few well defined qualifications necessary to constitute an elector. The present registry law was passed, and it has been explained here by gentlemen who are more familiar with it and its practical workings than I am. It was objectionable, and was once pronounced unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of this State. Then it was revised, passed again, and again carried to the Supreme Court, and then pronounced constitutional.

It has ever since been a source of irritation and annoyance to the people, particularly of Philadelphia, and also to the people of the State, who were affected by the frauds made possible and practiced under it in the city of Philadelphia.

As an illustration of what was possible under the old registry law, before the last amendment referred to by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Hanna) was made, I cite a case that actually occurred in this city. The facts, as developed, were these:

Under the law there were three persons selected as canvassers by the board of alderman for each ward, two being of the majority party, and the third of the minority party. These three canvassers made up the list of voters, and unless a voter's name appeared on this list he was deprived of the right of suffrage. After the canvass was completed, it was made the duty of the canvassers to examine their work within a certain time and strike from the list all persons improperly registered. To do this, notice was by the law required to be left at the residence of the person whose right to vote was questioned to appear, in person, at a certain time and certain place before the board, to show cause why his name should not be erased. If any voter failed to appear, or did appear, in obedience to this notice, and the canvassers erased his name by drawing a red line across it, he was deprived of his vote, and had no remedy at law or otherwise. In one of these boards, notice of this kind was sent to a number of persons, regularly registered, to appear; whether the voters ever received the notice or not is not known. At any rate, a few minutes before the time for the final action of the board had expired, one of the majority of the board pulled out of his pocket a long list of names, say of one hundred persons, and said the names of these men must be erased. They were regularly qualified electors, and never dreamed that they could or would be thus disfranchised. The minority member of the board said with horror, what would be done; in his despair seized the canvassers book, jumped out of the window and ran away with it. He was arrested for this, taken into court and tried before a judge of opposite politics in this city, who discharged him with the thanks of the court, the judge declaring that he had performed his duty, and had done the only thing possible under that law to prevent the wholesale disfranchisement of voters. Gentlemen, do you like this picture? Now there should not be, and I believe there is not, in this Convention any partisan feeling—because we are all animated with the single purpose of restoring the purity of the ballot-box, and if he would keep it pure by putting in a fundamental provision guarding and securing it—it does not and cannot make any difference what party has practiced frauds under the old system.

The majority party to-day may be the minority party to-morrow. It is not a party question, and it has been well said by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) that fraud, like everything else, is progressive, and each party improves in this line upon its predecessors.

I do not agree with the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeach,) that registration should be a pre-requisite to the right to vote. If a man can be deprived of his vote by the action of one man, or by two men who make out the registry list, then all that is necessary is to buy that man, or the two, and the red ink lines across the voters' names will do the business, as in the case I cited. It will not do at this day to say that men cannot be bought, for we have it to-day, from the highest authority, that men standing high in the councils of the nation have been guilty of selling the influence of their positions for money. I allude, of course, to the report of Judge Poland's committee to the House of Representatives at Washington.

No, gentlemen, either adopt a provision prohibiting the Legislature from passing any registry law at all or adopt this section, which provides for a uniform registry, and which prevents the registering officers from disfranchising the elector, and I do not agree with the learned and distinguished gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) that registration should be a pre-requisite to the right to a vote because that places the elector in the power of the canvasser as well as in the power of the registering officer, and if the registering officer sees proper to be corrupt the rights of voters, which are defined in the fundamental law, will be set aside. It is well known that men will sell themselves to the political party that pays the highest price, and we have only to look at the revelations which are now transpiring in Washington to be convinced that there can be no doubt of this fact. I say, therefore, if this subject can be considered in any other light—if it can be more properly considered when the report of the Committee on Legislation is made, or if a provision is inserted that the Legislature shall enact a registry law, I am ready to vote for the section, or I am ready to vote for the section as it stands, but I shall prefer the suggestion made by the gentleman from York, (Mr. Gibson,) that no electors otherwise qualified shall be deprived of the right of suffrage is adopted as a part of the section. In the event this amendment is rejected in committee of the whole, there will still be an opportunity to amend the section in Convention, and I trust that this committee will either vote for the section to prohibit the Legislature from enacting a registry law or else adopt the section as it stands.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Carter, and it was rejected.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following substitute for the section: "All laws regulating elections by the people, or for the registry of electors, shall be uniform in their operation throughout the State, but no elector shall be deprived of the privilege of voting by reason of his name not being on the registry."

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say, in explanation of this substitute, that its purpose is to make it perfectly clear; that if a registry act be passed it shall be uniform in its operations, and not apply only to certain portions of the State, and that no different character of registry act shall be passed. The section, as reported, is mandatory, and a further purpose of this substitute is to leave the question of whether any registry law shall be passed to legislative discretion. I desire to say a few words in reply to the delegate from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh.) He said he would make registration a pre-requisite to the right to vote, and unless a man's name should be found upon the registry list, that he would deprive him of the franchise. I desire to call attention to the practical results of such a suggestion. If, for instance, three canvassers made up the registry list, and the name of any citizen on that list was illegally stricken off, he would be practically without remedy. He could not hold these canvassers criminally responsible for the exercise of their judicial functions, however arbitrary or wrongfully they might have been exercised; and if he undertook to sue them, civilly, he would find, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, that a judgment against any one of these canvassers for five thousand dollars would not be worth five cents; so that you would, practically, have no remedy whatever. The gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) has said, that unless you make the registration an absolute pre-requisite it will be of very little use or value. But I may remark that if you make a registration necessary to the elector, the franchise itself will become of very little use to a great many of us.

The question being taken on the substitute to the section, offered by Mr. Dallas, a division was called, which resulted as follows: Ayes, fifty-seven; noes, thirty.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the section.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I call for the reading of the section as amended.

The section was again read.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: If it is in order I move to strike out all after and including the word "but."

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not in order.

The question being taken on the section as amended, a division was called, which resulted as follows: Ayes, sixty; noes, thirty.

So the section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

Any person who shall give, or promise or offer to give, to an elector any money or other valuable consideration for his vote at an election, or for withholding the same, or who shall give such consideration to any other person or party for such elector's vote, or for the withholding thereof; and any elector who shall receive or agree to receive for himself, or for another, any money or other valuable consideration for his vote, at an election, or for withholding the same, shall thereby forfeit the right to vote at such election; and any elector whose right to vote shall be challenged for such cause, before the election officers, shall be required to swear or affirm that the matter of the challenge is untrue before his vote shall be received.

Mr. STRUTHERS. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following as a substitute for the section:

"In all elections the use by a candidate, directly or indirectly, of money, valuables, or any promise of office, place of honor, profit or trust, to aid in his procuring the same, or securing legislative, judicial or any other immunity or favor, shall be deemed bribery, and shall render void his election, disqualify him for holding office, and subject him to indictment and imprisonment; and the receiver of any such bribe shall be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both, at the discretion of the court. Disqualification to hold office may only be ordered by an act of the General Assembly, two-thirds of each House consenting thereto."

Mr. STRUTHERS. Mr. Chairman: The great topic of discussion which has prevailed since the commencement of the sessions of the Convention up to this day has been the manner by which election frauds may be prevented, and a reasonable degree of purity attained in our elections. These frauds, I think, can be checked at least, if not wholly prevented, by the substitute which I have offered for the section. In the first place the fountain, it is believed, of all these frauds is the money or other valuable consideration which men are frequently ready to give to secure some high or profitable position. The difficulty in the prevention of these frauds lies in the presence of an incentive to commit them by the voters. If the incentive to commit fraud is removed, by placing it out of the power of men who desire to attain public office to commit bribery by the use of money or promises of favor when they shall be elected, the voters of the community will always act independently and according to their own judgments when they vote; and when they do that you will always find that the will of the people is honestly expressed in the ballot-box. I say, then, that the citizens of every community will vote according to the dictates of their judgments and consciences if there are no inducements held out to them to vote wrong. I will illustrate my remarks by referring, for instance, to the office of sheriff of the city and county of Philadelphia. A salary of ten thousand dollars would be unquestionably a fair compensation for the general exercise of the duties of the office of sheriff. The candidates for this important position understand very well that if elected they can make at least one hundred thousand dollars a year out of that office, and they therefore can afford to pay to the runners and the manipulators of the elections at least twenty thousand dollars or more for the purpose of corrupting the ballots. I desire to make this offence as highly punishable as it possibly can be made, and I hope the Convention will adopt such a provision that the perpetration of offences of this kind shall meet with the most severe and peremptory punishment. I think when the proper time comes for the discussion of the question of fixing the salaries of office holders, that if, for instance, the salary of the sheriff of the city and county of Philadelphia should be placed at ten thousand dollars, the candidate for this position could not afford to scatter his money around for the purpose of buying the office and corrupting the voters; and if this plan is pursued, with reference to the other office holders in the city of Philadelphia alone, at least three hundred thousand dollars will be saved from corruption purposes during the election seasons. If the salaries of public officers are fixed at reasonable rates of compensation, I have no doubt that in Philadelphia, as in all parts of the State, the services of good and competent men can be procured to perform these great public duties. I think, therefore, that the amendment here will have a very salutary tendency in putting a stop to the buying up of votes and the scattering around of money for the purpose of corrupting voters, and lead to purify the polls more than any measure that has been here suggested. This section, I discover, points in that direction. It is intended for that. But in reading the section it recites:

"Any person who shall give, or promise or offer to give to an elector, any money or other valuable consideration for his vote at an election, or for withholding the same, or who shall give such consideration to any other person or party for such elector's vote or for the withholding thereof."

Then, sir, it turns right from that idea, without providing for or specifying any penalty at all that will be visited upon them for doing so, and says: "And any elector who shall receive or agree to receive for himself or for another, any money or other valuable consideration for his vote at an election, or for withholding the same, shall thereby forfeit the right to vote at such election."

There is the penalty imposed upon the voter who is purchased. The denial of the privilege of the right to vote at that election is by this provision fixed, and visited upon the elector who offers to receive, or does receive the bribe, and yet there is no punishment whatever, not even the slightest, visited upon the man who bribes him, who pays him the money and hires him to do it. This section, to say the least of it, is very imperfectly drawn up, because for the greatest offence there is no penalty whatever, while for the least offence, the only penalty is that the offender shall lose his vote at one election. I think it is inefficient. It amounts to little or nothing and would be better left out of the Constitution than in it in that form.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: I rise to make a correction. In the first section the printer has left out after the word "give," where it occurs the third time, the words "or promise to give." The sentence as it was written is: "Any person who shall give, or promise or offer to give to any elector, any money or other valuable consideration for his vote at an election, or for withholding the same, or who shall give, or promise to give, such consideration," &c.

The CHAIRMAN. The correction will be made by the Clerk, unless objection be made.

No objection was made, and the correction was noted.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: The amendment offered by the gentleman from Warren (Mr. Struthers) is in a different part of the Constitution. The Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation supposed that the subject properly came under consideration in a subsequent part of the Constitution from another committee. It relates to one of the qualifications for office, or rather disqualifications. Bribery, or an attempt to bribe electors, should disqualify a person from holding a public office in this State, and for that reason that it was a disqualification to hold office, the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation did not act upon the subject. The section before the committee of the whole relates to the elector and the conduct of elections, a subject different altogether from the qualification or disqualification for any public office.

If the amendment of the gentleman from Warren should be adopted, it will strike out all that has been reported by the Committee on Suffrage in this article, and will substitute for it a section which, if it is adopted at all, belongs to another part of the Constitution.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I propose the following substitute, and I refer to page two hundred and seventy-six of the Journal, where it will be found: To strike out all after the word "section" and insert:

"No person who shall have given, or offered to give, received or agreed to receive, directly or indirectly, in money or other valuable thing, for the purpose of corruptly influencing the vote of an elector, or shall have made any bet, or wager, or shall be interested in any bet or wager on the election or defeat of any candidate or the result of any election, shall vote at such election. Provided however, If any elector be challenged for such cause, his vote may be received on his taking an oath or affirmation that the matter of such challenge is not true."

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I will just say that this embraces all that is embraced in the section reported by the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, and in addition thereto embraces betting, or making wagers on elections, or on the defeat or success of any candidate. It adds that feature to the section, and I think embraces all that is comprised in the section as it has been submitted by the Committee on Suffrage, Election and representation.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: I only wish to say a word with reference to this. This section gave the committee great trouble. It was in a dozen or fifteen forms before it assumed the form in which it is now. It does not reach everything on the face of this earth. There might be a number of suggestions made in reference to the subject of betting, or other subjects not in this section, and if it be wise, in the judgment of this Convention, to exclude a man from the right of suffrage, who bets upon an election, no one will go farther than myself upon that subject. It may be introduced in an independent section by itself, but it is not a sufficient reason, assuredly, for changing the whole form of this section and throwing it into some other form. These are a set of principles designed as the organic law, and whatever is necessary afterward by legislation to carry it out can be enacted. But I submit that if every one is to have a section reported from a committee changed or excluded because its exact wording does not suit him, we shall never get to the end of our labors. If each individual in this assembly is to hold on tenaciously to the words in which ideas are to be expressed, and to throw a report from a committee away simply because he conceives that it might possibly be put in better language, it will be a long time before we arrive at any conclusion.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the section.

The section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK:

SECTION 7. Every person convicted of any fraudulent violation of the election laws shall be deprived of the right of suffrage, but such right in any particular case may be restored by an act of the Legislature, two-thirds of each House consenting thereto.

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: I propose this amendment: To insert after the word "of," in the first line, the following words: "And sentenced for any infamous crime or." This would make the clause read: "Every person convicted of and sentenced for any infamous crime, or any fraudulent violation of the election laws, shall be deprived of the right of suffrage," &c.

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: I propose that addition to this sentence, for the reason that when a man is convicted in the ordinary sense of the term, many things may follow which will reverse the judgment of the jury. Conviction is understood to be a verdict, but there may happen an arrest of judgment or there may be a new trial. This simply provides for such a case, and is important to the section with a view of making it effective, not as now, to disfranchise a man who has merely been convicted, but to disfranchise him who shall be convicted and afterward sentenced. I have, therefore, proposed that part of the amendment and with it another portion, to disfranchise a man not only for any violation of the election laws, but also when he has been convicted and sentenced for any infamous crime. It is to prevent our elections being held and conducted or voted at by men who have been convicted of felonies and the higher grades of misdemeanors. I would have said felonies, only felonies do not include perjury or forgery which are, however, considered infamous crimes. But it seems to me to be very proper that we should disfranchise the thieves and burglars and pickpockets and the infamous characters who have been convicted and sentenced for criminal conduct. Not that we should include in our sweeping prohibition all men who have been convicted in a criminal court at all, for instance, as to assault and battery, but that all these infamous characters who have been the pest of the community and who are, to a very considerable extent, part and parcel of an organized conspiracy against the purity of the ballot-box and against a fair and honest management of the affairs of the election. I hope that this section will be so amended as to disfranchise not only those who have fraudulently violated any of the election laws of the Commonwealth, but who have been convicted of and sentenced for any infamous crime whatever.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Bucks, (Mr. Lear,) as well as to the entire section as it stands reported. Whether it is possible, Mr. Chairman, for a Constitution to embrace within its limits the sanctions by which its provisions are to be enforced, may be fairly questioned. Whether it would be a proper thing to do, to place such sanctions in the body of the fundamental law, to bejewel it with damnatory clauses, even if it were possible to do so, is a question which, in my judgment, admits of but one answer. I am entirely opposed to making a criminal code in the Constitution—entirely opposed to the brimstone settings.

But, sir, admitting both the possibility and the propriety of putting such sanctions in the Constitution, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the very remarkable terms in which this section is reported. If you will look you will see that it does not propose to provide a sanction for any article of the Constitution. It does not propose to provide a sanction for any particular section of any article of the Constitution. But it is a sanction for "election laws"—for laws which the Legislature may have made years ago, and which the Legislature may at any time repeal—if we are to have a Legislature at all under the amended Constitution; for laws which the Legislature may make in future, and which may not need the sanction here provided. The truth is, this is not a constitutional sanction at all, but simply and purely a common legislative or legal sanction. I submit, therefore, if this view be correct, that the section, as reported, finds no place in a body of fundamental law. It would belong rather to a criminal code.

But admitting the propriety of inserting legal sanctions such as this in the body of the fundamental law, this particular sanction now before us is open to two serious and grave objections. In the first place, it opens too wide a door of escape from its penalties. The punishment to be inflicted is indefinite and uncertain in its weight and duration. It carries with it to the mind of the man about to violate these laws no moral conviction of inevitable punishment. It wears on its very face not only the bud but the full blossom of hope of escape. What is that punishment worth, I ask, either as a deterrent or as a reformatory power, which holds out to the mind of the criminal the promise of speedy release, by no virtue or by no atonement of the criminal.

You will observe that the terms of the section allow this penalty to be easily and readily removed.

But by far the most serious objection to this section lies in the clause which makes the Legislature, in case of infraction and conviction, a high court of appeal and pardon. I beg members to look closely at this point. Are we, whose chief business here, if the many gentlemen who have so asserted are to be believed, is to limit and restrain the power of the legislative branch of the government, are we prepared, here and now, to extend its powers and jurisdiction in a new direction, and endow it with high and solemn semi-judicial and executive functions? I hope not. I hope gentlemen will hesitate a long while before giving their votes to place so extraordinary a power, so unusual and inappropriate a power in the hands of that department of the government, where it is most liable to abuse. So much for the terms of the section. But if you do not deem it irrelevant, I would like to say a few words about disfranchisement as a punishment, whenever and wherever inflicted.

And I regret that I am obliged to name again those two words which have become quite as distasteful to this body as are the words "Credit Mobilier" to the National Congress. I mean "elective franchise." But I say, if the elective franchise is a natural, inherent and inalienable right, which I deny, then, on no principle of justice, and by no power short of tyranny, can that right be taken away from any citizen whose moral conduct or mental aberration is not such as to make his association with his fellow-men dangerous. In other words, if a man is justly entitled as a citizen to the pursuit of life, liberty and happiness, without restriction, he is certainly entitled to an unrestricted exercise of that other natural right, whereby those rights are secured. But if he be a criminal so dangerous to the peace of society as to make his bodily restraint necessary, if it be unsafe to give him the right of enjoying life and liberty, of acquiring, and possessing, and protecting property and reputation, and pursuing his own happiness, then, sir, and then only, on this theory, can he be deprived justly of that other inalienable right by which all those are secured.

But sir, I hold that the elective franchise is not a natural right, not a privilege, merely, but an imposed duty, an office; that the State may give it, or withhold it, or having given it, may, for just cause, take it away again. From this standpoint, then, the very lowest ground upon which the elective franchise can be put, I propose to argue against the expediency of exercising the power of disfranchisement as a means of punishment. I say, in the first place, then, disfranchisement is not an equitable punishment. It lacks the element of variability. It admits no maximum and minimum expression. It is a fixed quantity, consequently it cannot be varied to suit the circumstances of the particular cases to which, under the law, it might be applied. In cases of aggravated character it might be entirely too light; in cases with alleviating or palliating circumstances it might be entirely too severe. I say, then, disfranchisement lacks the first essential element of a good punishment, to-wit: Variability. Not only so, but the same nominal punishment is not always for different individuals the same real punishment. Disfranchisement might and would fix an indelible stigma upon a man of wealth, influence and political aspirations; while to a man of lower rank, with no capital but his cunning, and with no aspirations of a political character but to serve the demagogue who will pay him best, it would not weigh in the balance of his estimation with one poor paltry dollar.

But as a punishment, disfranchisement lacks deterrent force. It will not, in my judgment, avail to prevent the violation of these laws by others, and for this reason, among others—because its weight as a punishment, its extent and force, cannot be exactly measured in the minds of men. It does not exhibit to the mind of the tempted man, or to the designing villain about to violate these laws, the full measure of the consequences of his crime, as does, for instance, the gallows. On the contrary, men are most likely to under-rate it as a punishment, before it has been experienced. I repeat what I said before, that it is not the real weight of a punishment as it seems to the legislator who provides it, but the apparent weight as it stands out distinctly, vividly before the mind of an individual about to violate the law which influences his conduct. Punishment by disfranchisement will, in my judgment, utterly fail as a means of general prevention.

But, sir, to come down to the section as reported by the committee, it seems to me to be an entirely inefficacious punishment when applied to particular individuals, and for these reasons: It will not take away his physical power of again violating these election laws. The criminal, though suffering under the penalty at the very time, is as free, physically, to practice his illegal arts, as if he had never been convicted. This punishment will not deter him by making him afraid to offend, because it has already expended upon him its entire force. Nor will it take from him the desire or motive to offend. On the contrary, I affirm, taking man's nature as we know it to be, it is safe to predict, that he, of all men against whom the State has raised her hand, and upon whose forehead she has set an indelible mark of distrust, and driven out from the political fellowship of his kind—it is safe, I say, to predict that he, of all men, will be most open to malign influences against the peace and welfare of the Commonwealth.

But, sir, the weakness and inefficiency of disfranchisement as a punishment cannot be better told or better seen than when you come to consider how easily it may be evaded. A simple change of residence from one State to another—ten cents upon the ferry of yonder river—would give exemption from it.

Mr. HANNA. Five cents.

Mr. WHERRY. Five cents ferryage, then, would exempt a man entirely from this punishment. More than this, a simple change of residence from one election district to another, in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand, would work exemption. Who would make it his business to go around through a county or through the State to learn whether this man or that man had been disfranchised in this or that district?

The punishment entirely fails in its application.

Now, I ask the committee, is disfranchisement a good kind of punishment? Does it possess the qualities of a good punishment? Has it variability? Has it equability? Has it certainty? Has it applicability? Has it deterrent power? It does not possess a single one of these qualities. And what is left to it? Nothing but the miserable sham of analogy, and the wicked, absolutely wicked spirit of vengeance. That is all. Does it consist with American ideas? What do American institutions offer a citizen that is not intimately dependent upon his right of suffrage? Our watchword is liberty or death; but what does liberty mean without a ballot? Is it a safe punishment for the State to inflict? Can the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, or any other free Commonwealth, afford to create in her midst a class of exiles not exiled? Can we afford to set apart an ostracised class in our very midst, who will be forever plotting against the peace of the State?

MR. CARTER. Mr. Chairman: This section, as reported by the committee, was adopted by that committee with the same intention which has actuated them from the first, to be as another guard around the ballot-box. So far from agreeing with the gentleman from Cumberland, (Mr. Wherry,) that it is not appropriate as a punishment, nor would it act as a deterrent, the committee, generally, believed that it was most eminently calculated to produce that end; that the character of a penalty and deterrent indicating so clearly the offence is precisely what is needed; not that we expect an entire purification from this, but that this is one of the adjuncts, one of the measures, all tending to the same end. The gentleman seems to think that this punishment is unsuited somewhat to the nature of the offence; that this sacred right of the ballot should not be taken lightly or heedlessly from any individual. In that I concur with the gentleman; but the State has a right to protect itself. I say, further, we have a right to put, and we do put by this act, if we adopt this section, the mark of Cain upon the man who has destroyed his brother's vote, my vote, and destroyed one of my manhood's dearest rights, so far as he can do it, by fraud at the ballot-box. It is eminently fit that when his fellow-citizens assemble every year to exercise this high prerogative, that that man shall stand forth as the man who has committed this great sin against the State and his neighbors, and should be so punished for it. I think there is an eminent fitness in this punishment as a deterrent, because so appropriate to the offence. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Bucks, (Mr. Lear,) because it does not seem exactly as if this was the proper place to disfranchise, as in the case of criminals. We are considering a section looking to the protection of the ballot-box—especially in reference to that one thing.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that if we adopt this it will have a wholesome effect. I think it was considered in the committee as one of the ideas in which we mostly concurred. We did not expect any one measure to entirely prevent all fraud, but so far as it went, the idea was to put a mark upon the man for a longer or shorter time.

I am, however, opposed to the manner in which this man is to be relieved of his disability and have this mark removed. I propose, when I can do so, to offer an amendment. It would not be right for it to come in after the amendment of the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) which is to refer the matter of pardons to the Legislature. That would be inducing special legislation; but, instead of that, to limit it to five years, so that the man who has acted in that manner shall bear his brand for that time; and so that when we go to the polls this man cannot vote among his old friends and neighbors until his offence is atoned for. I doubt exceedingly if any single provision is to do more good and is more fit in its application than this one under consideration. If this is voted down I wish to offer an amendment, taking it away from the province of the Legislature and of special legislation, and fixing the time at five years.

MR. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: I wish to say a few words upon this question. The word "convicted" is a technical term. It means a conviction by a court of competent jurisdiction, and it expresses all that would be expressed by the amendment proposed. As to the proposed insertion of the clause, "persons guilty of felonious offences," this section, as has been said by the gentleman from Lancaster, (Mr. Carter,) is a provision against frauds upon the elective franchise only. It has no relation to other frauds or other crimes, and for that reason the provision, though never so wise, should not be inserted here. If it is to come at all, let it be offered as a distinct section. It cannot be inserted here without marring the harmony of this section. The design was to take out of the power of the Governor—who may have secured his seat by the very fraud of which the elector had been convicted—the ability to restore him to the privileges of an elector which he had forfeited.

This matter gave the Committee on Suffrage much trouble. What power should relieve this man from the consequences of his conviction and of his guilt? In the very first section I think that was adopted. In reference to elections there was a provision that the time of the election might be changed by an act of the Legislature, two-thirds of each House assenting thereto. That was thought to be the best provision here, requiring an act of the Legislature, the concurrence of both Houses and of the Governor, in order to consummate the act. That, however, was not sufficient, for a majority of the members of the Legislature might procure their seats at some general election by the suffrages of the same party, and it was thought best, therefore, to require two-thirds of each House to assent thereto. The dispute was as to a larger number than two-thirds, the question being whether it were not better to make it three-fourths, or some larger proportion, but it was thought best, on the whole, to confine it to two-thirds.

Let me say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Cumberland (Mr. Wherry) in reference to the propriety of this disfranchisement. If there is any one act which is more injurious than another to the welfare of the community it is fraud at the elections. It strikes at the very foundation of our government; it destroys representation; it is a most heinous offence against republican government. It was, therefore, thought best to distinguish the crime as has been done here, by forfeiting the right of suffrage and placing the brand of infamy upon the guilty perpetrator. It was the design of the act to take away this right of suffrage from the convict criminal, whether he esteem that right much or little. I cannot appreciate the force of the argument of the gentleman from Cumberland, (Mr. Wherry,) when he distinguishes between the rich man who attaches great importance to the right of suffrage, and the poor man who attaches little importance to it. High or low, rich or poor, they are guilty of a great offence, and both should be disfranchised. I hope, therefore, the amendment will be voted down and the section pass as submitted.

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: I desire, after hearing the explanation of the chairman of the committee, to withdraw that part of my amendment which refers to infamous crimes, because I see that it would destroy the symmetry of this section. The gentleman from Centre (Mr. M'Allister) has, no doubt, together with the other members of the Committee on Suffrage, taken great care to understand the section in all its provisions. I do hope, however, that this provision, somewhere, will go into the Constitution, and I will bide my time to effect it. It should be in there somewhere, that men who have been guilty of infamous crimes shall not be a part of the source from which we derive our political power. I hope, also, that this section will pass, notwithstanding the remarks that have been made in opposition to it by the gentleman from Cumberland, (Mr. Wherry,) because I do not regard it as a matter of punishment alone to those who violate the election laws of the State, because I presume that when they have been convicted, it means that they shall have been punished in accordance with the sanctions that are provided in the election laws themselves; but that this is simply a protection to the people of Pennsylvania against the further interference in the elections of the Commonwealth by people who have sought to corrupt this source of power at its fountain head.

Mr. WHERRY. Will the gentleman explain, if this is not a punishment, what possible protection it can give to the community?

Mr. LEAR. It gives this protection: It protects them from further interference on the part of those people, and it deters others from taking part in this sort of business, because it will endanger their right to enjoy this privilege. To that extent it is a punishment; but I suppose it is not intended and designed that the punishment shall not follow their conviction by the court in which the individual is convicted. But when these people go to the election poll, and by fraudulent naturalization papers, by fraudulent personation of others, by any other device through which the election laws of the Commonwealth shall be circumvented and defeated, corrupt this source of power of the people, I say that they ought to be disfranchised. I would go further than the report of the committee, and put it beyond the power of the Legislature, by a two-thirds vote, or any other power in this government, to restore the man who has once violated the election laws of the Commonwealth knowingly; he should never afterwards have any voice in the affairs of the State as an elector. Why, sir, I consider it the worst and most dangerous kind of treason. It strikes at our rights, at the very source of political rights, where they should be sustained and supported.

It was said yesterday, in this Hall, that men have been inaugurated and inducted into high offices who have never been elected by the suffrages of the people of the State or district. I say, further than that, that it is scarcely known who is elected in this State. There has been some deprecation of the declamations of these wholesale frauds that have been perpetrated in Pennsylvania—particularly in this city. I say, however, that until we secure a full diagnosis of the disease to which we are going to administer our remedies, we are not capable of fairly understanding the magnitude of the difficulty, with all its ramifications. Do not let us, then, get squeamish, because one day we have said some harsh things about those election frauds, and another day go back upon our record, and apologize for what we have said, or ask others to apologize. I repeat that I do not confine it to Philadelphia. That there is a system of frauds in Pennsylvania that has become frightful; and that we do not know, today, whether a man who holds office in the Commonwealth is there by the legal expression of the will of the electors of his district or State, is an admitted and deplorable fact. While that is so, an election is simply a scramble, surrounded by all the contrivances and all the trickery of those who are skilled in respect to stuffing ballot-boxes and manipulating returns, and in the hurly-burly some one is declared elected to the office, and then he takes it and holds it and exercises its functions, and performs the duties under it, and takes its emoluments, and all is settled; but that it is an expression of the voice of the people of the State or district we have no knowledge, except in those places where there are overwhelming majorities, majorities so great that no reasonable amount of fraud could defeat the people's will. Why, not only is it a matter of importance for the purpose of giving the people an opportunity to have their own rulers, their own law-makers, and those who administer their laws, but it is important to us as a matter of economy.

There are now, probably, four or five committees of the Legislature at great expense to the State, besides innumerable courts in different parts of the Commonwealth, examining and investigating into various election frauds alleged to have been committed by the members of that body. I say, then, let the Convention make it a terror to those who shall be convicted of having defeated the will of the people by a violation of the election laws of the State, and I consider it will be a dereliction of duty on the part of the members of this Convention if they fail to incorporate such a provision as this in the Constitution. We are not here as the advocates of those who violate the election laws of the State. We are not here as the defenders of their rights, and I say it is a proper consequence of his act that a man who has been once convicted and found guilty of this grave offence shall never again exercise the elective franchise, because the man who is not willing to be governed by law and to exercise this privilege of an elector according to the provisions of the law which the wisdom of the State may dictate is not fit to live under a government and enjoy its privileges. I am therefore in favor of passing this section, and I therefore withdraw the amendment which I have offered, because it will probably interfere with the peculiar symmetry of the provision as it stands in reference to the violation of the election laws. If the gentleman from Centre, (Mr. McAllister,) who is the chairman of this committee, is confident that conviction covers the whole case without sentence, I will withdraw the amendment, but I do know that some laws have been enacted by the wisdom of our Pennsylvania Legislature whereby a man must be convicted and sentenced before he can be visited with the consequences of his crime. I think the same principle will apply with regard to this section, and that before a man can be removed from his office and punished he must be convicted and sentenced. It was with this idea in mind that I proposed this amendment, but if the members of the Convention who are learned in the criminal law are satisfied that conviction is all that is necessary, I will then withdraw that part of my amendment which relates to infamous crimes and let the remaining portion be voted upon.

The question being taken upon the amendment offered by Mr. Lear, a division was called, which resulted as follows: Ayes, thirty-eight; noes, forty-six.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. W. H. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the section, by striking out all after the words, "deprived of the right of suffrage." In offering this amendment I desire to express, in a brief manner, the views I entertain in regard to the proposition before the Convention. It has been said by an old proverb that "there is nothing that succeeds like success," and I think this principle is extremely applicable to the case of election frauds. If a man is elected to office by the most flagrant frauds imaginable he is quietly permitted to enjoy the fruits of his success. He does not lose many friends, and, in a measure, society does not avoid him. I think, therefore, that it is quite time that some action should be taken by the Convention which will put a stop to these frauds forever. In order to accomplish this result, I think if this section is shortened just one line and a half, if we even cannot wholly protect the purity of our elections, it becomes our duty here in this body to declare that we believe the violation of the election laws and the frauds against the right of suffrage are crimes that should be punished, and should not be entirely forgotten. I am not, therefore, in favor of placing the pardoning power, for such crimes as these, in the hands of any court or body, but I am in favor of a law which shall be positive, even if it destroys the votes of a hundred thousand persons, that any person convicted of a fraudulent violation of the election laws shall be disqualified from exercising the right of suffrage.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman: I propose to vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. W. H. Smith,) but not exactly for the reasons which he has given. I agree with the views of the gentleman from Lancaster, (Mr. Carter,) and am willing to vote to insert a provision limiting the punishment, upon conviction of violation of the election laws, to a term of five years, and in order to make room for the introduction of that amendment I shall vote for the proposition to strike out the second clause of the pending section. I think, sir, it would be entirely wrong to place this offence beyond the reach of pardon or forgiveness under any circumstances; and if it is right that a man, either wilfully or through the persuasion of others, has been led into the offence of committing a fraud upon the elective franchise, he should have a locus penitentie, like other people, and that the power of pardon or forgiveness should not be withheld from him any more than from any other citizens of the State who have committed other offences of perhaps greater magnitude. I hope this body, before it adjourns, will place such a restriction upon the pardoning power, by making it judicial in its administration, that it will be in safe hands, and can be exercised in the interests of the poorest and humblest of our citizens without endangering the public welfare. With these views, briefly expressed, I shall vote for the pending amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. W. H. Smith,) and in the expectation that the gentleman from Lancaster (Mr. Carter) will introduce his amendment as an amendment to the remaining part of the section.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman: I offer to amend the amendment, by adding the words "for the term of five years" to the end thereof. The section will then read: "Every person convicted of any fraudulent violation of the election laws shall be deprived of the right of suffrage for the term of five years." Mr. Chairman, in offering this amendment, I desire to say but a few words in regard to it. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Bucks (Mr. Lear) that we cannot estimate the enormity of this great crime—but, sir, there are certain considerations, well known to all of us, which should guide the Convention in the determination of this question. I am decidedly opposed, for reasons which I have heretofore indicated, and shall not reiterate now to intrust this pardoning power to the Legislature, inasmuch as the Convention designs taking from that body all the penal legislation which can be safely and properly done. I hope that the amendment will pass, and that the section will pass as amended. I do not claim or presume that the committee claims that this section affords a universal panacea for our troubles, or any sort of a cure-all, but it is a part of the system we are building up, looking towards that end, and in my mind it is eminently a proper one.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: The arguments which have been made in favor of the adoption of the pending amendment I think entirely misconceive the object of the section as it has been reported by the committee. The main intention of the section is not to provide a punishment for the fraudulent voter. His offence will be indictable under the statute laws of the State, and the courts will administer the punishment which the law has provided for the offence. If there should be mitigating circumstances in his case he will appeal to the ordinary tribunal. This section has been designed mainly for the protection of the ballot-boxes of the people against convicted rogues, who, by its provisions, shall be adjudged to be unfit for the exercise of the right of suffrage. I would not here attempt to measure the limit of the disfranchisement for offences of this kind, which shall be required for the protection of the ballot box, whether it shall be five years or twenty years. If it were simply a question of the punishment of the offender, as a matter of course, it would be proper to impose some limitation of time upon his sentence, or upon the extent of the punishment which should be inflicted upon him. This section, however, is a matter for the protection of the public, and I think the proposition is clear, that when a citizen of our State has been adjudged, after all the forms of law have been gone through with, to be a fraudulent voter, the judgment of the people should go against him, and he should enjoy no more political privileges than minors, females, and other non-voting classes of our citizens.

Now, sir, we have provided, in the report of the committee, for extraordinary cases. It may happen, in very extraordinary and exceptional cases, that a man will be unjustly convicted; that afterward it may be possible for him to show that he was convicted upon false testimony. I can suppose, also, a case where it would be proper for the Legislature to interfere after some ten, or fifteen, or twenty years. A villain may repent and change his life. He may become an orderly member of society. He may join one of our christian churches, and by his walk and conversation he may demonstrate to all the people about him that he is a new man, and that if re-intrusted with this right of suffrage he will exercise it honestly and justly. Now, in any case where one of these disfranchised men shall be able to show that his heart and life have changed, and that he is a fit member of society, there will be no difficulty, upon an appeal to the Legislature showing these facts, to get a two-third or three-fourth vote restoring him to the full exercise of the right of suffrage. These cases will be rare, not common. They will not burden the Legislature with business.

For my part I would choose to change this number, and not allow a two-third vote to restore the right of voting. I would make it three-fourths, so that it should never be possible for a mere political majority in the Legislature to restore this right. When a man is to be re-clothed with the privilege which he has justly forfeited, let it be given to him by the judgment of the party opposed to him, or at least a portion of its members. The Legislature is better constituted than the Executive or the board of pardons, because, after all, your Executive is a partisan, and the board associated with him may be of the same party, and in attempting to exercise a pardoning power with those officials you have no check upon partisanism. But the Legislature of the State, springing from the popular action of our people, always divided into political parties, will be so constituted that no restoration of this privilege can ever be done by a mere party vote, especially if you make it a three-fourth vote, and at the same time these few, exceptional, rare cases of restoration can be acted upon without difficulty.

If this amendment shall not be agreed to, Mr. Chairman, I shall move to make the vote required for the restoration of the right of suffrage three-fourths instead of two-thirds, as at present reported.

MR. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask the gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Buckalew) whether his experience in legislative pardons, which I know has been considerable, has induced him to favor them; or whether he does not know that in all cases, or in the class of cases, at least, in which he and I have been familiar with legislative pardons, the action of the legislative body has not been wholly without definite information upon the subject, and that the plan served the purposes only of the few who are wealthy enough or important enough to bring themselves within the notice of the legislative body? Now I am entirely opposed to pardons as they are being granted at present, or as the pardoning power is now used, and I trust that this Convention will reform it to a very considerable extent. I have no definite idea on that point, but wherever the pardoning power is placed I want it to reach these offences, as well as other offences, in the same manner. I am, therefore, entirely in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. W. H. Smith,) and opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Lancaster (Mr. Carter.) I am in favor of the amendment, not because I think with the gentleman who offered it, that it constitutes the offence an unpardonable one, because I do not believe that we should have in this sublunary world of ours any unpardonable offences. I would not deprive any criminal of the right to apply for forgiveness, here or elsewhere, and obtain it. I believe in striking off that provision of the sentence, and leaving this offence like all other offences, within the reach of pardon.

I am opposed to the limit of five years, although at first inclined to favor it, because these offences are very unequal.

No single punishment can apply to all of them. There are violations of the election laws that should deprive a man of his right to vote probably for life. There are others that should deprive him of his right to vote only at the election where the offence is committed. I am not willing to take these two offences and apply the same punishment to each. Because it is a punishment, notwithstanding the ingenious argument of the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) that it is a mere protection to society. I would like to know what all punishments are but mere protections to society. I am, therefore, inclined to vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Lancaster, (Mr. Carter,) and in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. W. H. Smith,) leaving the section stand:

"Every person convicted of any fraudulent violation of the election laws shall be deprived of the right of suffrage simply by a mere conviction."

MR. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say a very few words on this subject. There is, undoubtedly, very great force in what has been said here by the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) but it strikes me it goes too far, and I think a few reflections will show that it does.

Undoubtedly it is a very great wrong upon the community when a man violates the election laws in any of the modes pointed out in the preceding section, but it is not the greatest of all crimes. We are a little excited now, and have been for the last week, in discussing this subject, and having our minds unduly heated in approaching the discussion of this subject, we are a little run away with. There is but one offence to which a penalty is affixed by the laws of this Commonwealth, which, when once executed, is irrevocable. There is but one; and will gentlemen, when they look at this question apart from the heat of the moment, seriously undertake to say that a youth barely twenty-one, who, under, I grant you, improper pressure, but still under the pressure of party, violates the election laws in any particular, commits an offence for which no atonement can be made? Surely this cannot properly be said. All punishment has but two objects, as was hinted by my friend from Delaware, who has just taken his seat, (Mr. Broomall.) One is the protection of society. That is a part of every punishment. The other is the reformation of the offender. This is the object of all punishment, and punishment that has not these two objects in view is simply vengeance.

It seems, therefore, quite clear to my mind, and I hope it does to the minds of the members of the Convention, that there ought to be some mode of washing away the sin of an offence which is often committed in the heat of excitement, but which does not necessarily, wrong as it is, leave a man so coated with infamy that there can be no chance of his ever becoming better. Now how is this to be done? Is he to be disfranchised forever? Is he to have a punishment worse than Cain thought was inflicted upon him? Is he to go about the community forever branded? That is not the spirit of the laws of this Commonwealth. That was not the spirit of its great founder. That is not the spirit of our penal legislation, which has always partaken of the spirit of that great founder. There ought, therefore, to be an opportunity to reform given to these men. How shall it best be done? It is difficult to decide this, I admit. But it strikes me that of all the modes suggested, this mode of appealing to the Legislature is the worst. I do not know exactly to what the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) alluded when he referred to some case of legislative pardon, but I can very well understand that an appeal to the Legislature will be very rarely efficacious in behalf of a humble member of the community. I would prefer myself some definite limit as to time; and I vibrate, therefore, between the proposition of the gentleman from Lancaster (Mr. Carter) and that of the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. Smith,) with a leaning in favor of that of the former. I do not believe a man who once commits a fraud at an election is forever to be condemned. I believe a period of time may come when he may be a better man. Whether five years is the period, or whether it would be better to leave it to Executive clemency, modified, as I think it undoubtedly will be to some extent by this Convention, is a question that is for this body to determine. I would rather myself make it a longer term of years.

Five years, perhaps, is not enough. It is said that we all change physically, perhaps mentally and morally, every seven years. I will adopt that theory. None of us hold the opinions to-day, precisely, that we held seven years ago. I am disposed to adopt some such limitation as this. A man who is twenty-one years of age, who commits, in the heat of party excitement, a breach of the election laws, may well be considered at the age of twenty-eight to have attoned by an abstinence from participation in all public business for the fault originally committed by him. If the gentleman who proposed the amendment of five years (Mr. Carter) will make it a little longer, I will vote for it, as I believe it to be right to hold out always, to every one who has done wrong, an inducement to become a better member of society. I think it is a mistake to leave in any community, men so branded, that in no future time, do what they may, they can ever recover the original position which, by a single offence, they have unfortunately lost.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman: I accept the modification of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) and so change my amendment to seven years instead of five.

Mr. KNIGHT. Is an amendment to the amendment now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Not now.

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Chairman: It seems to me that we have overlooked one point, in leaving this power with the Legislature, and that is that it requires them to engage in one of the most unpleasant kinds of special legislation, and one that will subject them to more corrupt influences, perhaps, than anything else. It is open to any influence, good, indifferent, bad or positively wicked, that can be brought to bear upon any or all of the members for the purpose of obtaining pardon by those who may have committed this offence. It seems to me that if we are going to do away with special legislation, that we ought not to introduce it upon a subject like this, which, as I said, before, will open the way for opportunities of a greater number and strength of evil influences upon the Legislature than almost any other that can be named. Let the pardoning power on this subject rest where the pardoning power on all other crimes does, and let the section, if adopted at all, stop at the word "suffrage," which I understand is the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. W. H. Smith.)

Mr. CASSIDY. Mr. Chairman: I offer to suggest to the gentleman from Lancaster (Mr. Carter) a proposition, which, perhaps, he will accept as an amendment. I think it will also meet with the desire of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle.) It is to insert in this section, "may by the court, before which he was convicted, be deprived of," &c., so that the section will read, "every person convicted by a fraudulent violation of the election laws, may, by the court before which he was convicted, be deprived of the right of suffrage," &c., so that if it be a proper case, and not a mere case of a young man, twenty one years of age, having the first time violated the election law, in some way that is not, perhaps, very material, the court may exercise its judgment and make it a part of the sentence to deprive him of the right of suffrage, or not, as the case may warrant. Then, I have no objection to voting for the amendment of my friend from Lancaster, (Mr. Carter,) limiting the exclusion from the right of suffrage to five or seven years, though I would prefer it to be without limitation. I suggest that to him; if he thinks it ought to be accepted, very well; if not, I will move it as an amendment at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Lancaster, (Mr. Carter,) to insert the words, "for the term of seven years;" this being an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. W. H. Smith,) to strike out all after the word "suffrage."

Upon this question a division was called, and being taken, resulted: Affirmative, thirty-eight; negative, forty-four.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KNIGHT. I move the following amendment:

The CLERK read: Insert after the word "suffrage," the words "for the term of five years," leaving the balance of the section as it stands.

The section would read as proposed to be amended:

"Every person convicted of any fraudulent violation of the election laws shall be deprived of the right of suffrage for a period of five years, but such right, in any particular case, may be restored by an act of Legislature, two-thirds of each House consenting thereto."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I move to strike out "two-thirds," and insert "three-fourths."

The motion was not agreed to.

The question recurring upon the amendment of Mr. W. H. Smith, to strike out all after "suffrage," in the second line, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I move to strike out all after the word "suffrage," in the second line, and insert "and be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished as shall be provided by law."

I have thought proper to offer this amendment, because I believe that simply depriving a man of the right of suffrage for a violation of this great right, which lies at the very foundation of our government, is not sufficient punishment. The crime of violation of the election laws I conceive to be a greater crime against society than almost any other that a man could commit, and I believe that simple disfranchisement is not a sufficient punishment. I do not agree with the position taken by some gentlemen that disfranchisement is not a penalty. The deprivation of the right of suffrage is a penalty, and can be viewed in no other light, and the amendment which I now offer proposes an additional penalty. Of course the judicial interpretation is, that the person violating has wilfully violated, and we make it a crime, we punish it by depriving the offender of the right of voting. The person then who has wilfully violated the election laws of the Commonwealth has undertaken to corrupt the very foundation of this government, without which there is no mode of administering a republican form of government. This is the mode adopted to record the will of the people, and to secure the permanency of a republican government, and the man who would undertake fraudulently to destroy that will, I would not only punish by depriving him of his right of suffrage, but I would go further, and I would say that it should be a crime, to be further indicted and further punished. Many persons would take their chances, if they were simply to be stripped of the right of suffrage. Their citizenship remains.—They have all the rights in society left, except simply the right to go to the polls and cast a vote, and this can be restored when they can get a two-thirds vote of the Legislature to restore that right.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is for these reasons, believing that this right of suffrage is the very highest right that a citizen can enjoy, and the violation of it is the greatest crime that he can commit, that I would make the punishment of it greater. I would make him feel the sting of a criminal prosecution and punishment in addition to depriving him of the right of suffrage.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I think the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) goes rather too far, in proposing that we should insert in this section that offences against the election laws shall be misdemeanors, and punishable, by indictment, as other crimes. I think that is a proper matter for legislation, and not for constitutional provision; we are not to provide, by this instrument, a penal code, either in full or in part. The crime proposed to be provided against, by this amendment, is a fraudulent violation of the election laws. Certainly we can trust to those laws for imposing their own sanctions, and it is not necessary for us to say that a violation of a law shall be a misdemeanor. The law itself will say that, and it will be punished under the provisions of the law; and it is bringing into this section, and this article, more minutiae than it should contain. This view, however, does not apply to the section as reported by the committee, for, as I understand it, while it is true that, in effect, a punishment is inflicted by this section upon the man who violates it, still the purpose of it is clearly within the proper limitation of constitutional enactment, for this reason, that its real purpose is to designate who shall exercise sovereign power in this State. It is properly said by the Constitution and the laws that men of unsound mind shall not vote.

It is intended simply to go one step further here, and say that a man who shall be guilty of fraudulently violating the election laws is no more fit to exercise the privilege of franchise than a man mentally unsound. Such moral insanity as truly unfits him from exercising the privilege of a sovereign voter as unsoundness of mind, and therefore, whilst punishment results under the section that is proposed, the purpose is to declare that that class of men who can be guilty of this wrong are not fit to exercise the privilege of casting ballots, because they have shown themselves to be unqualified for the franchise. Therefore the amendment is objectionable, because it proposes to encroach upon the province of legislation. But I have tried to show that the section itself is not amenable to the same objection, because it proposes simply to designate where sovereign power shall reside and to what classes of people it shall be restricted.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I trust the committee will vote intelligently on this matter—that is, that the members will consider what they are doing. They are asked, certainly, to compound two hitherto distinct departments of this government. Hereafter we will be asked to impose political, legislative and Executive functions upon the judges, which functions they are discharging in this city to-day to a very large extent. We are asked to make legislators Governors—distributors of Executive grace and Executive pardon. I care not how you constitute your Executive department; that is a matter for discussion; but I do beg this Convention to confine Executive matters to the Executive department. Give the Executive aids that you can trust; erect barriers about Executive duty that will be a protection to the people; but do not put upon legislators the discharge of Executive duties, and do not put upon judges the discharge of Executive duties.

Surely none of the evils of which we complain, have arisen from the old division of our government—the Executive, the legislative and the judicial divisions—and the matter of pardons belongs to the Executive department of the government. Let us confide in our Committee on the Executive, at least until we shall have had the honor of hearing their report. Doubtless they will give an Executive committee on pardons, or an Executive council of pardons, or some machinery of the Executive branch, in which we can trust. We cannot do well by confounding distinctions of this character. Surely you do not want your judges to exercise the pardoning power? Judges cannot be Governors and legislators, and at the same time continue to be judges. Neither can legislators become judges or Governors—cannot be a council of pardon—as I read political history—with any safety whatever. The gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) and the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) have had experience on this question in the National Congress. I should like to hear from either of them, how it is possible for a legislative body to hear and consider and decide the propriety of granting an individual pardon for an offence. The distribution of powers of government rests upon the gravest principles. It has been the theme of thinkers for many centuries, and we have reached, as it seems to me, a wise conclusion. It certainly is desirable that we should consider carefully what we are doing, even in making so slight a change, tending as this change seems to me, to lead to confound the distinctions which we have hitherto maintained in our Constitution.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, by striking out all after the words "restored by," and insert in lieu thereof the words "the pardoning power, after the expiration of seven years, from the date of conviction."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from York (Mr. Cochran) to withhold that amendment until the question is taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. W. H. Smith.)

Mr. COCHRAN. I have no objection to withholding it for the present.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman: As has been remarked, by some of the gentleman who have recently spoken, it is well to vote upon this question intelligently. I cannot understand, however, how the different functions of the government are confounded by the provisions of this section, as reported by the committee. I cannot understand why the term "pardon" should be used in this connection at all. It seems to me, sir, that if gentlemen of the committee will reflect for a moment, and will read the language of the section, they will see it has no connection whatever with the pardoning power. This section provides that every person convicted of any fraudulent violation of the election laws shall be deprived of the right of suffrage.

Conviction has been decided, technically, to mean not only the verdict of the jury, which finds the man guilty, but the passing of sentence or the judgment of the court pronounced upon him. Now, sir, the offence of violating the election laws of the Commonwealth does not differ from any other criminal offence. If no change is made in the Constitution now undergoing consideration, the pardoning power rests with the Executive; and if a man is tried, found guilty and sentenced of the crime of a fraudulent violation of the election laws, the Governor can pardon him of that offence; and if he is pardoned by the Executive, or by the pardoning power, of that offence, he stands exactly in the position of a man who has never committed any crime; and therefore it may be all the remaining portion of this section becomes null and void as regards that man, who has been convicted and pardoned.

Now, sir, if such is the case—if such is the law of the case—that the pardoning power can restore a man to all the rights of citizenship, as though the crime had never been committed, this section would apply only to persons who stand convicted and are not pardoned. But be that as it may, when the Legislature is called upon to act, they do not pardon the criminal, because he may have gone to jail, may have paid his fine and costs, or suffered his imprisonment; but they restore to him merely the right, which we say here in this Constitution he shall be deprived of. He is not restored; he is not cleaned from what has been put upon him by his crime; he is not an innocent man. It simply provides in this section that the right of suffrage shall again be restored to him; and I cannot understand how gentlemen can confound that, in any degree, with the pardoning power. The two things are entirely distinct. The Governor, or whoever will have the pardoning power, will still have, I think, the pardoning power, and this section will not interfere with that right in any particular.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say a word or two to the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. Howard,) who proposes, as I understand, to legislate in this matter of fraudulent voting by making it a misdemeanor, and specifying the penalty. Now, sir, that is a matter which is proper to be taken cognizance of by the Legislature; and I will say to him that the Legislature has heretofore done that very thing, and I will refer him to the act. He will find it in Pardon's Digest, new edition, page 367. It says: "If any person not duly qualified shall fraudulently vote at any election within this Commonwealth, or, being otherwise qualified, shall vote out of his proper district; or if any person, knowing the want of any such qualification, shall aid or procure such person to vote, the person or persons so offending shall, on conviction, be fined in any sum not exceeding two hundred dollars, and be imprisoned for any term not exceeding three months." The Legislature has, therefore, provided for this very thing.

The question being upon the amendment of Mr. Howard, it was rejected.

MR. JOHN N. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, by striking out the words, "two-thirds of each consenting thereto," and inserting instead the words, "for a period of seven years from the time of conviction."

The question being upon the amendment, it was rejected.

MR. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman: I now offer my amendment, to strike out all after the words "restored by," and insert "the pardoning power, after the expiration of seven years from the date of conviction."

MR. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I am opposed to this amendment, because it may sometime or another keep an innocent party—a man falsely convicted—out of his liberty for seven years. The idea of the committee in saying that he should be pardoned by the Legislature was to meet any cases where he could prove that he was illegally and wrongfully convicted—as by false evidence and false swearing. Now, by this amendment, you would keep such a man out of his liberty for seven years, with that dreadful stigma upon his character, even when he has been discovered to have been wrongfully convicted.

MR. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman: I would simply remark, about this amendment, without desiring to detain the committee, that it substantially embraces two propositions. In the first place it proposes to substitute the expression "the pardoning power" for "the Legislature." I am opposed, and I apprehend that to be right in principle, to having the Legislature exercising such special power as this, for reasons which it is unnecessary to reiterate, and because I believe it would be open to corruption and evil influences to which it ought not to be subverted. As to the limit of seven years, I am prepared to say that, in my opinion, this offence, which is a very grave one, should not be pardonable inside a term of seven years; but if there are gentlemen in this committee who think that the pardoning power should be allowed to act upon it within that term they can move to amend the amendment, by striking out that term and leaving it to "the pardoning power," of whatever constituents it may be composed, generally to act upon it at any time, and in that way the limitation or restriction for the seven years would be removed. I prefer, myself, to make the term seven years, or five, or some such definite term, before the pardoning power should interfere, but if the sense is to strike out that term I will vote to leave it to the pardoning power at any time.

MR. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I move strike out all the gentleman has inserted, and to substitute in lieu thereof simply the word "pardon."

MR. MACVEAGH. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, I would like to state that we shall certainly be better able to decide this question when we have heard how the court of pardons is to be decided. I hope, therefore, the further consideration of this section will be postponed for the present.

MR. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman: I also desire to interrupt the gentleman by a few words of explanation. The committee on the Executive department will make their report in a very short time, and we hope to so protect the Executive, as well as the people, in this great question of Executive pardon, as to commend our action to the good sense of the Convention. My impression is that we had better postpone the further consideration of this section, as is suggested by the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) until the Committee on the Executive department has made its report.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to postpone cannot be entertained. The section can be voted down, and its consideration resumed on a second reading.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: My motion is based upon the conviction that the committee that has this matter in charge, will report a satisfactory pardoning provision, and that they will throw sufficient guards around it. I have no doubt about that, and I think the Convention may assume that as a fact; but I do not think it is necessary that we should await the action of that committee. I do hope, however, that the Convention will not entrust two-thirds, three-fourths, or a majority of the Legislature with any such power as that of pardoning offences. I do trust, before we mix up jurisdictions and functions in this manner, we shall consider the impropriety of conferring the power of granting pardons upon the Legislature.

I would remind the Convention further, that cases of an ordinary character would never be brought before the Legislature, and hence the provision, that the committee has reported will amount to an eternal deprivation of the right of suffrage in most cases. I trust the Convention is not going to make a discrimination between those who are wealthy, and therefore able to abuse the privilege of franchise, and repeat the mischief again, and those who are ignorant or are induced by undue influence to violate the election laws, leaving the latter without remedy. Do the members of the Convention remember what a vast scope is occupied by the grade of offences against the election laws? Are the advocates of this measure prepared to say, that a young man just of age and under the party drill, who shall be guilty of a fraudulent violation of the election laws if he happens to treat his companion in order to secure his vote, is thereby guilty of an unpardonable crime? Why murder is pardonable! They say the case supposed will not be a fraudulent violation of the election laws. I submit it would be an intentional violation of the law, and hence necessarily fraudulent; and should such a man be deprived of his right to vote for life, for committing such an offence? Certainly not. Yet that would be the effect; for unless the offender should be a wealthy or influential man, he would never get his case before the legislative body. I contend that the legislative body is not the proper body in which these questions should be decided. I remind the gentleman who sits before me, (Mr. Buckalew,) who has had considerable experience in legislative pardons, that the last body to obtain exact information upon the subject matter will be the legislative body. These questions had better be submitted to a court in our own counties and cities, or anywhere else, than in the legislative body. I repeat again, that this section, in my judgment, contains in it more mischief than anything else that has come even from the Committee on Elections.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: I rise to add a few remarks to the very sensible and pertinent argument of the gentleman from York, (Mr. Gibson,) and to answer the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh.) The Convention seems to be getting into confusion. It was well said by the gentleman from York, (Mr. Gibson,) that there is no interference with the pardoning power by this section, whether that power be vested in the Governor or in the Governor and his counsel. The offender may be pardoned the next day after his conviction, but this does not relieve him of the loss of the right of suffrage. The right of suffrage is a mere incident of conviction; and when the provision is placed in the organic law, that the offender shall be deprived of the right of suffrage, it will be impossible for the pardoning power to restore that right, although it may restore him to liberty and all other rights. The organic law still deprives him of the exercise of the right of suffrage. Now it is alleged by the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) that this section confounds the Executive and the judicial and the legislative power, and that it is an innovation upon the principles of government. How can this be? It is proposed now, in the section under consideration, that instead of this deprivation being perpetual, or for life, the legislative body may restore it. Is it not right that the Legislature should restore it? Is not the Legislature the only power of government which, on principle, can restore it? Surely it is. It is a legislative act, and not an Executive act.

Mr. WHERRY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Centre a question. The gentleman from Centre maintains that the right of suffrage is an inalienable, inborn right. How can the Legislature restore an inalienable, inborn right?

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: It is true, the gentleman from Centre asserts that the right of suffrage is a natural social right, and he contends further, that being a natural social right, it belongs to the people, in whom all power is inherent. That people being here to-day, by their representatives, to establish their organic law, he also contends that by passing the section under consideration the people thus represented agree, each with the other, that any one convicted of a fraudulent violation of their election laws shall forfeit this great natural social right of suffrage. Are they not competent so to agree? And having so agreed, do they not thereby deprive the Governor of all power to restore the forfeited right by a pardon?

This is a principle which seems perfectly plain, and which no lawyer can dispute, much less a constitutional lawyer. If the right of suffrage is to be restored it should be by a legislative and not an Executive act.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: It is very evident that this section is open to great difference of opinion upon its judicial construction. I apprehend that the work of this Convention ought to be so certain as to permit no room for any misapprehension among lawyers or judges as to what its true interpretation should be. I shall propose an amendment to the section, but inasmuch as I presume it is not in order at this time I shall merely read it for the information of the Convention. I propose to add at the end of the section the following words: "But nothing herein contained shall exclude the right of Executive pardon, which shall restore the right of suffrage." This amendment will very distinctly raise the question before the committee whether they intend to enact such a provision as shall wholly exclude the right of pardon. I could not myself assent to a proposition so entirely sweeping in its character. The violation of a law enacted to preserve the purity of the ballot is a crime of exceedingly great magnitude, but it is not murder. It does not equal in its magnitude or its consequences a vast number of other crimes, and it is peculiarly a crime which may be committed by the inexperienced and under circumstances which strongly call for the immediate interposition of Executive clemency. My judgment cannot approve any system which proposes to fix upon the people a crime of such magnitude that it shall be wholly beyond the power of Executive clemency. The chairman of the Committee on the Executive Department has stated that that committee will report a provision which it is hoped will meet with the approval of the Convention, by which the pardoning power will be greatly circumscribed and limited, and no longer be left to the sole discretion of the Executive. He will be required to exercise that discretion in accordance with the recommendations of a competent court of pardons, whose recommendations shall be filed and recorded with the reasons at large upon which the recommendation is based. I trust I do not improperly disclose, in venturing to say this much, the proposed action of the Committee on the Executive Department, but I trust when their report is made that it will satisfy the Convention; there is no necessity for excluding this crime from the scope of Executive clemency any more than other crimes of even greater magnitude. With this view, and in order that the committee may vote intelligently upon this question, I have offered the amendment that if the Convention means to exclude the power of Executive pardon, we shall express that intention in such terms that neither the judges nor the people can misunderstand the provision.

With the views I have expressed, I repeat, I cannot approve a provision which, it is admitted by its friends, will lift this crime above the reach of Executive clemency, and place it by itself wholly above the power of pardon. I will therefore offer, if it be now in order, the amendment to which I have referred in the opening of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that the gentleman had better withhold his amendment until the vote is taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall.)

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: Would the amendment be in order if mine was withdrawn?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: I will, with the permission of the House, again read my amendment for information. It is as follows:

To add to the end of the section the words: "But nothing herein contained shall exclude the right of Executive pardon, which shall restore the right of suffrage." It still leaves to the Legislature the right to remove the disability as expressed in the section. I have not proposed by the amendment to exclude the right of the Legislature, two-thirds concurring, to restore the right of suffrage. On the propriety of this I express no opinion at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Lycoming (Mr. Armstrong) that if the amendment is adopted, and then the amendment of the gentleman from York, (Mr. Gibson,) it will not read well, and it would be better to take a vote on the separate proposition.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I defer to the opinion of the Chair, and will wait until the amendment of the gentleman from York has been acted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from York.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman: I would like the amendment read for information.

The CLERK. "Any person convicted of any fraudulent violation of the election laws shall be deprived of the right of suffrage, but such right, in any particular case, may be restored by the pardoning power after the expiration of seven years from the date of conviction."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: I now move my amendment:

To add to the end of the section the words: "But nothing herein contained shall exclude the right of Executive pardon which shall restore the right of suffrage."

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I renew, as an amendment to that, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. Broomall,) which seems to me to keep the matter in the power of the Executive department of the government. I move to amend as follows:

To insert the word "pardon" after the word "by," in the third line.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: I respectfully suggest to the gentleman from Dauphin that the amendment I have offered does not interfere with the general pardoning power of the Executive.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: At the suggestion of the gentleman from Lycoming I withdraw the amendment for the present.

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: Has the question been taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. Long ago, sir.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: The amendment of the gentleman from Lycoming (Mr. Armstrong) meets the question distinctly; in substance presents the question whether we are to put a clause upon this subject in the Constitution or not; because I take it for granted that most friends of the proposition reported by the committee will vote heartily against it in this changed form. The gentleman from Lycoming states very accurately that his amendment raises the direct question involved in this debate. I agree with him, and I say here distinctly, that a provision of this sort, a provision of disfranchisement, with an unlimited power in the Executive department to pardon, is more than worthless, because it is a power which will be exercised by political personages for political purposes, to assist their own party, and to discriminate against those opposed to it, and it would be monstrous to put such a provision into the fundamental law of the State.

Now, sir, the report of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation did not exclude the Governor from action on this subject. The report of that committee is, that the Governor of the Commonwealth, with the assent of two-thirds of each House of the Legislature, may restore to a citizen the right of suffrage. The Governor is to participate in the enactment of the law. If in a particular case he has objection against restoration, he can veto the bill, and send it back to the Legislature, with the whole weight of his official influence and of his arguments, to reverse the first vote in each House.

Now the question is, whether the Governor, in assenting to the restoration of this political privilege, shall have associated with him the two Houses of the Legislature, or, under some other proposed amendment, shall have associated with him his own Secretary of the Commonwealth, and one or two other political officials, agreeing with him in political sentiment, whose check upon him in these political cases will be comparatively worthless. Joining the Legislature with him means a check and a curb upon the Executive. It means that no one party of this State, through its Executive or otherwise, shall restore this right; that the reasons of its restoration shall appeal to political opponents as well as to political friends. If, therefore, this committee of the whole choose to reject the proposition of the Committee on Suffrage, by which this restoration is not to take place from political favoritism under any circumstances, and shall lodge this whole authority of restoration with a partisan power, lodge it with the Executive and the political officials he may have associated with him, why, sir, we had better leave the section out of the Constitution altogether. It is not worth putting it there.

At all events, Mr. Chairman, I feel obliged to the gentleman from Lycoming for piercing through the mists in which the debate had involved this subject, and bringing us to the direct question, whether it is worth while to put into the Constitution a provision of this kind.

One other topic and I will leave the debate. My construction of this clause is, that it excludes altogether the ordinary pardoning power from actions in cases arising under it. Here, when you provide in this section a special remedy for the disfranchisement; when you provide by special constitutional provision that this restoration shall be by two-thirds of the Legislature and the Governor in the enactment of a law, you exclude necessarily other modes of restoration and the ordinary pardoning power cannot apply. To be sure, in another part of the Constitution you will grant to the Governor a general power, with or without an assistant council, to grant reprieves and pardons, but that general power is to be construed in connection with other parts of the Constitution. It will receive its construction in connection with this very section, and here, where another remedy is constitutionally provided for the restoration of this political right, the general power necessarily will not apply. So that without any amendment or change of the section as reported by the Committee on Suffrage, we will have the simple provision that men who pollute the ballot-box shall not vote, unless both of the great political parties of this State represented in the Legislature, in connection with the Governor, shall see such equity and justice in his case that they will restore to him the right of suffrage.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: I am glad that the amendment which I had the honor to suggest has brought before this Convention very distinctly the question upon which we are about to vote. It no longer rests in doubt that the Committee on Suffrage Election and Representation in reporting this section intended to exclude all power of Executive pardon. This offence is thus to be lifted by the act of this Convention into a magnitude and gravity which overtops all other offences known to criminal law. I apprehend, however, that it is not accurate for the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) for whose opinions ordinarily I have the highest respect, to argue that this section does not propose a punishment. Why, sir, there is no right of which a citizen is deprived which is not a punishment. If he is limited in the exercise of a right which other citizens exercise it is, pro tanto, a punishment and it is no answer to say that in this particular case it is the people only who suffer. It is the people always who suffer by a crime in contemplation of law. In a criminal prosecution when we indict for the commonest misdemeanor, or for the highest crime known to the law, it is in the name of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and against the peace and dignity of the same. And because this is an offence against the rights and liberties of the people, it is none the less the truth that the punishment lights upon the offender, and he experiences in his person the penalty of the offence which he has committed against the public welfare.

Now, sir, in this case, the person deprived of the elective franchise is punished severely. I know of but few punishments more severe than that a man should be singled out in a community and branded as unworthy of the exercise of the right to vote. It is to a sensitive man, it is to all ordinary men, a punishment of the greatest severity. Why shall this crime alone be lifted beyond the reach of all power to correct the mistakes which are incident to all human proceedings? If the power of pardon were to be vested in the Executive alone, without limitation and with power to exercise it in a manner calculated and designed to promote merely partisan interests, or to reward or to gratify political partisans or favorites I should agree with my learned friend. But the proposition already intimated to this Convention is to vest the power of pardon in a board which shall be, as far as possible, without political prejudice, and which shall not exercise the right of pardon in aid of, or to advance the interests of, any political party or for any political purposes whatever. If we fail to create a board of pardon, which shall attain to this end, the Convention will, in that regard, most signally fail of its duties. If it does reach that end, and constitutes a board whose recommendation to pardon, and without which it shall not be granted, shall be upon grounds distinct from political influences, then why should this particular offence be taken wholly beyond its range? Many instances will occur when, from inexperience, or when, from being the dupe of others, the person by whom the particular offence which would bring him within the provisions of this section will be committed, would be by far the least guilty of the parties concerned, and in such an instance, or where conspiracy or false testimony might work conviction, there ought to be a power which can relieve instantly the great wrong which would be perpetrated by suffering such a person to lie under such great privation as that of the elective franchise. I do not believe that any evil can result from the adoption of this amendment. On the contrary I believe that it would at all times greatly advance its efficiency, and I therefore hope that this committee will not undertake to say that this offence, of all others known to the law, shall be excluded from the right of Executive clemency.

Mr. LAMBERION. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to. The committee rose, and the President resumed his chair.

Mr. LAWRENCE, chairman of the committee of the whole, reported that that committee had further discussed the article reported by the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, and had instructed him to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Permission was given the committee of the whole to sit again to-morrow.

The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the President declared the Convention adjourned until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

FORTY-EIGHTH DAY.

THURSDAY, February 20, 1873.

The Convention met at ten A. M.

The PRESIDENT. There does not appear to be a quorum of members present.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I move that the roll be called, to ascertain whether there is a quorum present.

The CLERK then called the roll.

PRESENT.—Messrs. Achenbach, Alricks, Andrews, Baily, (Perry,) Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Baker, Bartholomew, Beebe, Black, Charles A., Boyd, Broomall, Carter, Clark, Cochran, Craig, Darlington, Davis, De France, Edwards, Elliott, Ellis, Gibson, Gilpin, Gowen, Guthrie, Hanna, Hay, Hazzard, Hopkins, Horton, Howard, Hunsicker, Knight, Lamberton, Landis, Lawrence, Lear, Lilly, Long, M'Allister, M'Clean, MacConnell, M'Culloch, M'Murray, Mantor, Minor, Niles, Palmer, G. W., Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Patton, Pughe, Purman, Reed, Andrew, Rooke, Ross, Runk, Russell, Sharpe, Simpson, Smith, Henry W., Smith, W. H., Stewart, Temple, Van Reed, Walker, Wetherill, J. M., Wetherill, John Price, Wherry, White, David N., White, J. W. F., Wright and Meredith, President—74.

NOT PRESENT.—Messrs. Addicks, Ainey, Armstrong, Baer, Bannan, Barclay, Bardsley, Biddle, Black, J. S., Bowman, Brodhead, Brown, Buckalew, Campbell, Carey, Cassidy, Church, Collins, Corbett, Corson, Cronmiller, Curry, Curtin, Cuyler, Dallas, Dodd, Dunning, Ewing, Fell, Finney, Fulton, Funck, Hall, Harvey, Hemphill, Heverin, Kaine, Littleton, M'Camant, MacVeagh, Mann, Metzger, Mott, Newlin, Palmer, H. W., Parsons, Porter, Purviance, John N., Purviance, Samuel A., Reed, John R., Reynolds, James L., Reynolds, S. H., Smith, H. G., Stanton, Struthers, Turrell, White, Harry, Woodward and Worrell—58.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication from Mrs. Elizabeth S. Bladen, chairman of the executive committee of the Citizens' Suffrage association of Philadelphia, requesting the use of the Convention Hall, on Monday evening next, for the purpose of listening to an address from Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. President: I move that the request be granted.

The question being taken, a division was called, and the motion was agreed to, a majority of a quorum voting in the affirmative.

REPORTS OF PROTHONOTARIES.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention the report of the prothonotary of Tioga county, relative to the number of civil cases pending upon the civil docket of that county, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. DARLINGTON presented a memorial from the London Grove monthly meeting of Friends of Chester county, praying for a prohibitory clause in the Constitution against the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. HAZZARD presented a memorial from the Monongahela Valley district convention, held at Pittsburg, praying that a separate clause in the Constitution, prohibitory of the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, be submitted to the vote of the people, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LILLY offered the following resolution, which was twice read:

Resolved, That when this body adjourns to-morrow it will be until Monday next at ten o'clock A. M.

Mr. ALRICKS. I move to amend, by striking out "ten" and inserting "eleven." The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President: I would like to say a word in regard to this resolution.

Mr. LILLY. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. MANTOR. I would like to inquire whether next Saturday, being Washington's birthday, is not a legal holiday, and made so by an act of Congress.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President: If it is the object of the resolution to adjourn over after to-morrow until Monday, for the purpose of commemorating the anniversary of the birthday of the Father of his Country —

Mr. BOYD. Mr. President: I rise to a point of order, and it is that debate is not in order upon the resolution, under a resolution which was adopted by the Convention a few days since.

The PRESIDENT. It is not a question of adjournment to-day. The motion is when the Convention adjourns to-morrow it will adjourn until Monday.

Mr. BOYD. I call for the reading of the resolution relative to debate upon questions of adjournment, which was adopted the other day.

The CLERK read as follows:

Resolved, That hereafter all questions as to the time of meeting and adjournment of the Convention shall be decided without debate.

The PRESIDENT. The point of order appears to be well taken. The Chair was not aware such a resolution had been passed in his absence.

Mr. COCHRAN. I merely wished to state —

The PRESIDENT. Debate is out of order.

The question being taken on the resolution, the yeas and nays were required by Mr. Hay and Mr. Cochran, and were as follow, viz:

Y E A S.

Messrs. Achenbach, Alricks, Andrews, Baker, Bartholomew, Beebe, Black, Charles A., Boyd, Brodhead, Broomall, Buckalew, Clark, Craig, Curry, Curtin, Dallas, Davis, De France, Edwards, Elliott, Ellis, Gibson, Gowen, Guthrie, Hanna, Horton, Hunsicker, Knight, Lambertson, Landis, Lawrence, Lear, Lilly, Long, M'Clean, MacConnell, Mantor, Minor, Mott, Newlin, Niles, Palmer, G. W., Patterson, D. W., Patton, Pughe, Purviance, John N., Ross, Runk, Sharpe, Simpson, Stanton, Stewart, Temple, Van Reed, Walker, Wetherill, J. M., Wetherill, Jno. Price, Wherry, Worrell, Wright and Meredith, President—61.

N A Y S.

Messrs. Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bailey, (Perry,) Biddle, Campbell, Carter, Cochran, Corbett, Darlington, Fell, Gilpin, Hay, Hazzard, Hopkins, Howard M'Alister, M'Culloch, M'Murray, Patterson, T. H. B., Purman, Reed, Andrew, Russell, Smith, Henry W., Smith, W. H., White, David N. and White, J. W. F.—25.

So the resolution was agreed to.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adicks, Ainey, Armstrong, Baer, Bannan, Barclay, Bardsley, Black, J. S., Bowman, Brown, Carey, Cassidy, Church, Collins, Corson, Cronmiller, Cuyler, Dodd, Dunning, Ewing, Finney, Fulton, Funck, Hall, Harvey, Hemphill, Heverin, Kaine, Littleton, M'Camant, MacVeagh, Mann Metzger, Palmer, H. W., Parsons, Porter, Purviance, Sam'l A., Read, John R., Reynolds, James L., Reynolds, S. H., Rooke, Smith, H. G., Struthers, Turrell, White, Harry and Woodward—46.

THE COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS AND EXPENDITURES.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman: I have been instructed by the Committee on Accounts and Expenditures to present the following report:

The Committee on Accounts and Expenditures respectfully reports:

That it has examined the following accounts for expenses of the Convention, viz:

1. John Smith, for clearing ice and snow from the yard of the hall occupied by the Convention and carting away same.....	$25 00
2. A number of accounts for printing and advertising proposals for the printing and binding of the Convention, done by direction of the Committee on Printing and Binding, as follows:
Messrs. M'Laughlin Bro's., printing.....	36 00
Evening Herald, Philadelphia, advertising.....	10 00
Evening Bulletin, Philadelphia, advertising.....	17 60
Evening Star, Philadelphia, advertising.....	8 00
Evening City Item, Philadelphia, advertising.....	10 50
Evening Telegraph, Philadelphia, advertising.....	13 20
The Inquirer, Philadelphia, advertising.....	13 20
The Day, Philadelphia, advertising.....	8 00
The Ledger, Philadelphia, advertising.....	19 60
The Age, Philadelphia, advertising.....	8 80

The Press, Philadelphia, advertising.....	$11 00
The Public Record, Philadelphia, advertising.....	8 80
State Journal, Harrisburg, advertising.....	5 50

Together amounting to..... 170 20

And that said accounts are for proper expenses of the Convention, and should therefore be paid.

The following resolution is accordingly submitted:

Resolved, That the Chief Clerk be directed to pay to the persons entitled to receive the same, the several amounts reported as proper to be paid in the above report of the Committee on Accounts and Expenditures.

The resolution was read a second time and agreed to.

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, on the report of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, Mr. Lawrence in the chair.

THE SUFFRAGE ARTICLE.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Lycoming (Mr. Armstrong) to the seventh section. The amendment will be read.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: I rise at this time to make a personal explanation. On Saturday last I stated to the Convention that business would require my absence from the city on Tuesday and Wednesday. I asked and obtained leave of absence for those two days. The Journal was read on Monday, stating that fact in the presence and hearing of the members of the Convention. During the discussion that arose on the subject before the committee of the whole, on Monday, I had occasion to make some remarks on election frauds in different localities. I left the city early on Tuesday morning, and you may understand how surprised I was on reading the paper of yesterday I found the remarks that had been made about myself and my statement, in my absence, by a member of the Convention. In regard to a portion of those remarks I do not propose to say anything. I have lived in this community for more than forty years. I was elected to this Convention by the largest vote cast for any man in the district. I had one thousand more majority than the candidate for Governor on the same ticket in that district. I am very well known amongst my constituents. With them I can leave my reputation for veracity. But the charge was made by the gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Boyd,) that, in speaking of election frauds, I had spoken of Norristown. I desire to say here that I have referred to the reporter's notes of the remarks that I made on Monday, and they agree precisely with my own recollection as to what I did say. I neither mentioned the borough of Norristown nor the county of Montgomery then or at any other time. I spoke of Bensalem township, in the county of Bucks, and the five counties in the Sixteenth Congressional district in this State, making in all six counties, one relating to the elections of 1868 and the other to the election of 1870. I also referred to the investigation now going on in Harrisburg. I repeat, I do not know of any fraud ever having been committed in the county of Montgomery, either in the borough of Norristown or in any of its townships. If I had, then was the time for the denial, not taking advantage of my absence to make the charge. When the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Boyd) stood up on this floor, and said that I had charged fraud in Norristown, he either spoke misunderstandingly of what I had said, or he wilfully misrepresented me.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Chairman: I simply understood the gentleman directly to state, not only upon that occasion, but upon previous occasions, that there were frauds in Montgomery county, and it was because I knew that it was not true that I took the liberty of making the statement which I did. If the gentleman disclaims alluding to Montgomery county, it is all right. I do not take any offence at his remarks upon the subject, but I have no apology to make.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: I read from the report of the gentleman's remarks: "When he stated upon this floor that frauds had been committed in Norristown, he was exceedingly unfortunate in fixing that locality. If he had put it in some remote quarter of the county, where few of us ever get, he might have had some chance to escape, for we would not have known whether it was correct or not."

I spoke of the counties of Bucks, Somerset, Bedford, Fulton, Adams, Franklin and Philadelphia.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman understands the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Boyd) to accept the explanation of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Simpson.)

Mr. BOYD. Yes, sir; I accept his apology. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Lycoming (Mr. Armstrong.)

The CLERK read: "But nothing herein contained shall exclude the right of the Executive pardon which shall restore the right of suffrage."

Mr. HAZZARD. Mr. Chairman: We have been talking for two or three weeks upon this subject of fraud at elections, and most of the remarks have been in regard to the manipulation of votes after they had passed into the ballot-box, and the indignation of the members has been very properly and eloquently expressed; but nothing heretofore has been done in our constitutional deliberations with regard to that matter that may have a tendency to restrain electors themselves from committing frauds; but now we have come down to the bottom of the subject, and are dealing with the vote as cast by the individual, the ballot itself. It seems to me that here is where the whole mischief, or most of it at any rate, is done. I was somewhat astonished yesterday to hear the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh.) His history has certainly been at fault if he knows of no matter which properly belongs to the Executive department that has been transferred to the legislative department. If I have read the newspapers properly, for the past eight years there has been plenty of such legislation by the general government. After the war a great many people were disfranchised in the south. It was a proper matter for Congress to remove the disability, and I have never heard that the President has grumbled any because the proper function of his office has been taken away from him. Here is a person who commits a fraud upon the election; he deposits an improper and illegal vote. It seems to me to be a proper matter for the Legislature. A precedent has been set us by the general government.

The gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) stated yesterday that in case this subject was referred to the Executive alone, and his board of officers, that it would partake of party bias, and no doubt it would, for the Governor and his council would be very apt to find some excuse for pardoning a partisan, and they would be likely to lean towards the party who cast a vote on their side of the question. That is certainly an objection to referring it to the Executive; but there are also objections even to referring it to the Legislature, because, as has been well stated here, a poor man cannot go to the Legislature to have his rights vindicated or corrected there. Many a man may be disfranchised forever without having the disability removed by legislative enactment. It seems to me that the provision should be in some such shape as was yesterday presented to the Convention, namely: To limit the disqualification to a certain time, and then when that time has expired the elector should be enfranchised.

Now it is said that this should not be put above and beyond Executive clemency. I think it should, because I believe it is one of the greatest crimes that may be committed against the country. I know that quasi these crimes are against the Commonwealth, but really they are against individuals. If a murder is committed it only affects the man that is guilty and his family, except in the outraged justice and sense of right, as it pervades the whole community; and if you steal my coat it is personal to me, but of course the criminal is prosecuted in the name of the great Commonwealth, although really it does not affect the rest of the people only as it outrages public justice; but how is it with regard to polluting the ballot-box? Mr. Chairman, that goes to the very foundation of our government, and you and I, and every other individual, are interested in such an outrage, and I say it ought to be put beyond Executive clemency, and the trouble of going to the Legislature should not be imposed upon the poor man or anybody else.

It is said that it will be a disgrace upon this man, that the mark of Cain is upon him. Well it ought to be. Is it not a disgrace for a man to go to the penitentiary if he steals ten dollars worth of property? Is it not a stigma upon him? It seems we have grown tender-footed when we approach the very thing we ought to be correcting. In this country gentlemen have said that this principle of suffrage is at the very foundation of government. Is not the abuse of that principle a crime greater than stealing a coat or a horse? Everything that strikes at the foundation of the government tends to the destruction of this glorious fabric that we have raised in this country, of which We propose to celebrate at the next centennial, and should be rooted out if possible, and yet gentlemen are fearful that the punishment for such a crime inflicts a stigma upon the offender. I would put such a stigma upon him that would surprise him very much more than could be placed upon him in any way that I could devise. Let the stigma be upon him because he has committed an act worthy of stigma; but the punishment in the penitentiary is just as public. If the offender is kept away from the polls during his probation I think it would be much better to let his disability expire at a certain time. He will gradually grow out of it and out of notice, and into his rights, without much attention from the public. I say that this is a greater crime than almost any other, because it goes to the very foundation of our civil fabric, to the very foundation of sovereignty, and in that we are all interested.

I hope this amendment will not carry; it encumbers the matter too much. The criminal may go to the Legislature; he may be pardoned by the Governor after seven years probation. Let it be fixed at a less period; let it be five years, and let it expire of its own limitation. There will then be no party Governor to be consulted and no act of the Legislature to be required.

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. Chairman: Is this an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is an amendment simply.

Mr. KNIGHT. I move an amendment to the amendment, to be inserted after the word "suffrage," "for the term of four years," so that the section will read: "Every person convicted of any fraudulent violation of the election laws shall be deprived of the right of suffrage for the term of four years, but such right, in any particular case, may be restored, by act of the Legislature, two-thirds of each House consenting thereto."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman had better withhold his amendment, as it will come in in another part of the section, until the vote is taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Lycoming (Mr. Armstrong.)

Mr. STEWART. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "section," and insert, "in addition to such other penalties as may be by law provided, fraudulent violation of the election laws may be punished with deprivation of the right of suffrage for a period of not less than four nor more than ten years, at the discretion of the court before whom the offender shall have been convicted."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman move to strike out the section and insert this?

Mr. STEWART. That was my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I only desire to say, in the absence of the gentleman from Lycoming, (Mr. Armstrong,) that this is intended to provide for a class of cases that the Convention does not seem, from anything that I have heard, to have had in mind at all. We have been supposing that a man convicted upon the finding of a verdict of a jury is necessarily guilty. That is a great mistake. There are too many lawyers here who know better than that for it to be received as the opinion of the Convention. The most that can be said of the verdict of a jury is that it is sometimes right, and as long as that is the case we should have some means of remedying the mischief when the jury is wrong. When a jury convicts a man wrongfully, and that can be made known two weeks afterwards, I want to know whether anybody here will say that there should be no possibility of pardon, but that the poor individual wrongfully convicted must await the slow action of the Legislature, and that only after seven years, as some members of the Convention would like us to say.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman: When I first considered this proposition I felt favorably inclined to it. It looked to me like that homoeopathic specific which declares that a little of the hair of the dog that bit you will cure the bite. But having slept upon it, I am of the opinion that we ought to throw aside the whole idea of the forfeiture of the right of suffrage. I think there are good reasons, sir, why that penalty should not be imposed for this act. Society lays before every voter now, and will continue to do so, the temptation to commit frauds upon the election laws. Scarcely any man who has attended the polls but has seen reputable men there who would not steal, who would not commit any other fraud, deliberately do things which, under this provision, would forfeit their right to suffrage. Now, sir, we place before men the temptation to commit this crime, and then having led them into temptation—contrary to all our teaching upon this subject—we turn around and we place the temptation before a jury to convict men wrongfully, who are honest men.

Men commit these frauds because they are excited. They are actually demented by passion, for the time being, and then, as criminals against these laws, are arraigned in the courts.

We shall have after a while, a majority of the jury determining the verdict—and you then lay before the jury the temptation to convict a man because he is of opposite politics, and to acquit him because he is of the same politics, and thus place before the jury the temptation to commit perjury. I say the whole business is a mere scheme of temptation, which can lead only to evil.

Then, sir, I think there is another good reason for not adopting it. In every country on earth where men are deprived of the rights of citizenship they become brigands, they become fungi upon society—preying upon its bitter interests. This law will erect in our country—in this community—a brigand class. Deprived of the right of suffrage, they will say to themselves: "We are outlaws in society; we have no part or lot in it," and will act accordingly.

It is vain to say that they may go to the Legislature, or to the Governor, or pardoning power, and there be restored. The pride of human nature will not permit them to do it. Men will not get down on their knees and humiliate themselves in the dust. Their very pride of nature will rebel against this humiliation. It is therefore to create a class of outlaws and brigands in the community.

For all these reasons, and I have stated them as briefly as I can, I have made up my mind that I will vote against this provision in all its parts.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman: For one, I am disposed to go a very great distance in punishing every one that is guilty of fraud in any direction upon the ballot. I can vote almost cheerfully for the section as it stands, although I could prefer an amendment. I would insert in the third line after the word "by," so as to make it read: "Every person convicted of any fraudulent violation of the election laws, shall be deprived of the right of suffrage, but such right, in any particular case, may be restored by the Executive on the recommendation provided in section — of article —, of this Constitution;" that is the article that provides for the board of advisors for the Governor in granting pardons. If that would meet the approbation of the committee, it strikes me, sir, that it is such punishment as those who are guilty of perpetrating a fraud on the election should receive. There is a way by which these men can be pardoned without the cumbersome way suggested by some gentlemen.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am opposed to this amendment, for I think that it nullifies the section itself. The section proposes that the fraudulent violation of the election laws shall be disfranchised. The amendment proposes that that man may be pardoned by the Governor, and restore to him his rights as a citizen of the Commonwealth.

I cannot add anything to the very forcible remarks made by my colleague, (Mr. Hazzard,) this morning, upon this subject, except that I will state, or remind the Convention, that we have an illustrious example of what this Executive clemency has done, and perhaps may do again. Why, sir, upon the records of one of your courts, in this city, a man was convicted—for what? Why, sir, for going from precinct to precinct, some say, as many as twenty odd times. However that may be, I do not know; but, certainly, he voted several times, and swore, before high Heaven, that he was a citizen, qualified to vote in the precinct where he was offering his ballot. This thing was brought to the notice of a court and jury, and it was regarded as a crime of such infamy that he was sentenced to undergo an imprisonment of, I believe, three months for his bad conduct. What then? Why, sir, the President of the United States extended his clemency to, and pardoned, this scoundrel, who was, I believe, the first that was convicted under the act of Congress, and turned him loose upon society again, to go on and perpetrate this repeating to his heart's content.

Now, sir, I am decidedly opposed to lodging this power in the Executive, even with counsellors, as it has been suggested it should be. I would not even give it to the Legislature. I would prefer modifying it, so as to confine it to, say five years, or four, or seven years; but I would make it unconditional and absolute, so far as this disqualification goes, without the intervention of even the Legislature or Executive. If, however, I must choose between the two evils, the Governor and his counsel or the Legislature, I prefer the latter.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I came to this Convention with my mind fully made up to punish every violation of the ballot-box without respect to persons. I am in favor of making the punishment of persons who pollute the ballot-box as severe as it is possible to make it.

I do not agree at all with the gentleman from Lawrence, (Mr. Craig,) who spoke a few minutes ago, that a man is, perhaps, excited when he does this sort of thing, and ought to be treated leniently on account of that excitement. I want to put caution before every man's eyes, that he must not get excited in that direction.

As for the pardoning power, I do not believe that the best plan would be that recommended by the gentleman from Washington, who has just taken his seat, because a man may be convicted unlawfully or by false evidence, and if such a thing should happen there ought to be some place where he could show the fact and prove it, and get himself pardoned. Hence I believe the pardoning power ought to be lodged somewhere, and I believe the committee has reached just the place where it ought to be. As that power is now—in the hands of the Executive—it would be entirely useless, because politicians would go to the Executive and say, "why this fraud was committed to elect you," and that would be the strongest argument they could present for Executive clemency. In order to get rid of that difficulty I believe, with the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) who spoke so lucidly on this subject yesterday, that by placing it with three-fourths or two-thirds of the Legislature you must have the consent of both the great parties of the Commonwealth to pardon. I am quite willing to fix some reasonable limit, at the expiration of which the guilty man be pardoned, say five or seven years. I do not know that I should insist upon forever disfranchising him, but I want to leave the door open for him to be pardoned in that time. I want, however, that the evil-doer or the man contemplating the doing of an evil that will pollute the ballot-box to have before his eyes the fact that he must suffer, and suffer, too, in a way that he will most feel it, even to the extent of putting a brand on him, if you please, and letting him go through the world saying, "I am the man that attempted to destroy the nation by polluting the ballot-box."

MR. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: It seems to me we are endeavoring to prescribe penalties in the Constitution for the violation of laws which possibly may be passed. It strikes me it is wrong end foremost in the Constitution, and is not rightly placed there. We must remember what the difficulty is now. It is that the Legislature has no right, under the existing Constitution, to prescribe as a part of the punishment of a fraudulent violation of the election laws, the deprivation of the right of suffrage. The right of suffrage is a constitutional right, and cannot be taken away by the Legislature as I understand it. Now do we need to do anything more therefore than to confer upon the Legislature the right to take away the right of suffrage as an additional penalty for a violation of the election laws? This is the manner in which I view this question, but I do not know how it may strike the minds of other gentlemen in the Convention. Instead, therefore, of favoring the section as it is reported by the committee, and as proposed to be amended, I will, if it is in order, and if not, I will, at the proper time, propose the following section as a substitute for this section for the consideration of the committee:

"The Legislature may prescribe such punishment for a fraudulent violation of the election laws as they may deem proper, including the deprivation of the right of suffrage, but such right may be restored by pardon."

Now I would give the right to the pardoning power to restore the right of suffrage, of which the Legislature shall have deprived a citizen, when the pardoning power shall deem it proper to exercise it. It must be remembered that we are in the early stages of the proceedings of this Convention. We have not yet decided what limitations we shall place upon the pardoning power of the Executive power, but I apprehend we will agree to fix some limit upon it, so that it cannot be exercised save by the advice and consent of some suitable council, who shall advise the Governor when it is proper to issue the pardon. To that council, however constituted, I am willing to confide the pardoning power. It must reside somewhere, and I consider there is no place so proper in which it shall reside as the Executive of the Commonwealth, around whom can be thrown all the necessary and proper guards.

I am not willing to confide this power to the Legislature, after what has been stated in the Convention in regard to that body, and which I am bound to believe, when gentlemen have spoken of the views which have been entertained by their own representatives. You could not always secure a pardon from the Legislature, even if the proper means are taken, and I am unwilling to confer any power upon them in this line, not only for that reason, but because it is a matter of special legislation, of which we are so very anxious to deprive them. It is, therefore, better, I suggest to this committee, to confer upon the Legislature the additional power to that which they now have in the punishment of fraudulent violation of the election laws, by depriving the voter of the right of suffrage; but, at the same time, if it shall be shown that a person, subsequent to conviction for this crime, was not so guilty as to require a lengthened deprivation of the right of suffrage, the Executive, by the exercise of the pardoning power, with such guards as we shall throw around him, may relieve the voter innocently or ignorantly drawn into the commission of this crime. If it is in order I therefore move to strike out the section.

The PRESIDENT. The motion will not be in order.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Chairman: I have not the least desire to occupy the time of the committee further than just simply to say that ever since the commencement of this discussion I thought I could cheerfully vote for the article as it came from the committee, and I had been firm in the belief that I could do so until I heard the arguments of various members upon the floor, and especially those of the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) and the gentleman from Lycoming, (Mr. Armstrong,) and then I felt a little uncertain as to what would be proper in regard to a vote upon the article. The gentleman from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) I think, has just embraced, in a separate article, the points wherein so many members of the Convention differ in regard to this question. I have no objection to giving a person convicted of having fraudulently violated the election laws the opportunity of two modes of escape, and hence I was in favor of the amendment to the article offered by the gentleman from Lycoming (Mr. Armstrong.) Now it is true that a man may be convicted on very insufficient evidence. Our courts are not always perfect, and many bad decisions have been given by them, but if this question of the pardon of persons convicted of fraudulently violating the election laws is to be one resting wholly within the jurisdiction of the Legislature, it will be difficult to ascertain when the pardon will be granted. There has been a great deal said in the Convention in regard to the sacredness of the ballot, but I think none too much, and hence the higher estimate we place upon the ballot, the greater will be the obligation resting upon us to punish very severely any violation which may be perpetrated against the laws regulating the exercise of the elective franchise.

Now in order that there may be fair dealing, I say there can be no possible harm in the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Lycoming, (Mr. Armstrong,) and I think it would be very proper that there should be the privilege given to the offending individual of having the right of suffrage restored to him by pardon, after he shall have been deprived of it by reason of having fraudulently violated the election laws, without having to undergo a deprivation of the right for years, which would be the inevitable necessity if the pardoning power was entrusted wholly to the Legislature. As I said in the beginning of my remarks, I do not wish to occupy the time of the Convention, but I do want to say that after we have had the views of a committee of fifteen members, which framed this article, that we certainly ought to pay some attention to them. I do not believe that there has been a single proposition presented here yesterday or to-day which has not been before that committee, time and again, and it was upon that ground I decided to vote for the report as it came from the committee, and I am of the opinion that if the question should come up plainly upon the section as reported by the committee, and even with the addition of the amendment of the gentleman from Lycoming, (Mr. Armstrong,) I shall vote for it.

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: This section proposed to the new Constitution, it seems to me, must be misunderstood by the gentleman from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) or else I must misunderstand it, for I understand, from reading it, that every person must first be convicted in a court, and when convicted he is bound to be sentenced by that court, because when I proposed an amendment yesterday to this very article, by which the person fraudulently violating the election laws should be convicted and sentenced, the chairman of the Committee on Elections (Mr. McAllister) said that he was satisfied in his own mind, and the committee had also been satisfied, that the word "conviction" covers the whole ground, having a technical meaning, and upon consideration I have no doubt that he is right, and for this reason: If a man who has been once convicted is again brought into court upon an indictment, and he pleads a former conviction, he must show, not only that there was a verdict of a jury, but that he was sentenced by the court in pursuance of that verdict, and that it was not a mere verdict subsequently arrested or set aside. Therefore it is in this section, ex viceribus siris, that you will find the whole explanation of what is intended to be done by the Convention in adopting it. The article provides, in the first place, that the offender shall be convicted and, of course, sentenced by a criminal court, and then it provides as to what shall be done with the convicted individual in case the Executive, or whatever branch of the government in which the pardoning power may be vested, decides to relieve the offender from the consequences of the sentence. So that under this section, as it is now proposed, we shall have, in the first place, a conviction, and that shall be a conviction under the election laws of the State, followed by a sentence, because it is for a violation of these election laws that the sentence shall be imposed. Then follows the disability, and there comes in the real question of discussion upon this amendment, and that is, whether this pardoning power, by which this disability from exercising the elective franchise is to be removed, shall be vested in two different branches of the government, or whether it shall be removed by the pardon of the offender from the penalty inflicted upon him by the sentence of the court of quarter sessions, and whether that pardon shall carry with it a relief from the disability the offender would be under by virtue of this constitutional provision.

Now I say that it is impossible to understand, by the very terms of the section itself, that when an offender against the election laws is pardoned from the penalty inflicted by the court, that he is by that restored to all the privileges of a citizen. The pardon does not carry with it a restoration of this privilege. The individual who shall have thus violated the election laws still remains under the disability, and I say, although the gentleman from Lycoming (Mr. Armstrong) has been complimented by the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) for having penetrated the fog with his amendment, he has taken the whole question through the fog and left us on the other side of it, for this amendment, it seems to me, renders it more obscure than it was before, and the object, as the gentleman said himself, was to place a provision in the section as would relieve these unfortunate offenders from their disabilities, and in order that there might be no mistake as to the meaning of the section, I would like to inquire, however, if any delegate can inform the Convention, by the mere wording of the amendment, as it stands, what is meant by it.

Now, I think, we ought not to load down the section with such qualifying provisions, as to render it void of meaning. The evil resulting from thus encumbering a section was seen yesterday, when a section relating to the registry law was adopted, and then it was qualified in such a way as to render it a nullity. We ought either to have our provisions sufficiently clear and efficient, or else let them stand without being encumbered by limitations and qualifications. It is said that old Menenius took his wine hot, without a drop of allaying Tiber in it, but we have put so much Tiber into this section that it has become all water. And this section itself, if it becomes amended by such emendations as this, will, after a while, become so diluted as to be, if not all water, at least all milk and water. Now this section, if amended in this way, will read as follows:

"Any person convicted of any fraudulent violation of the elections shall be deprived of the right of suffrage, but such right, in any particular case, may be restored by a vote of the Legislature, two-thirds of each House consenting thereto, and nothing herein contained shall exclude the right to Executive pardon, which shall restore the right of suffrage."

What is meant by that right of Executive pardon which shall restore the right of suffrage? Does it mean that this right of Executive pardon which shall restore the right of suffrage shall apply to the relief of the offender from a penalty inflicted by the quarter sessions? Or does it mean that he shall be restored by virtue of the Executive pardon from all of the disabilities and penalties inflicted upon him, for a violation of the election laws? That is to say, as this stands at present, if a man convicted of a violation of the election laws comes before the Executive, and is pardoned there, according to the terms of this amendment—if he is pardoned by the Executive—it carries with it the restoration of his right as an elector; but if he goes before the Legislature, what is he to obtain there? Certainly not the pardon of the offences of which he has been convicted in the court of quarter sessions, and the penalty which has been imposed upon him there. The Legislature, it is not intended by this provision, shall do that duty; neither is it intended—if he be convicted and sentenced in the court of quarter sessions—that the penalties of that sentence shall be relieved by the pardoning power. And I do not admit, with the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) that the pardoning power is necessary an Executive power. It may exist anywhere else. It may be lodged in a court of pardons, or in a council of pardons.

Now with regard to this argument, we were called upon very energetically, yesterday, by the gentleman from Dauphin, not to forget the three distinctive departments of government, and he asked this Convention to pause and see what they are doing, because they will be led into the error of giving Executive power to the Legislature. I am not partial at all that we should give this to the Legislature. I think that we should not. I would like the proposition made yesterday, by the gentleman from Lancaster, (Mr. Carter,) much better, "that the offender should be disqualified from voting for a limited term of years." I would say during the term of his natural life, but this Convention would not go with me, and I do not know, upon consideration, whether it would be right. But I like much better the proposition that "his disability to vote shall extend through a limited term of years—five, seven, ten, or any other number that the committee may in their wisdom determine," and not go to the Legislature at all to have this kind of special legislation, as it has been called in this debate, although it is not legislation. The gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) said that this Convention did not seem to know what they are doing, if they are about to give this power to the legislative branch which belongs to the Executive; but it does not necessarily belong to the Executive.

This Convention or the Committee on Executive, I presume, will report some provision by which this power will be placed in some other hands than those of the Executive. There is no reason why there should not be a court of pardons, where the matter shall be judicially examined into and determined by a competent body, to understand the requirements of the applicant, and the safety of the other citizens in the Commonwealth when the pardon is applied for. I do not believe that these different departments have always been kept so distinct as the gentleman seems to think. Why, the Legislature of that country from which we derive, principally, our law is the last high court of errors and appeals, and the House of Lords determine these questions of law, of property, and of human rights, and is the last court for that purpose. That is a Legislature that exercises judicial functions, and the Senate of the State of New York used to do the same thing. The Senate of Pennsylvania to-day is competent to hear and decide questions of impeachment, which are judicial questions, as the Senate of the United States may do in proper cases of impeachment. Consequently these three branches of the government are not kept distinct entirely, and I say that this pardoning power is not necessarily a feature or an arm of the Executive department of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, although it has been lodged there for years past. It is not a part of the execution of the laws. If this is the Executive department, I have no doubt that the man Brown, who was pardoned by the President of the United States, or Robert Smith Lister, who was pardoned by the Governor of Pennsylvania, greatly admired that play of executing the law. It is not a part of the Executive duty or of the Executive department. It is rather an obstruction in the execution of the laws of the Commonwealth, and the carrying out of the sentence of the court, and therefore I do not admit that this is a duty necessarily imposed upon the Executive department, and I do not believe that this Convention are going so far as to say so.

As I said, I am opposed to everything that follows after the word "suffrage" in this section. I am opposed to every portion of it, as all these parts are included in the whole, and therefore I am opposed to this last amendment proposed by the gentleman from Lycoming, (Mr. Armstrong,) which is now the only thing before this committee.

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Chairman: I would not prolong this debate a single moment, but it seems clear to my mind that we are drifting into a mistake. We have been, for the last two weeks, talking about great criminals, in connection with election laws, and we have confined ourselves almost entirely to persons of that grade. We talk as if we are legislating only for the chief class of offenders, and nobody else.

That leads me to the first objection I have to this section, and to all the amendments that are pending upon it; that is, that, in applying the worst part, and by worst I mean the severest part, of the result that can follow an infraction of the law, we make no distinction whatever between criminals. Let one man who is greatly guilty, and another who is slightly guilty, both be convicted before a court of an infraction of the election law, what is the result? Each undergoes his penalty of a fine, and perhaps of imprisonment. Each pays his fine, and each suffers his imprisonment of a longer or a shorter period. Then this is forgotten in the community; and from that time, although one is the greatest offender and the other is the slightest, are both, as they walk about the community, branded in precisely the same manner. They must go about, for some amendments, say four years, others five years, others seven years and others for life, until pardoned, with precisely the same brand, although their guilt is as wide in degree as the difference between the greatest and the smallest offence known to the election laws. I say that we would do a great wrong in putting all criminals, both large and small, on the same basis.

But another objection is this: We are fixing a severe penalty in advance, without even knowing what the law is to be. Who knows what even frivolous laws will yet be passed by the Legislature? They may pass laws so frivolous as to be absolutely unjust, yet if a man violates one of these laws, not intentionally, but by a mistake of judgment, or by a mistake in construction, yet if he is convicted, by partisan juries, or otherwise, or even by a justice of the peace, if he has final jurisdiction, you are visiting upon him this terrible result that will be entirely inadequate to the crime he has committed. How can we, at this time, and in this Constitution, define a penalty proper for all the offences that may be committed under any and all the laws that may be passed by any or all the Legislatures for the next thirty or forty years? Are we not overlooking our instructions and drifting into a mistake?

I close this brief statement, sir, by saying: Leave it with the Legislature to pass the laws and prescribe the penalties upon this subject as future light shall guide the way. Give them full power, even extending to the right of suffrage, if you please, and then give the opportunity of adjusting these penalties, according to the degree of the crime, to that tribunal before which the case is tried, and which alone can have full knowledge of the facts. To these considerations I will not take time to add others, for, it seems to me, those already suggested are fatal to this section. I therefore repeat, we will, if we adopt it, do more evil than good, because of its terrible penalty, when the crime, in many cases, is slight; for, if it is adopted, jurors will violate their oaths, and acquit the lesser criminals, because of this fearful penalty; and then the law will often remain a dead letter in instances when it should be enforced. But I will not prolong. I am opposed to all these amendments. We are legislating in advance, and failing to make distinctions between the great and small degrees of guilt, and tying up the future, when we cannot possibly know what that future is.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: This section, as it stands, together with the amendments that have been proposed, I think, does not entirely come up to what I believe ought to be the provision contained in the section. I propose to modify my amendment, so that it shall read thus:

"Every person convicted of any fraudulent violation of the election laws shall be deprived of the right of suffrage for the term of four years, but such right may be restored by Executive pardon."

The reason for that is this:—

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: Will the gentleman read the proposed amendment once more?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: I will read the amendment as I propose to amend it, or as it will be if my amendment is adopted. I have said that I propose to modify my amendment, so that the section, as amended, will read thus:

"Every person convicted of any fraudulent violation of the election laws shall be deprived of the right of suffrage for the term of four years, but such right may be restored by Executive pardon."

The reason is this: It is not well, as it strikes me, to confound these well settled distinctions which have grown up with the country, and have become a part of its settled legislative, judicial and Executive functions. The words which I would propose to strike out are those which would invest the Legislature with the right to pardon, if not that, virtually nothing else. It is contrary to the established principles, and to all the analogy which have heretofore controlled questions of this kind. We recognize the distinction in judicial proceedings between civil and criminal cases.

This is a criminal proceeding; it has all the characteristics and features of a criminal proceeding. To say that it is a crime is simply to express what every man's intelligence tells him. We are attempting to punish crime, and one of great magnitude, and one which should require not only severe punishment, but prompt and certain punishment. Now my difficulty is this: If we undertake to say that the Legislature, even with a vote of two-thirds, may pardon, we invest the Legislature with power which is unusual, and bring a certain class of criminal proceeding within the scope of a power never before exercising it, and where it would be particularly liable to political influence. If we vest this power, however, in the Executive, and within the general scope of the pardoning power, then we bring it into close analogy with all other criminal proceedings. And to say that such a pardon would be granted upon merely political ground would be simply to say that this Convention is not able so to restrict the pardoning power; that it can be unjustly or unworthily exercised. I do not concede any such proposition. On the contrary, I believe that this Convention has the power, and will exercise it, to so hedge around the exercise of the pardoning power that it may be safely vested in the Executive and shall not be liable to the abuse which many gentlemen on the floor of great intelligence apprehend. Now I believe that it is wiser and better that we should recognize this crime against the elective franchise as a high crime to be adequately punished; but bring it within the scope of all other criminal jurisprudence, and vest the power to do away with the sentence where we vest the power of all other control in similar cases. For this reason, again, the very existence of the pardoning power pre-supposes judicial mistakes; it pre-supposes that a man may be convicted upon false testimony, or that he may be the victim of conspiracy, and convicted upon improper evidence, and in such event he ought not to be the subject of imprisonment for any length of time, not even for one moment, beyond that which is necessary to interpose the Executive pardon where the facts are clearly established.

Under such circumstances the amendment, as it is now proposed, would meet all the exigencies of the case; it would punish crime as it ought to be punished, and it would vest in the Executive the power to arrest the course of a sentence which, under new developments of facts, ought never to have been imposed. This Convention will certainly adopt some provision by which this Executive clemency is to be exercised properly, and without the dangers which now surround it, for I am free to say if it were left to the exercise of Executive clemency, as it now is in the sole discretion of one man elected by a political party, and under the sole influence of that party—it would not be best. My idea, however, is this, that we vest it within the restrictions which this Convention will unquestionably place around it, as suggested in the amendment, and that we may thus reach the crime without subjecting it to that constant, continued and unalterable decision proposed, which might work the extremest injustice.

MR. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: It is not to be concealed that these offences, these frauds upon the ballot, have been considered very slight offences. We find men employed in that business who hold a respectable position in society, and it was the design of this section to place a stigma upon them and place them in the community as beacons, to warn all such of the danger they are in when they tamper with this right of the ballot. That was the design of the committee in reporting this section as it is. Now it is alleged that it is wrong to take away the right of franchise from a man simply because he has been guilty of fraud upon it. I reply that the forfeiture is a consequence of his own act, his own voluntary act, his own fraudulent and wicked act—an act which strikes directly at the foundation on which the structure of civil government is reared. Let us look at the formation of a republican government. The people come by their representatives only, because they cannot assemble in mass. Every citizen is potentially present. The majority cannot deprive the minority of the right of suffrage—that is the right to participate in the formation and administration of the government, because their hair is white, or because it is red, or because it is black.

If they do they violate the law of nature, the only law that governs the people in the formation of their government; but it is perfectly competent for the people, thus assembled, in the formation of their government to agree, each with the other, that any one of them who shall be guilty of frauds upon the right of suffrage shall forfeit his right of suffrage. That is the principle upon which this section is founded. It seems to be conceded that an offence that strikes at the life of a free republican government should cause a forfeiture of the right of suffrage, but how long and in what manner shall the forfeiture be removed is the difficulty. It is alleged by the gentleman from Lycoming (Mr. Armstrong) that the Executive department alone should have the right to remove the forfeiture. I utterly deny the correctness of the position. The Executive has power to pardon offences, and thus relieve the convict from prison and set him loose on the community, and that power properly belongs to the Executive department.

But when, as a Constitutional Convention, we put in the organic law a provision that the right of suffrage shall be forfeited, that right cannot be restored by an ordinary Executive pardon. Under the proposed amendment, when and how is this pardoning power to be exercised? Will the restoration of the right of suffrage result as an incident of the pardon of the offence of which the forfeiture was itself but an incident? Such construction would negative the section and render it absurd. The very design of the Constitutional provision is to take away the power of the Executive to pardon. Is the power now proposed to be given a distinct independent power, or is it an incident of the ordinary Executive pardon? I ask the gentleman that question. Are the Executive and his council to grant two pardons? One for the purpose of relieving the man from imprisonment, the other to restore the right of suffrage? The difficulty in reference to this forfeiture is, that it will be for the life of the man, unless provision be made for its removal. Several provisions have been suggested. The most reasonable amendment, if an amendment be thought necessary at all, would be to insert after the word "suffrage," in the second line, the words, "for the term of five years," four years or seven years. "But such right, in any case, may be restored by act of the Legislature," &c. Though the time be limited, still the Legislature should have power to remove disability. Such cases may occur as will need a removal of the disability within the term of five years; and if five years should be inserted, I would still retain the clause giving the Legislature power to remove disability. There may possibly occur, in times of great political excitement, cases that would justify a removal of the disability within five years. I am utterly opposed to committing this power to the Executive, or to the Executive council, under any possible circumstances. That council must either be elected by the same people who elect the Governor, or must be appointed by the Governor, and to give a body who have secured their offices directly or indirectly through frauds upon the election, frauds which may have resulted in giving them their places, would be unwise. It would be a means of protecting fraud, and the power should not, therefore, be committed to the Executive or his council; but when we commit it to the Legislature, who have the powers of the government in their hands, and require a legislative act, and when we require two-thirds or three-fourths of each branch of the Legislature to concur, we may be assured that there will be no party prejudice in the exercise of the power necessary to remove the disability.

Mr. MANTOR. Mr. Chairman: I rise for the purpose of making only a few remarks on regard to this question on this section before this committee. I am aware that we are getting somewhat tired, and demand a speedy vote. We have had some fourteen or fifteen speeches this morning, and it seems to me that this section, as reported, is wrong, and the remedies which it seeks to make are entirely too severe, as might be applied to certain offenders against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth. If we had some power whereby we could go behind the offending party, which this section suggests, and cause the arrest and carry punishment to another class of offenders—those who induce men to commit the frauds. Now, sir, in the precinct where I cast my vote—at our election last fall—a man was arrested for casting his vote, on the ground that he was a resident of another county, and of course another precinct. He was urged to cast this vote by men who knew—or ought to have known—that he had no such right to vote; yet he was over-persuaded, and all remonstrances to the contrary were in vain.

This man was accordingly arrested for casting his vote where he had no right to vote, and the result was, the day following he plead with those who caused his arrest to get him out of his difficulty, for he said he had been over-persuaded by others to commit this wrong. He was accordingly released. Now, sir, if he had committed this wrong with such a clause as this section proposes, he would have been disqualified for voting thereafter. I ask is this right, to inflict such penalty on every one who may commit a wrong in this way, or should we seek to punish according to the crime, giving due allowance to some who are dragged into the wrong and seek to find some way to punish one who makes himself an accomplice to this crime? For one, I am in favor of protecting the rights of every citizen, and dealing out punishment to the fearfully wrong doer, and show at the same time some mercy on the ignorant and those who may be easily enticed into sin. Therefore, taking this view of the matter, I cannot support this section as it stands.

Mr. DELFRANCE. Mr. Chairman: I am in favor of this section as it stands. If the section is read it will be found to read that "being deprived of the right of suffrage" is no part of the punishment of the crime that any person is convicted of. The gentleman from Lycoming (Mr. Armstrong) seems to think that it belongs to the pardon power to pardon him, and that this deprivation is in the nature of punishment. I do not consider it so at all. Pennsylvania has the right to say who shall be her voters, and she has the right to say on what conditions they shall be voters, and, I think, this is a proper case for us to do something, if possible, to purify the ballot-box. If there is any crime against republican government it is this question of destroying the consent of the people—of making the thing a farce. It is, in my judgment, equal to treason; it is, in fact, treason, because if the right of government belongs to the people, and criminals will destroy the ballot-box, and in that manner the very foundation upon which republics exist—the only foundation upon which they exist—that crime ought to be punished more severely than any other crime in the calendar. Some gentlemen have talked about this being a small matter, and about young men committing these crimes. If young men have been committing these crimes it only shows, sir, that we ought to teach our children better; we ought to teach young men that there is no crime known to the law so great as that which destroys the right of the people to govern themselves. There is no crime so great in the catalogue of crimes, because it destroys the very foundation stone upon which republics rest. In any other government—a government of force—it is not so great a crime. In a republican government there is no crime known to the law so great as destroying the right of the people to govern, and that is what this is.

Mr. Chairman, I have been amused, I might say, at the talk here about purifying the ballot-box, purifying the right to vote. I have been amused at it. Men have told me, in reference to this other section, that each elector shall write his name upon the ballot; that it will not do; that it is all wrong; that it will be beaten fifty thousand in Philadelphia, for instance. Then the next thing is: How do you propose to purify the ballot-box? How is it proposed to purify the ballot-box? From my standpoint, viewing the matter as I do, it would seem to me a reasonable conclusion that the majority of this Convention intend to do nothing about the purity of the ballot-box. They intend to leave things as they are. They intend to talk long and loud about the ballot-box, but when it comes down to the question of how we shall remedy the evils there is nothing proposed as yet. If I am wrong that this is the greatest crime in a republic, and if I am right that the taking away of the right of suffrage is a sovereign right of the people of Pennsylvania, then it does not come under the power of pardon, and has nothing to do with the power of pardon. What nation in the world that has taken away the right of suffrage from its citizens holds that it belongs to the pardoning power to have anything to do with it? What nation in the world? Is it the American nation? Is it the English nation? Is it any nation under the heavens that claims that when their principal right is taken away that the pardoning power restores it? The pardoning power has nothing to do with that. It is the sovereign power of the State, wherever that lies, and in this case it lies in this Convention.

Mr. JOHN M. WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I move to further amend, by striking out the word "four," before the word "years," and insert "seven."

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I accept that amendment.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, by striking out all after the word "suffrage," and inserting "for the period of seven years from the time of conviction. In case of the afterdiscovered innocence of the party, a pardon may be granted to him in the manner provided for the granting of pardons by the Executive."

This proposition to amend the amendment has this feature in it: That it confines the power of the Executive to pardon to a case where the party has been convicted innocently. The pardoning power may possibly be abused in such a case, but the Executive will have to base his pardon on the grounds of innocence. Besides that, it fixes a limit at which the deprivation of this right will cease, and that period is seven years—the same period that is fixed in the amendment. I think that this will meet the general views of this Convention. We shall have a limit at which the time of the deprivation of the right of suffrage will cease. It will give to the Executive power of relieving this disability, provided the party be convicted when he is innocent, and I therefore hope that it will be adopted.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman: There seems to be a confusion of ideas as to the character of this section. Objection is made that the Constitution of the State should not contain a penal clause. I do not regard this as a penal clause any more than I should the clause in the article presented here by the Committee on the Legislature. The latter part of the eleventh section presented by that committee reads: "And every member who shall be convicted of having sworn falsely to, or having violated his said oath of office, shall forfeit his office and be disqualified thereafter from holding any office of profit or trust in the State."

I regard an elector, as I have said upon previous occasions, as holding an office under the people; the Constitution designates him to perform a certain function of the government. He is to all intents and purposes a representative man, representing not only himself, but all about him, and concerned with him in interest; and the penalty proposed is a deposition from office of that elector. He acquires his position as an elector under this Constitution. We say that he and many others, acting for all the citizens of the Commonwealth, shall perform the function of the electoral department of the State. If he does it well he shall be continued in its possession; if he does it illy he shall be deposed, as the members of the Legislature are in a like case.

I do not regard the proposed amendment as a penal statute. I regard it as a protection set up by the people for their own protection, and not for the punishment of offenders. It seems to be admitted here by the gentlemen who advocate the amendment to this section that the pardon of the Governor would not pardon the offence, that is to say, it would not restore the disqualification which the section imposes. I admit that freely, and I admit it because it is not an offence.

The section under consideration is a constitutional provision, which deposes the elector from his high office as an elector. The pardoning power of the Governor will be sufficient to pardon the offence, but not sufficient to restore the forfeited right to vote. The pardon of the Governor does not remit the costs of a conviction, or order a restitution of stolen property, but it will remit the penalty to the State—the fine and imprisonment consequent upon the sentence. The forfeiture of the right of suffrage is a disqualification which the Governor has nothing to do with, and it does not properly belong to the pardoning power of the Governor. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is the province of the Governor to execute the law; in the event of a sentence it is his duty to remit that sentence if it becomes necessary; but by this section an elector is deposed from his position, and he is no longer an elector. He is deposed from his office for the unfaithful performance of his duty. It is the province of the Legislature to create a new order of things. If a citizen is to be made an elector after he has been deposed from his office, and if he is to be restored to all his rights and privileges, it is the proper province of the Legislature to act in the matter. The Governor's power is limited, and he is restricted to the enforcement of the law as it is, and is allowed in any given case to remit the penalty for an offence. He can create nothing. He simply executes the law already in existence. If an elector is to be restored to his privileges after his disqualification for the performance of the office of an elector, he must be restored to it by a positive act, which only a legislative body can perform with any safety to the government. That is the reason why I say the Legislature ought to restore this disqualification of the elector. Would the gentlemen who advocate the proposed amendment intimate that if a member of the Legislature, under the particular section reported by the Committee on Legislature, was deposed from his office for false swearing, that the pardon of the Governor would return him to his seat in the Legislature? Will it be intimated that the pardon of the Governor is so wide in its scope as to restore a deposed member of the Legislature, not only to his rights as a citizen, but as a member of the Legislature?

Mr. WHERRY. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he regards the granting of a pardon an act of the Legislature, or simply a suspension of the law.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman: I have been endeavoring to explain that question. I say it is not a part of the pardoning power of the Executive. The pardoning power is utterly unable to reach the disqualification of an elector. The restoration of an elector to all his former privileges, involves the creation of a new right which has been lost by that elector.

Mr. MACVEAGH. I wish to understand the gentleman's view of the law. Under the provision, with reference to members of the Legislature, ineligibility is made a penalty for a certain offence; but apart from the constitutional provision that each House shall be the judge of the qualifications of its members, would not the Governor's pardon make the convicted person eligible? In other words, does it not remove the taint of ineligibility?

Mr. CLARK. Under no circumstances. The disqualification of a member of the Legislature is a forfeiture of his constitutional rights. He held his office under that instrument. He violated its provisions, and that instrument forfeits the rights which it conferred upon him; and no Governor can restore him to the rights of which the law has thus deprived him. It involves the creation of a new right—the legislator having lost the old; and no power of this State ought to be permitted to create a new right in any citizen of this Commonwealth, except that power which we establish and create for such purpose—the Legislature.

This is an important question, and I apprehend that under no circumstances could a member of the Legislature be restored to his position in that body by Executive clemency as a full member of the Legislature after he had been deposed by this provision of the Constitution. And I apprehend that the proposed disqualification of electors is no part whatever of the sentence of the court. The court will impose a fine upon the elector. It is a part of the sentence of the court that he shall pay so much of a fine, or that he shall undergo such imprisonment. This is all the Governor can pardon, and beyond this sentence of the court, and incidental to the conviction, is the disqualification imposed by the Constitution for the commission of the offence. It is incidental to the conviction, and forms part of the results of the conviction under the Constitution of the State. It implies trial and sentence after the conviction, and it is only the result of that trial and conviction which the Governor's pardon can reach. The disqualification will still remain beyond all this, out of reach of the pardoning power of the Executive, and it properly belongs to the province of the Legislature.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I have but a single word to say in reference to the remarks of the gentleman who has just taken his seat. I wish to ask the attention of the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Clark) for a few moments. I do not know whether he has happened to advert to the fact that the Constitution, as it now stands, provides that "any person who shall fight a duel, or send a challenge, shall be deprived of the right of holding any office of honor or profit under this Constitution, and shall be punished otherwise as shall be prescribed by law, but the Executive may remit the offence and all of its disqualifications." Now where is the difference between disqualifying a man from holding office and disqualifying him from electing another to office? And is it not competent for this Convention to prescribe a disqualification by a provision in the Constitution, and at the same time provide that the Executive may remit the offence and all the disqualifications?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman: The reference which has been made to the Constitution by the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) only strengthens the more the position which I have taken. It requires a constitutional provision in order to enable the Governor to restore qualifications to a person violating the section of the Constitution to which the gentleman has referred. This is not a decision of our courts. It is a part of a section in the Constitution—"but the Executive may remit the offence and all of its disqualifications." The Executive can exercise this power, because the Constitution authorizes him, but if there was no constitutional sanction he could not, of course, exercise the power.

Mr. MACVEACH. Mr. Chairman: That is expressly prohibited in this section. In the division of the powers of the government, you look for the extent of the pardoning power under the Executive, and that gives him the right to grant pardon and to restore the offender the rights he possessed before the offence was committed.

If you create a provision of a constitutional character, of course you may limit the pardoning power, or you may divide it between the Executive department and the legislative department and judicial department; but if you make it by the Constitution a penalty for the offence that a person shall not vote, or shall not hold office, unless in some manner a limitation of the right of pardon and of the consequences of pardon is expressed. Whoever is pardoned of his offence is restored as he was as far as the public is concerned, and as far as punishment and penalty and forfeiture are concerned, before he committed the offence. Therefore it was that I insisted from the beginning that this discussion certainly was premature, and that the committee ought, at present at least, to vote down the section until we know how the council of pardon is to be constituted. You ask us now and here to say that the Legislature shall pass such a law. Do gentlemen hold that it is a matter coming within the scope of the Legislature to grant pardons, for, after all, it is giving a new right? It is taking away the old right from the Executive, leaving it for special legislation by the legislative department of the government. You make the Legislature simply a court of pardons for particular cases, and I trust the gentlemen of the committee will hesitate long before they vote that the Legislature of Pennsylvania shall be required to pass special laws for the relief of each offender against any of her statutes, or any of her constitutional provisions. Of course, the qualification of members is to be decided by each House, but this decides a different matter from the remission of fines, forfeitures or penalties. If this crime is to be taken out of the catalogue of crimes; if, as the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle) remarked, we are not getting a little wild upon this matter, if it is true you may leave with your Executive department the right to pardon those who murder voters, yet deny the right to remove the penalty from those who take the life of the vote, then, I say, if that is the philosophical order of crime, then I can understand that you should say that this offence shall not be reviewed, shall not be pardoned; but if it is to be reviewed and pardoned at all, I do hope that we will not take the power from the Executive department, at least, until we hear from that committee having this department of the government in charge.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: This is a new and startling doctrine advanced by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Clark.) If carried to the ultimate and applied to to our institutions it will, in my opinion, subvert the very foundations of liberty and justice. He admits, and I agree with him, that the right of suffrage is a public office. Now Chief Justice Story says:

"The legislative power cannot justly reach the property or vested rights of the citizen, by providing for their forfeiture or transfer without trial and judgment in the courts." Again: "Any one claiming a public office has a constitutional right to a trial by jury, and the right cannot be taken away from him by any law. No statutory tribunal can be created for that purpose."

Now, then, I submit that if it is a right which cannot be taken away, except by trial by jury and judgment in a court of justice, it necessarily follows that this penalty of disfranchisement must be accounted part and parcel of the punishment inflicted upon conviction in such court. If not, why not?

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I call for the reading of the amendment to the amendment.

The CLERK read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "suffrage," and insert "for the period of seven years from the time of conviction, and in case of the after discovery of the innocence of the party, a pardon may be granted to him in the manner provided for the granting of pardons by the Executive."

Mr. J. M. WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I call for a division of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will be taken on the first division of the amendment. The Clerk will read the first division.

The CLERK read as follows:

The first division is "for the period of seven years from the time of conviction."

The question was then taken on the division, and the division was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the second division, which will be read.

The CLERK. "And in case of the after discovered innocence of the party, a pardon may be granted to him in the manner provided for the granting of pardons by the Executive."

The second division was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lycoming, which will be read.

The CLERK. "To strike out all after the word 'suffrage,' in the second line, and insert, 'for the term of seven years, but such right may be restored by Executive pardon.'"

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Please read the section.

The CLERK. "Every person convicted of any fraudulent violation of the election laws shall be deprived of the right of suffrage for the term of seven years, but such right may be restored by Executive pardon."

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman: I ask for a division of that question, also, at the words "seven years."

The CHAIRMAN. The question will be upon the first division, which will be read:

The CLERK. "Every person convicted of any fraudulent violation of the election laws shall be deprived of the right of suffrage for the term of seven years."

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, as follows: To strike out "seven years" and insert "four years."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot offer an amendment, the question having been called. He will have to offer it again.

On the question of agreeing to the first division, a division was called, which resulted in the division being rejected, not a quorum of a majority voting in the affirmative.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the second division, which will be read:

The CLERK. "But such right may be restored by Executive pardon."

Which was rejected.

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. Chairman: I now move to strike out "seven" and insert "four."

Which was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the section as amended.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: Has it not been voted down by division?

The CHAIRMAN. The divisions of the amendment being voted down, the amendment itself remains.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman: I will inquire whether the committee having negatived both the divisions that does not negative the amendment itself.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: If I understand it aright, a division of a certain amendment was asked. After it was divided, the first division was voted down. The second division was voted down, and consequently the amendment must fail, and there can be no vote on it. The amendment is ended and the vote is on the section.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I now move to insert the following as a substitute for the section:

"The Legislature may prescribe such punishment for fraudulent violation of the election laws as they may deem proper, including deprivation of the right of suffrage, but such right may be restored by pardon."

The CHAIRMAN. When the Chair made his decision on the amendment, being before the committee, it was so stated under a misapprehension. He thought it was only an amendment to the amendment, which fell and that the amendment remained.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: I desire the decision of the Chair upon the question whether voting the separate divisions down is a conclusive disposition of the entire amendment. My impression is that it is not, for the reason that the committee may, if it see proper, retain one part of an amendment though it reject the other part.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the voting down of the separate propositions of the amendment killed the amendments, but I will leave it to the committee. The Chair is inclined to believe that the majority of the committee is in favor of the amendment.

The decision of the Chair is that the amendment falls. Shall that decision stand?

Which was determined in the affirmative.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington.)

Which was rejected.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Chairman: I now renew my amendment, to come in as a new section.

To strike out all after the word "section," and insert: "In addition to such other penalties as may by law be provided, fraudulent violation of the election laws may be punished with deprivation of the right of suffrage for a period of not less than five nor more than ten years, at the discretion of the court before which the offender may have been convicted."

Which was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the section.

On agreeing to the section a division was called, which resulted: Sixty in the affirmative and thirty-five in the negative.

So the section was agreed to.

THE SECOND SECTION RE-CONSIDERED.

Mr. HUNSICKER. Mr. Chairman: Before we proceed to the consideration of the next section, I having voted on Tuesday last with the majority that voted down section second, I now move that that vote be re-considered.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the motion seconded?

Mr. LONG. I second it.

The CHAIRMAN. How did the gentleman vote?

Mr. LONG. I voted in the affirmative.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I call for the reading of the section.

The CLERK:

SECTION 2. All elections of the citizens shall be by ballot; the ballots voted may be open or secret, as the elector shall prefer, and they shall be numbered by the election officers when received. Each elector shall write his name upon his ballot, or cause it to be written thereon and attested for him by another elector of the district, who shall not be an election officer.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: We have been occupied over a week on this section, and it was voted down by a decided majority. I hope that this motion to re-consider will not prevail.

On the motion to re-consider a division was called, which resulted: Fifty-eight in the affirmative, and forty-five in the negative. So the vote, by which the section was defeated, was re-considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The section will be read.

The CLERK again read the section.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: I move to strike out the section, and substitute as follows. It is the substance of the section, drawn up to meet the views of some gentlemen who were simply opposed to its construction:

"All elections of the citizens shall be by ballot. Every ballot voted shall be numbered in the order in which it is received, and the number recorded by the election officers, opposite the name of the elector who presents the ballot. Each elector shall endorse his name upon his ballot, or cause it to be endorsed thereon, and attested by another elector of the district, who shall not be an election officer, and the oath required to be prescribed for the election officers shall require secrecy as to the contents of every ballot cast at the election."

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I wish the gentleman from Centre would strike out the word "elector" where it occurs in the clause requiring the endorsement to be made by the elector. Let the man's name be endorsed by anybody, his wife, his daughter, his son, or by anybody else. If the gentleman will do that I will vote for the amendment cheerfully. I will vote for it any how, but I will vote for it much more cheerfully if he will do that.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: That question was very much considered both in the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation and in the committee of the whole, and I think the general sentiment of this body is, that the elector is the better one to prevent the wife, and the daughter, and the minor from being called on. The design was to give some person within the election precinct who is well known—whose hand-writing is known. It is the more important in the event of his death. We want some person whose hand-writing can be proved—who is liable to summons—some person liable to attachment, if he does not come willingly, if required. I think the language is best as it is, and I cannot accept the word proposed by my friend from Philadelphia, (Mr. Woodward.)

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: Then I move to strike out the words "another elector," and substitute "by any person."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia will be read.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I am surrounded by so many friends that I am constrained to accept their advice. They desire me to withdraw my amendment, and I withdraw it for the present.

Mr. BARTHOLOMEW. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee, (Mr. M'Allister,) to strike out the word "shall," wherever it occurs, and insert the word

"may," making it a mere provisional clause.

Mr. TEMPLE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Schuylkill (Mr. Bartholomew) whether he does not consider that such a change would virtually kill this section.

Mr. BARTHOLOMEW. I will answer no; that it will apply to the city of Philadelphia, where you expect frauds; but it will relieve the country from the burden which it is proposed to impose upon it by this section and defeat your Constitution.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: Before a vote is taken upon this question I want to say a word or two about this "country" that is going to have such a burden put upon it. Something was said, when this question was up before, about some portion of the country going en masse against it. Since that time this Convention has, no doubt, been somewhat enlightened upon this subject from the fact that the newspaper press in different parts of the country have spoken.

I do not think, as I said before, that this is going to impose any great hardship upon the voter in the country, any more than it imposes a hardship upon the voter in the city. The man in the country is affected by the fraudulent votes cast in cities as much as the man in the city in all general elections.

For the purpose of referring to something in regard to public opinion upon this subject, I propose to read a short paragraph from the Pittsburg Gazette. I cannot read it if there is so much noise in the Hall. I talk pretty loud, but I cannot talk as loud as forty or fifty gentlemen, when they undertake to do it all together.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I rise to a point of order. We cannot hear the gentleman at all; everybody is talking.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has endeavored, for the last few days, to preserve order in the Hall, and if he were the regular presiding officer of the Convention he would compel it. As it is, he can only ask gentlemen to preserve order, and appeal to their sense of manhood. It is utterly impossible to hear what is going on.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I propose to read from the Pittsburg Gazette of Tuesday, February 18. I am going to read it as a part of my speech. I desire to say, also, that we regard this as a good, sound paper; the oldest and one of the most influential in the west. It gives good advice, and its advice is carefully considered and often accepted, by at least a portion, and quite a respectable portion, of the people of the country where it is published, and I have no doubt that it does speak, in a large measure, the public sentiment. The article to which I now refer, and from which I propose to read, is a long editorial article upon the second section of this report, and the discussion upon the subject when it was before the committee upon a previous occasion. In speaking upon that subject it uses this language:

"The proposition requiring the ballot to be numbered, and the corresponding number to appear on the poll list, with the voter's name, is a wise precaution against repeating and stuffing the ballot-box.

"Our friends in the country, who know nothing of election frauds save what they read in the papers, may think all these precautions tedious and unnecessary, but we submit to them that they will be the gainers by these restrictions, as well as the people of the great cities. If their ballots are over-stowed by false votes, cast in another portion of the State, the elective franchise is a barren privilege to them."

The trouble, also, of writing the name and number, &c., are all considered in this article; so that we see that, at any rate, this proposition is endorsed by a paper in the western part of the State that we know to have character and influence with the people.

It is some expression of the public sentiment that the people are not going en masse against this proposition. It is an endorsement of my course that I am grateful for, and I am glad this subject has been re-considered. I believe gentlemen of this Convention have received some information upon this subject since it was last before the committee, and I hope now that the Convention has the back-bone to stand up and say that we will submit a proposition to the people for their adoption, so that when a man has once cast a vote he may make his mark upon it, so that once more in this world he may know that it was his vote. If the ballot is the great right of the freeman then let us provide a mode so that after he has put the vote into the ballot-box he can mark it, so that if fraud is perpetrated he can say that is the vote I put into this box. Without this provision there is no means by which he can do it. Under the secret ballot, when the voter parts with it he can never again recognize the vote, and the means of detecting fraud is taken away. Therefore I do sincerely hope that this Convention will adopt this provision or the amendment offered by the gentleman from Centre, (Mr. M'Allister,) which I consider better than the original provision, because that requires that the election officers shall be sworn to secrecy. Under such a provision the ballot is made just as secret as it has been heretofore under the old Constitution. Then, sir, we have these guarantees against fraud, and I believe the people of the Commonwealth will adopt it by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I do not know that it is worth while to even ask for the attention of the committee for a few minutes, but I would like them, at least, to consider the light in which some of us feel compelled to regard this section, certainly without the amendment of the gentleman from Schuylkill (Mr. Bartholomew.) You are endeavoring to correct frauds in your great cities. In that work, as I understand the means to be adapted to it, I purpose to go as far as any person here, in the first place, in ascertaining who the honest elector entitled to cast one vote is. I was in favor of a registry law for that purpose; not such a registry law as was adopted—a registry law not to register, but a registry law compelling registration as the price of franchise, and then to make your election district so small that with a list of two hundred voters, ascertained thirty days before an election, frauds will be almost impossible. Then I would also put all effective safeguards around the duty of the election officers, and I would impose severe penalties upon them. But between the honest elector, when he is clearly ascertained, and the dropping of his vote into the box, I have not yet seen any reason why we should put any impediment whatever, and I beg gentlemen to believe that whatever this Convention may do, in the vast regions of this State in which frauds never have occurred at elections, this is an exceedingly odious and exceedingly unpopular provision.

There is no question about it, as it seems to me. In that I may be in error, but from the intercourse I have had with people living in such districts, I believe there is an universal sentiment against it, and there will be sufficient interests arrayed against the Constitution to make its adoption very uncertain. Gentlemen, do not believe that the people are waiting eagerly and anxiously to adopt our work when we are done. They will have arrayed against us enemies of great power, of great numbers, of great influence, and while they represent what is evil in our State we can afford to incur their hostility; but I beg of you not to make the honest voter in the country believe that you have put a new trouble in his way, or imposed a new duty upon him. How many men write their names legibly in the country districts? How many intelligent voters do not write their names with sufficient legibility to care to write them at all? In the most exciting political contest, what proportion of voters have to be brought to the polls by party agency and the expenditure of money? You talk as if this provision would tend to prevent fraud. Gentlemen, this provision will tend to make a larger sum of money necessary, in every election hereafter, in Pennsylvania, than has ever been spent before.

We were called together by only three hundred thousand voters. There are but three hundred thousand voters in Pennsylvania who ever said they wanted us to meet; and even to elect a President, even to elect a Governor, even to elect a Congress in the throes of a great civil war it has always cost a large expenditure of time, and effort and money to get out the average voter of Pennsylvania, and every impediment you place between him and the ballot he is entitled to cast, so much do you add to the difficulty of getting him to vote, so much do you add to the power of the politician and to the need of money to bring him to the polls. With this provision in your Constitution your election becomes a pure question of money. With the rural districts it becomes a question as to which party will spend the most money to have active electioneering agents going around to every house, seeing that each man writes his name upon the ticket, furnishing him with a witness, if he has not got one, and furnishing him with a carriage to bring him to the polls. It will then be discovered that you have simply multiplied the power of the professional politician, and multiplied the sum that is required for the ordinary expenditures of an election canvass. If you need it here, if you need it in Pittsburg, do not put it upon all the rest of the State. Trust them that they understand something of their own need, and when they want it they will apply for it, and when they need it they will get it, but do not burden the whole Constitution with this provision.

Mr. NILES. Mr. Chairman: Is there an amendment to the amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; the proposition now is to strike out the word "shall," and insert the word "may," as proposed in the amendment of the gentleman from Centre, (Mr. M'Allister.)

Mr. NILES. Mr. Chairman: I do not at this time desire to detain this committee, because the vote upon the reconsideration seems to have determined the fact that this clause in the report of the committee is to be adopted.

During the many long days of this discussion I believe I have not troubled this committee with any remarks upon this subject; but representing, as I do, in part, a rural district—composed of four of the largest agricultural counties, as far as territory is concerned—in this Commonwealth, I feel that I would be derelict in my duty towards them were I not to rise in my place, and protest in their name, against the passage of this amendment.

I am willing, to-day, sir, to go as far as the farthest to protect the elective franchise in Philadelphia, or in any of the great cities of this Commonwealth. I am willing, as I said to the distinguished gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cassidy,) the other day, to vote affirmatively upon any proposition that proposes to purify the ballot-box in this or any other city; but, for the purpose of benefiting them—and of purifying the ballot-box in the great cities of the Commonwealth—I believe it would be an outrage and a wrong to the people of the rural districts, where no frauds are committed, to impose this great and unnecessary burden upon them.

I have here a resolution or proviso which I propose to introduce at the proper time, to limit the effect of this article to cities having more than thirty thousand inhabitants. If Philadelphia desires this measure, let Philadelphia have it.

What is it that is proposed to be done? Why, sir, look over the broad States of this Union, over which we heard so much eloquence last evening—are we not departing from the rule of conduct in every one of them? Is there a government to-day upon the face of God's green earth where men vote by ballot with such restrictions and limitations thrown around them, as those you propose to throw around the people of Pennsylvania by the section now before us? I appeal to the friends of this measure, those who propose to put this great and unnecessary hardship upon the voters of this Commonwealth, if you are not departing from the common law of voting in every civilized government upon the face of this earth, where you put a restriction upon the voter, requiring him before he can deposit his ballot—the right of every man—to write his name or have it written upon that ballot, you compel him to do a thing unheard of before!

For the purpose of protecting the ballot-box in Philadelphia, you propose to-day to depart from the acknowledged rule of conduct in every State of this Union, because it has not been said by the earnest and eloquent advocates of this measure during the sixty-two speeches we have had upon it pro and con, that any government, either upon these shores or any other, have ever adopted such a provision—that any government has ever imposed those unnecessary restrictions upon the voter in the discharge of his duties as an elector.

My friend over the way (Mr. Howard) says he has heard from Allegheny. Well, sir, I have heard from the northern tier, and from my constituents above the Alleghenies, and I say, in my place, that the universal sentiment of my people is opposed to this.

In a township adjoining the borough in which I live there were five hundred votes cast at the last election. The people met—as people meet in the rural districts—at a school house at the "four-corners." Now, sir, I submit, is it not a hardship for these people to come, many of them, four or five miles to meet there, in an inclement season of the year—in November—and compel them to write their names upon their ballots, when they have no writing appliances or conveniences? Besides, sir, and by way of making the matter worse, at every one of our elections four or five ballots are required to complete the tickets. It may be convenient enough for clerks—men whose profession it is to use the pen—to write their names upon their ballots, especially when they meet here in your large cities, close by their homes, and surrounded with every proper appliance for writing. I submit, however, to this Convention, that it is a great hardship to the men that live in the rural districts—men that are not used to writing—men who follow the plow instead of the pen—to compel every one of them, when they get out there, away from their homes, and with no conveniences, to write their names, or cause them to be written, upon four or five ballots, before they can discharge the right that they all possess.

I have now said, sir, all, and more than I intended to say when I rose. When the time comes for the purpose of showing my earnestness and conscientiousness on this subject, I propose to submit this amendment, giving to Philadelphia this great right that she says she desires; but I, for one, protest, in the name of the rural districts, against the enforcement of that provision.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I confess, sir, that I am unable to state what the views of my constituents, or of any number of them may be on this subject. The gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) and the gentleman from Tioga (Mr. Niles) may have superior means of discovering or divining what the sentiments of the people who sent them here may be. But, sir, that gentlemen may be mistaken in their suppositions on that subject has been fully evidenced to us morning. The distinguished delegate from Pittsburg, (Mr. Howard,) when this question was last before the committee, modestly stated that he was unable to say what views the citizens of Pittsburg would take of this subject. On the other hand delegates from the same city stated, with the greatest confidence, that if the Constitution should be made to embody the provision now under consideration, the citizens of Pittsburg would vote it down en masse. Still we find the gentleman from Pittsburg, who was too modest to assume any knowledge of the views of his constituents, establishing, this morning, that he is endorsed by the citizens of his district, in so far, at least, as a highly respected and influential portion of their press may be accepted as a representative of the people in that respect. We have also seen two gentlemen rise in their places this morning, one to move a reconsideration of this section, and the other to second that motion, who had previously voted upon this question in a manner differently from that upon which we are now led to hope for, and we have a right to presume that they may in the meantime have learned something from their districts to make them doubt the correctness of the course which they have hitherto pursued, and to confirm them in the good purpose they have now in mind.

I do not think this the way for this body to view any question; to haltingly and fearfully consider what their constituents are going to say about it. With all respect for the gentlemen who have invoked such an influence, I must say I do not think it is a manly way. I, for one, will vote upon every question before this body upon my own conviction of what is right. I believe, however, that if the people of Pennsylvania desire anything at our hands; if there is anything that will secure their favor for our work, it is some provision in our Constitution looking to a radical reform in our elective system, and for the correction of election frauds.

The gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) has told us that he is for a registry act, as a means of ascertaining, beyond question, the legally entitled voter; that, however, when the voter shall be ascertained he (Mr. MacVeagh) is opposed to anything that comes between him and the ballot-box—any unnecessary impediment; but, sir, it is not in the dropping of the ballots into the ballot-box by the honest voter that the wrong is done: it is in the manner in which they are taken out, the manner in which they are counted, and the manner also in which they are put in; but not by men even purporting to be honest voters, but by scoundrels and by the handful; and the provision that the standing committee has reported to us is recommended to us all by the fact that it proposes to enable honest voters to detect which of the votes in the box were put there by legal voters, and to distinguish them from those which were not. It would enable every honest voter to say, if necessary, "this was my ballot," and it would enable the people, if false votes were cast, to see that the purpose of the honest voters should not be thwarted by fictitious and fraudulent ballots.

This, sir, is not a Philadelphia question. The State of Pennsylvania is a unit. I am proud that I am a citizen of so great a Commonwealth; and the citizens of all this State, from one end to the other, should be proud that this great Commonwealth has so noble a metropolis as that in which we meet. No feeling of rivalry should exist between the rural districts and the city of Philadelphia. We are one State, and we should be brothers, and on this question we should be a unit for the general good, because in every election for State officers the franchise of the voters of every portion of this State is exercised. It is idle for gentlemen to say: "We will give you this in Philadelphia. We do not require it in the pure atmosphere from whence we come."

Sir, unless the ballot-box shall be equally protected throughout the State—unless we can guard it in every section of our Commonwealth—men who perpetrate frauds upon elections will go where they can make their calling effective. Deprive them of the power of exercising their nefarious trade here, and even the pure atmosphere of Tioga will shortly become polluted. But there can be no doubt that there are certain sections of the State that need it equally with us. The article that the gentleman from Pittsburg (Mr. Howard) read, from a Pittsburg paper, this morning, shows that Allegheny county, at least, is not so wholly freed from election frauds as some gentlemen have represented. If you do not protect every section, not only those sections in which fraud has existed, but into which it may come, you omit a measure of relief for the entire people of Pennsylvania. The frauds that have been committed in different sections do not affect merely local offices. Their perpetration involves State elections as well. You may cast as many legal votes as you please west of the Allegheny mountains, and they will avail nothing, if east of those mountains a sufficient number of illegal votes can be cast to overpower them.

I yield to no man in my reverence for the ballot. I look upon it as next only to trial by jury in its importance to us as freemen, and when I saw that this section proposed to interfere with it, I confess I hesitated long before I could feel that it would be right to adopt it; but the people of Pennsylvania are looking for something to be done for the purification of the ballot. This sacred right has been corrupted and polluted; and here is a committee of fifteen gentlemen, who have been for a long time considering the subject, and as a result of their best efforts to purify our elections, they have brought us this single proposition. No gentleman on this floor has suggested a better, and the united wisdom of this committee of the whole has been unable to present any other proposition to the end desired; and still gentlemen tell us that they are anxious to get rid of these frauds, but will vote down this only practical measure for relief whilst having no other to present.

MR. CARTER. Mr. Chairman: I think it would be presumptuous in any one to attempt now to add anything new to what has been said during the past four or five days we have devoted to the consideration of this subject; but I have something to say in reply to the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas) and the gentleman from Pittsburg, (Mr. Howard,) who have last addressed the Convention. I thought there were some very weak points in both of their arguments, and I think the extract which the gentleman from Pittsburg (Mr. Howard) read from the Pittsburg paper only confirms the opinions which I, for one, and I trust a majority of this Convention, have held in regard to this question. I understood the tenor of the extract which the gentleman read that this was not a provision which would meet with the endorsement of the people in the rural districts. This is the point we take, and that brings me right square to the argument of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Dallas,) who said that he was unable to state what his constituents may think in regard to this matter, and that he thought it was immaterial to know the opinions which they entertained. I desire to direct the few remarks I shall make against this great radical error. We are not assembled here, as I have remarked before, to determine upon questions likely to arise or a state of public opinion that may exist in the future, and to say this subject under discussion being right shall be the fundamental law of the land. We are legislating (for this is a species of incipient legislation) for things as they are and for men as they are. We are bound to consult the opinions and prejudices of our constituents, and we cannot go far in advance of the people and declare that such principles are correct, irrespective of the views our constituents may entertain, if we would have the work of this Convention meet with an endorsement at their hands when it shall have been completed.

I deem it would be extremely unwise if the sentiments entertained by the gentleman from Philadelphia find response in the minds of many members of this Convention, and the wishes of the people regarding questions coming before us for discussion were entirely disregarded and set aside. I firmly hold that the Convention has much important work to accomplish in many different directions, besides the purification of the ballot, if it would look to the interests of the whole people of the State. The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas) seems to have entirely forgotten, in his remarks, that the report of the Committee on Elections contains many features looking to that end, and that many of them have been adopted. I do not feel disposed to detain the Convention by enumerating them, but we all know that many of these features contained in the report have been adopted, and there will be more suggested before this Convention adjourns. This question, which has been so lengthily discussed, is certainly an important one, and I entreat the earnest attention of the members of the Convention in its deliberation, for the people of the State feel a deep interest in its final decision. The amendment of the gentleman from Schuylkill (Mr. Bartholomew) seems to have created an apprehension among some of our members that if it is adopted it will kill the section under discussion. Better it should than the entire work of the Convention. I have conversed with many of the citizens of my own county, and with a member of the Legislature from the district I represent, and on all sides I learn that nothing can be more unpopular among the German masses residing in my district than the adoption of this measure. Will gentlemen assert that it is possible for us to educate the people up to this standard? I think the practical and most statesman-like manner this question can be viewed is to wait until the people are, to some extent, disposed to endorse such a provision.

I have received information and have conversed with gentlemen residing in Delaware, Chester and Berks counties, and from all I can learn I am fully and perfectly satisfied that this measure is exceedingly unpopular in those regions. If we cannot place sufficient guards around the ballot-box to protect it without necessitating this special measure which is so obnoxious, I think, to all portions of the State, why should we incorporate it in the Constitution, and imperil all the work of reform which I believe the Convention is destined to accomplish? I said I did not intend to enter into the argument, believing that it has been entirely exhausted, but there is one point upon which I feel it my duty to express my views. I am very familiar with the feelings and sentiments of the so called German classes of the voters in the county in which I reside. They are a class of people who are exceedingly tender and delicate about the exercise of this right of franchise. There already exists considerable difficulty in getting them to the polls at times, and most certainly the difficulty should be lessened instead of increased. I can well understand the discouragement which would ensue among them if this measure was adopted and they were not permitted to vote in a conscientious and independent manner, and the reluctance they would have in being required to write their names on every ballot, thus destroying the secret ballot which they have always been permitted to use. I have now, Mr. Chairman, only one word to add in regard to the so called destruction of the secret ballot. I hold, whether it is right or wrong in itself, that the people of this country are not prepared to destroy the secret ballot, and to this remaining point I desire briefly to allude. I strongly believe, unless I can be otherwise convinced by the presentation of other arguments than I have already heard in this Convention, that this section, if it is adopted, will destroy the secret ballot. The people are not ready to have it destroyed, and this section does destroy it. This fact can be easily illustrated. An honest farmer or a citizen of a rural district does not want to vote for a man or neighbor, it may be with whom he may be, perhaps, on friendly and social terms, but he cannot conscientiously support him. He may desire to vote for a man whom he can conscientiously support, but he does not wish to have his vote known, and his vote will be known and thus to incur the enmity of old friends and neighbors.

Is a citizen of the State protected in cases similar to this, if this measure shall be carried into effect? It will be, I say, absolutely impossible to retain the secrecy of the voter's ballot, because when the box is opened to count the votes there is the voter's ballot and name. The judge of the election and the election officers, or anybody else in the room, can see at once the name of the voter and the manner in which the ballot was cast, and discord and dissension will be created to such an extent that voters will long hesitate before they encounter the animosity of their friends and neighbors. The timid, the shrinking and the cowardly voter, if you so choose to designate him, shields himself behind this secret ballot. The large class of our people who may wish to conscientiously cast their votes, but who would hesitate if they knew their ballots, and the manner in which they were cast, could be at any time exposed to the public gaze, and the result would be that in a majority of cases they would remain away from the polls, but will attend to vote against our work, when we need them most to vote to sustain the labors of this Convention. In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I am convinced that the adoption of this section will interfere with the harmony and the adoption of the work of reform which the Convention has been called especially to accomplish, I shall vote against this, as I hold, improper, if not iniquitous, measure.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman: I have thus far been as silent during the discussion of this question as any other member of the Convention, and I would remain silent if I did not consider the question now before the committee one of the most important that will come before the Convention. It must be confessed, Mr. Chairman, that the work of the Convention will be in vain, unless some protection is thrown around the ballot-box. This protection, be its form what it may, must be afforded by this Convention, if we would save our government and preserve our free institutions. I have listened attentively for days to the arguments that have been made upon this question, and I have yet heard none which have convinced me that the section reported by the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation ought not to be adopted, in the absence of a better or more satisfactory proposition. We have been told by the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) that he is in favor of a registration law, and that it will correct all the evils under which the country labors in consequence of the frauds committed at our elections. Mr. Chairman, a registration law has been tried, and has failed to accomplish the desired end. Besides, a registry law, to which I am not opposed, if it will do good, imposes as much trouble upon many voters as it would be to write their names upon their ballots. The gentleman also told us that if the section under consideration is incorporated in the Constitution, the people will reject the entire work of the Convention. We have heard this argument, if argument it can be called, over and over again, from all parts of this Hall. I do not, Mr. Chairman, apprehend any such result. The people are honest, and desire fair, honest elections, and will sustain any reasonable proposition that will keep the ballot-box pure and undefiled. If, however, they do not approve of what we do, we must abide by their decision; but, Mr. Chairman, my constituents have sent me here to do what is right, and I intend, regardless of all considerations, to do what is right as God enables me to see the right; and I intend, therefore, to vote for the incorporation of this section in the Constitution, because I believe that it is right, and that it should be there, even if some of my constituents should differ from me, and manifest their disapproval in their vote upon the adoption of the Constitution which this Convention may submit to them. I have said, Mr. Chairman, that this is an important question. Nearly one hundred years ago, in a hall only a short distance from this hall, a body of illustrious men convened and framed the Declaration of Independence. The history of that day tells us that the adoption of that great measure depended upon a single vote. That grand old patriot, John Hancock, was, as we all know, the president of that Congress. When the vote was taken it resulted in a tie—a member was hourly expected, and history further informs us that Hancock delayed the announcement of the vote, awaiting the arrival of the absent member, and occupied the attention of the Congress in a speech in support of the declaration until that member made his appearance in the hall. The vote was then taken and the declaration was carried, and the old State house bell rang out to the anxious, waiting people the glad news that Congress had declared that the thirteen colonies were free and independent States.

Mr. Chairman, upon that day was laid the foundation of the most magnificent governmental structure which the world has ever seen. The thirteen colonies, occupying a narrow strip along the coast, with a population of only four millions, have become thirty-seven States, with a population of forty millions, stretching from the lakes to the gulf, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, cemented now by the blood of half a million of the best men of our country. The corner stone of that structure is the elective franchise. Keep that pure, and all will be well. Allow it to be corrupted, permit the enormous frauds, the perpetration of which is not denied, to be continued, the labors of the men of 1776 will all have been in vain, and our free institutions must come to nought. Mr. Chairman, a Macedonian cry has come up from Philadelphia to the rural districts for help. She seems to be paralyzed, and asks the representatives from the other parts of the State for aid to correct the great evil under which she labors, and to help her to devise measures to insure purity in her elections. So far as I am concerned, I will do what I can to remedy this enormous wrong, not only in Philadelphia, but wherever it may exist in our great State, and I am willing to rest the Constitution with the people, and with this section reported by the committee incorporated among its provisions. We ought to do all we can to bring about a reform upon this most momentous subject. Let us adopt the section, and if we find, before it is taken up for final action in the Convention, after it has passed the committee of whole, that it is so distasteful to the people that they will not approve it, we can retrace our steps and agree upon something else to meet the emergency which will be satisfactory to the people. I hope that the members of the Convention will meet the question like men, and that they will, at all events, be willing to try what can be done to prevent for all time to come the gross frauds under which our Commonwealth has suffered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I rise to make an appeal to the committee for greater despatch in the transaction of our business. Certainly this question has been sufficiently debated, and I hope the committee, without further indulgence in discussion, will dispose of it now, one way or the other. I hope that this afternoon, instead of entering into a general debate upon a section the subject matter of which has been already fully considered, that we will dispose of it, and then I hope that tomorrow we will take up the remaining part of this report from the Committee on Suffrage and finish it, so that this matter of the report of that committee shall be fully passed upon in committee of the whole and reported this week. We are certainly consuming time at a rate that will make the Convention sit much longer than we originally intended, and may prevent that full consideration which will be due to the very important business which other committees will present to the Convention. We are pretty near the end of February, and we have made no progress except upon a few points submitted by the Committee on the Legislature, and to some extent upon this report from the Committee on Suffrage. If we shall dispose of this question without further debate, one way or the other, I hope we will be able to get out of the committee of the whole upon this entire report to-morrow, and upon second reading, if any gentleman has remarks to make, which are deferred now, they may be heard then.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: I do not desire to waste the patience of the House upon this subject, but at the risk of being charged with taking too much time, I desire to tell a little story that was told: Speaking of the case of an election occurring in one of the boroughs of this Commonwealth, under very high political excitement, the judge, who was a whig, allowed everybody who came to the polls to vote. If challenged by his party friends, it made no difference. The votes were received at the window, and before the election was closed he received a great many curses from his party friends. To the astonishment of everybody the whig ticket, the next morning, was found to have received some three or four hundred more than the usual majority in that borough. When they began to apologize to the judge he said: "It don't make any difference, but how in the name of common sense could I get the majority if I did not have the votes?"

Now, sir, if we want to get substantial reform adopted here in the interest of this Commonwealth, the Convention will adopt this section as reported by the committee. If the Convention does not want that reform they will vote this section down.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I do not intend to inflict a speech upon this committee—

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I trust the gentleman from Allegheny will allow me to say one word. I appeal to the member from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) not to interfere with the course of this debate. I do not say that it is true, but I heard on my way here this morning, that arrangements were made, mainly by one political party, to re-consider this vote, to prevent debate and to pass this section through the committee. I said then that I did not believe it, and I do not believe it now.

Mr. WORRELL. State your authority, sir.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I ask the gentleman to give his authority for that statement.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I beg to inform those gentlemen that I am not in the habit of giving the names of gentlemen who come to speak to me privately unless they request it. And now if anybody else has any more questions to ask, I will be glad to hear them.

I have already said that I did not believe it, but I appeal to the member from Columbia that it would be wise to allow unrestricted debate to-day to prevent any misunderstanding.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I rise to a point of order. I ask if it is in order for gentlemen to rise upon this floor and charge that measures are started here as party measures?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there is no occasion for this allusion to party. It is all out of order, but the Chair cannot tell what gentlemen are going to say until they utter their words.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I desire to—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to take this opportunity to say that he sees no need for this exhibition of party feeling.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman:—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Allegheny has the floor.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I yield to the gentleman from Columbia.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: In consequence of the intimation made here by the member from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) I have to reply that I did not know that this motion to re-consider was to be made at all, until a few minutes before it was proposed. As to this statement which the member has just made, in reference to an understanding between the members of one political party, as far as my knowledge and belief goes, it is utterly without foundation.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. I said, Mr. Chairman, that I did not design to occupy the time of this Convention.

Mr. HUNSICKER. Mr. Chairman: As the mover of this motion to re-consider, I hope that the gentleman from Allegheny will yield me the floor for a minute.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. I prefer, Mr. Chairman, saying what I have to say now.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I would like to make an explanation. I am sorry, very sorry, that any reference to party has been made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Allegheny has the floor.

Mr. BIDDLE. I desire to make an explanation, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Allegheny yield to the gentleman from Philadelphia?

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I prefer to say what I have to say now. I do not intend to inflict a speech upon this committee, but I must say that I think the suggestion made on the other side is a little unkind at this time. This question was discussed very fully and very ably in the committee of the whole, and a vote was taken upon it regularly, at the close of discussion, and the section as reported by the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation was voted down by a vote of fifty-one to thirty-nine. Those of us who are opposed to the section had no idea of the matter being sprung upon the committee of the whole to-day. A number of those who are opposed to the section and are opposed to this plan of writing names upon their ballots are not here to-day. It seemed very much as if there was a concerted movement on the part of the friends of this measure to bring it up to-day, and, without any discussion, force it through the committee. I say this seemed to be the plan, but I submit that it was taking advantage of those who are opposed to this plan. We all anticipated the question would come up again on the second reading of the section in Convention. That was the general understanding, because it will come up again then properly. But as a committee of the whole we had passed upon the question. We had disposed of it, so as to get through our work and return the same to the Convention. Now to bring it up again to-day, in the absence of some who are known to be opposed to it, seems unfair to those who expect it to come up at a different time and in a different way.

Now, sir, I do not intend to discuss the question again; but I beg to make one or two remarks, called forth by my colleague from Allegheny county. He quoted from the Pittsburg Gazette, but if the gentleman had noticed carefully what he read he would have found that the Pittsburg Gazette does not endorse the writing of the names upon the ballots. It favors the numbering of the ballots, and that these numbers shall correspond with the numbers upon the list, but it speaks doubtfully of the propriety of putting the names upon the ballots. The very manner in which it refers to it expresses doubt on that point, and speaks of it as being obnoxious and open to very serious objections. It says if that will be useful in the way of preserving the purity of elections, why not endure the inconvenience and trouble to which it will subject voters? I do not advocate or oppose any question here because of its party relation. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that while I am a partisan in one sense, and belong to one of the great political parties of the State,—

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. No, sir; I will not be interrupted. The gentleman can reply. He has his opportunity.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I do not wish to respond, but I want to call the attention of my colleague to this article.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I read the article at the desk of the gentleman, and I say that it approves of the numbering of the ballots directly, and it speaks rather doubtfully of the other suggestion of writing the electors' names upon their ballots; but admitting that the gentleman is even right, that is the only paper in the city of Pittsburg that has said a word on the subject; but even if all the papers there had come out in favor of it, as an individual and as a member of this Convention, I should exercise my own judgment. I do not intend to advocate or oppose any measure here because of its relation to parties. I will do here in this Convention what I believe to be best; what will be best for the people of the State, without regard to whether it is advocated by republicans or advocated by democrats, or without regard to any possible influence upon political parties. I have opposed this measure of writing the names upon the ballots on that ground solely, and totally and entirely. I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, of the first part of the section now before the committee; and I shall move, when it comes in order, to strike out the last part of that section, and I ask the attention of the committee a very few moments now to this thought.

The first part of the section reported by the chairman of the Committee on Suffrage, (Mr. McAllister,) now before us, provides that the ballots shall be numbered by the election officers, and the numbers correspond with the names of the electors, on the list. Now, sir, I am willing to go for that. I am willing to vote for that, because it will not subject the voter to any inconvenience whatever. It can be done very speedily by the election officers, and will not encumber the ballot-box, and will cause no annoyance to the elector; and because I believe we can still preserve the ballot in its secrecy by that mode. In this way, if the election officer wishes to find out how a man votes he cannot tell by the ballot when the ballot is simply numbered. He will have to see what number is on it and then turn to the list and see what number is on the list; and only by referring to the list and also to the number of the ballot can he tell whose ballot it is.

Now the Legislature might provide that before the election officers undertake to count the ballots, they shall seal up the list of voters; and if they did that, then it is impossible even for the election officers themselves to tell how any man voted. The Legislature may provide that. It may also provide that election officers shall be sworn not to tell how the elector voted, unless called as witnesses in court.

With these guards provided by the Legislature the ballot will be preserved, and its purity, as it has existed from the origin of our State down to the present time, and subject the voters to no inconvenience, no trouble and no vexation whatever. I object, therefore, to the latter part of that section which requires the names to be written, because I believe the numbering of the ballots will enable the parties in the case of a contest to tell whether frauds have been committed by the election officers. For example: If a controversy arises, I am called as a witness. The number of my name and ballot is fifty. The ballot marked fifty is shown me, and I am asked, "Mr. White is that your ballot?" I answer, no; I did not vote that ballot. In the same manner other voters are called as witnesses. The ballots marked as their ballots they testify are not the ballots they voted. And if the cases of this kind are numerous, we would have conclusive evidence of fraud on the part of the election officers, and the evidence would be just as conclusive as if the electors had written their names upon their ballots. With numbered ballots, election officers would feel that they cannot tamper with the ballots. If they should take out of the box the genuine ballots, and substitute others, they are liable to be detected. You would simply have to call the voter himself to prove it, and not have to call all the men that voted at any election, as you have to do under the present law, to establish the fact of fraud. Hence I am in favor of the first part of the section and opposed to the second part of it.

If you force this section into the Constitution you know that one-third of the Convention can demand a separate vote upon it. That, I apprehend, will be done. Had you not better put a clause into your Constitution that we can all agree to such as is suggested now, or the clause of the present Constitution, then submit this as a separate amendment to the vote of the people? I am willing to vote for it in that shape.

Mr. DUNNING. Mr. Chairman: I think the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. J. W. F. White) is mistaken when he says this measure was sprung upon this Convention. There is a much larger number of members here to-day than there was upon the day on which the vote was taken before.

I want to say simply this, as I have not said a word upon this subject at all, when I get an opportunity to vote upon this question, I want my vote to be so recorded that it shall go to the country that I have voted in favor of some reform upon this question that so materially affects the people of this entire Commonwealth. I have neither the time nor the disposition to enter into the discussion of what the troubles are in connection with this; they have been so fully elaborated here, but I want to put my name upon the record among those who vote in favor of such measures as shall reform and correct the evils that have crept into the ballot during the last few years, and I want to be found amongst those who will not vote as a partisan. I do not want to belong, nor to be recognized with those who vote upon this question who shall be called a partisan in voting upon it.

The people are demanding that we shall furnish to them such measures and such reforms as shall correct the abuses of the ballot box. I have failed to see anything which would lead to a reform that the people would not gladly endorse. They demand reform; and I believe the Committee on Suffrage have presented to us just such measures as the people all over this Commonwealth want, and I shall support, most cordially, the section as it comes from the committee with the amendment of the gentleman from Centre (Mr. M'Allister.)

Mr. HUNSICKER. Mr. Chairman: As I am the author of all this mischief, and have provoked all this discussion, I desire to state all that transpired between myself and other members of this Convention with regard to my action. When I came into this Hall this morning, I met the venerable chairman of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation (Mr. M'Allister.) I also called upon the gentleman from Carbon, (Mr. Lilly,) and I said, to both of them, that I was convinced in my own mind that the vote I had cast the other day against this section was a mistake, and if they could name another gentleman who had voted in the same way, who would second my motion, that I would, this morning, make a motion to re-consider, because I expected to be absent next week, and I desired to make this motion in committee, so that the committee could re-consider it, if my vote with the others was strong enough to do it. There was no party combination; there was no party question; I had no idea either of stifling or provoking debate, and I do say, with all deference to the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) that he must have had a very unreliable informant, or he must have been quick with his suspicions.

Mr. HOWARD. It must have been his imagination.

Mr. HUNSICKER. As my friend suggests, it may have been imagination; but I do think that this subject has been fully and thoroughly discussed. I have taken no part in the discussion of it whatever, nor do I mean now to go into the discussion of it; but, upon consultation with my constituents, at least with as many of them as I could see, and after reflecting, I have become entirely convinced that the substitute for the section, as offered by the gentleman from Centre, (Mr. M'Allister,) is a necessity imperatively demanded by the times, and that was the reason why I moved to re-consider. If gentlemen desire to discuss it, so far as I am concerned, they may discuss it from now until the end of the Convention.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: Just one moment's time of the Convention for the purpose of correcting the statement of my very respectable colleague, (Mr. J. W. F. White,) who seems to think I did not read the article from the Pittsburg Gazette aright, or that it was not exactly as I stated it.

In regard to the writing of the name upon the ticket, I am reading from the editorial now. I will read that part of it which I did not read when I spoke before upon this subject.

"In regard to requiring the signature of the voter on the ballot, and if he cannot write, his name written and attested by a resident of the district, it is open to the objection with many that it interferes with the secrecy of the ballot. Not any more than the numbering process, if the election officers are sworn, and the vote is only made known in an election contest."

"So far as this writing the name on the ballot is calculated to add a feeling of personal responsibility to the voter for his discharge of his duty, it seems to us a wise and thoughtful policy. It will tend to elevate and make more impressive the elector's duty. This is precisely what is needed most."

If that does not squarely and fairly endorse all that is before the Convention I cannot understand the meaning of language. The writing of the name is "precisely what is needed most." I do not think that can be dodged.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I was out in the ante-room and did not hear all of the remarks of the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Hunsicker.) It seemed to me that perhaps he did not fully understand what I had said. I did not say—because it would not have been true, and I knew it—that there were not gentlemen of both political parties upon both sides of this question, as ardent in their political faith the one as the other. Nor did I intimate that the gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Hunsicker,) so far as he was concerned—for I had no information upon the subject—had any knowledge of it; but I did say to the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) with his permission, that I thought it was exceedingly unwise and inopportune to close debate this morning summarily upon this proposition, because of alleged information had been brought to me, I stated then that I did not believe it. Other gentlemen around me said that they did believe it, and other gentlemen had heard the same thing. We do not make anything by failing to recognize matters just as they are. I was informed, as I said before, that gentlemen in political sympathy with the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Hunsicker)—nobody was named or I would name them here—would, this morning, move to re-consider this vote, and that they would endeavor to prevent debate upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that gentlemen of both particular parties came to him, this morning, and asked him at what time this motion should be made. I did not understand that there was any idea of party feeling connected with it all.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I move the committee now rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Upon this motion a division was called, and resulted: Affirmative, fifty-one; negative, fifty-eight. So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I will add a word more. The remarks I made this morning in favor of concluding the debate on this subject were made of my own motion, without consultation with any human being, and upon the reasons, therefore, as they presented themselves to me. In addition, in reply to the suggestions of the member from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh), I must be permitted to say that I think that it is unnecessary for any member of this Convention to bring into this body and put into our debates a report which he says he does not himself believe.

Mr. BROOMALL moved that the committee do now rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, which was agreed to.

So the committee rose.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. President: The committee of the whole has had under consideration the article reported by the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, and has instructed me, as its chairman, to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Leave was granted.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MACCONNELL asked leave of absence for Mr. Porter for a few days, which was granted.

Mr. WOODWARD asked leave of absence for Mr. Armstrong for a few days, which was granted.

The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the Convention adjourned until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

FORTY-NINTH DAY.

FRIDAY, February 21, 1873.

The Convention met at ten A. M.

The President, Hon. William M. Meredith, in the Chair.

Prayer was offered by Rev. James W. Curry.

The Journal of yesterday was then read and approved.

THE CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention the following communication :

U. S. CENTENNIAL COMMISSION, }
PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 21, 1873. }

Hon. WM. M. MEREDITH,
President Constitutional Convention:

DEAR SIR:—I have the honor to enclose herewith stage tickets for all the members of the Convention for the centennial celebration at the Academy of Music, this evening.

Very respectfully,

D. L. MORRELL,
Chairman.

REPORTS OF PROTHONOTARIES.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention the report of the prothonotary of Franklin county, relative to the number of civil causes pending upon the docket of that county, which was referred to the Committee on Judiciary.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. HORTON presented a petition from the citizens of Bradford county, praying for a prohibitory clause in the Constitution against the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. S. A. PURVANCE presented a petition from two hundred citizens of Allegheny county, praying for the same provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the same committee.

SUB-DIVISION OF COUNTIES.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition from the citizens of Luzerne county, praying that a clause be inserted in the Constitution that in all counties having a population exceeding one hundred thousand, the Legislature shall have power to make sub-divisions thereof, establishing in each sub-division all the necessary courts pertaining to counties, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

APPOINTMENT OF HON. HENRY GREEN AS A DELEGATE.

Mr. FELL. Mr. President: In accordance with a recent resolution passed by the Convention, I desire to submit the following resolution on behalf of the delegates at large, to whom was referred the filling of the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon. Samuel E. Dimmick.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

Resolved, That Henry Green, of Northampton county, be and hereby is appointed a member of this Convention, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Samuel E. Dimmick, a delegate for the State at large."

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HENRY GREEN, at the request of the President, then came forward to the bar of the Convention and took the usual oath prescribed for members of the Convention.

THE ADJOURNMENT OF THE TWENTY- SECOND OF FEBRUARY.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman: I desire to present the following reason for the vote given yesterday by various members of the Convention against adjourning over the twenty-second of February, and request that they be entered on the Journal.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I move the reading of the communication be dispensed with.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I would like to hear what the communication is.

The PRESIDENT. The communication will be read.

The CLERK read, as follows:

REASONS FOR VOTING AGAINST ADJOURN- MENT.

No debate having been in order upon the resolution adopted yesterday for an adjournment over Saturday, the twenty-second inst., Mr. Hay, Mr. W. H. Smith,

Mr. W. L. Corbett, Mr. Russell, Mr. T. H. B. Patterson, Mr. Gilpin, Mr. Hopkins, Mr. J. M. Bailey, Mr. J. W. F. White and Mr. A. A. Purman present the following reasons for their vote, viz:

1. The example of the Constitutional Convention of 1837-38 is against unnecessary adjournments; that body having sat on the fourth day of July, on Christmas day, on New Year's day and on the twenty-second of February, when it adjourned.

2. That as Washington was distinguished for his steady, untiring devotion to the performance of every duty, public and private, it would seem that the fittest way for this Convention to honor his memory would be to remain in session on his birthday, as on other days, giving attention to the discharge of the public duties for which it is assembled.

3. That as the State is at considerable expense for every day during which the sessions of the Convention are prolonged, whether any business is transacted or not, this fact should induce the Convention to remain in actual working session on every day when there does not exist a public necessity for an adjournment.

MALCOLM HAY,
J. W. F. WHITE,
WM. HOPKINS,
WM. L. CORBETT,
JOHN GILPIN,
W. H. SMITH,
S. S. RUSSELL,
T. H. BAIRD PATTERSON,
A. A. PURMAN,
JOHN M. BAILEY.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: I would like to add my name to that paper.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. President: I move that the document be referred to the Committee on the Bill of Rights.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would state that the reasons which have been submitted by the gentleman for their vote yesterday, in regard to the question of adjournment, are not referable to any committee. The rules of the Convention require them to be entered upon the Journal.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I desire to say that the resolution to adjourn over until Monday—which was adopted by the Convention—assigned no reason for the adjournment, and I think that the reasons of members for voting against the adjournment are entirely unnecessary.

Mr. HAY. Mr. President: The rules which the Convention has adopted are explicit in stating that any member of the Convention can submit, in writing, the reasons which have influenced his vote upon any particular question, and they can then be entered upon the Journal.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. President: I would like to inquire whether, as a matter of right, the reasons for the votes of these particular members upon this question of adjournment can be entered upon the Journal.

THE THIRTY-THIRD RULE.

The PRESIDENT. The thirty-third rule of the Convention will be read for the information of the members.

The CLERK read as follows:

"The yeas and nays of the delegates, on any question, shall, at the desire of any two of them, be entered on the Journals; and the delegates shall have a right to insert the reasons of their votes on the Journal."

Mr. T. H. B. PATTERSON. Mr. President: I rise for the purpose of asking permission to make an explanation in reference to the paper containing the reasons of certain gentlemen of this Convention for the vote which they gave yesterday, upon the question of the adjournment of the Convention until Monday. The Clerk read the name of Mr. Patterson as one of the signers. There are two Mr. Pattersons in the Convention, and I would like him to mention which Mr. Patterson it is, because I voted against adjourning over until Monday, on account of the twenty-second of February—Washington's birth-day.

The CLERK. The name is T. H. B. Patterson.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. President: I move the subject be laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that there is really no proposition before the Convention. Rule thirty-three gives every member the right to enter the reasons for his vote upon the Journal. In the exercise of this right certain gentlemen of the Convention have presented their reasons for their vote upon the question of adjournment yesterday, and in the opinion of the Chair no other disposition can be made of the matter except to enter them upon the Journal unless the Convention absolutely refuse to permit this course to be taken.

Mr. MANTOR. Mr. President: I would like to inquire whether the reasons of a member for his vote upon a particular question can be given verbally.

The PRESIDENT. They must be in writing, in order to be entered upon the Journal.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. President: How long after the vote is taken?

The PRESIDENT. The rule does not say.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: I ask the unanimous consent of the Convention to sign that paper as containing my reasons for the vote I gave, along with the other signers.

["No." "No." "No." "No."]

RESTRICTING LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DeFRANCE. Mr. President: I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That this Convention will hereafter grant leave of absence from its sessions to none of its members, except in case of the sickness of members or their families.

On the question to proceed to a second reading and consideration of the resolution, it was not agreed to.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BOYD asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Huusicker until next Tuesday.

COMMITTEE ON SALARIES.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. President: I move that the Convention proceed to the second reading and consideration of the resolution I offered on the 4th inst., respecting an alteration of the rules of the Convention by the appointment of another committee.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The CLERK read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules of the Convention be amended, by adding an additional committee, as follows: "No. 28. A Committee of seven on Salaries, Fees and Compensation of Officers, State and County."

On the question to proceed to a second reading and consideration of the resolution, a division was called, and it was determined in the negative, less than a majority of a quorum voting in the affirmative.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the substitute for the section offered by the gentleman from Centre, (Mr. M'Allister,) which the Clerk will read.

The CLERK read:

"All elections of citizens shall be by ballot; every ballot voted shall be numbered in the order in which it is received, and the number recorded by the election officers opposite the name of the elector who presents the ballot; each elector shall endorse his name upon the ballot, or cause it to be endorsed thereon and attested by another elector of the district, who shall not be an election officer: Provided, The oath of the election officer shall require secrecy as to the contents of every ballot cast at the election."

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: I rise to suggest a verbal correction. I move to strike out "provided that," and insert "and" in the place thereof.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: As there seems to be a very slim attendance I move that further consideration of this question be postponed.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order. The section may be voted down and taken up again at another time.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman: This committee will bear me witness that however much I may have been afflicted with cacoethes loquendi on other subjects I have not troubled them with any expression of views upon the question now pending, which has been largely discussed, and I do not know that I should do it now, if it were not presented to us in the peculiar form which seems to require and challenge from every member here a review and re-consideration of the opinions which he has formed upon this subject. This section was originally acted upon by this committee, and by a majority of the committee it was rejected. It has occurred, however, to one gentleman, after reflection, subsequent to that vote, although the discussion had been large and general, to move a re-consideration and recall the question to the attention of the committee, and ask them to adopt that which he, with a majority of the committee, had previously rejected.

Now, sir, with regard to this question, I have a clear, fixed and settled opinion. I am decidedly opposed to the change which is contemplated by this provision, yet I should not have intruded my opinions upon this committee had it not, as I said before, been for the peculiar form, and under the peculiar circumstances, in which it is presented. We are now about to depart from the practice and traditions of this Commonwealth which have existed from the day of its first foundation, aye, sir, from the time when its foundations as a province, were laid by Penn himself. We are now about to withdraw from the citizens of this State the privilege which they have enjoyed, for many generations, of depositing their ballots and exercising the elective franchise, without question by any person, and without the right of any man to inquire into the manner in which they have discharged their duty. I am opposed to the innovation. I do not concede, sir, that there is sufficient reason given why this long practice of the people of this Commonwealth should be broken in upon and destroyed, and why we should introduce here a new practice, which, however it may be disguised, under the style and form of words in which it is couched, is nothing more or less than the destruction of the right of the private ballot. What is there which should induce us to depart from the practice of one hundred and fifty years? What call has come up to us from the people of this State asking us to make this change? What cause can be assigned for it that is inherent in or connected with the exercise, use or employment of the vote by ballot, as we have heretofore used and employed it? I have listened in vain for any sufficient reason. It is said that it is necessary to make this change in order to defeat frauds at elections; that it is necessary to impose upon the great mass of the honest electors of this Commonwealth a provision which is intended to protect a certain other portion from frauds, which they are perfectly competent to protect themselves from if they exercise the power and the rights which are vested in them by the Constitution and the laws; but you, for the sake of throwing a shield over them, will impose a burden upon the great mass of the honest electors of this Commonwealth, whose exercise of the right has not been and cannot be impeached.

Mr. Chairman, this matter of frauds at elections has been talked of here at such length as, to use a phrase with regard to it that was used with regard to another thing, and with a great deal more justice, I apprehend, that it has become "loathsome." Sir, the right of election should be guarded and protected, and we should have pure elections, but it is not necessary, in order to obtain these, that we should subvert all the foundations upon which this government rests. This right of election, by secret ballot, has been the guard of human liberty in every struggle to attain and secure the inalienable right of man to its possession. It has been the cry of all those who are aspiring to the exercise of equal political rights in all nations, and the example of this country has been held up throughout the world as a proof that this right is necessary for, and runs parallel with, the enjoyment of human rights and human liberties everywhere. At this very time, sir, the men who are struggling to release themselves from the bondage which has been imposed upon them by ancient traditions and ancient institutions, are the men who are calling for the right of suffrage by secret ballot; and it is the unanimous demand of these men throughout the world that this right should be accorded to them, and the example of this country has been the example to which they have appealed for proof that they should be admitted to the exercise of this right, and that it was the sure guarantee of their welfare and of their freedom. Now, sir, we are called upon to take steps backwards; we are called upon to reverse all the precedents which have been set for us in our history, and we are called upon to say to these men, who are struggling for the attainment of their rights, that this has all been a mistake; that the right of the secret ballot is not a right but a wrong, and that to confer it upon them would not be a blessing but an injury. That is what we are about to decide by the vote which shall be taken on this section, if it is decided in the affirmative.

I cannot consent to admit that proposition. I do not believe that it is essential to the enjoyment of the power of franchise, that this right of voting by ballot should be taken away from the citizens of this State. I believe that it will be a great wrong done to the great body of the people by demanding that they should submit to the restrictions proposed to be imposed upon them by the provision now under consideration. Why, sir, it is a fact known to all who live in the rural districts of this State, that the great difficulty is to get a most valuable class of our citizens to exercise the right of suffrage. They are men who do not like to be put to the trouble of doing it; it requires an effort to get them to the polls; and now you are about to impose upon them a burden and a restriction additional to that which has hitherto been imposed upon them, and one which will have still more the effect of inducing them to decline to attend your elections and to withdraw the expression of their opinions through the ballot-box, which is so important to the well ordering and good government of this Commonwealth.

This matter has been spoken of at length by the gentleman from Lancaster, (Mr. Carter,) and I shall not further dilate upon it; but it is a fact, in the experience of the country, that this is so. It will be held to be a burden upon these men, which they will reject, if it is attempted to be imposed upon them.

Mr. Chairman, if this matter were essential, in my judgment, to the enjoyment of a pure right of suffrage, I would vote for it, even under all these circumstances and conditions; but I do not think it is. There are provisions which have been proposed by this Committee on Suffrage, and there may be others, for all I know, yet to be proposed by them, which, I think, will be sufficient and adequate to attain the purpose which, I presume, we all have in view. These provisions consist of various matters of detail, some of which we have adopted already. We have adopted the tax restriction, which that committee rejected, and although there was great difference of opinion with regard to that, I stood by it because I believe it is a just and valuable restriction. We have imposed, also, a restriction which tends in the direction of purity, with regard to the time that shall elapse before papers of naturalization shall be used; and many resisted that wholesome restriction who are contending for this. There are other restrictions, among which is the proposal to reduce the number of voters in any election precinct. This I consider a valuable restriction, and one which ought to be supported. If it is adopted it will take away a great many, if not entirely remove all, the objections which are interposed here against the secret ballot, and are used as an argument for the passage of the pending proposition. In large precincts, in the thickly populated districts, like those in the city of Philadelphia, of course it is impossible to know all the men who come to vote, personally. One gentleman in this city told me that he lived in one of its best wards, and when a man was nominated by his own party for a member of the Legislature he did not know, and he could not find a friend who could inform him who the man was for whom they called upon him to vote. But it is not so in the country, by any means, and if this reduction of the number of persons entitled to vote in any election precinct is made, then the knowledge of the voters will be communicated to the election officers, and there will be no difficulty with regard to false personations, or with regard to the alteration of the ballots after they have been orderly deposited in the ballot-box.

I hold that the secret ballot is a protection to the voters. There is a class of voters in this State who ought to have protection. It is not enough to say here that in this State it is not necessary, although it may be necessary in Great Britain. It is just as necessary, and just as likely to become still more necessary, than it is in that kingdom. It will not do for gentlemen to say that the employees rule their employers in the State of Pennsylvania. The time has not yet come here, more than anywhere else, that labor has obtained the ascendancy over capital; nor is that time going to arrive, if the present policy of this Commonwealth is to be continued, and capital shall continue to be accumulated in great masses in the hands of artificial and irresponsible bodies. The power and weight of that influence is to be brought to bear upon the ballot-box. Nor is it sufficient that I should be told that there are rules in these artificial bodies which prohibit their ministering servants from interfering with the right of election. I do not care whether such rules exist now or not, but this I say: That when the time comes, when it shall be expedient that that power should be exercised, it will be brought to bear with unsparing force upon the employees of these corporations. The right of voting by ballot is the badge of republican freedom, and I will not consent, under the circumstances in which we stand, and under the circumstances which appear to be drawing near to us, that that protection which it has thrown around the right of suffrage by the citizen shall be withdrawn, at least so far as my vote goes.

There is a question of expediency here; the public sentiment of the interior of this State, I am satisfied in my mind, is and will be opposed to the introduction of this provision into the Constitution, and by doing it you jeopardize the success of your entire work and jeopardize it, sir, because the people will not sustain the provision, and not only will there be a direct opposition to it, but the parties who are opposed to certain other provisions which may be introduced into this instrument, will be sagacious enough to bring their strategic tactics to bear upon the rejection of the Constitution by the use of this provision as a weapon by which to kill it. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. Chairman: I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment now pending.

The CLERK read: "Provided this article shall apply only to cities of thirty thousand inhabitants or upwards; but any county of a like number of inhabitants, by vote of the majority of its qualified electors in favor thereof, at any general election, may have the same applied to its locality, and the same notice is to be given of the taking of said vote by the sheriff of the county, on the written requisition of fifty electors of said county, as given of the general election."

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. Chairman: From the discussion that has been had upon this subject, it is evident that there is a great difference of opinion upon the question pending, and if we are to get a vote which shall be ratified by the people of this State there must be some concessions. If the gentlemen will notice the amendment I have offered, they will see that it contemplates a solution of the question to which all might agree. I propose to apply this writing of the names upon the ballot now to cities of thirty thousand and upwards; and the amendment further provides, that any county of a like number of inhabitants may subsequently require this article to be applied to their localities, by vote of the majority of its citizens in favor thereof, taken at any general election, of which vote the same notice is to be given as of the general election by the sheriff, upon the requisition of fifty electors of that district.

Now this leaves it in such a shape that every county in the State, if it chooses, may have this provision applied to itself by a vote upon this question. Then we shall avoid this difficulty that has been spoken of, and which I believe to exist, namely: That the rural and agricultural counties of the State do not need and will not accept this requisition. The cities may require it. I am not prepared to say that they do not. There is, however, a division of sentiment through the State. Why attempt to force public sentiment on the subject? Why attempt to force upon one locality or another a provision which they are not prepared to accept? Now, sir, I would not deprive the city of Philadelphia or any other city in the Commonwealth of the benefit of this provision, if they need it, and at the same time I do not want them to force it upon my county or my district, because I know that the people are not in favor of it. Upon this point I concur most fully with the utterances of my friend from Tioga (Mr. Niles) yesterday. I am satisfied, from the expression of the people and of their press, although these I consider merely as an expression of the editors, that the agricultural portions of this State do not want and will not have this provision, compelling them to write their names upon their ballots. I concur very fully also with the remarks which have just been made by the gentleman from York (Mr. Cochran) upon this subject, and will not therefore repeat them. Now will not this proposition answer the difficulty in the minds of the gentlemen who are in favor of this proposition? Does it not afford a fair intermediate ground where we can meet upon this question and settle it fairly? The amendment was hastily drawn and may not be entirely perfect. If so it can be corrected; but it seems evident to me that there must be some concession on this subject. I consider the remarks of the gentleman from York, (Mr. Cochran,) expressive of the opinions and views of the agricultural districts of this State in relation to this matter, correct, and that we will hazard the results of our entire labor here by the adoption of a provision which shall force upon the rural districts the necessity of writing their names upon their ballots. I ask the gentlemen to look at this for a moment candidly. Let them not be led away by any excitement of feeling engendered by the discussion. Let us be fair to all portions of the State. Without multiplying words, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the proposition as I have submitted it—amended, perhaps, somewhat in detail—might meet the difficulty, and ought to be satisfactory.

Mr. PUGHE. Mr. Chairman: I do not intend to take up the time of this Convention with any remarks upon this question, as it has been so ably and so well discussed; but I have listened with a good deal of attention to the arguments from those gentlemen who urge this proviso: "That the elector, when he votes, shall place his name upon his ballot." I look upon it, sir, as an infringement upon the rights of the people, and for this reason—among others—that there has never been one single petition presented to this Convention asking for such a change. As the distinguished gentlemen from York (Mr. Cochran) remarked, this system of voting by secret ballot has been carried on in this State for one hundred and fifty years, and it has worked well; and the only reason that gentlemen can give for the adoption of any other system is to prevent fraud. I tell you, sir, that the professional ballot-box stuffer, notwithstanding all the provisions that we can adopt, can commit fraud just as easily as now, by simply writing a name upon the ballot. Take, for instance, a ward in which all are of one party—the judge of election, the inspectors and the clerks—and I have seen it at home, in my own city. What difference does it make? Why, probably upon the registry list there are four hundred names, but, sir, there are twelve hundred votes cast. How is it done? Why, by writing upon the tally list such names as Daniel Archibald, Biddle M'Alpine, Seth Stoke, Timothy Barney, or any other name. Then the ballots are put into the box to correspond. Can they not do it? And can they not write these names upon the ballot, and deposit the ballot in the box and number it? This expedient will not prevent fraud. The great trouble, sir, with fraud in this city is the lavish use of money in elections, and that is the fault of those men who give their money so freely at such times—to debauch and demoralize the working men. I know of one Congressman in my district that spent seventeen thousand dollars—in the county of Luzerne—to be elected to Congress.

I know another gentleman that was nominated a delegate at large on one of the tickets; that was a gentleman who lives in our county, who was assessed, by the county committee, twenty-five hundred dollars, and by the State committee twenty-five hundred, making five thousand dollars, for the privilege of running as a delegate at large to this Convention. Where does this money go to? To debauch and demoralize the citizens of the State. Immediately after the Convention is held in the county, the county committees of both parties come to the city of Philadelphia, and want money, and why? To demoralize and buy up votes. That is what they want. It would be just as well as this written or open ballot to put in such a proviso as this: "That every voter should provide himself with a monogram, cut in brass or nickel, and stamp his ballot with said monogram, in green or red wax;" and then it would be known certainly that it is his ballot.

I believe, sir, that every corporation and capitalist in this State is desirous that this should pass, because then they would hold over those that worked for them the very power to compel them to vote as they want them to. If you want an open ballot; if you want your name impressed upon the ballot, or written upon it, let it be the same as the English system. That is more noble, more manly. When a man steps up to the hustings there, and they ask his name and he gives it, they then ask him: "Who do you vote for?" He replies: "I vote for William E. Gladstone," or whoever he may prefer. The working classes of England, however, and of France, and of all other countries, have looked to America as a model, and have been struggling to get for their own countries the very thing—the secret ballot—that we want now to sweep away.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the Clerk was in error as to the question to be voted on. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Susquehanna (Mr. Turrell) to withdraw his amendment for the present.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I have not said anything, thus far, upon this question, neither in its present shape nor in its former one. The reason I have not, is not because I have not a decided opinion, but because I could not see that there was any danger of this Convention passing anything that seems to me so monstrous as the destruction of the secret ballot—the right of every individual to vote wholly without regard to the intentions or power of other people. I do not yet think or believe that it will ever become part of the voting system of the State, and I am satisfied that the people will not permit it. We may pass it. We may put it into the Constitution, but if we do not submit it to a separate vote of the people it will carry down the whole work of the Convention, and if we do submit it to a separate vote, it will itself go down.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is said that this provision, once placed in the Constitution, will cure all election frauds in the State. The gentleman who has just taken his seat has clearly shown that as a means of preventing frauds it will be wholly ineffectual. What, I would like to know, is to prevent a repeater from providing himself with fifty ballots, all of them attested in the same manner required by this provision in the Constitution, and voting every one of them? What is to hinder the repeater from committing the frauds in this manner, because it is only by the connivance of some election officers that these frauds can be perpetrated at all, and they can connive at the counting of one hundred and fifty names or tickets, and all of them duly attested by the persons who present them. Where then does this provision provide a remedy for this evil? Instead of providing a means of detecting these frauds, I consider that it affords a better opportunity to bad men, both inside and outside the election board, to perpetrate the frauds in a systematic manner. The gentleman who last addressed the Convention (Mr. Pughe) pointed out a means whereby the provision will be rendered more effectual than it is now; but I have devised a plan which will make this a perfect voting machine, and I will submit it to the chairman of the Committee on Elections, and I know he will accept it, because it is so perfect. Now the committee do not mean to submit to the people a voting system that is even intended to be practically enforced. What they contemplate is a perfect one on paper, and one which can be pointed to as being absolutely perfect, but so perfect as to be wholly impracticable.

There was a dutchman once, Mr. Chairman, who was a watchmaker in the old country, and he proposed to make a watch that should be a piece of absolute perfection. So, after twenty years of constant work, he succeeded in making it, and every one who looked at it said it was perfect. All the mechanical and different societies before who it was exhibited pronounced the watch absolutely perfect, but when the old dutchman came to start it he found it would not go. And why? Because he had made it so perfect that it was not adapted to this world at all. And such will be the fate of this perfect voting machine which the Committee on Election have constructed. Now I desire to point out to the chairman of the committee, and I ask his attention for a moment, a provision which I have drawn up in order that this machine may be absolutely perfect. If I can obtain his attention for a moment I will read it, and I know he will accept it, for it will commend itself at once to his judgment, and it is entirely at his service. I shall not offer it myself, but he may and I am satisfied that he will. It reads as follows, Mr. Chairman:

"Provided, That before the ballot shall be cast it shall be acknowledged before a justice of the peace, or other officer authorized to acknowledge deeds, and shall be duly certified by such officer, and shall be recorded in the office for recording deeds in the proper city and county, and certified by the recorder under his seal of office."

Now when that provision is placed in the Constitution it will prevent, at once, all this personation in election frauds, and will make this voting system absolutely perfect, unless, indeed, it shall become necessary, which I do not believe, to have each vote certified by the justice of the peace or the alderman before whom the acknowledgment shall be taken. Seriously, Mr. Chairman, the provision which has been suggested by the chairman of the Election Committee, in lieu of the section which was voted down, will not prevent election frauds, and if it would it will only impose upon the people, where the evil does not exist, a burden that they will not take upon their shoulders, and to which they should not be asked to submit. What is the cause of all this evil about which we have heard so much in the Convention? I tell you, as has been said upon several occasions, that this evil is entirely unknown in the country districts. Why in my district there have not been five illegal votes cast in five years. There may have been votes cast under a mistake, it is true, but there have been no illegal votes deliberately cast for the purpose of committing an election fraud. The election frauds are limited entirely to the large cities of the State, and the cause of all the evil seems to be this:

In the large cities of the State the majority of the people are wholly unorganized; the bad men invariably form the minority of the people in all communities, are organized, and as is well known, an organized hundred men can always rule and overpower a thousand unorganized men. This is the whole secret of the success which has attended the perpetration of these frauds, and the blame must rest solely with the majority of the people, who have permitted them to be committed unrestrained, if not unrebuked. If the people of Philadelphia will allow themselves to be governed by an organized minority of bad men, no laws can remedy the evil. If they permit these frauds to be perpetrated they must suffer the consequences until they are forced to take the power in their own hands. If the majority in this country will not undertake to govern, the minority will, and that is precisely the trouble in our cities now. What, then, is the remedy? The gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr.

Temple,) who recently addressed the Convention, has most eloquently pointed out the remedy, and it is: To throw open the ballot to those whose mere glance will purify it. I wish I had the Debates up to this time, in which to read the glowing language of this gentleman when he pointed to this remedy for all your election evils. Sir, there is no pollution so foul or so corrupt but that the light of day and the eye of woman will render it pure.

Mr. RUNK. Mr. Chairman: I have already spoken twice upon the question now before this committee. Silently as I have voted upon every other question that has come before the Convention, and as I prefer to vote on every other question that shall come before the Convention, the extent and character of this debate has been such that I feel it my duty to express the sentiments I entertain in regard to the question now before the committee. I regret, exceedingly, that it seems to be the intention of a large portion of the Convention to insert in the Constitution which we propose to submit to the people of this State, a provision which shall interfere with and restrict the free exercise of the elective franchise. It is upon the freedom and extent of this right that the characteristic distinction of the American form of government depends, and it is upon the freedom with which this right of franchise is exercised, that depends the doctrine contained in the Declaration of Independence, that "all men are born free and equal." The humblest man in our country, when permitted to exercise the untrammelled freedom of the ballot, feels that he is the equal of the wealthiest citizen who holds the highest position in the nation's gift or who revels in all the luxuries of society. Whatever shall tend to diminish the right of the humblest citizen to exercise the privilege of the elective franchise, or in any other respect shall, at all times, receive my most cordial and determined disapprobation. I apprehend that it is not pretended by the distinguished gentlemen of this committee who advocate this provision of the Committee on Elections, that it does not hinder or restrict the freedom of the exercise of the elective franchise, and it is because, in my humble judgment, this will be the effect of its adoption that I have already voted twice in this Convention against the proposition; and I shall continue to raise my voice and cast my vote in disapprobation of a provision, which, if submitted to the people, may imperil the whole work of the Convention. These frauds, about which we have heard so much complaint, are committed by the parasites of society, and not by the honest voters of our communities.

But they are perpetrated by those men who depend for their subsistence upon the contributions of gentlemen of medium wealth, and of extensive wealth in society. Why, sir, you know, and this Convention knows, that, but a few years ago, we had paraded before the people of this country the fact that one citizen of this government had contributed the sum of $40,000 00 to carry an election in this country. Was that for the purpose of an honest election, or was it a contribution to sustain the parasites upon society who perpetrate the extensive frauds of which we have heard so much in this Convention? I happy to say, sir, that the gentleman, who is alleged to have contributed this large sum, now no longer revels in the wealth of which he then boasted. I believe that the remedy for the evils complained of in this Convention, and especially by the members from this city, lies not in the conversion of the gentlemen who perpetrate these frauds to be honest and upright citizens, but that it lies in an entirely different direction. We may legislate in vain. We may prepare Constitution after Constitution on the morals of the gentleman who prepared these frauds, and it will all be in vain. It is not by introducing into this Convention a provision that the honest voter shall write upon his ticket his name before he shall be allowed to deposit his vote in the ballot-box, that we shall remedy the frauds that are now complained of. But it is by placing in the room, and as members of the board, honest and upright citizens. I have been appealed to, Mr. Chairman, by a gentleman of this city, in whose ability, whose learning, and in whose integrity I have the highest confidence, and with whom, when he asked me to vote in a particular way, when it did not contravene my consciousness of right, I would most cheerfully and most cordially concur and comply. But when he asks me to vote for a restriction upon the freedom of the elective franchise I cannot comply with that, because I believe that, in doing so, I would disfranchise thousands of the honest voters of this State, simply to comply with his request, or to defeat the action of the few who, in my own judgment, necessarily control the election districts of this city, and of this State, so far as the preparation of frauds are concerned.

Do you, Mr. Chairman, do you, gentlemen of this Convention, believe that the gigantic frauds that are perpetrated in this city are perpetrated by the thousands of honest voters here? Is it the laboring man; is it the poor man, whose only hope of private success and support is his family depend upon what he can earn to-day; is it they who perpetrate these gigantic frauds? No, sir, Mr. Chairman. No, sir, gentlemen of this committee, it is not they; it is not the poor man; it is not the mechanic, who makes the workshops of this city, and who makes the results of these workshops the glory of this city and of this State; it is not he, and it is not they who perpetrate the gigantic frauds of which we have heard ad nauseam in this Convention. It is the parasites, as I said, upon society. It is the man who depends, not upon his own exertions, but who lives upon the contributions of the medium class, and the wealthy of this city who contribute their thousands to an election fund to defraud the honest voters of this Commonwealth. It is there where the evil lies, and it will be only when we reach that point and strike at the contributions of these large election funds that we shall begin to attain a point where we shall begin to reform the disgrace of the ballot-box, and the corruption and the infamy of the dishonest men who are now alleged to control it. Why, sir, we have had here the statement by gentlemen who seem to entertain as their pet remedy for all the evils which inflict society a proposition that if we shall wipe out from the statutes of our State, the provisions by which the men who fill the row offices and who fill other positions in society, are compensated by a system of fees, we shall have attained the acme in the reformation of society, so far as the ballot-box is concerned.

I have no pet remedy. I have no proposition to lay before this Convention, which will act as a universal panacea to purify the morals of every gentleman that may appear at the ballot-box to deposit his vote. But I trust that this Convention will adopt as a part of its provisions that in this city, and in other large cities, the precincts shall be confined to the number of two hundred voters, or any other reasonable number that may be suggested in the judgment of this Convention, wherein every honest voter who shall appear at the polls shall know and be able to tell to the honest voters and officers, who fill the board of election, whether a man who appears there and offers his vote is an honest voter and entitled to deposit the ballot which he offers. When you have arrived at that position, when you shall fill your offices of election with honest men, such as the distinguished gentleman who applied to me in strong tones to support the re-consideration of the vote by which this section was lost, and if he were in his seat, and it were proper, I would ask him the question whether he has ever filled an office on the election-board in his precinct. I say when you fill the boards of election with men of integrity, with such as fill almost every seat within the circle around me, it will then be that you will provide a remedy that shall remove from the city and from the State the corruptions that now inflict the ballot-box, as completely and as certainly as the morning sun dispels the dews of the morning. Until that period arrives—until you fill your election boards with honest men, with men of courage, such as sit before me—you will legislate in vain. You may pass Constitution after Constitution and you will not have attained the result that is desired by this Convention. When you adopt the principle that has been reported, "that in large cities the precincts shall be composed of not more than two hundred citizens," when every man who goes to the polls shall be known to the election officer, and when you shall fill that board with men of integrity, like those who sit at my right, and in my front, and at my left, then, sir, you will have taken a step in the right direction of reform. Then you will institute—you will have initiated—the reforms which are desirable and which are effective to sweep from your city and from your State the frauds and the corruptions that now threaten our free and our grand institutions. Until then, Mr. Chairman—until then, gentlemen of this Convention—you will not have attained the purpose that you desire. I care not, though you introduce into your Constitution all the plans that have been proposed in correction of this evil.

[Here the time of the gentleman from Lehigh expired. Being extended by a vote of the committee, Mr. Runck resumed.]

Mr. Chairman: This proposition which is under consideration would be a restriction upon the right of the honest and the poor man, who is to vote according to his judgment. It will interfere with the freedom that he has enjoyed for the last two centuries, and yet it will not reach the evils that are now so prevalent, the evils of fraudulent elections and corruption at the ballot-box.

I am profoundly sensible, Mr. Chairman, of the honor shown me by this committee in extending my time. The best appreciation that I can give of the confidence of this House, is to yield the floor, because I am impatient, as is every other member of this Convention, to reach the end of this discussion, and to legislate wisely and well upon the subject pending before us.

Mr. BEEBE. Mr. Chairman: I do not desire to prolong the debate a single moment. But it seems to me that if there is a disposition on the part of the advocates of this measure to offer a legitimate legislation which shall be approved by the people of this State in the organic law, that they will vote for this amendment. The city of Philadelphia urges that the whole basis of this action is for the purification of elections in Philadelphia. This amendment proposes to give to Philadelphia, and to any other cities, all that they desire. It has been alleged here that this would be special legislation. I ask if we have not a committee raised in this House to report upon the necessities of cities in those things of which we know little in the country, so that we may incorporate into the organic law in relation to these matters such principles as are necessitated by the peculiar character of cities?

What can we of the rural districts say to our constituents if we shall vote down a proposition of this kind which gives to Philadelphia all that she asks, and which leaves us all that we desire? I certainly cannot see why any member upon this floor should fail to give his sanction to this amendment; and it strikes me, reasoning from my standpoint, that it would be a perverse inclination to thwart the will of what might now be called the minority of this Convention if we should fail to do so.

It has been well said by the gentleman last upon the floor (Mr. Runck) that the frauds that have been practiced do not come from the voter, but that they come from the leaders, from the ballot-boxes, and from the boards controlling your elections. As the gentlemen remarked, I wish to say again, as I said in substance the other day, that we cannot place that in the organic law which will control this matter until the public sentiment of the community is aroused as it is now being aroused, and I wish, right here, to say that I have more hope for this nation, in reference to the purification of the ballot-box, and the body politic from the present condition of that body politic than from any legislation whatever. General Sherman, in issuing his celebrated notice to the inhabitants of the city of Atlanta, when they complained of it, said to them, "war is cruelty." He might have added, if the circumstances had required it, "war is demoralization." All over this country, from the largest gatherings of population down to every four-cross-roads, this demoralization grew up under the peculiar conditions which the war involved. These conditions led in a large measure, to the present condition of things; but, sir, the sun is rising upon us. Public sentiment is awakening, and is determined to purify the whole matter. Two years ago an investigation into the matter of the Credit Mobilier would have been laughed at by the parties interested in it. Is it so to-day?

Why, sir, even in the city of New York, when the first effort was put forth to purify the city of its corruptions, and to arouse public sentiment when every other means had failed, the men wielding this influence, the men having the money, and who had been guilty of the corruption, putting faith in what had been successful before, laughed to scorn the idea of investigation; but, sir, the uprising of that public sentiment has degraded, as a criminal, a man who thought he stood high in national power, and in controlling the national destinies of a national party. Recent instances occurring in this city of Philadelphia show that the same uprising is taking place here. Taking the view of this matter that I do, believing that it is of the people, and that the time has come, I do not see why this Convention, in its zeal, in the heat of debate and in the excitement of the occasion, should put upon the five or six hundred thousand honest voters of this district, for years to come, that which trammels their ability to exercise the elective franchise.

I trust, therefore, that both sides of this question will see the propriety of adopting, in substance, the amendment of the gentleman from Susquehanna, or, at least, that part of it which restricts this to cities of thirty thousand inhabitants.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: If the arguments advanced by a number of delegates on this floor in opposition to the amendment to the Constitution, that has been suggested by the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, are to be believed, there was no necessity for calling this Convention—no necessity whatever.

We hear gentlemen very blandly tell us—gentlemen that are optionists—that everything is going on very well. One gentleman will roll his hands and say that there have been “slight irregularities” in the city of Philadelphia; and another one will say there has been “a little wrong,” and that the only difficulty is that the intelligent gentlemen of Philadelphia do not act as election officers.

Mr. Chairman, unless there is some reform in the elective system of this State, no intelligent or honest man in the city of Philadelphia will ever be permitted to exercise such an office. We are powerless. I beg the gentlemen to consider one moment how this city is governed. The election officers are appointed by the board of aldermen composed of but one political party. They control the election officers. The citizens do not appoint the election officers. The citizens of Philadelphia have no right to go to their polling places, as people do in the country, and determine who shall be their election officers. The election officers in this city are appointed by a class of men fraudulently elected and fraudulently returned for no other purpose under Heaven than to control the ballot-box fraudulently; and it is idle for gentlemen from the country to say that we should look to this, for there is a restriction upon our action that prevents us from either looking to it or from curing it in any manner whatever. This Convention was called for a great purpose.

It was called to correct the tide of corruption now sweeping over the land. Nine out of every ten of the honest citizens of this State believed that this tide of corruption has risen to such a height that if something was not done to arrest it the whole fabric of the government would be involved in one common ruin. The greatest evil we have to contend with is open, glaring, notorious impurity of elections—consisting of stuffing ballot-boxes with hundreds of fraudulent ballots before the very eyes of the people, the perpetrators of the crime boasting of it afterwards as something to be proud of, not only boasting of it, but exhibiting to the public gaze, and glorying in the shame that exhibits it, the checks drawn by prominent citizens of this city to pay for the fraud that arrested the rights of the freeman from the honest people of the Commonwealth.

Mr. RUNK. Mr. Chairman: I should like to ask the gentleman whether all that could not be corrected if the amendment referred to by me should be adopted—that the people of the respective election precincts shall choose their own election officers, and elect, say, such gentlemen as the gentleman (Mr. Gowen) himself?

Mr. GOWEN. My modesty prevents me from saying what would happen if I were myself to be a member of the election board. I cannot, therefore, answer that part of the gentleman's (Mr. Runk's) question; but I can answer the first part by saying that, no matter how you may require the people of the several election districts to choose their own election officers, unless you permit the people to put a mark on their ballots, so that they can identify them, the will of the people will be set aside by ballot-box stuffers. We are not in the same position as the gentlemen in the country. If we go to the polls, with the view of electing the purest and best men in this city to preside at the polls and conduct the election, when the election is over we shall find that our ballots have been thrown out, and fraudulent ballots put in their places, by the custodians of the ballot-box, for the avowed purpose of defeating the will of the people.

It will not do for gentlemen in the country to say that this is something which affects us only. It affects them equally. The elections of the honest people in the country districts have been, time and again, set aside, nullified and wiped out of existence, by the purchased certificate of an election return, paid for to a forger in the city of Philadelphia.

I believe, from my residence for a long time in the centre of the State of Pennsylvania, I have as thorough a knowledge of the country people of this State, and as high an appreciation of their integrity as any member on this floor. I believe when these gentlemen from the country districts say this amendment will be voted down they misunderstand the feeling of their own constituents. There is no better class of people under Heaven than the simple-minded, old-fashioned people of the rural districts of the State of Pennsylvania. If you should come into the city with the wand of an angel and sweep away all the people here, and transplant six hundred thousand people from the centre of Pennsylvania to take their places, we would have purity of elections, until the corrupting influences that have heretofore destroyed that purity shall, in the course of two or three generations, have left their blighting marks upon the new population; for we cannot help admitting the bitter truth that—

And Honor sinks where Commerce long prevails.”

The difficulty in this city is that we have no power to help ourselves, and if the gentlemen from the country will not help us, then our elections will be set aside and taken for naught by the very act of the people here who, they say, should help themselves.

I was very sorry, sir, to hear the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) yesterday, allude to this question as a party matter. For my part, until the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Hunsicker) made his motion yesterday, on the floor of this Convention, I did not know that this motion to re-consider the vote was to be made at all. I thank the gentleman, (Mr. MacVeagh,) from the bottom of my heart, for the compliment he pays my party by assuming that it is the party in favor of this amendment; but on behalf of very many honest, upright and intelligent members of this Convention who represent the same party with the gentleman from Dauphin, I have to deny his right to place them upon the other side. On behalf of many gentlemen who differ with me in politics, and who have the most earnest desire to bring about reform, I say to him that the party lash he cracks over their heads sounds harshly in their ears, and the excoiating mark that it leaves upon their shoulders will be resented whenever he attempts to apply it. The gentleman tells us that if we adopt this amendment we will raise against us enemies of great power throughout the State. “Enemies of great power!” I admit it. God knows it is true. Who are these enemies? Every ballot-box stuffer in the city of Philadelphia is its enemy. Every man who has derived a princely income from forging election returns will be its enemy. Every man who is a professed politician, and whose subsistence depends upon false election returns, is its open and avowed enemy. There are also very many gentle, simple minded, good-hearted, wealthy citizens, who contribute large sums of money to carry the election, knowing, perhaps, little but certainly caring less how it is to be used—these will be the enemies of this reform; and monied mediocrity will issue its feeble wail against any innovation upon the established usages of election districts.

Who will be its friends? Every man who feels that when he casts his vote it should not be taken away from him by substituting in its place the vote of some one else, who had no right to deposit it, will be its friend. Every honest voter of the city of Philadelphia who desires his vote to be counted will be its friend. Every man who honestly desires purity of election, who wants the will of the people, as expressed at the ballot-box, to be the law of the land, will be its friend. And if there are parties, the party lines will be drawn between these two. If there are parties, one will be the party in favor of reform, and the other will be the party in favor of corruption. If there is any party in favor of this question, certainly the party in favor of it cannot be charged with being the party in favor of corruption.

We want purity of elections. How will this reform bring it about? Simply by placing upon the ballot the name of the person who casts it, signed either by himself or by some one who attests it, so that when the contest comes up in the court, the ballot can be followed into the ballot-box and identified. The gentleman (Mr. Pughe) who spoke this morning, and said that repeaters could put into the box fifty ballots, signed with other people's names, forgets that when names are forged in that manner, the forgery can readily be detected.

I have heard no argument on this floor against this, except these two. The first is that it will not suit the convenience of the public—that is, that it is better to have impurity of elections than to ask the public to take a little trouble. I do not believe in that argument. I do not believe that that argument can be sustained. I do not believe that the honest people of this State, whether they live in Philadelphia or in the country, will be averse to taking the little trouble that is necessary to identify their ballots. I believe they will do it cheerfully, gladly, eagerly and willingly, and that they will lend all their influence and assistance to stop this tide of corruption.

The second argument is this: That the people of the State will reject the Constitution if we put this in. Now there are certainly enough delegates in this Convention opposed to this amendment to insist upon its being submitted as a separate article, and whether the people reject it or not, we shall have done our duty. Is there any harm, then, in permitting us to submit it to the people, with the request that they vote upon it separately? We must be bound by the will of the people. If they reject the new scheme we will not be to blame; but if we refuse to submit it to them, upon the ground that they would reject it, and it should afterwards appear that they would have adopted it, we will be blamed for not giving them the opportunity of rescuing themselves and their posterity from corruption.

MR. MACVEAGH. MR. Chairman: I did not suppose that anybody's memory was so very short as the unfortunate memory of my friend from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen.) It is but a few hours since I stated twice, in order to avoid misunderstanding, that I had been informed that gentlemen sympathizing in political views with the gentleman from Philadelphia, had been urged to vote to re-consider this amendment, and that it was intended to do so without debate. I stated, also, most distinctly, that of course I did not mean, what everybody knew could not be the fact, that there were not gentlemen of equal earnestness of political views, belonging to each political party, who were upon both sides of this question. I stated it very distinctly, and supposed everybody had heard it. It is not the first time the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) has trusted to a memory which is not reliable. I remember one day he forgot his own words over night. In the hearing of the entire Convention he arose and denied one day what he had said a few days before.

MR. GOWEN. Will the gentleman give me leave to explain?

THE CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand the gentleman to be making any personal reflections.

MR. MACVEAGH. It is unwise, I submit, for a person with such an unreliable memory as the gentleman from Philadelphia, to possess or attempt to repeat what any other gentleman said the day before. I am very glad if any republicans have empowered that gentleman to be their champion. It is not a quarter to which I would have gone for such advocacy; but it was their privilege to go, and I have no objection to it, if any republican has really done so. I wish to say, further, that it is becoming difficult to know what lines of remark we are to be permitted to follow here. My friend from Schuylkill, (Mr. Bartholomew,) the other day, was so unfortunate as to use an illustration in his argument upon this very question. In speaking of the inadvisability of compelling every voter to write his name upon the ballot, he spoke of the possibility of a great corporation taking to itself the monopoly of one of the necessities of life, gathering to itself the ownership of vast estates, and suggested, especially, if it was mainly owned in a foreign country, that it might become the interest of that corporation to control an election of a township, or a county, of a municipality, or a Commonwealth.

I understood it to be objected, by the gentleman from Philadelphia, that it was not proper for any gentleman to allude to such a corporation. Now the same gentleman assumes to lecture me, because, yesterday, I told what I had heard, and appealed to the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) to desist, as he did desist, from stopping debate, to avoid misconstruction. Indeed, I disregarded the remarks of my friend behind me, (Mr. Walker,) and my friend to the left of me, (Mr. Knight,) who seemed to have heard the same suggestion, and to have believed it. I submit that I was, in no sense, assuming to crack a party whip over anybody. Indeed I expressly disavowed the idea of confounding the earnest gentlemen of one political party, who were divided, and come to be found upon both sides of this question, and the earnest gentlemen of the other political party, who were equally divided upon it.

I say now, however, that one of the great dangers of this movement is clearly indicated in the position of the gentleman from Philadelphia who has just spoken. He says that the party to which he belongs will gladly take upon itself the burden of the reform of our State affairs. I shall gladly join in that good work, and go as far as anybody else, but in no partisan sense. I certainly shall never say that every man who honestly desires reform will vote with me. I do not think such language becoming. I have never said in the presence of gentlemen here, certainly the peers of any gentlemen upon this floor—certainly in character, in experience, in position in the community, the peer of the gentleman himself. I have not assumed to say, even by implication, that they were not honestly in favor of reform unless they believed with me. I have heard the repetition of the phrase three or four times from the gentleman who last addressed the committee, that whoever is honestly desirous of purifying the ballot-box, will vote for this proposition and will support it. I say that is utterly untrue. The gentlemen who are opposing this compulsion to write the name of the voter upon the ballot, resent with indignation that is akin to contempt, the imputation of the gentleman that they are not as honestly and as sincerely for reform as any other gentlemen in this Convention. The gentleman also says that I spoke of the great interests that would be arrayed against our new Constitution; but he ought to have known, and he would have known, if his memory had not failed in the interval, that I said we would array great corporate interests against our new Constitution, and great interests in many walks of our diversified industry, and, therefore, I said it was unwise, by this provision, to create antagonism amongst the voters of the rural districts. Did I not say so? Is there a gentleman within the sound of my voice but the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Gowen,) with the unfortunate memory, who does not remember that I distinctly discriminated between the opposition that might be created by other reforms, and that which this reform would array against our work in the rural districts where voters would understand that it was the imposition of a burden, and of a quasi disqualification upon the honest and ascertained elector?

I intended to make that distinction very clearly. I think I did make it very clearly; and now I will tell you the reason why I think the hostility will not be found in the quarter where the gentleman supposed. It will not be among the corrupt politicians, either of the Fourth ward of this city or elsewhere, as he imagines. They are in favor of this proposition. If I am not mistaken one of the evils they desire to correct by this proposition is that certain nominal adherents of the great political parties of Philadelphia do not vote the regular ticket. Certain gentlemen in this city, as I understand it, have been charged for years with having cheated both of the great political parties here, and it is determined to have the opportunity of making each man put his name upon his ballot, so that if any member of either political party attempts to cheat his party leaders, he shall be singled out for vengeance, and possibly for violence. This is the reform which gentlemen from the country districts are asked to insert in the Constitution. This may account for a part, at least, of the eagerness outside of this Convention, which in certain portions of this city exists, for the passage of this provision. I can understand how it may be very important for certain politicians of this city or of any city to know how their henchmen vote. I can understand how a man who will now vote one way, if he is obliged to expose his ticket, will vote another; and while this provision does not go the entire length of the open vote, and does not gain the advantages that the open vote would gain, still it allows the politicians to know how each man votes; and, therefore, it will add to their power.

There is another ground of objection to it. The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) has announced to this Convention that it has been necessary to issue a positive order to the employees of the corporation he represents that they shall not interfere with our elections, or attempt to control the votes of their fellow-men. I do not know the terms of the order. It has not been laid before this Convention, but it has been stated by the chief executive officer of that corporation that such an order has been issued. What are the terms of it? Does it limit the right of the American citizen to his franchise or to his privilege of influencing his fellow-men? The one is as much a right as the other. If it was issued it must have had some justification. It is at least only charitable to make that supposition. Its justification must be, I suppose, in the fact that a power of this kind is too great to be exercised as the political liberties of other citizens are exercised, without restriction of any kind. If it simply means that they shall not be intimidated, which perhaps it does, then the very necessity of the order shows the danger of this method of voting. You are asked now, in the face of the avowal of the chief executive officer of a great corporation, that an order, defining the political rights of her employees, is necessary; you are asked, in the face of that avowal, to compel each employee of that corporation to put his name upon his ballot. In the interest of a true reform, in the interest of the purification of the ballot-box, in the interest of the independence of American citizens, I submit to you that the propositions are not compatible; either the order which the gentleman presented before this Convention was necessary, or the compulsion upon the voter to write his name upon his ballot is unwise. As my time has expired I leave the alternative I have mentioned to the judgment of the committee.

Mr. RUNK. Mr. Chairman: I think I stated, s'r, in my remarks that my action upon the section now pending before the Convention depended entirely upon my own conviction of right. I understood the gentleman from the city, at my left, (Mr. Gowen,) to state that a man who would vote for the report of a standing committee of the House was in favor of reform, and a man who would not vote for or support the proposition was not in favor of reform.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: May I interrupt the gentleman? If I said so I certainly did not intend it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from the city as making any personal reflections, but as speaking of the people outside of the Convention.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I said nothing about the members of the Convention; and when I spoke about the ballot-box stuffer in the city of Philadelphia, I meant no member of this Convention.

Mr. RUNK. Mr. Chairman: I understood the gentleman to say—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will take this opportunity to say that he will not permit personalities, and he will be obliged to gentlemen if they will not introduce politics. It is unpleasant to the Chair and to every member on the floor.

Mr. RUNK. Mr. Chairman: What I understood the gentleman from Philadelphia to say was, that those who vote in favor of the report of a standing committee were those who are in favor of reform, and that those who do not vote in favor of the report of that standing committee were opposed to reform. If I misunderstood the gentleman I regret having alluded to the subject; but I claim, s'r, as did the gentleman the other day—when he claimed that he was the one hundred and thirty-third part of this Convention—I claim the right to exercise my own opinions and convictions in this, as in all other matters. I have voted and shall vote upon this proposition, and every other that shall come before the Convention, according to my own convictions of right.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I am very reluctant to trespass longer upon this Convention, but if there is one little mental faculty among the paucity of intellectual endowments God has given me, which deserves greater credit than another, it is memory. I believe among my friends I have always been celebrated for that, and probably it is the only intellectual faculty that I possess, and therefore when my friend from Dauphin (Mr. Mac Veagh) charges me before this Convention with want of memory, and with uttering a denial of what I had previously stated, I am placed in such an unfortunate position before my fellow-members that I must deny it.

The first argument that I made on the floor of this Hall was in favor of having the time for the local elections fixed on one day throughout the State. I endeavored to show that some of the evils of our election system would be cured by such a provision. My friend from Dauphin got up and immediately referred to the great evils, the gigantic intelligence, and the corrupt influences of gigantic corporations. For the intellectual attainments which compelled him to answer an argument by a reflection intended to wound the feelings of a member of this Convention, I have the most profound respect. For the delicate courtesy of debate, which insinuates a reflection against a fellow-member, flimsily hidden under the whip-syllabub of that sophomorical eloquence with which my friend garnishes all his rhetorical efforts, I tender him my most heartfelt thanks.

The next argument I made before this Convention was upon some subject connected with purity of elections, in which I said that the great evil to be cured was, that the young men of this country were bred up to be professional politicians. My friend from Dauphin, a few moments afterward, got up and replied by saying that "Mr. Gowen proposes to cure this evil by preventing young men from going into stores." I denied that, because my friend's memory was at fault. I have, therefore, Mr. Chairman, hardly ever had accorded to me the opportunity of making an argument upon this floor without being replied to with something of a sneer, or something of a taunt from the gentleman from Dauphin, and when he says this morning that he and his friends regard me with an indignation akin to contempt, let me tell him that the opinion that he entertains of me does not weigh one feather in the scale which records my self-respect.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Dauphin to say anything of the kind.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I took the words down, and if the Chair will permit the reporter to read the words, I think they will be found "indignation akin to contempt."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman did use that term, but not as the gentleman from Philadelphia understood it. It had no personal application.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I said that the aspersion for the insinuation that a gentleman who voted against this section, the insinuation or the aspersion that a gentleman who opposed this section was not necessarily in favor of reform, was repelled by us with an indignation that was akin to contempt. The gentleman from York (Mr. Cochran) has just come over to remind me that it was the way in which he understood me, and other members understood it in the same way.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I was fully aware that the gentleman had a great contempt for what I said, and I was led to suppose that the contempt extended to me personally. I am very glad to know it does not.

I came into this Convention as a private citizen. My right on this floor is as good and held by as sacred an authority as that of the gentleman from Dauphin. I am not here as the representative of any corporation, and any taunts or insinuations the gentleman may make will not affect my conduct or influence my vote in any way whatever. If the time shall ever come, that because a man happens to be the president of a large corporation, he is unfitted to come into a Convention to amend the Constitution of Pennsylvania, I will willingly resign the presidency of that corporation, aye one thousand times, rather than I would resign the position which I now hold here. It may be my misfortune that I have adopted a line of life which does not meet the approval of the gentleman from Dauphin. It may be, but I care little. I simply ask the right which every member of this Convention has, that his profession, or occupation, or business, outside of the Convention, shall not be made use of as a taunt and a slur upon him, when he gets up in his place and makes a legitimate argument upon a subject under consideration. That is all

I ask, and this is what I accord to every one else.

In answer to the gentleman from Lehigh, (Mr. Runk,) I have to say that he misunderstood my remarks. When I spoke of voting for this section I meant the people who would vote for the adoption or rejection of the Constitution when it came before them. I trust that I know my duty too well, and that my own feelings are such that I would not, willingly or knowingly, cast any imputation upon any member of this Convention, and I merely ask that the same courtesy shall be accorded to me.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: I had supposed the proposition under discussion admitted of doubt; I had supposed there might be honest differences of opinion as to whether it should or should not be adopted as a part of the organic law, but I did not believe, Mr. Chairman, that the ridicule and the contempt of any member of this Convention would have been bestowed upon it so lavishly as it has been. The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) undertakes to ridicule it out of the Convention. He suggests that he has no doubt the committee who reported it would take his proposition and have the ballot acknowledged before and certified to by a justice of the peace, that it might be recorded. Another gentleman proposes that a photograph of the voter shall be attached to his ballot when presented at the poll. Are such suggestions intended to have weight in this Convention against a proposition reported by the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation?

Now, sir, I will refer to what the gentleman from Delaware intended as argument. He asks whether this section as reported will accomplish the end proposed, and he suggests that one man may repeat fifty times, notwithstanding this section should be adopted, whether at the same poll or at fifty different polls he did not condescend to tell us. But how, let me ask the gentlemen, would one man repeat fifty times at the same poll, or at any number of polls, without affording the evidence which would lead certainly and inevitably to his conviction? If he writes his own name then he writes that name fifty times in the same hand-writing. Would not that afford evidence against him? If he gets another to write his name then he would have fifty separate witnesses, and who are these witnesses? Not one individual in fifty election districts or precincts, because the witness is to be an elector of the election district in which the vote is cast. Thus there must be fifty different men, fifty different witnesses, to aid in his conviction and to assist in visiting him with the penalty of his crime. I therefore answer, no such inference can be justly drawn as that drawn by the gentleman from Delaware. But the gentleman from Delaware did not condescend to tell us how ballot-box stuffing and ballot-box changing could be effectually guarded against in any other possible way than that provided by the committee in this section. He told us of repeaters, and he failed to make out his case. But what provision does he suggest against ballot-box changes, against the crimes of those individuals who bribe the officers of an election to allow the box to be taken from their custody, and the entire contents of the box changed and the box returned? How does he provide against that, or how does he provide against the dropping of the ballot on the way to the box and the substitution, by manipulation, of another ticket in place of that deposited by the elector? Neither the gentleman from Delaware, nor any other gentleman in this Convention, has suggested any possible mode by which these frauds can be prevented, except that provided in this section.

Now are these frauds such as should be guarded against? Have they not been repeated, time and again, in this city, and out of this city? Have they not told upon our general elections? Have they not been the means of palming upon us officers that were not elected? Surely they have; and if so, the simple question arises whether the elector will allow himself to be subjected to the little inconvenience that arises out of writing his name himself, or procuring a friend, an elector of the district, to write it for him, and to attest it, in order to prevent the evil? Certainly the trouble is nothing compared with the good consequences that will follow the adoption of the section. The confidence that will be given the community in the result of their ballots will, alone, far more than compensate for the burden. This want of confidence is keeping away from the polls in Pennsylvania, this day, ten votes for every one that will be kept away by this restriction. There are men in this community, by the hundreds and thousands, who do not go to the polls, because, they say, though we do vote, we shall be defrauded out of our rights, and the minority will palm upon us a man against our choice. The poll will be increased instead of being diminished by this restriction.

These frauds must be guarded against, and I appeal to every man here who has spoken, or is to speak, to inform the committee in what way, except that provided, can the admitted evil be prevented. The old argument that we had when this subject was first under discussion, was that it removed secrecy from the ballot; and that leads me to speak of this amendment, and I call the attention of the committee specially to the changes it proposes.

Three objections were made against the proposition as reported by the committee. The first was that the ballots, although required to be numbered, were not to be numbered consecutively, and that there was not a consecutive record required to be made of that numbering. It was answered, when that subject was before the committee, that it was for the Legislature to prescribe how the ballots shall be numbered and where they should be numbered. It was contended that should not be left to the Legislature, and to remove that objection the first change was made.

Then it was said that the section as reported did not specify where the name was to be written, whether in the inside or the outside. It was thought best, in order to remove that objection, to require it to be endorsed. That is the second change. Now this endorsement of the name or the attestation upon the back discloses nothing. It does not enable the officer, when the ballot is put in, or any one standing at the window, to discover how the elector casts his vote or for whom, and yet it affords the means of securing compliance with the law, because if the endorsement is not upon the ticket, the election officer can say to the elector, "your ticket is not endorsed," and hand it back to him to be endorsed before it is deposited.

Again, it was objected that there was no obligation of secrecy imposed upon the election officers. It was replied, "that is a subject matter for the Legislature. They can prescribe the oath." But that did not seem to be satisfactory to some gentlemen, and therefore it is put in this section, as a part of our organic law, that an oath of secrecy shall be required. How, I ask, Mr. Chairman, is this secrecy of the ballot invaded by these provisions? It is true that the officers, in counting the votes, looking at the endorsement on the ballot, will know for whom the elector voted. But when the oath of secrecy is enjoined, is not the elector protected? Surely he is completely protected. Who complains of the publicity of dispatches by the electric telegraph? No one; and yet it is only the oath of secrecy that prevents their publication. Who complains of the want of secrecy in what transpires in the grand jury room? And yet it is only the oath of secrecy that prevents what transpires there from being known to everybody. We have then the ballot protected in its secrecy, until there is an allegation of fraud in the district; until the ballot-boxes are opened by the judicial officers, or by those authorized to make an investigation. And under what system on the face of this earth will you detect fraud unless there be publicity at some time. When you come to this point, how every man voted must be made public, or the crime committed by the election officers remains covered, and it is impossible to convict anybody of any crime upon the ballot-box. But if at this time, under some other system that the gentlemen would devise, publicity is given, is this any worse? Both plans stand upon the same footing, and the secrecy of the right of suffrage is necessarily invaded to the same extent by the investigation. The exposure is but an incident of investigation, so that this argument of innovation upon the secrecy of the ballot falls to the ground. There is less than nothing in it.

But it has been insinuated that there has been a scheme, a plan, concocted here, by which one political party in this House is to carry this section against the will of the House. It struck me as a most remarkable insinuation. I would like to see the party in this country that would identify itself with frauds upon the ballot-box, that would throw itself, as a party, against a proposition designed to protect the sacredness of the ballot. I pray to God that the party with which I have the honor to be connected—the party with which I have esteemed it a privilege in all the glorious past to be connected—will never identify itself with any such iniquity. But as to the truth of the insinuation made by the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) against the democratic members of this House, that gentleman says he did not know it, and he did not believe that it was true, but that somebody, he did not name, told him that it was true. I ask, was that a justification for so grave an insinuation?

I may say, Mr. Chairman, that somebody told me that there was an effort being made in this Convention, by politicians, to sweep in the republican party, as a party, in opposition to this measure, that it was going on all the forenoon, in which the gentleman made the insinuation, but I scout it. I could not believe it. I could not believe that anybody would attempt to get up a partisan feeling to defeat a measure reported by a committee on any such ground. Conscious of the fact that there was no partisan division in the committee of fifteen, that democrat and republican stood side by side, and shoulder to shoulder, in committee, and that it was carried by a large majority without any partisan division whatever, I felt sure that the insinuation of the gentleman from Dauphin could not be true. It was most remarkable, Mr. Chairman, that the insinuation should come from, and the tocsin of alarm sounded by, the same individual who inaugurated the only partisan vote that ever has taken place in this Convention.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would observe that he desires the gentleman from Centre to confine himself to the subject before the Convention.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. With pleasure, sir. I then hope that having answered these insinuations, as I felt bound to do as a member of the republican party, and to denounce it as far as myself was concerned; for I had, probably, more to do with the subject, certainly had more to do with the proposition that is now under consideration, than any other member, for I wrote that without consultation with any gentleman outside of the committee, and submitted to no one. I do not know that a single democrat in this House knew of the proposition I proposed to make when the re-consideration was moved and carried. I hope, then, that this Convention will decide upon the amendment on its merits, that neither now nor at any other time will partisan prejudices be allowed to influence any member in his vote. We have come here as the representatives of the sovereign people of this Commonwealth, without respect to party. Let us maintain that position and go forward to the ascertainment of truth, and when we ascertain that let us act in accordance therewith.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Schuylkill, (Mr. Bartholomew,) to strike out the word "shall," and insert instead the word "may."

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: Was the motion made by the gentleman from Susquehanna withdrawn?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; it was not in order when offered.

The question being upon the amendment offered by Mr. Bartholomew, a division was called for, and resulted: In the affirmative, fifty-one; in the negative, forty-one.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. Chairman: I offer now the following amendment, to come in at the end of the section:

"Provided, That this article shall apply only to cities of thirty thousand inhabitants and upwards, but any county of a like number of inhabitants, by vote of a majority of its electors in favor thereof, taken at any general election, may have the same applied to its locality; the same notice to be given of such vote by the sheriff of the county, on the written request of fifty electors of said county, as given of the general election."

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the amendment, by striking out "thirty" and inserting "twenty."

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. Chairman: I hope that will be voted down. Let us adhere to the "thirty;" that is a fair proposition.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: Are there not two amendments pending?

The CHAIRMAN. This is an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BROOMALL. I think, sir, it is an amendment to an amendment to another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman (Mr. Broomall) is right. The gentleman from Centre offered yesterday a substitute for the section, which is an amendment to the amendment.

The question being upon the amendment offered by Mr. Turrell, a division was called for, and resulted: In the affirmative, thirty-nine; in the negative, fifty-one.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NILES. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment, to come in as a proviso at the end of the section:

"Provided, That so much of this section as provides that the name of the elector shall be endorsed upon his ballot, shall only apply to cities having more than twenty thousand inhabitants."

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I move to strike out the first line of the amendment—the substitute offered by the gentleman from Centre (Mr. M'Allister): "All elections of the citizens shall be by ballot," merely because the language is not very good; and I propose to substitute, so as to make it read: "All elections by ballot, except those by persons in their representative capacities, who shall vote viva voce: Provided, That cities containing more than thirty thousand population," &c.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I rise to a point of order: That so much of the amendment as proposes to limit the proposition to thirty thousand inhabitants to a county has been voted down.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: The proposition in this form has not been voted down; it is a distinct and separate proposition. This presents the distinct question, whether we can or cannot retain the provision of the old Constitution, with the amendment which the gentleman from Centre (Mr. M'Allister) has engrafted upon it; that is to say, shall we, or shall we not, have for all of this State, except those cities, the provision of the Constitution as it now stands—that all elections shall be by ballot, except those in a representative capacity, and can we not, and will we not apply this proposed remedy to cities, where the mischief is avowed to be? I am willing, for one, that we should adopt for the cities a plan which will correct the mischief of which they complain, and I am unwilling that we should, in order to accomplish that purpose for eight hundred thousand people, impose this provision upon the other two and a half millions of the people of this State, a provision that they do not want.

I am willing to vote for the proposition as a whole, and I think my friend from Centre (Mr. M'Allister) will, upon reflection, see the propriety of accepting this as an amendment to his proposition. Let us retain the proposition of the old Constitution for all the rest of the State, including the county of Centre, and others outside of Philadelphia and Allegheny, and at the same time give the cities where trouble is found to exist, the remedy for that trouble. We have had from the gentleman from Philadelphia, who sits in the north-east corner of this Hall, (Mr. Simpson,) and from another gentleman who sits next the aisle, (Mr. Dallas,) and from another gentleman who sits upon my right, (Mr. Gowen,) and another who sits in the south-east corner, (Mr. Jno. Price Wetherill,) gentlemen representing both political parties, the open avowal here, that these frauds in Philadelphia are most serious. But these frauds do not afflict the rest of the State. I am willing to give this city what it wants, if it will act as a remedy for the trouble complained of; but why impose it upon the rest of the State? What argument can be given to the people of the country districts to satisfy them —

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Has the gentleman from Chester not heard of the sweeping frauds that have been perpetrated during the last few years in Schuylkill, and Lawrence, and Luzerne counties?

Mr. DARLINGTON. Yes; and I will apply it to them, if they want it. Let them have it, if they choose; but do not put Chester, and York, and other counties that do not need it, to the trouble which it will entail, if they do not want it. Show me where the disease is; show me, where you desire, the sore is, and I will cauterize it; but it is not necessary to cauterize the sound part.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I want to ask the gentleman a question —

Mr. DARLINGTON. I would let even Carbon have it if it wants it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LILLY. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. Was not the secretary or the chairman of a standing committee of this State from Chester county?

Mr. DARLINGTON. Who is he?

Mr. LILLY. It is not necessary to name him.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I do not know. I never was secretary of a standing committee. I want this question simplified. I want my friends from Allegheny, who are not satisfied with it, —

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please suspend his remarks until the members come to order. The Convention must keep order.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I believe I have said all I desire to say on the subject.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: I want to call the attention of the committee to a single fact. The first township, borough, county or precinct vote that was thrown entirely out of the count by reason of illegal votes, occurred in Cambria county, about 1857. That is the first case to be found reported in any of the books on elections in this State; so you will see these frauds began somewhat earlier, and not in the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. WM. H. SMITH. The first fraud that I ever heard of was in Youngwomantown, Adams county, where there was a majority of twelve hundred for a candidate, when there were only two hundred voters in the town.

The PRESIDENT. If no more gentlemen wish to give their historical recollections, the question will be taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington.) The amendment will be read.

The CLERK read: Strike out the words, "all elections of the citizens shall be by ballot," and insert, "all elections shall be by ballot, except by persons in their representative capacity, who shall vote viva voce."

"Provided, That in cities containing more than thirty thousand population, every ballot voted shall be numbered in the order in which it is received, and the number recorded, by the election officers, opposite the name of the elector who presents the ballot. Each elector shall endorse his name upon the ballot, or cause it to be endorsed there and attested by another elector of the district, who shall not be an election officer; and the oath of the election officer shall require secrecy as to the contents of every ballot cast at the election."

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I move to divide the question, if it is proper. My object is to allow members to say, by their votes, whether they are willing to have the tickets numbered. I wish to divide, so that we can have a separate vote upon the proposition to number, and strike out that part that has reference to putting the names on.

Mr. GOWEN. Will the gentleman please state how he would divide the question, so that we can vote intelligently?

Mr. BROOMALL. I call for a division into thirds.

Mr. HOPKINS. I would inquire whether that can be done.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen cannot call for but one division at a time.

Mr. BROOMALL. Then my division comes first. I call for a division of the first sentence.

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I have not yet relinquished the floor. If the Clerk will read the section, I will indicate the division.

The CLERK read:

"All elections of the citizens shall be by ballot. Every ballot voted shall be numbered in the order in which it is received and the number recorded, by the election officer, opposite the name of the elector who presented the ballot."

Mr. D. N. WHITE. That is the part that I wish to have presented separately to the Convention.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask a division of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. D. N. White) has the floor.

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I have not said a word upon this matter during the whole debate of it. I think that is as far as this Convention ought to go. It will impose as many burdens upon voters as ought to be imposed. I am perfectly willing, if that will meet the views of the Convention, that the tickets shall be numbered, and that will identify every ballot put into the box. His name has a number to it, his ballot has a number to it, and in case of any contested election or any examination you will have nothing to do but open the box and trace the votes.

Mr. LILLY. And allow the election officers to stuff the ballot-boxes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) will not interrupt the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. D. N. White.)

Mr. LILLY. I thought he was through.

Mr. D. N. WHITE. I am satisfied that by putting the names on the tickets you will open up greater opportunities for fraud than you correct. Gentlemen who have attended the polls have observed a crowd of men coming up to vote, with their buckets in their hands, coming from the factories and from their work on their way to their homes and stopping to vote. They will decline, in nine cases out of ten, to put their names on the ballots. They will say "you do it," or "you do it." How easy it will be for scheming men to slip in the wrong ticket and put the voter's name on it, and it will be frequently done by those who wish to defraud. It will give a greater opportunity to defraud than any other way that I can think of. A great many men are not in the habit of writing their names. The great mass of farmers do not often write. Many of them come there after riding four or five miles. It may be that there will be no opportunity for writing. They will ask some one to write their names. They will esteem it a hardship, and many a good man will not vote at all. We know how difficult it is now to get good men to go to the polls; how we exert ourselves, and go around and urge this man and that to go and vote, and they will say: "Well, if I have to write my name upon four or five tickets, and be put to so much trouble, I think I will not go." I believe the people will look upon it as a hardship, and not esteem it as a reform. Therefore I am opposed to it.

I deny in toto that the gentlemen, either in this House or out of it, who are opposing this matter of writing their names upon the tickets, are opposed to a reform of the ballot-box. No man has a right to say that. The present plan which we have pursued for long years, as far as we in the country know any thing about it, have found it honest and upright. If it is not so in the city, here, we cannot help it.

I hope this Convention, in its sober "second thought," will consent to adopt this intermediate method of allowing the numbers to be placed upon the tickets, which I think will answer all purposes, and let this method of writing the names thereon go by.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I do not propose, as I have already spoken upon this question in committee of the whole, to go over what I have already said, but I rise to say that I agree with the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. D. N. White,) and I am willing to go that far; and I trust gentlemen who favor this identification, as they call it, of the ballot, will stop at this point. I feel convinced from all I have heard on this floor, and from all the knowledge I believe I brought with me into the Convention, that this is an experiment which will disappoint those who introduced it. I am willing to go to this limited degree, and I merely rise to say that, and to throw it out to gentlemen who are very much attached to this new plan, I ask them to receive it in the spirit of concession, in which it is offered, because I believe in this modified way they will get it, but I think if they persist in asking for more they will lose it altogether.

Mr. RUNK. Mr. Chairman: I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the amendment is now pending, and no further amendment will be in order until that is disposed of.

Mr. HAZZARD. Mr. Chairman: I think we had better pause a little while just here. We are voting down all these propositions, it seems to me, just because we can. The pending proposition, divided at the instance of the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. D. N. White,) will serve every purpose, and will disencumber the provision from the process of writing the name upon the ballot, and it is well known that in the country it is a very inconvenient thing to do, and will not accomplish, I presume, what its friends anticipate. So far as it is necessary to recognize that vote upon contested elections, the number which will be placed upon the ticket by the election officers, relieving the voter from the trouble of putting his name upon it, and preventing the inconvenience which will ensue to many who cannot write, for all practical purposes, it seems to me, will be entirely sufficient. In cases of contested elections the investigators can trace the votes, and it will disencumber it from unnecessary trouble and annoyances.

It seems to me that we ought to pause here, and pass this as a general provision, not for Philadelphia, but for the whole country, and thus avoid the introduction into the Constitution of special provisions, when we propose to insert in the Constitution such provisions as will prohibit the Legislature from doing that very thing. It will not be objected to, I presume, in the country, and will serve all practical purposes.

Mr. RUNK. Mr. Chairman: I presented an amendment which I have now sent to the Chair to be read, if in order, for information.

The CHAIRMAN. It can be read as a part of the gentleman's remarks.

The CLERK read: "All elections by citizens shall be by ballot, open or secret, as the elector shall prefer. The ballot shall be numbered by the election officer when received, and the name of the elector endorsed either by him or in his presence, and the number of his ballot given to him by the officer."

Mr. RUNK. Mr. Chairman: I present this amendment, not because I favor the report of the standing committee, but because I believe if any provision is to be adopted by this committee and this Convention, by which the ballot deposited by any particular voter shall be identified, that this is as far as this committee and this Convention should go. It will be observed that this will answer all the purposes, contemplated by the standing committee, with the exception of the single fact that when the ballot has been handed in at the window the officers of the election may manipulate it and substitute in lieu of the ballot deposited by the voter, a ballot in his own possession, and I think this Convention should adopt a provision prohibiting the election officers from taking into the room in which the officers of the election sit any ballot whatever; and if that is the case the amendment which I propose to this Convention now will answer all the purposes of a ballot deposited with the name thereon, be written by the party by whom it is deposited.

It will be perceived that this provision does not interfere with, hinder or restrict the right of a party who offers to vote, but that it provides that the election officer, when he receives the ballot, shall endorse thereon the number of the ballot and the name of the party who deposits it. All these services are to be performed by the election officers, and the only possible event in which fraud could be possibly perpetrated would be the substitution of another ballot by the election officer for the one handed into the window by the voter. It will thus be observed that all restriction in the free exercise of the elective franchise is at once removed, and as a complete mode of identification of the ballot of the voter is furnished in the event of the perpetration of fraud. The provision I shall offer constitutes as acceptable a system of voting as can possibly be provided. I do not agree with the argument which has been advanced during the discussion of this question—that the endorsement of the number and the name of the voter upon the ballot will interfere with the secrecy—because the persons who sit inside the election board know at once, by the difference of type, almost invariably the character of the vote that is deposited—excepting in cases where there may be names crossed out and other names inserted thereon, either by printed slips or otherwise. It seems to me if the amendment I shall offer is adopted, it will afford all the necessary means for the detection of fraud; and hence I shall vote for it in preference to the report of the standing committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the first division of the section as amended by the substitute offered by the gentleman from Centre (Mr. M'Allister.) The substitute will be read for the information of the committee.

The CLERK read as follows:

"All elections of the citizens shall be by ballot. Every ballot voted shall be numbered in the order in which it is received, and the number recorded by the election officers opposite the name of the elector who presents the ballot. Each elector shall endorse his name upon his ballot, or cause it to be endorsed thereon, and attested by another elector of the district, who shall not be an election officer; and the oath prescribed for the election officers shall require secrecy as to the contents of every ballot cast at the election."

Mr. HUNSICKER. Mr. Chairman: I desire to ask, for information, if the separate divisions of the amendment are voted down will that defeat the amendment itself?

The CHAIRMAN. Such is the ruling of the Chair.

ELECTIONS BY BALLOT.

The question was then taken on the first division of the amendment, viz: "All elections shall be by ballot," and the division was agreed to.

NUMBERING THE BALLOTS.

The second division of the amendment, viz: "Every ballot shall be numbered in the order in which it is received, and the number recorded by the election officers opposite the name of the elector who presents the ballot" was then read, and upon a division being called it was agreed to, a majority of a quorum voting in the affirmative.

ENDORSEMENT AND SECRECY OF THE BALLOT.

The third division of the amendment was then read, viz: "Each elector shall endorse his name upon his ballot, or cause it to be endorsed thereon, and attested by another elector of the district, who shall not be an election officer, and the oath prescribed by the election officers, shall require secrecy as to the contents of every ballot cast at the election."

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: Is it proper to say one word? I simply wish to say this—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has spoken twice on the question. Shall he have leave to speak again?

Mr. MACVEAGH. Will the Convention pause one moment? The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) is chairman of the Committee on Revision and Adjustment, but surely independent of this fact we certainly ought to treat with deference a member who rises perhaps at the last moment before a vote is taken upon a question, to suggest something that may be very important. I trust that leave will be extended to the gentleman.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I rise to a point of order, and it is: That after a vote upon a pending question has been ordered, and the Convention has proceeded to take the vote, debate is out of order pending the division of the Convention.

The CHAIRMAN. Shall the gentleman have leave to proceed?

["Aye." "Aye." "Aye."]

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I simply desire to say, if the pending division of the question is adopted, there can be no possible identification of the ballot, except by the election officer, who in nine cases out of ten—

["Question." "Question." "Question."]

The question being then taken on the third and last division of the amendment, a division was called which resulted as follows: Ayes, fifty-seven; noes, fifty-five.

So the third division of the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the section as amended.

THE VOTE OF DUMB PERSONS.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment:

"In all elections by the people, and also by the Senate and House of Representatives, jointly or separately, the vote shall be personally and publicly given viva voce: Provided, That dumb persons entitled to suffrage may vote by ballot."

Mr. RUNK. Mr. Chairman: I offer the amendment I submitted as a substitute for the pending amendment.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I rise to a point of order, and it is: That nothing is now in order, by way of an amendment, except something additional to the section as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The amendment of the gentleman from Lehigh (Mr. Runk) is not in order, as it contemplates a change in the section as amended.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Hemphill, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. STRUTHERS. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the section.

"Provided, That if this section shall not be approved by the vote of the people, when separately submitted for that purpose, the second section, third article, of the present Constitution shall remain in force."

Mr. STRUTHERS. Mr. Chairman: I desire to state the reasons I have in view in presenting this amendment. There seems to be a very strong disposition to oppose the adoption of the section reported by the committee, as it has been amended, and the report of the committee itself.

Now, sir, this is a new proposition before the people of Pennsylvania, altogether. This is a proposition. I venture to say, no gentleman heard talked of before he came here. It has been brought forward here and discussed earnestly and ably, and seems to strike the judgment of very many gentlemen favorably. They seem to be interested in it and to regard it as a great improvement to be introduced into the Constitution. But it is an attempt to introduce, as an experiment, what has not been discussed before the people of the State; and my own opinion is that the people of the State will not approve of it; that this section, even if adopted here in this form, would be disallowed, would not be agreed to by the people. In that case we would be without any provision on the subject, and that is why I have offered this proviso, that in case, when submitted upon a separate vote to the people, this proposed plan shall fail, we will still have a provision in the Constitution on the subject. We will then have the old provision itself still in force if this proposition shall come before the people and be disapproved. But without this proviso we will, in such case, be without any provision on the subject in the Constitution. It appears to me, therefore, that it is highly important that such a proviso should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the proviso.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Chairman: Can it be read for information?

The CLERK. "Provided, That if the foregoing section shall not be approved by the votes of the people, when separately submitted for that purpose, the second section of the third article in the present Constitution shall remain in force."

Mr. STRUTHERS. Mr. Chairman: I will make one verbal correction before the vote is taken, to change the word "foregoing," in the first line, to the word "this."

The CHAIRMAN. The proviso will be so amended.

The proviso was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the section as amended.

On the question of agreeing to the section, a division was called which resulted: Fifty-three in the affirmative and forty-seven in the negative. So the section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the next section, which will be read.

The CLERK: SECTION 8. In cases of contested elections no person shall be permitted to withhold his testimony upon the ground that it may criminate himself or subject him to public infamy, but such testimony shall not afterwards be used against him in any judicial proceedings.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: I desire to correct a mere typographical error, to strike out the "s" in the last word, and make it "proceeding" instead of "proceedings."

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman: I move the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

On agreeing to this proposition, a division was called. A majority of a quorum not voting in the affirmative, the motion was declared rejected.

Mr. RUNK. Mr. Chairman: I wish to know if it is proper to propose an amendment to this section or not. The section provides that the holders of shares in a corporation shall be entitled—

The CHAIRMAN. That is not this section. We are considering the eighth section.

Mr. RUNK. Mr. Chairman: I ask for information. What is the section now under consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. The section under consideration is the eighth.

Mr. M'CLEAN. Mr. Chairman: I agree with the minority report of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, adverse to this section. I am one of a small minority of this body that is opposed to interference with the Bill of Rights, in the present Constitution of the State. The minority report of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation characterizes this section as an innovation, a dangerous, mischievous innovation upon our American jurisprudence. The ninth article which is in our Bill of Rights contains a provision that, in all prosecutions, no one can be compelled to give evidence against himself. It is not a sufficient answer to this to say that this section provides that such testimony shall not be afterward used against him in any judicial proceeding. I am satisfied with the Bill of Rights as we have it. The liberties of the people of this Commonwealth have been preserved in the fullest manner under it, and I am willing that it should go down to my children, and to others, as their sufficient safeguard and protection against wrong. I am opposed to any innovation upon the protection which every man enjoys, in not being compelled to testify against himself, or compelled to criminate himself; and for that reason I shall vote against the section now under consideration.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I desire to make but few remarks upon this subject. The ninth article of our present Constitution, as the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation understand it, prohibits the extorting of evidence from any party in a criminal proceeding. Yet it has been considered by some that this prohibition was universal; at all events the law has been made or so construed in this State. Now in the particular cases provided for in this section, a different rule is necessary and proper. Take the instance of an election agent who has corrupted fifty or a hundred votes in a district. The fact may be notorious. Many of those to whom money has been paid, may have stated that fact, and yet when you proceed to investigate the case, you may call the whole list, one after another, and they can defy you to obtain from them the slightest information upon which to base a decision. Your object may not be to pursue the recipients of the money. You may desire and ordinarily would desire, only to punish the principal offender, the man who has corrupted the votes. You may desire to obtain their testimony against him, and they would be perfectly willing to testify, at least many of them would, if it were not for the existing provision of law that there shall be no compulsion upon them. If you have this rule by which they cannot be permitted to withhold their testimony, a great many of these persons would willingly testify under the conditions that their testimony given in the interest of public justice should not be used afterward against them. At present you are often powerless to discover the truth. With your witnesses standing before your tribunals, you are powerless to procure a word from him. It rests in the discretion of the witness whether he will tell you anything at all about the transaction of which he has knowledge. Necessarily you have to allow him to be the judge himself, whether the testimony will criminate himself or not. Nay, the law is, that if his testimony will tend to his own crimination he may withhold it from you.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not impugning this rule of the law in cases of private transactions which are investigated in courts of justice, or the constitutional prohibition in criminal cases, that when you put a man into a prisoner's dock for trial you shall not extort from him any confession. I am not impugning that rule of law, or that provision of the Constitution, applicable, as it is, almost invariably to questions of a private character—to questions concerning the relations of individuals in the ordinary transactions of society. But, in this business of electing the officers of the government, a public duty charged upon the citizen, not relating to the affairs of private life, but business in which everybody in the State is interested, in which the public interests overwhelmingly prevail, and transcend any private interest which may be involved. I would not permit any person who knows a single fact, interesting to the public and necessary to the administration of public justice, to withhold it. Under the limitation that what he shall say shall not be used against himself in any subsequent judicial proceeding, I cannot see that any abuse or any hardship will follow from the adoption of the section.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I cordially agree with the objections of the gentleman from Adams (Mr. McClear.) I do not see the propriety of any distinction being made by our Constitution and laws between the offence of stuffing the ballot-box or fraudulent voting, and any other crime or charge that may be made against a citizen. If there be any propriety in compelling a man to testify in a manner which may criminate himself, or fix upon him a stigma of any kind, you might as well include all offences as one. Can any one give me a reason for the distinction between a crime against the ballot-box and a crime against property, or the individual has not been pointed out by anybody. I submit to this committee that no distinction beside the punishment of the principal can be made between one offence and another. If that portion of the Bill of Rights which prohibits you from compelling a man to criminate himself is right to be retained as to any offence, it is practically right to be retained as to all. You should not retain one kind of crime as to which the criminal's, or alleged criminal's, mouth should be secret, and another to which he shall be compelled to testify, because it is not the conviction and the punishment alone that is to be guarded, but it is the social standing and position in society of the individual. He shall not be compelled to testify in anything which shall bring him into public scandal or disgrace any more than he should be brought into a criminal court and be punished for the offence. The question is, then, is it wise? The ninth section of article ninth of the old Constitution, known as the Declaration of Rights, says: "That in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to be heard by himself and his counsel, to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him, to meet the witnesses face to face, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and in prosecutions by indictment or information, a speedy trial by an impartial jury of the vicinage." He cannot be compelled to give evidence against himself, nor can he be deprived of life, liberty or property unless by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land.

That is the provision of our Constitution, as it has been for eighty years. The question is: Do we mean to retain that good provision or break it? If we mean to retain it, and say it is right, and agree that no man shall be compelled to give testimony against himself—that he shall wait until he has been proved to be guilty by witnesses—not himself. If it is wise, I say, to retain that provision, then it is certainly unwise to infringe upon it—even with regard to the purity of the ballot-box. It would be a very strange spectacle were we to present it, that as far as one crime, say murder, manslaughter or burglary—a man accused shall not be compelled to testify about himself, and that with regard to another crime he may be compelled—in other words, that English and American justice shall be administered in one case, and French justice in another. I believe that throughout the French territory—if not in other countries on the continent of Europe—the first thing they do is to put a man to the torture to make him tell all he knows about the crime, and exculpate himself if he can. That, however, is not right, according to our way of thinking. Every man is believed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty, and therefore the Constitution guarantees to him the right of silence until proved by other testimony that he is guilty. I say if that provision be retained, then this provision now before us is a clear violation of it. What is it? "In cases of contested election no person shall be permitted to withhold his testimony, upon the ground that it may criminate himself." He shall be compelled to testify, even if it criminate himself. Now is the security of the ballot-box of so much greater importance than the security of life, that if a man should be compelled, in one case, to testify against himself, he should not be compelled to do so in the other case? I have an idea that life, and liberty, and reputation are among the first things to be looked to, and neither of these should be taken from him by any criminal proceeding with his help. He should be sacred. His testimony—whatever he may know himself, he is at liberty to withhold and let it die with him, if he pleases. Society will not call upon him to say whether he is guilty or not, except to answer when he is on trial on the charge, and society will not call upon him to say whether he is guilty or not, by putting him to the book.

Now is it right to make an exception with regard to a crime, insignificant when compared with the destruction of life, and insignificant as compared with destruction by burning, or as compared with the violation of the person. A man who violates your wife or your daughter by force has the privilege of saying nothing until he is proved to be guilty, and a man who commits a murder has the same privilege; the man who fires your house and destroys all within it has the same privilege. These all have the privilege and immunity of saying nothing, as to whether they are guilty or not, even in these high crimes; aye, even in treason against the State. And are not these offences of higher import than the ballot-box purification? Why, surely, what signifies the ballot-box and all its contents against the life, and virtue, and purity of the people. I venture to say this Convention are not prepared and never will be prepared to modify or change the laws and abolish that provision of the Bill of Rights; and if we do not, and if that is retained, then this section, as it stands, must be voted down. They cannot stand together with any propriety. They could not, with decent respect for ourselves, be permitted to stand. Two principles so opposite to each other as these are, could not be permitted to stand, with self-respect on the part of this Convention. Our own character, as consistent men, would require that we should dispose of one or the other of these, and not adopt diametrically apposite principles. For these reasons I am opposed to the adoption of the amendment as it stands, as altogether unnecessary. Leave the criminal, if such he be, against the election laws, to stand upon the same rights and privileges as any other man; aye, and with perfect immunity, as far as regards testimony. Leave him the privilege of being silent until he is proven guilty.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: With all due respect for the gentleman from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) I cannot see that the proposition now before the committee can, in the slightest degree, affect or change the ninth section of the ninth article of the Constitution, commonly called the "Bill of Rights." As I read that section, it provides "that in all criminal prosecutions the effect of the section applies, and can apply to no other than a criminal prosecution." That raises the question: Then is a contested election case a criminal prosecution or not? It has never been so held in Pennsylvania, and is not so held now. It is not, in one sense, a private prosecution or a civil suit, but it is a prosecution in the nature of a great public investigation, a question in which the public are directly interested, no matter what the office may be that may be under consideration. It is not a criminal prosecution, and therefore the provision that is proposed to be inserted into the new Constitution cannot, in any way, affect, or change, or modify that section of the Bill of Rights as it now reads. If I thought it had such an effect I would not vote for it, but I hold that it has not. For more than thirty years we have had upon the statute book a section that requires that where a man was proved to have voted illegally, that he might be compelled to disclose for whom he voted, and no one suspected that that was a regulation against this section of the Bill of Rights. It was held by the courts that persons were compelled to disclose for whom they cast their illegal votes, yet it was not held to be a violation of the ninth section of article ninth. Surely, if it had been, the court would not have compelled the disclosure.

For more than thirty years we have been practicing under it, and no one has suspected until now that a contested election case was a criminal prosecution. If the argument was based upon a good foundation, I should go with the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) upon it, but as I believe it to be upon a bad foundation, I cannot agree with him, and the Convention will be obliged to say, if they come to his conclusion, that a contested election case is a criminal prosecution, and therefore in violation of the Bill of Rights; but should they adopt the proposed section, as I believe they ought, for the reasons assigned by the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) this section will be needed to make the whole perfect in all its parts.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: The question has been asked, should a man be compelled to testify against himself in election frauds, and not be compelled so to testify in other cases? This offence has been compared to offences against individuals. This, Mr. Chairman, is the mistake that gentlemen fall into. There is a clear and manifest distinction between the offences arising out of the formation and nature of government, and this is the distinction. We are here to form an organic law. Every citizen of this Commonwealth is represented in this body. We are here as representatives, and this representation is a necessity. The people are presumptively here in their sovereignty, individually and collectively. Representation is the corner-stone, the great foundation upon which the structure of our government is to rest. Now this section contains an agreement of every man with every other man in the community that the citizen who conspires with his fellow-man to undermine that foundation shall be compelled to testify to his own guilt and the guilt of his fellow. In the formation of government every man agrees to surrender certain of his rights, the better to secure other rights. The surrender of the right not to be compelled to criminate himself is a small sacrifice in order to secure and preserve intact the great foundation upon which all his civil rights depend.

We have had the testimony of several members of this Convention, that even in country districts in the State men have a price for their votes, and that in close districts they have been bought by the fifties and hundreds; money is furnished by the candidates, or furnished by the emissaries or agents of the candidates to purchase votes. That is the evil which we propose by this section to remedy. We cannot remedy that evil without evidence, and how are we to obtain the evidence without the adoption of this section? The knowledge that the government must get in order to punish the criminals is in the exclusive possession of the parties to the fraud, either as purchasers or as purchased. Suppose twenty-five men come up to one poll and take the proffered consideration in a private way from the man who acts as a purchaser, and suppose it is noised about, you cannot make it out unless you have the testimony of at least of some one of the twenty-five who have been purchased; but the man who has purchased them, hearing of the suspicion cast upon him, comes to them and says: "Gentlemen if you say one word about your having taken money; if you agree to become a witness, or say anything about it, I will have you arrested for this fraud; I will have you imprisoned to-day; I will have you in the penitentiary just as soon as the courts can convict you. He does that either by himself or by his friends, and their mouths are closed and their evidence cut off. This section then requires them to testify, and relieves them from the penalties that may follow their testimony. They shall not be prosecuted for that crime, although they testify that they have been participants therein. "Their testimony shall not be used against them."

If this section is adopted we will have, not one, but the fifty men, who have been purchased, willing to testify to the guilt of the agent of the man who furnished the money to corrupt the ballot, and he will be punished and placed where he can do no further harm instead of misrepresenting his constituency. An example or two and we shall have no more election frauds of that kind. The evil will be thus reached and remedied without difficulty. Why then should we not have this provision? In this way we reach the author and thus prevent the fraud. This is a crime which, as the law now stands, it is the highest interest of all parties participating in it to conceal. Remove the terrors of the law which coerce concealment, and we shall have no more money used by candidates nor their agents. The distinction is palpable between private offences which only affect one, or two, or a dozen, or twenty, individuals in the community, and the offence which strikes at the foundations of the government. We had better form no government at all than to allow the government we establish to be undermined by villains who cannot be detected, who cannot be convicted and punished, by reason of the very instrumentality we allow them to retain in their hands, to stop the mouths of everybody who knows anything about their crimes against the government.

The question being then taken upon the eighth section, it was agreed to.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman: I move the committee do now rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to, and the committee rose.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. President: The committee of the whole have again had under consideration the article reported from the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, and has instructed its chairman to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Leave was granted to the committee to sit again on next Monday.

THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. President: I ask leave, at this time, to present a report from the Committee on the Executive Department.

Mr. WORRELL. Would it be in order to move to dispense with the reading of the report?

The PRESIDENT. It will not be out of order, but it is regular to read a bill or article when it is brought into the House.

The CLERK read the report.

DEBATE IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Leave being granted, Mr. Lilly offered the following resolution, which was read and laid upon the table, under the rule:

Resolved, That in committee of the whole, hereafter, speeches upon any proposition, or amendment to propositions, shall be restricted to one speech, of not more than ten minutes, without permission.

Mr. WORRELL. Mr. President: I move the Convention do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

So the Convention, at two o'clock and five minutes, adjourned until Monday next at eleven o'clock A. M.

FIFTIETH DAY.

MONDAY, February 24, 1873.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, at eleven o'clock A. M., President Wm. M. Meredith in the chair.

Prayer was offered by Rev. J. W. Curry.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

NO PROHIBITION.

Mr. DE FRANCE presented a petition from Abner Applegate, of Mercer county, asking for the insertion of a clause in the Constitution against the prohibition of the sale or manufacture of intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. MANTOR presented the petition of citizens of Crawford county, asking that a clause be inserted in the Constitution prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. CURRY presented a petition from the citizens of Duncansville, Blair county, to the same purport.

Mr. FULTON presented a petition from the citizens of Westmoreland county, to the same purport, both of which were referred to the Committee on Legislation.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. D. N. WHITE asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. MacConnell, of Allegheny, for a few days from to-day.

Mr. CURRY asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Russell, of Bedford county, for a few days from to-day.

Mr. DALLAS asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Corson, of Montgomery, for a few days from to-day.

Mr. LILLY asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Davis, of Monroe county, for a few days from to-day.

Mr. HEMPHILL asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Broomall, of Delaware, for a few days from to-day.

Mr. HEMPHILL asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Boyd, of Montgomery, for a few days from to-day.

EXAMINING INMATES OF INSTITUTIONS.

Mr. BARDSLEY offered the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the Committee on Judiciary be requested to report a section in the Constitution to give to the judges of the courts of common pleas and quarter sessions of the several counties of the State, the power to enter or cause to be entered by the proper officers of the courts, any institution of any character whatever, for the purpose of examining the same or any of the inmates thereof.

LIMITING DEBATE IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I call up the resolution offered by me on Friday last.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The CLERK. Resolved, That in committee of the whole hereafter, speeches upon any proposition or amendments to propositions shall be restricted to one speech of not more than ten minutes without permission.

On the question of proceeding to second reading, a division was called, which resulted: Forty-one in the affirmative and eighteen in the negative, so the resolution was read a second time.

On agreeing to the resolution, the yeas and nays were required by Mr. Cochran and Mr. De France, and were as follow, viz:

YEAS.

Messrs. Achenbach, Addicks, Baker, Black, Charles A., Carter, Corbett, De France, Dunning, Gilpin, Guthrie, Hanna, Hopkins, Horton, Knight, Landis, Lawrence, Lilly, M'Culloch, M'Murray, Mann, Mantor, Minor, Mott, Newlin, Palmer, G. W., Patterson, T. H. B. Patton, Purviance, John N., Purviance, Samuel A., Reed, Andrew, Ross, Simpson, Smith, H. G., Smith, Henry W., Stewart, Struthers, Turrell, Walker, Wetherill, Jno. Price, White, David N., White, J. W. F., Woodward—43.

N A Y S.

Messrs. Alricks, Baily, (Perry,) Bardsley, Campbell, Cochran, Craig, Curry, Curtin, Cuyler, Dallas, Dodd, Elliott, Fulton, Hay, Hemphill, Heverin, Howard, Kaine, Lear, M'Allister, M'Clean, Niles, Wherry and Meredith, President—25.

So the resolution was agreed to.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Ainey, Andrews, Armstrong, Baer, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bannan, Barclay, Bartholomew, Beebe, Biddle, Black, J. S., Bowman, Boyd, Brodhead, Broomall, Brown, Buckalew, Carey, Cassidy, Church, Clark, Collins, Corson, Cronmiller, Darlington, Davis, Edwards, Ellis, Ewing, Fell, Finney, Funck, Gibson, Gowen, Green, Hall, Harvey, Hazzard, Hunsicker, Lamber-ton, Littleton, Long, M'Camant, M'Connell, MacVeagh, Metzger, Palmer, H.W., Parsons, Patterson, D.W., Porter, Pughe, Reed, John R., Reynolds, James L., Reynolds, S. H., Rooke, Runk, Russell, Sharpe, Smith, W. H., Stanton, Temple, Van Reed, Wetherill, J. M., White, Harry and Wright—65.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President: I rise to a point of order. I think it requires a two-thirds vote to adopt the resolution. I call the attention of the President to Rule 25: "In committee of the whole a delegate may speak oftener than twice upon any subject." Rule 40th says: "No rule shall be altered or dispensed with, without a two-thirds vote of the members present."

The PRESIDENT: The Chair understands that to be to dispense with a rule upon a particular occasion, and he holds that it does not require a two-thirds vote to adopt a new rule of the House, which has now been done, the resolution having lain upon the table for one day, and having now been taken up and adopted. For that reason the Chair is of the opinion that a majority of two-thirds is not required.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Convention then, as in committee of the whole, Mr. Lawrence in the chair, proceeded to the further consideration of the article reported by the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the ninth section.

The CLERK read: "No election or appointment to fill a casual vacancy in a public office shall extend beyond the unexpired term."

Mr. Kaine. Mr. Chairman: It strikes me that this section does not belong to this article, but, more properly, to the Committee on Offices. The Committee on Offices is preparing sections on various subjects of this kind, and this is one of them. The subject has no connection whatever with suffrage and election. I submit, therefore, that it does not belong to this article of the Constitution at all.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I desire simply to add that my venerable friend from Fayette (Mr. Kaine) is chairman of the Committee on Commissions and Offices, and I trust that this section will be passed over.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: I suppose there is no objection to the adoption of the section at present. We supposed that it belonged to this committee. There is an interloping, of course, in every case in which committees are appointed upon principles and not upon articles; but there is no objection to its being adopted here. If there is a similar provision to be reported by another committee, it will not interfere with this. I think it is well, in all such cases, to allow a subject to be passed upon, so as not to prejudice the report of the committee in any way.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman: It seems to me that there are objections to the consideration, certainly to the adoption, of this clause at this time. Amongst other reasons for this, that it applies to the judiciary, and until the report of the Judiciary Committee has been made to the Convention and we know how many judges there are hereafter to be, and how they are to be elected—whether singly or in groups, and if in groups then in what manner—we cannot properly enter upon the consideration of the question whether the election of a judge to fill a vacancy shall be for the remainder of an unexpired term or for a full term. I am not prepared to vote upon this question now, and hope the consideration of the section will be postponed until the report of the Judiciary Committee is before the Convention.

The only way in which the consideration of the question can be postponed in this committee is to vote down the section now, and let it come up again when the report of the Judiciary Committee is before us.

The question being taken upon the section it was rejected.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I offer a new section, to come in at this point.

The CLERK read: "It being the duty of every elector to vote, the Legislature may pass such laws as it may deem necessary to secure the performance of that duty.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I rise for information—whether it would be proper to introduce a new section at this stage.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. WHERRY. After the motion to postpone the following section?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: At the suggestion of a member of this Convention and of quite a number of citizens of the Commonwealth, I introduced a resolution at Harrisburg, during the early days of the Convention, upon the subject of compulsory voting. Since that time I have had quite a number of communications upon that subject, and have been approached by men of intelligence from all parts of the State, urging me to press the consideration of the question upon the Convention. I am fully convinced that it is proper and fully convinced that it should be adopted by the Convention. Whether we are far enough advanced in civilization to go so far as that, I am not ready to say. It is well known that there are from twenty-five to seventy-five thousand of the best citizens of the State of Pennsylvania who do not usually attend elections, and if these men did attend and exercised the elective franchise as they should do, it would probably change the complexion of many elections. I can see no objection to it. It may be said that it is contrary to the spirit of our institutions. I think not. We say that it is a man's duty to sit upon a jury, and the laws compel him so to do, we say it is the duty of a man to hold municipal and other offices, and if he refuses to do it we fine him for so refusing, and also the same is true with reference to a great many other things which we compel people to do and the result of which is no more beneficial to the institutions of the Commonwealth than their going to the polls and casting their votes. This proposition does not compel a man to vote any particular way, but compels him to show himself at the polls and vote in some way.

I am not in hopes of passing this measure through the committee or the Convention, but I feel under obligation to persons who have approached me, and for this reason I have brought it up at this time.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I rise to ask a question whether the gentleman conceives it to be necessary to give this grant of power to the Legislature to enable them to pass such a law if they deem proper?

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: I will state as chairman of the committee, that this is a partial report. Subject matter which was referred to the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, if still before it. The gentleman who offered this amendment is a member of that committee, and I suggest that it is improper for us to entertain new sections before that committee has completed its report. If, in their final report, anything is omitted that should be inserted, there will be ample opportunity to have it inserted, and if members are to get up here, and on this partial report, make all the suggestions that occur to their minds, we will not get through with this partial report for weeks to come.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman: I will simply suggest to the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) that if he will make a slight modification of his amendment I shall vote for it; that is, if the Legislature take measures to compel them to vote the democratic ticket.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I desire to explain, as far as the chairman of the committee is concerned. I do not consider it proper to state the action of the committee. It has already dispensed with this subject, passed it over, and I think the remarks of the chairman are entirely uncalled for upon that ground.

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. Chairman: I wish to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Washington, (Mr. Hopkins,) by adding the words "or republican ticket, just as they are of a mind to; and if they do not, they shall stay in jail until the next election."

The question being on the section as introduced by Mr. Lilly, it was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the tenth section.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 10. The Legislature shall provide by law, that in all elections for directors or managers of incorporated companies, every stockholder shall have the right to vote in person or by proxy, for the number of shares of stock owned by him, for as many persons as there are directors or managers to be elected, or to cumulate said shares and give one candidate as many votes as the number of directors multiplied by the number of his shares of stock, equal, or to distribute them on the same principle among as many candidates as he shall think fit, and directors or managers shall not be elected in any other manner.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the section belongs to the Committee on Corporations, and that committee is preparing a report that will cover this ground. Therefore I hope the section will not be considered at present.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Woodward,) to which committee on corporations this gentleman supposes this refers?

Mr. WOODWARD. The Committee on Private Corporations has the subject now under consideration.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: Private corporations is divided into two classes—canals and railroads, and other private corporations.

Mr. WOODWARD. Our rules will answer the gentleman's question. We have a Committee on Railroads and Canals, and a committee on all private corporations, except railroads and canals and private and literary corporations. The Committee on Private Corporations and the Committee on Railroads are about to hold a joint meeting, and will probably make several reports covering this very subject. Obviously the subject belongs to one or the other of these committees. There will be no conflict between them, but it is quite out of order for the Committee on Elections to take the subject away from those committees and legislate with reference to it, without regard to what they are doing.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this subject properly and naturally belongs to what we suppose to be the Committee on Private Corporations. I suggest, therefore, that the section shall not be passed upon at present, and when the report of the Committee on Private Corporations is made, the section can then be amended. In the meanwhile, I think it would be injudicious to take any action upon the section.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: There is no disposition at all to press this section upon the committee; but it clearly belongs to the Committee on Suffrage and Election, from the simple and conceded fact that it was discussed in various other committees. The fact is, if the subject matter of this section belongs to the Committee on Private Corporations, it belongs as well to the Committee on Railroads and Canals, of which I am a member; and I know that that committee does not claim that it comes within their supervision or the line of their duty. I am of the opinion, however, that this section comes within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Railroads and Canals as much as it does the Committee on Private Corporations. The manner in which the sections of this article may be arranged is a matter for future consideration, and therefore the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation did not number them, but reported them without numbers for the convenience of the committee of the whole, and of the printer. Where this section shall go in the Constitution is a matter for future adjustment, but as a committee of conference has been suggested between the Committee on Private Corporations and the Committee on Elections, there is no disposition, whatever, to press the section.

The question was then taken on the section, and it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION — Wards of cities, or boroughs and townships, shall form or be divided into election districts of compact and contiguous territory, in such manner as the court of common pleas of the city or county in which the same are located may direct: Provided, All districts in cities of over one hundred thousand inhabitants shall be divided by the courts of common pleas of said cities, whenever the preceding election shows the polling of more than two hundred votes, and in other election districts whenever the court of the proper county shall be satisfied that the convenience of the electors and the public interests will be promoted thereby.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman: I offer to amend the section, by striking out all after the word "manner," preceding the proviso, and inserting the words, "as shall be prescribed by law." In offering this motion I would submit to the committee, in the first place, that I doubt very much whether this section properly belongs to this Committee on Suffrage. It seems to me it comes more properly within the line of duty of the Committee on Cities, City Charters, Counties, Townships and Boroughs; but still, as it has come before the committee for consideration, I have moved this amendment. In moving the amendment I have been influenced by several reasons which have convinced me that the section should not be adopted as reported by the committee. With due deference to the Committee on Suffrage, I must differ with its members in regard to the propriety of incorporating in the Constitution of the State a provision which, to my mind, embraces a subject of legislation. In the second place, not only does the matter contained in this section belong to the Legislature, but by the adoption of this provision in the Constitution the Convention will, in fact, legislate for the people of the wards, counties and boroughs of the State.

Now sir, this section, as reported by the committee, provides that the wards of cities or boroughs and townships shall be divided, but that all districts in cities of over one hundred thousand inhabitants shall be divided by the court of common pleas whenever the preceding election shows the polling of more than two hundred votes, and in other election districts whenever the court of the proper county shall be satisfied that the convenience of the electors and the public interests will be promoted thereby. It will be observed that this section is directly intended to apply to one city of the Commonwealth, perhaps two, the city of Philadelphia and the city of Pittsburg. Now why should we specially legislate for two municipalities in the State? I submit that such a provision as this will take away from the people of the cities and counties the right to legislate upon their own internal affairs. Not only is it legislation, but it is special legislation. It is designed to legislate specially for the people of these two particular localities, and so the city of Philadelphia and the city of Pittsburg are to be divided by the Constitution into election districts which shall comprise only two hundred voters. I agree entirely with the intentions of this proposition of the Committee on Suffrage, and I believe that it is wise and proper to divide the election districts into small sections of two hundred or three hundred voters, but I submit that this is a matter which belongs entirely to the people of each section of the State. They should be the judges, and should know whether such a division of the wards or townships is necessary and warranted by the necessities of the case. The committee, however, in introducing this proposition, designs that the Convention shall legislate for the people of these different sections, and I contend that it is inconsistent with all precedent. The Committee on Cities and City Charters reported on Friday last a section, to which I call the special attention of the committee. It reads as follows:

"The Legislature shall pass no special law creating any municipality or regulating its form of government or management of its internal affairs."

How can we consistently, with the views of the people, or with the views which we have ourselves expressed upon this very subject, specially legislate in favor of such a section in the State Constitution as has been proposed? Why we propose to prevent the Legislature from legislating upon special matters, and upon taking away from the people of different localities the right to govern themselves in all internal affairs, and yet we propose, in this Constitution, to tie the hands of the people of two of the largest cities in the Commonwealth in regard to this very matter. I submit that the people of these sections, through their municipal legislators, are far better judges than the Convention whether such a division shall be made. I consider that the provision is entirely improper, for it not only designs to legislate for the people of these sections, but it proposes a system of odious special legislation, and to give to the judges of our court of common pleas this power. Is this right? As was remarked by the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) the other day, are we to be governed by the judiciary? I submit not at all. Why, sir, I think I will surprise this committee when I inform them how, by special legislation, the judges of the city and county of Philadelphia regulate our internal police affairs. What are they doing now? By special acts of Assembly, the judges of our courts appoint members of the board of revision of taxes, controllers of the public schools, guardians of the poor, the board of health, prison inspectors, mercantile appraisers, commissioners of Fairmount park, inspectors of the Eastern penitentiary and board of city trusts. I would like to enquire where we are to stop. Is this Convention further to empower the judges of our courts to divide our election precincts? I find no fault with the appointments made by our judges, for they have uniformly appointed the most reputable and upright citizens of our community, but, sir, is it right in principle that this power of self-government should be taken away from the people of our different cities and counties and placed in the hands of our judiciary? It is not judicial, and I consider that this patronage of our judges is becoming entirely contrary to the spirit of our institutions, and I would add, it is not only undesired by them but is obnoxious to them. Are we then, by means of this special form of legislation, to compel our judges to sit upon the bench and attend to petitions respecting the division of our election districts into two hundred voters or more. I submit it is entirely wrong in principle, although I confess the object of the provision coincides with my views. If such a proposition was submitted in another form, I would gladly vote for it, for I believe in dividing our cities into small election districts. I think, however, this power should rest solely with the municipal legislature. The people, through their immediate representatives, can attend to all this matter. How would it be if we should provide in our State Constitution that every city of so many thousand inhabitants should be supplied with gas and water? Would not such a suggestion be as wise as the provision which the Committee on Suffrage has reported? for it is, after all, a matter of mere police regulation. It is nothing more or less than a matter affecting the private internal affairs of the different municipalities of the State, and I do submit, while it may be necessary thus to divide the city, and while I would gladly vote for such a proposition in the proper place, yet I deem it exceedingly unwise and improper for the Convention to place such a trivial insignificant matter in the Constitution of the State. I therefore hope that it will be submitted, as a proposition, to the Legislature of the State, for representing, as they do, our citizens. I have no doubt that their wishes and intentions will be duly expressed.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the amendment by adding the following words: "All districts in cities of over one hundred thousand inhabitants shall be divided by the city councils of said cities, whenever the preceding election shows the polling of more than two hundred votes."

Mr. HANNA. I accept the modification of the amendment.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I shall oppose this section, because in the first place, I do not like those special provisions in our Constitution. I am in favor of making our Constitution applicable to the entire State, not putting special provisions in it with reference to special localities. I am further opposed to this amendment, because it applies to the city of Pittsburg, although intended primarily only for the city of Philadelphia. It would apply to the two cities, only, Philadelphia and Pittsburg.

Now, I am not prepared to say, positively, that our people do not want this provision, but I think I can say they do not want it, because I never heard such a desire expressed by any citizens of the city of Pittsburg. I know that our election districts in that city are a great deal larger than this section proposes, and I know, also, that they can be divided and they are divided as often as the people of our city desire them to be divided. I never heard complaint on this score. I believe that to multiply our election districts and limit them down to about one hundred voters, because that will be the practical operation of this. If, whenever the vote exceeds two hundred, the district is to be divided, some districts will probably have, on the average, less than one hundred votes at each election. No district will have two hundred votes, because it will then have to be divided. To multiply election districts in that way, with all the section officers, seems to me an unnecessary expense and an unnecessary burden, and in the absence of any reason or any expression of opinion in favor of it, I shall oppose such a provision. I can see no use in it.

I am opposed to it further, because I do think that this is a matter that ought to be left to the discretion of the Legislature, or the discretion of the people. Why should we put this unyielding, unbending provision in our Constitution? There may be localities where it would be desirable to have small election districts, but there are other localities where they can have two or three hundred or even four hundred voters that will accommodate the people better than these very small districts. I know the fact, and perhaps every member of the Convention knows the fact, that there are districts throughout our State, many of them that have more than two hundred votes, and you could not get the voters in those districts to consent to a division. In all our rural districts the people vote in townships where they have three hundred, four hundred or sometimes five hundred voters. They get through the election in time and without any difficulty.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I will state that there are three districts in Washington county where there are over five hundred voters.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I know that in Allegheny county we have a number of districts that contain from four hundred to five hundred voters.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman: I desire to state to my colleague that one precinct in Allegheny county contains nearly two thousand voters.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. My colleague states that one district in Allegheny City contains very nearly two thousand voters. I think that is too many. I do not believe there ought to be so many; still, that is a matter for the people. I cannot see that we ought to put such an iron rule in the Constitution, one that is unyielding and unbending, and without any exception, that in cities of one hundred thousand inhabitants election districts must be divided whenever the vote exceeds two hundred.

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. Chairman: It seems to me that this had better be postponed until we ascertained the construction of the courts. That would have a great deal of influence upon the minds of many gentlemen in relation to their votes upon this subject. It seems to me, therefore, that we had better postpone it until that point is ascertained. In my own mind, my own judgment would be to allow these divisions to be made in cities by the city councils, and in the other counties of the State, if we have courts constituted somewhat after the present form, composed of three judges, it seems to me that they should make that division. But in such cases I would let the people be heard from. It should be left to the people to determine when such a change was necessary, and it ought to be done only on petition. I would not, as my friend from Allegheny (Mr. J. W. F. White) says, put in an imperative provision like this. I would leave it so that the people of a particular locality, on petition, might have their district changed to suit their convenience.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. Chairman: I am not entirely in favor of the section as reported by the Committee on Suffrage, Elections and Representation, although I agree with some of the ideas it embodies. I am opposed to inserting so much machinery in the Constitution. I would be in favor of passing a general article on this subject, and permit the Legislature to carry it into execution. I prefer offering an amendment, so as to make the whole section read in this way:

Wards of cities, or boroughs and townships, shall form or be divided into election districts of compact and contiguous territory, containing not over two hundred voters, in such manner as shall be defined by law.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: That is exactly Mr. Hanna's amendment.

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I would suggest to the gentleman from Allegheny that the Legislature has that power now.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I admit that the Legislature has this power.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: It seems to me that the consideration of this section should not be discussed at the present time. The Committee on Cities and City Charters have presented a report, and if that report be adopted it will conflict with a part of this section. That committee have seen fit to give the cities full and supreme control over their own affairs, believing that inasmuch as power must be fixed somewhere, that power should be lodged in the mayor, the select and common councils of cities. To that view I believe the Convention will assent, and yet if we adopt this section we will say that this Convention does not agree to that principle. On the other hand, with regard to the regulations of elections in boroughs and townships, I suppose that that matter will be taken up and discussed by the Committee on Boroughs and Townships, and inasmuch as the Committee on Cities and City Charters have reported, and it is likely the Committee on Boroughs and Townships will report perhaps adversely to the proposition as presented by the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, I think it would be well if we postponed the consideration of that section until that time. I would be extremely sorry if we would in this way prevent the full and complete control of cities in the management of their own affairs. I can see clearly how the select and common councils of the city of Philadelphia would know much more in regard to the regulation of election districts than any court, and if they do wrong, if they act improperly, there is a corrective principle behind, which, at the proper time, will present and enforce a proper corrective. And on reflection I am satisfied that no special legislation should be asked for in relation to the regulation of the internal affairs of any city. For that reason I shall vote against this section; and for the reason that both of the other committees I have named may at the proper time present reports which will be adverse to this section. I hope that the further consideration of the section will be postponed for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not in order.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: How does the section, as it has been amended, read?

The CLERK. Wards of cities, or boroughs and townships, shall form or be divided into election districts of compact and contiguous territory, in such manner as shall be provided by law: Provided, all districts in cities of over 100,000 inhabitants shall be divided by the city council of said cities whenever the preceding election shows the polling of more than two hundred votes.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman: I should not have been able to vote for that section had the power of dividing districts been left in the hands of the courts. I most decidedly object to mixing up the courts with the exercise of those matters which are simply and purely political, and whose tendency is to degrade the courts and draw them away from the discharge of their proper judicial duties. But as this section has been amended, I am quite ready to support it, for the reason that I assigned the other day, that I believe it shows a wholesome provision tending to protect the proper exercise of the elective franchise, and calculated to advance the public interests in that direction. I am prepared, therefore, to vote for the amendment, and the section as it will stand when amended.

Mr. M'MURRAY. Mr. Chairman: The reason why the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation proposed this section was, to meet the objection that the election precincts of our large cities were entirely too large. Not only inconveniently large, but so large that the number of voters afforded an opportunity for illegal voting; and it was to get rid of this difficulty of illegal voting, or rather in order that the electors of a district might be better enabled to detect persons offering to vote illegally, that this section was presented.

I think the section an admirable one, and I really hope the Convention will approve it. Nay, from the tenor of the discussion that has taken place already on the report of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, I supposed it was taken for granted by the majority of the body that this section would be adopted without any opposition. Gentlemen, in their remarks uttered, during the course of the debate upon the pending report, have virtually pledged themselves to vote for this section, and have referred to it as the specific remedy for those irregularities which it was proposed to cure by other sections. It was remarked the other day of one of our cities—I believe the remark referred specially to Pittsburg—that in some of the districts there, just before election, some of the hotels would be so full of voters that you could see their legs sticking out of the windows. I do not know whether that is literally true or not, but probably it was an approach to truth. Probably these hotels were overcrowded and the proprietors could not accommodate their guests properly, and I am perfectly willing to come to their relief.

But that is not the object of the section. As we have done before in nearly every discussion, so here we almost immediately come to the subject of frauds in elections, and it was for the purpose of preventing these that this section was proposed.—Whether the precincts shall be divided by the courts or the councils, is immaterial to me. I prefer the courts, because I believe them to be entirely non-partisan, and have an abiding confidence in our judiciary. Councils would, probably, be partisan. That might not be much of an objection, but if we must choose between two tribunals, we should choose the better, and I think the courts would be entirely the better tribunal. I really hope that this section will be adopted, and that no member will make any captious objection to it. The gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. J. W. F. White) objects seriously, and says the people of Allegheny and Pittsburg do not wish their precincts divided, as they are not too large. I think the people of that county, especially of Pittsburg, would do well to have their precincts divided. If I am credibly informed, a very large proportion of the voting of that city is done late in the evening, after twilight and darkness have gathered around the polls. That certainly affords great facility for fraud in polling votes. By this measure we desire to protect the ballot-box from receiving illegal votes; and by other provisions we seek to purge it from illegal votes that have crept in. If I had one object in view in coming to this Convention, it was that I might, by my voice and vote, purge the ballot-box of frauds and irregularities that have surrounded, and even found their way into it.

I think this is a very wholesome provision, and I appeal to gentlemen here to allow it to pass. The precincts now are divided almost all over the State by the courts. This section only provides an arbitrary rule as to numbers for cities of over one hundred thousand inhabitants; the places where illegal votes are most likely to be cast. It leaves the matter, so far as it relates to the small towns and country districts, just as it has been heretofore. But it should not be left to the discretion of councils, courts or any other tribunal to say where the division should be made. But the precincts should be so small that each elector in a district might know every other elector, and that none but honest votes should go into the ballot-box, and I want the rule compulsory so that the division must be made whenever a precinct shows the polling of more than a certain number of votes, but I would prefer that that number should be two hundred and fifty or three hundred.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: The people heretofore have had the most implicit confidence in the judiciary, and in order that they may continue to have the most implicit confidence in them, I hope this power will not be given to them. There is another objection which is one of detail. In the city of Philadelphia we have at each election division twelve officers, and if each division is to consist of not more than two hundred inhabitants, and inasmuch as a considerable portion of the inhabitants do no vote, the consequence would be that you would at every election have about seven per cent. of the voting population engaged as election officers.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: The proviso is not that the districts shall be reduced in size so as to contain only two hundred inhabitants, but two hundred who actually voted at the last preceding election, the presumption being that at least an equal number will vote at the next succeeding election. I trust that the principle of this section will be adopted. I hope the committee will make a provision to limit election districts so that no one will comprise more than two hundred voters, for I believe that nothing will so aid in the suppression of fraud as the intimate personal knowledge which each man would then have of every other man offering to vote in the same district. But I desire to call the attention of the committee, for one moment only, to the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Hanna,) as it has been modified by myself. Objection has been made, and I think well made, to the original proposition, because it intends to lodge in the courts the power to divide election districts. I do not propose to go over the argument upon that subject again. I concur in the objection, but I think it will be well removed by the adoption of the pending amendment, so as to make the section read that "election districts shall be composed of compact and contiguous territory in such manner as by law may be provided; but any and all districts in cities of over one hundred thousand inhabitants shall be divided by the city councils thereof, whenever at the preceding election more than two hundred votes shall have been cast in such district or in each of several such districts." This would meet the objection of the gentleman from Philadelphia on my right, (Mr. Wetherill,) and would vest the power to divide districts, where it ought to be, in the city councils to determine, and in the rural districts, as to which there seems to be a difference of opinion upon the subject, the proposed amendment leaves the whole matter to the Legislature. The purpose of this section is to restrict the number of voters to a district in the large cities, and that object is good, and the amendments which have been submitted make it possible to attain it without casting legislative duties upon judicial officers.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I think that the section as amended is a very wholesome one, and should be adopted, as modified at the suggestion of my colleague, (Mr. Dallas,) I agree with him and with my other colleague (Mr. Newlin) in suggesting to this committee that the courts of the city of Philadelphia should not have the right to re-district our election divisions. It is not necessary to state the reasons for lodging this power in some other hands. I prefer to leave it with the councils of large cities in preference to the Legislature, for the reason that the section which was read by the chairman of the Committee on Cities and City Charters, which provides that the whole machinery of our city government shall be left in the hands of the city councils.

It is evident, from what has taken place in the elections in the city of Philadelphia, and in other large cities, that the substance of this section should be adopted; and the only question is as to whom the power shall be vested in. I believe it should be left with the legislative department of the particular locality to which it is adopted, and for this reason I am in favor of leaving it with the councils of Philadelphia, if this section is to be adopted at all. If it could be taken out of the committee of the whole I would be in favor of taking this subject up when we come to discuss and consider the result of the labors of the Committee on Cities and City Charters, but if we are to adopt it here, I am in favor of leaving it where my friend from the city (Mr. Dallas) desires it to be left by his amendment, to the city councils of the city of Philadelphia, and other large cities, to determine when and how the division shall be made, restricting it always to an election district not containing over two hundred voters.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: This section is one of a series reported by the Committee on Suffrage, intended to secure integrity in elections. That is its principal object, and, so far as that object is concerned, I desire to submit a few words to the committee before a vote is taken.

At present the power of establishing new election districts is vested, generally, throughout the State, in courts of quarter sessions. By legislation it is provided that the people living in districts proposed to be divided may vote upon this subject; at least, there is such a regulation of law upon the question of establishing new election districts. You will observe that this section says that these districts shall be made under the "direction" of the court. The power is not to be exercised by the court directly, but by commissioners appointed by the court. All that is required is that the authority of the court shall be appealed to, in order to establish. The court will have a supervisory power over reports which shall be made to them by the persons whom they shall appoint for this purpose.

Now this section of the present report of the Committee on Suffrage establishes a uniform rule for the whole State, so far as the power of creating election districts is concerned, and therefore it is a proper and a judicious provision.

If gentlemen shall succeed in carrying their amendment, leaving this power, in certain cases, to the legislative bodies, the councils of cities, I see no reason why they should not extend their amendment, so that it shall vest the power in councils of boroughs and commissioners of counties. If they shall succeed in carrying their amendment, by which the courts in a part of the State shall be prevented from ever exercising this power, I think we had better drop the section. We had better let matters remain as they are now; for at present, in the case of the city of Philadelphia at least, the councils have a statute power upon this subject. It is a very peculiar provision, because, when they have acted, they must send the record of their proceeding to the court of quarter sessions of the city. You must have a place where you can find these records—not among the loose papers of a city or town council or a commissioners' office—you must have them in court.

Now what reason is there why the councils of a city should have this power ordinarily vested in the courts of quarter sessions? There is no reason in the world for this, unless there be some desire to gerrymander the wards or election divisions of a great city. No other reason for it can be presented.

The most convenient, the cheapest, the most efficient and the most unobjectionable mode of establishing new election districts, is by the appointment of commissioners, just as we make local divisions of townships and of school districts throughout the State. Prompt, competent men are always selected, and if there is anything wrong in their action and the citizens have the chance to appeal to the court, to object to the report of the commissioners and have it corrected. Ordinarily the courts do not interfere, except for strong reasons. The inconveniences of dancing attendance upon two chambers of councils, in case the citizens think that wrong has been done, and desire to appeal to the authorities, is apparent, should the power be vested in the Legislature of a city. These gentlemen serve, I believe, without pay. The hearing is very different from what it would be in a court of justice.

I think, therefore, that we should place a provision in the Constitution, that the courts of quarter sessions, in both city and county, shall direct the manner in which all election districts should be made. This will also prevent vicious legislation at Harrisburg. If it is not so provided, this power may be vested in one city in the councils, in another in the courts; in one county it may be vested in the commissioners, and in another, a different rule may prevail.

It is a judicial proceeding, notwithstanding the criticisms which have been made here. It has been so regarded, practically, almost uniformly in our State, and it is properly vested in the courts of quarter sessions, which are charged with very nearly all the municipal judicial business of the State. Properly the changing of these election districts, and still should be with local authority, but it may be done by the Legislature. A provision of the Constitution of the State, prohibits the Legislature from acting where the courts can act, but the prohibition does not extend to municipalities; it applies only to corporations of a business character. Therefore, this power may still be exercised by the Legislature at the instance of individual interest.

The other provision here relates to the number of voters in an election precinct, where the voters in any precinct, in a city of one hundred thousand inhabitants, shall exceed two hundred, the precinct shall be divided. Now, I do not pretend to say what the number should be. The members of the Committee on Suffrage from this city seemed to acquiesce in that number; therefore, I favored it. If a higher number is desired I am willing to take it, even if it be three hundred; but there ought to be, in order to avoid difficulty hereafter, and to give an inflexible and binding rule to the court, some number fixed, so that citizens, when they come to the court can say to the court that it has jurisdiction, and not only jurisdiction, but that it is its duty, a duty charged upon it by the people, to do what they ask in the matter. What is the object of small election districts in cities? Why, in the first place they are necessary in order that the election board shall know all the voters. If you poll, as you sometimes do now, in cities, six or eight hundred votes in one election precinct, it is impossible for the election officers to know all, or even one-half of them; and this is one of the principal reasons why there are fraudulent personations of voters at elections.

It is necessary, therefore, in this respect, that the election divisions of cities should be kept within small limits. But there is another reason for it now, because these election divisions are so large, and there is so much work thrown on the election officers, that you have to have special laws for cities in order to work the system. You provide here in Philadelphia for nine election officers to hold elections in every precinct of the city. You have, first, two window inspectors, and their two clerks; making four; the judge of the election, five; there are two return inspectors and their clerks, which make nine; and while the window inspectors are receiving the tickets during an hour, the return inspectors are counting the votes for the previous hour, so that you have a board of nine officers. When you come to the question of how the election officers shall be chosen and how many there shall be, I trust we shall go back to the old provision of the statute of '39 and provide that three election officers shall be chosen by the people in every district of the State and city directly by their own votes, and in such a manner that they will be divided between political parties, and then the inspectors will appoint their clerks, and if you have any additional persons officially present in the election room in a city let it be a watcher or somebody appointed by the local courts of the State or of the United States, charged with such power as may be necessary as a check upon the election board.

You observe, then, that if you reduce your electoral divisions in the city you can dispense with four election officers in every precinct, and I insist upon it that, instead of this provision accumulating expenses, it will leave the sum total of election outlay about what it is now; that the element of expense is out of the case, if, by such provision, you can reduce the number of officers; if you can keep the level of expenses of elections about what it is now; if you can secure a knowledge of all the voters by the election boards, because they live in the immediate neighborhood, and are but a small number, you will secure the purity of the ballot-box and a most valuable reform.

Why then should not this section be adopted? It is drawn for the whole State and is uniform, so far as the power of creating new districts from existing ones is concerned. Discretion, however, is properly allowed to the courts with reference to the size and population of interior election districts. We provide, as the section is drawn, that in the interior of the State, in agricultural regions, the courts shall not be compelled to divide districts unless public necessities and the convenience of the people require it. That is the only difference proposed between city and country in the section.

MR. GUTHRIE. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment to the amendment: To insert in the third line before the word "in," the words, "containing not over two hundred voters," and strike out all after the word "law," in the amendment now pending.

MR. CASSIDY. Mr. Chairman: I think the report of the committee should be adopted. I earnestly protest against the Legislature of the State or the councils of the city having anything to do with the formation of election districts. It is not a legislative duty at all, and is no more a political matter than it is to pass upon any measure involving our rights of liberty or property. One of the necessary steps in the reform that we are called upon to carry out is to enable us have honest elections. One of the steps that is necessary to carry out this purpose we have already adopted. As another advance in the cause of reform, none has been presented more important than that now under consideration. It proposes that election districts hereafter shall be so formed as not to exceed two hundred votes. I should have preferred a much smaller district, mainly on the ground that where the smallest number of votes have to be polled there would be the least chance of fraud. If you have but one hundred votes to be polled, the persons residing in the district would know every voter, and the same line of argument would apply to the district of two hundred votes, but of course not in the same degree. In a district where the votes are known to each other you can see at once there could be no such thing as importing or colonizing voters, and you would have the additional opportunity of permitting the whole of the election law to be considered and enforced by the election board.

I submit to the Convention that it is not physically possible for the election officers to do their whole duty, and take more than twenty votes an hour, or a vote in every three minutes, and at that rate you would take a working day of ten hours to poll two hundred votes. If a person comes up to vote, he is to announce to the election officers who he is, where he resides, how long he has resided there, whether naturalized or not, and the various claims that he has to present his vote and have it polled. That, to be calmly and carefully considered, as I trust we agree all election officers ought to treat the matter, will, at least, take the time I have indicated. To say that it would take less time, would be to say that the taking of the vote would be simply the physical discharge of the duty of taking the ticket from the voters hand and putting it into the box, without asking any question or testing him as to his qualifications. That is not the whole duty of the election officers, for, under the obligation of his oath, he is not only to take the vote of the person, but to see that the person who presents it has the legal right to vote. Therefore I submit to the Convention, that it is a physical impossibility for the election officers, who will do their duty, to take more than two hundred votes in one day. This being conceded, the necessity for small districts is established. Who are to form the districts? Surely not the Legislature, if you would have them formed without regard to political preference. The Legislature, past experience establishes, will form the election districts so as to give their political friends power; and this will be so no matter which party is in power. They have done so time out of mind in making senatorial and representative, and even in judicial districts, they have made these districts to suit themselves and the political party they represent, and they will do so to-day. The same argument applies to the city councils. They will be called upon to carry out the views of the political parties which they represent, and if they are called upon to do that, will they not do what their predecessors have done time out of mind?

Is this state of affairs not an evil, and one of the very things that gave rise to this Convention? Are we not here to so form the organic law, that the system of "gerrymandering" shall not any longer be carried into effect throughout this State? It has been a discredit and a disgrace to the Commonwealth, and all agree that it ought to be changed. If so, where can this power be most safely vested? I submit in the courts of the Commonwealth. I do not care whether it shall be in the court of common pleas or other court. The court of common pleas was named, because it is a recognized court under the present Constitution. This power may be vested in the court of quarter sessions, or it may be placed in the hands of any other court. I am perfectly willing to trust the courts with the arbitration of this question, because whatever disputes may arise will be settled openly and judicially, and the people who have an interest in the proceedings will be entitled to be heard by counsel or by petition. The judges of these courts having been elected for long terms of office, are far removed from politics, and will decide these questions in court, not according to their political proclivities, as legislators do, but according to the wants and interests of the people.

I cannot agree with those in the Convention who have argued that such a provision as this will drag down the judiciary. This power which is proposed to be conferred upon the judges of our courts does not give them patronage. It simply devolves upon them the determination of a legal proposition, submitted to them for their decision, of the same character as the confirmation of an award of damages by a road jury, or to say whether or not a road shall run in a given direction, or whether a ward house shall be kept as a place for voting. These are all questions submitted to the courts of this county, and I have yet to hear any objection made to the exercise of this power by the judges on account of their partisan proclivities. I therefore submit that this question of dividing the precincts is one which should rest wholly within the jurisdiction of the courts, where the power will be far removed from even a suspicion of being governed by politics or politicians. It is said make this provision for Philadelphia alone. I answer that I am opposed, as a matter of principle, to framing a system exceptional in its character. I am not willing to place upon the record that the people of the city of Philadelphia require an exceptional constitutional provision for their benefit. On the contrary, I desire the people of this city to stand upon the same footing as the people of the rest of the State, lest, however, some of our friends from other parts of the State should except to this arrangement, we have provided that outside of cities it shall not be compulsory upon the courts to divide the precincts. In the provision for the country we have said that the courts shall only be called upon whenever, in their judgment, the popular interest shall require them to interfere. It therefore seems to me that this is a fair proposition, and I submit to the consideration of the convention that the more thought that is given to it the more convinced we must become that it will be one step further towards purifying city elections, while at the same time, it will in no way interfere with the conduct of elections in the rural districts.

Mr. MANTON. Mr. Chairman: It was not until the amendment to the amendment was offered that I designed saying anything upon this question, but after hearing all the arguments of the different gentlemen that have spoken on this subject, I cannot hesitate in declaring that I am opposed to the pending amendment.

In speaking of this subject, I desire to call the attention of the Convention to the fact, that it would be exceedingly inconvenient to divide into election districts the territory of wards of cities, boroughs and townships. In the county in which I live, which is, perhaps, one of the largest in the State, there are sixty-six election precincts. There are two incorporated cities in the county, and about nine boroughs, and there is no inconvenience whatever in polling the votes in times of election. The borough in which I live, contains about three to four hundred voters, and it would be certainly a great inconvenience if the borough was divided into two precincts, so that there would be only two hundred votes in each precinct. All the votes in that borough are cast without difficulty between morning and evening. No difficulty is experienced whatever, and I am, therefore, opposed to this section, because I think that it will trespass entirely upon the rights of a class of people who have heretofore been entirely satisfied with their election precincts. I feel confident that what I have said in regard to the county which I represent, will apply equally as well to all the counties of the rural districts. So far as the city of Philadelphia is concerned, or any of the other large cities in the State, I have little or nothing to say. I am rather of the opinion, however, that a division in the number of precincts would, perhaps, be beneficial in their elections, but it can certainly produce no good results in the rural districts, where the people are all acquainted with each other, and in my opinion, will only work great inconvenience, in dividing the townships, wards and boroughs in election precincts, so that each precinct shall not contain over two (200) hundred voters, as this amendment proposes. Therefore, I shall vote against this amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Chairman: I am opposed to the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Allegheny, which proposes to divide districts any where in the State whenever more than two hundred votes are polled. In the rural districts it may be taken for granted that at least nine-tenths of the voters are known to the election officers, and that proportion can vote as fast as their votes can be taken and their names recorded. In the city in which I reside, containing about twelve thousand inhabitants, the different wards contain a voting population varying from a little below to a little over two hundred each, and if a division was made every time more than two hundred votes were cast, it would result in exceeding inconvenience. Besides, if a division was made it would have to be by ward and township lines, otherwise, when ward or other local officers were elected, it would occasion great confusion, and if such lines are preserved the divisions would be unnecessarily small. Under the present system, in our towns and smaller cities, there is not the slightest difficulty in polling sometimes between three and four hundred votes in a ward, whereas, if these various sub-districts, which are proposed, are made in the large townships and small cities, it will become exceedingly burdensome. The provision which is contemplated may be applicable to the large cities of the State, but it certainly will not answer in the rural districts and smaller cities. It seems to me that this amendment will result in great inconvenience to them, without any corresponding benefit. I am therefore opposed to its adoption.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say a few words in reference to the object of this provision. It was designed mainly to protect the right of the voter, and to secure him justice—justice in the foundation of the district, as well as justice in the depositing of his ballot, and in that view, the same rule which now exists throughout the entire State, except Philadelphia, was applied to the State at large.

The Committee on Suffrage desired to secure uniform laws—laws governing the people throughout the State. The courts of quarter sessions now have the power that is proposed to be given by this section to the court of common pleas. If, however, the court of quarter session is preferred, by any delegate in this Convention, there is certainly no unwillingness to strike out the court of common pleas and insert the court of quarter sessions. Why, then, should not the same rule be applied to cities, in reference to the formation of these election districts throughout the entire State. It is said that the city councils in Philadelphia, have exercised this power, and it seems they feel disposed to hold on to it, which is but another evidence of the disposition of man never to surrender willingly any power he holds. Our inquiry, however, is, should the courts have this power? We say they should because the courts are not political bodies. They never have been, and I sincerely hope they never will become political bodies. It will be observed that the territory, out of which the districts are to be formed, is not only to be contiguous, but compact. A political body, whether the Legislature or the city council, will give a different construction to these words, "contiguous and compact," from what a judicial tribunal will do. A judicial tribunal is governed by principle and precedent, and one decision is followed by another decision, because of the first, but political bodies are governed by no such rules. I might refer to our legislatures gerrymandering the State, who think of referring to the action of one legislation as a reliable precedent for the action of another legislation. No one so great a fool as to think of it. Not so, however, had the power been vested in the judiciary. Had that been done in the past, we should now have laws upon the subject arising from the precedents. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this power will be conferred upon the courts, and that other powers in reference to the districting of the State will also be conferred upon the courts and not upon political bodies, who inquire, not what justice and law require them to do, nor what they can do for the benefit of the people at large, but what they can do for the benefit of their party. I would confer this power upon no such body, and it is therefore that I would have the city conform to the general law provided for the State.

Now this law is uniform, except in one particular. The power is the same and the only difference between city and county is that, in cities of over one hundred thousand inhabitants, the courts are compelled to divide a district when the voting population thereof exceeds two hundred. In the rural districts and throughout the entire residue of the State the courts are to exercise their judgment upon the petition of the citizens as to when districts should be made. It will not lead to any material changes of the present law in the country, but it was most earnestly contended by some of the city members of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, that unless the election districts were brought down to one hundred voters they could not protect the purity of the ballot. That number was thought too small and the two hundred was agreed upon as a compromise with great unanimity. That number will not create much inconvenience to anybody, and yet it is a number so small that when the list of voters is placed up a reasonable time before the election, inquiry can be made as to the qualification of every man whose name was upon the list, and all the knowledge obtained necessary to prevent illegal voting. If this end can be thus easily accomplished, why not adopt the section as reported? The purity of the ballot-box is the leading object of this restriction. The rule is uniform with the single exception stated. No special legislation will be required. The number, two hundred, was agreed upon as the number best suited to secure convenience and preserve the purity of the ballot-box. I hope, therefore, that these amendments will all be voted down and that the proposition as it came from the committee will pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I ask that it be read.

The CLERK. The gentleman from Allegheny moved to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "territory" in the first sentence, the words "containing not over two hundred votes," and striking out the proviso in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The section as amended will be read that it may be properly understood.

The CLERK. Wards of cities or boroughs and townships shall form or be divided into election districts of compact and contiguous territory containing not over two hundred votes in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I desire to offer the following, to come in at the end of the pending amendment. To add the words, "such districts to be as nearly equal in numbers as practicable."

Which was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Hanna,) modified as it will be read by the Clerk.

The CLERK. To strike out after the word "manner," in the first line, and insert, "as shall be prescribed by law: Provided, All districts in cities of over one hundred thousand inhabitants shall be divided by the councils of said cities whenever the preceding election shows the polling of over two hundred votes in any of said districts."

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I move to strike out from the fifth line the word "one," applying to one hundred thousand inhabitants, and insert the word "two."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose that as an amendment to the section, or to the amendment?

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. To the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had better wait until the amendment is disposed of.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman: If it is in order, I would ask for a division of the amendment, the division to be at the word "law."

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I want to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. A division of the amendment has been and is in order. The first division will be read.

The CLERK. "Wards of cities, or boroughs and townships, shall form or be divided into election districts of compact and contiguous territory, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law"—

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I want to offer an amendment before the division is made—to strike out "two hundred," in the proviso, and insert "three hundred."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Allegheny has called for a division of the amendment. The first division has been read, and the question is upon it. The gentleman from Carbon will have to wait until the division is taken.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman: I will withdraw the call for a division, to allow the gentleman from Carbon to present his amendment.

Mr. LILLY. Then I offer my amendment, to strike out "two hundred," in the proviso, and insert "three hundred."

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I object. I renew the call for a division.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I have a right to amend, and after we get through amending, if the division is desired it can be called.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Carbon has a right to amend if he offers his amendment at the right time.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman: I suppose the simple question before the committee is the division called for.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Allegheny first rose and asked for a division of the question, and afterwards yielded the floor to the gentleman from Carbon to offer his amendment. The question is on that amendment.

Which was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the first division.

On the question of agreeing to this, division was called. Thirty-three voting in the affirmative, it was decided rejected, less than a majority of a quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the second division, which will be read.

The CLERK. "Provided, All districts in cities of over one hundred thousand inhabitants shall be divided by the council of said cities whenever the preceding election shows the polling of over two hundred votes in any of said districts."

Mr. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman: I desire to amend, by striking out "two hundred" and inserting "four hundred."

Mr. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman: I desire to suggest that it is perfectly practicable to conduct an election in a precinct where the number of voters in the precinct is four hundred. In this city we will have two elections each year, according to the provision adopted by this Convention in reference to that subject, and if, in addition to doubling the elections, you increase the number of precincts, practically to double their present number, you will so multiply the expenses of the elections that they will become a burden.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Philadelphia move to amend the proviso of the printed section or the proviso of the manuscript amendment?

Mr. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman: I desire to make my amendment apply to the division of the amendment under consideration. I believe the proviso is in both the section and the amendment.

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I inquire whether my amendment is not now in order. I move to strike out "one hundred thousand" and insert "two hundred thousand."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Allegheny refers to the printed section, does he not?

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. No, sir; I refer to the proviso of the amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the amendment of the gentlemen related to the original section and not to the amendment. The Chair should have given the floor to the gentleman from Allegheny, but the gentleman from Philadelphia took it. The question will be first taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia to strike out "two hundred" and "four hundred."

Which was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny is now in order, and will be read.

The CLERK. "To strike out the words 'one hundred thousand,' and insert 'two hundred thousand.'"

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: Before the vote is taken I will say that I offer this amendment for the purpose of carrying out the views expressed by my colleague on the other side of the House (Mr. J. W. F. White.) We do not regard this provision as necessary for the city of Pittsburg. It is a city of about one hundred and thirty-three thousand inhabitants, and so far we have discovered no inconvenience in taking our votes in the precincts as at present composed. In the city of Allegheny, in the precinct in which I reside, we poll usually about one thousand votes, and yet I have never discovered any inconvenience in taking these one thousand votes. Therefore I do not desire that the provision shall be applied to the city of Pittsburg.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests to the Convention that the adoption of the proviso now would, perhaps, not be proper, as the first division has been voted down. The proviso is a provision upon what has been voted down.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I do not understand how the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. S. A. Purviance) can be voted on. We have agreed to vote on this second division of the original section.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not for the Chair to suggest to the committee, but if the proviso is voted down, then the balance of the section can be amended as the gentleman desires.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

The question being upon the amendment offered by Mr. Guthrie, it was rejected.

The question then being upon the proviso, it was rejected.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: If in order, I move to amend this by striking out the words, "common pleas," where they occur, and inserting the words, "quarter sessions."

The question being upon the amendment of Mr. Darlington, it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the section.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I do not know that I understand exactly what is before us, and what was done on the motion of my colleague (Mr. Guthrie.)

The CHAIRMAN. It was voted down; and the proviso was also voted down. Now, the question is on the section as amended by the motion of the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington.)

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. As I understand it then, the question is on the section as reported by the committee substituting "quarter sessions" for "common pleas."

The CHAIRMAN. That is it.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. I think, sir, there was a misunderstanding in the vote on the motion of my colleague (Mr. Guthrie.) I wish to present that to the committee properly and fairly. He moved, as I understand him, to strike out the word "one" in the fifth line and insert "two."

The CHAIRMAN. To strike out "two" and insert "three" according to the manuscript.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Well, sir, I move to strike out the word "one" in the fifth line and insert "five;" and I have merely this remark to make, I hope that, as this section is designed mainly for Philadelphia, and is not wanted by the delegates from Pittsburg in this Convention, the members from Philadelphia will not force it on Pittsburg. If it works well here, it can be adopted by us afterwards, but I do not believe it is wanted there, and I trust that those in the city of Philadelphia and elsewhere, who think this provision so important here will not force it upon the people of Pittsburg. The provision as it now stands, applies to these two cities, and my amendment is designed to except Pittsburg from it and leave it to apply to Philadelphia alone, and I trust that that will be agreed to.

Mr. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman: It seems to me that if this principle is to be adopted it should be general. I have yet to learn that there is any great demand in Philadelphia for a decrease in the number of voters who shall vote at a precinct. It is really of importance to Philadelphia to have the number increased than otherwise, because, as I said before, it increases the expenses enormously, especially when we are to have elections twice a year. I do not think we will have the benefit from it that is expected; but I think we should all be in the same boat. I think the number ought to be increased to four hundred to a precinct, with the same precincts that we have now.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I have only this to say in answer to the remarks of my colleague, (Mr. Littleton,) that the cost of contested elections—so frequent have these contests become—is much more than the cost of the elections in the first place.

Mr. LITTLETON. I think the gentleman is mistaken on that point.

The question being on the amendment offered by Mr. J. W. F. White, it was not agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I move to make this number two hundred and fifty. I think there is some force in the remark made, that after a precinct is divided there may not be over one hundred in either of the precincts into which it is divided. I think it would be as well not to make it imperative that it should be divided when it comes to have only just a little over two hundred.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: For the very reasons that the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew,) gives, I offered a motion to make the number three hundred. Now, under this proviso, if any district in Philadelphia or Pittsburg, shows a vote of two hundred and one persons at a precinct you have got to divide the precinct, and thus you multiply precincts very considerably.

The question being upon the amendment offered by Mr. Buckalew, it was agreed to.

The question then being upon the first section as amended, it was agreed to.

The proviso, as amended, was then read as follows :

Provided : All districts in cities of over one hundred thousand inhabitants, shall be divided by the courts of quarter sessions of said cities whenever the preceding election shows the polling of more than two hundred and fifty votes, and in other election districts, whenever the court of the proper county shall be satisfied that the convenience of the electors and the public interests will be promoted thereby.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I apprehend there was a mistake on the part of members of the committee in voting down the motion of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. J. W. F. White.) I think they were voting on the number of voters in a district. I would therefore move to amend the fifth line by striking out "one" and inserting "two," so as to make the number two hundred thousand.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman: I rise to a point of order. That proposition has been voted down.

Mr. MANN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Washington, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Guthrie) was a limit of the number of voters in a district.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. J. W. F. White) on my right, moved to strike out the word "one" and insert "two"—that is in reference to cities of a population of one hundred thousand.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I think I have the floor. I desire to state my proposition. I move to strike out the words "one hundred" in the fifth line and insert "two hundred and fifty," so as to read "two hundred and fifty thousand." I submit that that proposition has not been voted on, and it is therefore in order. I feel very confident the committee will accept this proposition when the members reflect that as the section stands it excludes from its provisions all the cities of the Commonwealth, except Pittsburg and Philadelphia. Why should Pittsburg be put in when Harrisburg, and Reading, and Lancaster are not in. If the proviso is intended to correct evils that are inherent in cities, why exclude these others? It is very clear there was a misapprehension as to the former motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a motion?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

The question being upon the amendment offered by Mr. Mann, it was rejected.

The question then being upon the proviso, a division was called for, and resulted, in the affirmative, 47; in the negative, 22.

So the proviso was agreed to.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: There is a supplementary report of the committee, partly on this same subject, on the next page.

The CHAIRMAN. It has nothing to do with this, unless it is moved as an amendment to the section.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I understood this to be a report from the same committee—the Committee on Suffrage—merely a supplementary report, and, of course, to be considered by the committee of the whole, precisely as the other has been. It will be for the chairman of the committee to say whether that is right or not.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee do now rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: I would remark that the Committee on Suffrage and Elections have other sections under consideration which they will report in a few days. We submit to the Convention, itself, the propriety of proceeding with the consideration of the supplementary reports. There are two of them—numbers four and five—or to defer them until we further report.

The CHAIRMAN. The chair would state that he thinks the only way to get the supplementary report before this committee would be to move the section as a new section.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I move we proceed to the consideration of supplemental report No. 5.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: It seems to me that as a further report will be made in a few days that will show the entire plan of the committee, it will be better to defer these sections until that report is made. Therefore I do not, as chairman of the committee, move these as new sections.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I am in favor of the committee taking that section five up.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I ask what has become of my motion that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he did not put the motion because the section was gone through with.

Mr. HOPKINS. That motion cannot be entertained for the simple reason that the section has been gone through with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Carbon moves to proceed to the consideration of supplementary report, No. 5, of the Committee on Suffrage and Elections.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I ask leave to make my motion that the committee rise and report the bill, as the bill has been gone through with.

The CHAIRMAN. It does not require a motion to report a bill.

The question being upon the motion of Mr. Lilly, a division was called, and resulted: In the affirmative, forty-one; in the negative, twenty-nine.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) that his understanding of the question is that the gentleman will have to move this supplement by sections.

Mr. LILLY. Yes, sir. My motion was to consider report No. 5.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: Why not proceed in the order in which they were reported, if you take it up at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Centre (Mr. M'Allister) be good enough to state how many sections there are?

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Two on No. 4 and one on No. 5. I move, as an amendment to the proposition, that the committee now proceed to the consideration of section one of No. 4.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: The only reason why I did not make that motion is that the gentleman who sits at my right (Mr. Brocmail) is absent to-day.

He made a special request of me that in case this matter of report No. 4 came up I would do what I could to postpone its consideration until he returns, as he wants to be heard upon it. I promised him I would do so.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman: May I be allowed to make a single remark? By order of the Convention these reports from the several committees were received as separate articles, and each has been printed as a separate article. The inconvenience of a committee cutting up its report into several distinct matters was obvious, I believe, to everybody from the beginning; but that course has been adopted. Now, the article referred to this committee of the whole is the article preceding No. 4. It is not competent for this committee to take up an article that has never been referred to it. It appears to me if any gentleman desires to go on with that article he has to make no reference to it as an article, but move the several words of that section as a new amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what the Chair stated, substantially. The Chair now understands that the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) moves as an amendment to add a new section to the bill. It will be read.

The Clerk then read the new section, as follows:

"All elections by persons in their representative capacities shall be viva voce."

The question being on the amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I now move to amend by adding the words of the second section, as follows:

Females of the age of twenty-one years, or upwards, shall be eligible for election or appointment to any office of control or management under the school laws of this State.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: As a question of grammar, I propose to strike out the words "for election or appointment."

The question being on the amendment offered by Mr. Darlington, it was agreed to.

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend by striking out the first word, "females," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "woman."

The question being upon the amendment offered by Mr. Lear, it was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend by striking out the words "twenty-one," and inserting instead, "twenty-five."—

["No!" "No!" "No!"]

You may say "no," but you will hear me.

Under the present law of the State no person can be eligible to the office of school director until he is of sufficient age to serve as senator, and that is twenty-five years. If that is the law for males, I do not think there should be any different law for females.

Mr. BUCKALEW. That is a matter of statute merely, and not a constitutional provision. The statute can be changed at any time.

Mr. M'MURRAY. Mr. Chairman: I wish to ask the exact meaning of these words, "control or management." I was not in the Committee on Suffrage when this section was agreed to, and I do not understand why these words are in there. I would like to know from the chairman of the committee, or somebody. I want to vote intelligently on the section. I should like to know whether these words would prevent a female from holding any office under the school laws of the State, whether she is to be limited to certain offices, or can hold any office whatever?

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the section by striking out the words, "of control or management," so that the section shall read "females of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, shall be eligible for election or appointment to any office under the school laws of this State."

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman: I apprehend that this is a step in the right direction as it will accord to women certain privileges which shall place her in a position of usefulness from which she has hitherto been debarred. I think it is not only a step in the right direction, but one that has been made at the right time. It has been demonstrated so clearly that women are the proper instructors of youth, so designed by nature, so designed by the Almighty Father who seems to have so fittingly constituted them as the guardians of the children of the Commonwealth, and who have proved themselves so eminently successful as their teachers, that the time has now arrived when we can consistently make this concession to them, if concession it may be termed. I considered that it is eminently proper, and will be most useful, and that it will infuse a new life into the public school system in the rural districts of the State. This is by no means a new idea. I think it has been only about a year since that the British Parliament framed a new law embracing this very provision, and under it were elected two ladies renowned for intelligence and philanthropy, and perhaps as it so chanced added to their efficiency the possession of immense wealth. I think the names of these ladies are Miss Garrett and Miss Countts. It is said that they have done a vast amount of good, having infused new life into the educational system of Great Britain, or more especially of the city of London. The efficiency of women in the school system of the State wherever they have been permitted to take an active part, has been so clearly demonstrated, that I think it is perfectly safe now to introduce this new educational element, and I have no doubt whatever that it will be attended with the most beneficial results. Why, sir, I remember some forty years ago, when it was said that women could never teach schools. I remember the agitation of this question well, when this system was first established in the State of Pennsylvania, for I was interested in such matters then as a school director, being one at the time. For a long time there was a lingering doubt in the minds of many, whether lady teachers would ever supplant the old masters that had been accustomed to teach our children. The experiment, however, was tried, and it was successful from the first, and it has been successful in its fuller development ever since. I think then that the amendment which has been offered is a step in the right direction, because it will tend to remove those restrictions that should be forever put out of sight under a new and liberal Constitution. I assert that every employment should be open to every person of the Commonwealth, man or woman, if they possess the necessary qualifications to fulfil the duties which may be assigned them. The whole tendency of modern civilization looks to the elevation of woman, and to the removal of all the restrictions which have been thrown around her, and will ultimately place her in a sphere of far greater usefulness; and while I cannot doubt this for one moment, I am yet unable to agree with those who have argued that it will destroy feminine purity. It has not been long since when, in conversing with a member of this Convention, he said that he would oppose everything that looked to the destruction of feminine purity. I replied that he would have to go back thirty years, when great objections were made to women teaching, and contemplate the results of it in the State, if he desired to be convinced of the ennobling effect it produced upon her character and her employment, as well as upon her pupils. I remember well the astonishment that the suggestion of female teachers created. Many at that time looked with abhorrence at the idea of a young lady going among and teaching the big boys of a school. The experiment, however, was tried, and it was found that moral force predominated over physical, and the superiority of their teachings was not long in becoming apparent and approved by all. The moral force of the true woman, combined with the gentleness of her character, restrained the unruly, and her influence was found to be more beneficial than the stern corrections of male teachers. I did not favor the granting of the suffrage to women, but it was not that I had any objection to it as a matter of principle. I thought the women themselves of this country had not yet demanded it, and I thought that there were enough indifferent voters in the State already who do not exercise this invaluable privilege, and that further, we had enough of uneducated voters. I opposed it for this ground, believing that it was a mere question of time; but I think the time has now come when we can, with safety, adopt this section as it has been reported by the committee.

The question was then taken on the amendment, striking out "twenty-one years" and inserting "twenty-five years," and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment, striking out the words, "of control or management," and it was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the section, by adding the words, "and if otherwise legally qualified, shall have the right to vote for any committee or school officer."

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. FENCK. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, by adding at the end of the section the words, "and to the office of recorder of deeds."

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee rise and report progress. There are a number of gentlemen who desire to offer amendments, and, as they will lead to further discussion, I think it is unnecessary to continue the session any later in the day.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question being then taken on the section, a division was called, which resulted as follows: Ayes, fifty; noes, thirteen.

So the section was agreed to.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

IN CONVENTION.

The committee then rose, and Mr. Lawrence, chairman of the committee of the whole, reported progress and asked leave for the committee to sit again.

Leave was granted, and to-morrow was named.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

So the Convention, thereupon, at two o'clock P. M., adjourned.

FIFTY-FIRST DAY.

TUESDAY, February 25, 1873.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M.

Prayer was offered by Rev. Jas. W. Curry.

JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceeding was read and approved.

REFORM CLUB.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication from the Reform club, of this city, tendering to the members of the Convention the use of the house of the club during the sessions of the Convention.

Mr. M'CLEAN. Mr. President: I move that the invitation be accepted, with the thanks of the Convention.

The motion was agreed to.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. DARLINGTON presented a petition from citizens of Chester county, in favor of the prohibition of the sale of liquor, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

THE DEATH PENALTY.

Mr. DARLINGTON presented a memorial from Fallowfield monthly meeting of Friends, praying for the abolition of the death penalty, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

PAY OF OFFICERS.

Mr. CORBETT offered the following resolution, which was twice read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be requested to report a resolution directing warrants to be drawn for thirty per cent. of the pay of the clerks and other officers of the Convention.

Mr. JOSEPH BAILY. Mr. Chairman: I move to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty." If we draw warrants for thirty per cent. it will pay the officers one-half of their salary up to this time. They have already had twenty per cent. of their pay, and we have not gone through one-half the period of the time this Convention will probably be in session; and it seems to me improper that the officers should be paid one-half of their salary for the time we have been in session.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Perry (Mr. Joseph Baily.)

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I hope the amendment will not prevail. These clerks have only received twenty per cent. of their pay, and they are at considerable expense, and it is right that they should receive this additional thirty per cent. There will still be one-half of their pay remaining, and certainly we can vote them this amount without danger to the treasury.

The amendment was rejected.

The question recurring upon the adoption of the resolution, it was agreed to.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. JOSEPH BAILY presented a petition from citizens of Perry county, asking for the abolition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

RAILROADS.

Mr. JOSEPH BAILY also presented the petition from citizens of Perry county, relative to the subject of railroads, which was referred, without reading, to the Committee on Railroads.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PATTON asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Horton for a few days from to-morrow, on account of sickness.

Mr. HOPKINS asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Elliott for a few days from to-day.

Mr. ELLIS asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Bartholomew for a few days from to-day.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. Lawrence in the chair, for the purpose of further considering the report of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) to the supplementary report of the committee. The Clerk will read the section as proposed to be amended.

The CLERK read:

SECTION —. For the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained a residence by reason of his presence, or lost it by reason of his absence, while employed in the service, either civil or military, of this State or of the United States; nor while engaged in the navigation of the waters of the State or of the United States, or on the high seas; nor while a student of any seminary of learning; nor while kept in any poor house, or other asylum, at public expense, nor while confined in any public prison. Provided, That when any student shall have wholly abandoned his former residence he may acquire a new residence as any other citizen.

Mr. McCLEAN. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, by striking out the proviso. I understand that the section now under consideration is the printed copy of the section which we have upon our desks; and I desire to ask the attention of the committee for a moment to the consideration of the provisions of that section, with regard to voting, by students in any seminary of learning. I submit, sir, that the section, as we have it, is correct in principle; that for the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained a residence while a student in a seminary of learning. That is the part of the section to which I wish to direct the attention of the committee.

I submit, sir, that the proviso makes that section wholly inoperative, whilst declaring that no students shall gain a residence by reason of his being a student, while he is a student, yet when he shall wholly abandon his former residence he may acquire a new residence, as any other citizen. I consider this proviso unnecessary, and as productive of a great deal of mischief in its practical operations. We have recently had a decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania affirming the decision of Judge Longaker, of the Lehigh district, that the residence of a student, while pursuing his studies, is merely temporary, and that he does not thereby acquire a residence.

I understand this to be a correct rule of law, and that it is a wise principle recognized by the United States government. When the conscription laws were put in operation, students were not enrolled at their schools, colleges or seminaries. They were enrolled and made subject to the draft at their homes, and their homes were considered their legal place of residence. The mischief, therefore, which this proviso, if put in operation, will produce, is just this: That students, when they are brought to the polls where their schools are situated, will be tempted to swear, when their votes are challenged, that they have wholly abandoned their former residence, when the fact and the law are both against such an assumption. I submit that the section in this regard is right, and that the proviso is inconsistent with it; and I trust the latter will be voted down. I have lived in a place where a very respectable and prominent college (Pennsylvania college) is situated, and I have seen year after year the mischief which just such a provision has created. Young men of both political parties have been brought to the polls, perhaps under the influence of political leaders, and induced, when sworn, to state that that locality was their place of residence, and in several cases of contested elections students have been brought forward as witnesses, and in their examinations have attempted to convey the impression of having acquired a residence at the place where the college is situated. I know that instances have occurred where they have been induced to testify that they have entirely abandoned their homes, and that they have had no intention of abandoning, as their residence, the place where the college was situated. This is exactly what necessarily leads to all the trouble. If, in case a student has really abandoned his former residence by becoming a married man, or under other circumstances, this section, as it has been reported by the committee, without the proviso, would not exclude that person from voting; but I submit that the proviso, if put into operation, will bring almost the entire student vote into the ballot at the place where the college or seminary may be situated. I hope, therefore, for these reasons, that the proviso will be stricken out, and the section then adopted.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I rise merely for the purpose of adding a single word to the remarks of the gentleman who has last addressed the Convention. There are a large number of students from all parts of the country, who are being educated in this State, and I think it is a wise provision that they should not lose their right to vote in the city, from which they come, nor acquire the right to vote in a county wherein they are receiving their education. I am in favor of striking out the proviso, as I believe it will accomplish all that can be desired.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I desire to add a few remarks in reference to this section, as it has been reported by the committee. If I understand it properly, it says that no person who is confined in any public prison shall lose his right to vote in the State of Pennsylvania. I apprehend that the people of Pennsylvania do not desire a provision to be incorporated in the organic law, which shall permit criminals from other States, who may be convicted of crime and confined in one of our jails or penitentiaries, to claim their residence and the right to vote in the particular counties where such jails may be located. If this is the meaning of this section I shall certainly vote against it. It is evident to my mind that this is the meaning of the section, but before the vote is taken, I should like to hear from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: The meaning of this section is: That every man has a residence at some place, and he can have but one residence. Residence is requisite to the exercise of the right of suffrage, and we can give no better definition of residence than that found in the books, which, for all the purposes of voting in all the Constitutions of the State, is synonymous with domicile and habitation. Residence is the best word that can be used, and it is an elementary principle that a man does not lose one residence until he gains another, and that he always has a residence. Now it is provided that by none of these things mentioned in the section shall a man gain or lose a residence. That is the intention of the section, and this is the only explanation I have to make in regard to it.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I will then move to strike out that part of this section which refers to criminals being confined in public prisons. I think such a provision as this would be a disgrace to the State of Pennsylvania. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the words I propose to strike out in the section. They are: "Nor while confined in any public prison."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I suppose that the motion of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Temple) is not in order until the pending amendment is disposed of. I rise for the purpose of speaking against the amendment of the gentleman from Adams (Mr. M'Clean.) I understand his amendment is to strike out the proviso from the section as reported by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: The gentleman is correct. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Adams (Mr. M'Clean.)

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: In listening to the remarks made in favor of striking out the proviso from the section reported by the committee, I certainly gathered the idea that the young men who attend our colleges had committed some crime, and that they were to be punished by being deprived of the right of suffrage if they shall presume to aspire to any other position than that which they have heretofore occupied, and that the section without the proviso would imply that a student could not acquire a residence in any election district of the Commonwealth. If I understood the remarks of the gentleman, (Mr. M'Clean,) he said that students ought not to be able to acquire such a residence as would enable them to vote at elections while attending college. I have heard this sentiment expressed so often, and there seems to be such a disposition on the part of some men to place restrictions upon young men who desire to vote while at college, that there must certainly be some meaning attached to it. The language of the section which immediately precedes the proviso seems to be so clear and explicit that there can be no possible danger in making a mistake. It is only where students abandoned entirely their former residences that they may acquire a residence at the place where they are attending college, which will enable them to vote. Without this proviso they would be entirely disfranchised, while the man working on our railroads could deposit his vote unchallenged if he lived in the district sixty days prior to the election, but a student, who may have attended college for years, shall not be permitted to vote. I cannot see the propriety of thus discriminating against intelligent young men attending college, and engaged in the pursuit of acquiring a liberal education. It certainly can have no other meaning if this proviso is stricken out than that the students in our colleges shall be disfranchised. It seems to me it is a creditable object in a young man to go to college, and in encouraging them to pursue this course they should be allowed to exercise all the rights of citizens while they are thus becoming liberally educated. If the proviso to this section is stricken out it will be beyond the power of a young student to acquire a residence that shall enable him to vote except at the home of his father. I can see no possible evil in retaining the proviso to the section, and I hope, therefore, the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. Chairman: I rise to correct the statement made by the gentleman from Centre, (Mr. M'Allister,) in respect to the meaning of the word "residence." He says that it is conceded that a man cannot lose his residence in one place until he has gained it in another. I think a little reflection will satisfy the gentleman that such a statement is entirely inaccurate, to say the least. Residence is mainly a question of intention, and partly of fact. The state of fact must correspond with the intention. Now it has been well settled, and I have no doubt it will recur to the gentleman's mind, upon reflection, that if a man leaves this State with the intention of making his permanent residence in another State, the moment he leaves the State with that intention his residence here is lost. If he goes beyond the borders of the State, and though he may return the next day, still it would require a residence of six months before he could vote again. This very point was decided by Judge Parsons, upon full consideration, in M'Daniel's case, reported in Third Pennsylvania Law Journal, page 89, &c. Many other cases, equally pointed, might be referred to, but it is not necessary, and I will not take the time of the Convention in so doing.

There is another point in connection with this section, and it is in relation to the character of the voters—students, laborers, and the like, who are required to leave home temporarily. Now, sir, the act of Assembly which gave rise to the decision in the Allentown case has had different constructions in different parts of this State. In the northern part of the State, so far as my observation has extended, before the time of the decision referred to was made, mechanics, students and all persons temporarily absent from their homes were permitted to vote, if otherwise qualified, provided they were within the election district ten days prior to the election, and in pursuance of their lawful calling. I understood from a gentleman who assisted in passing that act, Hon. A. H. Read, now deceased, who is doubtless remembered by many of the older members of this Convention, that this was the express object of that act, which is exactly reverse to the decision made in regard to it in the Allentown case.

Why, sir, it is said that you place a hardship upon the laboring man—the carpenter, the mason, and men of that class, who labor away from their homes for a livelihood—to make them lose time, a day, or two days, perhaps, and the attendant expenses, to go home to vote, refusing them the privilege of voting in the district where they are at work, where they are well known, and where they have been pursuing their lawful occupation for the space of ten days. I, for one, believe that it is right that that class of men should be protected and encouraged in the exercise of the right of suffrage, and should not be put to expense for the purpose of exercising it at home. As to students, I admit, sir, that there might be a seeming hardship occur by a large body of students congregated in one place, as there were at Allentown, who should come in and vote at municipal elections; but they should have the right, if otherwise qualified, if they have resided in the district the time required by law, to vote for national and State officers, and there could be, it seems to me, no objection to this. In all cases it would be easy for a man to establish his right to vote.

But I do not intend to make any extended remarks, but wish to express my dissent to the view expressed by the gentleman from Centre (Mr. McAllister) as to residence.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman: I do not know that I have much to say in regard to the immediate question before the committee, which I believe is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Adams (Mr. McClean.) I am not lawyer enough to know whether the striking out of the proviso is necessary to make more effective the requirements of the section itself. But I, for one, desire to say that I believe a provision of this kind ought to be engrafted on our organic law, prohibiting students at colleges from voting, and I will tell you why. You, sir, know, Mr. Chairman, and I know, that in Washington county it has occurred more than once, that this vote controlled the election in the county. I know it has occurred more than once that it controlled our municipal elections in the town of Washington. In the county of Washington the difference between the political parties does not sometimes amount to fifty votes, and it has often been that it did not amount to ten votes, and at that time we had two colleges in our county, and I suppose it would not be exaggeration to say that from forty to sixty students voted at the two colleges. Many of them were not even citizens of the State, except as they became so by being at college a year. They were foreign to our soil, and yet their votes controlled the election, not only for county and municipal officers, but for members of the Legislature and for Congress. It has occurred more than once, and it has been a source of very great annoyance. I have seen the question raised a score of times in my own town, as to whether they should vote or not. They have generally been allowed to vote upon swearing that they had been there one year, and these people from other States, and from other counties or our own State, absolutely controlled the result of the election.

I am not sure whether it is necessary to strike out the proviso to give the proper effect to the section, but I am decidedly in favor of a provision which will prevent students from voting. If they desire to vote they ought to go home.

Mr. DODD. Mr. Chairman: Having been a student in Washington county for four years, and having voted there, I simply desire to state to the gentleman that if all the voters of Washington county were as intelligent as the students he ought not to be ashamed of them. I see no reason why students, if they are twenty-one years of age, should not vote as intelligently as any other class of voters. If they are living at the institutions where they are acquiring education, and they have no residence elsewhere, why should they be prohibited from voting in the county where they have a right to?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman: I did not intend to cast any reproach upon the intelligence of the students, and surely I would be the last man to cast reproach upon the intelligence of the gentleman from Venango (Mr. Dodd.)

Mr. McCLEAN. Mr. Chairman: I rise to explain. The gentleman from Potter (Mr. Mann) seems to impugn my views in making the proposition I have. I totally deny the justice of any charge of the kind. I have been a student myself, and I know that I would never attempt to exercise the right of suffrage at the seat of any institution which I have attended, literary or law. I have had no right to vote except at my home, which was my legal place of residence. That was the place for the exercise of my right of suffrage. I make no discriminations against students. I yield to no man in respect for the great body of students, and it is only to preserve the honor of that noble class of young men that I have offered this proviso, that they may not be led into the temptation which this provision offers them, that I ask that this proviso be stricken out.

Mr. METZGER. Mr. Chairman: It occurs to me that this section would be less confused, and more easily understood, if the proviso were stricken out. If I understand the section, if the proviso were stricken out, it would not disfranchise the student, for it would leave his residence for the purpose of voting at the place where he resided at the time when he entered the college or the seminary. Consequently there will be no difficulty in ascertaining where his actual residence is, while if you leave in this proviso, it seems to me you you will have difficulty. At every place where there is a college or seminary, it will become a question as to what students have wholly abandoned their former residences, and who have not. In our city there is a seminary of learning, and a very respectable one, and to my knowledge, there has not been an election within the last ten years where we have not had trouble in ascertaining what students were entitled to vote. Sometimes they were wholly excluded. It depended upon the election board. At other times they were all permitted to vote. There have been occasions when I have seen the principal of the institution march down with the students and vote them en masse. Now if this provision were stricken out, such a scene as that could not be enacted, and these gentlemen, if they wished to exercise the elective franchise, could do it by going to their former residences. Certainly they should not ask any greater privilege, while connected with a seminary of learning, preparing themselves for future active life, than the man who is engaged in the service of the nation, doing duty for his country. If you strike out the proviso, it leaves the section simply to mean, that a man who enters a seminary of learning or a college, while there, neither gains nor loses a residence. It leaves it in such a position that the election officers will have no difficulty, and there will be none on the part of any one to know what the section means, whereas, if you leave the proviso in, I apprehend that wherever colleges and seminaries are located trouble will ensue.

MR. AINEY. Mr. Chairman: There are cases that may arise where it is impossible for a student to retain his residence with his father, or at the place where he resided prior to entering an institution of learning. If a student leaves or abandons the district where he has resided with his father, to go to an institution of learning in another county or district, and his father, during his residence at such institution, changes his residence to another county, such student could not go to the home of his father from the school to vote. Where would be his residence then, in such case? How could he go home to vote? His father resides in another county or district. He has never resided there for a single hour. He has acquired no shadow or semblance of a residence there. There are many other cases which might be suggested. It is unnecessary here. This whole subject was well canvassed, and deliberately and maturely considered before the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, of which I have the honor to be a member. If I correctly understood the feelings of the committee, it was a source of regret that this section must necessarily be limited in its character. We desired to make it more general, more comprehensive, and more precise. We desired to define more definitely and clearly what should constitute a residence, under the Constitution, for the purpose of voting. After a series of meetings, at which many propositions were brought forward, and after long and deliberate consideration, the committee came to the conclusion that this was about the best we could present to the Convention. I am clear, in my own mind, that this proviso is proper and necessary; without it the section would be imperfect, and be liable to result in injustice. It can do no harm. The student, by the simple act of attending college, neither gains nor loses a residence; but if he shall have wholly abandoned his former residence, and has no other residence, then he acquires a residence at the college, or at the institution of learning where he is, as another citizen. This is certainly right. It is necessary to protect, or at least to make clear, his rights in certain cases, and will serve as a guide to election officers, by making the purpose and scope of the section more clear and precise.

MR. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I am opposed to the proviso reported by the committee, and in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Adams, (Mr. M'Clean.) I oppose the proviso, first, for the reason that the word "students" is too general. It is not specific enough.—Gentlemen have spoken upon this question as though it was confined to students in literary institutions. Now, I apprehend, that the word includes much more than that, and if it does not, we will have to have a definition of what a "student" is. I hold that a young man leaving his father's residence, and going into another county to learn any trade, is a student. Does the chairman of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation hold that he is not? Or does he admit that the word "student" will cover this class of citizens too?

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Certainly not!

Mr. WHERRY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this proviso on that ground. I shall oppose the proviso because it discriminates in favor of one class of students against another class. Moreover, the proviso reads "who shall have wholly abandoned." I want to know what "wholly abandoned" means. Does it mean that he has turned his back upon his father's house and taken a solemn vow that he will never return there again? Or does it merely mean that in the pursuit of his avocation, namely, the acquirement of an education, he has seen fit for a while to leave his father's residence and take up his residence in another county? If this last be the meaning, I would like to know what is the use in making this discrimination in favor of students over and above the favor bestowed on other citizens? If it only means that by going from his father's house and making his abode in the place in which he is pursuing his studies, he has thereby obtained a residence in that place; he is put precisely on the same footing with other citizens without this proviso. I hope, therefore, the proviso will be stricken out.

This is wholly lacking in specific statement. If it means what gentlemen claim, then it is a discrimination in favor of one class of citizens against all others. If it does not mean what the gentlemen claim, it is of no use whatever and ought to be stricken out.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: This section was not intended to alter the legal construction of the preceding sections. It is simply explanatory of what we have enacted, not necessary for a lawyer, but presumed to be necessary for the guidance of election boards—the proviso as well as what precedes it.

Now, a word in reference to this proviso, "that when any student shall have wholly abandoned his former residence, he may acquire a new residence as any other citizen." This is the law now—this will be the law after the adoption of the section even without the proviso; but to exclude the inference, that because a student, he could not acquire a residence, it was thought best to insert the proviso. Is it not right that doubt should be removed? Is it not right that a student who is turned aloof from his father's house, by force, it may be, and who makes his home at a college, seeking employment as a school teacher, and thus accumulating money sufficient to support him at college, but gaining no residence in the teaching of the school, because but a few months only in any one place should acquire a settlement? Most certainly it is right. During the time that he is acquiring his education, the only residence he has, or can have, is at the college, and he should not be deprived by any election ward of his right of suffrage by mistake or otherwise, and hence the proviso is inserted, that he may so acquire a residence, has been laid down as elementary law in "Cooley's Constitutional Limitations," page 600, in these words:

"A student in any seminary of learning, who has a residence there for purposes of instruction, may vote at such place, provided he is emancipated from his father's family, and, for the time, has no residence elsewhere." And the elementary writer himself, of standard authority, refers to Lincoln vs. Hapgood, 11 Massachusetts Reports, 350; and Putnam vs. Johnston, 10 Mass., 488. So much in relation to this proviso.

Now a word in reply to my friend from Susquehanna, (Mr. Turrell,) in reference to the error which he supposes the chairman of the committee has fallen into, in saying that every man must have a residence somewhere. He cites the case of a man leaving Pennsylvania with a view to seek a settlement in another State, and asserts that a citizen of Pennsylvania thus leaving with the mere intent to seek a residence in another State, loses his residence in Pennsylvania the moment he leaves the county in which he resides. I take issue with the gentleman. It is not the law; and the gentleman will find in no standard author authority to sustain his allegation. There is but one case in which that can occur, and it is this: If a native of Ohio come to Pennsylvania with a view of making Pennsylvania his residence, and acquires a residence here, and after having so acquired a residence here, determines to return to his native State and make his former his future residence, he then loses his acquired residence in Pennsylvania the moment he leaves Pennsylvania for Ohio. But if a native of Pennsylvania having no residence elsewhere, leaves his State, his residence remains in Pennsylvania up to the moment when he acquires a residence elsewhere. Upon this subject I refer to "Story's Conflict of Law."

Mr. MANTON. Will the gentleman permit himself to be interrupted for a question?

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Certainly.

Mr. MANTON. If a man were to take his household furniture and move into the State of Ohio from the State of Pennsylvania, and was gone one single day, with the intention of leaving the State of Pennsylvania and then came back, could he vote in Pennsylvania?

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: I hold as an undoubted principle of law, that if a resident of Pennsylvania leaves his residence and goes to Ohio and travels all over it for six months, and does not find a residence there, and returns to Pennsylvania, he is a legal voter in the district he left; his residence remains all the time in Pennsylvania. That is the well settled law upon the subject of domicile and residence. It was upon that subject that I was about to refer to "Story's Conflict of Law," par. 47, p. 42, when interrupted: "A domicile once acquired remains until a new one is acquired." Again: "If a man has acquired a new domicile different from that of his birth and removes from it with an intention to resume his native domicile, the latter is re-acquired, even whilst he is on his way, for it reverts from the moment the other is given up." But in the other case it remains until he acquires a new domicile.

That has been the well considered rule in Pennsylvania. It was the rule on which votes were received at the last election in the borough in which I live, after full discussion and reference to authorities. A citizen had left the borough with a view to making his residence in Indiana if he could find a residence there; but he did not find it and returned a few days before the election, and offered to vote in Bellefonte, and was permitted to vote on the ground that he had not lost his residence. Upon this principle, then, I contend that this whole section is explanatory of the sections that we have adopted and intended wholly for the guidance of the election board. I hope this amendment will therefore be voted down and the section pass as reported, with one exception, however, and that is in reference to those persons kept in poor-houses and asylums. I think, myself, that the words, "at the public expense," are in good place as applied to them.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman: I do not want to trouble the Convention more than for a moment; and what I have to say is rather interrogatory than argumentative. I think there is some misapprehension about the construction of this section, and I think there is more claimed for it than the language would guarantee. We are told in the section that those in the service of the government, in seminaries of learning, and in certain other institutions, shall, for the purpose of voting, be deemed not to have gained a residence nor to have lost it. Now, sir, if they have not gained it, then they have not lost the old residence. If they have not lost the old residence then, surely, as a logical consequence, their place of election would be at the old residence. If it is proposed that they shall vote at the place where they temporarily sojourn, would it not then be best that it should be broadly, distinctly, and squarely stated? The committee have provided for that in the fourth section of their report in the case of those of our citizens who are absent in the army of the United States, in which they provided there should be some proper legislation to allow them to do so. If it is not then provided that they should vote away from home, so far as regards other persons provided for in this section—when they have done so in case of soldiers—then surely it cannot follow that any of these other classes of citizens have any right to vote away from their place of residence, that, then, being conceded—that being the reason of the section.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Will the gentleman allow me to say that the fourth section did not refer to soldiers in the army of the United States? It refers to those temporarily absent under call.

Mr. LANDIS. I understand it so, precisely. It speaks of citizens of the Commonwealth who are temporarily absent in the military service of the United States or of the State. I understand that to be so. If that requires a special section to allow them to vote while absent, would it not also follow that a special section would be required to allow the others to vote inasmuch as they are said not to gain a residence nor to lose it by reason of the circumstances stated? Now, as to the proviso, which I believe is the real question before the committee; suppose there was no proviso there. What is it? "When any student shall have wholly abandoned his residence, he may acquire a new residence as any other citizen." Would not that follow any way without the proviso being there? If it is held that the proviso is for the purpose of letting him vote whilst absent from home, it does not say so on its face. The proviso is entirely unnecessary, because in the absence of the proviso, the student or any other citizen, shall be permitted to acquire a new residence, when he has wholly abandoned his former residence. Therefore, that being a self-evident proposition, what is the use of embodying it in this section? Let us not encumber the section with any surplusage. Let us have nothing here that is certainly wholly useless.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Chairman: The section, considered as a whole, presents a plain and simple proposition, open to no serious objection so far as I can see; but, regarded without the proviso, it is imperfect and defective, for the reason that it would virtually disfranchise a portion of our people.

It provides that no person shall be deemed to have gained a residence by reason of his presence, or lost it by reason of his absence, while a student in any seminary of learning.

Under this provision, if an individual voluntarily abandons his residence for the purpose of prosecuting his studies at an institution of learning, he puts it beyond his power to get a new residence while so engaged, no matter how long he continues in that particular place.

The proviso is required to relieve the section of this objectionable feature. And it does it by declaring that the student, when he wholly abandons his residence, shall not be an exception to the general rule, but shall be allowed to acquire a new residence in the place to which he removes, just as other citizens may, without regard to his business or pursuits.

With the proviso I shall vote for the section; but if the amendment of the gentleman from Adams (Mr. M'CLean) prevails, I shall vote against it.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I do not rise to make a speech, but I desire to say that while this Convention sat at Harrisburg I submitted a proposition, which was referred to the Judiciary Committee, requiring that they should fix the matter of residence in some definite manner, so far as it relates to voting. However, some other person had a similar proposition, referred to the committee of which I have the honor to be a member, the Committee on Suffrage and Elections. In that committee we have discussed this matter very fully, and I am free to say that out of the whole fifteen members there are not two of us who think alike upon it. Each lawyer I meet in committee tells me that he understands it thoroughly, and that nobody ought to understand it in any other way than his; but when the committee get together, and get conversing on the subject, they soon get by the ears. I think that this is an important question. I have studied it up so much in committee that every one in the committee who refers to this subject refers to it as "Lilly's question." It is an important question, this question of residence, and should be so defined that the commonest mind can understand it. I do not attempt to say that it should be defined so that all lawyers would agree on the terms exactly, but it should be so defined that the election officers, that the common mind, should know what it means. We have a gentleman living in our county who has resided there for forty years, and has raised his family there, and had them married from his house there, and has never lived anywhere else, yet for the last ten years he has voted in this city, and he is upheld in that. That is one point that I think ought to be settled, so that that man, who is a man of high standing and respectability, should go home to vote, and not vote in Philadelphia. Again, we have another man in our county, a gentleman that I know, and whom I have known for thirty-five years, and, in my opinion, he has never voted at his residence, and yet he has voted at every election. He resides at Beaver Meadow, with a sister; he goes there every Saturday night, stays there all Sunday; if he is sick, he goes there at once; every holiday that occurs he goes there; and if you ask him where he is going, he tells you he is going "home." This gentleman, however, will tell you that because the law reads, "In pursuance of his lawful calling," he can vote where he does business. The election officers let him vote; and we have, in every election contest in our county, and at every polling place, a difference of opinion on this subject, which causes more discussion and dissension there than any other one thing. It is due to this Commonwealth, the legal acquirements of this Convention owe it to the people of the Commonwealth, that the question of residence, in its relation to voting, shall be so stated that every man who holds an election office, and every man who approaches a ballot-box to vote, shall know what this word "residence" means. Under these different statements and decisions in our country, I meet men every day who say they have the right to vote at a half dozen places. That is unreasonable; there is no man in this Convention, I suppose, who will for a moment say that it is not unreasonable; yet it is the fact.

In our town, at the last election, a man came up to vote, and he was asked if this was his home. He says, "yes." Where do you work?" "At Tamaqua; but this is my home. I have worked there for six months, but I pay my taxes here, and here is where I want to vote." He voted. Three hours afterwards, another man came up to vote and he was challenged, and was asked, "where do you reside?" He says, "in St. Francis, in Columbia county?" "Have you your family there?" "I have." "You pay your taxes there?" "Yes." "Is that your home?" "Yes." "Then what under the sun brings you here to vote." "Why," he said, "I have worked on the Lehigh and Susquehanna Railroad for the last twenty days, and have been in the pursuance of my lawful calling there for that time. I am entitled to vote here." So they took his vote. I say to this Convention that it owes to the people of the State of Pennsylvania, to themselves and to every duty which they came here to perform, to define, clearly and sharply, what residence means. Let it be arbitrary if you please; but set down some positive rule by which election officers can be governed, as well as the people, when they go to vote. That difficulty creates more strife, and heartburnings, and trouble at our election poll, and at every election poll throughout the Commonwealth, I have no doubt, than any other one question you can bring before it. It should be so fixed that a citizen in the position of the one whom I first mentioned would be obliged to go home to vote and not come to Philadelphia for that purpose. There is a great deal of ill-feeling created on this subject in its various bearings, and I think there is no member on this floor who will not concur with me that the question ought to be set at rest in such a manner that there should be no further trouble about it.

MR. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: I shall vote in favor of striking out this proviso. I shall also vote against the whole section, and I shall regard it as a very grave mistake if this section is put into our Constitution. If it is for any purpose, it is for the purpose of defining what kind of absence from home will lose a man his residence. If we confine it to these cases mentioned in this section, we shall have a limitation which, by its own force, will exclude every man from the right to vote who is absent from his home upon his particular business, whatever it may be. I avail myself of the privilege of discussion in committee of the whole, not so much to speak of this proviso as of the section itself, for it provides that: "For the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained a residence by reason of his presence, or lost it by reason of his absence, while employed in the service, either civil or military, of this State or of the United States, nor while engaged in the navigation of the waters of the State or of the United States or on the high seas, nor while a student in any seminary of learning," &c. Now, sir, it seems to me that to take that section as it stands, is as much as to say that every person who is absent from his place of residence in any other department of business or calling than those mentioned here, will lose his residence by that absence from home—which I suppose this committee does not intend should be done. Besides, nearly the whole of the provisions of this section are of such a character as have been well established, for instance, that a man should not lose his residence by reason of his being thus engaged away from home. Who ever supposed that a man should lose his residence by reason of his being away from his place of domicile, engaged in the civil or military service of this State or of the United States? If it has always been supposed that he did not thus lose his residence, why should we enact it into this clause of the Constitution, when it is already a very well settled principle of common law with regard to this question of residence? If we undertake to say that he "shall not lose his residence by reason of his being engaged in the civil or military service of this State or of the United States, or by reason of his being engaged in the navigation of the waters of this State, or upon the high seas," do we not thereby indirectly and impliedly say that he will lose his residence if he is from home engaged in any other duty than those named? What becomes of the commercial travellers of this country? What will become of the residences of those men who are engaged as collecting agents, and who go out of this State and into other States, and domicile themselves for many months together in Chicago, St. Louis, Louisville or Cincinnati, for the purpose of collecting money for their principals, or of selling goods for those with whom they are engaged? They do not lose their residence in Pennsylvania, and yet there is no word said about them in this section. There is a well settled principle of law that "the expression of one thing is the exclusion of all others." If we undertake to define by what means a man shall not lose his residence, it is supposed that we express all the classes of cases which will come under that exclusion.

By the provisions of this section, then, it will be held by election boards construing this law, that by that rule we establish a principle that all those who are away from home, and who are not within the definition of these classes of persons enumerated in this provision, will lose their residence by this absence. Therefore, it is a mistake to undertake to define, by a single section or article in the Constitution, what classes of persons shall not lose their residence in consequence of being absent from their places of business or from their ordinary domiciles; and I think that we will commit a mistake if we incorporate this as one of the provisions of our new Constitution.

Let all these classes of cases be considered by the election officers under the common law principles as to what shall and what shall not lose a man his place of residence as a voter in the State of Pennsylvania. They have been determined, as was suggested by the gentleman from Adams, (Mr. M'Lean,) by the Supreme Court of the State in one case, and by other courts in this State with regard to other questions, and similar questions, and we have them well defined. When we undertake to define, then, a new class, and leave others out, it will be and properly may be understood by the election officers that we have undertaken to explain by this section all of the classes who should not lose their residence by their absence from home; and, therefore, all other men who are engaged, as, for instance, travelling for their leisure, or in any other occupation, who have gone from their homes without any intention of changing their places of residence—will lose their residence by reason of this absence. Hence I think we had better not adopt the section as it stands, because it is impossible to meet every possible case which might occur.

With regard to this very question of "students" who go from their homes and are temporarily away, although sometimes for three or four or more years, the gentleman from Cumberland has very well asked the question, whether that expression "student" means apprentices? It means here, according to the language actually used, "students in seminaries of learning." It does not cover students of art who go, for instance, to Italy, for the purpose of studying the old masters, or of improving their knowledge of their profession, and yet when we put such a provision as this into the Constitution we say, that while students in all seminaries of learning shall not lose their residence by reason of absence from home, yet students of art, and students in other departments, men engaged in business, as upon railroads, lose theirs, and in this shiftless and restless population of ours there is a great portion of the community that have occasion to go from home every year of their lives for some personal purpose or other, and it will, not unreasonably, be held by virtue of that principle—"expressio unius est exclusio alterius," that we have undertaken to exclude all others from the provisions of this Constitution that we have not actually expressed within it, and therefore these people leave their difficulty with the election board, and it will add confusion and difficulty to the determination of the question as to whether a man should lose his residence by this effort to define it.

The question being taken on the amendment striking out the proviso, a division was called, which resulted as follows: Ayes, thirty-eight; noes, twenty-five.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, by striking out all after the word "asylum."

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the amendment, by striking out all after the word "learning."

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: It has been suggested by a number of gentlemen in the Convention that my amendment should include all after the word "learning." I have no objection to accepting that as an amendment. I have, however, a few remarks to make in regard to the amendment. I cannot possibly conceive why the Committee on Suffrage should have reported such a section as this, or at least that part of it which my amendment is designed to strike out. I cannot understand why the committee should undertake to make a provision in the Constitution that shall guarantee to a class of persons who see proper to go into other cities or into other counties than those in which they properly live, and get into penitentiary or other prisons, and by doing that retain their residence in the place from which they went. I cannot understand why the committee should undertake to place such a provision in the Constitution, which accords to this class of people such a protection as this; and why they should be unwilling to leave the question to the ordinary decision of the courts. If such a provision as this is even introduced into the Constitution of the State, any number of criminals who shall come over from the State of New Jersey, or the State of New York, and who may be incarcerated in the penitentiary, can thereby acquire a residence in the State of Pennsylvania. It seems to me, upon the ground of decency alone, such a provision should be excluded from the Constitution. The modesty of the Convention, if you please, should forbid us from placing such a provision in the Constitution. I therefore hope it will be voted down.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: Is it in order to offer an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN: There is an amendment to the amendment already pending.

Mr. ANDREW REED. Mr. Chairman: I do not think the gentleman who has last addressed the Convention (Mr. Temple) can have read this section very carefully, or he would not have made the speech he did. He states that the effect of this section will be that criminals, coming to this State from New Jersey or New York, who may be incarcerated in the penitentiary, will thereby, under this section, acquire a residence. Now if the gentleman will read the section attentively, he will find that a criminal incarcerated in a penitentiary of this State does not thereby acquire a residence in the county where the jail may be located. The whole section provides nothing further than what is now contained in the Constitution. A person may now be taken to a jail in another township or county and incarcerated therein, but he would not thereby acquire a residence in the county where the jail may happen to be located, because he has no intention of making that county his residence. A residence, in the meaning of the law, is a question of intention entirely, and the criminal is there in the jail of a county against his intention and against his will, and his residence refers to the place from whence he came before he was incarcerated in jail. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that part of the section in reference to the poor house will also be retained in the section. How often have we seen the degrading spectacle in each county, of the steward of the poor house bringing up the inmates of that institution in regular order and voting them like so many machines. It is evident to every candid mind that such proceedings are entirely wrong, and that they have an evil ten-deney. The residence of paupers and criminals should always refer to the place from whence they come and where they voted, if they voted at all. I doubt, however, the propriety of allowing these classes of our society to exercise the right of elective franchise at all, I cannot perceive the evils to which the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Temple) has referred, and I therefore shall vote against his amendment.

Mr. TEMPLE. I would like to ask the gentlemen whether he believes that the insertion of this clause in the Constitution will change the law as it now stands in any material.

Mr. ANDREW REED. Certainly not.

Mr. TEMPLE. Then why do you desire its insertion in the Constitution?

Mr. ANDREW REED. I presume the Committee on Suffrage inserted this section into their report for the purpose of furnishing an unvarying rule for the election boards, and in order that the law might not operate differently in one county than in the another. This is the only good that I can see will be accomplished by placing such a provision in the Constitution. This far it may be beneficial, but it certainly gives no residence to criminals from other States, who shall be incarcerated in the various jails of our counties.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: While I shall vote for this amendment, I confess I have yet to hear any satisfactory reasons given for the insertion of this section at all into the fundamental law of the State, and I trust the members of the Convention will take care to read it thoroughly and consider it, and then that we will vote the whole section down as suggested by the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington.)

The question was then taken on the amendment, striking out all after the word "learning," and it was not agreed to.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman. I now move to strike out all after the word "section," in order to bring the Convention to an affirmative vote on the question.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I object to the motion upon a question of order. I contend that no amendment can be received which is equivalent to a rejection of a proposition under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, although disposed to gratify the gentleman from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) will so rule, and decides the motion out of order.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I call for the reading of the section as amended.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 14. For the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained a residence by reason of his presence, or lost it by reason of his absence while employed in the service, either civil or military, of this State or of the United States, nor while engaged in the navigation of the waters of the State, or of the United States, or on the high seas, or while a student of any seminary of learning, nor while kept in any poor house or other asylum at public expense, nor while confined in any public prison.

The question being then taken on the section as amended, a division was called, which resulted as follows: Ayes forty; noes, thirty-six.

So the section was agreed to.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I move the committee rises and report progress.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is unnecessary.

IN CONVENTION.

The committee then rose, and the President resumed the chair.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. President: The committee of the whole, having had under consideration the report of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, have instructed me to report the article, with sundry amendments.

The PRESIDENT. The amendments reported by the committee of the whole will be read.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. President: Is it in order—

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order. The amendments will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

THE SUFFRAGE ARTICLE AS AMENDED.

The report of the committee of the whole on the article on suffrage, election and representation, is as follows:

SECTION 1. Every person possessing the following qualifications shall be an elector, and be entitled to vote at all elections, viz:

1. A male person twenty-one years of age.

2. He shall have been a citizen of the United States at least one month.

3. He shall have resided in the State one year, or, if he had previously been a qualified elector of the State, removed therefrom and returned, six months immediately preceding the election.

4. He shall have resided in the election district where he offers to vote two months immediately preceding the election.

5. If twenty-two years of age or upwards, he shall have paid within two years a State or county tax, which had been assessed at least two months, and paid at least one month before the election.

SECTION 2. All elections of the citizens shall be by ballot. Every ballot voted shall be numbered in the order in which it is received, and the number recorded by the election officers, opposite the name of the elector who presents the ballot. Each elector shall endorse his name upon his ballot, or cause it to be endorsed thereon, and attested by another elector of the district, who shall not be an election officer, and the oath prescribed for the election officers shall require secrecy as to the contents of every ballot cast at the election.

SECTION 3. Electors shall in all cases, except treason, felony and breach or surety of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance on elections, and in going to and returning therefrom.

SECTION 4. Whenever any of the qualified electors of this Commonwealth shall be in any actual military service under a requisition from the President of the United States, or by the authority of this Commonwealth, such electors may exercise the right of suffrage in all elections by the citizens under such regulations as are or shall be prescribed by law as fully as if they were present at their usual place of election.

SECTION 5. All laws regulating elections by the people, or for the registry of electors, shall be uniform in their operation throughout the State; but no elector shall be deprived of the privilege of voting by reason of his name not being on the registry.

SECTION 6. Any person who shall give or promise, or offer to give, to an elector any money or other valuable consideration for his vote at an election, or for withholding the same, or who shall give, or promise to give, such consideration to any other person or party, for such elector's vote, or for the withholding thereof, and any elector who shall receive, or agree to receive, for himself or for another, any money or other valuable consideration, for his vote at an election, or for withholding the same, shall thereby forfeit the right to vote at such election; and any elector whose right to vote shall be challenged for such cause before the election officers, shall be required to swear or affirm that the matter of the challenge is untrue before his vote shall be received.

SECTION 7. Every person convicted of any fraudulent violation of the election laws shall be deprived of the right of suffrage, but such right in any particular case may be restored by an act of the Legislature, two-thirds of each House consenting thereto.

SECTION 8. In cases of contested elections, no person shall be permitted to withhold his testimony upon the ground that it may criminate himself, or subject him to public infamy, but such testimony shall not afterwards be used against him in any judicial proceeding.

Sections 9 and 10 were stricken out.

SECTION 11. Wards of cities or boroughs and townships shall form or be divided into election districts of compact and contiguous territory, in such manner as the court of quarter sessions of the city or county in which the same are located may direct: Provided, All districts in cities of over one hundred thousand inhabitants shall be divided by the courts of quarter sessions of said cities whenever the preceding election shows the polling of more than two hundred and fifty votes, and in other election districts whenever the court of the proper county shall be satisfied that the convenience of the electors and the public interests will be promoted thereby.

SECTION 12. All elections by persons in a representative capacity shall be viva voce.

SECTION 13. Women of the age of twenty-one years or upwards shall be eligible to any office of control or management under the school laws of this State.

SECTION 14. For the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained a residence by reason of his presence or lost it by reason of his absence while employed in the service, either civil or military, of this State or of the United States, nor while engaged in the navigation of the waters of the State, or of the United States, or on the high seas, nor while a student of any seminary of learning, nor while kept in any poor house or other asylum at public expense, nor while confined in any public prison.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that upon a former occasion the question of agreeing to the amendments made in committee of the whole was put to the Convention. This action is in conformity with parliamentary law, and the Chair pursued this course. It has never been the custom in Pennsylvania, and, as a number of gentlemen for whom the Chair entertains the highest respect have suggested that it would be best for the Convention to follow our own custom in this respect, the Chair will submit to the Convention whether the question of agreeing to the amendments shall be put to the Convention or not?

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: I move that the article as amended shall be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will observe, on this question, that the House may understand it, that this bill will be in order to-morrow morning, on second reading; and unless it be re-printed before that time, it will not be practicable for the House to go on with it understandingly.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: It must be printed before the House can understand it.

The motion that the article, as reported by the committee of the whole, be printed was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The next business before the House would be article four of the report of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, but which has been incorporated in the article reported in committee of the whole. Is it the pleasure of the House to proceed to the consideration of that article?

Which was decided in the negative.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in regular order would be article five of the report of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, which has also been included in the report made by the committee of the whole. Is it the pleasure of the House to proceed to the consideration of that article?

Which was decided in the negative.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. President: If it is in order, I would move that the House go into committee of the whole, to consider the report of the Committee on Legislature.

The PRESIDENT. The article reported by the Committee on Legislature was before the committee of the whole, and the committee of the whole had leave to sit again. On the day that they had leave to so sit, it was not passed over but postponed. It is in order now to go into committee of the whole on the article on the Legislature.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The motion was agreed to, and the Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. Hopkins in the chair.

THE LEGISLATURE ARTICLE.

The CHAIRMAN. The business before the committee of the whole is the consideration of the report of the Committee on Legislature. The section in order is section twenty, which will be read.

SENATORS FROM PHILADELPHIA.

The CLERK:

SECTION 20. The General Assembly shall apportion the State at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, and once every ten years thereafter, by dividing the population of the State, as ascertained by the last preceding national census, by the number thirty-three, and the quotient shall be the ratio of representation in the Senate. Counties containing a population of four-fifths of said ratio shall be separate Senatorial districts, and each elect one Senator. Counties containing not less than the ratio, and three-fourths thereof, shall each elect two Senators, and one additional Senator for each number of inhabitants equal to the ratio contained by said counties in excess of twice the number of said ratio. All Senatorial districts shall be formed of contiguous and compact territory, and contain, as nearly as possible, an equal number of inhabitants: Provided, That no city or county shall elect more than four Senators.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: When this committee of the whole was in session before, on this Legislature article, I moved this amendment: To strike out all that section, and insert:

SECTION 20. The General Assembly shall apportion the State, for the election of Senators and Representatives, according to population as ascertained by the last preceding census, every ten years, commencing at the first session after the adoption of this Constitution. Senators and Representatives shall be chosen by single districts, composed of contiguous, and as nearly as practicable, compact territory, of equal population. When a city or county shall be entitled to two or more Senators, it shall be divided by ward or township lines. No city or county shall be entitled to more than six Senators. Each county shall be entitled to at least one Representative. When any city or county shall be entitled to two or more Representatives, they shall be divided by ward or township lines.

The number of Representatives shall, at the several periods of their apportionment, be fixed by the Legislature, and shall never be less than one hundred and fifty, nor greater than three hundred. The number of Senators shall, at the same times, be fixed by the Legislature, and shall never be less than one-fourth, nor greater than one-third, of the number of Representatives.

I now desire to modify that amendment by the addition of another clause. After the word "Representative," at the end of the fifth sentence, I desire to interpolate the words:

"But no county hereafter erected shall be entitled to a separate representation until sufficient population shall be contained within it to entitle it to one Representative, agreeably to the ratio which shall then be established."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Chester has modified his amendment, and it is before the committee.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: How will the whole amendment read?

The CLERK:

SECTION 20. The General Assembly shall apportion the State for the election of Senators and Representatives, according to population as ascertained by the last preceding census, every ten years, commencing at the first session after the adoption of this Constitution. Senators and Representatives shall be chosen by single districts, composed of contiguous, and as nearly as practicable, compact territory, of equal population. When a city or county shall be entitled to two or more Senators, it shall be divided by ward or township lines. No city or county shall be entitled to more than six Senators. Each county shall be entitled to at least one Representative. But no county hereafter erected shall be entitled to a separate Representative until sufficient population shall be contained within it to entitle it to one Representative, agreeably to the ratio which shall then be established. When any city or county shall be entitled to two or more Representatives, they shall be divided by ward or township lines.

The number of Representatives shall, at the several periods of their apportionment, be fixed by the Legislature, and shall never be less than one hundred and fifty, nor greater than three hundred. The number of Senators shall, at the same times, be fixed by the Legislature, and shall never be less than one-fourth, nor greater than one-third, of the number of Representatives.

Mr. WORRELL. Mr. Chairman: I move to further amend, by striking out the words, "no city or county shall be entitled to more than six Senators."

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: In presenting for the consideration of this committee this amendment, it will be at once perceived that it proposes the establishment of single districts throughout the State, both for Senators and Representatives. That is the leading feature of this provision. The report of the Committee on Legislature proposes Senatorial districts, not all single, if I understand it right. Perhaps it does, but at all events representative districts may be established for two or more Representatives.

Now, sir, I urge the consideration of this committee to this important principle, as I conceive, in the representation of this State. This amendment proposes to establish single Senatorial, as well as single Representative, districts. It proposes, also, another very important provision, an increase in the number of Senators and Representatives, not so large, perhaps, as will be desired by some members, but sufficient to enable the members to express their opinions, also, upon that question and to propose a larger House of Representatives, and, if they choose, a larger Senate. It proposes, also, to allow the city of Philadelphia six Senators, and this, it will be perceived, is precisely in conformity, so far as proportion is concerned, to the present Constitution, which, with a House of Representatives of one hundred members, allows the city of Philadelphia, or any other city, not exceeding four members of the Senate. If you increase the House, however, to one hundred and fifty, then the Senate would contain about fifty members, and the city of Philadelphia would have, by the same rule of proportion, at least six Senators, being fifty per cent., added to the number of the House, and that number added to the number of Senators in the city. If, however, it should be the wish of the committee, and subsequently of the Convention, to increase the number of the House, say to three hundred, the number of Senators to which the city shall be entitled, if the Senate bears the same proportion then to the House as it does now, say one-third, will be twelve, instead of six, and so in proportion, as you shall fix the number of Representatives.

But the main and leading feature, and the one which I have most at heart, is the establishing of single districts for the choice of Senators and Representatives. I think, sir, that it is a cardinal principle in the establishment of our government that the representative should be brought as nearly home to his constituents as it is possible to bring him. It is important that the circle of gentlemen who are to choose a representative, whether of the Senate or the House, should be limited in their choice to their own immediate representative, and that they should have no care beyond the general care which every one has in the character of the citizens of the whole Commonwealth in the choice of the representatives of other districts. I would, therefore, in thus bringing the member home to his constituents, make him the representative of his own district, whether in the Senate or the House; and I would have a particular district composed of a certain number of counties, or a single county, or a certain amount of population, whichever it might be. I would have no man elected along with another man, but the State should be so divided for the choice of Representatives, as well as of Senators, that each district should elect but one man.

What would be the advantages which would be derived from such a system, is the natural inquiry? They would be numerous. I conceive, in the first instance, besides what I have stated, it would do away with all the evil which is generally understood to exist in the formation of districts for representation by the Legislature. It would do away with the necessity which either party, no matter which should be in power, would exert in forming districts to the advantageous of their own particular views. I take it, sir, that it would be impossible for any party, no matter what might be its complexion, that should chance to be in power, to form the State into one hundred or one hundred and fifty districts, each of contiguous and compact territory as nearly as may be practicable without making them very largely divided; so that we shall accomplish what is desirable in every well regulated government, a balance, as nearly as possible, of power between the two large over-ruling parties of the country.

I believe that all statesmen agree in one thing, that it is desirable under all circumstances, in all legislative bodies, that there should be majorities and minorities, but all insist that the majority should never be overpowering, but should always be controllable by a determined, energetic, intelligent minority, who are able to reason, who are able to vote, who are able to combine and prevent any unnecessary, imprudent and injudicious legislation.

It is important, therefore, in the construction of every government, that we should, if possible, as nearly as practical, balance the political parties in its legislative bodies. How can we more surely do it than by requiring every man to be elected in his own district; for it is well known in history, and every man understands it, that the State of Pennsylvania, as all other States, has been divided in sentiment by two or more political parties, and I take it such always will be the case. That being true, in one county you will find a large preponderance of the people of one party, and in another county you will find a large preponderance the other way. When you come to divide those counties into districts for Senators or Representatives, you will find it perfectly impossible, adhering to the principle of this amendment, to make your districts as nearly as practicable of compact and contiguous territory, to regulate them otherwise than that some should be of one political complexion and some of another.

Now, sir, if you accomplish that, and, at the same time, bring each representative home to his constituents—make him answerable to those who will send him—and allow those constituents to select their own man from among those whom they know, uninfluenced by any other consideration, you will accomplish the double good of bringing the representative home to his constituents, and making him immediately accountable to them, and, at the same time, of dividing your representatives, as nearly as practicable, into equal parties. The same thing would occur in the selection of Senators. Although you may have to combine two or more counties in a district, in some portions of a State, for the election of a Senator—depending, in this respect, upon the number, to be sure, of which that body should be composed—with the restriction upon the Legislature that they must be formed of contiguous and compact territory, you would necessarily bring together that portion of the population embracing one or more counties.

Mr. ALRICKS. Mr. Chairman: I move the gentleman have permission to proceed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WORRELL. I rise to a point of order. The committee of the whole cannot change a rule of the Convention.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule is that no man can speak more than ten minutes, unless leave be given. That leave has been given. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I was about to say, sir—and I will not detain the committee long—that, in the formation of Senatorial districts, we may have to embrace two or more counties, in some instances; but we cannot take a county here and a county there, and another yonder, of a long and narrow shape, for it would not be conforming to the provision, which requires the districts to be of contiguous and compact territory, as nearly as practicable.

In carrying this out, it will be found, whether in the formation of Senatorial or Representative districts—adhering to the spirit and letter of this proposed amendment—we should necessarily bind the Legislature; in other words, must expect it to obey the constitutional injunction—to conform to the Constitution, if practicable, in every respect; and thus you would have the Senatorial districts formed, as you would have the Representative districts.

Now, sir, suppose that, in the county of Chester—a county which, for the last ten or twenty years, has been as decidedly one way in politics as the county of Berks has been decidedly another—suppose we are to be entitled to three or four members, if you choose, and that county is to be divided into districts for the election of Representatives, and the Legislature is confined to contiguous and compact territory, it would be utterly impossible to secure, in the county of Chester, all the districts of one political complexion; and, I presume, it would be equally impossible, in the county of Berks, to secure them of the same politics. My friend from Berks (Mr. H. W. Smith) says not. Well, if there is but one party there, be it so. Probably, in the county of Washington, we might have both parties represented; and in the county of Lancaster you would have some of one party and some of the other.

In the city of Philadelphia your Senatorial districts would necessarily result, if properly formed of contiguous and compact territory, in the selection of those, at all events, who would represent the people of the district in each case, whether there be a majority on one side or the other. In the General Assembly there would still be those who want to represent their districts respectively, whatever might be their politics.

I will tell you of another difficulty which now exists, which would be avoided. It is one that occurs in the gerrymandering of the State, so as to form districts for party purposes.

Again, it would avoid another difficulty which we have in both parties, and which occurs in nominations in counties entitled to more than one representative. It would do away with the system of log rolling to get upon the ticket. Men put their heads together and say, "You help me, and I will help you. My delegates will go for you, if your delegates go for me," and thus they manage to get upon the ticket. It would do away with that. Each man would stand upon his own just foundation; and if he was a proper person to be placed in nomination by his own party, in his own district, if he was the man who should succeed in getting the majority of votes and be fairly nominated, what then? The other party would put forward their best man, and thus you would have the best men that could be selected by this district, the best man upon the one side against the best man upon the other, and a fair choice would be presented to the electors from which to choose. This would be an advantage, and a very great one.

Now, sir, this is no novel idea. It has been tried and is in successful operation throughout the whole country with regard to our members of Congress. I speak, now, irrespective of those cases in which, by reason of the non-apportionment of the State, the apportionment bill not having been passed by Congress early enough, two or three members at large have been elected, in some cases. The apportionment of the States of the Union for Congressional representation is by single districts of contiguous territory. We have had it in operation for a number of years, and I venture to say that it has been nowhere condemned. It produces the best results. It puts forward the best men for the representation of the single district which each party can venture to put into the field, and then the choice is fair between two good men, as to who shall represent it. It is, therefore, no untried scheme; but it is a scheme that has worked well throughout the nation. Nay, more; in the existing Constitution is contained the provision that by single districts shall the representatives from the city of Philadelphia be sent to Harrisburg. Has it not worked well? Some say it has not; some say it has; but whether they be good or bad representatives that are sent from the city of Philadelphia to Harrisburg, I suppose we are to assume that they are proper representatives of the people who sent them. If it does not secure proper representation in the city of Philadelphia, it would do so if the citizens of Philadelphia who do not go to the polls, would go. If those who do not go to the primary meetings for nominations, were to go, and thus secure the placing upon the ticket of the best men, then the best men would go to Harrisburg. If the good people neglect to do this, others will take it up. It is no argument against the system itself that in Philadelphia it may not have produced all the fruits which they expected from it.

This is the system which has been in operation in the State of New York ever since the year 1846, if I mistake not, as long as the present Constitution has existed. They have elected by single districts. Wherever a county is about the proper size for a single district, of course the county has a member; but single districts is the Constitutional provision of the State of New York, and I had it from a very respectable citizen of that State, very soon after the first election under that Constitution, that that election had sent to Albany the strongest body of men that had ever been elected in the State. Whether it continues so to the present time, I do not know. That was the testimony then. If it does not continue to be the case now, I apprehend that it is not because they are elected in single districts, but because other principles and other interests are involved which have led to a different result. I have heard no objection to it. I know very well that in the formation of the recent Constitution, along with many other things, this was changed, but that Constitution was rejected by the people, whether for this or some other causes I know not. It has not been adopted by the people of New York. It stands then, sir, so far as my knowledge extends, upon the experience of the Congress of the United States, and the experience of the State of New York and the city of Philadelphia. No one will deny but that it is right in principle; that the true theory of our government is that every man should be elected by the district which he immediately represents. It is so with the Governor; it is so with every State officer; it is so with the judges of our Supreme Court; they are all elected by all the people because they hold offices and perform duties with which all the people charge them with. They represent, in that sense, all the people. So it should be with every man elected everywhere. The true theory is, so far as we can adopt it, local self-government for all offices which are not necessarily State or more extended. The county elects the officers that are to represent the people of that county in their municipal affairs; the judicial district elects the judge who is to preside in the courts in their district. So throughout the State; so everywhere; so in all things. What are the objections, then, to it? Of course it is not for me to anticipate them. Now is there any difficulty in carrying it out?

I do not contemplate by this amendment, it will be perceived, the entire destruction of county representation, by any means. I do not consider it important that this last provision in reference to equality of population is so essential that it may not be varied. It must necessarily be varied. Take a county that has population enough for one member, and a few hundred or a few thousand more, it must have its one member of the Legislature; if enough for two, it must have two. Fractions I would disregard, in dividing a county that is entitled to two or more members, divided by township lines; a certain number of townships, say, form a district, although there may not be the precise amount of population in it that is necessary; while another district may contain more population than is necessary. I care not about a little variation in that respect. We still have as near as practicable the representation of the people by single districts, with population as nearly equal as possible. They will not be exactly equal, nor is it important that they should be. This I consider of minor importance.

We would then gain by the adoption of this amendment. Let the committee settle upon the number of Representatives and Senators. I name one hundred and fifty, and three hundred others may name five hundred, with a less number of the Senate. I do not know what we shall agree upon. Whatever number shall be agreed upon, the principle which I suggest in this amendment of representation by single districts will be the true theory, and it is the only true theory that ought to be adopted.

I do not mean to do more than to introduce this subject to the consideration of the Convention. It seems to me that it must necessarily commend itself to the good sense and sound judgment of every member of this body, and although it may be subject to modification as to form, I am satisfied that it is the principle which should be adopted.

MR. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I beg the gentlemen of the Convention will do the committee I represent the kindness of turning their attention now to the very great gravity of the question which is attracting the attention of this committee. Some of the most important considerations that will come before this Convention are now presented for the consideration and the action of the committee of the whole. In the first place there is opened by these two sections, the entire question of the numbers of the legislative bodies, how many Senators you intend to have, and how many Representatives you intend to have. In the second place the amendment of the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) introduces the question of whether you will have them in single districts; in other words, whether each Senatorial and each Representative district shall elect one Senator and one Representative. Then I beg the attention of members to the fact that the proviso reported by the committee limits any city or county of this State to four members, which, as you will see, raises another very important question in the distribution of legislative power. A fourth consideration of great importance is presented, and that is, what method will be most likely to prevent unfair advantages being taken by one partisan organization which happens to have a majority in the Legislature in districting the State.

I have already had the honor to present to the committee the considerations which compel my own mind to the conclusion that we ought not to increase the number; but that question will be fairly presented by an amendment to strike out the numbers thirty-three and one hundred, and insert any other numbers. I had the honor of stating to the committee then that I thought it was an utter fallacy to suppose that, by increasing the numbers, you gained either increase of character or integrity of any representative bodies; and I now venture to add that the experience of the eastern States is not in favor of the increase, and it is the smaller legislative body in every American State which has most stoutly withstood the attempts at its corruption.

In the next place, as to single Representative districts, I cannot forbear thinking that the county is the unit of representation with reference to the State, and that the State Legislature ought not to be entitled to carve a county to suit the necessities of the majority of that body; and finally, I believe that this provision reported by the committee, the provision adopted by the late Constitutional Convention of Illinois, is more likely than any other to secure an equitable and just districting of the Commonwealth for legislative purposes, but at any rate I trust the committee will give to these grave questions the full, grave and earnest consideration which their magnitude and importance deserve, and then I am very sure every member of the committee which reported this article will be glad to join in the final judgment of the committee upon the subjects embraced in it.

MR. WORRELL. Mr. Chairman: I would not say one word upon this question, were it not that I represent in part the largest Senatorial district of this city, the largest district in point of population, and consequently the district in which there is the greatest number of citizens unrepresented, and practically disfranchised.

I had hoped that the chairman of the Committee on Legislature would have favored us with the reason which induced his committee to propose this restriction upon the right of representation. But as no reason has been assigned for the proposed limitation, and as no just ground presents itself to my mind for a qualification of the principle that each elector shall have an equal voice in the selection of representatives, I am embarrassed in the discussion of the pending amendment.

The amendment of the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) provides that the House of Representatives shall consist of not less than one hundred and fifty members, and not more than three hundred members, and that the Senate shall consist of not less than one-fourth, and not more than one-third, of the number of the members of the House, with the proviso that no city nor county shall elect more than six Senators. This means that the Senate may consist either of fifty or one hundred members, and upon that basis, if the present proportion were preserved, the city of Philadelphia would be entitled to either six or twelve Senators, but if the number of taxable inhabitants were made the basis of apportionment, the city of Philadelphia could properly claim either nine or eighteen Senators accordingly, as the House of Representatives was made to consist of either the one or the other number of members which the gentleman proposes. The gentleman from Chester, it will be seen, asks us to adopt an amendment which may reduce Philadelphia's representation in the Senate lower, proportionally, than that which the city has under the present Constitution.

Now I submit, Mr. Chairman, that each city and county in this State should have of right that representation in each branch of the Legislature to which its population entitles it. Taxation and representation, under our form of government, should be reciprocal, and if any body of electors be denied participation in the legislation of the Commonwealth, they should, to the extent of the denial, be exempted from the burdens of government. It is proposed by this section to announce that taxation and representation are not reciprocal, and that the city of Philadelphia shall bear the burdens of government, but shall not enjoy governmental rights, in proportion to her population. No tax can be properly assessed nor legally collected, unless those upon whom the taxation is imposed were represented in the body which laid the assessment, or at least had the opportunity of being represented.

I think, Mr. Chairman, no analogy exists between this proposed limitation and the article of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that each State shall have two Senators.

Mr. Chairman, the people living in sections of this State other than the city of Philadelphia, should feel no jealousy of the citizens of Philadelphia. Our interests are common. We should take a just pride in the welfare and the prosperity of each other. The rights of each are the rights of the other, and every citizen of this Commonwealth should assert and maintain the equality of these rights, whether of representation or otherwise. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the Convention will not commit itself to the theory that a qualified elector, because he resides in a populous city or county, may be denied representation in that department of government which makes the laws to which he is to be amenable, and by which his rights are to be regulated.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I desire to call, in a brief manner, the attention of the committee to the exact character of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington.) I will take it for granted, when he says the number of Representatives shall never be greater than three hundred, and the number of Senators not more than one-third of that number, that the House of Representatives will always consist of three hundred members, and the Senate of one hundred members; and I submit that the past legislation, not only of this but in other States, shows that the Legislature, wherever there has been legislation on this subject, has always adopted the largest number of members; and, where constitutional enactments have been enforced, the largest number has been fixed, both for the Senate and the House of Representatives. I think I am safe, then, in saying that the number of the members of the Senate, according to the amendment of the gentleman from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) will be one hundred, and the number of the members of the House of Representatives will be three hundred. Taking this, therefore, as a basis, the ratio of representation in the Senate will be thirty-five thousand, and the ratio of representation in the House will be in the neighborhood of eleven thousand.

I could not help thinking, Mr. Chairman, as I glanced over the population of the county of Chester, how beautifully this amendment fitted into that county. That county has a population of seventy-seven thousand; and, if the ratio of representation in the House of Representatives is eleven thousand, Chester county will be entitled to seven members, without the loss of a vote; and, if the ratio in the Senate should be thirty-five thousand, and the population of Chester county seventy-seven thousand, we see how easily it entitles that county to two Senators, with a loss of only seven thousand votes; and yet, in the face of the fact that this county obtains her full count, the gentleman who represents Chester county proposes to restrict the city of Philadelphia to six Senators.

Now, Mr. Chairman, how does this principle operate? Why, sir, we have a population in the city of Philadelphia of about six hundred and seventy thousand, and if this city is limited to six Senators, the ratio of representation to each Senator will be about one hundred and fifteen thousand. Now, as the ratio of representation for the Senators throughout the Commonwealth is thirty-five thousand, it will thus be perceived that the city of Philadelphia loses on every Senator at least eighty thousand in population, and, as a consequence, the Senatorial power of every voter in Chester county has three times the force of the Senatorial power of every voter in the city of Philadelphia. In view of these facts I think this is one of the most unfair propositions I have ever heard of, or I am very much mistaken in my calculations. Now look at Allegheny county, and see how this principle will work there. In that county you have a large city, and you find existing in that city quite as much of election irregularities, in proportion, as is charged against the city of Philadelphia. There can be no question about this; and if the members of this Convention desire any proof of this fact, I think it will not be very difficult to furnish; therefore all large cities of the State should be subjected to the same rule. The city of Pittsburg, in the county of Allegheny, contains a population of about two hundred and sixty-five thousand. In the city of Philadelphia there is a population of six hundred and seventy thousand, and in the name of justice and fairness I ask the gentlemen from Chester (Mr. Darlington) why he, in his wisdom, proposes to give the city of Pittsburg and the county of Allegheny the same number of Senators as the city of Philadelphia? What could be more unfair than such a proposition? Will the gentlemen of this Convention ignore the large cities of the State entirely? Why, the city of Philadelphia, together with the corporations connected with it, pays a State tax of $2,500,000, in a State revenue of $8,000,000. The city, in her vast mercantile and manufacturing interests, demands that her rights to which she is fairly entitled should be recognized. I cannot understand why such a proposition should come from a delegate who is the representative of so liberal a county as Chester.

I do hope the Convention, when it comes to look at this question in all its length and breadth, will carefully examine this ratio of representation. Even with a representation of eleven thousand inhabitants there will be some six or eight counties without a representative. I am clearly in favor of giving to every county in the State a representative in the House. I am decidedly in favor of enlarging the Senate and the House of Representatives, in order to bring the legislative body as near as possible to the people, but I want to see fair and honest representation therein. I desire that every county in this State shall have their representatives, but I want it distinctly understood that I do not stand here in my place and favor representation by the acre. If there is force in the argument which I have used, then when we come to increase the Senate and House of Representatives, so as to give a representative to nearly every county, in that enlargement I desire that the city of Philadelphia shall receive all the Senators her population would entitle her to, and I hope, and am satisfied, that the members of this Convention from the city of Philadelphia, who have her interest at heart, and from simple justice to her tax-payers, will not frustrate this true and liberal ratio of representation, and I earnestly hope that the city of Philadelphia will meet with the same liberality at the hands of the interior counties which her interests demand and her population justifies.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman: I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Worrell) will pass, for I consider that the proposition in reference to large cities, which the report of the Committee on the Legislature contains, is a relic of old times, when the population of the State was much smaller than it is now, and when the limitation of four Senators to Philadelphia was not considered unfair. Since this limitation has been in force the city of Philadelphia has greatly increased in population, and the growing necessities and interests of that population certainly demand a larger representation in the Senate. The limitation to such a small number of Senators for a city of the extent and population of Philadelphia is almost an anomaly in the provisions of State Constitutions, relating to Senatorial representation of large cities. In the Constitutional Convention which was held in Illinois in 1870, a special provision was not made for the city of Chicago. That great city was not limited to a smaller number of Senators than her population entitled her to.

The Illinois Convention provided that the State should be divided into fifty-one Senatorial districts, and gave to Chicago, the largest city of the State, its full and just representation. In the other recent State Constitutions we do not find the largest cities of the country deprived of their equal and just number of Senators and Representatives. In rising, Mr. Chairman, and in making these remarks, it is with the intention, not of making a long speech upon the subject, but of merely adding my voice to those of the gentlemen from this city who have already spoken in favor of striking out this proviso, and against the unfairness and injustice of limiting Philadelphia to such a small number of Senators.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I only rise for the purpose of explaining the position I hold in regard to this question. I am in favor of basing representation upon population, and I cannot see why Philadelphia should be limited to a less number of representatives than according to her population she is fairly entitled to; and I claim for the little county of Carbon an equal representation according to her population, which is in the neighborhood of thirty thousand. We desire nothing more, and we will be satisfied with nothing less. I think if every gentleman of this Convention will consider this as a fair proposition, we shall have no difficulty in arriving at an equal and proper ratio of representation. I have only a single word to add in connection with the report of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, and it is, that by to-morrow the committee will have a section ready to report to the Convention which will take the place of this entire section, and, as we believe, will dispose of this whole question. It is designed to go further than the section under consideration, and will be an appropriate section to insert in the Constitution. I am strongly in favor of the largest representation in our Legislature, for I believe the enlargement of both the Senate and the House will greatly tend to purify our elections.

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. Chairman: I rise to state that I am also in favor of representation according to population in cities, towns and country, the State over. In the city of Philadelphia, in the year 1840, we had a population of 258,037. In 1838, when the other Convention met, the population probably was about 244,000. In 1870 we had a population of 674,022, and in 1873 the population would be about 700,000. Now at the same ratio of increase in thirty-five years, from 1838 to 1873, which would be about two and three-fourths, or nearly three for one, it would make our population, thirty-five years from this, 1,925,000. I ask the representatives on this floor whether it is fair, just, liberal and right that they should restrict the city of Philadelphia for thirty-five years in the future to four Senators, each Senator representing, probably, a population of nearly 500,000 citizens. I would like gentleman to consider this and see if there is any justice or equity in it.

Whilst I am up I will merely state that I am greatly in favor of largely increased numbers in both branches of the Legislature, one that would certainly give us a larger representation and a representation that we ought to have in proportion to our population.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I agree with my friend before me (Mr. Knight) in regard to increasing the number of both Senators and Representatives, and when we come to vote upon that question I shall vote with those who vote for the largest number. I believe that the Constitution will be greatly improved by increasing the numbers of both Houses. But the chairman of the Committee on Legislature, (Mr. MacVeagh,) who has brought this subject to our attention, limits the number of both Houses to what they now are—one hundred in the House and thirty-three in the Senate, and what I rise to say is this: That if that is to be fixed in the new Constitution, then I am altogether opposed to the striking out of this proviso that limits any city to four Senators. I say that this proviso is most important to remain in our Constitution if we retain the numbers of our State Legislature as the chairman of the Committee on Legislature proposes, one hundred in the House and thirty-three in the Senate.

Let me allude to the history of this. In the reform Convention of 1837 the late Thaddeus Stevens brought forward this proposition to limit cities to not more than four Senators, and he made a speech of extraordinary power, founded upon the text of Thomas Jefferson, that great cities are great sores upon the body politic. Mr. Stevens illustrated it in his masterly manner, and, sir, that speech of Mr. Stevens woke up the President of this Convention, (Mr. Meredith,) who replied to him in one of the most remarkable speeches that has ever been made in Pennsylvania, in our day certainly, if not in all time. It was a glorious conflict, sir. Why I recollect it now with that sort of pleasure with which we remember reading some of the most powerful fairy tales of our youth. Nobody interfered between these giants. They had the field to themselves. What was the result of that debate which, in a mere forensic sense, was greatly in favor of our friend, the President of the Convention? The result was that Mr. Stevens' amendment was carried and sustained by a large majority of the Convention, and the people of Pennsylvania sustained the Constitution with that amendment in it. And my opinion is here, to-day, that they will never give it up while the world stands, and it never ought to be given up.

MR. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman; Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

MR. WOODWARD. Certainly.

MR. DARLINGTON. Was it not in the Constitution of 1790 in precisely the same terms?

MR. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: Perhaps it was. The proposition may have been in the Convention of 1838, as it is here, to strike it out of the Constitution. Mr. Stevens made his speech upon that subject. So far as I can recollect, and if my memory is at fault my friend from Chester (Mr. Darlington) will correct me, this was the subject on which these gentlemen debated so infinitely to our edification and amusement, and the result was, if it was in the old Constitution it was kept there; it has been kept there, and I trust it will always be kept there.

What my young friend from Philadelphia (Mr. Campbell) says here about representation from the city of Philadelphia, and from other counties, according to population, is all right in the abstract. Undoubtedly population is the true basis for representation. But these great cities are exceptional. They are an exception to that rule. And, sir, if you will recur to what you have heard upon the floor of this House since we have been here, you will find a sufficient justification of this limitation, for, from the evidence of every gentleman from this city, and from other parts of the country, we learn that the most vicious legislator at Harrisburg comes from the representatives of these large cities. I do not know how it is. I do not mean to say that populations in the rural districts are any better or purer than populations in urban districts; but such is the practical outworking of our system that our great cities send into the Legislature the men who give us the worst legislation of any class of representatives. They ought to send there the most intelligent and leading minds of the country, for they contain them. Intellect, like capital, centres in these great cities; but when have these great cities been duly represented in the Legislature of Pennsylvania? What gentleman will rise now in his place and say they are represented to-day as they ought to be? That the intellect, and culture, and enterprise of Philadelphia are represented to-day in the Legislature of Pennsylvania as they ought to be? No man will say it. When have they been so represented? Never in our day. When will they be so represented? Never in our day.

Now gentlemen may search for the reason of this down in the foundation of things as deep as they please, and one man will assign one reason and another man another; but there is a reason lying deep in the foundation of things, from this fact: It is only the effect that works out to the surface, and we may all feel it, and see it, and know it, that teaches us that this provision, which my friend says was in the Constitution of 1790, is a most salutary provision, provided you retain the present numbers for the two Houses. But if you increase the present numbers of the two Houses, which I hope will be done, why, then I will vote for an increase of this limitation, still retaining the limitation; still retaining the principle; but, of course, increasing the limitation if we increase the numbers of the two Houses of the Legislature.

What I feel concerned about is, first, that we are not going to increase the two Houses. From what I hear from the chairman of the committee, whose report is now under consideration, and other influential gentlemen of the body, I anticipate that the disposition of the majority is to retain the present number. Very well. Then I insist upon retaining this amendment. If you increase the numbers of the two Houses, I will agree to enlarge the basis of this exception; but this exception I hold to be most salutary and conservative, and I shall be extremely sorry to see it stricken out of our Constitution. I say this as a Philadelphian, which I am in some sort. But I do not forget that I represent on this floor, not Philadelphia, but the State of Pennsylvania. I am a delegate at large. I represent the people of Pennsylvania, and I think I serve them faithfully when I say that it would be a great mistake to deprive them of this limitation upon these great overgrown communities which constitute our cities.

MR. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: I would like to know for my gratification, if I could ascertain it, upon what principle the proviso is based, and how it can be justified. I would like to know by what rule, by what theory, a man residing in one locality is to have, in the legislative branch of the State, a power three times as great as a man who happens to reside in another. Neither, perhaps, resides at his home from choice, but from compulsion. If we propose to have a democracy it ought never to exist. Even if we propose to have it in the form of a republic, of a representative government, it ought not to exist. It seems to me that a proposition to provide that a city or a county, no matter where located, what it may want, or how many people it may have, shall be restricted by an arbitrary principle in the proportion of the representation of the State, is to cut at the very foundation of the government, which is the right of the governed to be represented.

If the proposition be carried out, if this principle is to be carried out as it is now proposed, and as it is now applied under our present Constitution, it cannot be said, in the language of the Bill of Rights, that all men are free and equal. I am not equal to a man residing outside of the city of Philadelphia so far as the Senate of the State is concerned. I have not that power. My voice is not so potent in the Senate of this State as a man who resides a quarter of a mile from me, because between him and me runs a little creek called Cohocksink, a little stream about four yards wide. He has a power in the Senate which I have not. He may be as intelligent as I am, as wealthy or as poor as I am, but his power in the legislative branch is far greater than I possess.

I can understand very well why such a limitation as this would be originally imposed in 1790, although I have not seen any such limitation in that instrument. But at that time, if delegates will recur back to the history of this State, it was believed that the city of Philadelphia would grow in a much larger ratio than all the rest of the State, and that in time it would probably contain one-half of the population of the entire State. Now I can imagine why such a proviso could have been placed in the old Constitution of 1790.

MR. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: Allow me to suggest to the gentleman that it is explicitly set forth in that Constitution in the article beginning: "The Senators shall be chosen in districts."

MR. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: I was just about to read that section to show how our old Constitution did treat this subject.

"The Senators shall be chosen in districts, to be formed by the Legislature, containing each, as nearly as may be, such a number of taxable inhabitants as shall be entitled to elect one Senator; but where that cannot be done, then such number of adjoining counties shall be formed into one district as shall be entitled to elect not more than four Senators: Provided, That neither the city of Philadelphia, nor any county, shall be divided in forming a district."

I can understand very well the theory that existed then. It was feared that Philadelphia, from its aggregation, would come, in time, to absorb one-third, or one-half, or even, perhaps, more than one-half, of the entire population of this State, and when occurred, it was feared the city would, in both branches of the Legislature, grasp the power of the State, and therefore the limitation was necessary. Well, that limitation, as passed by the Convention of 1838, was designed to restrict the city, in its lawful representation, upon the floor of the Senate; and yet, under that limitation, if now in force, Philadelphia would have, upon the floor of the Senate in Pennsylvania, this day, its eight members. She would have eight members to-day, but for the fact that, in 1854, the old county of Philadelphia was merged into the city; the city borders were enlarged, and it was all brought within one limit—the city of Philadelphia. But for that act of consolidation Philadelphia would, to-day, be entitled to its proportion of the Senate—not exceeding eight members; four from the old city and four from the districts surrounding it. The city and county would have been entitled to eight Senators.

But by the act of consolidation, merging the city and county into one city, it fell within that clause of the proviso that no city or county should be entitled to more than four members; and although we had, at the time of the passage of the act of 1854, five Senators, yet at the first apportionment thereafter we lost one of them, and from that time to the present we have had but four Senators. Now if the proviso that was in the Constitution of 1838, was carried out as it was intended to be, as applied to the city, limiting the proportion and not the number, as, for instance, that it should not have more than one-fourth of the Senators, or more than two-fifths, or some other definite proportion, I could understand the justice of the argument; but I cannot understand it when it is made an arbitrary number, which number may, in time, work great injustice, as in the instance cited by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. J. Price Wetherill,) that where a citizen residing in Chester county might have three times the power that a citizen residing in Philadelphia has. That ought not to be. We have, in that rule, departed from the foundation stone. As I have shown that the reason has passed away, there is no fear, and can be no fear now, that Philadelphia will ever, in relation to population, increase in an equal ratio with the rest of the State. There is no danger. The opening up of mines and of collieries, and the development of all the varied interests of the State, have gathered together populations and masses of people so great as to put it beyond peradventure that Philadelphia can ever, possibly, have one-third of the population of the State of Pennsylvania; and if Philadelphia cannot have more than a third, giving her her representation, she cannot control the State government. She ought not to, if she could. In the proviso, if there should be substituted a proportion, say one-fourth, or two-fifths, I would vote for it; but I cannot, and will not, vote for the proviso in its present form, and I hope the Convention will vote this down as anti-democratic and anti-republican, and as against the spirit of free institutions, and in violation of the rule that all men are free and equal.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: It seems to be pretty well settled that this limit in the Constitution was placed there a generation before most of us were born. It has been in the Constitution of the State ever since 1790, and the simple question now for the Convention to determine is, whether it shall be struck out after this long period of time has elapsed, assuming that the total number of Senators shall be retained at thirty-three. Necessarily, if we change the total number of members in each House, this limitation will become inapplicable or improper. It must be changed or some other one substituted for it. Therefore this question involves the discussion of the other points, to wit: Of how large a number shall the Legislature consist; and also certain of the conditions upon which membership shall be assigned to the several divisions of the Commonwealth, whether counties or cities.

I am strongly, very strongly, opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) and to all propositions of a similar character which may be proposed hereafter. One of the great evils at which, if it be possible, this Convention should strike, and strike unflinchingly, is "gerrymandering," as we have had it heretofore illustrated, in the Legislature of our State. And if we can reach that great evil and iniquity, and I hope, before we are done with this question, we shall reach it, we should apply a thorough and effectual remedy for the future. If you are to divide this State into single Representative and single Senatorial districts, and commit the work to the Legislature, as is proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) the iniquity and evil of the "gerrymandering system," as it has been known heretofore, in this and other States, will receive an unexampled illustration. It will become so intolerable and offensive that you will be obliged promptly to again change the fundamental law of the State; at least that is my opinion.

Now, sir, I think that it is perfectly feasible to take this question of apportionment out of the Legislature entirely; and I will read the form of a proposition by which it may be accomplished.

"At the general election in the year 1881, and every tenth year thereafter, there shall be chosen by a vote of the electors of the State at large, ten commissioners of apportionment, whose duty it shall be to divide the State into Senatorial and Representative districts, and assign to each of such districts its appropriate representation. Any apportionment, or report thereof, so made, shall be concurred in by at least seven commissioners;" and then the proposition further provides that the commissioners shall be elected upon the plan of the "limited vote"—no voter voting for more than five—and that any vacancy in the number of said commissioners shall be filled in the manner in which vacancies are filled in the membership of this Convention.

So that by no accident shall the Constitution of that "board," if you choose to call it such, be changed or altered before the work is done, and by requiring the concurrence of seven of the ten members who shall constitute it, you have a guaranty—an effectual guaranty—that the apportionment will be justly made.

Now, sir, the last apportionment of this State by the Legislature cost the people no less than seventy-five thousand dollars. The session was protracted nearly two months beyond the ordinary time of adjournment, and compensation to members was voted for the additional time after one hundred days of session, at the same rate at which members are ordinarily paid, for that time, swelling up the expenditures for the session enormously. The figures were referred to by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Jno. Price Wetherill) some time since, in debate, as showing the profligacy, or, perhaps, I should use a softer term, the want of economy, in the Legislature of our State; yet, sir, that outlay was but reasonable, because the detention of the two Houses until nearly the first of June in the making of that apportionment. But that apportionment, as made, was stamped all over its face with wrong and injustice, and, in one part, with unconstitutionality also. The county of Luzerne had enough taxables for five Representatives, and a surplus, and she had also a surplus in her Senatorial district; yet, arbitrarily, she was given but four, in flat contempt of the Constitution of the State. If you will cast your eye over the State, you will see here and there counties joined to each other, not for any just, proper and public reason, but to subserve some individual or partisan purpose, as, for instance, the junction of Perry county with Dauphin—and several other instances might be named.

Sir, I am in favor of enlarging the number of Senators and Representatives in the Legislature of our State, if we can secure along with it a reform in the manner of choosing them, by which all the people shall be represented. In case the two go together, in my judgment we will have a great reform; but I am not, as at present advised, in favor of disturbing this report of the Committee on Legislature as to the number of Senators and Representatives, if we are to have no reform or improvement in the manner of selecting them. I would rather leave things as they are, trusting to the increased experience of the people in future years.

If we shall increase the number of members of the Legislature in the two Houses, I think, instead of this arbitrary provision in the Constitution as to the number of Senators, I would agree to a proposition that no city or county shall have more than one-sixth part of the total representation in the Senate. That would give, upon a basis of sixty Senators, ten to this city. At present her representation is a little less than one-eighth. I think, sir, that the old idea that you should constitute the lower House of the Legislature upon the principle of numbers, absolutely representing the whole population of the State, and the other House upon a different basis—taking into account territory and the diversity of interests as they may exist in different parts of the State—is a sound one, or, at least, it is capable of being vindicated by argument. But, sir, I perceive that my time is up.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I move that the time be extended, so as to allow the gentleman (Mr. Buckalew) to proceed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I thank the committee, but I do not desire to speak further at this time.

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: Coming, as I do, from the interior of the State, I feel called upon, just here, to say a word or two in reference to the true basis of representation. I understand it to be conceded by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) that population is the basis, and the only true basis, of representation; but that, as there are exceptions to all general rules, he thinks cities ought to be made exceptions to this general rule. The only reason he gives for thus depriving a portion of our citizens of their just representation is this: That his friend Thaddeus Stevens, in 1838, made a great speech, in which he denominated great cities great ulcers and sores on the body politic. The truth of the assertion he does not undertake himself to verify.

I will concede that in cities there are great vices, but I must also be permitted to assert that there are great virtues there also. The only city interested in the provision under discussion is great in commerce, great in her manufactories, great in the diversity of her interests, and great in everything that points to human weal. Why, then, should she be deprived of her just rights to representation? I will admit the power of this Convention to deprive her of her just rights, but the question presented to us is, should the majority of this Convention do it? Will they not violate the law of nature if they do it? It seems to me they will. I have been wholly unable to conceive any possible reason why Philadelphia should not be placed upon the same platform with every other portion of the State when she comes to ask her representation. On a former occasion I remarked that representation arose from necessity, and from necessity alone; and if we were not under that necessity, and the masses could assemble and deliberate for their welfare, who would undertake to deprive any portion of the citizens of Philadelphia of their right to deliberate, of their right to be heard in the democratic assembly? And if representation arises out of necessity, how can we be justified in depriving any portion of that population of being heard by their representatives? The representative body being but an epitome of the people at large, and, if an epitome, then, why should they not be fully represented in the Senate as in the House, and in both bodies alike? It may be placed upon the ground of contracted territory, and that territory should enter into the basis of representation. I do not think the argument is good. The diversities of interests of the inhabitants of a city are greater—far greater—in proportion to the number of inhabitants in a city, than in districts in the country of equal population. These different interests in a city should be represented. The people of the entire State have a right to demand of us, in making a Constitution for their government, that they shall each and all be fairly represented, and how can you afford a just representation in the city of Philadelphia to these varied interests in commerce, in learning, and in everything that pertains to the good of man, unless you give them a just epitome of their population in the representative body?

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to any restriction whatever. I was not surprised at the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) when he made his proposition. I have observed his course from our first meeting, and he seems to be wedded to the Constitutions of 1790 and 1838—joined to his idols. My friend from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) seems to sympathize with him in his adoration, probably from having participated in the erection of that fabric of human liberty. I cannot conceive any reason why we should not reform the errors of the past. With that view we are called here—to correct errors—not to bow submissively to what has been given to us in years that are past. We are here for the purpose of doing better than they did, in the light of the age in which we live, and therefore I do not sympathize with those gentlemen in adhering to error simply because it has the prestige of antiquity.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say a few words on this subject to-day, because I may, on account of engagements which I cannot control, be absent from the Convention to-morrow.

There are two great points involved in this twentieth section which deserve a separate discussion. I shall say but little about one of them at this time, because I desire to occupy my time in discussing what, to me, is of paramount importance.

I believe in the value of larger representation. I believe experience, especially to the east, has shown the advantage of that, in preventing improper combinations, to the disadvantage of the people, to be so easily formed, and in limiting and greatly impeding improper attempts at influencing the legislative bodies. I shall, therefore vote for the very largest number that I may have an opportunity of voting for; certainly up to four hundred for the lower House, if I may be so permitted. But I want to say something about a subject that is vastly more important. It is a matter of which justice itself lies at the root.

On what principle is this limitation of a city or county to a designated number based? I defy any gentleman on this floor to give a good reason for it. I can understand very well that where your principle of representation, in the smaller or upper body, is based upon a representation of interests and not of population, something may be said about it. That is not the theory of our government. It is not the theory of this section. It still comes to city and county representation, which is altogether diverse from a representation of political or economical interests. It has no analogy to any such system of representation as that. You therefore, in electing members to the upper House, per force, unless you change—unless, indeed, you tear to pieces—your present system, assume, as a basis, population. I want any gentleman that is prepared to vote for this grave act of injustice to pause. Let him search his heart and see if he can find any reason for this, and if he appeal only to mere selfish motives, let him dread, if he casts his suffrage in favor of such a limitation as this, whether, in some shape or other, poisoned chalice may not be returned to his own lips. Why should Philadelphia have a smaller representation in the Senate? Why should any city or county have a smaller representation in the Senate than any other portion of the community? Is it to be said that large cities do not pay their full ratio of the public burdens? The merest glance at the returns of the taxes paid, direct and indirect, will refute that. If you take taxation as a ratio, then, instead of asking, as we might, sixteen or eighteen members, we would be entitled to ask twenty-four. This, therefore, cannot be the reason. It is to be supposed that we are not equally alert to bear, according to the ratio of our population, an equal share of public burdens in other ways. Why, sir, Philadelphia—and this section, disguise it as you may, is aimed at Philadelphia—has always sprung to her feet at the call, real or suppose—too frequently the latter—of patriotic appeal, to do more than her full share in pouring out her blood and treasure, on every occasion, in which has been asked.

Are we to discuss here, at some future stage of the report of one of the leading standing committees, the question whether minorities shall have their just share in the voice of the public councils, when we say in advance that we are ready to deprive the citizen by any imaginary barrier, of his fair share of representation? Why, sir, all these discussions, if this blot remains in this system, will be worse than idle. Why talk of the "rights of minorities?" Why talk of "proportional representation?" Why talk of modes of getting "a fairer expression of the will of the people," when you stamp indelibly upon your whole system a brand which proclaims that because a city or a county, in its struggles for the acquisition of material wealth, reaches a certain figure in population, you will by a barrier that cannot be passed, condemn her on that very ground of material advance, to a less share of justice than is meted out to her neighbors. Are gentlemen prepared to do that? I at first thought that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Chester possessed some little merit. I see it now, stripped of all such attempt at fairness; for, whilst this section gives four Senators, his gives six, with a ratio three times as great. He ought to give us twelve, to be consistent with the system as it now exists. I care not for any such amendment. I maintain, and I hope this Convention will in simple justice—that is all we want—no favors, justice, equality—assert the principle of having a representation, both in the Senate and the House, based upon county and city life, which means population and nothing else, according precisely the same to all. If you do not, your labors are in vain. Why talk of improvement? Why talk of advance? Why talk of the progressive spirit of the age, if the progress is to be in injustice and not towards fairness? Why cite the Constitution of 1790, which, by the bye, contains no such provision as the Constitution of 1838—

MR. WOODWARD. You are right about that, I find.

MR. BIDDLE. I know I am right, because I examined it before I came here. The Constitution of 1838 does, but is that a reason? We come here, or are supposed to be here, to correct something that heretofore has been wrong, else we had better have stayed at home. Now let us begin, not by doing that which is merely supposed to be more expedient, not by doing something the value of which is problematical, not by changing that which has heretofore worked well, but by going back to the very source at which justice is found to exist.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether my time is up or not? I do not wish to encroach upon the rule of the Convention.

["Go on!" "Go on!"]

The CHAIRMAN. You have two minutes yet.

Mr. BIDDLE. Well, sir, I merely wish to say, in closing, that I want this Convention, unless it can see some reason based upon some generically different rule which is not yet found in any of these sections, to conform to that principle which says that the citizens shall be heard through his representative, his selected mouth-piece. My friend from Philadelphia (Mr. J. Price Wetherill) has depicted fairly, not rhetorically, the gross injustice of treating a man living on one side of a creek with a certain proportion of representation in that body which is considered the higher and the more conservative, and giving to a man who lives immediately opposite to him, on the other side of the creek, possessing no more rights than he, and without any reason for the distinction, just three times as large a voice in that body.

Are cities such blots upon the body politic? Are the citizens of this State to be deprived of their natural right because they happen to live in a city? From whence do gentlemen draw this argument? I have always supposed that as the political heart became enriched with richer blood, the extremities also are benefited by the circulation through the different veins and arteries which course through our political system. Are our cities to be looked upon like fungus, or a festering sore that possesses no life or vitality. If so then proclaim it boldly, and you will do less injustice in depriving us of that to which we are fairly entitled. Large cities and large communities will not be willing to submit to such a provision. A majority may ride over the rights of a minority, but they can never do this with justice to themselves, or with honor and fairness, in dealing with the rights of the people. It would be just as difficult to change the primordial laws of our natures, as to expect that such an element of injustice as this can ever find a permanent and abiding place in the Constitution of this Commonwealth.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I only desire to occupy the time of the Convention a few moments, and, with the privilege of the Convention, I shall proceed to make a few explanatory remarks upon the position I held when I addressed the Convention upon this question. Since that time I have consulted the record, and I find that I was absolutely correct, and that the gentleman from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) in presuming to correct my statement, was himself in error. In the Constitution of 1790, it was provided in section seven, that "the Senators shall be chosen in districts to be formed by the Legislature; each district containing such a number of taxable inhabitants as shall be entitled to elect not more than four Senators." The Constitution of 1838 reads thus: "Section 7. The Senators shall be chosen in districts to be formed by the Legislature; but no district shall be so formed as to entitle more than two Senators, unless the number of taxable inhabitants in any city or county shall at any time be such as to entitle it to elect more than two; but no city or county shall be entitled to elect more than four Senators." &c. This was the amendment which Mr. Stevens moved, and out of which the debate arose to which I have alluded. It was not in the Constitution of 1790, because the Constitution of that year has reference to districts, while the provisions of the Constitution of 1838 have reference to cities and counties.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the Constitution of 1790 does not provide that no district shall elect more than four Senators, and that no city shall be divided in the form of districts. Placing these two clauses together, I would ask the gentleman if it did not restrict the city to four Senators?

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: The provision of 1838 was added to the Constitution, so far as my memory serves me. I have already stated that the people of Pennsylvania ratified the Constitution, and no complaint ever arose in regard to it. Mr. Chairman, as I said before, all this talk about the purity of the rural population, as compared with the other populations of the State, has a great deal in it that is not true, and yet it is a well known fact, that the 700,000 people that inhabit this city are the consumers of the products of the entire people of the State. We are all consumers, living upon the industry, more or less, of the other portions of the State, and what, then, would this great city be without the country which surrounds it and has made it? Why the State was originally a State of farmers. When William Penn found that his English colonists had become malcontents upon his hands, he went to Germany and established emigration societies in all the German cities, and those societies sent a thrifty population to our shores, and it has been upon the labor of this class of our citizens that the whole prosperity of the State has been based. The German population of our interior counties, from whom we originally derived our government, farmed the lands of the State, and it was the transportation of the products of their farms to market that projected the railroads and canals throughout the State. Pennsylvania, whose Constitution we are now considering, was not then a State of cities; it was a State of solid, substantial German farmers, and when I hear gentlemen talk about the justice and injustice of disfranchising a portion of the people, I say that these political regulations rest at last upon the judgment of the real people of the State, and the people of the State have settled this distinction upon a reason which has been found to be a solid and substantial one. There is no injustice, therefore, it seems to me, in the people of such a State as Pennsylvania, in saying to the great cities of the Commonwealth, that their representation in the upper branch of the Legislature shall be limited. It is impossible to tell to what extent the city of Philadelphia may grow, for within its limits it already possesses one-fifth of the population of the State of Pennsylvania, and we do not know but that the city of Philadelphia may grow to such an extent as to possess the Legislature of the State. Man made the city and God made the country; and the farmers and the producers of the staples upon which the cities live do desire to retain this provision in our Constitution. The country has made the city and the city has not made the country. When gentlemen talk about the magnificence and importance of Philadelphia, and the injustice of imposing a limitation, in our fundamental law, upon the overgrown population of this great city, they talk as if they had never read the history of the State; they talk as if they were not Pennsylvanians. I do not desire to run a parallel between the urban and the rural populations, but I recognize the fact that there is a distinction between them away down in the foundations of society, and, in the very nature of things, that distinction must always exist between the producing and the consuming populations. That distinction is honored by this limitation in representation. Why, sir, if thirty-three Senators comprise the Senate of the State, certainly four Senators are enough to represent the city of Philadelphia. When, I would like to inquire, does the city of Philadelphia propose to send any of these delegates, these highly gifted and intelligent gentlemen who I see around me, to the Senate of the State. Why I should like to see one of these delegates, whom her citizens have sent to this Convention, run against the ring in this city. The gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) narrated an instance that occurred in a recent election, in which Col. McClure was an opposing candidate, where three election officers and nine citizens voted in one precinct, between the hours of eleven and twelve o'clock, and not a single vote was announced during that entire hour for the candidate for whom the votes had been cast. Three election officers and nine citizens were thus cheated out of their votes in a single hour. An expensive contested election case followed, wherein all these facts were developed and McClure was awarded his seat in the Senate of the State, and now represents the city of Philadelphia. This instance of election fraud is by no means exceptional, for other developments have been brought to light by the reform organization of this city. If we can purify the ballot-box, if we can secure a representation for the substantial and worthy citizens of Philadelphia in the Legislature of the State, I submit that this limitation is too small, but in the existing state of affairs, I maintain it will be a great mistake if the Convention shall, by its action, exceed this limitation.

MR. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say just one word. The argument of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) seems to be that because we do not elect good representatives, therefore, we should not have our full share. Now I do not think that that is logical. I think that the argument should be that population should be the basis of representation.

But I arose to make simply one remark. The gentleman from Philadelphia—I believe he is called from Philadelphia—suggests that the citizens of Philadelphia are simply a body of consumers. I desire, in answer, to state that the manufactured products of Philadelphia, two or three years ago, amounted to $335,000,000 yearly, so that if he will look at that fact, he will see that we do produce something here, something besides illegal votes, and I do not believe that we produce half as many of them as has been stated here, but still we do produce something that adds to the wealth of this community and of the State. The argument made by the gentleman from Philadelphia is, that we should endeavor to make this Constitution for the farming population of Pennsylvania. That upon this class should devolve entirely the duty of forming a Constitution which is to govern the whole State of Pennsylvania, including the city of Philadelphia, is a proposition to which I do not submit. His argument amounts to that, and nothing more. If you should take the varied interests of Philadelphia, and put them into comparison with any portion of this State, and base the representation upon that comparison, then we would be willing to put the question upon that basis. Take all the interests together of the different communities of the State, and if the apportionment is to be based upon these, and not upon population, Philadelphia certainly could be satisfied.

Mr. DALLAS obtained the floor, when Mr. Biddle requested that he yield to a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. DALLAS yielded; and

Mr. BIDDLE moved that the Convention rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to, the committee rose and the President resumed his seat.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. HOPKINS, chairman of the committee of the whole, stated that the committee had considered the report of the Committee on Legislature, and had instructed him to report progress and request leave to sit again.

Leave was given the committee to sit to-morrow.

Mr. HARRY WHITE moved that the Convention adjourn, which was agreed to, and at 1.56 the Convention adjourned until ten A. M. to-morrow.

FIFTY-SECOND DAY.

WEDNESDAY, February 26, 1873.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M.

Prayer was offered by Rev. Mr. Curry.

THE ELECTIONS IN PHILADELPHIA.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 26, 1873.

To the HON. WM. M. MEREDITH,

President Constitutional Convention:

DEAR SIR:—At the last October election, one hundred and eighteen thousand seven hundred and nineteen votes were polled for a municipal officer, the receiver of taxes. The Convention proposes to separate the election of the municipal officers of the city from the general election, and have fixed the third Monday of February as the day on which it is to take place. By the consolidation act of 1854, which had been framed with great care, and after an ample discussion by the General Executive consolidation committee of the citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, the first Tuesday in May was appointed for the municipal election, being in a mild season of the year, and when a full vote could be brought out. The day selected by the Convention is in the most inclement season of the year—in mid-winter—with the streets filled with snow and ice, and with ice gorges in the Schuylkill and Susquehanna. Sunday, the sixteenth day of February, was a day on which no one ventured into the streets, except under the pressure of absolute necessity. How many votes would be polled on such a day, or on the succeeding Monday. If it is intended to have a real separate municipal election, some other day must be selected, and I know none more suitable than the first Tuesday in May.

The city of Philadelphia covers one hundred and thirty square miles, and has a larger number of houses, in proportion to its population, than any other large city in America, and the honest mechanic and operative can have his separate dwelling, with water and gas. It is the greatest manufacturing city in the United States, and is commencing to re-gain its foreign commerce by establishing lines of iron steamships, built by American mechanics, on the shores of the Delaware.

She has within a fraction of one-fifth of the population of the State, and her list of taxables entitles her to six Senators out the thirty-three Senators, which I feel the justice of the Convention will give her.

By the census of 1870,—

The population of the State is... 3,521,791
The population of the city is..... 674,022

By the triennial assessment,—

The taxables of the State were... 861,498
The taxables of the city were... 158,622
For each Senator is required..... 26,106

Which would give the city of Philadelphia six Senators out of these thirty-three Senators.

In 1790 the population of the State was 434,373

In 1790 the population of the county, now city, of Philadelphia was 54,391

Showing the increase of the city to be much larger than the rest of the State.

I am, very respectfully,

JOHN M. READ.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. ANDREW REED presented a petition from the citizens of Juniata county, praying for a provision in the Constitution against the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. H. G. SMITH presented a petition from the citizens of Lancaster county, praying for the same provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. HAZZARD presented a petition from the citizens of Washington county, praying for the same provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. TURRELL presented petitions from the citizens of Wayne, Lycoming and Columbia counties, praying for the same provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. DUNNING presented a petition from the citizens of Luzerne county, praying for the same provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. LONG presented a petition of the citizens of Carbon county, praying for the same provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. CURRY presented a petition from the citizens of Blair county, praying for the same provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. H. W. PALMER presented a petition from the citizens of Luzerne county, praying for the same provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

DEBATE IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Mr. WRIGHT offered the following resolution, which was laid on the table under the rules:

Resolved, That when, in committee of the whole, a motion is made to extend the time of a member in debate the length of the time shall be fixed in the motion.

SMULL'S HAND-BOOK.

Mr. LILLY offered the following resolution, which was twice read:

Resolved, That the State Printer be and he is hereby required to furnish to the Convention one hundred and forty copies of Smull's Hand-Book for 1873: Provided, That the cost of the same shall be the same as is charged the State for those furnished the Legislature.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. President: I move to strike out the words "State Printer," and insert "Chief Clerk."

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I desire to state that the State Printer is the publisher of this very convenient Hand-Book, and that is edited by Mr. Smull. The State Printer is able to furnish this book at the manufacturer's prices, and I cannot see the advantage of inserting the name of the Chief Clerk in the resolution.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. President: I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. KAINE. I would like to know what the probable cost of this book will be.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. President: I hope this resolution will not pass. It has been a great source of complaint with the citizens of this State that the Legislature is continually making appropriations to purchase books of this character, and I think we had better not imitate the example of the Legislature in this respect. Therefore I do hope that we will not vote for any more books or publications to be furnished to this Convention at the cost of the State.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I hope that this resolution will pass. I can conceive of no possible complaint that any tax-payer or any citizen of the Commonwealth can make against the passage of this resolution. It is not merely for the personal profit or benefit of the members of this Convention, but to assist them in the performance of their duty here.

Now what is Smull's Legislative Hand-Book? It is no job. It is matter that is contracted to be published annually by the State, by a solemn statute, at a fixed rate. It is a valuable publication. There is statistical information, items necessary to be known by the representatives of the people, aggregated there in a convenient and compendious form, not to be had in the same form elsewhere. Yesterday, when the question of apportioning the State, the question of the taxables and of the census returns were talked of, there was a singular want of the proper means of information upon these subjects in the Convention. Now Smull's Legislative Hand-Book has all these things aggregated in a convenient manner. The cost of it is a matter of small consequence. It will not amount to one dollar a volume.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. President: Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is not the list of taxables already furnished in the Convention Manual that we have paid for.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: That may be so; but there are other items of information comprised in this Hand-Book. The present legislative districts of the State, as fixed by the last apportionment, the present Congressional districts, the present judicial districts, the numbers of the judges, the popular vote for several years past in the different counties, and much more, is contained in this compact volume; and all this information is valuable.

I am in favor of economy always. For one, I yield to no man in my record on this subject; but I conceive there is a propriety in securing proper information for the use of this Convention.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: I am always opposed to this buying business, but I would not object in this small way if the gentleman who offered the resolution would strike out "Smull's Hand-Book" and insert "Ginx's Baby," we would then have a more valuable book.

On the question of agreeing to the resolution, the yeas and nays were required by Mr. Cochran and Mr. Fell, and were as follow, viz :

Y E A S.

Messrs. Achenbach, Addicks, Ainey, Alricks, Andrews, Baer, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bardsley, Black, J. S., Brodhead, Buckalew, Carter, Clark, Curry, De France, Dunning, Edwards, Ellis, Ewing, Fell, Fulton, Gibson, Green, Guthrie, Hanna, Hemphill, Heverin, Howard, Knight, Lamberton, Landis, Lawrence, Lilly, Long, MacConnell, M'Allister, M'Camant, M'Clean, M'Murray, Mann, Mantor, Metzger, Minor, Niles, Palmer, H. W., Patton, Porter, Pughe, Purman, Purviance, John N., Purviance, Samuel A., Reynolds, S. H., Ross, Runk, Smith, H. G., Smith, W. H., Stanton, Stewart, Temple, Van Reed, Wherry, White, David N., White, Harry, White, J. W. F. and Wright—63.

N A Y S.

Messrs. Bailly, (Perry,) Campbell, Cochran, Corbett, Craig, Curtin, Cuyler, Darlington, Dodd, Funck, Hay, Hazzard, Hopkins, Kaine, Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Reed, Andrew, Rooke, Smith, Henry W., Struthers, Turrell, Walker, Wetherill, John Price and Meredith, President—24.

So the resolution was agreed to.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Armstrong, Baker, Bannan, Barclay, Bartholomew, Beebe, Biddle, Black, Charles A., Bowman, Boyd, Broomall, Brown, Carey, Cassidy, Church, Collins, Corson, Cronmiller, Dallas, Davis, Elliott, Finney, Gilpin, Gowen, Hall, Harvey, Horton, Hunsicker, Lear, Littleton, M'Culloch, MacVeagh, Mott, Newlin, Palmer, G. W., Parsons, Read, John R., Reynolds, James L., Russell, Sharpe, Simpson, Wetherill, J. M., Woodward and Worrell—44.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. NILES. Mr. President : I ask leave of absence for a few days for Mr. Beebe, of Venango.

Leave was granted.

Mr. DARLINGTON asked and obtained leave of absence for to-day for Mr. Dallas, of Philadelphia, on account of sickness.

Mr. DUNNING asked and obtained leave of absence for a few days from to-day for Mr. G. W. Palmer, of Luzerne.

Mr. H. W. PALMER asked and obtained leave of absence for a few days from to-day for Mr. Mott, of Luzerne.

SKELETON MAPS OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. President : I offer the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to procure from the State Printer, for the use of the members of the Convention, five hundred skeleton maps of the State, with the population and taxable inhabitants of each county throughout the State.

On the question of proceeding to the second reading, a division was called, which resulted : Forty in the affirmative and fifteen in the negative. So the resolution was read a second time.

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. President : I move to amend, by striking out "five hundred," and inserting "one hundred and forty."

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. President : I would simply remark that the expense of these skeleton maps is very trifling, not more than from ten to fifteen cents each. They give outlines of the counties, and in our work on the Legislature, in reference to the grouping of the counties, they will be of great advantage to us. They will also be of advantage upon the question of grouping the judicial districts. The expense is so extremely trifling, and the convenience so great, that the resolution ought to be passed.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. President : I move to amend the amendment, by making the number two hundred, instead of one hundred and forty.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Schuylkill (Mr. Ellis) that he strike out the number in the resolution, and let the blank be filled.

Mr. ELLIS. I will accept the suggestion of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT. The numbers of five hundred, one hundred and forty, and two hundred, have been named. Does any gentleman suggest another number?

Mr. LAMBERTON. Three hundred.

The PRESIDENT. The question will first be taken upon the largest number.

The question being taken, shall the blank be filled with five hundred, it was agreed to.

The question being then taken upon the adoption of the resolution, it was agreed to.

PAY OF CLERKS AND OFFICERS.

Mr. HAY, from the Committee on Accounts and Expenditures, in obedience to a resolution of the Convention, adopted on the 25th of February, presented from said committee a resolution directing warrants to be drawn in favor of the clerks and officers of the Convention, for the payment of thirty per cent. of their salary, which was twice read and agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The next business before the Convention is the second reading of the report of the Committee on Suffrage, reported from the committee of the whole yesterday. The Clerk will read the first section.

The CLERK read :

SECTION 1. Every person possessing the following qualifications shall be an elector, and be entitled to vote at all elections, viz:

1. A male person twenty-one years of age.
2. He shall have been a citizen of the United States at least one month.
3. He shall have resided in the State one year, or if he had previously been a qualified elector of the State, removed therefrom and returned, six months immediately preceding the election.
4. He shall have resided in the election district where he offers to vote two months immediately preceding the election.
5. If twenty-two years of age, or upwards, he shall have paid, within two years, a State or county tax, which had been assessed at least two months, and paid at least one month, before the election.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. President: I move that the further consideration of that article be postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. Hopkins in the chair, for the purpose of further considering the article reported by the Committee on the Legislature.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Worrell) to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) to strike out "no city shall be entitled to more than six Senators."

The Chair desires to make a suggestion to the committee. Under a rule recently adopted by the Convention, members are limited to ten minutes, unless, upon leave granted, they may speak longer. If that leave be granted, then there is no limit, and the delegate may speak for two hours if he thinks proper. The Chair would therefore suggest to the members—and they may adopt it or not as they choose—that in moving that the time be extended for the delegate, that the mover designate the time, say five, ten or twenty minutes, as he may deem proper.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: The amendment offered to the twentieth section yesterday, by the gentleman from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) was, as justly observed by my colleague, (Mr. Biddle,) a wrong aimed directly at Philadelphia. Philadelphia, with a population of nearly seven hundred thousand, represented by a taxation, an amount of property, and individual assessments, second to no other city in the Union, has but four Senators. As all such representations of the people are based upon population, Philadelphia is justly entitled to the highest number such population gives. Apart from the effect that this amendment would have upon our political status, would it not tend to affect our great commercial and mechanical interests? A proper and just representation, based upon population, is all that our city or county should ask, and it is that which our State Constitution grants, and the time has now arrived for us to secure all our political, commercial and mechanical rights by just and proper representation.

I agreed with my colleague (Mr. Jno. Price Wetherill) when he said that the proposal of the gentleman was the most unjust he had ever heard. It was shown that Chester would have two Senators and eleven Representatives, while Philadelphia would be restricted to four, and Allegheny county, composed of two hundred thousand or more, would have six Senators. Now if the Convention should agree to limit the number of Senators to four or six, for cities and counties, it would establish a precedent which would lead to the ultimate injury of all our large cities, and to ours more particularly, as we have at stake a representation more than any other city in the State of Pennsylvania. On mere politics I, for one, oppose all attempts to degrade our city by making it, even in a political point of view, seem a—village.

At the outset of this Convention, Mr. Chairman, it was proposed to do away with special legislation. Gentlemen that represented the western districts, especially Pittsburg, begged and pleaded with us not to separate Pittsburg from Pennsylvania or Philadelphia, but to stand shoulder to shoulder, although some of their representatives have accused Philadelphians of being ready to sell out for a certain political consideration, which I, for one, deny. I have never heard that any of our representatives were even suspected of having tendencies in that direction.

This position is well taken if it is proposed to separate the city from the State. We have no idea of seceding. We have proved it to all the country that we are not in favor of secession; we want to be placed on the same footing as any other city in the State, and I trust the amendment offered by the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) will not prevail. All that we want is equality and our rights. It is in your hands to give them to us. We intend to stand by every large city in the State, Pittsburg, Williamsport, Lancaster, Scranton, and others. Now, let us all come in alike, and I am sure there will be no complaint by citizens of Philadelphia or citizens of Pennsylvania.

MR. HEVERIN. Mr. Chairman: I desire to add my endorsement to what has already been said in advocacy of the claims of Philadelphia to a representation based upon proportional population. While no member of the committee pretends to dispute the justice of our demands, under an abstract consideration of the question, as it relates to the fundamental principles of our government, yet surprising arguments have been adduced in favor of restricting, by constitutional provisions, our agency in the legislative department of the State. The distinguished gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) yesterday, under his rural predilections, attempted to vindicate his position by referring to the primitive condition of our State. He certainly is insensible to social and governmental progress, when he seeks to remind us of the primeval relations of our ancestors as a criterion for our conduct. When he refers to the "dutch farmers," who acquired their titles under the patents of Penn, he certainly forgets that nearly two hundred years have passed and gone since Charles II ceded the territory of Pennsylvania.

We are not here to represent the condition and the interests of the German husbandmen of 1681. We are not here to make organic law for the people of two centuries ago, but for the people of the present, and, probably, of fifty years to come. If we are to retrograde, if we are to go back to the condition of the aborigines, then such arguments possess, probably, some plausibility; but if the products of our labors here are to be consistent with and appropriate to the natural course of events and the progress of civilization, then we want no reference to these antiquated and moss-grown theories of the by-gone. If we are to respect the wants of the agricultural emigrants under Penn, then we should have some regard to the claims of the Swedes and the Finns who settled here in 1627; if we are to preserve the crude institutions of the German agriculturalists of the seventeenth century, let us also perpetuate the tastes, habits and customs imported by the Swedes; if we are to adhere to the errors of the past, then let us continue the government of the Vasas of Sweden. Let us form a Constitution in conformity with the reign of Sigismund and the rule of Adolphus. Let us be faithful to barbarism and consistent in our actions; but, Mr. Chairman, I imagine no member of this Convention, who was born a little later than the eminent gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Woodward,) and who has realized that the world moves, will be influenced by such frequent animadversions to the examples of a condemned antiquity. The gentleman says further that the city is simply a consumer; that she produces nothing. I have not yet heard of any theory in republican or democratic government which elevates the agricultural above the manufacturing interests. I know of no principle in our government which invests the humble husbandman with rights and prerogatives paramount to those which attach to the manufacturer; and I would like the learned gentleman to inform me what would become of the producers if there were no consumers, and whether this dependency is not mutual. Such arguments are unworthy of the ability and experience of the gentleman who utters them. But even admitting that the city is dependent upon the country, then, Mr. Chairman, I find in this the strongest argument in favor of municipal representation. The dependent is always loyal to his benefactor, the beneficiary is always faithful to the source of favor and sustenance, and if the city is entirely dependent upon the country, as asserted by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Woodward,) then its representatives have always an incentive and inducement to be true to the rural sections, which claim Providence as their architect, and they will never imperil the interests of the country by indulging in selfish and injudicious legislation. The dependency will conduce to identical ambitions, and will tend to promote their common welfare. Common interests induce sympathy of purpose and concert of action; therefore we see that the reasons urged to justify this unjust affliction upon Philadelphia are the best advocates in favor of unrestricted, urban representation.

Again, the gentleman argues upon the false and exploded theory that a legislator is bound by the will of the people of the particular locality which he represents, that he is exclusively the representative of a particular section—a mere mechanical exponent of the will of those whose votes confer the office. Why, Burke said long ago—and it has been since recognized as a cardinal truth—that “government is not a matter of will, but a matter of judgment and reason.” The Legislature is not an “assembly of ambassadors from different and hostile interests, which interests each must maintain, as an agent and an advocate, against other agents and advocates, but a deliberative body, with one interest, that of the whole—where not local purposes, not local interests ought to guide—but the general good resulting from the general reason of the whole.” And much more will this principal prevail if there exists this dependency which the gentleman referred to, for then, in such case, are all legislators particularly bound to respect the will of the entire State, by ties higher than those which bind them to their constituents, and they will support measures for the benefit of the whole State, even at the risk of prejudicing the immediate local interests of those who send them. Now so much for the arguments of the gentleman who came open yesterday like a suddenly aroused Rip Van Winkle, oblivious to the events of a half century.

But we are told that cities are ulcers and gangrene upon the body politic, therefore they must be deprived of this right of equal representation; that, because a man accidentally happens to be an inhabitant of a city, he should, therefore, have an unequal voice in the Legislature of the State.

I have been a silent listener to attacks upon the city of Philadelphia, and, whilst

I admit the truth of much that has been said, I must say that some of the information that I have received here from country members has induced me to consult the latest geographical authorities, in order to insure a correct knowledge of my own residency. And when I heard one gentleman proclaim, with sweeping emphasis, that the probable fate and deserved destiny of all those who enjoy the emoluments of office in the city of Philadelphia, another gentleman (Mr. Woodward) assert that we were all drones, I was almost inclined to ask a letter of introduction to my own constituents.

If the interests of the city are not identical with those of the country—if we are to declare war between the city and country—then the arguments which have been adduced on the other side might, with some degree of propriety, have weight here. But, sir, I am not only opposed to limiting our Senatorial representation here, by constitutional provisions, but I am in favor of increasing the membership of the whole General Assembly. I believe that, as in union there is strength, so in the multitude integrity and honesty always have an abiding place. The circumscribed pool is easily roiled, but it is a potent agency that disturbs the crystal purity of the deeper and broader waters. He who was surrounded by the good influences of eleven others could command thirty pieces of silver, while the solitary dealer in birth-rights brought but a mess of pottage to his coffers.

But, say the opponents of this measure, it offends the traditional significance of our institutions. Well, practice has established more general errors than general truths. Make age the badge of institutional virtues, and despotism is, by many thousand degrees, on the scale of antiquity, better than representative government. The laws of Draco are older than those of Solon, and idolatry antedates christianity.

But, if we are to regard the lessons of history, let us consider now what it teaches. The Amphictyonic Council was an improvement upon the Triumvirate. The former exerted a beneficial and civilizing influence, and knit together the twelve distracted tribes of Greece, in a bond of common interest and piety; while the latter, with its trio of rulers, bequeathed no cherished institutions or beneficent influences. The paucity of its members presented opportunities for successful corrupting approaches; and war, lawlessness and ruin befel the government that enjoyed wealth and power when its management was confided to the patres et conscripti that formed the "Council of the Elders."

Again, the Roman Senate, with its three hundred members, exhibited its virtues in a protracted and meritorious existence; while the Decemviri lived but two short years. The Senate, with its numerical greatness, evinced a virtue and integrity which made it the superior of the ten law-makers who went out with the impious Claudius.

And now, Mr. Chairman, if we are to effect and perpetuate the grand objects of free government, and of our own official existence—honorable motives in the exercise of the elective franchise, honor and integrity in those who occupy the high seats of authority, and virtue and purity in the administration of all the departments of government—we must let sovereignty find expression through the many.

Mr. ALRICKS. Mr. Chairman: I have but a few remarks to make on this subject. A good deal may be said upon a subject of this nature, but gentlemen should not permit their zeal to outrun their discretion. We must not forget that the question actually before this committee—which is, how many Senators is it proper a city or county within this Commonwealth should be entitled to? That is the question. Philadelphia is not alone concerned. Every growing county in the Commonwealth, Luzerne, Allegheny, and every other county in the Commonwealth, are concerned. There is no war between the city and the county. We are not acting on a question of first impression. The case comes before us after it has received the judgment of a past generation. I may say that for generations our organic law has stood as it stands now. In 1838 the Convention thought proper to say that no city or county should have more than four Senators. Philadelphia might have had eight if she had not thought proper to extend her municipal territory, so as to embrace the whole county. She supposed that it was to her interest that she should have but four Senators, inasmuch as she consolidated the county, by embracing it within the limits of the city. That gave her but four Senators. Now the question we have to pass upon is, whether she is entitled to any more or not. I must confess I am in favor of the bill as it has been reported by the committee. I apprehend that when we come to look at the matter, we will find that it is right; and unless we increase the number of Senators in other parts of the State, we should not increase the number in Philadelphia. Why, sir, we have been brought here for the purpose of reforming abuses. The complaint was that there was corruption at the ballot-box. We have been brought here to reform that. The allegation was that our Legislature was not pure. We have been brought here for the purpose, if possible, to take care that the Legislature should not be corrupted. The allegation was that certain officers were receiving immense fees. Those have been the evils. We are told that corporations have an overwhelming influence. These matters brought this Convention together—that they may be reformed. But, Mr. Chairman, what section of the State has ever raised a voice against the number of representatives that a county or city has had in the State Senate? In 1850 the Constitution was amended, and nothing was said about this then. In 1857 the Constitution was again amended, and this very article, in relation to the city of Philadelphia, was passed upon by the people, but there was no objection to its having but four Senators. In 1864, and in 1872, we again passed amendments to our Constitution, and this question never was mooted in all these amendments.

I apprehend, then, that the city of Philadelphia, and all other cities and counties in this Commonwealth, ought to be limited to a certain number of representatives in the Senate. You well know, Mr. Chairman, that our Senate is constructed upon the same principle upon which the United States Senate is constructed. It is constructed for the purpose of being a check upon the other power—upon the popular branch of the government—if choose you to put it so.

It is said that during the war of 1812, the State of Delaware did not pay as much direct taxes into the United States Treasury as a single township in the county of Lancaster; and yet the State of Delaware, during all that time and up to this day, had and has her two United States Senators, equal with New York and Pennsylvania, and that great State at that day, old Virginia.

Well, now, is it not consistent that we should remember that in the construction of our government we intended to limit the number of Senators in any city or county? The gentleman from Centre, (Mr. M'Allister,) however, has informed the Convention that he is in favor of representation according to population. Why, sir, that is not the principle upon which the Senate of Pennsylvania has been constructed. The great theory of our government would be completely overturned if the Convention adopted the gentleman's crude notions upon this subject. It was never intended that taxation, population, nor territory should alone be taken into consideration in the construction of the Senate of the State; but the apportionment was made so that a limit should be placed upon the number of representatives that were sent from any particular city or any particular county to the Senate of Pennsylvania.

The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Knight) says that in 1838 Philadelphia had a population of only about two hundred and fifty thousand, but the gentlemen of this Convention well know that the members of the Convention of 1838 understood as well as we do that the city of Philadelphia in 1873 would have a population treble what it was in 1838, and when that Convention formed the organic law of the State in that year, they intended it for all future time and not merely for ten, twenty or thirty years. When that Convention incorporated this limitation in the Constitution, they designed that it should remain there, not only for half a century or a century, but they intended, even when the city of Philadelphia had a population of a million and a half of inhabitants, that she should not have more than four Senators in the Senate of Pennsylvania, and therefore the arguments of gentlemen in this Convention against this limitation, do not weigh a feather in the consideration of this question.

The gentleman from Philadelphia, Mr. Chief Justice Read, in his letter, intimates that the city of Philadelphia pays about one-fifth of the entire amount of taxes collected in the State of Pennsylvania. I reply to this assertion of the gentleman, that if Philadelphia does pay one-fifth or one-fourth of the taxes, she gets nearly one-fourth of the money after it reaches the treasury of the State. It is no more than justice that the city of Philadelphia should be compelled to pay a large amount of taxes, because the debt of the State was almost entirely incurred for the benefit of this city, and in making her what she is—the metropolis of Pennsylvania. Look at the great arteries of commerce, the railroads and the canals, which have cost forty millions ($40,000,000) of dollars, leading from this great city, and then contemplate what Philadelphia would be without them. Look at the manufacturing establishments which have been built up by these great commercial facilities, and then can any one doubt that Philadelphia should bear a portion of the burden which has been created in placing her where she is—among the first cities of the nation, and made her the metropolis of this Commonwealth?

She, perhaps, ranks among the greatest manufacturing cities of the world, and the rest of the State are proud of her commercial and manufacturing achievements. We are proud that she forms a centre around which the arts, sciences and literature cluster, and are advanced. We are proud of her immense and industrious population, for we acknowledge she is an honor to the State; but we are compelled to say to our sister city that she must remember when the Constitution of the State was formed it was thought wise and prudent that a provision should be inserted in the Constitution, so that no city or county should have more than four Senators in the Senate of Pennsylvania. The Scriptures tells us that Aaron's rod became a serpent, and when the sorcerers threw down their rods Aaron's rod devoured them all. I do not believe that Philadelphia will gobble up the rest of the State, but we believe that there is wisdom in this provision of our Constitution, and therefore I am disposed, for one, to adhere to it. I believe this provision should be retained in the Constitution, for while it will do no injustice to Philadelphia, it will, at the same time, be only just to the other sections of our large State.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: When the proposition was first made to give to the city of Philadelphia a representation in the Senate of the State, less than what is accorded to other portions of the State in proportion to her population, I did not think it would have the support of a single member of this Convention—unless it were the mover of the amendment himself. I was not convinced that it was going to have very much support, until I heard the very plausible speech of my excellent friend and brother, who sits on my right, (Mr. Woodward.) Then I thought it would not go very far until I learned in conversation that divers gentleman—one who has just spoken, (Mr. Alricks,) and one of whom I expected better things, who has not yet spoken—had received a very strong impression from the speech made by the gentleman from Walnut street (Mr. Woodward;) and it seems to me that we have reached the time in the latter days when teachers would come about who would be able “to deceive the very elect.” Now the theory of this government of ours is: “That it is a government of the people, for the people, and by the people; and that in every department, especially every department that has anything to do with the great functions of making our laws, the whole people are to be represented, and all the interests that belong to every part of the State are to be supported by all those who are engaged in it. It is proposed, in effect, to say that the city of Philadelphia shall have in the future about one-half as many members in the Senate in proportion to her population as the same population, residing anywhere else than in Philadelphia, would have and be entitled to. Now if a proposition of this kind were to be made by one of the other counties of the State to a third county—that is to say, suppose a war of roses should occur between the two counties of Lancaster and York, and one of those counties should deliberately propose to this Convention, or any Convention representing the people, that the other county should only have half of the representation in proportion to her population that she claims for herself, such a proposition would not be listened to for moment by any just or fair-minded man. The gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) referred yesterday to the iniquitous apportionment, by law, which gave to the county of Luzerne only four Representatives in the lower House, while she was entitled to five, according to the ratio of representation, and he said what everybody admits to be true, that this thing had stamped upon its face, all over, the marks of wrong and injustice.

If the city of Philadelphia had the power to determine in what proportion the representation should be in the Senate, and she were to propose to us in the country that she would give us one-half of the representation which she claims for herself in proportion to the population, what would we say about it? Why we would thunder it into the ears of the world as the grossest and most outrageous wrong that could be perpetrated. Now why should we not do unto Philadelphia what we would Philadelphia should do unto us if the cases were reversed; and here comes the curious part of my friend's argument. He gives certain facts which he calls reason for this. One of them is that the city of Philadelphia is vicious; they are wicked people that live here, and it may be, for aught I know, that it is filled with publicans and sinners. Very certain they are no better than they ought to be, and when the gentleman compliments the tillers of the soil, of whom I am one, and tells us that they are much better and more righteous than those who inhabit the city, I am willing to own the soft impeachment. Still I think it partakes a little too much of the spirit of the Pharisees, for those from the country to say to the inhabitant of the city: “Stand aside, I am holier than thou.”

I would punish every body who commits crime against society, but I must object to a punishment of this kind. I do not think you can ever safely or fairly administer purity of justice by way of making a bad government for the people that are guilty of it. This provision injects into the Constitution a bill of pains and penalties upon the city of Philadelphia for its peculiar wickedness that some people suppose exists in this city. Now we have a provision in the Constitution of the State that no bill of attainder shall be passed, and I hope we shall keep it there. The amendment which is proposed I consider altogether wrong, and besides, if you disfranchise the city of Philadelphia to such an extent you will not only let the punishment fall upon the heads of those whom you believe to be wicked people, but upon those who are known to be as good as we are. It does not only deprive a certain portion of the people of the right to vote for Senators, but it deprives every man in the city of half of his vote. You take away from him half the weight and power that his vote is entitled to after he had given it.

There is no mode of dealing with wicked people, except to take each one and punish him for his personal guilt, after he has been legally convicted, up to that time. I think, as a public body, my friend, with all his indignation at everything that is not good, which is perfectly natural to him and very proper, he ought to be willing to consider the unconvicted as standing upon a perfect level, in the eye of the law, with himself, and that is as high a level as anybody can get to; but they are entitled to it.

Now, then, there is another objection to allowing Philadelphia what I consider a fair chance, which is that they are a set of idlers and drones, and do not work; there is nobody in this whole city that is engaged in productive industry. I answer that by simply saying that the fact is not so. I do believe, on my conscience, from all the observation I have been able to make, and from the results of all the inquiry that I have instituted into this subject, that this is one of the most industrious communities on the face of the earth. When the gentleman said that they do not work, why somebody has been victimizing him. Somebody has taken the advantage of his youth and inexperience and imposed upon him most grossly. [Great laughter.]

MR. WOODWARD. MR. CHAIRMAN: I am very sorry to interrupt the fervor of the gentleman's imagination, but I observe he is drawing upon his imagination for his facts; but when he alleges, in the face of this body, that I alleged that the people of Philadelphia do not work, he either has no ears or his imagination has got the better of his judgment. I alleged no such thing, sir. What I alleged was that the original source of wealth was in the agricultural productions of the country, and that there was seven hundred thousand people of Philadelphia who could not produce a loaf of bread to save their souls. That is what I said. I did not say they did not manufacture all sorts of useful things.

THE CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from York has expired.

MR. CHAS. A. BLACK. MR. CHAIRMAN: I move his time be extended twenty minutes.

The motion was unanimously agreed to, and Mr. Black resumed.

MR. J. S. BLACK. MR. CHAIRMAN: I have nothing further to say since my friend takes it back.

MR. WOODWARD. I do not take back anything.

MR. J. S. BLACK. The people of Philadelphia are not idle people. They are industrious people. Will the gentleman tell me or anybody else that a man who is engaged in manufacture, in trade, or in commerce is not engaged in as meritorious a business as the man who makes a loaf of bread? Every man that earns his bread is entitled to it, one just as well as another. So I think the gentleman has been imposed upon; perhaps not by anybody that took advantage of him, but his own imagination, as he would call it, has imposed upon him when he supposes that people who work at one business were less entitled to protection, supposing their labor to be honest, and proper and lawful, than any other; so that at last the error is just as bad as I supposed it to be. However there is just one reason that I have heard suggested from him. He seems to think that between the city of Philadelphia and the people in the country there is some kind, or is to be some kind, of conflict of interest. Now that may be true for anything I know. They may have interests that, at some time or another, will come in conflict with our interests in the country. But for that very reason, when the conflict comes, they ought to have fair play, and we ought not to deprive them of one atom of the natural power they have to protect their interests. Whether the fight be between us and them, when it does come, let it be decided according to the old rules of wager in battle, where we will go out into the open lists, and make a fair division of sun and wind and fight on level green.

I might illustrate, perhaps, now, what I think would be a fair principle, by mentioning an occurrence that is said to have taken place at one time, a great while ago, on the coast of New Jersey. The navigation there was somewhat dangerous, and a good many wrecks were cast ashore, and which the people were in the habit of plundering. A clergyman preached against that particular sin from the text, "Thou shalt not steal," and he was in the very fervor of the most eloquent part of his sermon when somebody cried out, "there is a wreck on the coast." Every individual in the congregation rose up and rushed toward the door. The clergyman begged them to stop only for a minute while he would say but four words to them. He succeeded in getting them to stop, and in the meantime he was getting to the door and had his coat buttoned, and when they waited in expectation of hearing these four words, these were the words he said: "Let's all start fair." [Laughter.]

Now I think that would not be a bad rule to apply to this case. If we are going to have any future conflict, or if there is to be a race for our rights and our privileges, or any other advantages, let us start fair. For my part, I feel much more anxious to give to the city of Philadelphia fair play, than, perhaps, I would if I was exclusively a representative from the country. His Honor (Mr. Woodward) says that he is a delegate at large, though he lives in the country. That is exactly my case. I am a delegate at large, though I live in the country; and perhaps a larger number of the votes that he and I both got were received from the city of Philadelphia than from any other one portion of the State. I think, therefore, that we are both bound to do what we can to save Philadelphia from what I would consider most unjust and unequal distribution of the power of this government.

MR. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman: I was a good deal struck yesterday, surprised I may say, to hear my friend from Chester (Mr. Darlington) state that there was a clause in the Constitution of 1790 similar in its effect to this which is now pending before the committee. I wish to vindicate that Constitution of 1790 from such an imputation. That Constitution, sir, is one to which, substantially, we shall some day have to go back. Our people were forced in that year, as we know by tradition, to tear themselves out of the anarchy which had succeeded the Constitution of 1776, in which everything was elective, as it is now. That Constitution was formed upon the sound political principles of republican representative government the first of which, and that which lies at the foundation of all of them, is, that the political power is to begin in communities, and then from that to grow into the general government of the State. It is an axiom in our political learning that where the local jurisdictions have been preserved most carefully, and most effectively, there have the principles of republican government thriven.

Now, sir, the Senatorial representation provided by that Constitution of 1790 was, first, that the Senators should consist of the city of Philadelphia, and the different counties in proportion to their respective taxable inhabitants. That was the basis. Then they provided that the Legislature, as soon as there might be a county that was not entitled to one Senator, or another county of different size, that the Legislature might form Senatorial districts from adjoining counties, provided that in forming these districts they should not form one with more than four Senators. Then they went on, inasmuch as it might happen that the Legislature would divide these communities, and thus destroy the community representation, and prohibited them from dividing the city of Philadelphia, or any other county, in making Senatorial districts. The result was, that if there had been at that time a city or any county in the State whose taxable population entitled them to more than four Senators they would have been entitled. This was the universal understanding. This rests upon the principle of representation in proportion to the number of taxable inhabitants, which is, or ought to be, familiar to all of us, although I am afraid some of us are, perhaps, losing sight of it a little. This was the universal understanding of the meaning of that clause in the Constitution of 1790, and therefore it was that in 1838, for causes or reasons which it is not necessary to go back to, and which I never could half understand, in regard to a great many of the members of that Convention, except that they were carried away with the rush of a particular party as it existed then, founded on one idea, and rushing with that in their teeth anywhere where their leaders drew them, put this iron clog on Philadelphia. It is not necessary to go back to that, sir, but it was necessary, in order to reach the present limitation, that there should be a distinct and positive proposition to that Convention, and no man, then or since, has ever signified that the Constitution of 1790 was, in any manner, responsible for that clause.

Perhaps I may make that a little clearer. The principle on which the revolution began was, that there should be no taxation without representation. Carrying out this principle the Constitution of 1790 apportioned the representatives according to the number of taxable inhabitants. This provision is to be found in article one, section four. The sixth section of the same article provides that the number of Senators shall be apportioned among districts "formed as hereinafter described, according to the number of taxable inhabitants in each." The seventh section provides that the Senators shall be chosen in districts to be formed by the Legislature, "each district containing such a number of taxable inhabitants as shall be entitled to elect not more than four Senators." The same section provides that neither this city or any county shall be divided in forming a district. If, therefore, any city or any county should have more than, or as many taxable inhabitants as would entitle it to four Senators, the Legislature could not interfere with it, either by adding to it or by dividing it. The consequence is that such city or county would form a separate district and be entitled to the number of its taxable inhabitants, under sections four, five and six. This was the construction which was always taken for granted under the Constitution of 1790, though the case for acting on it had never arisen. But the debates in the Convention of 1837-8 will show, it is believed, that it was never doubted. I do not remember to have ever heard it doubted till yesterday.

I have said this much in vindication of that Constitution, because I will say here that, speaking from tradition, from history, and in part from experience, that during the time when that Constitution was in full force, say from 1790 down to about the year 1835, there never was on the face of the globe a better government, on the whole, than that of Pennsylvania. To be sure, we had none of this election of monied officers. The people did not undertake to act as the Executive. We had responsibility. We had a Governor who dared not appoint a bad man to an office, and who never did; and we had a Governor who, if he made a mistake, and had appointed one, would have been compelled at once to remove him by the representations of his fellow-citizens. Now we have forgotten all responsibility. We elect officers. Who is responsible for them? Nobody. Who are they responsible to? Nobody. In that way our elections have mainly become tainted.

This, by the by. I now propose to say a word or two on the proposed amendment, the part of that offered by the gentleman from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) which is now proposed to be stricken out, and I shall say what I have to say on this subject in a very few words, and without the slightest irritation myself or the least desire to irritate anybody else.

I am sorry the city of Philadelphia has been introduced here by name. I look upon this as a general provision, that no city or county having more taxable inhabitants than would entitle her to four Senators shall have her senatorial representation, but that it shall be taken away from her.

Upon what reason is that attempted to be founded? I have heard only one reason given for it; and I do not consider that a reason at all. I have heard, on a former occasion, a great deal of hard language offered to the inhabitants generally of large cities. I am happy to have heard nothing of that kind on the present occasion except what perhaps has been drawn upon us by some of our own members. The reason given was that large communities—still having the idea of communities—might swell up and obtain more weight and influence than they ought to have in reference to the body of the people of the State. Now, sir, apart from the fact that that seems to rest upon no reason that is consistent with the principles of the Constitution and of the government, which are, that communities shall have exactly that weight in the government of the State which their ratio of taxable population entitles them to. Apart, I say, from that, what is the altered state of the question in regard to the city of Philadelphia? Is that a "community" for the purpose of representation? No, sir; you have destroyed it. In neither House of the General Assembly has the city of Philadelphia a representation at all. Other counties are there in a body. Every man in Lancaster county knows who his representatives are. They go as the representatives of the county. They speak for the body of the community to which they belong. They are a body of men who are responsible to their constituents. What have you done here? We ask to go to the House of Representatives. You do not pretend to deny us that. "No," you say, "we do not deny it to you, but you shall not go as a community; we cut you up as little election districts," numbered, I believe, from one to eighteen. Who do the members of these districts represent? The city of Philadelphia? By no means. They represent, in fact, nobody but the little knot of ward politicians to whom they look for protection, and from whom they receive it. We were a community before the wise men of 1854 resorted to the philosophical experiment which, for myself, I wish had been first tried upon some other subject—for instance, of suspecting a number of eggs to be not exactly in a true state, and conceiving that they could run them together into one large shell and produce a monstrous fowl that would astonish the world. [Laughter.] When they tried that experiment, sir, what did they do? Why they forgot that they were taking away our Senatorial representation.

Gentlemen have said that this provision in the Constitution of 1838 has stood unchallenged. Why? Simply because it was never anything but a proposition in the future. It never had a practical application. The city of Philadelphia never had more than two Senators; the county of Philadelphia never had more than three; and when the consolidation came this number was reduced to four. This consolidation was done by act of the Legislature. You put it upon us, in fact, though, I am sorry to say, probably with the assent of most of our citizens. What did that do? It consolidated two communities, each of which, at that time, was entitled to four Senators, into one community; and that is entitled to but four. We have lost half our right, not by any intentional act upon the part of the Legislature, or anybody else, but simply by the fact that this consequence was overlooked when that act of consolidation was passed.

Now, sir, what have we? We have no community representation. Gentlemen complain that bad bills are passed at Harrisburg. I have no doubt they are. They complain they are passed by bad men. I do not know whether they are or not. But this I do know: That if there be a fault there, let not the gentlemen of the interior of the State attempt to throw it upon us. Why have we not our old representation there, of the city on one hand, and of the county on the other, which could be held responsible, and which were responsible, and which held to the resolution, at that time, that no man was ever taken up, on either ticket, who was not a man of good private character, and known to be such? Who has taken that away from us? Your Legislature. They have destroyed us. They have destroyed our community system; and then, when our members go there, representing nobody but a little district of inhabitants, half of whom do not know who their representatives are, and a little knot of ward politicians, to whom they can go for support in everything they do, they bring in bad bills. Who corrects them? Where is the large body of members of the interior who should stop that, and who should crush such bills, and take their proper part in the legislation of the Commonwealth?

Why, sir, they have established a rule of etiquette at Harrisburg, which is utterly inflexible, that if members desire a bill to pass that refers to their own localities or districts, all the members from the other districts keep "hands off" and vote for it, right or wrong. Blame us! Blame yourselves. Help us to do justice. What can be done? Give us back our representation on such a scale that we shall have some thing like a community representation. Take the old city, which was to have six members; take the rest of the county, which had eight; give them that representation back again, and you will get a body of men who will soon set things right, if it has not got too far to be set right. You will then have a body to be represented that is of some importance, and who will expect to be represented as such; and you will have a body of Representatives who must either do their duty or fall under the censure of a responsible body like the inhabitants of the old city.

Instead of doing this, however, gentlemen seem inclined to cast all sorts of reflections upon us, and at the same time appear to think there is none to be cast upon themselves. A fault of omission, where it leads to such consequences, is as great as a fault of commission. I have been sorry to hear these discussions. I do not think they lead to any good result. We have been told that our elections are all badly and dishonestly held. Whose fault is that? Is that the fault of the city and county of Philadelphia? Did they vote for this amendment of 1838, out of which that has arisen? No; they did not. Did the people of the Commonwealth ever vote for it? No. There was a nominal majority for it of, I think, under three hundred. There are many counties in the upper part of the State where no tickets against the Constitution were printed; and upon a fair and full vote it would not have been adopted. We never voted for it. Yet what has it done? You have, by its means, compelled the people here to take into their hands Executive power. You compel them to appoint these monied officers. Of course they come into the nominating conventions. While these offices have grown to the importance which they have at present attained, their incumbents being responsible to nobody, and nobody being responsible for them, the amounts they receive as compensation for their duties are "fabulous." Certainly if you were to designate the sum you would use that phrase, and I hope it would be properly used. Why your legislators, your representatives—that class of public servitors, for they are not "officers" at all, though I find we have got to calling them such—are lost sight of in this contest for offices of one hundred, or more, thousand dollars a year, the holders of which can afford to spend almost unlimited sums, if they choose to do it. I do not know that they do; I hope they do not—in manipulating nominating conventions, and securing their own re-election, or the election of their immediate friends and dependents.

You put them upon us; and then you follow that up by taking away our community rights, by denying us the right of having a set of representatives representing the whole community, by splitting us up into these little districts so easily manipulated. Then, some gentlemen seem to put all the blame upon us.

I will say this, that I believe the true basis is that which the Constitution of 1790 adopted. It has always been so regarded. It is an instinct of our race, and wherever that has been allowed to be followed it has led to good results; wherever it has been abandoned the consequences have been evil.

I believe the inhabitants of a large city, say of this city, are as much entitled, from their intelligence, from their industry, from their honesty and integrity, to be heard at the ballot-box as the inhabitants of any other part of the State, for these corruptions, great as they may seem, have not spread to the body of our people. As one professing to know, perhaps, something about this matter, I beg leave, sir, to say that there is not on the face of the earth, so far as I have been able to find, a working population approaching in purity and integrity of character the working population of Philadelphia; and I say this boldly.

What are we? The dangerous classes, as they are called, are reduced to a minimum, and why? Because our early system of ground-rents, a system which the "wise men" of modern times are breaking up, encouraged every workman to take up his lot of ground with the assurance that he would get the benefit of the profits that the ground would bring; and he knew that if he could build a small house upon it, his family would be provided for. The consequence is, that you have miles and miles of small houses, as comfortable and convenient as the largest, each inhabited by the separate family of a working man. That man, instead of being driven from his home of an evening to the saloon or the gaming table, as he would be likely to be if he lived in the uncomfortable, uninhabitable and miserable tenement house of other cities, goes promptly home when his day's work is done, to spend the evening in comfort with his wife and children.

I have seen these things, sir, all my life, and I cannot refrain, when I hear the population of Philadelphia spoken of as unproductive, from testifying to what I know and have seen of them. No man has ever seen a mob in Philadelphia. We have seen what are called mobs, but by "mob" I mean a body of men let loose from all the obligations of society, such as the mob known to London and New York, which, whatever may be the pretext for its assemblage, begins immediately to be a thieves' mob, and proceeds, indiscriminately, to rob and plunder houses and persons, and which takes the strongest exercise of power to subdue. We have had some "insurrections," as they call them, here, and have even had a partial "civil war." We have seen the time when the native Americans and the Catholics were at open war in the lower districts of the city of Philadelphia. It continued, substantially, for some weeks, although nominally quelled. The fights continued at night, in the streets, and yet, during the whole of that period, the citizens who were not actively engaged as factionists on one side or the other, walked the streets among the combatants with just as much safety as they did at noon-day at any other time; and no one was heard of as having been robbed, or molested, or even had his pocket picked. Theft was not known. That will serve to show what I mean when I say you can not get up a mob in Philadelphia. It has never been done. I look upon it as a glory to this city that such is its condition, and that the dangerous classes are brought down to such a small proportion that they dare not show themselves. Especially when the people are out, are these parties, such of them as we have amongst us, careful to go to their hiding places; and if they come out, it is when the streets are not frequented by others.

I have one more remark to make. I do not doubt the intelligence of such a people. I have nothing to say against the inhabitants of other parts of the State. I owe them too much, so much, indeed, that even a feeling of gratitude would prevent it. I respect and honor them all. The German farmers, in particular, have been at times the anchorage of the State by their conservatism. If we have a fault in our population, is it that it is not homogeneous. We have the German and the Scotch-Irish, the New Englanders up in the "Seventeen townships" and in that neighborhood. We have the old English population here in Philadelphia, and in Chester, Delaware and the lower portions of Bucks and Montgomery. They are not strung exactly on the same key; and it has, therefore, sometimes happened that when an excitement is just dying out among one class of the population it would be taken up when too late by another. We have seen the time, for instance, when some excitement which was dying out, say among the Scotch Presbyterians, would be eagerly caught up by the German population just in time to be too late for any good; and so it has sometimes been found among others, the excitement dying out in one place when taken up in another.

In conclusion, sir, let me say that our skilled workmen, our artisans, our mechanics, our thousands of honest laborers, skilled and unskilled, have as much intelligence to vote, and have as much a right to self-government as the population in other parts of the State. They claim no more. They do not set themselves up because they live, forsooth, in daylight, as entitled to govern the thousands who live in the darkness of the mines, under ground, and who are not, perhaps, able to see as clearly as we who are above. They pretend to nothing of that sort. They allow the equality of all who are competent voters, and they desire to have the rights of all secured.

Mr. Chairman, since the only plausible reason that ever was given for this clause has now been doubly removed, first, by the destruction of the principle which was the original foundation on which the clause was based, and, secondly, by the consolidation which has squeezed us here into one-half the number that the provision originally allowed, I trust, and I hope I may be pardoned if I say I expect, that this body will go back to the principles upon which our liberties depend, and declare that the right of representation, whether in the Senate or House, should be by communities, in proportion to the number of their taxable population. Do that, and you restore harmony. What are we laboring under now? We are entitled, under this clause, to four Senators. What Senators? Senators representing the "city and county." Have we got them? No, sir; we have no Senators. We have four Senatorial districts, carved out upon some principle or other. Each elects one Senator. Are other communities on the same footing? No, sir; they are represented as communities. Suppose these Senators in Philadelphia are elected, two of them in districts a majority of whose voters are of one political party, and two in districts a majority of whose voters are of another political party, what representation has this community? None at all. Their votes balance each other. Do not leave us in that position. Do not, on the other hand, grind us down in our right of representation. Put us upon an equality with other citizens; give us a fair chance; treat us as if we were men and citizens, and, because you happen to have a majority of this Convention coming from the interior of the State, do not use your power to screw a particular portion of the State, and deprive its citizens of their rights. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I ask leave, at this time, to address the committee.

Unanimous consent was given.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I have listened to the remarks of our respected President, with deep satisfaction, upon both the main points to which his remarks were directed. One of the main objects that I have desired to see secured by this Convention is the correction of one of the constitutional amendments of 1857, which was drawn by me, and was adopted by the Legislature by an almost unanimous vote. I mean the amendment under which this city is divided into single Senatorial and Representative districts. I think that amendment was a mistake, and that the results of it upon the character of our Legislature have been most disastrous.

Now, sir, when Mr. Eli K. Price came up to Harrisburg, backed by the voice of Philadelphia, and demanded that the city and county should be consolidated into a single municipality, those of us who represented other sections of the State could not refuse the demand. We passed the bill; we gave to this city enlarged boundaries, including within its limits large sections in its neighborhood which were really agricultural in character. But one certain result of that measure we all saw would be, if the Constitution remained unchanged, that control, absolute and constant control, of the political complexion of the Legislature would be assigned to this city. All the members from Philadelphia would be elected upon a general ticket, so that so many as eighteen votes in the House of Representatives would now be constantly polled by one political party. This political difficulty induced that amendment of 1857, requiring the Legislature, in future apportionments, to divide the city into single Representative as well as Senatorial districts. We resorted to this means of relief, or rather of protection against an impending political evil or mischief, because we did not know what else to do, how else to divide the representation of this city, so that it should not have absolute political control over the action of the State government. Our justification for what we did consists in the fact that we were ignorant how else to accomplish our object. But, sir, from the day that amendment was adopted the character of the representation of this city has gone down; gone down in ability, in character, in reputation; and we have, in all parts of the State, suffered the consequences of it.

We now have an opportunity to amend and correct that error, and the direction in which we are to correct it is exactly the one indicated by the President of this Convention. It is at once, without hesitation, to sweep away the whole system of breaking this city up into minute fragments and allowing the politicians, some of them armed with improper influences, in every little community to represent themselves in the government in defiance of the aggregate or general will of the honest and intelligent citizens of Philadelphia. There is, as matters now stand, no opportunity to the great mass of the people here to amend their representation in the Legislature, and, sir, we must give them that opportunity by so organizing electoral power in this city that they can secure it. Before we are done with this legislative article I hope that we will—and the committee of which I am a member will probably report to the Convention a proposition which will raise the question—provide that Representatives and Senators from this city shall be elected from large divisions not more than two or three for electing Senators, and not more, certainly, than five or six for electing Representatives. If you elected these Representatives now in districts with three members each, that, itself, would be a great measure of relief.

I repeat, then, that I was delighted that the President of this Convention, in his own inimitable and forcible manner, struck this subject, and portrayed to the Convention the great and abounding evils which result from the amendment of 1857 and gave to us that moral support, and I trust that general opinion in this Convention which will enable us hereafter to amend the Constitution in this particular.

A word upon the other point spoken of by the President of the Convention and I will close. He pointed out what was the main work of the Convention of 1838. It was to strip the Governor of the patronage and power which he had, before that time, held and exercised. Nearly all the offices of the State were cast into the popular elections. In my opinion that movement, which, to a certain extent, may have been justifiable, was carried to excess. We have loaded down our popular elections by accumulating upon them too great a mass of matter. I believe that we went too far, and, as the President has pointed out, the election of persons to these nominal or lucrative Executive offices is one of the main causes why our elections are now unsatisfactory, why they have to some extent become polluted; and I trust, sir, that we will not act in the direction which some gentlemen desire to go, to make the Secretary of the Commonwealth, the Attorney General and the Superintendent of Common Schools, and all other officers that still remain appointable, elected by the people. I do not even see any reason why the Surveyor General should be elected. The election system of the State then, we may suppose, requires too much to be passed upon by the people. They have been loaded down with matters that are not necessary for disposition at popular elections. I will, however, speak of this, if necessary, hereafter. My main purpose in rising was to give my views in regard to the representation of Philadelphia, and I have spoken upon this subject because the remarks of the President of this Convention re-called our attention to the action of the Legislature in 1857, in which I was a participant. When the pending question in relation to the limitation upon the representation of the city of Philadelphia shall have reached a proper stage in another form in the debate for consideration, I shall endeavor to submit some reasons in justification of what I stated yesterday; that I preferred a different arrangement in such a limitation, if the principle of a limitation is to be retained.

MR. D. W. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman: I have not occupied much of the time of the Convention, and I hope I will be pardoned while I make a few remarks upon this question before the committee. I am decidedly opposed to any measure which shall increase the representation of any city or county. I am in favor of the report of the committee if both the Houses of our Legislature are kept as they are now. I do not think that we are any wiser than our fathers, and the history of the Constitution of 1790 and of 1837-8 are doubtless better understood by many gentlemen on this floor than myself. I had the honor to know a great many of the members of the Convention of 1837-8 personally, and still a larger number by character and reputation, and I say that in my humble judgment there never was any Convention ever assembled in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania that possessed more talent, more virtue, and more political and public experience than that Convention. Notwithstanding that fact, it has been intimated by the honorable President of this Convention that the question now before this committee, when acted upon by that Convention, was decided by a certain party under the influence of political excitement, and through the eloquence of probably one member. Far different from that statement is the fact. The political parties of that Convention were composed of sixty-six whigs and sixty-six democrats, and one so called independent whig, Hon. Walter Forward, from Pittsburg, and claimed to be elected as an independent candidate. There could have been no political partisanship, and no preference as to political views or predilections involved in the decision of this question, but, sir, it was the solemn and deliberate act of that Convention without respect to party.

The Journal of the proceedings attending the disposition of this question will show that the vote of a large majority decided that it was proper, under the circumstances, to limit the city of Philadelphia in her Senatorial apportionment. The arguments that were adduced in favor of that policy are hard to answer, if they have ever been answered. I have never heard them answered in this Convention, and in thus limiting the city of Philadelphia in her Senatorial representation, that Convention acted entirely consistently with the well known logical principle that no cardinal rules exist without exceptions. The exception proves the rule, and I hope this Convention, when the vote shall be cast upon this question, will follow the example of the Convention of 1837-38, and act in accordance with this well established principle, that all rules are proven by the exception, and that the exception to the rule, in this instance, is the limitation in the Senatorial representation of the city of Philadelphia. If there were any necessity for an increase in the representation of Philadelphia at the time the last Convention was held, there is much more necessity for it now, because, in the mind's eye of that Convention, there was but one great and growing community subjected to all the corruption of city life; whereas, there has now sprung up on our western border a city, larger to-day than Philadelphia was on the day that the Convention of 1838 acted and voted upon this question. I have nothing to say against the city of Philadelphia, or the city of Pittsburg either. I glory in the prosperity and the greatness of the city of Philadelphia. I admire its public spirit in every department of humanity. I take pleasure in beholding its educational improvements, and enterprises of all kinds, and we all admit that it has vindicated itself by the regular march of its progress in all the great improvements that have assisted in making it the great city of the State. The city has, therefore, grown and prospered, notwithstanding the limitation upon its representation established by the Constitution of 1838. This is conceded; and even the gentlemen who take the opposite position upon this question must admit that the limitation to its representation, in this particular, has neither conflicted with the material progress of the city, nor thrown any obstacle in the way of its moral, educational and commercial advancement.

The large cities can always take care of themselves. This is clear and conclusive, when we see the number of champions which the city of Philadelphia has upon this floor without respect to political preferences or opinions. Their citizens are not likely to suffer by any provision we may insert in the Constitution. Now, while we must admit the general conclusion that great cities are great sores upon the body politic, we must all admit that Philadelphia is composed of as good, if not a much better, population than any of the other great cities of the country, and yet it is true, that being a city, there is more convenience and opportunity for combination of action, either by itself as a community or by representatives, and by which her power and influence is greatly increased in the legislative body. This fact is shown by the history of the legislation of this Commonwealth. The city of Philadelphia has always obtained, not only what her citizens have demanded, but many measures have been originated by legislation in their behalf, and became laws through city influence, that they never should have had. Again, Mr. Chairman, while the Legislature has enough of its own sins to answer for, I regret that the honorable President of this Convention has placed upon it the additional sin of uniting the old county of Philadelphia with the old municipal government in one grand municipality. He did observe, however, that it was with the consent of a large portion of the inhabitants. Yes, sir; they asked it almost unanimously. Their own representatives asked it. Their own Senators, and their own great men of all parties asked it, and this sin should not be saddled upon the back of the Legislature and the country members of the legislative body blamed for it, as has just been strongly insinuated by the honorable President.

I am familiar with the history of the Legislature about that time, and I know there was no opposition to it. It was done at the request of the people, and Philadelphia, through their own representatives. And, sir, if we admit the principle of a representative system—a representative government—the Legislature of that day would have been faithful, and untrue to its character and its power if it had refused to comply with the request of the people of Philadelphia. Now, Mr. Chairman, in discussing this question, I hope we shall not forget that our fathers, who were wiser than we, thought it proper to incorporate this limitation in the Constitution. Let us not be led off by any feeling or by the allegation that this is a right which properly belongs to the city of Philadelphia, and that there must be no distinction or exception in this general rule of Senatorial representation. A general rule is worth nothing unless it is proved by exceptions, and I say if we do not restrain this representation, seeing the influences that combine in every great city, by reason of the representative and the people being in close contact, and seeing the controlling influence of city legislation—

Mr. DEFRANCE. Mr. Chairman: I move that the gentleman's time, be extended.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. D. W. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman: I thank the committee for the courtesy, but I was simply about adding that while I agree with many things contained in the remarks of the honorable President of this Convention, and of those from the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) this morning, I do not concur in their argument that the Constitutional provision, dividing this city into separate districts, "was a mistake," "was a great mistake," was their language. Because the provision has proven not to operate well in the city proper, and since the legislative character of representatives has fallen in the scale of intelligence, and public integrity, to some degree, in the city representation, it certainly affords no proof that it is not a good rule. I need only point to Massachusetts with her very large representation in the lower House, to controvert this assumption, and to show the healthy working of the single district system. In that State where each town, equivalent to a township in the State of Pennsylvania, sends two and three representatives to the lower House of the Legislature, every voter in those small districts are, necessarily, conversant with the character, intelligence and honesty of their legislators. Their public fidelity and their private character are well known to every voter, and the consequence is they have, under the single district system, always secured honest representatives. There the man who seeks to be elevated to office by the people must be a fair and honest man, or he will not represent them in the public councils of the State; and we contend, and it is the opinion of many of the best minds among public men, that this is all the legitimate fruit of a large representation, and the single representative district system.

Yet, in the face of these examples, my friend from Columbia county says the district system "is a great mistake." I hope it will be adopted by this Convention and incorporated in our fundamental law, so that not only cities but every county that has more than one member will be required to be districted off, that voters may know who they are voting for by personal contact and individual knowledge. This is the safety of this State. This is the safety of all representative governments, in my humble judgment. It is because the good people of Philadelphia, the men of intelligence, of wealth and of morality have folded their arms and not gone to the primary elections, have taken no interest in either their city or State government, that all these evils of which they speak has directly resulted. Sir, a few men may have committed wrongs in this city, for when you sift them out they are only a handful, compared to the intelligence, and honesty and purity represented in the general mass of the people of Philadelphia, only because these good people fold their arms and let these men rule by their absence. Let them go to the primary elections and select their officers and candidates; let them properly appreciate their citizenship; let them all faithfully perform their governmental functions, the only way to keep the ballot-box pure, and not come in here and make the complaint that they cannot get along; that there is so much corruption, so much fraud in the ballot-box and all that kind of thing. I say they ought to be ashamed of themselves. Why, sir, these complaints have been made on this floor by gentlemen who are among the leaders of the parties in Philadelphia who do these things.

I hope that we will consider well this subject; that we will not be like the thoughtless and inconsiderate young man in his teens, about budding into manhood, who thinks he knows everything; that he is wiser than his father, and that, although without experience, he knows everything about everything better than anybody else. Let us venerate the action of the Convention of 1838 and its predecessors, and be content to follow their wise example, and make this exception in the Senatorial representation of the city of Philadelphia, and thus prove the general rule, while we will, at the same time, secure a fair and equal voice in the legislation of the Commonwealth to the rural districts of the State.

Mr. JOHN M. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman: I shall ask the indulgence of this committee for a very few moments on this question. At the risk of disagreeing with the very distinguished gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) and with the eminent President of this Convention, (Mr. Meredith,) I believe that the true foundation of apportionment does not rest wholly upon number, but rests fully as much, or more, upon locality. The interests of localities are as varied as the interests of citizens, and oftener come into conflict. There is always more danger of legislation to the prejudice of localities than to the prejudice of individuals. The interests of individuals are identical with their particular section, and whatever legislation is dangerous or prejudicial to a certain locality, is prejudicial or dangerous to all the citizens of that locality, whether they be in number ten thousand or one hundred thousand. It is, therefore, in my view, a principle of location, rather than of numbers. The interests of location must be taken care of, at least, in one branch of the Legislature if we allow the people to be represented in the other according to numbers.

The first care, therefore, in my view, in making apportionments, is locality, for the greatest danger in legislation is to discriminate between localities, rather than between individuals. When the Constitution of 1838 was formed, the city and county of Philadelphia were entitled to four Senators, and in anticipation of this tremendous growth and enlargement of the city—in anticipation of the immense population that has centered here—the framers of that Constitution thought proper—and, I think, wisely—to limit their representation in the State Senate to what it was at that time. Now, sir, has the experience of the last thirty-four or thirty-five years demonstrated that that limitation was right or wrong? I take it that the observation of all of us has been, that these thirty-five years have demonstrated that it was a very wise provision, and I would ask my friends from Philadelphia on this floor where and when the interests of their magnificent and beautiful city have been prejudiced by this constitutional limitation? What legislation has ever this city asked that she did not receive? What has she ever opposed that has not been defeated? If the gentlemen from Philadelphia have any cause at all to complain, it is of their present strength in the halls of the Legislature, and not of their weakness. They should ask this Convention to save them from the power they now wield in the legislative halls at Harrisburg, rather than ask greater.

Why, sir, this obnoxious, iniquitous and fearful election law they have in the city of Philadelphia is due to the tremendous power that she now has in the Legislature. This election law that not only over-rides the will of the people of every other section of this Commonwealth, but is a blur and a blistering blot upon the statutes of this Commonwealth, only remains there a day because of the power of this city in the State Legislature. Let the delegation from this city to-day unite for the repeal of that statute, and does any man believe it would stand an hour in the face of that delegation? If it was not for the power of this city at Harrisburg, this law would be repealed before the sun sets. I therefore repeat that these gentlemen from Philadelphia ought rather to ask to be saved from the numbers they have there now, than to ask us to increase them. Philadelphia has suffered nothing. Philadelphia has felt no wrong or injury from this constitutional limitation. What is the fact? When the act of Assembly was passed and submitted to the people whether or not this Convention should be called—whether or not the Constitution should be changed in any respect—whether or not it should be submitted to the investigation of the Convention—what was the vote in this city? Out of the one hundred and twenty thousand voters which this city contains, only a little over sixteen thousand voted for calling this Convention. They did not feel that they were wronged by that constitutional limitation, or they would have accepted this opportunity tendered to them to right that wrong. They were resting in a happy indifference to this terrible wrong (?) as gentleman would have us believe it is.

Now, sir, my view is that locality should be represented in the Senate, whether that locality is comprised of ten thousand people, or whether it is comprised of one hundred thousand people. That different localities have distinct interests, and that those interests often conflict, I beg to call the attention of the committee to a very noted example. The railroad corporations of this Commonwealth are permitted now by law to charge an exorbitant rate of transportation between intermediate stations, while they are allowed to ship the same class of freight two hundred or three hundred miles farther to get it to this city at a less rate of transportation; a discrimination in favor of the cities, a discrimination against the country. Now I ask you, sir, with that example upon our statute books, with that provision permitting railroad corporations, to so arrange their transportation rates, whether or not there are not varied interests, conflicting interests, between this city and other portions of the State? It is not a question of population entirely. It is a question as much of locality as it is of population, and I therefore shall vote, if the number of Senators is not increased, to preserve the present limitation as to the city of Philadelphia; and if the number of Senators be increased, to increase their number just in the same proportion.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I have but little to say upon this subject. But I shall support the report of the Committee on Legislature that recites, in the proviso that has raised so much controversy here: "Provided, That no city or county shall elect more than four Senators." In reading this I do not see that Philadelphia is named in it at all; and I read it because one delegate from Philadelphia stated that, under this proviso, Philadelphia would have but four Senators, and Allegheny county might, somehow, get six. It seems to read that "no city or county shall elect more than four Senators. No city or county. It includes both.

I presume, sir, the time will come, if it has not already, when gentlemen will get tired of hearing so much about Philadelphia. I confess that I have, although I concede to every gentleman on this floor the right to use his time just as he may think proper, provided he speaks to the subject matter before the Convention.

I rose, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of entering my emphatic protest against the idea that the Senate of Pennsylvania is based upon the idea of population. The Senate is the conservative body. The Senate represents communities; and the question is, shall we surrender to one community, although that community may be large in numbers, packed upon a small territory, like the great city of Philadelphia—shall we surrender to her the power to govern a great and mighty Commonwealth like Pennsylvania? They talk about her want of influence, and say she is shorn of her political strength and her political rights; yet to-day she has one-eighth of the entire political power of this Commonwealth in the Senate, and one-sixth in the House of Representatives; and when you look over the broad acres of Pennsylvania, I would like to ask these gentlemen whether they do not think that, when they have one-eighth of the entire political power of this Commonwealth in the Senate, whether they have not been conceded, as a community, their full share of political right? It is true, Mr. Chairman, that we have said that communities shall be represented in the Senate, upon the basis of the number of taxable inhabitants. We have fixed upon that idea as a general one, but this general rule is always subject to exception. When we look upon the Senate of the United States, which has already been alluded to here, and I will not discuss the subject again, there Pennsylvania stands by the side of Florida; but in the House of Representatives, in the popular branch, the representation of Pennsylvania is governed by her numbers, and has her full voice in proportion to her strength and her population.

There are reasons, great and grave reasons, why we should not agree in the organization of society, that a community—which may be supposed to act as a unit—should be represented in the conservative body by numbers that will surrender to it too great a power.

Gentlemen in Philadelphia seem to think that she is not only the Commonwealth, but that she has made all the balance of the State. They speak of her as though she was the heart, which furnishes the life-blood, and they suppose that the heart that furnishes the red blood that flowed out to the extremities should be recognized. Mr. Chairman, I never understood that cities were the heart of any Commonwealth or the heart of any State. I understand that it is the country, where the life-blood comes from. It is the country that flows into these cities that makes them what they are. Cities never made the country. It is the country that makes the cities. It is the country that supports them, and it is upon the country that all these interests rest.

When we look at Philadelphia the question is suggested, perhaps to some persons from my county: "What have we contributed to build this great city, a city that has used its power to discriminate against our people, trample upon and strike down our interests?" They have used it for that purpose at Harrisburg. For the great railroads of this Commonwealth we have contributed millions in Allegheny county, for which we have not a dollar to show, and every single pound of freight that comes to us comes with a discrimination upon it, and this city, being the end of the string, is the only city in the whole line that receives her freight and her passengers at the lowest rates.

I say there are reasons, good substantial reasons, why, in the organization of the Senate, we should say that one community should not have too great a voice.

In the House of Representatives the people are all represented. When we come to organizing the Senate, we organize a different body. Minorities are to be protected. It was intended to be a balance; it was intended to be a check; and it was intended that the small communities might there have a voice equal to the larger ones. The small community has just as many rights in this Commonwealth as the greatest one, and the real principle of the organization of the Senate is, that it is organized upon the basis of communities. It is communities, and not the people, upon which we base the Senate, and the smallest community, that has a population of but fifty thousand, or a hundred thousand, has rights as great as the city of Philadelphia, and this is the plan upon which the Senate of the United States is organized. I say their rights are as great, and they should be protected; and the Senate was intended as a check upon the popular branch; and it was intended to protect minorities, and protect small communities against the oppressions of greater ones.

I do not wish to say anything by way of comparison between the country and the city; but if we come to a question of morals, I think there would be no great difficulty in striking the balance; but I desire, for one, here to enter my protest against the idea that the Senate is to stand upon population as the basis. Our honored President of this Convention, in the first part of his speech, stated the true principle, namely: That the Senate represented, properly, under our Constitution, "communities." That is the true idea, and we should adhere to it, so far, at least, as not to put it in the power of one great community to control the legislation of the State. [Here the hammer fell.]

MR. DARLINGTON. I move the gentleman be allowed to speak ten minutes more.

The motion was agreed to.

MR. HOWARD. I will not further occupy the time of the committee.

MR. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: After the eloquent words which have fallen from the lips of the President of this Convention, and from the lips of the gentleman from York, (Mr. Black,) it seems to me scarcely necessary to say anything with reference to the proposition now under discussion. It would almost seem to me to state that proposition is to refute it. The thought that underlies our whole system of government is that of equality of representation, and yet this Convention sits here to-day, and sat here yesterday, gravely discussing the question whether nearly one half of the people of Philadelphia should be disfranchised, and whether that disfranchisement should continue in an increasing ratio for all time to come.

Now I would have thought, to state that proposition was to answer it. I would have listened with amazement to the statement that any gentleman should have been found upon this floor to urge reasons in support of such a doctrine; and I cannot but confess the surprise with which I listened to my learned brother from the city of Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward.) I felt that Philadelphia was stabbed in the house of her own friends. But I could not but feel, sir, that the remarks which were addressed to this Convention, by that gentleman, constituted the best argument which could be urged against the view he contended for; for, if a gentleman of his learning, his experience, his integrity, his standing in this Commonwealth, could urge no wiser reasons in support of the proposition of the committee than those he did urge, that it had little merit indeed, and could, by no possibility, command the approval of this intelligent Convention. But what were those reasons that were urged in support of this proposition?

First, they were that Thaddeus Stevens, in an eloquent speech, had been the father of this doctrine in the Convention of 1837. For the first time in my life, and with an amazement which passes expression, did I hear from the lips of that gentleman words of reverence for the memory of that departed statesman. But, Mr. Chairman, it is not by weight of names, however great, but by its merits, that this proposition is to be tried. Next, that the city of Philadelphia is a city of consumers and not of producers. What had that to do with the question, even if it were true in point of fact? Not a city of producers! a city that adds four hundred millions of dollars every year to the solid wealth of this Commonwealth; a city that employs two hundred millions of capital in manufacturing operations; a city that every year manufactures eighty millions of dollars more than the whole export trade of the city of New York, and thirty millions of dollars more than its entire import trade; a city that converts into ten dollars every one dollar that the country produces; are we to be told that such a city is not a city of producers, but a city of consumers? It matters not, even if it were true; I perceive no possible bearing that it can have upon the question now before the committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is an undeniable fact that the city of Philadelphia, practically, is dwarfed in all the political relations of this Commonwealth. I believe that I am correct when I say that while the city of Philadelphia to-day has a fifth of the population, and a fourth, perhaps, of its wealth, that she has never had a Governor of the Commonwealth since the year 1808, and there has never been a United States Senator from Philadelphia with one solitary exception, I think, that of the late Mr. Geo. M. Dallas, since the year 1800.

But let us look, as we are invited to do, at the State Legislature. My friend from Huntingdon (Mr. John M. Bailey) has spoken to us of the power of the city in the Legislature, but I say to that gentleman that, except in questions which arise that are purely local in their character, and with regard to which the etiquette of the Legislature, alluded to by the President of the Convention in his remarks, is held to be controlling, the city of Philadelphia, is utterly powerless in the councils of the Commonwealth; and instead of his asking us to point to the measure of legislation which has failed to be passed, that the city of Philadelphia has asked for, I ask him to point me to a solitary measure of legislation which the city of Philadelphia, when interested in the general interests of this Commonwealth, has been able to have passed through the Legislature. I do not know where he can find it.

I am not going to say that the city of Philadelphia is not herself to blame for this thing. I have no doubt she is to blame for it. We can see how the representation of this city in the Legislature of the Commonwealth has steadily declined in the years that are past. When I see who have been sent there to represent this city, in each branch of the Legislature, I must feel, as a citizen of Philadelphia, that she is herself to blame for the whole result. I can express no wonder that the city is, practically, unrepresented in the Legislature, and, practically, possesses no real power there. But what is the reason for it? We have but to turn back twenty years, when the city of Philadelphia was represented in the Legislature by her foremost citizens. The best men of our city went there. That day has passed away. The best men of our city cannot get there.

It is not that the best men of the city of Philadelphia are not willing to go to the Legislature, but it is that the best men of the city of Philadelphia cannot command a nomination for the Legislature. They cannot pull the wires, they cannot exert the arts, they cannot expend the money which must be expended to secure nominations for these places. That is the radical difficulty. What has caused it? The President of this Convention, with eloquent words and wise utterances, stated what the cause was. There is no longer any representation of the city of Philadelphia in the Legislature. It is a representation of little districts, small representative districts, that are manœuvered, and handled, and governed entirely by small factions of the smallest and the meanest of petty politicians. There is no representation of the city as an entirety. There is no representation of the wealth, and the power, and the intellect, and the intelligence of the city of Philadelphia to be found in its Legislature, and the reason is: That we have cut this city up into little representative districts, that are the property of the small politicians that control them and nominate and elect whom they will to office. That is the radical difficulty, and until we get rid of that we shall never have any proper representation of the city of Philadelphia in the Legislature. Is it not correct, as has been suggested by the last two gentlemen who have addressed this committee that there is a great corporate power—a great railroad power, which controls and administers the affairs of the city of Philadelphia, and does it to the disadvantage of the country, though I fail to perceive what that, even if it were true, has to do with the great question before us. I desire to speak, so far as I am concerned, with the utmost hesitation and prudence on this subject, but I have no relations here, and no relations elsewhere, that would control the freedom of my thought or the freedom of my action, did I for an instant believe that these gentlemen were correct in that which they have stated.

Why, sir, I listened with surprise to the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. Howard,) who gave us to understand that the city of Pittsburg had built the Pennsylvania railroad. I do not want—

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I believe I did not allude to the Pennsylvania railroad, at all. I stated that we had contributed over three millions of dollars to build the railroads of this Commonwealth—our county did—and the city, I believe, two millions. We lost it all, and Philadelphia got the benefit of it.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: What I desired to state on that subject, and I did not misunderstand the gentleman, was, that it was true, indeed, in one sense, and utterly untrue in another. They contributed in their bonds, and they repudiated their bonds, and it was not until the county commissioners went to prison that they were compelled at last, not even then, to do their duty, but to compromise the obligations they had assumed. If that be building a railroad then the gentleman is entitled to the full force of what he has stated on that subject.

Nor is it true that these discriminations, to which the gentleman from Huntingdon (Mr. Jno. M. Bailey) referred, have existed any further than the natural laws of trade create these discriminations. I did not suppose that any law of trade or business requires that all customers are to be dealt with, from whatever locality they come, on precisely the same footing. I did not suppose that if a man has one store in the city of Philadelphia, and another store in the city of Pittsburg, that the price of any commodity which he has for sale is necessarily the same precisely in each of these two cities. I deny that there is any law of trade, or of morals, or of the State, which he is offending when he charges customers in the cities named prices which accord with the current market prices in these respective cities. I thought that the great laws of trade controlled these matters. I thought that competition, where it existed, always had a tendency to reduce prices, and where it did not exist prices were not so reduced. And I suppose these railroad corporations are governed by these great natural laws of trade and finance, that control other parties. I think, sir, that there is to be found a complete answer to anything expressed by the gentleman from Huntingdon, (Mr. Jno. M. Bailey,) or by the gentleman from Pittsburg (Mr. Howard.) This, however, is a digression from the main question before the committee.

The main, and the only, question existing before the committee, is this: "On what principle is it that one-half of the people of Philadelphia are to be disfranchised?" I listened, in vain, to hear an argument for it. The gentleman from Huntingdon says it is by reason of locality. Is there anything in this little piece of ground that we inhabit, here, that should take away from us political rights we possess when we cross the boundary of the county and live in an adjacent township? On what principle is it? Why is it that the people of the city of Philadelphia are to be deprived of that great cardinal doctrine of republican institutions, that representation is to be equal in order that it may be fair and just?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman: I move that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The question being upon the motion, it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman (Mr. Cuyler) will proceed.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I am much obliged to the committee for the courtesy, but I have no desire to consume more of their time, except merely to say that I cannot agree to the thought that population is not the basis of representation. I cannot agree, even if locality is to be the basis, that different localities are to be placed upon a different footing. I cannot agree that we should discriminate against a particular locality or place, and not accord a fair and equal representation to each locality. I cannot agree to the propriety or justice of making that discrimination against the city of Philadelphia which the gentleman from Huntingdon (Mr. John M. Bailey) has attempted to show would be right and just.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Philadelphia and of the committee to one consideration that has been present to my mind from the beginning in this matter. I had not very settled convictions upon this proviso, and originally reported it simply because it stands in the present Constitution. I confess that one of the suggestions that fell from the gentleman from Philadelphia, behind me, (Mr. Woodward,) yesterday, had great weight with me, and that was the length of time this discrimination has existed. There is one other consideration, also, that has great weight in my mind. Either you must disfranchise the city to a certain extent or you must disfranchise the country. It is utterly impossible to allow the city of Philadelphia a representation according to population, and at the same time preserve the relative importance of the country representation. There never has been a time when eighteen men, representing a large territory and very diverse interests, could combine and act together as a unit as eighteen men can do who represent a small section of territory. It is certain in the very nature of things, notwithstanding the opinion of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler,) who last addressed the committee, that eighteen members in the House of Representatives of our State Legislature from this city are capable of three times as much force upon any question as any eighteen members from the country districts, simply because the diversity of interests does not exist among the former. A division does not exist; they work as a body; they move as a unit, and you cannot get a gentleman from Allegheny, a gentleman from Venango and a gentleman from Washington to work together as a unit. Political arrangements are arrangements of expediency; they are arrangements for public utility; and that is the best method of representation which tends to give the citizen of Philadelphia the same measure of weight in the representative body that the citizen of Chester, or of Dauphin, or of Washington possesses. And to-day each citizen of Philadelphia, if representation is restricted to population alone, has very much more share in representation of the State than any other citizen in any other portion of the State. I submit, also, that the gentleman from Huntingdon (Mr. John M. Bailey) presented a consideration of importance, a suggestion of very considerable weight, to this committee. Upon any matter of local consequence, these men are as one man, standing shoulder to shoulder and securing, by their united force, what they desire, and the representatives of the country districts are necessarily diversified in their duties of representation and incapable of acting en masse; and therefore, the eighteen representatives here have decidedly more weight, and more power in this Convention, than the same number of gentlemen from the country. So that in deciding this matter, the wisdom of the people has been heretofore persuaded that the best way was to put a limit upon the representation of the city. If you increase your number and do not insert any limit, the city of Philadelphia will absolutely control your State. No legislation, I venture to say, will be possible against her will, and no legislation can be resisted that she desires for the reasons that I have suggested to the committee.

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Chairman: If we at this question simply from the standpoint of Philadelphia, and the large counties, we would reason as these gentlemen do, and we would say, as they have said to us, that they are anxious to hear some reason why population should not, in every case, be made the basis of representation. If, however, sir, these gentlemen can step out of the influence that floats into their minds from their surroundings, they would find that there were great reasons for it; and I can suggest this idea in no better language than that of the poet, who was also a philosopher, when he said:—

"O, wad some power the giftie gie us,
To see oursels as ithers see us;
It wad frae many a blunder free us."

Now, sir, it is true, as a general rule, that the rights of one elector are equal to those of every other elector; and that the rights of any one amount of population are, as a general rule, equal to the rights of any other; and yet, it is also true, and an equally fundamental and necessary principle, that every right held by any citizen, by any elector, by any community, is subject to those modifications that are necessary for the public and general good. On that account, sir, it is that, in your apportionment, if there is a county that falls below the proper ratio for representation, you give it a representative notwithstanding, because it is necessary that it should be protected. You depart from the basis of population, because there is a special necessity for it, and make a special rule to govern it. By looking at the other end of the line, we will also see that, as the population exceeds a certain extent, there is reason why there should be a limit to its representation. I give that reason now. Part of what I intended to state has been given by the gentleman from Dauphin, who has just spoken, (Mr. MacVeagh,) and therefore I will omit most of that part. I now call the attention of every member to this proposition; that, as a rule, we know it to be true, from actual practice, and from everyday experience, that wherever in the world there is concentration—and I use the word in its strongest form—a concentration of wealth, a concentration of population, a concentration of commercial interests, a concentration of manufacturing interests, a concentration of railroad interests, and of other interests that might be enumerated, by virtue of that very concentration, they acquire a power and influence that the same interests precisely, capital and extent, the same population also, do not possess, and cannot possess, when they are scattered over a large amount of territory.

Now, sir, we may theorize about population as we will, and about individual rights as we will, there is a consciousness in every man's heart, that concentration combination does produce influence. We have been told, from time immemorial, that in union there is strength, and I may add, that in concentration there is power.

It is well known, all over the world, that, for many purposes, Paris is France, Rome is Italy; that New York city is almost New York State; and that the cities of the world largely control the power of the world, by reason of their vast proportions, and concentrated population, and wealth.

These are, I apprehend, the main reasons which have exercised an influence upon the minds of our former law-makers in the discussion of this question of representation. Now, sir, apply it, and take, as an instance, the aggregated capital of the city of Philadelphia, or of any other great city or county, whether in the form of manufactures, or in other enterprises, and you will find that they exercise more power over the commercial interests of the State than the same number of manufacturing establishments or enterprises possessing an equal amount of capital would scattered over a wide extent of territory. This is obvious. If concentrated they can act as a unit, or exert their efforts in the same direction to preserve themselves, or build up the commercial prosperity of one particular locality. This same principle will apply to all the interests of this or any other State. Again, to take another illustration, if all the interests of the western part of the State were concentrated, their power and their influence would be vastly increased. Is it not evident to every thinking mind that if the greatest amount of power is desired to be obtained from a community of six hundred thousand people, that their interests must be concentrated, and not scattered over the country? This principle found an apt illustration during the late war. It was only when General Rosecrans massed his artillery that he was able to defeat the opposing enemy. When his guns were scattered, his army was driven from one point to another. In explaining this principle of political economy, I desire to call the attention of the Philadelphia and other members to the condition of affairs, as they exist in actual everyday life. We have applied it to material interests, now apply it to men. Is it not true, and has it not been true in the past history of our State, that ten men from any one place holding their seats in our Legislature, or any deliberative body, have possessed more actual power and influence than any ten men representing different localities in the State? I care not whether Philadelphia has four or ten representatives in the Legislature. They are acquainted with each other, and representing, as they do, a community of common interests, they act in a solid body upon all questions connected with the interests of their county, and exercise far more influence than an equal number of men representing different interests or different portions of the State, and who may be entirely unacquainted and uninterested with each other.

Therefore if you place representation upon a basis of population, you give to the large cities and large counties an excessive amount of power and influence, instead of placing them on a level with the other counties of the State. Do the large counties and cities of the State deserve more influence and power than would be a fair proportion to the balance of the State? I think not; then the basis of representation must be different.

I think that this is the true view of this question, and I think the proportion of representation should give equalized results, no matter what ratio may be required to obtain it. I do not desire to enlarge upon this point. I rose simply to explain my objections to the arguments on the other side, on the ground of the disadvantage that would result from an undue Senatorial representation in the large cities and counties. Allow me to add that simply an arbitrary number I do not like, but would prefer an increase of representation, as large communities increase, yet on such an increased ratio as would result in equalized influence, and trust that such a basis will be proposed.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman: I have no desire to inflict a long speech on this Convention; but, coming from the interior, I might say from the back woods, where it is supposed civilization does not reach, I cannot permit my vote to be cast on this question without making it possible for those who have an interest in me to know how I vote, because I consider it to be a question which vitally affects the very basis of our form of government. I shall, therefore, with the greatest pleasure, vote against any proposition that is introduced in this Convention that shall tend to disfranchise any man in this Commonwealth. The citizens of Philadelphia are in every respect the equals of every citizen of the State of Pennsylvania, no matter from what quarter they come, and the people in the interior of the State are their equals, perhaps not in the extent of intelligence, but, at least, in good intentions. The people of the interior counties do not ask that Philadelphians shall be restricted in their representation because of their great city, and their vast and continual growing importance, for they are proud that they are Pennsylvanians, and they are equally proud that the city of Philadelphia is in the State of Pennsylvania. They are willing to concede that the greatness of Pennsylvania depends, in a large measure, upon the greatness of Philadelphia, and they will not consent for a single moment that its citizens shall be deprived of their representation because of the multiplied people assembled, and engaged within its limits in occupations that tend to the general interest and welfare of the State. The true doctrine is, that all men are equal. I desire to be consistent in all the votes I shall cast in this Convention, and therefore I shall vote to give to every man in Philadelphia the same right as every other man has anywhere else in the State; and I think it is high time that the Convention came to the conclusion that we are not here representing a Commonwealth of rascals and villains, and that all this sectional feeling and debate only tends to create the impression that the representatives of the interior counties have assembled here for the sole purpose of interfering with the future prosperity of the great city of Philadelphia, instead of representing an intelligent mass of beings who are honest in their intentions to promote the interests of all the sections of our State. It is only a miserable petty minority of the city of Philadelphia who are corrupt, and all that its citizens desire of this Convention is that we should give them wise and fundamental laws, with power to carry out their provisions, and they will take care of all these frauds and iniquities themselves.

I contend, therefore, that it is an act of injustice to base the representation of the city of Philadelphia upon the fact that every man she sends to the Legislature is a rascal, and that, in consequence, she is to be limited in her Senatorial representation. The proper place to commence this duty of purifying the Legislature of the State is in this Convention, and if our work is performed in a thorough manner, no more rascals will go to the Pennsylvania Legislature, and no matter whether members are sent from the city of Philadelphia, or any other section, they will always have the interest of the entire State at heart. A man who has been elected a member of the Senate has no right to legislate solely for the interests of one particular locality, but as the representative of the interests of the entire State. It is a reflection upon the intelligence and the integrity of the people of the State, to say that they send representatives to our Legislature for the purpose of merely carrying out the wishes of a particular locality. The argument of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) may, perhaps, apply to the Senate of the United States, as its members represent the rights of sovereignties, and as they are not placed in that body by a popular vote, but it cannot apply to the Senate of Pennsylvania, for that body is as much a popular branch as is the House. The people vote directly for their Senators, as they do for members of the House. There can be no distinction, but it has always been held that it is a conservative body, and they should always take a wider and more liberal view of questions which come before them, than is expected of the members of the lower House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman : During the discussion of this question there has been a great deal said concerning the limitation of the Senatorial representation in the city of Philadelphia, and it is alleged that this restriction commenced in 1838. There is certainly some misapprehension in regard to this point. The honored President of this Convention has certainly not read the provision in the Constitution of 1790 very lately, or else his anxiety to serve the city of Philadelphia has blinded him in regard to the language of that instrument on this subject. For myself I am perfectly content to take the provision of 1790, on this question of the apportionment of Senators, for it provides that "the Senators shall be chosen in districts to be formed by the Legislature. Each district containing such a number of taxable inhabitants as shall be entitled to elect not more than four Senators, and no city shall be divided in the formation of districts. Now, Mr. Chairman, under the provisions of this section, if the Constitution had never been changed, and if the city of Philadelphia contained five millions of people to-day, it could have but four Senators; for the provision distinctly says that no district shall elect more than four Senators, and that no city shall be divided in the formation of a district. There can be no mistake about this provision, and it has been the organic law of the State of Pennsylvania from 1790 to the present time. Members of this Convention, representing the city of Philadelphia, are now asking to have this wholesome provision set aside and a new one established; and that, Mr. Chairman, I may add, is a proposition which was not heard of during the pendency of the call for this Convention. It was not one of the evils that the people of Pennsylvania have asked this Convention to remedy, and I maintain, as I have on other occasions, that it is the sole duty of this Convention to remedy the evils which called it into being, and not to change those various constitutional enactments about which there is no complaint whatever.

There has never been any evil connected with this matter of representation. The people of Pennsylvania have felt no evil growing out of it, and when have the people of Philadelphia experienced any evil from it? For, as has been said here by other delegates this morning, Philadelphia has always exercised its due control of our legislation. Although it has never had, as was stated, a Governor of this Commonwealth, it has had something far more important than a Governor. It has had control of all the important committees of the Legislature from time immemorial, and it has secured this control by means of its consolidated vote in the Legislature in both branches. Its eighteen Representatives and its four Senators have been able to control every important committee. They have, therefore, no occasion to ask for anything more. There has not been a Committee on Railroads or upon Corporations formed for the last twenty years that has not been formed under the inspiration of Philadelphia. There has been no Speaker for twenty years that has not first had to ask the consent of Philadelphia for such position. There is, then, no evil felt by the people of Pennsylvania in consequence of this restriction, which we are called upon to remedy. Philadelphia itself has suffered nothing in consequence of it. If they have suffered at all, it is because of their own negligence in not sending such representatives to Harrisburg as they desired; for the Philadelphia delegation in the Legislature of Pennsylvania practically controls it to-day, and has controlled it for twenty years upon every important question of legislation. There cannot be secured legislation of any kind for a country district unless the member from that district will get upon his knees to Philadelphia.

But it was not to speak upon that point that I rose. It was simply to refer to the fact that this proposition now pending is an effort to change what has been the organic law of Pennsylvania from 1790 to this time, and I repeat there was not a single demand before the meeting of this Convention, for such a change, not even in Philadelphia. That proposition, that method of representation, has been acquiesced in from the time of its adoption down to the present day.

And again, Mr. Chairman, it is not true that in Pennsylvania, or in any other State of this Union, is population the sole criterion of representation. This very Constitution of 1790 provides that each county shall have at least one Representative, no matter how few the inhabitants. It was communities, not numbers, that were to be represented in part. Every county, no matter how small its population, was entitled to a member of the House, and no city, however large its population, should have more than four Senators. The same principle is recognized in the Constitutions of nearly all the States, that communities and municipalities are represented as well as taxables. It is not true, it never was true, that United States population is the sole criterion of representation. The Senate of the United States is the pattern for Senates of States throughout the Union. That is the conservative body. It does not represent population. Its whole purpose and its mission is one of conservatism. It never was a principle in the organization of Senates upon this continent that population was to be the measure of representation.

We are not, therefore, those of us who are simply standing by the old law, striking at the old Constitution of 1790, which I venerate quite as much as the honored President of this Convention. We are standing by that document. It is they, who are seeking to carry this amendment, who are striking at it. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that I am willing to take the Constitution of 1790, just as it stands, as our guide upon this question of representation. I prefer not to change it. I prefer rather to take that document just as it stands than to take any Constitution which may be adopted with the amendment now pending. It was right in principle then, and it is right now; and the country districts of Pennsylvania are willing to take it, word for word, as it was adopted in 1790, for it nowhere contemplates —

Mr. PURMAN. Mr. Chairman: Representing, as I do, the State of Pennsylvania, —

Mr. MACVEAGH. If the gentleman from Greene will allow me, I desire to read an extract which has been placed in my hands by the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew.) It is from the Daily Legislative Record, of 1856, and is an extract from the works of John C. Calhoun; and whatever opinions may have been entertained, by him, of the Constitution of the United States, certainly all students of political science regard him as one of the most profound thinkers upon that subject who has lived in recent years. I beg this committee to listen while I read a short extract that the gentleman from Columbia has put in my hand. He is speaking of the principle of the numerical majority, or of basing power upon population alone, and observes:

"It assumes that, by assigning to every part of the State a representation, in every department of its government, in proportion to its population, it secures, to each, a weight in the government, in exact proportion to its population, under all circumstances. But such is not the fact. The relative weight of population depends as much on circumstances as on numbers. The concentrated population of cities, for example, would ever have, under such a distribution, far more weight in the government than the same number in the scattered and sparse population of the country. One hundred thousand individuals concentrated in a city two miles square, would have much more influence than the same number scattered over two hundred miles square. Concert of action and combination of means would be easy in the one, and almost impossible in the other, not to take into the estimate the great control that cities have over the press, the great organ of public opinion. To distribute power, then, in proportion to population, would be, in fact, to give the control of government, in the end, to the cities, and to subject the rural and agricultural population to that description of population which usually congregate in them, and, eventually, to the very dregs of their population. This can only be counteracted by such a distribution of power as would give to the rural and agricultural population, in some one of the two legislative bodies, or departments of the government, a decided preponderance. And this may be done, in some cases, by allotting an equal number of members in one of the legislative bodies to each election district, as a majority of the counties or election districts will usually have a decided majority of its population engaged in agricultural and other rural pursuits. If this should not be sufficient in itself to establish an equilibrium, a maximum of representation might be established, beyond which the number allotted to each election district or city should never extend." (Works, Vol. I, 398.)

Mr. MACVEAGH. I am thankful to the Convention, and to the gentleman from Greene, for allowing me to refer to this authority, the application of which is so direct to the subject now before us.

Mr. PURMAN. Mr. Chairman: As a representative of Philadelphia, as well as of the immediate section of the Commonwealth in which I reside, I should be very loath to cast my vote for, or to advocate any measure that would work injustice to, the city of Philadelphia, and I have no doubt, notwithstanding all that has been said here in regard to the bad character of the inhabitants of Philadelphia, that if the Almighty were to take it in his mind to deal with the city of Philadelphia as he did with the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, that he could find the requisite number upon whom to serve the notice, as he did in those unfortunate cities. Therefore my views upon this subject are not formed by any opinion I have in regard to the peculiar character or condition of any portion of the city of Philadelphia, nor is it as a judgment or a punishment to the people of Philadelphia even to that higher and nobler and better class who have deemed it to be their duty, as we are told, to abstain from the polls, held away either by business engagements or reluctance to mingle with a class of persons who have seized upon the ballot-box and upon the control of the municipal affairs of this great city.

I would not, as has been said here, do justice to Philadelphia. I would do exact justice to Philadelphia, and at the same time take care of the rights and interests of all the people, and all the interests of this great State. It is, as a general proposition, an undoubted principle underlying our institutions, that representation is based upon individuality, upon the individual man, and out of this principle has grown another, namely: The representation of municipalities or localities. Both of these principles underlie our government, both State and national. There is, therefore, something due to localities, as well as to the number of inhabitants within a particular locality. The general government is based upon this idea. The small sister State of Delaware has the same power in the United States Senate that the great State of Pennsylvania or the great State of New York has. This regulation of representation is founded upon the separate existence of the locality, or individual existence of the State, and therefore we cannot say, in fairness, that Pennsylvania is disfranchised in having only the same number of Senators in that branch of the government with the State of Delaware or the little State of Rhode Island.

Mr. Chairman, the general and fundamental principle of representation upon the individual man as a general maxim or principle is subject to exceptions and limitations. This principle is based upon the idea of equality of individuals, and equality of individuals in the government means equal power in the law-making of the State. And it is a maxim unquestionable that a compact population exercises a greater power than the same number of persons scattered over a vast amount of territory, and therefore representation upon the number of individuals, men would produce inequality of power in the individual man in the government. To avoid this, and to produce equality, and to do justice to all, we are compelled to declare that individuals hold the powers of government in a qualified sense. This, equally true of the several States, although the States are declared to be sovereign and independent, yet they are not strictly so in their individual character. Another general principle is that government is founded upon the consent of the governed. Now, as a general principle, this is true, and yet there are exceptions to it. In every State, although all persons are under the protection of this government, and obliged to conform their action to its laws, there are some who are altogether excluded from participation in the government, and are compelled to submit to be ruled by an authority in the creation of which they have no choice. This patent fact suggests the inquiry who are the people in whom is vested the power of the State. When we talk about the people that constitute the government, we mean those who have the elective franchise, because only those who exercise the elective franchise are a part of the law-making, law-executing and law-determining power. The foreigners amongst us who have no votes are governed, and yet they have no voice in the government. All the minors in the Commonwealth are governed, yet they have no voice in the government. All the females are governed, and yet they have no voice in the government. Then when we come to talk about the people constituting the government, we come back to inquire whom the people are. Why, in the sense of that fundamental principle, they are the people that vote, the people who exercise the elective franchise. Hence it is evident that the whole population is not included in the maxim that government is founded upon the consent of the governed, and that in practice it is subject to exceptions and limitations. As founded upon individuals, it must be subject to necessary restrictions and qualifications such as sound public policy requires.

We come to another general principle that taxation and representation must go together. That, too, is subject to limitations. All the property of minors and the property of females, and of foreigners or aliens, persons who cannot vote, is taxed, and yet they have no voice in the representation. You cannot name a general principle which is not subject to exceptions, and must have exceptions. Sound policy always dictates exceptions to general rules. Thus we have the axioms of abstract rights of individuals and principles and practical injunctions and prohibitions, promulgated with a view to their safe administration, and intended as a guide and limitation to the government in the exercise of power; yet these rights and axioms are, in practice, subject to limitations in favor of the interests of the community. The good of the individual must yield to the interest of the community. It is upon this maxim that we build all our railroads and other great public improvements. The limitation of general principles in practice from motive of public policy manifestly result. No maxim is more firmly established. Then all these general principles must be examined in the light of those necessary exceptions, and those exceptions are founded upon sound public policy.

When we come to great cities the same principle must be applied, not because of any particular wickedness, but because it is necessary that aggregated bodies of people should not have the entire control of the great affairs of the country; and in the application of this principle Philadelphia has never suffered. I have not heard from any gentleman that Philadelphia has suffered by reason of not getting any legislation that was necessary to the protection of the property, the lives and the liberties of the city of Philadelphia. Her representation in the lower House is equal to her population. In the Senate it is embraced in the idea of our federal government, which, it seems to me, is exactly just and proper.

Mr. WILLIAM H. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: —

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman will give way I will move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President: The committee of the whole has had again under consideration the report of the Committee on the Legislature, and has instructed its chairman to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Leave was granted to the committee to sit again to-morrow.

Mr. BARDSLEY. Mr. President: I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

So the Convention, at one o'clock and fifty minutes, adjourned.

FIFTY-THIRD DAY.

THURSDAY, February 27, 1873.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M., the President, Hon. Wm. M. Meredith, in the chair.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. James W. Curry.

The Journal of yesterday was then read and approved.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. DARLINGTON presented a petition of the citizens of Coatesville borough, Chester county, praying that the Constitution be so amended as to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. TURRELL presented petitions from the citizens of Great Bend and New Milford, Susquehanna county, praying for the same provision in the Constitution, which were referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. LEAR presented a petition from the citizens of the Makefield meeting of Friends of Bucks county, praying for the same provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. PORTER presented two petitions from the women of Indiana county, praying for the same provision in the Constitution, which were referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. CLARK presented a petition from the citizens of Indiana county, praying for the same provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. FULTON presented a petition from the citizens of Westmoreland county, praying for the same provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

Mr. LEAB presented a petition from the Makefield meeting of Friends of Bucks county, praying for a provision in the Constitution against the infliction of the death penalty, which was referred to the Committee on Judiciary.

Mr. DARLINGTON presented a petition from the citizens of Chester county, praying for the same provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TWO SESSIONS OF THE CONVENTION.

Mr. MANTOR offered the following resolution, which was twice read :

Resolved, That from and after Monday, March 3, this Convention hold two sessions each day. The first session from ten o'clock A. M. until two P. M.; the second session from four P. M. to six P. M.

The question being taken on the resolution, the yeas and nays were required by Mr. Hemphill and Mr. Temple, and were as follow, viz :

YEAS.

Messrs. Achenbach, Alricks, Andrews, Baer, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bartholomew, Boyd, Campbell, Carter, Corbett, De France, Edwards, Fulton, Funck, Green, Hay, Hopkins, Howard, Lawrence, Lear, Long, MacConnell, McCamant, McCulloch, McMurray, MacVeagh, Mann, Mantor, Metzger, Niles, Palmer, H. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Porter, Purman, Purviance, John N., Purviance, Samuel A., Rooke, Kunk, Smith, Wm. H., Stanton, Struthers, Van Reed, Walker, Wetherill, Jno. Price, Wherry, White, David N., White, J. W. F. and Wright—48.

NAYS.

Messrs. ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. President: I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That this Convention adjourn the third day of June sine die.

The question being on proceeding to second reading of the resolution, it was not agreed to.

LIMITED DEBATE IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: I move to proceed to the second reading of the resolution I offered yesterday.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The CLERK. Resolved, That the resolution limiting debate in committee of the whole to one speech to each member without leave be rescinded.

The Convention refused to read this resolution a second time.

DEFINING EXTENDED TIME IN DEBATE.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President: I move to proceed to the consideration of the resolution I offered yesterday.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The CLERK. Resolved, That when in committee of the whole a motion is made to extend the time of a member in debate the length of time shall be fixed in the motion.

The resolution was read a second time and agreed to.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, to further consider the report of the Committee on Legislature, Mr. Hopkins in the chair.

THE LEGISLATURE ARTICLE.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee of the whole have again referred to them the report of the Committee on Legislature. When the committee rose yesterday the twentieth section was before the committee, and the question was upon the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Worrell,) which will be now read.

THE NUMBER OF SENATORS FROM PHILADELPHIA.

The CLERK. To strike out of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) the words:

"No city or county shall be entitled to more than six Senators."

Mr. W. H. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: To my mind the correct way to solve the question before us is to consider the broad principle of citizenship.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman will permit me I desire to make a suggestion. It has been stated by many gentlemen that it would, perhaps, be better to suspend debate on the proposition before the committee, postpone or vote down the section, and first discuss and decide how many members we will have in the State Senate and in the House of Representatives. Until that is decided, it is, perhaps, quite impossible to reach a satisfactory conclusion upon the pending proposition. I trust, therefore, unless there is some objection, unless the gentleman from Allegheny has some, or some other member of the committee, that by unanimous consent we will allow the portion of the report of the Committee on Legislature, now pending, to be postponed, and debate proceed on the question of the numbers of the legislative body. When that is determined we certainly will be able to vote much more intelligently upon the remaining propositions both of apportionment and whether any discrimination shall be made in one body or in both.

Mr. W. H. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: I have no objection to this course proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Legislature, but it hardly becomes me to anticipate what the action of the committee of the whole would be in that respect. Inasmuch as this debate has gone on for sometime, I do not feel like taking the responsibility of waiving the floor for such a purpose. The House will have to decide that matter.

["Go on!" "Goon!" "Proceed."]

Mr. W. H. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: I believe that the true way to settle this question is upon the broad principle that every citizen of Pennsylvania, or every fifty thousand citizens, have respectively an equal right to representation in the Legislature of the State, no matter where he or they may happen to reside. The attempt to limit the Senators from this city through all time, or through a single generation to four or to six, or to any number less than the census tables and the apportionment acts may from time to time indicate or prescribe, is a weak and temporary expedient that must fall, because it is invidious and unjust. We have had abundant reason to complain of the almost endless catalogue of "special laws" which have been made at Harrisburg, at the instance of Philadelphia, and which were intended to operate within her borders exclusively. But now you propose to offset this bad habit of the wise people of this town, who think they know exactly what they want, and every winter go to Harrisburg and help themselves, by cutting them off from the full share of legislators to which their numbers (if not their virtues) clearly entitle them.

Some gentlemen have not hesitated to say that because an uncertain portion of Philadelphia is very, very vile and sinful and corrupt, that therefore the fewer Senators she shall elect the better, for it is confidently presumed that bad men will elect bad Senators, and Philadelphia is to be punished for her manifold, repeated, atrocious and undeniable frauds upon the ballot, by refusing her a full and fair representation, or rather number of representatives. I confess I thought that Philadelphia's character for fair elections was materially damaged in the house of her friends. One of them, to be sure, characterized election outrages in that bland and gentle language that is so becoming in this charming city of brotherly love. He admitted that, perhaps, there had been slight irregularities at elections here. I will not be outdone by the gentleman in the generous frankness with which we all confess the sins of our neighbors. [Laughter.] And I will admit, with equal candor, that in our county very reprehensible things have been done in this regard and are yet unpun-ished. But as I fully intended to do Philadelphia what justice I could, I now gravely make the tardy, but not the less truthful, acknowledgment that I really and truly believe there are other places in this blessed old Commonwealth where ballot-box stuffers are as bold, where repeaters are as expert, and where election officers are as purchasable as they are in Philadelphia. And sincerely believing, as I do, that there are as many frauds upon elections in Allegheny county, in proportion to the number of voters, as there are here, I cannot consent to depart from a broad principle and to punish Philadelphia for her fraudulent practices, and to give double reward to Allegheny, for perpetrating the same sort of political and moral iniquity—and this would be the case if things remain in this affair just as they are.

Mr. Chairman, this whole business of apportioning seems to be confused and ridiculous, and is not only marked by inconsistency and injustice, and this, give me leave to say, must always be the case as long as districting and apportioning the State are left to the miserable tricksters of both parties, who, for the last ten or fifteen years, have gerrymandered the State to make places for themselves. This Convention should itself apportion.

If you should divide the population of Pennsylvania in 1870 (3,521,791) by 33, the number of Senators, you will find that every Senator should represent nearly 107,000 of the people—no less, no more; and the districts should be adjusted to that number as nearly as may be.

Now let us examine, for a moment, how the districts are really apportioned, as things stand under the census of 1870.

Each Senator for Philadelphia represents 168,500 people; each Senator for Allegheny county represents about 87,400 people; the Senator from Montgomery represents 81,612 people; the Senator from Fayette and Greene represents 69,171 people; the Senator from Crawford represents 68,832 people; the Senator from York and Adams represents 106,444 people; and so the list goes on, without order or system, or common fairness. Gentlemen can examine for themselves.

Now why should it require nearly twice as many people to send a Senator from Philadelphia as it takes to send one from Allegheny? I do not think that there is, on the whole, much difference between the average Senator that comes from Philadelphia and the one that comes from Pittsburg; surely they should not be counted as two for one, as is now the case. I may say that, for my own part, none of them are "officers of mine," for I have had nothing to do with electing Senators since William Wilkins was elected from Allegheny. My good and healthy ballot has been regularly sequestered, lost, or entirely overborne and outweighed by unscrupulous opponents or the dusky sons of Africa.

Therefore I am not desirous of increasing the Senators from this town, because the kind of Senators they send to Harrisburg are very superior. But it is manifest that the present allotment, and the one now proposed for the new Constitution, are alike unequal and unfair, and should not be made permanent.

But it has been said that Philadelphia has acquiesced in this number of four hitherto, and that she certainly ought to be satisfied with six hereafter. This argument is not sound. We are not starting now as they did when, in order to keep this city from an undue share of Senators, some adroit and sagacious person placed the limit of four upon the number of her Senators for all future time. When that limit was fixed, if it was done in 1838 or 1840, Philadelphia was probably not entitled to more than two Senators. Now if you keep the number of Senators at thirty-three, which it is now, and declare upon the census of 1870, it will give her, as before stated, one Senator for every 107,000 people, or about six Senators and a half for her 674,000 population. According to one of my respected colleagues, Philadelphia has always been a pet of our county, and it therefore seems to me that we of Allegheny should take care that she has fair play in this division of power, and this we should clearly do without permitting the cruel taunt of a member of Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler,) about the repudiation of our bonds some ten or twelve years ago, to influence our action. That was a shabby business, to be sure, and both political parties in Allegheny vied with each other in their zeal in the unworthy cause. There were only about three good men in the county who resisted that attempt, and one of them, then the mayor of Pittsburg, and now within the scope of my vision, was one of the three. I will not now allude to any other of the three, because some might think allusion invidious, and comparisons odious; besides, modesty forbids. There was but one newspaper to help them.

But, Mr. Chairman, I find myself launching into irrelevant matters, and I will desist. I conclude as I began, that we must arrange this and all other questions here upon principles that must be just, permanent, fair, and to be comprehended by all men. If Senators are to be adjusted to populations, the count must be fair, and square, and uniform.

Let me add that if this manifestly proper plan is defeated, I shall then move a substitute to this effect: Leaving population and its increase or diminution out of the question, I shall propose that the Senate shall be composed for all time of four members from this city, two from Allegheny, and one from each and every other county in the State, now organized or to be erected hereafter, regardless of its population now or hereafter. Then Cameron and Forest, and Elk and Sullivan counties will hold equal power in the Senate with Philadelphia, as Delaware and Rhode Island counter-balance New York and Pennsylvania now in the Senate of the Union. In one of these two modes, as I conceive, it must be adjusted. But I suppose this restriction will be voted down, and that Philadelphia, reprobate and sinner as she has been, through her one-thirtieth, or one-eighth, or one-tenth of the wicked and worthless population (as variously estimated) cannot have a chance to send six or seven instead of four Senators to misrepresent her and sell out her rights and the rights of the State, at the seat of government, as I am sorry to believe too many of them have done.

Mr. Chairman, if you hold Philadelphia to her present quota of Senators, you must also, in fairness, restrain Allegheny and Luzerne—these are the most rapidly growing counties in the Commonwealth. But you cannot do this. If it could be so arranged that you could deduct from the sum of the voters all those who engineer the frauds at elections, and all the rich men who connive at their misdeeds and contribute large amounts that are used in fraudulent operations, thereby sharing the crimes of the corruptionists without, perhaps, sharing in their plunder—if you punish them only, it would be right and proper. But this you cannot do. You must not punish the guilty and innocent indiscriminately by taking away a portion of their common rights in bulk. But you can, perhaps, make stringent election laws, and thereby save free government from the destruction that now seems to impend over it, even as a sword ready to fall.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I ask, for a single moment, the indulgence of the committee to this fact. Unexpectedly to myself, and unexpectedly, I presume, to the chairman of the committee, the debate upon this whole proposition seems to have gone to the one point, that of the number of representatives to which Philadelphia shall be entitled. I agree with the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) that it would be wise if we could, by common consent, pass over this subject and go to the other point, leaving the number to which Philadelphia shall be entitled to be settled when we shall decide upon the number to which the Senate and House shall be entitled. I do not adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) but if he, representing the committee, will propose to modify the report by striking out the number "four," I will modify my amendment by striking out the number "six," and let the blank be filled.

Mr. CUYLER. I trust the committee will not, for a moment, consent to postpone the discussion of this question. To do so will practically be to throw away the two days we have already spent in debate, for whenever the question shall present itself again, these arguments will all be heard, and will require to be heard to have their proper impression upon the minds of the members. I hope we will keep steadily on in the path in which we have been walking, and that there will be no postponement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to withdraw the amendment if he sees fit to do so.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: Where that amendment is withdrawn for a purpose, and is not intended to dispose of the question finally before the committee, I do not concede that right without the consent of the committee.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I have a right to modify it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to modify or withdraw.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I do not propose to withdraw, but to modify.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is the amendment of the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) withdrawn?

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: It is not and will not be, but it will be modified, if the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) will modify the report of the committee.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I will do anything that it seems to the committee wise to do, and it does seem to me to be exceedingly wise, as I said, to proceed first and settle the numbers of the Senate and the House, and therefore, if that is the sense of the committee, I will, if the gentleman will withdraw his amendment, move to strike out the number "four" and leave it blank for the present, with an opportunity for the gentleman renewing his amendment after that is done.

Mr. DARLINGTON. The moment that the modification is made I will modify my amendment, by striking out six and leaving it blank.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: Do I understand that the amendment to the amendment is withdrawn?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir; it is not withdrawn.

Mr. LILLY. Is anything withdrawn?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir.

Mr. LILLY. Then I presume the best way is to vote down the amendment.

Mr. WORRELL. I have an amendment pending, to the amendment, which I have not yet withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps the Chair may be responsible to some extent for the discussion which has taken place. It occurred to the Chair, and he so intimated to the chairman of the committee, as well as to the President and several other gentlemen of the Convention, that it occurred to him that we were proceeding wrong end foremost, and that, as has been intimated by the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) the first question for this committee to settle ought to be what number of Senators and Representatives will this committee and the Convention recommend? That being settled, then the question of the distribution of these numbers will come up as a legitimate consequence, and therefore the Chair intended to suggest to the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Worrell,) who offered an amendment to the amendment, and to the gentleman from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) who offered the amendment, to withdraw their amendments and let the question of numbers be first settled, and then the pending question be disposed of.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman: As you have referred to what happened between ourselves upon this subject, I wish to state that I did think, and I do think, that it would be a much more logical mode of getting at the matter, to fix the number of Representatives and Senators separately, and, if the other subject of their distribution could be got rid of, to wait until we have fixed the number and then consider the distribution. If, therefore, this were a real withdrawing of the proposition, which is not palatable, I hope, to a large part of this House, to limit by arbitrary number a part of the representation from part of the State, I would be entirely satisfied with it; but this merely striking out "six," and striking out "four," leaves the proposition just as it was, and if it is to be left in that shape, I trust the question will be taken upon it, and we may decide finally whether we intend to adopt a course of that kind.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman: I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh.) I agree with him in thinking that we ought first to understand what number of Representatives we will have in the Senate and House. That ought to be the first question to be decided. I suggest to the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) that the only way that I see of getting over this section, as the gentleman from Chester will not withdraw his amendment, is to vote down the amendment and the section, and take up the other section, and after we have done that, then re-consider.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman: It may be owing to my mental obtuseness, but I really cannot see any necessity, whatever, for postponing this debate. This is not a question of numbers; nor do I consider it necessary, in my very humble opinion, with much deference to you, Mr. Chairman, and others, that we consider the question of numbers at all, at the present time. This is a question of proportion—a question of the pro rata share of representation which this city should have. It appears very plain to me that it is not necessary that we shall arrest the current of debate to take up a matter not absolutely connected therewith. We are now in the very current of this debate, and are prepared or being prepared to act intelligently upon it. It is not, as I have already said, a question of numbers, but of proportion; and hence I see no necessity for postponing the consideration of it and take up another, as suggested by the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh.)

No man would propose to limit this great and growing city, which, in fifty years hence, will contain millions of people, to any specific number; but it might be quite proper to restrict it to a certain proportion of the entire representation of the State.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I desire to make a short explanation of my opinion of the position of this question. When this matter was before the committee—

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman (Mr. Lilly) spoken already on this question?

Mr. LILLY. I do not know whether or not I have spoken on this particular amendment before. I have spoken on the general subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) having spoken once on this question desires to speak again. The question is, shall he have leave?

["Aye!" "Aye!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: When this report of the Committee on the Legislature was under consideration, some two or three weeks since, it was laid aside, as I understand it, for the purpose of allowing the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation to report on this subject. That committee has had this matter under consideration, and have something to offer in the place of this very section, which the committee think will cover the grounds a great deal better than any of the present amendments or the section itself. The chairman of that committee not being here, I presume the matter will be reported by one of the members of the committee when it is in order. I think it will meet all the difficulty that we have been talking about.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: I do not know what may be the disposition of the committee upon the proposition or suggestion that has just been made by the gentleman from Washington, (Mr. Lawrence,) which was to vote down this entire section. The worthy President, I believe, has just proposed that this proviso be voted down, and that the section be proceeded with. Now, sir, I am opposed to this if it is to be any index of what is to be done hereafter by this Convention.

I am not willing, sir, to vote down this section in connection with the proviso, unless it be with the understanding that it will be taken up hereafter and acted upon in Convention or committee. All the arguments that I have heard upon this question of restriction and limitation in regard to the city of Philadelphia, and other cities and counties which may be larger than others in this Commonwealth, have failed to satisfy me that this section and proviso are not right. It was thought proper and right by the Convention of 1790, which, according to the opinion of our worthy President, made the best Constitution that has ever been enjoyed by any people. My friend on the right (Mr. Woodward) thinks that the Constitution of 1838 is perhaps the best, and I am not certain but what he is about right. The Constitution of 1790 contained, in principle, this restriction. The Constitution of 1838 contained it in plain, substantial English. It was put into that Constitution after a long, a learned and an elaborate debate by the ablest men, then, of this Commonwealth. I think that they were right, and I doubt very much the propriety of this Convention departing from the rules established by both of these former Conventions.

I find, sir, that the gentlemen from Philadelphia and the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Smith) have struck hands upon this question—that they are going against any restriction in the apportionment of Senators to large cities and counties. The city of Pittsburg, in the county of Allegheny, which will soon absorb all that county as the county of Philadelphia was absorbed by the consolidation act of 1854, by the city of Philadelphia, they will rule this State. This thing of perfect fairness—of a government “of the people, for the people, and by the people”—which was proclaimed yesterday by the gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) is all very liberal and patriotic, but, sir, I think it savors very much of an observation that was made by a distinguished gentleman of this Union, years ago, in regard to the Declaration of Independence, that it was a “string of glittering generalities.” Why sir, power always concentrates itself where there is wealth. Look at the city of Philadelphia, with its immense corporations, immense wealth, immense power; and, more particularly, the power of the press of Philadelphia. Look at the same thing in Pittsburg, in the county of Allegheny. Why, sir, what is their position now in the Legislature of the State? Philadelphia has both the Speaker and Clerk of the House of Representatives, while Allegheny has the Speaker of the Senate and the Clerk of the Senate both. They have between them all the important offices of the Legislature at the present session. Let them have the power hereafter, with their increasing population, and the rest of this State will be nothing but hewers of wood and drawers of water for these immense cities.

I would like to know what, when that thing should be accomplished, would become of the “worthy German farmers of the interior of the State,” who are not so worthily represented by the gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) who I am sorry to see is not now in his seat. He says he is a farmer, and belongs to that worthy class—the hard-fisted yeomanry of the State, and he is here to protect their interests. He, I am sorry to say, has gone over to the enemy. He has deserted his “German farmers of the interior.”

Philadelphia, according to the remarks of the President of the Convention, yesterday, is all honest; her people are all honest, all virtuous, all right, and I dare not gainsay that, in the face of his remarks. I take it for granted that it is true; but that has nothing to do with this question. It is a question of government. It is a question of power. Equality! "Equal and exact justice to all," says the gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black;) and he related the story of the preacher in New Jersey, who asked his congregation for leave to say five words more before they should go: "Let us all start fair." But, applying that story as it was intended to be applied, I ask how long it would be, (even with a "fair" start,) before some one would be ahead of the others? If the worthy gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black) were upon this floor this morning, I would remind him of a remark of his own, made in an opinion which he delivered while Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, when two men, in my section of the State, had got into controversy about a land warrant, and one had got ahead of the other, and had succeeded in getting his warrant first laid, and took the land, though he had started a little behind the other. The judge concluded his opinion upon that occasion by saying, that "it was no imputation upon the fairness of the race that the winner was behind at the start." So he would say with these people in Philadelphia, although they might start equal, and even and fair, with the rest of the State, yet he would say, that if they got ahead, as they undoubtedly would in a very short time, that fact would be "no imputation upon the fairness of the race, because the winner was behind at the start."

This restriction has always existed in Pennsylvania. It was a distinction taken by William Penn, in the laws agreed upon in England, and preserved in the Constitution of 1776. "Representation, taxation," is all well enough, and we do not desire to take it way from Philadelphia.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I move that the gentleman's (Mr. Kaine's) time be extended ten minutes.

The question being upon the motion, it was agreed to.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: I am very much obliged to the committee, but I was about through. I was about to make a remark or two upon the question in the case, because upon the question, as I consider it, I have said nothing yet. [Laughter.]

Under the Constitution of 1776—the first one formed by the people of the State themselves, and for the State—they had no Senate. They had nothing but an Executive council, and the principle of this government and of all State governments, as well as the principle of the Government of the United States is, that the lower House represents the people, while the Senate is part of the Executive department. We had the Executive council under the Constitution of 1776, and under the Constitution of 1790 we first had the Senate; but it was never intended to represent the people in their aggregate capacity. The Constitutions have left representation to the lower Houses alone, and they are the representatives of the people. With them originate all bills for the appropriation of money. The Senate of our State grew out of the Executive council of 1776. It was created with the intention of being a conservative body and of being a check upon the action of the representatives. Now this is all we propose here, to give to the people of the State, their just representation in the lower House, and to place the conservative power of the Senate in the hands of the people of the interior counties, who are without the power held by the large cities. The people of the interior have always held this conservative power, and very justly and properly they have held the scales of justice between the cities and the country upon a level, and Philadelphia had better entrust this power in the future with these who have held it in the past. I am therefore opposed to voting down this section. I am opposed to striking out the word "four" or "six" either. I would prefer, however, that this apportionment could be so arranged as to settle the number of Representatives and the number of Senators, and then I would be willing to vote for giving to Philadelphia a fair proportion of the Senate according to the principles I have indicated.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman: Before the vote is taken upon this question, I desire to submit my views to the Convention. I shall endeavor to be as brief as possible. Mr. Chairman, my mind is controlled by the character of our government in the consideration of this question. We have heard, all over this body, that this is a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. It is a government based upon the will of the people, and whenever we wander from this principle we wander away from the basis of our government, and from the only sound basis upon which our government can stand or ought to stand—the will of the people, expressed by representation. That is our government. It is not a pure democracy, where all come up and vote their votes and take part in the discussion, but it is where the elements of the people, by their representatives, come forward and speak, not their sentiments, but the sentiments of the people, the voice of the government. In accordance with the great teachings of our government, I feel that I must ever obey the principles upon which they are founded, and that is to be governed either by the decision of the representatives of the people, or according to the decision of the people. If we cut loose from this principle in our government, whither will we be drifting? There is, then, no restraint. It becomes the mere will, the mere opinion of the individual, and that is not our government. It is an eternal established institution, built upon the voice of the people, expressed through their representatives. That is our government, and if we are not controlled altogether by that principle, then we have no government, though we may think we have. Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe I am a democrat, and I believe the people should rule. I think I am a republican, and I believe the people should rule, through their representation; and representation must either be based upon taxation or upon population. Now take this representation either way, and dare we say that Philadelphia shall not have her fair proportion. I dare not go within myself and ask: "Is it right?" and get the answer that it is not, and then in this Convention vote for a provision which neither my heart nor my intelligence can approve. I dare not.

Other gentlemen upon this floor may, but I am so constituted that I dare not do what my conscience dare not approve. It has been said that an increase in the representation of cities will not work well, because large cities are great ulcers in the body politic, and Philadelphia has been instanced as an example. Words are easily spoken. A man may say anything, and in the heat of excitement and discussion, denounce the representation of this city but if it were denounced a hundred times it would not enlist my sympathy. I know as well as I know anything, that Philadelphians are not any more corrupt than any of the other legislators of this State or any other State. It has been said that we are corrupt. Well, if we are, it is because we have made ourselves so. If I give loose to my passions, and allow them to rule and control me, I would become but a corrupt scoundrel, and what God intended I should not be; but if I leave the better feelings of my nature gain the ascendancy, I am just what I want to be, and just what God intended I should be. I am unwilling to say that God made a blunder when He made me. He made no blunder. If I commit a blunder I alone am responsible; and so it is with regard to cities. If men are aggregated together, and they will not restrain these evil causes, and will not rule themselves as they ought to be ruled, they will, of necessity, become corrupt. Will I be told that mind brought against mind will not work together for the good of society, but that it will, in its aggregate, result in corruption? This may be said to occur in our large cities, but I cannot believe that the aggregate characters of the men and women in our cities only result in corruption.

I know it is true that in our large cities there must be crime and corruption, and the good of society requires that they shall be restrained; but in looking over this Union, wherever you please to go, do any of our States wholly ignore our large cities on account of this crime and corruption? Read the Constitution of the State of Massachusetts, and then can it be said that any of its citizens are ignored in their representation? Go to Illinois—that State from which we are drawing, as it were, the very life-blood of their Constitution—and do they say there that a man in Chicago is not the equal of a man in Springfield? Go to Cincinnati, and tell me is there anything in the Constitution of the State of Ohio that says a man in Cincinnati is not the equal of a man in Columbus or Cleveland? Go to Missouri, and tell me is there anything in the Constitution of that State which says that a man in St. Louis is not the equal of a man in Springfield, down there on their southern line? Why nothing of the kind can be found in their Constitutions. A man in St. Louis is a man; in Chicago he is a man; in Cincinnati he is a man, and in Boston he is a man; and now, in speaking of the corruption of our cities, we come to that place where, if corruption exists on the face of the earth it does there—the city of New York; but does the Constitution of that State say that a man in the city of New York has not the same voice in the government of that State as a man in the county of Ontario, Oswego, Cattaraugus, or any other place in the State of New York? The Constitution of that State contains no such provision; and shall we say in this State, of which we brag as the land of Penn., that a citizen of Philadelphia shall be deprived of the right of representation in the State government? Look for a moment at the population and representation of the various counties in the State. Go to the county of Crawford, with a population of sixty-three thousand, and there they say they are entitled to one Senator. Go to the Tioga district, with a population of fifty-nine thousand, and there you will find that they claim one Senator; but the city of Philadelphia, with an immense population, is to be entitled to one to one hundred and sixty thousand. Now is this republicanism? Is it democracy? And does it accord with the theory of our government? I say I spit upon such a doctrine

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CORSON. Mr. Chairman: I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman: I thank you and the committee. I want to speak out what inwardly I feel, and I do not speak out here, on this or any other subject, anything else. I believe our government is right, and believing that it is right I mean to carry it out philosophically. I do not mean, for the purpose of securing cumulative voting hereafter, to roll one way and look another. I do not mean to do anything of that kind; I mean to say that a man is only one man, and I do not mean to say that he may transform himself into ten or twenty men and then call that democracy. It is not my character of democracy, whether applied to the city or to the country.

But that is foreign to what we are on now. When that comes up we will discuss it. Mr. Chairman, it was said that Philadelphia is an ulcer. My friend, the Senator from the city, did not say exactly that but something approximating to it, and he also said that Philadelphia cannot produce a loaf of bread. Well, I know she cannot, and I know that there is many a field and many a thousand acres in Erie county that cannot produce Philadelphia. I know that they produce what is manufactured here and what I mean is this: You have the New England States; I admire them. They have built themselves up in spite of their climate and in spite of their soil, to manufacture largely and make their mark in this nation, and to-day there is more manufactured in this city of Philadelphia than in all the State of Massachusetts. Yet it is said that Philadelphia is an ulcer. God send to Erie county just such an ulcer!

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I did not intend to say a word on this subject, nor would I do so now, did I not feel called upon by the remarks of the gentleman from Erie, (Mr. Walker,) who has just taken his seat. Whilst approaching the same conclusion to which he has reached, I entirely differ with him in his premises. When the gentleman asserts that the theory of this government, and necessarily of any republican government, is wholly based upon the doctrine of representation by population or taxable, which amounts to the same thing, he makes, in my humble judgment, a very grave mistake.

I ask the gentleman from Erie to recall the history of constitutional law in the United States. When the founders of this Republic met, and agreed upon a fundamental law for our federal national government, in their wisdom they determined to divide the legislative power between two separate, yet co-ordinate branches, a Senate and a House of Representatives. Evidently they did that for the purpose of securing a check upon hasty, inconsiderate, unwise legislation. But, to accomplish this purpose, in order to make the one branch of the legislative department an effectual check upon the other, found it necessary to incorporate and agreed upon essential differences in the organization of these two branches. Four possible and practicable points of difference in organization suggested themselves, and I desire to call the attention of the committee to those four points of difference.

In the first place the two branches were made to differ essentially in the basis of representation, the very point to which the gentleman from Erie has referred. The two Houses of Congress differ upon the principle of the basis of representation. In the organization of the Senate representation rests upon geographical districts, territorial lines, States, and not upon population, as the gentleman from Erie has said. It rests upon States, upon simple, geographical division, and has nothing to do with the question of population whatever, and consequently equality of representation secured to each State. I challenge the gentleman to contradict this statement. The House, on the other hand, was organized on the basis of population and proportional, not equal, representation granted to the several States.

The second essential point of difference in the organization of the two branches of the legislative department of the national government lies in the qualifications of the elections. The same electors who send delegates to the House of Representatives at Washington do not elect the United States Senators. The qualifications of the electors of members to these two branches are entirely different. United States Senators are elected by the State Legislatures. Members of the House of Representatives, on the other hand, are elected by the people of the several States, by ratio of population. Now what is the result of this? That equality of representation is obtained in the Senate, whilst proportional representation is obtained in the House of Representatives. And this result is wholly inconsistent with the theory of the gentleman from Erie who is entirely in error in his preliminary statements.

There are two other points of difference between the organization of the United States Senate and that of the House of Representatives. They are immaterial perhaps, or less material than the two already referred to. They are the length of term of office, and the difference in the numbers which constitute the two Houses. I therefore pass them by, and call the attention of the committee to a historical fact. When the Colony of Penn wheeled into the line of United States, by the adoption of the federal Constitution of 1787, the people of Pennsylvania, at the earliest practicable moment, determined and agreed to modify their organic law, (notably in the legislative department, for under the preceding Constitutions there was but one House of Assembly,) modified it, I say, so as to harmonize in structure and design, in form and principle, with that great model charter under which freedom was won and liberty secured. But right there the Constitutional Convention of 1790, in my humble judgment, made a most fearful mistake. They accepted the form of the Constitution of the United States, and dropped from it the substance—dropped out the two most material points of difference in the organization of these two legislative bodies. They organized their State Senate, not on the basis on which the United States Senate was organized. They left out the two material and essential points of difference, namely, the difference in the basis of representation, and the difference in the qualifications of the electors. They retained the minor, almost trivial points of difference, viz: The difference in mere numbers, and a difference in the length of terms—retained the form without the substance, the shadow without the material, and our Constitution, in this particular, has been but a hollow sham, even unto this day. We, sir, to-day see and know and feel the evils of a Legislature organized wholly on the uniform basis of population. We are without an efficient check.

I will re-call another historical fact which the gentleman from Erie has either overlooked or forgotten. Of the thirteen original States, eight did not fall into this same error. Maryland, in her Constitution, adopted precisely the same principle which was incorporated in the national Constitution. So did Delaware, New Jersey, Connecticut, Vermont, Georgia, North Carolina and Virginia. They all based the representation of their State Senates, not upon population, but upon mere geographical divisions. I call attention to this historical fact, that these eight of the thirteen original States did follow the Constitution of the United States to the very ultimate, and based their Senatorial representation not upon population but upon communities.

And it is worthy of observation that six out of eight of the original States still retain that provision in their Constitutions. I assert that the States of Maryland, New Jersey, Connecticut, Vermont, Georgia and Delaware still base their Senatorial representation not upon population, but upon territorial lines without regard to population at all.

These, Mr. Chairman, are facts of history. They represent the true state of the case in regard to the history of constitutional law in the United States. Now, sir, I do not know how far the people of Pennsylvania are prepared to go in the way of reform; nor do I know how far this Convention—this reform Convention—is prepared to propose radical changes. For one, I unhesitatingly say that we have reached that stage in our history that demands a change in the basis of representation in the Senate of the State. I am firmly and clearly of the conviction that no remedy for the bad legislation of this State can ever be found until the basis of representation in the State Senate is modified and changed. I have no theory of my own to offer. I have no project to lay before the Convention; but I was struck with the practical suggestion of the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) to district the State by a board of commissioners of apportionment. I do not know but I would agree to such a proposition. It has much in it to commend itself to my judgment; but I do say and insist that the time has come when the basis of representation in the State Senate of Pennsylvania must be something else than population. It may be territory without regard to population. It may be based upon a sort of civil service regulation, in which I am free to confess I have but little faith; or it may be based upon the higher qualification of electors, a principle in which I have the greatest faith; or it may be based on two or all three of these or upon something else than these. All I plead for is that the times demand a change of the basis of representation to the Senate of this Commonwealth.

But I want to say, finally, in plain words, not to be misunderstood, that so long as the ratio of population remains the basis of Senatorial representation in the organic law, I will never give my vote to any proposition which aims at restricting or limiting the Senatorial representation of any section of this State.

Let me say to the gentleman from Erie, I am as consistent as he is. So long as population remains the basis of representation in the State Senate, so long by my vote shall Philadelphia, and Pittsburgh, and Berks and every other populous district in this State have all the representation to which they are fairly and justly entitled. However, with this exception, I shall vote to take from Philadelphia and Allegheny and other large districts that fair equivalent of their representation which they ought to be deprived of in consequence of the fractional losses of representation in the districts throughout the country.

Mr. Chairman, my ten minutes are expended and I am done.

Mr. CORSON. Mr. Chairman: I agree with the gentleman from Cumberland (Mr. Wherry) except in this. He says he has no theory by which we can escape from the difficulties in which we seem to be placed by the report of the Committee on Legislature. I have a theory which I propose to offer, but inasmuch as I understand an amendment to the amendment is now pending and it will not be in order. I desire to hear it read merely as a part of my speech which will only occupy two minutes.

Resolved, That every county in the State shall be entitled to one Senator, and the whole population of all the counties divided by the number of counties shall be the basis of Senatorial representation for all cities containing a population exceeding one hundred thousand.

As soon as we can get at this thing, either by voting down the amendments or the whole section, I propose to offer that. And this is the whole scheme of our government. It is the theory that every county, every portion of Pennsylvania which rises to the dignity of a county shall have a Senator at the Capitol of the State. Every State in this Union has two Senators in the National Congress. Rhode Island as well as Pennsylvania, Delaware as well as New York. We hear no complaint from this method, and if in Pennsylvania every county in the State should have one Senator, and all the counties should be summed up in their population and divided by the number of counties, it would give the same representation to every city in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. It would give Philadelphia to-day seven Senators. It would give Allegheny and Pittsburg what she now has, and it would be the fairest and the fullest method of representation which I have yet been able to discover from all the schemes proposed. I hope, therefore, that the report of the Committee on Legislature will be voted down, and that my substitute will be adopted when it comes to that.

This will give every community which rises to the dignity of a county, a community, or county, representative, as such; and by proper measures, to be hereafter proposed and adopted, the equilibrium can be kept up by representation in the House of Representatives according to population. This will give all counties and cities, in their aggregate capacity, and all people according to population, a full, equal and fair representation. It is the plan which was adopted in the formation of our government by our forefathers.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I do not desire, at this time, and after the question now before the committee has been so long and so ably and so fully debated, by other gentlemen, to go over the ground upon which the opinions of the friends and opponents of this measure are based. I rise simply, sir, to protest against what I consider to be a rank injustice, and I am indebted to the gentleman from Fayette (Mr. Kaine) for his very honest speech upon this topic. I believe that he is the first gentleman upon this floor who has called things by their right names. I believe in calling a spade a spade, and I believe in calling jealousy jealousy, and I believe in calling fear of a greater power fear of that power; and the gentleman from Fayette (Mr. Kaine) is the first one who has openly, avowedly and unequivocally stated that he is not in favor of fair play as between the city of Philadelphia and the interior. Other gentlemen have endeavored in various ways to defend this manifest injustice and wrong.

It is, I suppose, an evidence of the weakness of human nature, but it is, perhaps, an amiable weakness which induces men, when they do a wrong, to endeavor to persuade themselves and others that they are actuated by some different motive from that which is the moving power within their minds. Now I confess that of all the different excuses that have been made for this manifestly unjust proposition, the one made by the gentleman from Philadelphia who sits behind us (Mr. Woodward) is, perhaps, the best of the bad reasons, that is to say it at least has the merit of some appearance of plausibility, and some philosophical idea in it, though, I say a wrong one, I will never acknowledge, or put myself upon the record as being of the opinion that a producer of raw material is any better than the man who makes it up into a manufactured state, or is any better than a man of intellect who is no material producer whatever. I will never say that a plow boy is entitled to two votes and a man of parts, refinement and education is entitled only to one. I would give to each exactly what he should have—one vote.

I do not, as I said before, intend to go over the arguments. I have no doubt that every one has made up his mind, and to speak further, it strikes me, would be like addressing a wooden idol, to speak to eyes that see not and to ears that hear not. I rose simply to protest against a measure, which is dictated solely by jealousy of the city and which can be defended on no other ground and not on that. If gentlemen would really look down into the bottom of their hearts and see why they propose to vote in favor of this proposition they would be forced to acknowledge the truth of my charge.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I was interested in the historical narrative which the gentleman from Cumberland (Mr. Wherry) gave us, and his reasons for believing as he does, with regard to representation in the Senate, and I may say that I am opposed to this amendment for the reasons which the gentleman gives for being in favor of it. This matter of representation in the Senate and House, I take it, is, to some extent, at least, a matter of expediency, and it is a matter and a measure on which we may well be guided by the experience and wisdom of those who have gone before us.

Now, I take it, that the Senate of this State, has never at any time been based wholly upon population. The experience of republican governments, and of every government, has shown that two Houses of the Legislature, one to be a check on the other, one to some extent representing a different interest or a different constituency from the other, is a safe and necessary provision. I believe that we have no instance on record of any large nation or people existing as a free government, without some such arrangement as that. And as stated by the gentleman from Fayette, (Mr. Kaine,) when William Penn formed this government, he did not base representation, (nor did his people,) upon population alone, but as he says, the charter gave a different basis. Then in another provision emanating from William Penn in 1701, the assembly was composed of equal representatives from each of the counties, Philadelphia having a larger population, but the other counties, having with her, four representatives each.

In 1776, the Executive Council was formed of one member from each county. In 1790 the Convention which assembled in that year, (and whose wisdom has been so highly spoken of here,) after repeated discussions, after a great many amendments offered, finally settled down to the provision which they adopted, which limits Philadelphia to four members. It could not mean anything else; it is what it did mean, it was the only thing that it did mean, and the Convention of 1837 but followed it. Now the complaint is that injustice is done, if we do not give Philadelphia and Allegheny the representation to which each would be entitled according to population. Well, I say, we never have had representation upon population even in the lower House—we have usually had one member for each county, and the representation has heretofore been based on taxables. I would prefer it now, at least for one of the Houses, and hope that some other basis than mere population will be established by this Convention for the Senate. I look upon it as a safeguard.

We have no jealousy of Philadelphia, and I may say, here, that while this provision has been debated as though it referred to Philadelphia alone, we think that in Allegheny county it will affect us within the next twenty-five years. The man is perhaps present in this assembly who will see Pittsburg a fair rival of Philadelphia, without any jealousy, even if she does not surpass her in population and in wealth within the life of men now living. I hold, then, that this provision will affect Allegheny, and lessen its representation in the Senate. I believe it to be just and right. I believe it to be a safe provision, and therefore favor it. I need not go over the arguments which have been so well adduced here and so well set forth in the article read by the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) from the pen of John C. Calhoun, showing how power concentrates with the wealth and the large representation of a city. It was so in those days, it was so in 1790, it was so in 1837, it is still more so to-day. The relative power of the cities is rapidly growing with the multiplication of railroads, with the concentration of capital, with the increased power of the press, which locates in the great central cities. They control and rule far beyond their population, far beyond their representation, and, to-day, Allegheny and Philadelphia combined, can rule the State. I think this, then, is a safe precedent. I would prefer limiting the proportion, say a certain proportion, not more than one-sixth of the Senate shall be given to any one county. They say to us, and I think I have heard the question asked a dozen times, "what would you do if put in our place?" It is a fair question, and I will answer it.

Let us see what we do when we have power in our own communities, among our own people at home. The city of Pittsburg has its legislative power vested in two city councils. Now, how do we elect them? We elect the lower branch by taxable inhabitants; we elect the select council, not by population, not by taxables, but by wards, and a ward with two thousand inhabitants has the same representation there that a ward with twenty thousand has.

Now let us come home to Philadelphia. I have, lying upon my table here, presented by the courtesy of a member of councils, and an honored member of this Convention, the manual of councils for 1872, and it sets forth the manner in which elections are held. I find by this book that select council in Philadelphia, according to laws passed in 1854 and finally down to 1872, no objection having been made to it, elect their common councilmen by representation of taxables. Each ward has a common councilman for every two thousand taxables, and several wards have as high as five members in common council and some of them have but one. Then we turn to select council. It has precisely the same power as common council, and we find, not population, not taxation, not wealth, not taxables, but wards as the basis of representation; and each of the twenty-nine wards has one representative in select council, and I have not heard of any man in Philadelphia complaining of that as unjust, nor have I heard any man complain that it has ever resulted injuriously. On the contrary, I believe that the experience of every city is that while occasionally there may have been some apparent inequalities, it has been a wise and just provision, and one that should be retained.

Another thing with regard to this particular system of representation. We have seen what the history of representation has been in this State. It never has been based upon population alone. Is it wise now, with the increase of the power of the cities, with their concentrated wealth, and with the press and all the powerful influences that it has to-day, that it did not possess fifty years ago, to change that system? Then another thing; it appears to be pretty well decided, and it is the evident sentiment of Philadelphia, and of Pittsburg I may say also, and probably of all the other cities, that there should be some constitutional provision in regard to cities, which will very largely take away the power of the Legislature to legislate for cities, and that a large portion of that legislative power which, for the balance of the State, is vested in the Legislature shall be vested in the city, in its own local legislature for its citizens.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. J. R. READ. Mr. Chairman: I move that the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes.

The question being upon the motion, it was agreed to.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I thank the committee, and will occupy their attention for but a short time further.

I take it that the legislation that will hereafter be enacted by the State Legislature will be much less for the cities than heretofore—that there will be more legislation for the balance of the State and less for the cities. Is that a reason for changing the law that we have had in regard to the Senate? Is it not rather a reason for still further limiting the powers of great cities—of great money-centres? In answer to the gentleman from Erie, (Mr. Walker,) for whose opinion I have a profound respect, when he speaks of other States, how is it, and how has it been? In the State of New York, up to 1821, the class of men who voted for Senators was a different class from those who were entitled to vote for members of the lower House, and the qualifications were entirely different, and representation was not based on population; and it never was based on population there until long after that date. In 1846, when they framed their new Constitution, while New York city had about one-fourth of the population of the entire State, they gave it but four Senators, but they provided that at the next enumeration the Senators should be divided in accordance with the population, and since that date New York city has had a much larger proportion of representation than it had before; and if we were to draw conclusions, as some gentlemen do, from particular facts, I would say that from that date commenced the degradation of New York legislation, and the power of the city of New York over it. New York city is the Legislature of New York.

I see also by the Constitution of Massachusetts that they do not permit any district in that State to have more than six men, but there is no other State, except Louisiana, Maryland and New York, that is situated as this has been—no other in which a great city so controls the State.

Mr. NILES. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say a few words in behalf of the report of the committee, of which I am a member. I am in favor of restricting the Senatorial power of our great cities; and while I say this I have no feeling, and, I trust, no prejudice against the city of Philadelphia or any other city in the State.

We are here to-day, sir, to amend the organic law of the State, and it seems to me that unless defects are pointed out in the old law, we should make no change in regard to it. I have been not a little surprised at the position that has been taken by the friends of this amendment, the dictatorial manner with which we, who are in favor of this limitation, have been assailed. Why, sir, it has been intimated to us, here on this floor, and by distinguished gentlemen whose leadership I, in the past, have been but glad to follow, that we are committing a great outrage and wrong upon the great cities when we attempt to preserve this restriction that has lived ever since we have had a State organization. And I undertake to say, that when we follow in the line of the Constitution of 1790, which was re-adjudicated or re-considered by the framers of the present Constitution of 1837, and when we follow in the leadership of such lawyers as the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Woodward,) the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) and the gentleman from Fayette, (Mr. Kaine,) I feel that I am in good company in desiring to preserve a few of the old landmarks and restrictions that have been thrown around our organic law for the preservation of the people living in the rural districts.

As I understand it, sir, this is no new theory. This idea of ours, to retain in the organic law of the State this restriction, is not a new idea. I understand that in the mother country, the land from whence most of us have come, and from which we have fashioned our government and taken many of our laws, all of her great cities are restricted in relation to representation in Parliament. The great cities of Ireland and Scotland and of England are restricted. London, including the adjoining municipalities, contains one-seventh of the population of England, and has but one-twenty-ninth of the representation in the House of Commons.

It has long been understood by our best and wisest men, as was shown by the extract read yesterday, from the utterances of that great man, John C. Calhoun, that it has ever been found necessary to preserve the government, that the representation of the population of great cities should be restricted.

A distinguished delegate at large, from Philadelphia, (Mr. Campbell,) said yesterday, if he is correctly reported—I had not the pleasure of listening to his speech—"this limitation"—I read from the newspaper account of it—"this limitation upon the representation of a large city is an anomaly peculiar to our State Constitution, no similar provision being contained in the Constitution of other States, nor having been even suggested in recent Constitutional Conventions."

That position has not been denied by any delegate on this floor, excepting the one or two that have spoken recently.—My purpose, and the only purpose that I have, in obtruding my remarks upon this Convention is, to say that this remark from a very distinguished delegate of this city, who is not only a lawyer, but a law-maker and a law-writer, is at fault, for in six of the great States of the Union to-day, where they have great and over shadowing cities, the same limitations and safeguards have been thrown around them, to protect the more sparsely populated portions of the State. Why, sir, the very State of Missouri, to which my distinguished friend—and I am glad to call him a friend—the delegate from Erie, (Mr. Walker,) referred a few moments ago, when he said that a man in Saint Louis was equal to any man in Missouri, has a limit; and if the committee will take the trouble to refer to the first volume of Hough's "Constitutions," page 793, they will find these words:

"The ratio of representation shall be ascertained at each apportioning session of the General Assembly, by dividing the whole number of permanent inhabitants of the State by the number two hundred. Each county having one ratio or less shall be entitled to one Representative; each county having three times said ratio shall be entitled to two Representatives; each county having three times said ratio shall be entitled to three Representatives; and so on above that number, giving one additional member for every three additional ratios."

So that a voter living upon the northern or western borders of Missouri, according to the organic law of that State, is equal to three living in St. Louis, Springfield or Jefferson City.

The same safeguard is thrown around the representation of the State of Maine, and I refer to these facts to correct the record made by the distinguished delegate from Philadelphia, (Mr. Campbell,) whose speech has gone all over the country. Here is the language of the Constitution of Maine, on this subject: (Same Vol., page 513.)

"Each town having 1,500 inhabitants may elect one Representative; each town having 3,750 may elect two; each town having 6,750 may elect three; each town having 10,500 may elect four; each town having 15,000 may elect five; each town having 20,250 may elect six; each town having 26,250 inhabitants may elect seven; but no town shall ever be entitled to more than seven Representatives."

Yet, sir, some gentlemen would have us believe that we are perpetrating an anomaly and an outrage and wrong upon the cities by the retention of the old constitutional limitation. Maine, in 1870, had a population of 626,000 people, of which Portland had 32,000. Each town of that State having 1,500 inhabitants has one Representative, "but no town shall ever elect more than seven" members, yet Portland, upon the basis of her population, would have at least seventeen members of the House of Representatives. So that Portland lacks, to-day, ten members to give her a full representation on the basis of population.

The delegate from Erie (Mr. Walker) said that a man in Boston was equal to any man in Massachusetts, and he cited this as one of the great States having a great city, where, notwithstanding, there is no constitutional prohibition of the nature referred to. What is the fact? By the Constitution of Massachusetts the Senators are limited to forty in number, and no district shall be entitled to more than six. Massachusetts, in 1870, had one million four hundred thousand inhabitants, of which Boston contained two hundred and fifty thousand. In Boston it takes forty-two thousand inhabitants to be entitled to one Senator, while in the balance of the State it requires only thirty-four thousand.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman turn to the place where the Constitution of Massachusetts is shown to be amended, he will there find that Boston is represented just as any other portion of the State is.

Mr. NILES. Which section does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. WALKER. Whatever section it is that shows the amendment to the Constitution, referring to the districting of the State,

Mr. NILES. I have read from the body of the Constitution. If I find any conflicting paragraph I shall be glad to read it.

In the State of Maryland, where they have the large city of Baltimore, and Baltimore has overshadowed the State of Maryland, just as Philadelphia overshadows Pennsylvania.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: I move that the gentleman's (Mr. Niles's) time be extended ten minutes.

The question being upon the motion, it was agreed to.

Mr. NILES. I thank the committee. I now read from the Constitution of Maryland: (Same vol. pages 569-570.) "Each county in the State, and each of the three Legislative districts of Baltimore city, as they are now or may hereafter be defined, shall be entitled to one Senator, who shall be elected by the qualified voters of the counties, and of the Legislative districts of Baltimore city, respectively, and shall serve for four years from the date of his election," &c.

Now, Maryland, in 1870, had a population of 780,000, of which Baltimore had 267,000. Each county in the State has one Senator, to an average of 15,000 persons, while Baltimore, with her 267,000, is restricted to three Senators, or one for every 89,000; so that 89,000 people in the city of Baltimore, so far as the Senate is concerned, is only equal to 15,000 in the rural districts. Had I time I should read further from the Constitution of Maryland, to show its provisions on this head, but I will content myself with a mere statement or summary of their operation. Every county in the State, having 18,000 inhabitants or less, has two members of the House of Representatives, being, say one for every 9,000, while Baltimore, with her 267,000, is restricted to eighteen delegates, (precisely what Philadelphia has to-day,) being one for every 15,000, or a little more than one-half her share if the representation were not restricted.

Rhode Island, in 1870, had a population of 217,000, of which Providence city had 69,000, being about one-third of the population of the State, yet Providence is, by the Constitution of the State, restricted to one-sixth the representation of the House of Representatives.

Providence is entitled to one Senator, and every town having a population of one thousand five hundred inhabitants has one Senator, and according to her population, upon this basis of fifteen hundred, Providence is entitled to thirty-seven Senators. The State of South Carolina has a population of six hundred and sixty-eight thousand, and Charleston, with a population, in the same year, of forty-nine thousand, is restricted to two Senators. That State gives to each one of her counties one member in her House of Representatives and one member in her Senate. Charleston is restricted to two Senators, and yet we have been told in this Convention, by the hour and by the day, that this provision of our fathers, restricting the Senatorial representation of the city of Philadelphia, which has existed ever since the State itself, is a thing unheard of. There is another subject I desire to refer to before I conclude, if the Convention will indulge me for one moment. Now it may seem unfair, Mr. Chairman, to limit the city of Philadelphia to four members of the Senate, when every county in the State obtains the precise number they are entitled to; but there is another consideration that I have not heard suggested in this Convention. Philadelphia, in the lower House, has no fractions. She loses nothing in the way of fractions, whereas some of the counties of the State lose fractions which almost entitles them to a member. Now the report of the committee, which we are considering to-day, gives a separate representation to every county of thirty-five thousand inhabitants, and a member to every county that has a ratio of three-fifths of the same, making fifty-six thousand. Now, upon the basis of the report which we are considering to-day, the county of Armstrong, with a population of forty-three thousand, has an excess of eight thousand. Bradford county, which adjoins my own county on the east, having a population of fifty-three thousand, has an excess of eighteen thousand. Fayette county, represented by my friend, (Mr. Kaine,) has an excess of eight thousand. Lycoming county, lying upon the south, has an excess of twelve thousand. Venango county has an excess of twelve thousand. Mr. Chairman, your own county of Washington has an excess of thirteen thousand. So that in eighteen counties of this Commonwealth to-day, if we adopt this report of the committee, which has been represented as unjust and unfair to the city of Philadelphia, we have one hundred and seventy-five thousand of the people of this State who will not be represented in the lower House.

It will thus be observed that what we gain in the country by this constitutional restriction in the Senate, the city of Philadelphia re-gains by having no fractional losses in making up her representation in the lower House.

The national government recognizes this same principle in the organization of the United States Senate. Each State there has an equal representation without regard to population. Delaware and Rhode Island have the same vote as Pennsylvania and New York. The great States have suffered nothing from the equal representation of the smaller ones. Experience has demonstrated the wisdom of the men who devised our national Constitution. The Senate is the conservative, the House the popular branch of the government. One is a check and a balance upon the other. If the basis of representation is the same in the Senate and House of Representatives, why not dispense with one or the other? Why have both? One certainly is unnecessary.

I desire to retain this old time-honored restriction from no feeling of opposition to Philadelphia. For her I have nothing but respect. I remember that she is the great commercial centre of our great Commonwealth. I remember that she is the great manufacturing city upon this continent. I well remember that in all the great wars that have afflicted our land and our people, Philadelphia has been as true to freedom and the Union as the needle to the pole. I admit that her wealth has done much to develop the great and hidden resources of the State, and the State in return has, by means of her iron, her coal, lumber, grain and oil, poured untold millions into the lap of this great city. I agree that there should be no antagonism between the city and country—that the true interest of the one is the best interest of the other.

I do not here and now make charges against the city of Philadelphia. During the many long weeks of our session here we have listened by the day, and almost by the week, to eloquent appeals of the very many distinguished delegates from Philadelphia in regard to the frauds perpetrated upon her ballot-box, to the intimidation of voters, to the almost total destruction of the elective franchise. Very many delegates have appealed to the country to save the city from her "rounders," "repeaters" and "ballot-box stuffers." We have attentively listened to the recital of the misuse of her representatives at the State Capitol. Our respected President (Mr. Meredith) told us yesterday, in his own inimitable language, that Philadelphia was not represented by her representatives. That for the last twenty years she had been mis-represented at Harrisburg. That the city was in the hands of irresponsible members "who represent nobody but the little knot of politicians to whom they look for protection."

If this be true (and upon this point I neither affirm or deny,) would Philadelphia be any better off with an increase of representation? If her true interests are sacrificed by her four Senators, would her condition, politically, be bettered by increasing her number to six? Would the condition of the patient be improved by increasing the character and extent of the disease?

Mr. Chairman, I do not admit that population alone is the only basis of representation. It may be the general rule. But there are exceptions. The population of our great cities, living in dense masses with a known and easily understood community of interest, controlled by a powerful and all pervading local press, have much greater strength and a larger degree of political influence than they would have if the same number were scattered over a half dozen sparsely populated counties.

In my opinion no good reason has been shown for breaking down the barrier thrown around the people in 1790, and again re-affixed in 1837. Its repeal is not one of the reforms demanded by the people when this Convention was called. No one has called for its abrogation. No single petition has asked that it be annulled, and yet, without being asked, we propose to wantonly lay hands upon this old landmark of protection to the country. To-day Philadelphia has four Senators. In a few short years Pittsburg will have the same number, giving these two cities eight Senators or one-fourth of representation of the whole State. I submit, Mr. Chairman, ought a time ever come when these two cities shall have more than one-fourth of the representation of the whole State? Our city friends are not satisfied with the present ratio of representation. For all practical purposes the State to-day is absolutely under the control of Pittsburg and Philadelphia. One city organizes the Senate and takes the Speaker and Clerk. The other organizes the House, and takes the Speaker and controls a majority of the important committees. And if such be our condition to-day, I pray you, sir, what will be the situation of the people of the State when all limitations and restrictions are broken down and the country entirely in the hands and at the mercies of our great cities. In the name of the rural district that I have the honor, in part, to represent, I protest against the destruction of this time honored protection of the rural districts, and against the encroachments of the wealth and power of our great and growing cities.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Chairman: I understand the proposition before the committee is the amendment which has been offered, inserting six Senators in place of four, as reported by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is to strike out the proviso.

Mr. BOYD. I was about to observe that if the city of Philadelphia claims only six Senators, she is, indeed, exceedingly modest in her demands, for I certainly shall vote for that number, and I think it quite likely that I shall vote to allow her the same representation as is accorded to other portions of the State. It seems to me simply absurd to say, that the city of Philadelphia should be confined to the number accorded to her by the report of the committee. Why, sir, I understand that under the Constitution of 1790, and under the Constitution of 1837-38, she was allowed but four Senators. Now, if she were entitled to four Senators in 1790, it would seem to me that in 1837-38, she had grown up to a stature that entitled her to at least double that number, and surely if she were entitled to four Senators, and that was considered a just number in 1837-38, she has certainly grown, since that time, to proportions that would entitle her to a number vastly beyond that. I am not one of the members of this Convention ever to be governed by any jealousy of the city of Philadelphia. I have already indicated upon this floor that I can discover nothing in her greatness of which we need be jealous, because as she is great, so the State is great. She has contributed her material wealth and resources to make the State what she is, and so the State has helped to elevate the city of Philadelphia to the high position she now occupies. It has been a mutual benefit all around, and if it be said that because she has a larger number of representatives in the Legislature than come from other portions of the State, it seems to me that whatever mischief exists, is very much modified and corrected by the report of the Committee on Cities and City Charters, of which my friend, Judge Walker, is chairman. According to the report of that committee, and I presume it will be adopted by this Convention, the city of Philadelphia will be, so to speak, a law unto herself, because that committee have reported in favor of allowing her to enact her own local laws, and do her own local legislation for the government of the city.

Now that being the case, it seems to me that her Senators and Representatives are no longer in the condition or position they have been in the past, because it has been said that they have been obliged to trade around with members from the interior for the purpose of securing legislation necessary for the city of Philadelphia. I have no doubt that this has been true in the past, and now that this source of trouble is to be taken away from her legislators, and the city of Philadelphia is to do her own legislation, as a matter of course it will not be necessary for her Senators, in the future, to descend to the means they have been compelled to resort for the purpose of securing that legislation for the city which was conceived to be wise and just; and if, therefore, she is to have the full representation she seems to be justly entitled to, her representatives can go in the Senate of the State and represent not only the city, but the State, because it is difficult to draw a distinction between the State of Pennsylvania and the city of Philadelphia. What is the interest of the one is undoubtedly the interest of the other, and hence if Philadelphia can send to the Legislature an equal number of Senators in proportion to the rest of the State, why she can take a broader and more comprehensive view of important questions that may arise, without being encumbered by this log-rolling system her representatives have been subjected to in obtaining for Philadelphia the legislation to which she was entitled. Therefore it is that I shall vote for the number six, or for whatever number she is fairly entitled to, and it does not make a particle of difference to me, one way or the other, as the gentleman from Fayette (Mr. Kaine) suggested, if she does elect both the Speaker of the House and the Clerk of the Senate. What of that? What a miserable little business it is for the members of this body, who are endeavoring to create a fundamental law for the State of Pennsylvania in the great future, to stand here and discuss questions which seem to involve the simple question whether the city of Philadelphia shall elect the Speaker of the House, and the city of Pittsburg the Clerk of the Senate. Why, sir, so far as I am concerned, I shall favor building up the city of Pittsburg, both by my vote and every act I perform while in this Convention. I would gladly make her the rival and the superior of this city; and, on the other hand, I would vote to build up the city of Philadelphia in all her greatness and in all her glory, so that she shall keep pace with the progress of her State. I shall never, so long as I have a seat in this Convention, ever belittle this city by depriving her of her just rights, and I will here observe that, so far as her Senators, at least, are concerned, she has maintained a respectability and character in those representatives at least, that, considering all things, has been highly creditable to her citizens. The Senators with whom I have been personally acquainted, who have represented this city for the last twenty-five or thirty years, have been a credit to her, and they have been men that could be confided in for the most part. Now my friend from Allegheny (Mr. D. N. White) smiles at this.

Mr. D. N. WHITE. I was smiling "for the most part."

Mr. BOYD. It is to be expected in a city of this kind that the manner of managing their nominating conventions will sometimes produce a miscarriage in the kind of men they send to the Legislature; but the same thing happens in the interior of the State. I know men in the rural parts of the State to be set up by these conventions who have been wholly unfit for the position to which they have been nominated and elected; but it by no means follows as a rule that it is unsafe to resort to this mode of representation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am strongly inclined to favor the proposition of my colleague from Montgomery (Mr. Corson.) I shall spell it out a little more, and if I comprehend his idea correctly, and it is in substance to give to the city of Philadelphia her just proportion of representation, I shall support that proposition, or any other one that looks in that direction.

Mr. BARDSLEY. Mr. Chairman: The subject now under consideration is one that affects the people of the city of Philadelphia more particularly than those of any other part of our State, and as one of the representatives of this city I desire to impress upon this Convention the importance as well as the justice of meting out to the people of this city the same rights and the same privileges that they propose to take to themselves. I submit that equality of rights and equality before the law are the dearest privileges belonging to the American people, and that we are not carrying out the great principles upon which this government is founded, in preventing 800,000 people from exercising the rights that properly belong to them. When we propose to tax the people, and to prevent them from being represented in the legislative body of our State, we strike down the dearest principles which originated with the birth of the United States; for the principal object that induced the United Colonies to sever their connection with England was taxation without representation. The city of Philadelphia pays into the Treasury over two-fifths of the entire yearly revenue of the State.

I submit it is right, or just, or proper, that Philadelphia shall be deprived of the right to have upon the floor of the Senate of this Commonwealth that full representation to which she is actually and legitimately entitled? This section now under consideration proposes that the Senate shall be composed of members in accordance with the population of the State, save only as one proviso, which applies only to Philadelphia, shall limit and restrain the representation of that city. If this Convention adopt any such system, Philadelphia, sir, will yield, but not entirely uncomplainingly. What other portion of the State would so patiently submit, in the face of the fact, that it is manifestly proper and right for both Houses of the Legislature to be composed of representatives according to taxables, as she has for the past sixteen years? This city claims only her just due when she asks, as her full and legal right, that she shall be represented like any other portion of the Commonwealth.

We are met here to form a new Constitution. The distinctions of the old Constitution, where they have operated in the past or operate now unequally upon any part of this State, are of no binding force or effect upon us. We are not to be guided by the existing organic law of this State, or of any other, save as the principles of those Constitutions have proved conservative of the public welfare and promotive of the general weal: The people of this Commonwealth, in calling us into convention, clothed us with their own sovereignty, and vesting in us that high privilege, called us into being to exercise a simple duty, to mete out justice to every citizen of the State.

We are not now, Mr. Chairman, in the possession of the proper representation that we at one time actually enjoyed under the present law on this subject. While to other communities the law afforded just representation, to us it has given less than we once enjoyed under its own restriction. In 1854 the city and county of Philadelphia were consolidated.

Prior to that time we were entitled to, and had on the floor of the Senate, five members. The next apportionment, after the passage of the act of consolidation, reduced that number to four, and to-day this great city, which has grown in wealth and in numbers every year with giant strides, has less representation in the Senate of this Commonwealth than it had sixteen years ago. And yet, during that time, we have steadily maintained our position as the second city in numbers in the Union, and have grown to be the first city of the country in the extent of our manufactures. In this city, annually, we produce $400,000,000 of manufactures, we have 800,000 people, we have 160,000 voters, and I appeal to the justice of the committee, whether we ought to be ostracized because we have gathered within our borders all this immense wealth and this immense population. One thousand voters here ought to have the same right as a thousand voters in any other county of our State. By what right, sir, by what system of calculation can any gentleman say that we ought not to be represented as well as they, that the same number of population within the confines of Philadelphia should not have the same representation which that number would receive outside of this city?

It is only a question of justice; as such, and as such alone, we present it, and ask its decision. If Philadelphia claimed more than any other portion of the Commonwealth, no man here would vote against that claim more willingly than I. But she asks only for the same equality, that throughout this broad Commonwealth is questioned only when the application comes home to her. Is the representation to be equal everywhere else and here be unequal? I trust, sir, and I believe that the common fairness of the members of this Convention, and their innate sense of justice, will lead them to give to this city like privileges and like rights that they propose to give to themselves.

Mr. C. A. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: I did not intend to participate in the discussion of this really important proposition, but as two of the delegates who represent the district that I come from have indicated an intention to support the section as reported by the Committee on the Legislature, I desire to give, very briefly, the reasons why I have come to a different conclusion. I regard this proposition as one of the most important that has been or will be presented to the Convention. So far, the advocates of this limitation have, in my judgment, made no serious effort to defend it on principle. The whole argument has been based upon expediency, or upon policy, and nothing else. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been taught, and almost every man of both parties has been taught, that in a country like this, where the people are presumed at least to rule, where all power is supposed to come from them, the true democratic basis of representation is population, and population alone. It is not only the doctrine we have learned from our childhood, but all who have been here since the revolution have learned the doctrine, that the only true basis of representation in a democratic form of government is population. It is the doctrine that we have all learned from the books. From Bentham, from Mill, and others, who have felt and written upon the evils of a different system in England, and from Jefferson, and Madison, and Hamilton, who framed or expounded our admirable Constitution, and taught us to believe that the true basis of representation is population. I do not pretend to say, nor do I believe, that the doctrine of representation, based solely and exclusively upon population, can be carried out to its logical results. There may be, necessarily, some departure from the principle, for instance, where some arbitrary division or boundary of territory would interfere with its complete operation. But I do maintain, that wherever we can do so, we are bound to give every portion of the State a just and equal representation, independent of the accidents of wealth or density of population, or violate the principle upon which our republican institutions are founded. At least so it appears to me. I repeat, that the advocates of this invidious limitation have, in my judgment, failed to sustain it on principle. Indeed, so far, I think they have scarcely attempted to do so. The delegate from Fayette, (Mr. Kane,) and I refer to him the more willingly, though kindly, because we hail from the same district, grounds his argument in favor of the proposition upon the assumed fact that it has always been so. It is a bad argument, even if the fact be so, for he and I have learned from the same authority that a vicious usage should be abolished. But has it always been so?

The accomplished President (Mr. Meredith) told us how it got into the Constitution of 1838, and as for that of 1790, I think it will require a very forced construction to find the limitation there. And as to the Provisional Constitution, if such it can be called, of 1776, it can scarcely be regarded as authority. The attempt to find any analogy in the Constitution of the United States, taken in connection with the history of its formation, is equally unfortunate. My friend, and the gentlemen who have spoken upon the proposition, seem to overlook the reasons which resulted in the incorporation in the federal Constitution of the principle which they regard as sustaining their position. The purpose of the framers was to establish an Union of separate States, of separate and independent sovereignties. Unlike our cities and counties, which are but parts of the whole, and separated, or rather divided, into communities for mere municipal purposes, the States were not only sovereign, but, as to each other, foreign sovereignties. The smaller States, such as Delaware, Rhode Island, New Jersey, and others, fearful of being absorbed or their independent sovereignty in some way abridged, refused to become members of the Union, unless they were, to some extent, made the peers of the greater States. This was effected by making them equal in the Senate, and it was done for that purpose alone. It was conceded, virtually, at least, by Mr. Madison, Mr. Mason, Mr. Wilson, and other leading members of the Convention, that in the absence of this reason, Senators would have been elected like members of the House of Representatives. If my recollection of this portion of the history of the formation and adoption of the federal Constitution be correct, and I think it is, it furnishes but little authority, I submit, for the position taken by the gentlemen.

MR. KATNE. Mr. Chairman: Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

MR. C. A. BLACK. Certainly!

MR. KATNE. Mr. Chairman: I want the gentlemen from Greene to say whether the old Continental Congress was not a merely representative body, and whether there was any Executive authority during the existence of that body, and when the States came to form the Constitution of the United States, whether the Senate of the United States was not put in there simply as a check upon the representative branch?

MR. C. A. BLACK. No, sir! It was put in for the reason I have adverted to; to protect the smaller States, and nothing else. Mr. Madison expressly declared that if it had been a merely consolidated government, a homogenous government, if I may use such a term, then the representation would have been based upon population, and the members of the Senate would have been elected in the same way as the members of the lower House. He so expressly stated, on the floor of the Convention, and afterward in Virginia; and to my mind there could have been no other reason why the Senate was so constructed. If the government had been a consolidated one, I can readily see why the basis would have been population, and the upper branch of the national Congress not have been constituted in the manner in which it was done.

The Constitution of the Senate of the United States then, taken in connection with its history, should have but little weight, I think, in the solution of this question. It was a matter of policy, of sheer expediency, and did not contravene or affect the great principle of popular representation. The framers of the Constitution could not have so intended it. They were too fresh from the conflict of the revolution to forget that taxation without representation is tyranny; that all power emanating from the people, the right to be represented in the law-making body should be equally enjoyed by all. To my apprehension the weakest argument of all is the allegation that the Senate is necessary as a check upon the House of Representatives. Granting it to be the case, would the Senate be less a check, if all were elected from a single locality? The check, if necessary at all, arises from the existence of the body after election, not from the manner of the election or location of the members. Were it necessary, I think it could be shown that this idea of the upper House, being a check upon the lower, never had a legitimate existence, either here or in England, from whence the plan of two Houses in Legislation was derived. In England the House of Lords existed centuries before the Commons were called into existence, and when it was done, it was for a very different purpose than to be subject to the check of the upper House. But this is of no consequence here.

It is urged in support of this limitation that cities, being non-producing, the preponderance of representation should be in favor of the rural or producing districts. But, sir, I have learned from writers upon political economy, if common sense did not teach me that much, that whoever contributes to the comfort and happiness of society is a producer; and that there are others besides those who produce grain and meat, and iron and coal that do this. The man who plans and builds a ship, a house, or a steam engine, is just as much a producer as he who furnished the crude material from the forest or the mine. Nay, the man who writes a valuable book, or the man who fashions a great invention, are just as much producers as he who by manual labor produces the food that sustains the life of the writer or inventor. I need not refer to what Philadelphia has done and is doing in these respects. Vast as her productions and creations are, the enumeration is not necessary to my purpose. Besides they have been already fully adverted to. Great cities, I know, have been regarded by many with apprehension. Mr. Jefferson likened them to great sores upon the body politic. I doubt, if living, he would apply the term to Philadelphia or any of our American cities. With our advanced civilization, I hardly think such a term can be justly applied; certainly not to such a city as Philadelphia. It need not be denied, if it could, that large cities naturally develop a large amount of crime, much more perhaps than the rural districts. The facility for concealment, and, perhaps, the increased incentives to crime resulting from the greater degree of luxury, and other causes, naturally induce such development. But then, they do a vast deal to prevent and punish crime; immeasurably more than is ever necessary in the country. They have much mendicancy, vagrancy, and perhaps suffering, far more than could exist in a rural population; but how much more munificent and efficient are they than any country population could be for the alleviation of human suffering, and comfort and protection of the weak and helpless. There can be no more magnificent or interesting spectacle than that exhibited by our great American cities in providing means for educational, charitable and reformatory purposes. And in the great productive and industrial enterprises the great bulk of the necessary capital has undoubtedly been furnished by the more opulent and liberal cities. It is unnecessary, perhaps it would be somewhat invidious, to refer to the amount of taxes they furnish for the support of government; and especially by the city of Philadelphia. We should bear in mind, however, in this connection, that taxation has always carried with it the right of representation. The chairman of the committee that reported this proposition read the opinion of Mr. Calhoun, deprecating the power of great cities, growing out of their great facility for concentration. But granting the existence of this power of concentration, what antagonism can naturally exist between the city and the country? The members of the Senate from the city would have but their numerical strength. They would have the weight of their own members and no more. Other members of the body would have the same power of concentration in case of any concerted movement against any other part of the State, or in support of an improper measure. I cannot understand how such attempt, if made, could ever prevail.

Then if we intend to give up true democratic principles you can impose this limitation on the city of Philadelphia. I hold that every citizen is entitled to representation in the law-making power, and if that be a just and a sound principle, how can you say, as this section proposes, that you will give all of the State its proper representation except Philadelphia, which shall have but a portion of what it is justly entitled to.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Unanimous consent was given the gentleman from Greene to proceed ten minutes more.

MR. C. A. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: I thank the committee for their kindness. But I do not desire to say any more. I wished only to vindicate the reasons why I must differ with my friend from Fayette (Mr. Kaine) and my friend from my own county (Mr. Purman.) I think. they are wrong in their conclusion. They have not attempted, in my opinion, to defend their position on principle, nor can it, I think, be defended on any just grounds.

Mr. M'CLEAN. Mr. Chairman: I apprehend we have reached one of the most important and vital questions that has arisen in this Convention, and I am glad to see a disposition on the part of the committee of the whole to extend the debate. For my part I am decidedly, and have always been, in favor of the principles as I find them incorporated in the present Constitution of Pennsylvania. In referring to that Constitution we find that representatives are distributed in proportion to the number of taxable inhabitants in the several parts of the State; and when we examine the mode of constituting the Senate, we find it is provided that Senators are to be chosen by districts. I have watched the course of this debate with a great deal of interest, and I have listened in vain to the able gentlemen who have addressed the Convention upon this subject for any valid argument for abolishing the important distinction between the formation of the Senate and the formation of the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania. The arguments of all the delegates from the city of Philadelphia, including the honorable President of the Convention himself, I might say, have been based throughout wholly upon the one ground that there should be representation according to population. I say I have listened in vain to hear one of these gentlemen refer to the manifest distinction between the two branches of the Legislature. For my part I am opposed to any restriction so far as concerns the House of Representatives. Let the House of Representatives be formed strictly according to population, and let there be no limitation upon Philadelphia or any other part of the State in that branch of the Legislature. But I apprehend that gentlemen, out of their warmth of affection for their city, have forgotten not only the history of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, but of the former Constitution of our own State. I was deeply impressed with the remarks of the gentleman from Cumberland (Mr. Wherry.) I believe much light was thrown upon this question by those remarks, and that he reached the very core of the question when he said that the representation of the people in the Senate should be by districts or territory, and not according to population. Sir, if that is not so, why should there be a provision made for an upper branch of the Legislature, if the Legislature is simply to be a representation of the people according to population? Why not abolish your Senate then? It is intended, I submit, as a check upon legislation, and is one of the wisest provisions placed in the Constitution of the United States, and of all the States in this Union. I say that it has seemed remarkable to me that the able gentlemen from this city and from other parts of the State, who are opposing a restriction upon their representation as an innovation upon their rights, do not reach this argument as to the essentially different theories involved in vesting the legislative power in the two branches of the General Assembly. I hope this body is not about committing a fatal and terrible error, as I fear it will do, if they forget and abolish this distinction between the two branches of the Legislature.

Mr. C. A. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Was the Constitution of the United States, in reference to Senators, adopted upon this principle of limitation?

Mr. M'CLEAN. I understand it so, just as I have stated during the course of my remarks, and the scheme is a beautiful one. We are fatally destroying its basis, and great and peculiar advantages, by the amendment which proposes to strike out the proviso reported by the committee. I would appeal to the gentlemen from this city, and from other parts of the State, who are in favor of wiping out this limitation, to pause and reflect before they commit this fatal mistake, as I apprehend it will be. Unless the Convention places all the sections of the State upon the original basis and principle of representation in the Senate, the interior counties of the State, with all their interests, will be ground to powder, as between the upper and the nether millstone. I do not say this out of any sectional jealousy of the cities, but because I believe a blow is aimed at the fabric of the government under which we have so long prospered, and I hope, therefore, gentlemen will reflect before they commit this appalling error.

Mr. CASSIDY. Mr. Chairman: After the elaborate discussion of the question now before this body, I hesitate to occupy the time of the Convention, and only do so because I feel that I would be derelict in my duty to a city where I have lived all my life, if I did not say a word or two in behalf of her claim to be considered, so far as representation is concerned, upon the same footing as other parts of the State. I have listened, attentively, to the speeches of those who have addressed the Convention to hear something in the way of reason in favor of this amendment or of any proposition that limits the right of a city or county to representation, and I confess that I have listened in vain. I think I do not speak lightly of the views presented, and do not fail to appreciate their full force when I say that no word has been uttered or sentence pronounced in this Convention that invalidates the fundamental proposition, without which free government cannot exist, that representation ought to be based upon population and that taxation without representation is tyranny. In calling your attention to an axiom of government as old as this, it may be considered unnecessary, and yet if we have paid any attention to the course of the discussion in this Convention we find that nearly all that has been said has been in direct violation of that principle of republican government. The gentlemen who have advocated this amendment, not being able to furnish any sound reason in support of their views, have endeavored to place the question of representation upon some other basis than that of population, and I confess again that I have not been able to understand the course of their remarks. If representation is not to be based upon population what is it to be based upon? Is it to be based upon wealth? I should very much regret it if representation was so based, but I need hardly say that Philadelphia and Pittsburgh would find in it no cause for complaint, but it would be anti-democratic and wholly unrepubli- can. Is representation then to be based upon the question of territory? I cannot say that I would object to such a representation. If all the counties of the State are to have each an equal number of representatives, I cannot say that I would object, but it would not be based upon any rule of reason I know of or any rule of government that I ever heard of. Therefore the question of representation comes back to the only other basis upon which it can be safely rested, and that is population.

As far back as the Constitution of 1776, of which some of our friends are so fond, and to which they have been accustomed to refer during the course of this debate, we find the very sentiment uttered and reiterated, and impressed upon the Convention then, and circulated throughout the land, that taxation without representation is tyrannical. For the purpose of calling the attention of the Convention to this sentiment, in turning to a volume of the Debates of the Convention of 1837-38, in a speech made in that body by the honored President of this Convention, reciting a section of the Constitution of 1776, we find that Convention starting with the proposition I am now advocating: "Representation in proportion to the number of taxable inhabitants is the only principle which can at all times secure liberty and make the voice of the majority of the people the law of the land." Nobody in this State ever hesitated to endorse this doctrine till now, and now it is to be determined that this sentiment of self-government shall not apply to people gathering together in large numbers in our cities. This proposition, I have stated, underlies the very existence of our form of government. The people have nowhere suffered from the adoption of this principle, and what is to be feared at this day from the inculcation of this doctrine in our State? I know it has been said, and will be said, perhaps, hereafter, that the rural districts of our State have much to fear from the concentration of large numbers of people in a given place. Why, sir, in the light of the advancing civilization of the hour there is, practically, no concentration of people or persons anywhere. The telegraph, the railroad facilities, and the various means of inter-communication have wiped out of existence everything like the organization of numbers of people akin to each other in habits, feelings or sentiments, and the interests of one section of the State of Pennsylvania have become identified with the interests of the people throughout the State. There is not a pulsation of the public heart the beat of which is not felt by all the people. If the tide of prosperity or reverse flows through the metropolis of the State its influence is felt not only in the extreme south-western counties of Fayette and Greene, but upon the shores of Lake Erie and along the eastern slopes of our mountains, as much as it is on the shores of the Delaware. If disaster overwhelms the people of Allegheny, are not its effects immediately felt in the city of Philadelphia? We are legislating for the people; not for cities, not for counties, not for large numbers concentrated here and there, but for the entire people of the State; and I submit, therefore, that the only fair and just way to reach the desires of the people of the State is to regard the question of population the only basis upon which an equitable representation can be made.

But, sir, a gentleman in this Convention, (Mr. Woodward,) who has earned a distinguished position in the history of this Commonwealth for learning and statesmanship, rises in his place and states, upon this floor, that the city of Philadelphia ought not to be treated like the rest of the State, for among other reasons, the remarkable one that "we are non-producers." Non-producers! I would like to introduce that gentleman to some of his constituents, if he thinks they are non-producers. Let me tell that gentleman, if he has not already heard it, that in one ward of the city of Philadelphia—the Nineteenth—more ingrain carpets are made than all England produces.

There are more shoes manufactured and produced in this city than in the famous marts of Massachusetts. Let me tell him, if he does not know it, that one establishment in the city of Philadelphia makes and exports more saws than formerly were imported from, and that the fame of that one establishment goes throughout the land, as one of the best producers of the world. The gentleman has forgotten, for he knows too much of literature not to know, that the house of J. B. Lippincott & Co., of this city, is the largest book publishing and distributing house in the world. Non-producers a term to be addressed to us when our productions annually exceed four hundred millions of dollars, and exceeds, by fifty millions every year, the importations of the city of New York, and exceeds its imports by one hundred millions every year? I could go over what must be familiar to him, and call his attention to the iron interests, the dry goods interests and the woolen interests, with its millions of money involved in them, but it is surely unnecessary. I trust we shall not again hear the term non-producers applied to the city of Philadelphia. My friend from the State at large (Mr. Woodward) also said, I think, "what would the city be without the country?" They have built it up. Let me ask him, in a better spirit, I trust, what would your rural districts be without the markets of the city? Of what earthly value to your farmers would be their grain, if there were no place to sell it, and no place to take it! Is not the capital and enterprise and energy of the city, every day, opening markets for the sale of your goods, thus adding to your wealth, and does not that all prove that there is nothing for the benefit of city that is not for the benefit of the country, and that their interests are entirely reciprocal. Surely it is so, and assuredly it is true, that every dollar we earn, and every sentiment we originate by which the love of popular government is diffused, and struggling humanity throughout the earth aided, adds not to our fame, but to the glory of our grand old Commonwealth.

I have heard, I regret to say, some denunciations of Philadelphia on this floor. We are not without fault, and some grievous ones, too, perhaps, as I take it for granted can be found in every city of eight hundred thousand or a million inhabitants; but I am here to say, in behalf of this city, that a better governed city, and one in which there is less crime, and I say it advisedly, does not exist upon the earth. As compared with London, or Paris, or New York, or Chicago, or even Boston, the city of Philadelphia shows a greater exemption from crime than any of them; while the assaults and batteries and petty crimes that will be found always in large cities, the terrible offences against society and the law are almost unknown.

Beyond, Mr. Chairman, the wealth of this city, for which I am not here to speak, I appeal in behalf of the rights of that large number of toiling men and women who compose a large part of my constituents, hard-working, earnest people, about whom our President spoke so well the other day. These people who occupy a greater part of the one hundred and thirty-seven thousand houses of this city, most of which they have earned and own, I am here to ask that those men—freemen—the equal of any people of the globe, shall have the freeman's right, that of representation according to their numbers. Is there any hardship in this, Mr. Chairman?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHN PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I move that the gentlemen have leave to proceed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CASSIDY. Mr. Chairman: I am very much indebted to the committee for their courtesy, but I feel that I ought not, in view of how much has been said on this subject, and so much better than I can hope to say it, to consume more time. I know, Mr. Chairman, that the desire of this committee is to do all that is right to do, and I can therefore have no fear of the committee being governed by the jealousies and rivalries that one of my colleagues spoke of. Such sentiments belong to the past. We live in the age where man has been able to direct the lightning and has practically annihilated space. The iron bands of the Commonwealth bind together all parts of the State, and the telegraph makes us all neighbors.

No, Mr. Chairman, the city and country are rivals in nothing except in good works. The question for our consideration is far beyond personal or local rivalry. It is one of grave principle. We are asked to place in the fundamental law, under which we and those who come after us are to live, a principle that is anti-republican and anti-democratic. In the name, Mr. Chairman, of the toiling people of this city, in the name of the people who bear the burthen of at least one-fourth of the expenses of this Commonwealth, in the name of one-fifth of the population of the State, I protest against the adoption of any rule that seeks to establish the proposition that the residents of cities are not the equals of the residents of other portions of the State.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman: I will not detain the committee long, but as this debate has taken a wide range, I feel it my duty to offer a reason or two for the vote that I shall give. I cannot say, sir, that I am in favor of the report of the committee, but I must say that I am in favor of a restriction upon the representation in the Senate of the larger communities, and I have endeavored to condense what I have to say as much as possible, so as not to consume the time of the committee.

The reasons for a vote in favor of the proposed restriction, and the reasons against such restriction, have each claimed their support upon principles of government. The representatives from the city say that the restriction is unjust, because they do not have a fair representation according to population, and some of their supporters from the country say that a man in the city should be the equal of a man in the country. Principles of democracy have been appealed to, and facts of population and taxation have been invoked, to uphold a full representation according to population. But, sir, what is government, which in this country consists principally in the legislative power? It is a system of compromises. This apothegm was uttered by the great Edmund Burke, who has been referred to by one gentleman from Philadelphia. The whole of his observation is as follows: "All government, indeed every common benefit and enjoyment, every virtue and every prudent act, is founded on compromise and barter. We balance inconveniences. We give and take." The question, sir, of the rights of Philadelphia is therefore to be considered, not abstractly, but with reference to the rights and interests of other communities.

This question has been argued as though the only object of a representation in the Senate of the State was to take care of the interests of the particular community the member represents, while it is forgotten that the representative is a member of the legislative power of the State, elected to legislate for the whole State, and to pass general laws. If the system of local legislation, which, it is universally admitted, has been abused is to continue, then I can understand why the city of Philadelphia should be so jealous to have what they call a full representation in the Senate; but if that is to be restrained, the members elected are to legislate for the entire State. Philadelphia sends her representatives for that purpose. In one House she has full representation; but what is objected to, on the part of the country, is an undue preponderance in the other House when there may come up questions of antagonism of interests.

Why two legislative bodies have been deemed necessary is no longer a question. It was thought by the founders of our national and State governments, for the preservation of constitutional liberty, that an upper House should be constituted in some select manner to be a check upon hasty legislation. The question before us then is, how shall this upper House be constituted. It is a subject of compromise, a subject of barter. There is no question of popular sovereignty connected with it, in my opinion; but only as to the proper means to provide for the best government and best legislative system to protect the interests of the entire State. If gentlemen would take that view of the subject, the view that all government is founded on compromise, and that it is the province of government, and the object of the legislative system to protect the interests of the entire State, I do not think there ought to be any hesitation in supporting limitations or restrictions of any kind which may be necessary, so that the interests of the entire Commonwealth may, through the legislative power, be protected, and proper laws be passed for the greatest good of the greatest number.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: Am I at liberty to address the committee again?

Mr. NEWLIN. I move that the gentlemen have leave to speak twenty minutes upon this subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I do not propose to take up much of the time of the committee, but I am obliged to gentlemen for their disposition to listen to me. I rise to refer, sir, very briefly, to the course of debate that has taken place. When the report of the Committee on Legislature was brought in, I found in it, sir, a provision that has been in all our Constitutions from the beginning of our history, and I heard a disposition expressed and a motion made on this floor to strike it out. It seemed to me that the reasons were entirely inadequate, and I took the liberty of expressing my hope that this venerable provision of our Constitution should be permitted to remain. Nobody had complained of it, either in Philadelphia or out of it. I saw no reason for expunging it from the Constitution. I restrained myself very carefully in the observations which I submitted to the committee at that time. I said, expressly, as any gentleman will find who refers either to the notes of the stenographer or to his own memory, that I would not discuss the grounds upon which great municipalities were generally restrained in representation in legislative bodies. I said I believed there were reasons lying down in the foundation of our social structure that would justify such limitations; but I would not go down to develop them. One gentleman might find one class of reasons; another another. It was so with those who have restrained this provision in our Constitution. Their reasons may have been various. I did not enter into any invidious comparison of the city with the country.

In 1837 when this subject was under discussion, Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, in a speech to which I have referred, and which I have now lying before me, did assail Philadelphia most unjustly, and was replied to triumphantly by the President of this Convention.

Mr. Stevens charged that Philadelphia had opposed the internal improvement of the State, and had withheld her votes whenever the people of Pennsylvania wanted canals and railroads, unless they led directly to this city. The record was against him, and it was shown so to be. I knew that that was not a proper line of remark, and I did not pursue it. I do not believe in it. I made no assault upon the city of Philadelphia. Not one word escaped me that could be construed into an assault upon the city. My observations were few, and they were submitted with great deference, as my observations always are.

Among the replies which these observations drew forth was one from the gentleman from Philadelphia, who sits behind me, (Mr. Biddle,) in which he discovered in his researches into the anatomy of the body politic, that Philadelphia was the heart of the Commonwealth, and that from this fountain all the currents of health and strength flowed through the arteries and veins down to the extremities. To that speech I replied in another speech. In replying to that observation made by a Philadelphian, a gentleman whose sympathies are exceedingly intense in regard to everything, Philadelphian, I say that in replying to that argument—if indeed it could be called an argument—my eyes lighted upon the venerable figure of the founder of Pennsylvania, as it hangs over your head, sir, and I remembered that that founder did not plant the heart of Pennsylvania in the city of Philadelphia, and I told the Convention that when he tried his English colonists and found them malecontents on his hands, he went into the German States and formed German emigrant societies in the principal cities of the continent of Europe, and brought them into this State and placed them in the limestone valleys of Pennsylvania, and they formed the basis of the population of Pennsylvania as it is to-day.

In the course of my remarks on that point, in reply to the gentleman's anatomical argument, I did say—the observation escaped me somewhat as Mr. Wallace's observation escaped him when he addressed the Supreme Court as gentlemen, and apologized therefore by saying the word escaped him in the "heat of debate"—did say that the seven hundred thousand people who inhabited Philadelphia could not raise their bread. I might have said—what I did not—that every citizen of this great city is warmed with the coal that the industry of the country sends to us, and that every man, woman and child in the city is fed with the bread and milk and butter and beef which the country sends us. I say I might have enlarged on this, but, surrounded as I am, by so many gentlemen of intelligence, and knowing as I do that hints are all they need, I did not enlarge upon the subject. I did suggest that one passage in our history, in replying to my friend from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) not by way of assailing Philadelphia, but by way of saying that the people who manufacture in Philadelphia are an inferior race of beings to the people who raise bread in Lancaster and Berks and Chester counties; that was not my argument. But I did refer to this historical fact in order to vindicate the truth of history, in order to show these gentlemen that Pennsylvania was not originally a manufacturing State; that it was not founded as such, and that it was founded as an agricultural State; and, sir, William Penn, if he could speak from that canvas, would tell us that he brought men here to cultivate the soil, and he brought the best people for that purpose that the world ever seen. They knew what good land was, and they knew how to use it. They spread themselves over Pennsylvania, and laid foundation of the all our prosperity, social, economical and political. Now, sir, for this, as I thought, very innocent reference to the history of my native State, I have been held up here for two days, a spectacle for men and angels. [Laughter.] I have been denounced in every phrase in which the politeness of Philadelphia could allow itself to express itself; and with that ineffable wit which that famous "farmer" from York county (Mr. J. S. Black) knows so well how to use, that famous farmer who will tell you that his wheat costs him twenty-one dollars a bushel and he gets two for it. [Laughter.] Why, Mr. Chairman, I do not wonder that these gentlemen—my friend here (Mr. Cuyler)—who serves a corporation that rules Philadelphia and Pennsylvania, and which, I believe, is going to rule the whole Union if not the whole world—and the other gentlemen. I do not wonder that these gentlemen improve the opportunity to make speeches that will tickle the ears of Philadelphians. I do not blame them. They say: "Here, sir, you are one of our colleagues, and yet you have ventured to allude to a historical fact, that does not tend to prove that Philadelphia is the heart of the republic."

Now on that text I do not blame these urbane gentlemen for discussing Philadelphia—the glory of Philadelphia and the greatness of its manufactures. It is their vocation. I honor them for it. But these volunteers from the country, [laughter,] this famous "farmer" from York, and my distinguished farmer friend from Centre county, (Mr. M'Allister,) and other gentlemen, rush in to the rescue of imperilled Philadelphia. I wish they were all in their seats to-day, sir; I should have something to say to my friend from York county (Mr. J. S. Black) if he were here, but he shot his Parthian arrow at me and fled, in which there was more of discretion than of courage. I will, therefore, let him escape as he has escaped; but what business has any farmer in the interior to arraign me for having aspersed Philadelphia, and cause a newspaper of last evening to state that "he replied, triumphantly, to the aspersions of Mr. Woodward on Philadelphia." I deny, sir, that I ever aspersed Philadelphia; but, in justice to myself, I will say that, since I have lived in Philadelphia, and long before, there never has been a movement of this great community with which I have not strongly sympathized.

Recently we have a project of ocean steamers, we have a project of municipal reform, we have a project of Centennial celebration. I, sir, am booked for all these, and have been, and shall continue to be. If any man chooses to eulogize the manufacturing interests of Philadelphia, I listen to him with satisfaction and pleasure. I said nothing on that subject. My course of remarks did not lead me to discuss manufactures. I was discussing the fundamental principle of the prosperity of Pennsylvania, and I found it in the agriculture of Pennsylvania. The gentlemen, however, have paraded statistics, and have shown the uncounted millions of the manufactures of Philadelphia. All well. I rejoice in the prosperity of Philadelphia as much as any man. It is all right for these gentlemen to talk of the greatness of Philadelphia in this regard. What I say is, that it is no answer to the history to which I alluded. It is no answer to the proposition that the foundation of the prosperity of Pennsylvania is to be found in the hard working sons of toil who have inhabited our valleys and mountains, who have disembowled our iron ore and coal, and who have made Pennsylvania almost equal to Great Britain, because Pennsylvania abounds in those very resources of wealth which has made England what she is. These are the fountains and the sources of our prosperity. It is from this source the life blood of all our industries has flowed.

The manufactures of Philadelphia, developed, founded and built upon this foundation, is a subject upon which I have not uttered one word by way of aspersion, and that editor or that member who charges me with having done so charges me with that which is false. So, also, in regard to the assertion that I had said that the people of Philadelphia were an idle and thriftless race of people. I appeal to every gentleman on this floor to bear me out when I say that no such word ever escaped my lips. No such thought was ever in my mind. I know the contrary. I know right well not only what the vast manufacturing operations of this city are, but I know also that in no city, in ancient or in modern times, has there been such a development of the christian charities of life as you will find in this city of Philadelphia; and I believe now, and say so with great pleasure, that there is no city to be found, either in our own country or in any other, where there is less vice or wrong, or outrage, than in this city of Philadelphia. And, sir, when all that is conceded and said, what then? Shall every man in Philadelphia be counted in the basis of representation in the Senate? Shall every man in this vast community be counted? Why, I suggested that while population was the general rule in regard to representation, like all other general rules, it had certain necessary practical exceptions; and this had been found to be one, that great compact communities should not be represented in the same proportion in which rural populations should, the reasons for which I forebore, I repeat, from stating, and left gentlemen to explore these reasons for themselves.

Conceding that Philadelphia deserves all the eulogies that have been pronounced upon it on this floor by her admirers, domestic and foreign, [laughter,] conceding all this, I nevertheless say that she is a vast aggregation of population. And I am not responsible for the thought that humanity, like manure, cannot bear packing. [Great laughter.] If you look at the weeds that grow around a heap of manure, you see how entirely worthless, though rank, they are. But you scatter that manure and you fertilize the whole land, and you produce fruits that are pleasant to the eye and good to the taste. It is not Philadelphia, but it is London, it is New York, it is Paris—it is any city in which you pack human beings. You bring there the refugees of all the penitentiaries. You bring all the fraudulent practices that the ingenuity of man has invented. You bring them there, not because it is the city of Philadelphia, or some other city, but because these great cities are the hiding places of just such rogues and cut-throats and thieves. You find them in all cities. Philadelphia is not peculiar, or if she be peculiar, she is peculiar perhaps in the smallness of that kind of population: but she has that population in common with all the other cities of the earth. It is in consequence of the aggregation of individuals that you find such burglars, and thieves, and counterfeiters and gamblers—but I need not enumerate the whole catalogue of vicious men. You all know them as well as I do, and I say, sir, that their tendency to cities is as sure, by some law, as the law of gravitation.

Now, when my friend, the famous farmer from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) insists that every man of these fellows shall be counted in the basis of representation, and other gentlemen enlarge upon the intelligence and culture and virtue of most of the population of Philadelphia, what do you say? Is there any force in that argument? You don't find that class of people in country and rural districts, simply because they cannot hide themselves there. Exchange the rural population and the urban population of virtuous people, and the case will be exactly the same. It is not a comparison, nor is it fair for gentlemen to institute a comparison between the culture and intelligence and the virtue of this city, and say that these things are untrue, when it is notorious that in fact they are true. No, sir! I will take the testimony of the Reform association of this city, as respectable a body of Philadelphians as can be found anywhere, and I say that if what they have told us and laid on our desks be half true, Philadelphia is, if not the most corrupt city in the world, at least within the same general rule which applies to cities at large all over the world.

Mr. CUYLER moved that the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes. This was unanimously agreed to, and Mr. Woodward resumed.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I do not intend to occupy much more of your time; but these foundations of government were laid by our fathers, and are being re-laid by us. And, sir, a large experience governed them and must govern us. It is not a question of right. Some gentlemen argue it as if every one of the lazaroni that are found in our cities has a right to be represented. Sir, the right of representation is exactly according to the fundamental law that a community agree upon; and when that much often quoted and much misunderstood expression in the Declaration of Independence is cited, "that all just government is founded in the consent of the governed," that is what it means. That in the origin and foundation of our political institutions, a community consent and agree upon the principles that shall regulate the State. It is to such fundamental rules the "consent of the governed" is presumed. It does not mean that every law that is proposed shall have the consent of all the men, women and children in the State. That is not the meaning of that maxim. It does mean that in the laying of these foundations the people shall not be required to submit to some foreign power, or some despotism, or some rule of the sword; but shall be required simply to submit to a Constitution of their own formation and agreement.

Well, now. The people of Pennsylvania are here in this Convention, by us, their representatives, to re-lay these foundations; and I say that when we come to a question of whether municipalities, great municipalities, shall have a limitation imposed upon them, we come to a question of expediency. Is it expedient? Is it well for the Commonwealth that this limitation should be imposed? What says the voice of history? Why the history of our own State is that it is well. That it is well, and why should it not continue? Because Philadelphia is a great manufacturing town? Because Philadelphia is a town of great wealth and of great corporations? These are the kind of reasons that are rendered to us for expunging this limitation. I think, and I think as a Philadelphian, that the reason upon which this original provision rests is just as good to-day as it was in 1776, and again in 1790, and in 1838. It is a reason which in the nature of things must continue as long as great cities continue; and the tendency of the Anglo-Saxon race is to towns and cities, and therefore they will grow; they will continue to increase, and so far as they contribute to the prosperity of the country, I am glad to see them growing and increasing. I do not believe that there is any part of Pennsylvania which is growing at this moment as fast as the city of Philadelphia is growing. I believe it is increasing in population faster than any other district of the State, and while that is true other great cities are springing up in Pennsylvania. Harrisburg has become an incorporated city. In Luzerne we have three incorporated cities, all of which are populous and growing rapidly. Pittsburg, at the other end of the State, is a great city and a prosperous city, and a city whose manufactures will compare advantageously with the manufactures of this city or any other great city.

In the face of these circumstances, then, is it wise for us to let go this restriction upon these large municipalities, or is it wise to retain it? Why, look at the Legislature. If Philadelphia grows as she is growing, and as she has grown for a few years, and these other cities expand and grow as they are likely to do, the legislation of Pennsylvania will be in the hands of these cities entirely and forever. A combination between Pittsburg and Philadelphia gives Pittsburg and Philadelphia the control of this Commonwealth, for all purposes. Well, let any of these eloquent defenders of Philadelphia, from aspersions which have not been made here, tell me whether that was according to the original plan of the founder of this State, that Pennsylvania should be ruled by a great city at each end of the Commonwealth. I tell you, sir, these cities will rule the Commonwealth; the corporations will rule the cities; and who will rule the corporations remains to be seen. We are having some experience in this city at this moment, in regard to corporate power applied to the business of a large body of respectable inhabitants. When this time comes that these cities are Pennsylvania, may God save the Commonwealth! We shall need His protecting arm then, if we never did before.

Now, sir, I believe this in my heart of hearts. It has been wrung out of me by this course of debate. Am I worthy of death or bonds for expressing such sentiments as these? Well, wait a few years, and you will see the necessity of bridling corporations, municipal as well as private. I am here, a delegate at large. I am representing the people of Pennsylvania as well as I know how, and I do not mean that this fundamental guarantee of the rights of the masses of the people of Pennsylvania shall be taken away without my doing what I can to defend it. If gentlemen have got a majority in this Convention ready to do that great wrong, why then I am sorry this Convention ever came to Philadelphia. The sooner it gets away the better. for I know not what other popular guarantee it may take away if we remain here.

Mr. Chairman, I have said enough to indicate the ground upon which, I believe, this provision of our Constitution rests, and ought to be permitted to rest. I hope I have said enough to vindicate myself from the slanderous aspersions that have been made against me, who made no aspersions against Philadelphia. It is not to be tolerated, sir, that, in a Constitutional Convention, like this, when we are considering the fundamental law, we are not permitted to speak of cities, and of the peculiarities of cities, without having this whole covey of Philadelphia admirers light upon one as if he were a common thief. That is not to be tolerated. I am here, sir, representing the people of Pennsylvania, and I have a right to refer to what no gentleman will undertake to deny, that the cities of the world do contain an amount of population that is less worthy of representation than any other equal communities that are to be found in the world. Why, sir, the city of London, a vast city, that has overspread four counties, and whose greatness Philadelphia may equal, if she continues to grow, is not represented in the House of Commons according to her numbers, if I am correctly informed, whilst in the House of Lords the people of London are not represented at all; and I think my venerable friend from Erie (Mr. Walker) failed entirely to prove that the city of New York is. I examined what he showed me, in the Journal that we have here, and I find that the Senatorial districts of the State of New York are of as nearly equal population as possible; but I do not understand that the city of New York has a representation in either House of the Legislature equal to her numbers; and I do not believe, sir, that it will be found to be the case in any city in our country or in foreign countries. On the contrary, this exception has been recognized, in all time, as a sound and salutary exception; and those men who planted it in this Constitution did not make a mistake. They understood exactly what they were doing. We shall make a mistake if we strike it out.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman:—

Mr. BARTHOLOMEW. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman will give way, as it is about the hour of adjournment, I will move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion has just been voted down, and the Chair will not entertain it at present.

Mr. BIDDLE. I will not occupy the attention of the committee very long. If it is the pleasure of the Convention to go out of the committee, it is my pleasure to yield at once.

["Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: There is one advantage, certainly, that has accrued to the House from the debate that has taken place upon this question. It has enabled us to review and re-consider some of our opinions on social and economic questions, and to get, perhaps, a more accurate understanding of some things which are supposed to be involved in this debate; and if, in what I am about to say, the distinguished gentleman, who has just taken his seat, supposes I have the least intention of referring unkindly to him, I beg to say, in advance, that no such thought is to be found in my heart, and therefore no such thought shall receive utterance in words. I have for him not only the highest but the most cordial admiration. But I must speak out that which is in me; and if I deal with arguments as I think they ought fairly to be dealt with, the man who utters them is not to be regarded in the discussion. I am dealing with the argument, and not with the individual, and I shall so endeavor to do throughout.

Mr. STRUTHERS. Mr. Chairman: I move the committee now rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BIDDLE. Now I undoubtedly understood the distinguished gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) to say the other day, that out of the vast population whose hearts pulsate in this community, there was not a single producer, that our industry was not productive but consumptive. I confess that I was astounded to learn that the greatest manufacturing city, not only in the United States, but on this continent, soon I trust in her mighty progress to be the first manufacturing city in the world, contained within its body no productive industry. I was amazed to learn that the loaf of bread which is, metaphorically, and, perhaps, literally, the staff of life, was not as much produced by him who forms and fashions the plow, and by him who forms and fashions the garments with which the husbandman is clothed, as by him who drops the seed into the hole where it germinates and fructifies to the profit of man. I was amazed. I am still amazed to learn it. I had supposed that every one who raises his hand or exercises his brain in lessening the difficulties which surround humanity in their encounter with rugged nature, in utilizing the resources which nature pours out before us, was equally entitled to the name of producer, and I felt amazed that any gentleman with an experience so vast, with a knowledge so profound, as that possessed by my distinguished colleague, (Mr. Woodward,) if he will allow me to call him my colleague, should not view this matter as all, yea the most elementary writers upon this subject, regard it. I regard no man as a mere consumer, save him who deliberately wraps up his talent in a napkin and buries it within the body of the earth. We are all alike in this respect if we faithfully use the powers entrusted to us, and this attempt to antagonize and array one section of the Commonwealth against another, or the agricultural portion of the State against the cities, in my mind is out of place economically, is out of place politically, is out of place socially, is out of place in every other way, and should have no consideration at the hands of the members of this body. I challenge any gentleman here to point to a single vote, to a single expression of mine, in which I have for a moment narrowed within sectional limits my duty to Pennsylvania as a Pennsylvanian, to the Commonwealth in which I too—although it is attempted to keep me out—claim to feel a deep and abiding interest, and of which I claim to form a part.

I deny, Mr. Chairman, that there can ever be any such antagonism of interests or of sentiments, unless they are selfishly arrayed, not to subserve any true purposes of State policy, but to advance the narrow views of the partisan who utters them.

Now permit me, very briefly, to run over some arguments which have been used here, why cities—I shall not use the word Philadelphia—why cities should not have their just share in Senatorial representation.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman: It is very evident that the gentleman will not finish his argument; and I think this Convention will gladly hear all that he has to say.

Mr. BIDDLE. I will not be over ten minutes. I think the committee will save time by hearing me out.

Mr. LANDIS. Then I move that the gentleman's time be extended until he finish his argument.

["Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. BIDDLE. It is a total misapprehension to suppose that Philadelphia claims her rights to Senatorial representation by reason of her being a great manufacturing community, or by reason of her wealth, or by reason of the large amount which she pours into the common treasury, or by reason of any consideration peculiar to herself. Such a view exhibits a total misconception of the subject. We demand our right, just as you, and you, and you demand your right; we claim that, though we are a city, though we do contain one-fifth of the population of the State, a much higher ratio of its wealth, to be treated just as each one of you is, or as the body of constituents represented by each one of you. Starting from the point, as I did the other day, that you attempt to make no distinction in the manner of representation in the upper House from the lower House, that it is not intended to be a representation of class interests, but simply of population. I put the question then, as I put it now, why, with the fifth of the population of the State, are we not entitled to a fifth of the representation in the Senate, and instead of argument in answer to this demand, we are treated with a discussion in regard to the non-productiveness of the community and a lecture upon the sins of our constituents. Mr. Chairman, large cities need no commendation at my hands. Their history is the history of freedom, of successful resistance to oppression. He who has the slightest information upon the subject knows that cities have always been the refuge of the oppressed against tyranny of the oppressor. He who has the slightest information upon the subject knows that it is from cities—I do not speak of this particular city—it is from cities that the first germs of liberal thought go, disseminating themselves broadcast throughout the land, alimanted and nourished by those who take them up, and fructifying to this advantage of all, even to the remotest extremities of the body politic.

Do gentlemen forget the early history of this Commonwealth? Was it not—just here—almost on the very spot where we are now assembled, that the great founder of this Commonwealth who has been referred to to-day, planted the nucleus of the civilization that he brought from the mother country, and which, from this point as from a centre, radiated in all directions throughout the province. I claim no credit for this. I should as well think of claiming credit for the operation of the ordinary laws of nature. I should as well think of claiming credit for the fact, that after the darkness of the night the sun rises again in the morning. It is the natural and inevitable progression of things political and things social. It never can be otherwise. But what I do protest against is, that after this course of things has continued to take place—when, as I repeat, you can do no good to the centre without its being vivifying to, and being felt advantageously at the extremities, an attempt to assault the centre and insulate it from the rest of the body politic, should be made and urged upon this floor as argument.

I am surprised at such a course of remark. Why, sir, one would suppose that because communities are gathered into cities they no longer continue to form part of the body politic; and the woe of woes is prophesied, when the cities of Pennsylvania shall, in time to come, attempt to use the influence which their population, their wealth and their intelligence may justly entitle them to exert throughout the length and breadth of the Commonwealth.

I feel that I am trespassing a little too long in speaking on this subject—

["Go on! Go on!!"]

But I desire, in conclusion, just to call the attention of the committee for a moment to a single topic. You may call it a topic in which sentiment is somewhat involved—nevertheless it occurs to me, that it may be advantageously referred to here.

At this very moment, while we are now here deliberating, the city of Philadelphia, as it were, by the common claim of every human being in the length and breadth of this great country, is designated as the proper place to which, three years hence, every man who feels the spirit of patriotism beating in his heart, may come and renovate and re-kindle that sacred fire at the altar of his forefathers, in the simple, modest, venerable hall, where the existence of this country as a separate nation among the nations was first proclaimed. Is this a time—is this an occasion—when, as it were, by a common outburst of patriotic feeling, every American turns his eye and his heart hitherward, like the pilgrim to the "Sacred city," that we, Pennsylvanians, some of us dwelling in the very heart of this community, should turn with averted gaze and with outward step from this place, and attempt to bring it into discord with the rest of the State? I cannot but think if a little of that sentiment which seems just at this moment to be warming the whole great American heart is present at our deliberations, we shall hear no more of this supposed diversity of interests, this talk about city and country, and this allusion to the farmer and the citizen; and with one accord—with a common spirit of fairness, we will unite in saying that Philadelphia has just the same rights as the rest of the Commonwealth. She asks no more. She will willingly be contented with no less. Treat her fairly—treat her justly—and you will find her always ready to more than respond to the claims that may be made upon her. Treat her with injustice, and while she will not retort—she will not strike back—she will, as every generous breast cannot fail to feel, be keenly alive to the sentiment, that deliberate injustice has been committed against her in this regard. While Philadelphia will not retaliate, she will continue to discuss—to try to change unsound opinion, to endeavor to have this unjust discrimination removed, until the whole community is brought into accord with what she thinks herself entitled to, and without receiving which she will never be content—justice.

The question being upon the amendment offered by Mr. Worrell, it was rejected.

Mr. LILLY moved that the committee do now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, which was agreed to.

So the committee rose.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President: The committee of the whole has had under consideration the report of the Committee on Legislature, and has instructed me, as its chairman, to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Leave was granted.

The Convention then, at two o'clock and eight minutes, adjourned to to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

FIFTY-FOURTH DAY.

FRIDAY, February 28, 1873.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M., the President, Hon. Wm. M. Meredith, in the Chair.

The Journal of yesterday was then read and approved.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. EWING presented two petitions from the citizens of Perryville, Allegheny county, praying for a prohibitory clause in the Constitution against the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. JOHN M. BAILEY presented a petition from the citizens of Huntingdon county, praying for the same provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

SESSIONS OF THE CONVENTION.

Mr. LAMBERTON offered the following resolution, which was twice read:

Resolved, That on and after Monday next, the sessions of the Convention shall be held from ten o'clock A. M. until three o'clock P. M.

The yeas and nays were required by Mr. D. N. White and Mr. Temple, and were as follow, viz:

YEAS.

Messrs. Alricks, Andrews, Baer, Bailly, (Perry,) Baker, Black, Chas. A., Brodhead, Carter, Corbett, Craig, Darlington, Ewing, Gilpin, Guthrie, Hay, Hemphill, Kaine, Knight, Lamberton, Landis, Lear, Lilly, Long, M'Clellan, Mann, Mantor, Minor, Patterson, D. W., Porter, Pughe, Purman, Purviance, John N., Reed, Andrew, Ross, Runk, Sharpe, Simpson, Smith, Henry W., Smith, Wm. H., Stanton, Stewart, Struthers, Temple, Van Reed, Wetherill, J. M., Wetherill, Jno. Price and Meredith, President—47.

NAYS.

Messrs. Achenbach, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Campbell, Clark, Cochran, Corson, DeFrance, Dodd, Edwards, Fulton, Gibson, Green, Hazzard, Howard, Lawrence, MacConnell, M'Camant, M'Culloch, M'Murray, Metzger, Newlin, Niles, Palmer, G. W., Palmer, H. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Purviance, Sam'l A., Rooke, Walker, Wherry, White, David N., White, J. W. F. and Wright—32.

So the motion was agreed to.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Adicks, Ainey, Armstrong, Bannan, Barclay, Bardsley, Bartholomew, Beebe, Eiddle, Black, J. S., Bowman, Boyd, Broomall, Brown, Buckalew, Carey, Cassidy, Church, Collins, Cronmiller, Curry, Curtin, Cuyler, Dallas, Davis, Dunning, Elliott, Ellis, Fell, Finney, Funck, Gowen, Hall, Hanna, Harvey, Heverin, Hopkins, Horton, Hunsicker, Littleton, M'Allister, MacVeagh, Mott, Parsons, Patton, Read, John R., Reynolds, James L., Reynolds, S. H., Russell, Smith, H. G., Turrell, White, Harry, Woodward and Worrell—66.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WHERRY asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Lamberton for a few days from to-morrow.

Mr. GUTHRIE asked and obtained leave of absence for a few days for Mr. Curry.

Mr. LAWRENCE asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Hopkins for a few days.

Mr. D. N. WHITE asked and obtained leave of absence for himself for a few days from to-morrow.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

Mr. LAMBERTON offered the following resolution, which was twice read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Auditor General be requested to furnish, as soon as printed, for the use of the Convention, copies of his report for the fiscal year ending November 30, 1872.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. CORSON presented a petition from citizens of Montgomery county, praying for the insertion into the Constitution of a clause prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating beverages, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ALRICKS asked and obtained leave of absence for himself for a few days.

Mr. LILLY asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Gilpin for a few days from to-morrow.

Mr. ANDREW REED asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Wherry for a few days from to-day.

Mr. JOSEPH BAILY asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Stewart for a few days from to-morrow.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: I am instructed by the Committee on Education to present the following report, and, in doing so, I may say that it is as nearly harmonious as nine gentlemen can be expected to make it, although none of us pledge ourselves to absolute perfection.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 1. The Legislature shall provide for the maintenance and support of a thorough and efficient system of public schools, wherein all the children of this Commonwealth, above the age of six years, may be educated.

SECTION 2. They shall appropriate at least one million dollars for each year, to be annually distributed among the several school districts, according to law, and applied to public school purposes only.

SECTION 3. No money raised in any way whatever, for the support of public schools shall ever be appropriated to or used by any religious sect for the maintenance or support of schools exclusively under its own control.

SECTION 4. A Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He shall hold his office for the term of four years, and his duties and compensation shall be prescribed by law.

SECTION 5. Neither the Legislature, nor any county, city, borough, school district, or other public or municipal corporation, shall ever make any appropriation, grant or donation of land, money or property of any kind to any church or religious society, or to any university, college, seminary, academy, or school, or any literary, scientific or charitable institution or society, controlled or managed by any church or sectarian denominations.

SECTION 6. The arts and sciences may be encouraged and promoted in colleges, and other institutions of learning, under the exclusive control of the State.

SECTION 7. The Legislature may establish industrial schools, and require the attendance of vagrant, neglected and abandoned children.

SECTION 8. They may, by law, require that every child, of sufficient mental and physical ability, shall attend the public schools, unless educated by other means.

The PRESIDENT. The report will lie upon the table, and be printed for the use of the Convention.

THE LEGISLATURE.

The Convention then resolved itself into a committee of the whole, Mr. Chas. A. Black in the chair, for the purpose of further considering the article reported from the Committee on the Legislature.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, the question under consideration was the amendment of the gentleman from Chester, (Mr. Darlingting,) to the twentieth section. The amendment will be read.

The CLERK then read the amendment as follows:

SECTION 20. The General Assembly shall apportion the State for the election of Senators and Representatives, according to population, as ascertained by the last preceding census, every ten years, commencing at the first session after the adoption of this Constitution. Senators and Representatives shall be chosen by single districts, composed of contiguous, and as nearly as practicable, compact territory, of equal population. When a city or county shall be entitled to two or more Senators, it shall be divided by ward or township lines. No city or county shall be entitled to more than six Senators. Each county shall be entitled to at least one Representative. But no county hereafter erected shall be entitled to a separate representation until sufficient population shall be contained within it to entitle it to one representative, agreeably to the ratio which shall then be established. When any city or county shall be entitled to two or more Representatives, they shall be divided by ward or township lines.

The number of Representatives shall, at the several periods of their apportionment, be fixed by the Legislature, and shall never be less than one hundred and fifty, nor greater than three hundred. The number of Senators shall at the same times be fixed by the Legislature, and shall never be less than one-fourth, nor greater than one-third, of the number of Representatives.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I move to re-consider the vote taken yesterday upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Worrell,) striking out the restriction in the amendment of the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington.)

Mr. W. H. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: I second the motion. I voted in the minority. I was not here on Monday and did not hear the various amendments presented; and consequently did not fully understand the question.

The question being on the motion of Mr. Newlin, a division was called and resulted: In the affirmative, thirty-eight; in the negative, thirty-five.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Worrell) will now be read.

The CLERK then read the amendment as follows:

Strike out the words, "no city or county shall be entitled to more than six Senators."

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman: There was a time when the citation of the great names of the past added great weight to an argument. But that time has passed away forever. If this age has any one feature which conspicuously distinguishes it from every other, it is its refusal to regard the utterances of great men as of binding authority. Every man stands now on his own pedestal of right or reason. His utterances must bear the test of re-examination, by the growing light of progressing events. The iconoclasm of the age invokes the spirit of truth in the words of the sacred poet, thus:

"The dearest idol I have known,
Whate'er that idol be,
Help me to tear it from its throne,
And worship only Thee."

It spares neither age nor sex, politics nor religion. It spares not John C. Calhoun. He was a great man, undoubtedly, but he was a man of one idea only, and that one idea was a Southern Confederacy. He was for a protective tariff, in 1816, but when he saw its effect, in building up the material wealth, and increasing the population of New England, much more rapidly than that of the cotton-growing and slave-breeding States, he became the champion of free trade. He poisoned the minds of the young men of the southern States with the political heresy of paramount

State allegiance, which, after his death, led them into the attempt, many of them against their better judgment, to separate from the northern States, and erect a separate government.

His views on the distribution of representation concentrate on the same point. He exhausted his great intellect in endeavoring to solve the problem of secession. Of all statesmen and political theorists that America has produced, he was the most dangerous. That he should find disciples and followers to-day, in this Convention, who have witnessed the disastrous results of his political teachings, is an unsolvable paradox.

If the limitation sought to be imposed on cities be a just and justifiable one, the same method of reasoning will compel us to apply it as between counties. We must put the severest bridle on Luzerne. We must handicap Schuylkill. We must shear the locks of Lancaster and Berks. But when so fine a mathematical point is put on the theory, all men exclaim against it. Placed in that strong light, its injustice is visible to all.

It is always safe to do right. Robt Philadelphia of a large share of her representation, and, smarting under a sense of wrong, she makes all things even, at last, by scrambling for and obtaining power and advantage in a hundred illegitimate ways.

Treat her honestly and justly, and she cannot afford to bear the blush of shame for an oppression of the remainder of the State. Treat her with justice, and she will respond, as she ever has done, in every cause ennobling to human nature. No man, however good, is wholly good. No man, however bad, is wholly bad. The same things are as true of communities as of individuals. Treat a man like a dog, and he will be like a dog. Treat him like a man, and he will be a man. The same things are as true of communities as of individual men.

But it is said that cities, by reason of their concentration, wield more power than the sparsely settled districts. That is true. But it is because it is the inexorable law of God; and whoever will not conform thereto only treasures up to himself wrath against the day of wrath; he fills his cup with many sorrows, and drinks it to the bitter dregs. The very statement of the complaint is its own best answer.

London is England; and England is proud of her. Paris is France; but France is proud of Paris. Vienna is Austria; but Austria is proud of Vienna. Berlin is Prussia; but Prussia reverences Berlin. They may have their domestic jars; but let an outside enemy touch with hostile foot the most barren spot, or lay hostile hand on the humblest peasant of any of these realms, and he shall have grievous cause to complain again that London is England, Paris is France, Vienna is Austria and Berlin is Prussia. They may have the power to oppress; but they have, also, a proportionate power to resent and protect. So with the great cities of our own country. The equality of all men before the law is but another name for justice to all men. This equality of justice is founded in that faith which all men ought to have in one another; which communities must have in one another; that to do justice will produce a return in kind. If the city shall be provoked into injustice toward the country, it will be by the prior injustice of the country to the city. As sure as injustice provokes and breeds injustice, so surely will justice provoke and breed justice. Like begets like, morally as well as physically. But it is said the people have made no complaint against the old Constitution on this subject of apportionment, and, therefore, we should not alter its provisions.

Unfortunately, we are not without a witness on this subject—the last apportionment for Senators and Representatives.

The ratio for a Senator under that law was about 106,700 population. I use population, because its results are most astounding. Fifteen of the Senatorial districts have less than the ratio of population for the number of Senators apportioned to them. They elect nineteen Senators. The districts are, by numbers, the Sixth, Eleventh, Twelfth, Thirteenth, Fifteenth, Sixteenth, Seventeenth, Eighteenth, Nineteenth, Twenty-third, Twenty-fourth, Twenty-fifth, Twenty-seventh, Twenty-ninth and Thirtieth. They have a population of 1,463,185, electing nineteen Senators, while the remaining population of 2,058,606, elect only fourteen Senators. Leaving off the Thirteenth district, the fraud is still more palpable. The fourteen districts, with 1,275,632 population, being but a trifle over one-third of the population of the State, elect seventeen Senators, and the remaining two-thirds of the population (2,246,159) elect the remaining sixteen Senators.

Thus a majority of the Senate, a branch of the legislative department of the government, without which no law can be enacted, is elected by about one-third of the population of the State, and yet we suppose this to be a government in which the majority rules! Such an infamous gerrymander, whereby nearly one-third of the population of the State are virtually disfranchised, ought to be impossible, under any Constitution worthy of the name of Constitution. Surely some amendment is necessary here, but if we depart from the inexorable republican law of equal representation we may tinker, and tinker, and mend, and patch, and all our shallow statesmanship will end in disappointment and trouble. We shall be compelled to return at last to the democratic rule of "equal and exact justice to all men."

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I very much regret troubling the committee with any remarks at this time, after so long and interesting debate upon this important question.

And I desire to state in the outset that I claim for Philadelphia equal and exact justice in this discussion, as I shall in every other question which may hereafter arise. I do not, however, claim for her any special privileges or legislation. I do not believe that we should be actuated by any feelings of jealousy towards the rural districts of the State. I cannot believe that the remarks of some of the delegates from the city will be conducive to her interests. Why should there be a disposition upon the part of some gentlemen upon this floor to cast aspersions upon the Commonwealth? Do they forget that Philadelphia is a part of the State and that the interest of one is the interest of the other?

Are they unmindful of the fact that the greatness of Philadelphia—her immense manufacturing interest in particular—are dependent upon the vast resources of the rural districts of this grand old Commonwealth? Sir, no amount of argument can convince me that it is any part of the duty of delegates from the city to belittle the agricultural and mining products of the State. The people of this great metropolis are abundantly able to take care of themselves. They all recognize and appreciate that comity of interest which is necessary to the growth and greatness of both city and State. What would Philadelphia be without the great coal mines of Schuylkill, Lehigh, Carbon and Luzerne, without the oil regions of Venango and Tioga, without the hundreds of rolling mills found in many of the counties of the interior, and the immense chains of railroads connecting her with every section of the State? Why, sir, withdraw all the products of the interior from us, cut off all the arteries which give us life, and substance and power, and you at once dwarf this great metropolis and make her a second class city. Mr. Chairman, I yield to none, here or elsewhere, in devotion to Philadelphia and all her interests. I am proud to be one of her citizens, and esteem it as a great honor to represent, in part, one of her districts in this body, but I also feel that I am a citizen of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Chairman, I have spoken thus for the purpose of showing to those gentlemen from the rural districts that the people of Philadelphia are not actuated by any feelings of jealousy towards the country, but, upon the contrary, we are willing to unite with them in so amending the Constitution that it will be adapted to the wants and interests of the people of the entire Commonwealth. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Worrell.) I do not believe that the number of Senators in our city should be limited for all time. Who can tell but that Philadelphia will, at a period not far distant, be entitled to more than six Senators. Suppose the number of Senators should be increased in other portions of the State, believing, therefore, it is the evident intention of the Convention to so apportion the State as to give to each district a limited number of Senators. I am in favor of dividing the whole State into districts, say ten, without regard to any of the large cities, and give to each district the number of Senators hereafter determined upon. I endorse every word of the speech of the distinguished President of this Convention (Mr. Meredith.) I believe that the sooner we get back to the old plan of dividing our State into communities the better it will be for the people. Why, sir, the eminent delegate from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) openly admitted upon the floor yesterday, that the amendment of eighteen hundred and fifty-seven, of which he was the author, was a great and fatal error. He then spoke of the vicious effects it had had upon our legislation, and I agree with him that the question of apportionment is one of great difficulty; it is one about which men of learning and ability have differed. It is an easy thing to settle, so far as relates to the House of Representatives, a body which is intended to represent the people directly.

It has been argued, by some of the most distinguished men of this and other countries, that the Senate is not, properly speaking, a legislative body, in the same sense that the House of Representatives is. They argue that it was established for the purpose of exercising, as it were, a supervisory influence over the other House—to act as a check upon its proceedings when the public good required.

Lord Brougham declared that “the House of Lords was the grand court by which the deliberations of the House of Commons were tried and judged.” I do not pretend to say that there is that similarity between the House of Lords of England and the Senate of our State as would warrant us in regarding it as a grand court of errors and review, but I contend that the Senate does not stand in the same relation to the people that the House of Representatives does—neither are their duties identical. Who doubts but that the Senate is intended as a check upon the actions of the other House? The Senators are differently chosen, and serve a different constituency, and for the purposes of legislation the voice of a Senator is three times as great as that of a Representative.

Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Pittsburg, (Mr. Ewing,) and I confess, I was somewhat undecided upon this question until I heard that gentleman's views, but I believe, in point of theory, he was right, and, in my humble opinion, he made one of the ablest arguments which has been delivered upon this question, and I do not say this in disparagement of other gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject.

I say that we cannot apportion the State into Senatorial districts with the same degree of preciseness and correctness that we can the House of Representatives. The apportionment must, of necessity, be different, and further from equality.

The idea which I suggest is demonstrated even in our city government—each ward has a common councilman for a certain number of inhabitants, or voters, thereby giving to some wards a much larger representation than others; while the select council is composed of one member from each ward, without regard to population. So we see there is a real difference in the formation and basis of representation, carried through all legislative bodies; and the distinction is as great in the Legislature of the Commonwealth, as in any other body.

I shall not refer to the case of the Senate of the United States, which has been so often referred to in the course of this debate. Gentlemen have reminded us of the fact that each State has an equal representation in the Senate of the United States, without regard to either population or territory. I do not think such an argument is applicable to the question now under discussion. Each State is regarded in the light of an independent sovereignty; and entered into the compact forming the United States government, with the distinct understanding that each and every State should be entitled to an equal representation in that branch of the government. No such argument as this can be applied to the various counties of the Commonwealth; and I was surprised that any such a comparison should be made.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I move that the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I thank the committee, but I do not desire to occupy any great length of time. I see that my distinguished colleague (Mr. Littleton) does not seem disposed to listen to my remarks. I desire to say to him that neither he nor any other gentleman on this floor will take more pride in incorporating into the organic law of this State a provision which will protect the citizens of the city of Philadelphia, than myself; but I am not here—and I say it boldly—to take part in any measure that savors of jealousy. True, I am here representing, in part, a district of the city of Philadelphia, but I do not forget, sir, that my duty requires me to act in behalf of all the people of this whole Commonwealth, and not in the interest of any particular locality.

If my friend, Mr. Littleton, thinks it to be his duty to advocate such measures as are adapted to the particular district which he immediately represents, to the disparagement and disadvantage of the rest of the State, I suppose he will do so. I, for one, do not forget that I am a Pennsylvanian, and while I will be vigilant in behalf of our own city, I will do no act, knowingly, which will excite the prejudices and passions of the delegates from the other part of the State. I do not believe that the action of certain gentlemen in this Convention, who have felt it to be a part of their duty to slur at the importance of the rural districts, is productive of any good. Already we see the effect of such a course. Some gentlemen who were disposed at the beginning of this debate to act with us, have arrayed themselves upon the other side, and say that Philadelphia wants everything. My object has been to harmonize all the interests of the Commonwealth if possible.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely and honestly believe that the most practical and just basis upon which this vexed question can be settled is the one I have already suggested or something similar to it.

Why, it has been argued that if Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Scranton and other large cities were represented in the Senate according to population, they would soon control the legislation of the State. This seems to be the great fear of gentlemen representing the farming and mineral districts. They declare that they will never agree to a proposition which is likely to result in danger to them and their constituents. From the vote taken yesterday upon this question it is evident that there is a disposition upon the part of these gentlemen to limit our representation in the Senate. Therefore I suggest the plan spoken of a moment ago, so that we may all agree upon an apportionment which will secure to every section of the State substantial justice. I believe that the number of Senators ought to have been first settled, and then we could have discussed this subject more understandingly. I have heard a number of gentlemen upon the floor declare that they were against the whole of this section, as well as all the amendments, and that it was thought that another report would be agreed upon by the Committee on Suffrage and Election, favoring minority representation. If such a proposition is to be made I can see no good to be derived from this discussion, because that would involve an entirely different method of districting the State.

Mr. Chairman, I consider this one of the most important questions to be discussed by this body. The alarm which has grown up in the interior of the State, in regard to what our friends seem to think an encroachment upon their rights, is without the least foundation in fact. We ask nothing of them but an equal representation. We ask nothing but what we are willing to give. We beg of you, gen-tlomen, to give Philadelphia, which belongs equally to you, and of which you should be proud, the same voice in the Legislature as you claim for the rural districts. Is there a delegate upon this floor who would underestimate the magnitude and importance of the old Quaker city? Is she not the great custom seat of all your products? Is she not one of the component parts of the very first States in the Union? New York, with all her importations, relies to a large extent upon the factories of Philadelphia. Will you then attempt to cripple her; will you curtail her strength and power in the halls of legislation, or will you join hands with us and permit your great metropolis to continue to increase in population; to grow in wealth? In one sense of the word we are consumers, and so are you. You can no more live without us than we can live without you. What special privileges do you require?

Mr. Chairman, the different delegates upon this floor have, with a singular unanimity, opposed everything like special legislation; and they cannot now, without being inconsistent, support a proposition which makes such an invidious distinction against the large cities of the Commonwealth. I contend that in apportioning there will necessarily be some districts larger than others, but it should be our duty to arrive at a conclusion which will do as near substantial justice as possible. I will vote for a proposition which will apportion this State in such a manner as will give to Philadelphia, at all times, all that she is now or hereafter will be entitled to.

Mr. SHARPE. Mr. Chairman: I desire to present at this time, with the indulgence of the committee, all the views that I shall, at any time, present upon this subject, and after I shall have said what I have to say, I shall hereafter content myself with voting upon the different propositions that will be presented to this Convention. It would be difficult to exaggerate the importance of the subject that is now before the committee. How one of the three co-ordinate branches of the government shall be made up, of what number it shall consist, how its membership shall be distributed throughout the State, is certainly a theme which well merits the calmest deliberation of every thoughtful mind. Within the limits of the Constitution the Legislature is absolute, and unless restrained by its own sense of expediency and justice, it may become despotic. The sweep of its power is co-extensive with the boundaries of our State. It can build up and cast down the material prosperity of the citizen. It can harmonize or render discordant all the domestic relations. It can invigorate or dwarf the growth among the people of art, science, wealth and education. If true to its high office, it can make this Commonwealth a prodigy of grandeur far outrivaling the vision of any Utopian dreamer. But if false, it can strangle the arteries which give health and vigor to the body politic until it will become paralyzed with the decrepitude of premature decay. The law-making power thus having centered in it the issues of grandeur and decay, of weal and woe, of life and death for the Commonwealth, will ever be held in popular estimation the supreme power of the State. Therefore to strengthen this branch of the government where it is likely to be too weak, and to weaken it where it is likely to be too strong, to make it, as near as may be, the true exponent of the interests of the people, to purify it and to perfect it, is the highest performance of statesmanship. Such is the duty that now presses upon us, and if in its discharge we suffer the mists of prejudice or the vapors of passion to cloud our judgment or pervert our consciousness of right, we will be unworthy of the occasion and the subject, and recreant to the high trust that devolves upon us.

Standing upon the threshold of this discussion, there are two questions for our determination. The first is, "of what number shall the Senate and House of Representatives consist?" and, secondly, "how shall that number be distributed throughout the State?" The able and intelligent Committee on Legislature has brought in a report in favor of adhering to the present numerical membership of the Legislature, and its eloquent chairman has laid before us the reasons which impelled him and his associates to the conclusion that a departure from the present practice of the government in this regard would be a change, but not an improvement. He has zealously insisted, on the contrary, that an increased membership would invigorate into ranker growth all the vices of the present system, because of the diminished individual responsibility which increased numbers would afford.

Now, sir, what are the vices of the present system of the Constitution of the law-making power of this State? The first one lies upon the surface, and any man can read it or see it. It is the facility with which so small a body can be influenced by improper considerations. We have tried the experiment of a Legislature imposed of a Senate of thirty-three members, and a House of Representatives of one hundred members, and if we are to believe all that we have heard, that experiment has proved a signal failure. It has been said more than once in my hearing, by gentlemen on this floor, that the halls of both the State and the National Legislatures, are market places, where legislation is bought and sold; that money, offices, emoluments and stocks are the father confessors that purge the consciences of our public men; that the logic of truth is impotent and powerless before the logic of mammon; that our legislators gamble away the true interests of the people with a stoicism and indifference unsurpassed in all the annals of the past. I do not assert, sir, that this is true. But if it be true, if this great scandal rests upon our State and nation, then, sir, the Herculean task of cleansing the Augean stables may no longer be delayed with safety. There is a deep-seated conviction growing in the public mind that we must have reformation and purification in our governmental affairs, especially in the law-making power, if we would save our national character from disgrace, and our national institutions from decay. The gravest question for the solution of the statesman is, "how shall this great work be best accomplished?" Can we retain the present membership of the Legislature, and make it an incorruptible body? If we can, I am not sure that I would be so anxious about an increase in its number. But if we cannot, then I will vote for a large increase. To the question of the probability of this purification and reformation under the existing condition of our social affairs, I desire to devote a few remarks.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LANDIS moved that the time of the gentleman from Franklin be extended twenty minutes, which was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. SHARPE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen: I thank you for the courtesy. If, sir, this can be done, as I have just stated, I am in favor of it. Now there is one way by which this consummation may be accomplished, and that is by an unflinching determination on the part of the people to entrust no man with legislative power who can be approached by improper influences. To make this determination of any practical value, it must be backed up by decisive action. The people must be aroused to a sense of their duty, and alarmed by a sense of public danger. But have we any reason to hope that the people are going to waken up and act? I see no premonitions of such a revolution.

The excessive hungering after wealth is the peculiar madness that rules the present hour. Its attending evil spirit is an intense thirst for excitement and enjoyment. The man of business, and the man of pleasure, each intent upon his own pursuit, are both alike forgetful of the welfare of the State.

Now and then, it is true, the hurry of their eager foot-steps is arrested, for a moment, by some stupendous wrong—by some glaring betrayal of public trust—and they stop long enough to form a good resolution in behalf of the public weal, but to-morrow the wave of Lethe rolls over them, and they forget it before they have had a chance to execute it. But this is not the worst feature of the present aspect of public affairs. Whilst the best and most useful citizens have thus been turning their faces so exclusively to their private interests, and their backs towards the public interests, a dangerous enemy has stolen into the citadels of power. This enemy is the professional politician. He is the janissary of parties, whose sword is drawn for the cause that pays best, and who fights under the standard where victory is most likely to perch.

What stalwart arm shall strike off the shackles with which these men have bound us? What pillar of fire will appear in the political firmament to guide us out of this Egyptian bondage? Who will appear as a tribune for the people? Until the gross materialism of this age shall have become blended with greater humanitarianism; until the man of pleasure and the man of business come to realize the fact that the State is entitled to a part of their allegiance; until the honest masses of the people rise in their majesty and power, and drive these pirates out of the ship of State, and seizing the helm, direct her away from the rocks upon which she is now running, no effectual purification and reformation can reasonably be expected.

We will, therefore have to look in a different direction for relief. The project proposed, may, indeed, prove as abortive and deceptive as the system which our past experience has condemned. That a largely increased membership in the Senate and House may not accomplish all that its sanguine advocates hope from it is quite probable.

But I propose to try the experiment for several reasons. If the hypothesis be true, which has been assumed very generally during the progress of this discussion, that Legislatures can be bribed, and legislation can be bought, then, I think, the argument in favor of a large legislative body is capable of a mathematical demonstration. If legislative jobbery cannot be entirely prevented, then, manifestly, the next best thing is to make it so expensive that it will become unprofitable. I hold it to be an axiomatic truth, that the price of legislation will go up—other things being equal—in the same ratio in which the number of dividends increases. It is simply a question of figures to say (which any one can understand) that if a majority of a Senate containing thirty-three members is venal, it will cost less than a majority of a Senate containing one hundred members.

But I leave this consideration of the advantages of a large legislative body, at this point, without further elaboration, because the subject is an exceedingly unpalatable one, and will proceed to allude, briefly, to some other reasons that seem to favor the experiment.

It cannot have escaped the observation of any intelligent member of this Convention that small bodies of men, assembled together for deliberative purposes, are peculiarly susceptible to the influence of improper combinations and rings. The facilities with which such confederacies can be formed, and the power which they do wield in such bodies, are notorious, and within the experience of all of us. These combinations are not necessarily corrupt, but may be created for the purpose of procuring special legislation to answer special localities, or general legislation to further some individual aim. But multiply the numbers of your legislators, and the conflicts of interest, the variety of temper, the disparity of intellect, the bickerings and jealousies, and the want of homogeneousness will make cabals and rings practically an impossibility.

But, sir, there is still another reason why the membership of the Legislature should be enlarged. Under the present infamous system of gerrymandering, which finds its chief vitality in the power of the Legislature, to link counties together in the formation of legislative and Senatorial districts, the smaller counties have generally been practically without any representation at all at Harrisburg. Usually they are united in unhallowed political wedlock with some large and populous county, and if, by some lucky chance, they get a candidate on the ticket, the opposing candidates in the other county, by a combination among their friends and supporters, are almost uniformly elected.

Now, sir, the Constitution of 1790 guaranteed to every county of the Commonwealth, then existing, at least one member in the lower House. This was a just and wise shield for the protection of the populations of small counties. I trust this salutary provision, which has been lost sight of in our present Constitution, will be by us again restored to the organic law. No scheme, therefore, that does not contain a provision giving each county in our State at least one member in the lower House will meet with my approval. Let this be the foundation stone in defining the membership of the House of Representatives, and upon it erect such a superstructure as will give in that body to every city and county such further representation as their population will justify.

These reflections now bring me, finally, to the question, what shall be the basis of representation in the Senate? This subject is beset with much graver difficulties. We all admit that, theoretically, at least, the fundamental idea of all governments, whose law-making power is vested in two Houses, is that the lower House is the people's House, where they are represented according to their numbers. We assert that it is equally true that neither in theory nor in practice has any constitutional government recognized and adopted the principle that the upper House is also solely the representative of populations, and that its membership ought to be based upon populations alone.

He who asserts the contrary has not only the burden of proof upon him; but also the weight of the argument to show that such a basis of representation would be safe. The history of the formation of our national government, and all the analogies it furnishes, are against such an assumption.

The Senate of the United States does not represent populations, but States. In that august body the smallest has as much political importance and influence as the largest. This was one of the compromises of the Constitution, without which the formation of the Federal Union would have been impossible.

Now, sir, the idea incorporated into the Constitution of the United States that the Senate is the representative of territorial districts and political communities, underlies all that is valuable in such a body. This principle I would have introduced, in some proper shape, into the organic law of this great Commonwealth. It is urged that, hitherto, such a basis of representation has been repudiated in our State Constitutions, and that Senatorial representation has been distinctly based upon population. A vicious practice, if, in fact, it does exist, ought never to be permitted to destroy a valuable theory. If such a practice has prevailed, let us, without delay, abandon it, whilst it is still in our power to do so.

Why have two legislative bodies at all, if they are to be made up exclusively as the representatives of populations? The value of the Senate is chiefly in its conservatism; in its being a check upon the crude and hasty legislation which the surging passions of the populace so often force through the lower House, upon which they are supposed to have a most direct and special influence. But, if you will insist that the people must be represented in the mass in the Senate, what will become of its conservatism, and how shall it be able to check the gusty passions of the popular branch?

Again there are certain other considerations which sharply define the distinction between the two bodies. The qualifications of Senators, the period of their terms and the peculiar functions imposed upon them, mark a strong contrast and difference, which have always existed, and, perhaps, always will exist in all constitutional governments.

The Senate is the advisory council of Governor in the matter of official appointments, and on occasion may sit as a high court of impeachment. These functions, it seems to me, conclusively detach and separate that body from the notion that it is, or ought to be, the representative of the masses of the people. Indeed, partly to prevent it from running too strongly in that direction, limits have been imposed in this State, upon the number of Senators which any city or county shall have. This was done in positive terms by the Constitution of 1838, and by necessary implication in that of 1790. Now, sir, we are asked to reverse this venerable practice, to surrender this conservative principle in the construction of the Senate, and to throw its doors wide open that the populace may walk in. It is argued that all such restrictions are arbitrary, and cannot be supported by either reason or justice. The same charge can just as easily be brought against all constitutional restraints. Did time permit, it would be no difficult matter to enumerate many others, quite as arbitrary as this one, which is so eloquently denounced by distinguished gentlemen on this floor.

All governmental restraint is, in a certain sense, an arbitrary invasion of natural right. But if every man were suffered to do just as he pleased, no human government could exist. The safety the whole, therefore, becomes the supreme law of every State, and whatever restraint is necessary for that safety cannot, in any proper sense, be arbitrary or unjust, even though it may create gross inequalities. If, therefore, a limitation of the representation of any city or county in the Senate becomes a prudent or necessary shield against some danger, that may probably become imminent to and threaten the destruction of the prosperity and liberties of the people, it is fully vindicated by the maxim "salus populi suprema lex." But to be fully justified, it must not be an unreasonable limitation beyond what the exigencies of the public safety require. Outside of this limit it would be tyranny; inside of it it is simply salutary restraint.

Doubtless the framers of our organic law, when they placed restrictions upon the Senatorial representation of cities, were influenced by sufficient reasons. They had prescience enough to foresee the immense growth to which this city was to come. They had read history, and had learned from it the stupendous and despotic power which lodges in concentrated numbers. The French revolution had taught them what Paris had done, and what she could again do, for France. They had read what London had done, and what she could again do, for England. They knew what the combined energies of city populations, moving as one body and inspired by one spirit, had done and what they could again do. With this knowledge came fear, and from fear arose the stern determination to interpose a constitutional barrier against this power, which, like the Alpine avalanche, grows as it rolls on.

Surely, if we take the lamp of experience as a guide for our feet, we will walk in their foot-prints. The wisdom of those who have gone before us has been triumphantly vindicated by the events of the past. It is quite a notorious fact that Philadelphia, with her four Senators and nineteen members, has a predominating power already at Harrisburg.

With her present limited Senatorial representation, and her full popular representation in the lower House, she has, to our bitter grief, more than once dictated the legislation of this Commonwealth.

Mr. COYLER. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman will pardon me for an interruption, I will state that he is in error in his statement of fact. The Constitution of 1837-8 did not limit the representation in the manner in which he supposes.

Philadelphia in 1854 had three Senators from the county, and two from the city, making five. She lost one Senator by consolidation, because the representation of cities was limited to four, and this city, then, became both the city and the county. We had then five Senators with four hundred thousand population; now we have four Senators with seven hundred thousand population.

Mr. SHARPE. Mr. Chairman: My recollection of the reading of the Constitution of 1793 is that it created the city of Philadelphia a Senatorial district and the county of Philadelphia a Senatorial district. Then came the Constitution of 1838, which restricted the Senatorial representation of any city or county to four Senators. It is now insisted by the earnest, able and eloquent delegates from Philadelphia that this is unfair, and that she ought to have no shackles put upon her Senatorial influence and importance. I, for one, cannot consent to this. I am not moved to this determination by any insane jealousy or distrust of this great city.

She sits here like a stately queen, with her sceptre stretched over the waters of the Delaware and the Schuylkill. Her manufactories, like great arteries, carry wealth and prosperity throughout the nation. Her public and her private buildings are the noblest triumphs of architecture; her benevolent and charitable institutions shine like jewels upon her brow; her devotion to art and science consecrate her; her merchant princes, her professional men, her accomplished and elegant gentlemen and scholars, and her honest, thrifty and industrious artisans are among the noblest of Pennsylvania's sons. About her grand old Hall cluster the hallowed associations of the birthday of our national independence. The spirits of that devoted band of patriots still linger among these scenes. He would be an unworthy son of this Commonwealth who would be jealous of its metropolis. I claim my full share of her heritage of glory and grandeur. Reverencing her thus I will not needlessly oppress her; but I will not suffer my reverence to make me unmindful of my duty. I will not agree to tie her down to any arbitrary number of Senators. I am content to give her a liberal ratio of representation. I will give her one-sixth of the Senate at any time her territorial growth will justify it; but never shall my vote, in favor of unlimited Senatorial representation, lead her into temptation, or give to her the power to subvert, under the forms of law, the liberties of the noble yeomanry of Pennsylvania.

Again I thank the committee for its kind indulgence.

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: If the committee will pardon me for a few moments I will speak upon this branch of the subject which is now before the committee, and put myself upon the record as explanatory of the vote which I shall give upon the question of the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Worrell.)

The gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Sharpe,) who has just taken his seat, has referred to this limitation of the number of Senators in Philadelphia, which was in the Constitution of 1790 by implication, and which was in the Constitution of 1838 by positive provision, and seems to think that because this was a limitation by the Constitution under which we have lived, that is the reason why it should be under the Constitution that we propose to adopt or submit to the people.

There has been an idea prevailing throughout the State of Pennsylvania that her Legislature has not been one of the most perfect bodies that can be organized, and that there was room for improvement and reformation, and that this is part of the reason why this Convention is in session here to-day. We are supposed to have been called together for the purpose of reforming some abuses and imposing certain limitations and restraints upon the abuse of power, and the changes which have been heretofore made are not all that can be made for the improvement of the fundamental law of this State.

Of late we have heard a great deal said about the representation of minorities, and minority representation will be one of the darling theories that will be ably handled and conveyed to this Convention during its session, as I have no doubt; but shall it be said that while the world moves forward, gentlemen talk about providing for the representation of minorities, that majorities, such as are concealed in great cities, have no rights, and that they shall not be represented.

That seems to be the foundation of the theory by which this proposition of limitation of the number of members of the Senate is set up and supported upon this floor. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is said that if we are simply to be represented in the Senate by a representation based upon population, then it is of no use to have a Legislature consisting of two Houses, and it is asked why not, in that case, have a Legislature consisting of a single body, like the Convention that is now revising the organic law of the State? Why should we have a Senate and House of Representatives, instead of having a single body constituting the Legislature, and embodying in it the legislative power which is now found in the General Assembly composed of two Houses?

Why, sir, it is simply, as Dr. Lieber says, because the bicameral system has been found to work better than the unicameral system. It is for that reason that we have two Houses; it is for that reason, also, that he have, in this body, committees, for the purpose of gathering up and arranging the work—the whole Convention consisting of twenty-seven standing committees, that are first to prepare the work before it is submitted to this committee of the whole, and the results of whose labors are discussed in committee of the whole before being submitted to the Convention for its final action. Why, sir, that system, as it has been well said, has traveled with the anglo-saxon race. Wherever they have tried the unicameral system it has been found a failure, and the illustration that has been presented here, of the Senate of the United States, which represents territory alone, is not a fair illustration as applied to the legislative body of the State of Pennsylvania. The Congress of the United States represents vast and conflicting interests, interests existing under all the different latitudes and climates of the world. While our nation does not exactly extend to the north pole, nor quite to the equator, yet all the products of all the climates of the earth are produced upon territory comprised within the Union of these States. With an idea that there should be a preservation of all these varied interests and rights, was it, that every State came to be represented in the Congress of the United States by two Senators, that they should represent the peculiar and the particular, and the conflicting interests of the several States of the country, while the lower House should be based upon population. When an illustration is drawn from that source, it fails to be applicable to the condition of the State of Pennsylvania, which is a State bearing undoubtedly large and varied interests, but these so compact and so nearly allied, and one depending so much upon the other, that there is, as it were, but a single interest that is to be represented upon the floor of the Senate by a representation of the population of the State.

This was made part of the Constitution of the State, as we are told by its chief advocate here, by reason of the superior eloquence of the great commoner, Thaddeus Stevens, who made a remarkable speech in the Convention of that year in support of this idea. If provisions are to be advocated and supported here, and put into the Constitution which we adopt, by appeals of that kind—and probably appeals to the prejudices of the people of the country against those of the city—I say it is unworthy of this Convention to follow such a lead. We ought to act understandingly, and impartially, and not listen to that sort of argument. Why should the country be placed in contention against the city? Let me say to every member of this Convention, who represents a rural community, that he dwarfs himself and he dwarfs his constituency when he says that one Philadelphia member is superior to five country members in the Senate of Pennsylvania. If Philadelphia has a population of one-fifth or one-fourth of the people of this State, Philadelphia should have a Senator out of every five or every four of the Representatives of the State; and if members from the country cannot compete with members from the city, let them go down in the conflict. I am not afraid of it; and when we find exhibitions like that we saw here this morning, after having discussed this very question for three days—of gentlemen who made speeches in favor of it, showing that in the conclusion arrived at yesterday, they either forgot, or did not understand, how they should vote, and voted against the measure which they had been supporting during the discussion, and when we allowed them to get out of their difficulty by re-considering their vote, this morning—it shows that after all they are not so stupid, but have all the wisdom and capacity to conduct a deliberative or legislative body like this, or the Senate of Pennsylvania.

I say, sir, that this bicameral principle lies at the foundation of republican and democratic institutions.

Here in Pennsylvania, and particularly in Philadelphia, which has been abused, perhaps to some extent beyond its deserts, and perhaps to some extent, according to its merits, there is no doubt of the fact that there is a class of the population devoted to politics, who make that their occupation and trade, and subsist by it, and who are not a very desirable class of the community; but, sir, even in this city, they are no more to the great ocean of the city's population than are the dregs that lie at the bottom of your Delaware river, to the great body of the clear water that flows in an unbroken tide to the sea. Here in Philadelphia, where we first put forth that grand principle upon which we now live, as a nation, the principle which gave us our existence and our birth, that "taxation without representation is tyranny;" where the protest went up in the name of this Commonwealth, that the people of these colonies were not represented in the Parliament of Great Britain; where we put forth that immortal document by which we now exist as a nation. Here in Philadelphia, where freedom first from her fairfeet shook off the old world's dust, shall we say that the scholars, and merchants, and manufacturers and business men of Philadelphia, who have intelligence, and power, and strength, and wealth, if you please, shall not have the same representation, according to its numbers, that the people of the other portions of the State have? Shall we, of the county, be afraid to compete with gentlemen from the city on the floor of the Senate—

"Where mind shall close with mind, Free as the sunshine or the chainless wind."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I move that the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes.

The question being upon the motion, it was agreed to.

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman I thank the gentleman (Mr. Temple) and I thank the committee; but the Convention having made a Procrustean bed upon which the average member is compelled to lie, I am unwilling to be stretched out or lopped off to suit its dimensions.

Mr. GILPIN. Mr. Chairman: I chance to be a member of the Committee on Legislature, and from the various remarks that I have heard during the past few days I was at first inclined to think that that committees, by reporting the provision limiting the number of State Senators to be chosen by the great cities, had committed a grave error, or been guilty of tyranny, injustice, &c., as has been so eloquently charged by the gentleman from Philadelphia. Upon a little reflection, however, sir, and after having listened attentively to the arguments against the restriction for the past two or three days, I find that, in my judgment at least, the committee, by reporting this restriction, which is so much opposed, have been guilty of no such great tyranny or injustice after all, and that these very eloquent arguments which we have heard do not apply to the question in issue. They would have applied had there been any restraint put upon the city of Philadelphia, or upon any portion of the State, in the selection of members for lower House, that is, if that report had attempted to have limited the representation of the city of Philadelphia in the lower House, then the people of Philadelphia would not have been fully represented. But representation there has been given fully, and indeed it has been given more fully than to any other part of the State, because Philadelphia loses nothing at all in fractions. But it is asserted that because a full representation, according to population, is not given in the Senate, therefore comes injustice, tyranny, &c.; and this argument that would, as I say, have applied to the House, is sought to be applied to the Senate.

Now let us look for a few minutes, and see whether it does apply. What is the Senate? Is it a representative body of the people? Not at all. It is the council of the State, not of the people. The people are one thing, for some purposes, and the State is another. The people have their chamber or body for a council, and the State has its body for another. That is the theory, at least, upon which the Senate is organized. It is the theory upon which every Senate has been organized; it is the deliberative council of the State, whether we take it in the United States, in Venice or in our own State.

Now, then, the question: "How shall those Senators be elected," is no question of right. It is but a question of expediency. It would have been the same kind of a body, if, instead of electing Senators by districts, here and there, we had elected them upon a general ticket by the whole State, the same as presidential electors are now chosen, but, as a matter of prudence, it was, by our predecessors, deemed best to give minorities in the whole State, who might be majorities in some parts, some representations, because, if Senators were elected, say thirty-three Senators, upon the general ticket all over the State, a small majority would then be able to place this council of the Commonwealth wholly in the hands of but one political party, and hence that council might become the council of the party rather than of the State. Therefore it was, by the framers of our present and former Constitutions, deemed expedient to divide up the area in which the elections were to take place into several small districts, not necessarily as to population, but for the mere purpose of forming more limited districts. When Senators are thus chosen they are not Senators of the district, but Senators of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; and a Senator elected from one district, say in the east, represents as much the district in the west as he does that from which he comes, or at least he should do so. He is there to counsel for the interests of the State, and not for the interest of any particular citizen or of a particular locality in the State. They are only scattered in order that the council might have the benefit of the views of persons from various parts of the State. As it was doubtless anticipated that in so large and varied a State, subjects would require action which would not be properly, by a person, who coming from and who had always resided in an entirely different section of the State.

That in theory there is supposed to be a conflict between the interests of the State, and the interests of the people is manifest, because the Senators who represent the State are subject to a restraint that is not placed upon the members of the lower House, for we know very well that in the upper House there can originate no revenue bills and nothing that touches the taxes of the people. I have remarked before that the councils of the State may differ from the councils of the people—the interests of the State may differ from the interests of the people, and therefore, in theory, as I have intimated, the decision of questions of State is to rest with the councils of the State and not with the people as citizens of the State. To illustrate: Suppose, for instance, our Supreme Court was composed, say of nine judges, and that instead of electing them, as we do now, by a vote of the people through the whole State, we should divide the State into three districts, and declare that one district shall elect three judges, another district three judges, and the third district three judges, and when elected they should constitute the Supreme bench of Pennsylvania. If this were so, would any person pretend that of all these judges thus elected, some of their number would be compelled to decide in favor of or represent the people of the particular district from which they came? Not at all; and in applying the same principle to the Senate of the State, we conclude at a glance that its members are elected, not for the purpose of representing any particular class or section of people, but in order to form a council wherein the interests of the entire people of the State as a State shall be considered. The construction or rather the Constitution of the Senate is only for the purpose of having a deliberative body for the State, and whether it is formed one way or the other, whether by allowing all the parts of the State to select members proportionate to population or by restraining in some places the number to be selected in either event, there is no tyranny or injustice over or to the people; and our determination of the present pending question is nothing more nor less than the determination of a question of political economy, and is whether in the State council the densely populated communities should have power proportioned to their population merely without regard to their territory or any other requisite.

If this question is decided in the affirmative, then no restriction should be imposed upon the large cities of the State; but would this be prudent and would the best State council be obtained by such a decision? Let us glance for a moment at two notable examples which history affords us. We have, in the first place, the English system, where we find that London does not by any means have what would be considered a just and fair representation in Parliament according to her population. The power of the representation in England remains in the country districts, and we find as the beneficial result that the government is stable and conservative, because it is well known that faction and corruption work more rapidly, and easily, in densely populated communities. In France we find a notable contrary example. There the great cities are entitled to and have their full power and representation in their legislative body in proportion to their population. It was not, however, always the case there, but was so designed and brought about by Mazarin and Richelieu, about the reign of Louis XIV, who sought thereby to concentrate the power of the country, and thus make Paris France. What has been the result of this policy? Paris may be France, but how unstable did France become, and how feeble has her government been amidst the scenes of fraud and corruption which always prevail in densely populated communities, and which, if unrestrained, destroy the State and produce revolution?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NILES. I move the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GILPIN. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, judging from these examples, and from what we know and have experienced of the actions of mobs, can we not fairly conclude that in our own State, also, the densely populated cities and districts are more hasty and radical than the country, and that among the crowded masses of their people, passion possesses more and reason less power than in districts where numbers are not so thickly concentrated? It was, doubtless, with some such view that our predecessors sought to restrain the representation, and the power, of the cities in the Senate of our State, because they did not deem it wise to permit the councils of the State to be as easily influenced as the members of the lower House. In the determination of this question now before the committee, I think the examples that history afford, and the conclusions which I have attempted to deduce, should have some weight with us in our determination of this question.

The gentleman from Tioga (Mr. Niles) has cited a number of Constitutions of other States that have determined this question by adhering to the exception to the general rule of representation, just as it has been determined by the report of the Committee on the Legislature. This question of representation was determined by our predecessors in the same way, and therefore, in the absence of any particular proof, bearing either one way or the other, it is fair to presume, and we must presume, that their determination was wise and correct. In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I only desire to add, that the burden of proof rests with those who oppose the limitation contained in the report of the committee, because the same limitation is imposed in our present Constitution, and they must show, to the satisfaction of the Convention, that the true basis upon which our State Council should be constructed should rest, is to allow the citizens of densely populated communities to have full per capita representation therein; or, in other words, that the present Constitution, in this respect, is wrong, and is prejudicial to the interests and prosperity of our great State. Doubtless the wisdom of our State Council, i. e. Senate, has contributed to her past prosperity, and we should be well assured that we improve, ere we make any change in the organization of that body.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman; I would feel that I was derelict in the duty I owe to the district I represent if I did not express the views I entertain in regard to this question of representation before the vote is taken. I desire, however, to examine this question in the light of some remarks that have been made this morning upon the floor of this Convention. It has been asked that if population alone is the basis of representation in both branches of the Legislature, why is it that there should be two Houses of the Legislature? I propose to review that argument, and to give the reason why there are two Houses of the Legislature, rather than one, and why population should be made the basis of representation in both these branches.

If we turn to England, the country from which we derive all our institutions, we find two Houses of Parliament governing that country. One is called the popular branch, and yet, strange to say, it is not popular, as exhibited in its results, because it is a well known fact, that under the old borough system, which, to some extent, still prevails in parts of England, small localities have a larger representation than very large ones, and population is not really the basis of representation in the lower branch of Parliament. The upper House of Parliament represents, not the people, but the nobility of the land—the peers of the realm, and those who are akin to them, the clergy and others.—Hence that body is separated and removed entirely away from the people, who have no choice whatever in the selection of a single member of the upper branch.

France, under the old regime, was in the same condition. There the nobility alone were represented in the upper House, and the people were not included in the representation at all.

In looking at the Legislature, as established in England and in France, we have no precedent to guide us, because we have no privileged classes here.

It has been argued that the composition of the Senate of the United States presents a reason for the establishment of two branches of the State Legislature. I deny the conclusion. I aver that it does not; that the two Houses of Congress cannot properly be compared with the two Houses of the Legislature of a State, for they were brought into being for very different reasons and for totally different ends; it follows, then, in the nature of things, that the basis of representation in the two bodies cannot be compared with each other.

Let us see if this is not so: The several States of the Union are in themselves, as to all those powers not delegated to the national government, supreme—foreign to each other as States. When, therefore, in the formation of the federal government, the limitation was agreed upon as to representation in the Senate of the United States, it was to preserve the rights of the smaller States; while population was made the basis of representation in the lower House of Congress, it was not made the basis in the formation of the Senate. In the latter body a totally different rule was adopted; to protect the smaller states, or rather to give them the power to protect themselves, an equal representation was given to each State; they could thereby prevent coalitions among the larger States to oppress the smaller by unequal and unjust laws, and it will be remembered that these Senators are not elected by the people at all; they have no direct voice in choosing Senators in the National Legislature, because they represent States and not people. Who pretends to say that any county in the State of Pennsylvania stands in the same attitude to the State at large as Delaware or Rhode Island, or any of the smaller States, stands to the general government? Counties always formed a part of the State itself as a unit; the territory composing it was always within the lines of the State; for the sake of convenience or for political effect that territory has, from time to time, been sub-divided and new counties have been formed. How then can they be compared to the several States included in the Federal Union? It will be perceived at a glance that they cannot be said to stand in the same relation to the State of which they form a part, as the several States do to the government.

They do not, in any sense, present the same phase of affairs, and the rule that is applied in the one case ought not to be applied in the other, because they are very different in their public relations. I have already shown that there is no comparison between them.

Now when our forefathers established this Commonwealth and adopted the double system of two Houses of the Legislature, they had another view than that presented by the English or French Legislature, or that of the United States.

They made one branch changeable annually, so as to reflect the immediate will of the people, susceptible of change each year at the annual election, but in the event of a flood-tide sweeping over the State, as occasionally it does, in favor of some idea, before that should be stamped upon the legislation of the State by the first thought of the people, and to operate as a check, the other House stands as a barrier until the people can have time to think again. If one House should be swayed by such an idea, the other elected for a different term comes in as a check, and may prevent a possible wrong from being carried out, and affords the people an opportunity for their sober second thought before their will could have full effect. The upper branch of our Legislature was made changeable only by the elections of two years. One-third of the Senate being elected each year, it takes two elections in every three years to bring that body into accord with that tide of public opinion, which might operate injuriously, an opportunity was given to the people in the meantime for reflection. One election is insufficient to carry both Houses, and by our system the people may think twice before an evil is suffered that may be irreparable. It was for that reason, and for that reason alone, under the Constitution of 1790, as well as in the agreement of 1786, that it was determined to have two Houses in the Legislature, one elected annually, the other changing but one-third each year, and taxable population was the basis of representation.

The intention, certainly, was up to 1838 that all parts of the State should have their equal representation upon the floor of the Senate as well as upon the floor of the House. In 1838 the taxable inhabitants was still continued as the basis in the Senate, with the limitation, however, "that no city or county should have more than four Senators."

Why, sir, just look at the anomaly of such a principle, as it stands to-day, in the light of the civilized world. Under the present apportionment of the members of the lower House of Congress, twenty-seven members are assigned to the State of Pennsylvania, and Philadelphia is entitled to elect, and will elect, five members, exclusively within its limits; and yet, when we come to our own State, in our own Senate, we are entitled to only four members out of thirty-three, while in the National Congress we obtain five members out of twenty-seven. Surely this is an important element in the discussion of this question. The immediate proposition, however, before the Convention is even more infamous than the present existing rule. The proposition is, as I understand it, that the Senate of the State of Pennsylvania shall be composed of not less than sixty members, nor more than one hundred; but that no city or county shall ever be entitled to more than six Senators. I believe it may always be conceded that in the division which may be made, the maximum number of representatives will be invariably adopted, and so, if the State is allowed to be divided into one hundred Senatorial districts, there will be one hundred Senators, and out of this number of Senators Philadelphia is to be allowed only six, one in sixteen, while now she has nearly one-eighth—four out of thirty-three. That is the present proviso before this House. That is the proviso that this committee is called to pass upon. Our friends upon this floor are not only asked to permit the injustice that was made in 1837 to stand as the law of the land, but whether they will intensify it by reducing our proportion of Senators even less than it was made by that organic law, making it just half of what it was then, and making the injustice double; increasing it two-fold. If it was wrong then, and I contend that it was, I have not heard any argument to the contrary; if it was wrong then, the adoption of this proviso making the number not less than sixty, or exceeding one hundred, and allowing Philadelphia only six, will increase the evil, and make it double what it is now.

Another thought that I think has just been answered by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, (Mr. Gilpin,) is that the burthen of proof in this case does not rest upon Philadelphia. It does not rest with us to show that it ought not to be so. Either the Senate of Pennsylvania is the representative of the people of Pennsylvania or it is not. What is it, then? If, in the organization of our State government, they had adopted the system in vogue in New Jersey, declaring that each county should have but a single Senator, and if we had retained that as a part of the organic law, it would then be territory that was represented. But they did not do that. They made population the basis of representation, and kept it up until 1837, and even then and now, under the present limit, restricting, as it does, to a certain extent, the representation of one county, population was and is still the basis of representation. Even though there was a limitation in the organic law after 1837, that no city or county should have more than four Senators, I say that in the main population has been really the basis of representation in the State Senate from the foundation of the government to the present hour, with the single limitation of 1837, that there shall not be more than four Senators to any one city or county.

When I spoke the other day on this subject, I think I showed the reason why this limitation was imposed, and I think I showed that the reason upon which it was founded had long since ceased. Therefore I urge, in the language of the old law-makers, that when the reason of a rule ceases the rule ought to cease with it. I trust, sir, that under this view at least, this injustice will not be perpetuated, and I protest that we should have the same justice meted out to us as to any other portion of this Commonwealth, as will be meted out to Allegheny county, where Pittsburg is growing to be one of the first cities in the Union; to Dauphin, where Harrisburg is located, and may become a city with a large population; to Berks, with her Reading; to Lancaster, with her improving city; to Luzerne, with her thriving cities of Wilkesbarre, Scranton and Pittston; or to any other portion of the State where there are no populous cities and only a sparse population.

On the question of agreeing to the amendment to the amendment, to strike out the proviso, a division was called, which resulted: Thirty-seven in the affirmative, and forty-nine in the negative. So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

A STATE BOARD OF DIVISION.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment, to strike out the pending amendment, and insert as follows:

"SECTION —. At the general election in the year 1881, and every tenth year thereafter, there shall be chosen, by a vote of the electors of the State at large, ten commissioners of apportionment, whose duty it shall be to divide the State into Senatorial and Representative districts, and assign to each thereof its proper representation, but any such apportionment, or report thereof, shall be concurred in by at least seven commissioners. In the election of said commissioners each voter shall vote for not more than five persons, and the ten persons highest in vote shall be declared elected. Any vacancy in the number of said commissioners shall be filled by an apportionment, to be made by such of the remaining commissioners as shall have been voted for by a majority of the same electors who shall have voted for the commissioner whose place is to be filled. The commissioners shall severally possess all the qualifications for office required of members of the State Senate, shall be sworn or affirmed, and shall be ineligible to an election to either House of the Legislature, under an apportionment made by them, for a period of five years.

SECTION —. In the formation of Senatorial and Representative districts, regard shall be had to compactness of territory, and to the convenience of intercourse and similarity of interests among the people proposed to be united in a district. But the general basis of every apportionment (except so far as the application thereof shall be controlled by this Constitution) shall be the returns of population contained in the most recent decennial census of the United States; and every apportionment shall be made to secure, as nearly as may be, the proportional full and present representation of each division of the electors of the State at large and of the several sections thereof, as exhibited in the returns of popular elections. No city or county shall be divided in the formation of a Senatorial district, unless its population shall entitle it to two or more Senators.

SECTION —. The number of Senators and Representatives under any apportionment of the State shall not exceed sixty Senators and one hundred and eighty Representatives, nor be less than fifty-five Senators and one hundred and sixty-five Representatives.

SECTION —. As soon as conveniently may be after each decennial census of the population of the United States, an apportionment of Senators and Representatives to the several parts of the State shall be made by districts, and such districts shall remain unchanged until after the next decennial census, but no former apportionment shall in any event authorize the election of Senators or Representatives after the third year in any decennial period.

FOR SCHEDULE.

SECTION —. All terms of Senatorial service shall expire in the year 1875, and in that year Senators shall be chosen under the amendment to the Constitution, those from districts with even numbers to hold their seats for two year terms, and those from districts with uneven numbers for four year terms, and thereafter all Senators shall be chosen for four year terms; until 1875 Senators shall be chosen under the existing apportionment of the State, but for terms to expire in that year.

Representatives chosen in the year 1873, and afterward, shall be chosen under the amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: This amendment, although offered by me, is substantially a report from the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, and I present it on account of the absence of the chairman of that committee. It embodies the action of that committee upon this subject, and was agreed to by that committee almost unanimously. We desire it to take the place of the present section under consideration, reported by the Committee on Legislature. We recommend a plan of apportioning the State which will take the great subject entirely out of the hands of the Legislature. And is not this necessary? Those of us who have had experience in Harrisburg know very well that the apportionment of the State into districts, whether Representative districts from which to select our State Legislature, or into districts from which to choose our Representatives to the National House of Representatives, is a subject of degeneration and of contention. It has for years caused more corruption and log-rolling than any other matter which has required the action of legislation. Particular districts have been carefully framed to suit the ambition and the convenience of particular persons, and the ingenuity of the Assembly has been exerted as carefully to form other districts to exclude other members from returning to their seats under the new apportionment, while always the entire districting of the State has been designed to increase the interests and preserve the power of the political party which happened, at the time, to be in the majority at Harrisburg. The State knows, as a matter of record, how, when the last apportionment was made, the Legislature stood blocked for weeks, and important legislation was neglected, while the apportionment bill engrossed the attention of the Assembly.

By this proposition, which is intended to hereafter prevent any such legislation at Harrisburg, the entire subject of dividing the State into districts, from which the members of the Legislature shall be chosen, is left to a board of ten commissioners, into whose deliberations partisan influence cannot enter. They are proposed to be elected just as the members to this Convention were elected. We tried to divest the board of any party character, and so provided that while five shall be elected on one general ticket and five on another, dividing them equally between the great political parties, the concurrence of seven must be necessary to determine their decision. I am not pertinacious as to this number. If the Convention choose to make it eight, I will be entirely satisfied to say that the board shall not act officially unless eight out of the ten concur. The consequence of this will be that both parties must agree to the apportionment, and then when the districting is done it will be fair and not partisan.

We then, sir, presumed to fix the number of Senators and Representatives, but we did not fix it absolutely. We did not place it at an arbitrary number, because we wanted it to be flexible—

MR. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I rise to a point of order. The amendment of the gentleman from Carbon is not germane to the proposition before it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot rule the amendment out of order, but it would, perhaps, be better if it were withdrawn, and the vote taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Chester, when, if it be voted down, the gentleman from Carbon can renew his proposition.

MR. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I think it is entirely germane. It is a second amendment. It takes the place of the other exactly in case it is adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. While it may not be out of order, the Chair does not regard it as germane to the amendment already under consideration, and would suggest that it be withdrawn until a vote is had on the other.

MR. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I do not know but the committee may vote in the proposition of the gentleman from Chester, and if it does we would have no control over it. So I shall insist on it.

We have then, Mr. Chairman, to resume my remarks, fixed the Senate in numbers at not more than sixty or less than fifty-five, and the House of Representatives at not more than one hundred and eighty or less than one hundred and sixty-five. We have named a limit of numbers and yet not an arbitrary limit. And for this reason: We want to give this board of commissioners, this board of apportionment, a little room to fix up the fractions that always occur in districting, and that under an inflexible number create unavoidable difficulty in determining an apportionment. The Senate may be sixty in number, or it may be fifty-five. The House of Representatives may be one hundred and eighty, or it may be one hundred and sixty-five. These numbers may not suit the committee. In fact some of the members of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation desired larger numbers, and some of us are pledged to vote for the highest number that any one will propose in the Convention. But, without going into a discussion at this time upon that subject, I will simply state that the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation deem this is a better section than that reported by the Committee on Legislature. As I said before, in the commencement of my remarks, I have made this statement in the absence of the chairman of the committee who have drafted this amendment. It was placed into my hands by him with a request that I offer it as an opportunity occurred, and I make this explanation in his behalf.

Mr. Dobb. Mr. Chairman: Those who advocate an increase of Representatives expect to accomplish thereby certain objects which all will admit are desirable. If by increasing the number of the legislative body it will thereby become more elevated in character, more learned, more difficult to corrupt, better acquainted with the local wants of the people, and at the same time better able to comprehend the character of legislation required for the general well-being of the State, more earnest to do right, and with better knowledge of the right, by all means let the members be increased. Considerations of economy or conscience are of no consequence compared with results like these.

But those who assert that such results will spring from this measure are called upon to prove the fact. It will not do merely to say that the Legislature of some State is composed of a greater number of members than the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and is more honest. Admitting the fact, it yet remains to be proven that the honesty is on account of the great number. There are many States having Legislatures composed of fewer members than the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and yet more honest. The argument works both ways, and the mere number of members has as much to do with the honesty of the body in one case as the other. The advocates of this measure must establish their claim by better argument than this.

If in a body of one hundred men selected by the people there is found twenty per cent. of rogues who may be corrupted, and thirty per cent. of imbeciles who may be deceived, if the number is increased to two hundred, will the percentage of rogues and imbeciles be any less? No one pretends that it will. But it is said the actual number of capable and honest men will be greater in the larger body than in the smaller. Perhaps so; but remember that a legislative body, like a rope, takes its character from its weakest and worst parts. The absolute number of honest men in a body is of little consequence, unless they are in the majority. Ten are as powerful in a body of twenty as fifty are in a body of one hundred.

But by increasing the number you lower the dignity and importance of the body, and, as a consequence, men of less importance and character will gain admission to it and compose it. Office is sought for by honorable men from motives of laudable ambition. Just in proportion as such office is exclusive and to be obtained by few will be the character of the men who seek after it. Make it so common that everybody can obtain it, and nobody of any consequence will have it. Hundreds of the best men in our State would not to-day accept a seat in the Legislature. Is it because the salary is so low that it does not pay? By no means. We have, in this body, evidence sufficient that public positions are not rejected by the best talent of the State because not remunerative. We have all over the State men in judicial positions on inadequate salaries, who might be winning fortunes with less labor at the bar. The best legal talent of the State seeks the position. And why? Because the office is still an honorable one. It has not yet, by small districts and short terms, been made altogether common and unclean. Increase the number of judges to such an extent that almost any lawyer can become a judge, and no lawyer of standing will accept the position. Make the office as common as that of justice of the peace, and it will be filled by men about as competent, as wise and astute as that class which Dogberry so well represented. But why dwell on this? It is evident from experience, observation, and the character of men, that the dignity and importance of any position is estimated in direct proportion to the number who may attain to it, due regard being had to the intrinsic importance of the position. Double the number of members of the Legislature, and the honor of being a member of that body will be considered about one-half as great as before. As a natural and inevitable consequence the dignity and character of its members will be lowered. It is a consequence you cannot escape. I do not say that necessarily the moral character of the members would be lowered. That would not follow, as a matter of course, because, unfortunately, as this country is now learning, to its sorrow, exalted morals is not a necessary attendant of exalted station or exalted ability. But I do say that the moral character would probably be lowered with the dignity and importance of the office. That would be the natural tendency. It would become a place for a lower grade of politicians, if in this lowest deep there is a lower depth.

But, it is said, that admitting the proportion of corrupt men is greater in a large body, there is, nevertheless, a larger number to be corrupted, and the process becomes a more difficult and expensive one. This argument is extremely fallacious. The legislative market, like any other, depends upon the supply and the demand. When the supply is scarce each one may command his own price. When the supply is great, purchasers set their prices. I don't know what the price of a man is, now, at Harrisburg, but I know that if you throw another hundred on the market, competition will be wonderfully increased, the bears will rule the day, and legislators will become dog cheap.

But who supposes that a Legislature is corrupted by simply buying up a majority of its members. Every one knows this is not the process. When the Credit Mobilier undertook to corrupt the federal Congress, it did not propose to distribute its stock among a majority of the members. On the other hand a few of the most important, most influential men were chosen to be made recipients of the stock, the company trusting wisely to their commanding abilities and good influence to control other members. And so it is in all cases. Corrupt Legislatures are so common as to excite no surprise, yet I do not believe there was ever a legislative body assembled of which a majority of the members were corrupt men. I do not believe the majority of the members of the Pennsylvania Legislature ever was or ever could be bought. How, then, are corrupt measures forced through? Who does not understand the process? The weak are by these, and by a corrupt lobby, cajoled, flattered, deceived and driven into support of the proposed measures. Every man in a public body, worth buying, is able to control more votes than his own. His price is in proportion to the number he may control. Now the facility with which a Legislature may be corrupted depends not so much upon the number of men who may be bought as upon the number of weak, dependent and gullible men who may be controlled by shrewd, powerful and designing members of the House or lobby, and who blindly follow their leaders like a flock of silly sheep. The proportionate number of such men will depend upon the dignity and importance of the body. Double the number of members, and the number of such men will be more than quadrupled.

Vice, too, is contagious. A few scoundrels corrupt the whole body. Members are sent to Harrisburg every winter who have borne good reputations, but, exposed to temptation and surrounded by an atmosphere impure and tainted, they soon become infested. Will increasing the number of members cure this disease? You might as well talk of driving the infection from a small-pox hospital by adding the patients of another small-pox hospital to it.

Now take into consideration another well known fact. By increasing the number of members you not only increase the number of scoundrels and imbeciles, the number of corrupt and corrupting men, the number of weak and credulous men, you not only lower the dignity and character of the body, by stopping the better class of men from accepting the position and rendering it more easily accessible to dirty ward politicians and political bummers, you not only increase temptation and add pollution to the already plainly polluted atmosphere—you also decrease in each member his sense of individual responsibility. Each man's sense of individual responsibility is weakened in direct proportion as the number is increased who share that responsibility with him. The idea of a double Executive, once strongly advocated, was rejected in this country, because the office was of too much importance to risk a divided responsibility. Two heads might be better than one, but one alone must bear the responsibilities of the position. In a Legislature, absolute individual responsibility is impossible, but the numbers should be so regulated as to preserve this to as great an extent as may be. It was said in the Federalist, and it may be said to be an axiom in government, "the smaller the number, and the more conspicuous the station of men in power, the stronger must be the interest which they will, individually, feel in whatever concerns the government." Just in proportion as this individual responsibility is diminished, the facility for corrupting the body is increased.

From this cause, combined with others, perhaps, it is a well known fact that a large body of men, no matter what their knowledge, virtues and character, more easily become the dupes of a few leaders than a smaller body. "In all numerous assemblies, of whatever character composed, passion never fails to wrest the scepter from reason." The famous saying of Cardinal DeRet, "that every public assembly consisting of more than one hundred members is a mere mob," may not be absolutely true, but contains the germ of a great truth. But there is absolute truth in the saying of another wise man, that "had every Athenian citizen been a Socrates, every man assembly would still have been a mob."

Is it not true, then, that a large body of men is more difficult to corrupt than a smaller one? Within certain limits it may be true. But if a Legislature of one hundred and thirty-three men are corrupt, one of two hundred and sixty-six men, less in dignity and importance, with a greater proportion of designing knaves and weak fools, with less sense of individual responsibility, less care for the interest of the State, and less study of the public welfare, would certainly be no better.

Nor is it true that a larger representation than we now have is necessary to understand the interests of the people. One member from every county, or one from every township, might understand better some minor local and special interests. But I thought we had enough of local and special legislation. I thought we considered it time for members of the Legislature to cease to regard their own locality alone, and rise to the higher duty of making laws for the State. The very devotion to local views, and feelings and interests, naturally tends to a narrow and selfish policy, and has almost destroyed all consideration for the broader, greater and more important interests of the whole Commonwealth. It has long been a reproach, and why is it held up in this argument as a virtue. Give us men with liberal and enlightened views, with a broad and general knowledge of the wants of the whole people in all their political, social and business relations, and such men will comprehend our local and special needs much better than one who knows only that and nothing more.

I am satisfied we can do something towards securing purer Legislatures; but enlarging the representation is certainly a step in the wrong direction. If there is a change in the number at all, I would prefer to see it the other way. Destroy special legislation, and let it be understood the duty of the Legislature is to make laws for a vast Commonwealth, not for wards, townships and boroughs. Destroy the corrupt outside influence, take away temptation, punish fraud, increase the character and responsibility of the body by decreasing its numbers and increasing its salary—in this direction true reform lies.

But after we have done all we can do, the responsibility for the character of their representatives rests with the people. Scoundrels must be kept out of office. Fools must be retained in the position for which nature destined them.

The people must cultivate a higher moral sentiment in political matters. When bribery and corruption in office sends a thrill of indignation through the whole community, as they should always do, bribery and corruption will be checked. No man can stand in public position against the moral sentiment of an outraged people. Party bondage must be broken. What can we expect of our representatives, so long as the people go blindly to the polls and vote for their party nominee, no matter what his character or attainments. How do we propose to keep scoundrels out of public positions so long as acts of villainy in office are hushed up for fear the party will suffer injury. How can we hope for wise and honest rulers so long as their choice is directed by a spirit of intolerance, that forgets everything but its own creed, or a spirit of party, that remembers everything but its own duty?

If the people will surrender to faction what belongs to the country, and allow "patronage and party, the triumph of a leader and the discontents of a day, to outweigh all the solid principles and institutions of government," a Constitution, however carefully prepared, can do little towards creating a just and pure Commonwealth. Who can preserve the rights of the people when they themselves abandon them? Who will keep watch in the temple when the watchmen sleep at their posts? "Republics," says a statesman, "fall when the wise are banished from the public councils, because they dare to be honest, and the profligate are rewarded because they flatter the people in order to betray them." We have reached this point in Pennsylvania, and, as a consequence, our legislation is "wise by accident and bad by system." Let not the people trust to this Convention to remedy the evil which they alone can cure.

MR. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Suffrage, I desire to interpose a motion at this stage of the debate. The amendment which has been submitted by the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) raises two important questions, which will be debatable, to wit: The number of members of which the two Houses of the Legislature shall respectively consist, and the very important question of how, and by what authority, appointments shall be made. Should that function or duty be continued in the Legislature itself, or should it be vested in some other independent authority?

The amendment raises, also, a third proposition, and that is, that a constitutional rule should be established by which apportionments shall be made. In order to the proper consideration of this amendment, and of the other amendments which may be offered, I suppose it would be proper for us to have them printed. I submit that it will be, therefore, a proper thing for the committee now to rise and report progress, and, in Convention, order the two pending amendments, both of which are of some length, and any other amendments which the members of the committee may informally desire to offer to this section of the report of the Committee on Legislature, to be printed. It will only take a few minutes. We can then go into committee of the whole again, and go through with the debate already begun upon the question of the number of Senators and Representatives that should hereafter be chosen. I suppose the discussion of that question will occupy a day or two, at least, and, in the meantime, this matter of printing can proceed, so that before we are called upon to vote we will have before us, in print, everything that has been proposed on this subject.

I move, therefore, sir, with the object of ordering the printing of this amendment, that the committee do now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

MR. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: It seems to me hardly worth our while to do that. I suggest that the Committee on Suffrage have power to order the printing of these amendments, and that it is not necessary for this committee to rise now in order to have these amendments printed. Let the committee have them printed, and let them be laid on the desks of members to-morrow. I do not see any necessity for dissolving this committee, at this time, for the mere purpose of printing the amendments, and fear that there may be some doubt as to the permission to be given to sit again. Let us go on and discuss that part of the amendment relating to the number of Representatives and Senators, which I believe it is proposed to make sixty for the Senate, and one hundred and eighty for the House.

MR. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: The Committee on Suffrage cannot order amendments to be printed; it cannot order the amendment of the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) to be printed, nor can it order the printing of any other amendment, and I have proposed, therefore, that the committee rise, in order that these may be ordered printed. It will not occupy more than five minutes, and then we can go on with the debate as to the number.

MR. J. P. WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: The amendment of the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) seems to have been printed, and I suppose the Committee on Suffrage could do the same for the other amendments.

MR. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: I suppose by unanimous consent that could be withdrawn for the present, and when we get out of the committee of the whole it could be then ordered printed.

THE CHAIRMAN. The amendment to the amendment could be withdrawn.

MR. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I suggest that as the debate has commenced upon the number of members in the respective Houses, if the gentlemen will confine themselves by common consent to that, and debate it for to-day, I think it can be profitably discussed. Let us discuss that question, whether the House shall consist of one hundred and fifty or one hundred and eighty, or otherwise, and then have the printing done by to-morrow.

MR. SIMPSON. Mr. President: I ask the unanimous consent of the Convention to offer a resolution at this time.

THE PRESIDENT. The unanimous consent of the Convention can not be permitted to interfere with the regular order of business, or else it would be impossible to make any progress in the work now before the Convention.

MR. HANNA. Mr. President: If it is in order I move that the Convention resolve itself into committee of the whole, for the consideration of the report presented by the Committee on Cities and City Characters.

The question being taken, a division was called, which resulted as follows: Ayes, thirty-six; noes, forty-two.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the report of the Committee on the Executive Department.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President: I ask leave to offer a resolution.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution is not in order at this time, and especially while the Chair is putting a question. Is it the pleasure of the Convention to proceed to the consideration of the article reported by the Committee on the Executive Department?

The question being taken, a division was called, and it was not agreed to; ayes, thirty-eight; noes, forty-six.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President: I now ask leave at this time to offer a resolution.

Leave was granted.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President: I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the following proposition be printed for the use of the Convention:

TO DIVIDE PHILADELPHIA BY THE COURTS.

SECTION —. Until the apportionment be made under the next decennial census of the United States, the city of Philadelphia shall be divided into three Senatorial districts, each thereof to choose three Senators, and into Representative districts not exceeding — in number, each thereof to choose not less than three nor more than six Representatives, under the direction of the court of common pleas of the said city, in manner following, to wit: The said court, all the judges thereof concurring, shall appoint two commissioners of apportionment, who, after being duly sworn or affirmed to perform their duties justly and truly under this Constitution, shall divide the said city into Senatorial and Representative districts as aforesaid, and make report of their apportionment to the court, subject to its unanimous approval and confirmation, and upon the confirmation thereof the same shall be entered of record in said court, and a certified copy thereof shall be transmitted to the Governor of the Commonwealth, to be by him laid before the two Houses of Legislature to be entered on their Journals; each of the Senatorial and Representative districts as formed shall have a population proportioned as nearly as may be to the number of Senators or Representatives assigned to it, and shall be composed of connected, compact territory, but no ward shall be divided into the formation thereof; the said districts shall also be formed so as to secure the proportionate, full and just representation of each division of the electors of said city, as exhibited in the returns of popular elections, and in choosing Senators and Representatives therefrom, each voter may distribute or concentrate his votes as he shall think fit, or bestow them in equal divisions upon candidates, and candidates highest in votes shall be declared elected.

SECTION —. Until the apportionment be made under the next decennial census of the United States, the city of Pittsburgh shall be entitled to choose one Senator and three Representatives, and the county of Allegheny three Senators and nine Representatives, and the Representatives from said city, and the Senators and Representatives from said county, shall be voted for and chosen in the same manner as the Representatives from the city of Philadelphia, under the preceding section.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. President: I offer the following as an amendment, to be printed along with the resolution:

FIFTY SENATORIAL DISTRICTS.

"SECTION —. The State shall be divided into fifty Senatorial districts of compact and contiguous territory, and as of equal a number of taxables as possible, and each district shall be entitled to elect one Senator. No county shall be divided in the formation of a district unless such county is entitled to two or more members, and no city or county shall be entitled to more than one sixth of the number of members."

Mr. CORSON. Mr. President: I offer the following proposition as an amendment, to be printed along with the resolution:

EACH COUNTY TO HAVE A SENATOR.

"That every county in the State shall be entitled to one Senator, and the whole population of all the counties divided by the number of counties shall be the basis of Senatorial representation of all cities containing a population exceeding one hundred thousand."

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. President: I desire to offer the following proposition, mainly in connection with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Corson,) and ask that it be printed along with the resolution:

ONE REPRESENTATIVE FOR FORTY THOUSAND INHABITANTS.

Every county shall be entitled to one Representative, and for every forty thou-and inhabitants shall be entitled to an additional member in the lower House of Representatives.

The manner of ascertaining the population of counties shall be prescribed by law, and whenever it shall appear that any county has attained the requisite population for an additional member, the Governor shall make his proclamation of the same, and the additional member or members shall be elected at the next general election thereafter.

REPRESENTATIVE DISTRICTS.

MR. HEMPHILL. Mr. President: I offer the following amendment, and ask that it be printed:

"SECTION —. The Senate shall be composed of one Senator from each county.

"SECTION —. The House of Representatives shall be composed of three times as many members as there are members of the Senate; and the General Assembly shall ascertain the ratio of representation every ten years, beginning at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, by dividing the population of the State according to the last preceding federal census, by the number of members required, and the quotient, excluding fractions, shall be the ratio of representation. The General Assembly shall, at the same time, apportion the State as follows:

"Every county having the ratio shall have one Representative; if double the ratio, two Representatives, and so on. Counties not having the ratio shall be formed into Representative districts by being united with a contiguous county or counties, and shall be entitled to representation in the same manner as is provided for single counties. But no Representative district shall be composed of more than three counties; nor shall any county be divided; nor shall any two counties, each of which shall have the ratio required to entitle it to one Representative, but united in one district. And those counties and districts having one or more Representatives, and the largest fraction of the ratio remaining, shall be entitled each to an additional Representative until the whole number required shall be obtained."

THIRTY THOUSAND INHABITANTS A BASIS.

MR. MANN. Mr. President: I desire to offer the following amendment, to be printed along with the resolution:

"Representatives shall be distributed throughout the State as follows: The qualified electors of each county shall elect one Representative, and one additional for each thirty thousand inhabitants, as determined by the preceding census of the United States; and in counties entitled to three or more Representatives, each voter may cast as many votes for each candidate as there are Representatives to be elected, or may distribute the same among the candidates as he shall see fit, and the candidates receiving a majority of said vote shall be declared elected."

MR. CORBETT. Mr. President: I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

THE PRESIDENT. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion for one moment, while the Chair makes an explanation.

MR. CORBETT. I withdraw the motion.

THE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to correct a decision made a few moments ago, that the Convention could not name a time for the committee of the whole to sit again to-day after it had risen. The Chair has evidently fallen into an error, and with the consent of the Convention, this decision will be withdrawn. At what time shall the committee of the whole, having under consideration the article reported by the Committee on the Legislature, have leave to sit again?

MR. STANTON. Mr. President: I move that the committee have leave to sit again to-morrow.

The motion was not agreed to.

THE PRESIDENT. Shall the committee have leave to sit forthwith?

The question being taken, it was agreed to.

THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Committee then resolved itself into committee of the whole to further consider the report of the Committee on Legislature, Mr. C. A. Black in the chair.

THE LEGISLATURE ARTICLE.

THE CHAIRMAN. The committee of the whole have again referred to it the report of the Committee on Legislature, and the question before the committee is the amendment of the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) to the amendment of the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington.) The amendment to the amendment will be read.

THE CLERK:

SECTION —. At the general election in the year 1881, and every tenth year thereafter, there shall be chosen by a vote of the electors of the State at large, ten commissioners of apportionment, whose duty it shall be to divide the State into Senatorial and Representative districts and assign to each thereof its proper representation, but any such apportionment or report thereof shall be concurred in by at least seven commissioners. In the election of said commissioners each voter shall vote for not more than five persons, and the ten persons highest in vote shall be declared elected. Any vacancy in the number of said commissioners shall be filled by an appointment, to be made by such of the remaining commissioners as shall have been voted for by a majority of the same electors who shall have voted for the commissioner whose place is to be filled. The commissioners shall severally possess all the qualifications for office required of members of the State Senate; shall be sworn or affirmed, and shall be ineligible to an election to either House of Legislature, under an apportionment made by them for a period of five years.

SECTION —. In the formation of Senatorial and Representative districts regard shall be had to compactness of territory, and to the convenience of intercourse and similarity of interests among the people proposed to be united in a district. But the general basis of every apportionment (except so far as the application thereof shall be controlled by this Constitution) shall be the returns of population contained in the most recent decennial census of the United States; and every apportionment shall be made to secure, as nearly as may be, the proportional, full and just representation of each division of the electors of the State at large, and of the several sections thereof, as exhibited in the returns of popular elections. No city or county shall be divided in the formation of a Senatorial district unless its population shall entitle it to two or more Senators.

SECTION —. The number of Senators and Representatives, under any apportionment of the State, shall not exceed sixty Senators, and one hundred and eighty Representatives, nor be less than fifty-five Senators, and one hundred and sixty-five Representatives.

SECTION —. As soon as conveniently may be after each decennial census of the population of the United States, an apportionment of Senators and Representatives to the several parts of the State shall be made by districts, and such districts shall remain unchanged until after the next decennial census, but no former apportionment shall in any event authorize the election of Senators or Representatives after the third year in any decennial period.

FOR SCHEDULE.

SECTION —. All terms of Senatorial services shall expire in the year 1875, and in that year Senators shall be chosen under the amendments to the Constitution; those from districts with even numbers, to hold their seats for two-year terms, and those from districts with uneven numbers, for four-year terms, and thereafter all Senators shall be chosen for four-year terms. Until 1875 Senators shall be chosen under the existing apportionment of the State, but for terms to expire in that year.

Representatives chosen in the year 1873 and afterwards shall be chosen under the amendments to the Constitution.

MR. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: In presenting, for the consideration of this Convention, the amendment to which the gentleman from Carbon has offered another amendment in the nature of a substitute, I purposely avoided saying anything on the subject of the number of the Senators and Representatives that should compose the Legislature of this State, except that in framing the amendment which I offered, conceding that an addition would probably be made to the number of each House, I put in a number which would preserve a proper proportion if the present number should be increased.

I think it expedient that this committee should now, if they will, by common consent, agree to do it, turn their attention to that subject, and discuss and settle this one question first: Of what number shall the two Houses, respectively, consist? I do not feel solicitous about it, myself, but for the sake of the preservation of order in the consideration of the questions which come before us as a committee, I suggest that we had better dispose of that question now, confining our observations to that particular subject alone until it shall be disposed of.

I do not mean to enter into that discussion further than to say that in forming my amendment I had in view what I knew to be a favorite idea of a large number of members upon this floor, which was to give to each county of the State, no matter of what size it may be, at least one Representative. And you cannot do that with justice to the larger counties, unless you increase the number so as to enable you to accomplish that object. It was this that I had in view, and it was a strong reason with me in voting for an increase of Representatives. An increase of Representatives in the lower House properly and naturally calls for an increase in the Senate, also, and this was the main reason why I made provision for an increase in that branch.

This is all I have to say on that subject. I leave it, without further comment, for the members of this committee to say whether they will or will not confine their attention to that one question, and dispose of it first.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment. Is the committee ready for the question?

[Calls for question from all parts of the House.]

Mr. DARLINGTON. In one sense, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that this committee is ready for a vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew.)

Mr. DE FRANCE. Mr. Chairman: I wish to correct the gentleman. The pending amendment was offered by the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly.)

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I know the amendment was offered by the gentleman from Carbon; but, for all that, I understood it to be the amendment of the gentleman from Columbia.

If it is the intention of the committee to act upon this question now, for the purpose of taking a vote upon that amendment as a substitute for the one I offered, then I do not think we are ready for that question. I would ask the indulgence of the committee, either now or at some other time, to say something on the general subject.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I desire to explain. The amendment under consideration is not my proposition, individually, and I so stated distinctly when I presented it. It is, substantially, a report from the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, although it is not actually presented in that form. It was the result of the action of that committee, and was agreed upon almost unanimously. The Committee on Election, Suffrage and Representation was very desirous that when opportunity offered, this amendment should be presented to take the place of these two sections reported by the Committee on Legislature, and this being the only opportunity I had of submitting it, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Suffrage, I forwarded it to the desk.

I may add one word to what has been said, by the gentleman from Chester, in reference to voting upon this question now. I agree with him that the committee is not ready for the question. The Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation do not desire a premature vote taken upon this proposition. They desire to have it discussed, and a proper conclusion reached with reference to it. I have had no consultation with my colleagues of that committee, but if they thought proper to defer action upon it until it is printed and in more intelligent form for debate, I would be willing to withdraw it for the purpose of allowing the vote to be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Chester.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest either to have a vote or that the committee rise.

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. Chairman: —

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Chester has the floor, having only yielded it to the gentleman from Carbon, who desired to make an explanation.

Mr. KNIGHT. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion, and have it read for information?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment, and if there is no further discussion we must have a vote upon that or the committee must rise.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: The amendment of the gentleman from Carbon, now pending, raises, very properly, the whole question of the number of members that ought to compose the Legislature of this State. Believing that to be one of the most important questions which this Convention is called upon to decide, it seems to me that we ought to proceed with this discussion until that question is settled, before any other question is raised with regard to the Legislature.

How many members shall compose the Legislature? Various propositions have been made by different gentlemen, among whom there is a wide diversity of opinion. The gentleman from Venango, (Mr. Dodd,) who made a very able argument this morning against any increase of the members of that body, has evidently given this subject more attention than many of the rest of us. But it is a question that ought to receive the very earnest attention of every member of this Convention. While I entirely dissent from the conclusions to which he came, I may not be able at this time to convince him or any other delegate that I am correct. I have, however, some reasons which convince my own judgment that the number of members of the Legislature ought to be increased.

The first is that it was deemed wise by our fathers, in laying the foundations of our organic law, when the States of this Union were mere colonies; when neither the numbers nor the wealth, nor the business of Pennsylvania was scarcely more than a drop in the bucket compared with the proportions which it now assumes.

If the present number was necessary at the time when it was fixed clearly a far greater number is necessary now. The measures, the questions which came before the Legislature at that time, were then simple, compared with those that come before it now; and if it required one hundred members at that time to represent intelligently and properly the interests of this Commonwealth, it requires a very great increase in that number now.

That is the judgment of all our sister Commonwealths. There is no State in this Union with so small a number of Representatives compared with her population. Not a single one. Now can this uniform action of our sister States be mistaken? Are they all mistaken in supposing that it does require a larger number of Representatives properly to take care of the interests of their people? I submit that this fact is an argument in favor of increasing the membership of our Legislature. This is the uniform testimony of our sister Commonwealths and ought to have weight with us.

I utterly dissent from the position assumed by the gentleman from Venango, that an increase in number will decrease the dignity of the Legislature. I affirm, on the contrary, that it will improve it. It will bring the Legislature nearer to the people, and enable it to reflect their wishes better than a smaller number possibly can. The truth is that the various counties of this Commonwealth have grown to such large proportions, have so increased in numbers, in wealth, and in the interests, that the Representatives are practically far removed from the people, very far removed from them. To bring them closer together is the way to increase the dignity of the office of legislator.

I again dissent entirely from the gentleman from Venango, when he asserts that as you increase the numbers in the Legislature you will thereby increase the power of its corrupt influences. I maintain, on the contrary, that the power of integrity and of honesty will be increased in a far greater proportion; that it will hold good in the Legislature as it holds good everywhere, that one honest man can chase one thousand rogues if he will but have the energy to do it, and that the combined influence of honest men will be effective in the same proportion. If we elect a Legislature for Pennsylvania with one hundred members, and you can elect but one-third of them honest men, who will stand up to their duty under any and all circumstances, the power they can exert for good cannot be questioned. But if you increase the number of Representatives to three hundred, and elect only the same proportion of honest men, you will increase the power and dignity of the House by a much greater proportion. One hundred men, standing together upon principle and honesty in the Legislature, will have greater power over a Legislature of three hundred men than thirty-three honest men would have in a Legislature of one hundred; a far greater power. Men, when they come together, as has been argued here on this question of limitation, are strengthened by a concentration of force, but in a small representative body there is little chance for such concentration. Take the case as it stands, and you have in the present Legislature but twenty-five or thirty such men, and they do not feel their strength. They do not feel that they have the power to move with that strength that they would feel if there were one hundred of them. It follows naturally that this class of men will be increased in the same proportion. If you make it three hundred men instead of one hundred, it follows naturally and logically that you will increase the representative intelligent men of integrity in the same proportion. I believe it would be greater, because you would bring these men home to the knowledge of the people more. The people do not re-elect dishonest men when they know it, and, besides, I do not believe what has been so often asserted here about the dishonesty and the corruption of the Legislature. I was sorry to hear again, this morning, the same old story that we heard in the early assembling of this Convention. I thought we had heard the last of that kind of talk. There is no necessity of lugging it into any discussion coming before this body, and I do not believe in it. What I do believe, with regard to this matter, is that it is necessary for the proper representation of the people of Pennsylvania that the representatives should come home nearer to the people than they can come with a membership of one hundred men. They are too far removed. It needs more of the infusion of the people into that body, and that is to be obtained only by the increase in the number of the Representatives.

There are not to-day, in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and there has never been at any time, as I firmly believe, any considerable number of Representatives who do not intend to reflect the will of the people, but they are surrounded with subtle influences, they are persuaded by men of great ability that certain measures will not be objectionable to the people, and they are so far removed from them that they do not feel the impulse of their constituents behind them, and they do feel the influence, and the advice, and the persuasion of these men around them, and they are led to vote for measures they would never have thought of voting for if they had felt the inspiration of an honest constituency constantly near them. I think it is a lesson worth reflecting upon and worth considering in this connection, that when the New England system of representation provides of one member to about four thousand inhabitants there has been less complaint of improper influences being brought to bear successfully upon members than in Pennsylvania under our plan of one Representative to thirty-five thousand inhabitants.

In Vermont, I believe, there is the purest democracy that has ever been established. The numbers are very much larger than ours—as it is in all the New England States; and in Massachusetts, with a population of less than one-half of Pennsylvania, there is a Legislature more than twice as large as ours, and we do not find that the dignity of the Legislature of Massachusetts is at all belittled by it. Nor do the people find any difficulty in calling to their aid, in the Legislature of that State, the very best talent that it has. They have had in their Legislature the historic names of the country—Cushing, and Adams, and Hoar, and Butler, and Phillips, and Boutwell—to represent them. There is no force, therefore, in the argument of the gentlemen from Venango on this point.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALRICKS. Mr. Chairman: I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. I voted for the resolution restricting debate. I thank the committee for its kindness, but I believe the resolution ought to be enforced or rescinded, and therefore I close my remarks.

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. Chairman: I rise with the view of making a suggestion, and finding no other way of getting it before the committee, I embrace this opportunity to make a few remarks. We have evidently been "swinging around the circle," and it seems that it is difficult for any gentleman in this Convention to determine exactly what we are driving at. We have three or four reports before the Convention, one on distribution, another on the number of members that shall be fixed for the two branches of the Legislature, and various amendments and suggestions have come before us, but it does seem to me that we are getting along very slowly. Now I think we are here for the purpose of improving rather than condemning what has been done in the past.

While I am not going to say a word against the members of the Legislature, or against the corporations of the State of Pennsylvania, and while I have no other purpose than to do them justice, I believe there is a very great reform required, and it is my opinion that the only way of getting at it is largely to increase the numbers in both branches of the Legislature, and I shall give you a few reasons why I have come to this conclusion.

In the first place we know very well when promoters of corporations go to the Legislature to obtain corporate privileges they ask them for a purpose which they suppose is to benefit themselves. The Legislature is the father of that institution, or corporation, and we know very well that the child scarcely becomes able to creep before its head is turned towards Harrisburg, and it goes there for an object. When it begins to walk and run you find it there, influencing legislation in some shape or other.

Now I contend that with a largely increased number in each branch of the Legislature, coming more directly from the people, we would have a better class of members, and it would be a great deal more difficult to pass bills through the Legislature, except upon their merits. Now we all know very well the difficulties of the corporations of this Commonwealth keeping themselves from being controlled by the Legislature. If you had a larger number, this state of things, in my opinion, would not exist. The Legislature, to a certain extent, would be independent of the corporations, and the corporations independent of the Legislature. We all know that the railroad companies—I might as well speak out plainly—of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania are constantly called upon by the members of the Legislature and the members of other public bodies, for passes, not only for themselves and their families, but for many of their friends. You cannot go into a railroad office in this city without finding a constant flow of applications, personally and by letter, for passes for everybody of any supposed influence, for trip and annual tickets all over the State. If you had some three hundred members in the lower House, and one hundred in the Senate, the railroad companies would come to the conclusion—if the Legislature itself did not pass a law prohibiting free tickets—that they could not afford it, and therefore they would do away with the system, and thus remedy a great and growing evil. Gentlemen of this Convention may not know it, but I have been credibly informed by a party who ought to know, and does know, that the free passes over the roads of one of the incorporated companies of this State cost the stockholders five hundred thousand dollars a year. Now this is a great evil, and you cannot extend this evil without it having other injurious effects. There have been cases, not in our own State, but in one of the neighboring States that I know of, where the Legislature has been positively tampered with, where but one vote was required to make a majority for a certain purpose. I am credibly informed of a case where twenty-five hundred dollars was paid for a vote. The opposing party heard of it, and said that they would do better, and agreed to give five thousand dollars. The party bribed returned the money he had received to the first party, but before he had time to see the second party, they compromised the matter, and he lost both sums. It served him exactly right, but the parties who heard of it took it as a very great joke, that this man should not have received either the twenty-five hundred or the five thousand. Now if you have a large representation the Legislature would not continue in session so long, and I am satisfied that the State will be greatly benefited by the change. Before another Convention to revise our Constitution assembles, we will have a population in this State of at least ten millions of people, and then we will require a larger representation; and I think we had better commence the change at once.

I have drawn up my suggestion in the form of a resolution, but it not now being in order, I will simply read it for information:

Resolved, That the whole number of Senators and Representatives shall be determined by the Convention before considering the number of members that any city or district shall be entitled to.

If we confine ourselves to that one point we will be accomplishing something, and can progress with our business more rapidly.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: Upon the subject of the number of members in the two branches of the Legislature, I confess that my thoughts have not run in the same channel with those of the gentleman from Venango (Mr. Dodd.) I took the trouble to examine the various Constitutions of the several States of this Union, and the Journals of the several Houses of the Legislature, as far as they were attainable, and I have made a table which I hold in my hand, showing the disparity of numbers as represented in the various Legislatures of the different States of this Union, and I propose to read them for the information of this Committee, that they may determine, perhaps, to some extent, upon the propriety of the proposed increase, or whether it would be better to retain the present number.

Alabama has a population of 996,992; she cannot have more than thirty-three Senators nor less than twenty-five. The thirty-three would give a ratio of one Senator to 30,213 of the population. The twenty-five would give a ratio of 39,876. Her Representatives number 103, which gives a ratio of one to 9,969.

Arkansas has a population of 484,471; she has 26 Senators, giving a ratio of one to 18,633. Her Representatives are 82 in number, giving a ratio of one to 5,908.

California has a population of 560,247; has 36 Senators, giving a ratio of one to 15,562. In her House of Representatives the minimum number is fixed at 30, which would give a ratio of 18,674, the maximum is 80, which would give a ratio of 7,003.

Connecticut has a population of 537,454; 12 Senators, ratio 44,789; Representatives 240, ratio 2,239.

Delaware has a population of 125,015; 9 Senators, ratio 13,981; 21 Representatives, ratio 5,953.

Florida: Population, 187,748; 24 Senators, ratio 7,823; 51 Representatives, ratio 3,681.

Georgia: Population, 1,184,100; 44 Senators, ratio 26,912; 175 Representatives, ratio 6,766.

Illinois: Population, 2,539,891; 51 Senators, ratio 49,802; 153 Representatives, ratio 16,601.

Indiana: Population, 1,680,637; 50 Senators, ratio 33,612; 100 Representatives, ratio 16,806.

Iowa: Population 1,191,792; 50 Senators; ratio 23,836; 100 Representatives, ratio 11,918.

Kansas: Population 364,399; 25 Senators, ratio 14,576; 75 Representatives, ratio 4,859.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the ratios for the House of Representatives in each State, prefacing with the remark that the Senators usually number about from one-fourth to one-third the Representatives, and will add this table as a part of my remarks.

There is one Representative allowed in each of the following named States for the number of inhabitants stated:

Kentucky	13,210
Louisiana	7,197
Maine	4,179
Maryland	9,080
Massachusetts	6,072
Michigan, not more than	18,501
“ not less than	11,840
Minnesota	5,496
Mississippi, not more than	8,279
“ not less than	6,899
Missouri	8,607
Nebraska	3,152
Nevada	1,180
New Hampshire, about	1,050
(One for every 150 registered voters, and one for every 300 additional.)
New Jersey	15,102
New York	34,240
North Carolina	8,928
Ohio	26,653
Oregon	2,968
Pennsylvania	35,218
Rhode Island	3,019
South Carolina	5,690
Tennessee	12,712
Texas	9,095

Vermont, each town of 80 taxable inhabitants is entitled to two members; all others to one.

Virginia	8,814
West Virginia	9,404
Wisconsin, not more than	19,531
“ not less than	10,547

In the case of Vermont, if a town has 80 taxable inhabitants, its population cannot well exceed 800; that number is entitled two Representatives, so that in some of the larger towns the ratio for one Representative may be called 400, but in others it is much greater; the average for the State may, however, be set down as about 1 to 1,100 persons.

We see by this table that Pennsylvania has about one thousand more ratio than the State of New York; and those two States—leaving Ohio out—are rather more than double Indiana and Illinois, which are the next highest after these other three States.

Now, sir, my experience of the history of this country is, as was well stated by the gentleman from Potter, (Mr. Mann,) that the New England States have given less cause of complaint than any other of the States of this Union, in regard to the character of their legislation, as supposed to be swayed by corrupt motives, and we find that Connecticut is represented upon the floor of the House of Representatives to the extent of one member to 2,239 persons, and in the Senate one to 44,789; Maine is represented in the House of Representatives to the extent of one to 4,179 persons, and in the Senate one to 31,789; Massachusetts in its House of Representatives has one member to every 6,072 inhabitants, and one Senator to 36,544; New Hampshire has a Representative to about 1,050 of population, and a Senator to 26,525; Rhode Island has a Representative to 3,019 of population, and a Senator for each city and county; Vermont has a Senator to 11,018 of population, and a member in the House for an average of about 1,100.

I think the gentleman from Venango (Mr. Dodd) was mistaken in the conclusions he drew from his researches. I think an examination of the acts of Assembly of the various States of this Union will show that purer legislation will be found in those States that are represented by the largest number in proportion to population. I think no one can avoid coming to that conclusion from the very nature of the case. It will be still more curious to observe that the sessions of the Legislatures having the most numerous bodies are the shortest in point of duration; while those that are the lesser in numbers, proportionately to population, are the longest in session. If the length of time occupied in making the laws, together, with the number of the laws, can be said to be an evil, as it has been said to be, then, I think, that upon the policy of having larger Houses and shorter sessions we can get less evils than we have now. I am therefore prepared to vote for the largest number of Senators and Representatives that will be named on this floor.

For the purpose of reference, I now read and add the following table as part of my remarks:

Mr. DE FRANCE. Mr. Chairman: I desire to add a few words to what has been said as to the increase of the number of members of the Legislature, as I have had the matter under consideration for some time.

I think experience is the best guide in a matter of that sort. If we had had no experience to refer to, the argument of the gentleman from Venango (Mr. Dodd) would have great weight with me, for he is an intellectual and highly cultivated gentleman. The experience of the different States of this Union has been entirely different to that which could have been expected according to the logic of that gentleman. The practical workings of large Houses for legislative bodies and of small ones has been directly the reverse of what he seems to think. I agree fully with the gentleman from Potter (Mr. Mann) and those who have spoken on that side of the question. In furtherance of that side of the argument, I wish to read a letter which I have received from the Governor of Vermont.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
STATE OF VERMONT.
MONTPELIER, Februray 7, 1873. }

Hon. R. M. De France:

DEAR SIR:—Your favor of 24th ult. was received in my absence. I hasten to reply.

We have in this State two hundred and forty-one incorporated towns, each of which is entitled to a Representative. Generally there are some towns unrepresented. The House seldom falls below two hundred and thirty for actual business. Our Senate consists of thirty members, elected by fourteen counties. We have often attempted to reduce the number of Representatives, but we have always failed. The main ground of failure—and I think so, too—is the security it gives us against corruption. I think to-day the reason against lessening the number is stronger than at any prior period in the history of this State. The experience of some of the sister States, for a few years past, I think has irrevocably established the wisdom of our policy in the minds of the people. I most heartily concur in this opinion, that it prevents fraud and corruption.

I am, sir, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
JULIUS CONVERSE.

I have also, Mr. Chairman, received a letter from Governor E. A. Straw, of New Hampshire, on this subject. I inquired specially as to whether he thought a large number of Representatives gave security against corruption. He says:

"There has never been any corruption charged in our House of Representatives."

That body is very large, consisting of three hundred and sixty members.

I have also a letter from the Governor of Connecticut, Governor Jewell, in which he says:

"In my opinion a large number of Representatives is a certain guard against corruption;" and, he goes on to say, "I am proud to say that there has never been any corruption of the Legislature. What is true of this is equally true, I think, of all the New England States."

There is an old saying that "the proof of the pudding is in the eating." Now what are the facts in this matter? That the Legislatures of those States who have had the largest representation have always been the most honest. Some men pretend to ascribe this to the fact that there is nothing to steal in New England—that therefore there was no incentive to bribery. Well, sir, Massachusetts is rich and Boston is rich. They have United States Senators to elect there just as we have, or as they have in Kansas or any where else; and we find that when the New England men come out here they are not very much more scrupulous than we are. They believe in getting all they can, and keeping all of it as long as possible. They are about as avaricious as the Pennsylvanians.

I have thought about this a great deal, and I have particularly endeavored to inform myself concerning the operations of this subject in other States, and from all the information I have received, as well as from my own consideration of the question, I do believe that the representation in our Legislature ought to be increased to the largest extent. I shall, therefore, vote for the largest proportion of representation for this State, and then, if I can not obtain that, I will have to come down a little. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have nothing further to say in connection with this question, and all I have said has only been by way of confirmation of what has been so ably argued in this Convention.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: I move that the committee rise and report progress.

The motion was agreed to.

IN CONVENTION.

The committee then rose, and the President resumed the chair. The chairman of the committee of the whole reported progress, and asked leave for the committee to sit again, which was agreed to, and to-morrow was named.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. President: I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

So the Convention thereupon, at one o'clock and forty-five minutes, adjourned.

FIFTY-FIFTH DAY.

SATURDAY, March 1, 1873.

At ten o'clock A. M. the President called the Convention to order, and announced that there was not a quorum of members present.

Mr. MANN. Mr. President: I would suggest that the roll of members be called, in order to ascertain whether there is a quorum present, or whether there will be likely to be a quorum.

The CLERK called the roll, and the following members answered to their names:

Messrs. Achenbach, Alricks, Andrews, Baer, Baily, (Perry,) Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Black, Charles A., Bowman, Boyd, Brown, Carter, Clark, Craig, Darlington, De France, Edwards, Ewing, Fulton, Guthrie, Hay, Howard, Knight, Lawrence, M'Allister, MacConnell, M'Culloch, M'Murray, Mann, Mantor, Metzger, Minor, Niles, Purviance, John N., Purviance, Samuel A., Sharpe, Simpson, Smith, Henry W., Smith, W. H., Stanton, Struthers, Turrell, Walker, Wetherill, Jno. Price, Wherry, White, Harry, White, J. W. F., Wright and Meredith, President —48.

NOT PRESENT. — Messrs. Addicks, Ainey, Armstrong, Baker, Bannan, Barclay, Bardsley, Bartholomew, Beebe, Bidle, Black, J. S., Brodhead, Broomall, Buckalew, Campbell, Carey, Cassidy, Church, Cochran, Collins, Corbett, Corson, Cronmiller, Curry, Curtin, Cuyler, Dallas, Davis, Dodd, Dunning, Elliott, Ellis, Fell, Finney, Funck, Gibson, Gilpin, Gowen, Green, Hall, Hanna, Harvey, Hazzard, Hemphill, Heverin, Hopkins, Horton, Hunsicker, Kaine, Lamberton, Landis, Leat, Lilly, Littleton, Long, M'Camant, M'Clean, MacVeagh, Mott, Newlin, Palmer, G. W., Palmer, H. W., Parsons, Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Patton, Porter, Pughe, Purman, Read, John R., Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, James L., Reynolds, S. H., Rooke, Ross, Runk, Russell, Smith, H. G., Stewart, Temple, Van Reed, Wetherill, J. M., White, David N., Woodward and Worrell —85.

Mr. EDWARDS. [After some minutes delay.] Mr. President: I move that we do now adjourn, since we cannot get a quorum.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring in the members.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PURMAN asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Charles A. Black for a few days.

Mr. STANTON asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Brown for a few days.

Mr. NEWLIN asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Bardsley for a few days.

Mr. WORRELL asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Addicks for a few days.

Mr. DARLINGTON asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Boyd for a few days.

DEBATE IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Mr. MANN offered the following resolution, which was laid on the table under the rules:

Resolved, That hereafter in committee of the whole no delegate shall speak longer than fifteen minutes at one time, nor more than once on the same proposition.

SESSIONS OF THE CONVENTION.

Mr. HOWARD offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That on and after Monday next this Convention will meet at ten o'clock A. M., and adjourn at one o'clock P. M., and will meet at three o'clock P. M., and adjourn at six o'clock P. M.

On the question to proceed to a second reading and consideration of the resolution, a division was called and it was not agreed to. Ayes, twenty; noes, sixty-five.

Mr. BAER offered the following resolution, which was laid on the table under the rules:

WHEREAS, All resolutions adopted by this Convention which operate as a change, alteration or modification of rule XXV, have thus far only impeded the progress of the business of the Convention, and, in effect, are a dead letter upon the record; therefore,

Resolved, That all resolutions violative of rule XXV be and are hereby rescinded and annulled, and the rule re-instated as originally adopted.

THE REVISION OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE offered the following resolution, which was laid on the table under the rules:

Resolved, That the following method be adopted in revising the Constitution:

First. That the articles and titles of the Constitution be as follow:

PREAMBLE.

- ART. 1. Declaration of Rights.
- ART. 2. Distribution of Powers.
- ART. 3. The Legislative Department.
- ART. 4. The Executive Department.
- ART. 5. The Judicial Department.
- ART. 6. Elections and Suffrage.
- ART. 7. Education and Labor.
- ART. 8. Municipal Corporations.
- ART. 9. Corporations other than Municipal.
- ART. 10. Taxation, Finance, Public Debt.
- ART. 11. Disqualification for Office.
- ART. 12. Official Terms, Vacancies, Salaries.
- ART. 13. Impeachment and Removal from Office.
- ART. 14. Miscellaneous.

SCHEDULE.

Second. That the standing committees make their reports under one of the above articles; and when two or more have subjects which should be embraced in the same article, they unite in reporting a full article.

Third. That section four of rule VII be stricken out, and section six be changed as follows:

I. The articles and sections shall be considered in consecutive order first in committee of the whole.

II. After all the articles and sections shall have been considered in committee of the whole, they shall be considered in the same order in Convention on second reading.

III. They shall then be considered in the same order in Convention on third reading.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I have the honor to submit the report of the Committee on Legislation, and ask that it be read.

The CLERK read the report.

The PRESIDENT. The remaining section is one which the committee requests shall be submitted to a separate vote of the people. The Chair does not think that such section can properly form part of the article.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: With all due deference to the Chair, I would state that the Committee on Legislation incorporated that section in their report in obedience to the petitions received here from thousands of the citizens of Pennsylvania, asking for the submission to the people of a separate article of that kind. The majority of the Committee on Legislation thought it would be wise to place that section in their report.

The PRESIDENT. The section will be received as part of the article if the Committee on Legislation think fit to take out the words relating to the separate vote. That is a subject which belongs primarily to the Committee on Schedule.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: The understanding of the committee was that on this question the committee to which it should be referred should exercise their judgment as to the manner in which it should be reported to the Convention. After having passed from the hands of the Committee on Legislation it is, of course, the property of the Convention, and the Convention can require that subject matter to be submitted to a separate vote of the people or not, just as they deem fit.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair feels bound not to receive this in its present shape. He regrets it very much, especially as the chairman of that committee seems to think that it is in order.

There are two distinct subjects involved in the proposition. The first is whether this Convention will agree to the section proposed, and the second is if they do agree to it whether it should be submitted as a separate question to the people. Now these two cannot go together. The first question would be whether it is to be submitted as a separate article, and when the Convention agreed to that the section might be negatived. If the chairman will withdraw that part of his report the section will be read.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I do not feel myself authorized to withdraw any portion of the report, inasmuch as I have been instructed to present it just as it has been presented by the majority of the committee, after full discussion and understanding. It was apprehended by the majority of the committee that all questions which have been passed upon by the committee should be submitted at this time, and that the report, therefore, would be incomplete if this clause had not been put into it.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair regrets very much that he cannot receive the report now. He cannot receive a report that mixes up an article with a recommendation of what should be done hereafter. This article has now been read the first time. It will be laid upon the table and printed.

COPIES OF THE NINTH CENSUS.

The PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Hon. John Scott, Senator of the United States from the State of Pennsylvania, transmitting a copy of the first volume of the ninth census of the United States, for the use and information of the members of the Convention, which was laid upon the table.

PROHIBITION.

The PRESIDENT presented a petition of numerous citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that an amendment to the Constitution may be adopted prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors.

LEGISLATION.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: Do I understand that the Chair declined to receive the report of the Committee on Legislation?

The PRESIDENT. No; the section at the end of that report, not being part of the article, but merely a recommendation of the committee, was not received.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I feel it my duty, in deference to the instructions of the Committee on Legislation, who directed me to make this report, to see that the section is entered upon the Journal. I would therefore ask that the section, as it appears in the report, be read by the Clerk and entered upon the Journal.

The PRESIDENT. The Clerk will read the section.

The CLERK read:

TO BE SUBMITTED FOR A SEPARATE VOTE.

SECTION —. No license shall be granted to sell vinous, spirituous or malt liquors, or any admixture thereof, or any other intoxicating drinks, and any sale of such liquors, except for mechanical, medicinal or sacramental purposes, shall be a misdemeanor, and punished as shall be provided by law.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the further consideration, in committee of the whole, —

EASTERN PENITENTIARY.

Mr. SIMPSON. I desire to ask a question. The Convention accepted the invitation of the inspector of the Eastern penitentiary to visit that institution, and assigned this afternoon for that purpose —

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman is not in order. The next business before the Convention is the further consideration, in committee of the whole, of the article submitted by the Committee on the Legislature.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Convention then, as in committee of the whole, Mr. Charles A. Black in the chair, proceeded to the further consideration of the article reported by the Committee on the Legislature.

Mr. JOHN N. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I do not intend to speak on the question as to the representation of cities, which has been so elaborately discussed by the able and learned gentlemen who have addressed the committee, but to confine my remarks mainly to one of the propositions contained in the amendment now before the committee. That is the amendment providing that each county shall have at least one Representative in the House of Representatives, although it may not contain the requisite ratio of representation.

I am in favor of this amendment, because I believe that no county of the State should be without a representation in the popular branch of the General Assembly.

Population is taken as the basis of representation, not because it is wholly right, but for the reason that some rule must be established in order, as far as practicable, to secure equality of representation. It is absolutely necessary, too, that a number be fixed so as to provide for additional members where the population of counties exceed the minimum fixed for a member. Whilst this mode is the one universally agreed upon in every State of the Union, it is no violation of it, as a general rule, to give to each county a member, though the population may be less; it is only in such case an exception to the rule. Each county should have a member because of its separate and independent existence as such, and the wants of the people which could be best made known by one of their own citizens. Territory, as well as population, should be considered in determining upon the right and necessity of representation. Counties, as such, are taxed, and have to bear a portion of the expenses of State government, and therefore have a clear right to demand representation, and voice and vote in all questions of taxation, as well as the location of county seats, the fixing and maintaining boundary, the location of State and county roads, the division of townships for school and other purposes, the regulation of wharfs, bridges, &c., in navigable streams.

It is well known that district representation does not confer the advantages to a new and sparsely settled county which is necessary to its development and prosperity. The district member may represent a number of adjoining counties as large as the State of Delaware; he may be, and generally is, a stranger to his constituents and their wants, and resident one hundred miles distant from them. Take, for example, the counties of Forest, Elk, Cameron, McKean, Sullivan and Potter, extending from the waters of the Susquehanna to the waters of the Allegheny. What now would the Representative from any one of the counties named know of the wants and interests of the other counties of such a district? One county may be entirely agricultural, the others mining, manufacturing and lumber. In fact such representation, as experience has proved, is almost equal to no representation whatever. In city government, in all the cities of the State, every ward, whether small or large in population, is represented in at least one branch of the city councils. No ward would be asked to submit to taxation without representation, and each ward has its own immediate representative. The regulations as to water, gas, street railways, buildings, private and public, the assessment and collection of taxes, the control and management of schools, the regulation of markets, &c., all demand representation in the councils of the law-making power for the government of cities. The same principle is carried out in the representation of Territories in Congress, each Territory having a delegate, who is entitled to a seat in the councils of the nation to protect the rights and interests of the Territory, though the population may be but a few thousand.

The principle of representation should be carried out to every county, as it is to cities and territories, without reference to population. They have their organization as counties, their courts, their county officers and their county pride, only humiliated by their want of representation in the enactment of laws which they are bound to obey.

By giving to each county a member you protect the rural districts against the ever increasing representation from the cities.

This amendment is but restoring in the new or amended Constitution the same provision which was a part of the Constitutions of 1776 and 1790, stricken out by the Convention that framed the amended Constitution of 1838. Let us get back to the old land marks from which, in this respect, we never should have departed, and thus preserve the rights, and promote the safety and welfare of the people.

From the days of the Continental Congress down to the present time, it has been a recognized fundamental principle of our system of government, that representation should be allowed to each separate community, State or county, without reference to the number of population, though the increase in numbers of Representatives was enlarged by the increase of population.

Numbers, therefore, was not a primary principle in determining the right of representation, but rather settled upon as the rule to regulate the enlargement of it.

We should make counties the basis of representation, and fix a ratio for their increase in population, so as to equalize representation, and provide such checks and balances as are necessary for a just equilibrium of legislative power.

Mr. Chairman, with a view of ascertaining how far other States have gone in recognizing the principle of county representation, I have examined the Constitutions of many of the States. I now refer to the Constitutions of twenty States, and will read the provisions contained in each as to county representation. I quote from American Constitutions:

Alabama. Vol. I, page 67: "Each county shall be entitled to at least one Representative."

Connecticut. Page 161: "The number of Representatives from each town shall be the same as at present practiced and allowed."

Florida. Page 231: "Each county one Representative at large."

Georgia. Page 260: "To each county at least one Representative."

Illinois. Page 293: "Every county or district shall be entitled to one Representative when its population is three-fifths of the ratio." Although Illinois did not go the whole length of making counties the basis of representation, yet she manifested her faith in the principle by adopting the three-fifth rule.

Iowa. Page 379: "Every county and district which shall have a number of inhabitants equal to one-half of the ratio fixed by law, shall be entitled to one Representative."

Louisiana. Page 481: "Each parish in the State shall be entitled to at least one Representative."

Maine. Page 513: "Each town having one thousand five hundred may elect one Representative."

Maryland. Page 570: "Each county in the State shall be entitled to one Senator, and each county at least two delegates."

Massachusetts. Page 632: "Every corporate town containing one hundred and fifty ratable polls may elect one Representative."

Michigan. Page 670: "Each county hereafter organized shall be entitled to a corporate Representative when it has attained a population equal to a majority of the ratio of representation."

Missouri. Page 793: "Each county having the ratio of representation, or less, shall be entitled to one Representative."

North Carolina. Volume II, page 118: "Each county shall have at least one Representative in the House of Representatives, although it may not not contain the requisite ratio of representation."

New Hampshire. Page 13: "Every town, parish or place, entitled to town privileges, having one hundred and fifty ratable male polls, twenty-one years of age and upwards, may elect one Representative."

New Jersey. Page 42. "Each county shall at all times be entitled to one member."

New York. Page 77. "Every county heretofore established and separately organized, except the county of Hamilton, shall always be entitled to one member of the Assembly."

Rhode Island. Page 261: "Each town or city shall always be entitled to at least one member."

South Carolina. Page 285: "If in the apportionment of Representatives any county shall appear not to be entitled, from its population, to a Representative, such county shall, nevertheless, send one Representative."

Vermont. Page 406: "The House of Representatives shall be chosen by ballot by the freemen of every town in the State respectively."

West Virginia. Page 891: "Every delegate, district and county, not included in a delegate district, shall be entitled to at least one delegate."

It thus appears that eighteen of the States referred to have, without qualification, adopted the principle of taking counties as the basis of representation, or in other words, of allowing each county a Representative in the popular branch of the Legislature.

Mr. DARLINGTON. What is the question up before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition of the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly.)

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: That question is rather broader than any yet discussed, and involves principles certainly of very great magnitude. I regret that it has been put before us in such a conglomerated form that it is difficult for the Convention, in the short time allotted for it in committee, to give any attention to the various departments of it, which are necessary to be discussed and understood by the body before any vote should be taken.

I did not suppose, sir, that we would be called upon at this early stage to go into the discussion of the general questions which the proposition of the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) involves. It is nothing else, sir, than whether we shall adopt entirely a new principle in the history of this State—an unknown principle of minority representation—or whether we shall adhere, on the other hand, to the acknowledged, well-understood and long-tried principle of the representation of the majority.

True, each of these separate propositions, as now presented for the consideration of the committee, involves, necessarily, the consideration of the number of which each House shall consist. The proposition of the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) proposes a Senate of sixty and a House of one hundred, with, perhaps, some modifications therefrom. The proposition which I suggest contemplates a Senate of fifty and a House of one hundred and fifty as a minimum, leaving it optional, however, with the Legislature to increase the Senate to one hundred, should they see fit, and the House to three hundred, thus leaving the proportions between the two precisely as they now are. In other words the Senate is never to be greater than one-third nor less than one-fourth the number of the House of Representatives.

When we shall have arrived at the decision of the committee on this question, we shall only have advanced one step, and possibly we may not arrive at a satisfactory decision on this question as to how many the House shall consist of, or be able to vote intelligently upon it, without, at the same time, taking into view two plans which are now presented to us by the amendments which are pending.

Are we prepared to leave the landmarks which have been the guide of our ancestors down to this day, and which are recognized as the fundamental principles upon which all governments rest, and adopt a new and untried scheme, and experiment in government in the hope of gaining something better than we have before had?

Why, sir, all republican and all free governments necessarily rest upon the will of the majority. No other foundation can any man lay with safety for a free government, State or national, than the majority of the people. That was the principle which lay at the very foundation of our institutions, and it remains to-day. I trust it shall always remain so long as free governments shall exist. It is the only principle upon which liberty can rightfully rest.

MR. CUYLER. Will the gentleman pardon a question? How does the doctrine for which he now contends support the proposition in his own amendment, that no city or county shall be entitled to more than six Senators?

MR. DARLINGTON. That I have not discussed.

MR. CUYLER. Although not discussing it, the doctrines which the gentleman contends for lie at the root of his principle.

MR. DARLINGTON. That is precisely the principle of the debate, but with regard to its application to cities or counties, I say that is a question into which I have not gone. I have not done so because it has been so much better and ably discussed by others. It has received the sanction of this body. I do not, therefore, propose to re-open it.

However unjustly the principle may be found to work, as it may be thought by gentlemen living in the city of Philadelphia, or by those who advocate a principle which they do not believe, still it is the true principle upon which all forms of government must rest. How can we then best attain the sense of the majority? If we could all be thrown into one universal Commonwealth for voting, and all vote one general ticket, undoubtedly we would in that way, having but two candidates, obtain the will of the majority, as we do in the selection of our municipal officers; but still we must bear in mind that representation must be by districts composed of communities or their divisions, as it may be thought best, and we are to so organize the government as to allow the majority in each of these communities, or divisions, to select those who are to make their laws. I said the other day what I believe is true, that in a republican government, such as ours, there will always be, and there always ought to be, minorities as well as majorities. The safety of the government requires it, while the duties of a community require that there should be no unbridled and uncontrolled majority. There should be both majorities and minorities, and the stronger, the more powerful and the more talented the minority the safer will be the government of the majority; but while I say that, I nevertheless am unwilling to yield a single jot of the principle that the majority must rule. It must be the majority of the people of the community who shall elect their Representatives, and that is the principle I advocate.

Now what is that other principle which has been proposed here by the gentleman from Carbon, (Mr. Lilly,) but which is more popularly and better known as emanating from the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew?) It is that there shall be no representation if the district consists of two or more members of the majority, but there shall be representation of both parties in the district by a system of voting known as the minority system and the cumulative system. In either event the purpose is, that we shall elect, in districts composed of two or more parties, one from each political party. Now, sir, upon what is this idea based? It is based upon the idea that a gentleman, when elected to the Legislature in either branch, is no longer a representative of the people who sent him there, but of the party that elected him; and this evil, this mistake, lies at the very foundation of the whole system of minority representation. There is the wrong; there is the mistake committed by those who advocate the minority representation system; and I say it is a heresy in politics, and a heresy in government for any one to suppose that one who is elected to office, and bound by the duty he undertakes to discharge the duties of that office, is, in any sense or in any extent the representative of that party who send him to a legislative body. He is the representative of the whole people. Was not the distinguished gentleman, who sits at my right, (Mr. Curtin,) the loyal and faithful war Governor of Pennsylvania, the representative of the whole people of the Commonwealth, and not of one particular party, when he held that office? Was my friend who sits near me, (Mr Woodward,) the representative of the party who elected him to that high position of a Supreme Justice, or was he not placed upon that bench to discharge his duty with "even-handed justice," amid all the interests of the people of this Commonwealth? Why the mere statement of the proposition refutes the notion that any man who enters a legislative body, judicial position, or assumes the gubernatorial chair, does so as the representative of his party. He holds these positions as the representative of the whole community, and it is rightly so. It could not be otherwise.

You may tell me that no man forgets his political antecedents; that no man who is elected to office as a republican ceases to be a republican, and no man elected as a democrat ceases to be a democrat. If true, and I admit that a man may form an opinion that the political principles which he advocates are the best for the welfare of the country, but he acts in accordance with his judgment and his convictions. I do not expect a man to forget that. I do not expect to be less a republican when I leave this Hall than when I came into it; but when I come here my duty is to assist in forming a Constitution that shall be equal in its benefits and its disadvantages upon all parties of the State. I say, therefore, that we must not forget the true theory is, that when elected, no matter by what party, the individual elected is the representative of the whole people who joined in his election, and not of the party who is successful in the election. Then, sir, what is gained by permitting the majority thus to rule? You have men chosen who are supposed to be the best qualified, though in point of fact, the choice of the people may not fall upon the best men, but they must be, at least, among the best men, because the majority have so decided, and hence, upon this principle was enunciated the old Roman maxim—vox populi, vox Dei—the voice of the people is the voice of God. In a republican form of government this principle must be accepted, because it is the unalterable voice of the majority of the people upon which rests the responsibility of government. Are we about to attempt a new and untried scheme by which we shall not send into our legislative halls the men elected by the majority alone, but also the minority a proportionate representation? Is it safe to make such a radical change, and would it not be treading on untrodden ground, and inaugurating a perilous movement in government? When did this new notion originate, and where? It has been tried, I know, in England, to some extent; but as the British Parliament is composed of a large body of men, it is possible that the inconvenience of minority representation may not be perceived, and we know not what its operation may be there. In Illinois, I am aware, they have endeavored to put this system in operation, but with what success I know not, except that they have elected a body under its operations; but this I do know, that when the question of minority representation was submitted to the people of that State there was less than a majority of the whole people who voted in favor of the system. It was submitted, it is true, at a season of the year when the vote would necessarily be small, but there was a majority of between nineteen and twenty thousand in favor of it, while the whole vote cast upon the adoption or rejection of the amendments to the Constitution did not exceed, I think, one-half of the whole population of the State. There was less than one-half of the people of the whole State voting upon a question of changing the fundamental law of the State.

Where else has it been tried and with what success? It has been tried in the formation of this body. What has been the result? Not entirely in the formation of the whole of this body, but the principle has been adopted in the election of every member of the body. In the State at large a ticket was voted for by each party; in the city of Philadelphia the same; in the city of Pittsburg the same; in the various country districts the same, with what result we know. On the general tickets in the State and in the cities mentioned the delegates were divided equally between the two political parties, and in the Senatorial districts two of one party and one of the other were elected.

Now, in order to ascertain how nearly this answers to the popular will, let us inquire whether this House, situated as it is, represents the popular will of the State? And just here I beg to be understood. I am here, Mr. Chairman, finding no fault with the election of anybody. I am here to act with friends and statesmen of all parties to do the best for the common good. But upon the distinct question, which I propose to consider, how does this Convention represent the will of the people who sent us here? It is well known that in the organization of this body there was a majority, I think, of five. I beg pardon for thus alluding to party; I do it in no invidious sense. There was a majority of five. Is that the majority which represents or should represent the great political party which is the controlling power in this Commonwealth, or should that majority be much larger? If I calculate aright there would have been in this body, had it been elected by majorities, as parties generally are, instead of a majority of five, a majority of eleven or as nearly eleven as possible—ten and a very large fraction. That would have been the result. I do not speak without the book, and if the committee will indulge me for a moment I will show what I mean. For instance, take the Senatorial districts alone, leaving out of consideration altogether the gentlemen who were elected upon the State ticket and in the city of Philadelphia and in the city of Pittsburg, all of whom received half the votes cast or thereabouts; take the Senatorial districts alone. You have of republican votes cast for the republican candidates elected to this Convention 554,753, and for the democratic candidates 302,532 in all the Senatorial districts of the State. The whole vote of the State, therefore, given for the members of this Convention, in all the Senatorial districts for the Senatorial candidates, was 657,285.

Now a moment's attention and a single moment only to this. The ratio of votes is $6,639\frac{1}{2}$ for each member, and this will give 53 republican members and 46 democratic out of the 99, a republican majority of 7. Or take the popular majority, which is 52,221 republican, and the same ratio will give 7 members and a large fraction, 7 and $57\text{-}63$, very nearly 8 members, as the republican majority. Now, sir, you may carry that out with the same result, but I will detain the committee with no further comments upon that subject. I take these figures from the official vote given at Harrisburg. Probably there may have been a few scattering votes not affecting the general result. Thus you will perceive that even this body of as honorable men as ever were assembled, of both parties, leaving out myself—as my friend from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) would say. I am fond of speaking of this body as an honorable and very intelligent body, and leaving myself out, as honorable a body as ever were assembled, composed of the best members of both political parties—nevertheless even this body does not reflect the popular will by reason of this minority system of representation adopted by the Legislature in our election. Mind I am finding no fault whatever in the organization of this body. We are doing well enough. But what I do say is that it is no certain way of giving expression to the popular judgment, the public feeling of this Commonwealth. Had the true majority system been applied to the formation of this body, the republicans would have been, instead of in a majority of five, at least in a majority of seven, or eight or nine, the difference perhaps being of no consequence in the general result.

MR. DE FRANCE. Mr. Chairman: I desire to ask the gentleman from Chester if this Convention does not, in this way, represent more of the people of Pennsylvania than if it represented only the majority of the people.

MR. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I do not know how that can possibly be made out. How are you to ascertain the wishes of the people of Pennsylvania, but by taking the sentiment of the majority? I grant you it gives a larger representation to the minority, and therefore it is better for their wishes. But when you remember, and we must remember, that all republican governments rest on the will of the majority, we are not allowing to that will its scope and power, but we are giving to the minority a representation which does not belong to them. I do not know whether it is my friend from Mercer (Mr. De France) or my friend from Montgomery (Mr. Boyd) who is liable to this objection, but certain it is that a large number of republican votes have no votes here to represent them, and there are a number of democratic votes in this body who have no constituents. I am not objecting sir, to the composition of this body, but I am referring to the principle of whether it is right in organizing the government of this State, to provide any system which shall not reflect the will of the majority in the only way in which it can be reflected by giving the majority the right to choose the men that shall represent them.

One word further. What is the true purpose of the minority? What is the true object of a minority? What is the true business of a minority? Not to govern! Not to govern, because the government and responsibilities of the government must rest on the majority. The minority have no responsibility for the acts of the governed, nor should they have. It is upon the majority that this responsibility rests, and they cannot shrink from it. The good and the ill that flow from their acts must be fathered by them, and by them alone. What then is the office of the minority, admitting that a minority should always be represented? Represented! Yes, sir; and where? In the forum by public addresses. By the fire-side with argument. In the public press; in the Assembly that makes your laws. They must be represented in all of these, and they must watch and reason, and argue, to constrain and convince the majority. In the language of John T. Hoffman, while Governor of New York, in his veto message on the New York city charter bill, "their duty and their function is to watch the majority, to reason with them; to argue with them; to prevail with them to do no mischief, and by their power, by their talent, and by their combinations, prevent, so far as they can, any wrong." And when all this argument shall be exhausted; when the minority shall have been heard in every place in the land where they have a right to be heard; in private argument, in the forum, in the press, in public meetings, in the Assembly itself; and still they do not convince the majority. What then? Then the majority must rule and they must decide what measures of government are to be adopted and carried out. They must be responsible for it and the minority must not be.

That is the true doctrine as laid down by Governor Hoffman. Little as I may admire or follow him in other things, in this, allow me to say, he is sound. Then where are we? Shall we adopt an untried system beautiful in theory? Gentlemen in favor of it contend that the minority shall be represented. I grant you it is a very fine theory. It is a very pretty idea. It commends itself to all our bosoms and all our thoughts that the minority should be heard; that they should have the opportunity of submitting any views they may have to offer; that they shall not be crowded down; that they shall not be ignored, but that their arguments should be listened to, and that they should be heard, weighed and judged with every regard to their full force and weight. But after all this is done, after they have used all persuasion, and all the talent, and all the reason they possess, if they cannot still convince the majority that their plans are wrong, then the majority must be allowed to carry out the government or their plan until the minority shall prevail with their arguments so as to create themselves a majority.

That is the correct way. Is there any danger that under our system a minority shall not be heard? Was there ever a case in the history of this government where the minority were not large enough to be heard, were not talented enough to be heard, and to use all the arguments that could be used in favor of their views? Did the time ever occur in the national or in the State government that there was not a minority to be heard? Was there ever a case where there was not a minority to watch the majority? There was never a time, and never will be a time, in which the minority cannot be heard. If, then, they can be heard, if they are able to perform all the proper functions and duties of the minority, to watch, to reason and to argue, to do everything except to take upon their shoulders the government, what complaint can they have?

Now, if that is the case, why should we devise any new scheme by which we should bring into power minorities in counties and cities where minorities are small? Take the case of my own county, for instance. Applying this doctrine to it, let us consider its effect. Suppose the county of Chester was entitled to three members in the House of Representatives of this Commonwealth, and one member in the Senate, and suppose some favorite principle upon which the people of that county were nearly all agreed was to be proposed, and the effort made to carry it out, what would be the effect of minority representation? Why, if you allow minorities where they are small to elect a member, in our case it would be to send a member into the legislative body to frustrate the will of nearly all the people of the county, to throw his force into the opposite scale, and thus prevent the will of the majority from being carried out.

Mr. WORRELL. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman will permit the suggestion, under this system of proportional representation in any county, if the minority were as small as he indicates it would not be able to secure any voice in the General Assembly. The system only gives representation to minorities sufficiently powerful to carry into effect the opportunity afforded by it. In a county, such as he supposes, having three members of the lower branch of the Legislature, the minority to secure one of those members would have to attain one-third of the voting population, or at least one-third of those who participate in the election.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: Probably that is correct, so far as regards the the minority representation alone. But still, that one-third of the people of Chester county should neither be allowed to frustrate a particular measure upon which the two-thirds of the people of the county were united, or yet in the Legislature, where the measure must be proposed to reduce her representative force by one. She ought to go to the Legislature with three united voices, instead of having these three neutralized by one of them being given to the opposite party, by any proportional system, 'as the gentleman terms it. And so all over the State. So everywhere. So in Berks county, which has been the bulwark of democracy from time immemorial. Why should we invade her and say to her, "you shall permit a minority representation of republicans when you are nearly united on your plan and system of government?" With what justice and what right shall we republicans claim that we ought to have a member in Berks, any more than my friend from Berks (Mr. H. W. Smith) should claim to have a member from Chester? The majority of the community, into what districts you shall divide the State, should still be the majority of the community, and as such represent and direct the State government. If they are democratic districts, they should be represented by democrats, and the republicans should have no voice in them.

Now, sir, passing from this, because I do not wish to detain the committee, I desire to say a word about another theory.

I understand from the gentleman who introduced the amendment (Mr. Lilly) that this is an amendment which is proposed to be introduced by the committee who have charge of the subject, the chairman of which is my friend from Centre (Mr. M'Allister.) They are not ready to report, and I understand that the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) who is not now in his seat, is not prepared altogether to agree with the committee. He is not prepared to stop where the amendment of the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) would stop, but go further and take up the cumulative vote, and that that is the reason why the committee have not reported.

The subject of cumulative voting is to be the next project to be introduced. One idea is the representation of minorities, another idea is cumulative voting.

The cumulative voting system gives one man the privilege, where three men are to be elected, of concentrating his votes on one man, so that he can put all three of his votes on one candidate instead of giving one vote to each of the three. He may cumulate his votes. What is the argument? What is the reason? What is the ground on which this is to be done? It is that it enables the good men of the community to cumulate their votes upon good men on any special ticket, and thus force them on the community even against the majority of the people; but, sir, will it not at the same time enable bad men to cumulate their votes upon bad men who may get on the ticket, and thus force these bad men into office?

I am not disposed to make any invidious distinctions as to sections of country; but let us look, for a moment, at Philadelphia. I take it, as I have often heard it stated here, that Philadelphia is full of fraud. Now suppose a district to exist as districts did exist twenty or thirty years ago, and suppose there are three members to be elected to the Legislature, and one should be a horse-thief, or a gambler, or a robber, if you please, a representative of his class on the ticket. What is to prevent his class of people from cumulating their votes on him and sending him to the Legislature? You cannot keep out of the Legislature these bad men on such a system as that—these men who distribute the plunder obtained in legislation, if any plunder be obtained, to men of their own class. While, therefore, it is claimed on one hand that it will be a good thing to enable people to strike off bad men and put in good men, it will be productive on the other hand of more mischief, by far, by enabling bad men, who are the very men most likely to take advantage of the cumulative voting, to put their own friends in office. Neither minority representation nor cumulative voting belongs to republican government. Neither of these systems should receive the countenance of this body, where we are seeking to make such changes in the government as will be to the advantage of the majority of the people, and will enable us to get at the true expression of the will of that majority.

What, on the other hand, have we proposed as the antipode of all these? It is the single district system, to divide the State into single districts for the choice of Senators and Representatives. What, then, will be the result? Each party, in a single district having but one man to put forward to office, will necessarily vote for that man, that each conceives to be best qualified to represent the district. If the parties do not do that they run the risk of having their opponents elected. In the single district system you can have but a single candidate on one side for office. All log-rolling and attempts to procure votes would be at an end. There would be no more interchanging of favors, getting your delegates to go for me and my delegates to go for you. There is still the choice presented to the elector of taking one or the other, whichever he deems best suited to the position. All the evils of "gerrymandering" in the State would be avoided, because it would be impossible for any, however disposed, to form these districts to suit of contiguous territory. If they carry out the amendment, as they say they will, as proposed this morning, it will be impossible to so "gerrymander" these districts as to destroy the will of the majority of the people. If Chester county should be formed into a district which should have a republican, and another district which should have a democrat, let it be so. If Bucks county should be divided up in the same way, let it be so. We have still a majority representation of the people of the district, and at the same time county or community representation, which is so great a favorite with our friend, the President, would be preserved.

One word with regard to the proposed plan of the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly.) He proposes to begin this system of minority representation by taking away all power from the Legislature to district the State. He would have a body of ten gentlemen elected, say every ten years, for this purpose; but how elected? By the minority system, each man voting for five. Thus you would have a number of men brought together who do not harmonize in political convictions, five being of one view and five of the other. Just imagine what sort of apportionment they would make? Do you suppose you would have any agreement among these ten men? Five will be of one opinion and five of the other.

I object to the plan, because it is a putting into the hands of a few, selected for the purpose, and perhaps of different politics, all power to divide the State; and it is proposed to make these men a power superior to the Legislature itself. I do not believe you can get a body of that kind of ten men or of any other number that will have any superiority of intelligence or integrity to the Legislature of the State. Nothing is gained, therefore, by this anomalous, strange and complex proceeding that is proposed to be imposed upon the science of government.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman: I do not propose to occupy the time of the committee more than a few minutes; but I regard it as proper that some of the arguments that have fallen from the learned gentleman, who has just taken his seat, should not go without a reply.

I have not found, in any printed paper, or any written one, submitted to this Convention, nor in the report of any committee, anything whatever about cumulative voting; but it may be of some advantage to the members of this Convention, when that subject does come up for discussion, that they shall have had the benefit of some prior debate on the subject.

Mr. EWING. Will the gentleman permit me to ask what this second section of the amendment of the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) means? I have been at a loss to understand it, and it has not been explained. I want to know what "proportional representation" means.

Mr. CURTIN. I do not know. I do not pretend to discuss it specially, nor to insist on this section as proposed. I have not the time in which to go at length into it, nor do I care about it.

The learned gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) says, with emphasis, "are we here to break down the time-honored customs established by our ancestors—to break down the great landmarks of our form of government?" I say: "Yes, we are; that is just what we are here for." If there is any custom—any tradition which has been abused—if there are any principles in our government which can be abused—which are found to work for the good of the people, and which do not aid the development and prosperity of the nation, we are here to break them down. It is not upon the examples of antiquity that we built our government, although they may have been used in its construction. It is presented to the world in all the beauty of novelty, by wise and great men, and yet there is scarcely a principle which lies at the foundation of our government, save only that of liberty itself, and the equality of manhood, that has not been changed to suit the advancing times and the expansion of this nation—the increase of its population, the development of its vast physical and material resources. That has been amply proven in this body. This Convention is called to reform abuses, to amend the Constitution, so that these abuses that still cling to us shall be obliterated forever, and that the fair fame of Pennsylvania may be no longer tarnished by them.

If we were as old as the christian era, and covered with the dust of time from all the ages, and should still have some provision of Constitution or law that operated to the disadvantage of the people, this Convention is here to remove it, and to substitute in its place forms of government better adapted to the growing wealth, and power, and convenience of this great people. That, sir, is the purpose for which we are here; and, with a reverence for everything that is old, everything that is antiquated, I must, at the same time, say that I am not afraid of that which is new, merely because it is modern. We are a modern nation, an enlightened people. We are a State made up of a population so mixed, and of blood so varied, as was graphically described the other day by the distinguished gentleman from Philadelphia, (Judge Woodward,) who referred to the fact that we are made up of German and Scotch Irish, and English and Welsh; that we are a people of large common sense. I take for granted that this Convention of one hundred and thirty-three members about reflect the common sense of the State; and the delegates to this Convention, enjoying, as they do, a large measure of the confidence of the people, may rest assured that whatever they do, honestly appealing to their common sense, will be accepted by the people, because, while this is a very learned and intelligent body of men, it is no better than the men outside. After a man has passed the grand clinax, say about the age of fifty, he will come to one sage conclusion, and that is that one man does not know a great deal more than another, and that there is about an average amount of common sense, which, by the laws of nature, is fairly distributed. Hence, I take it that the one hundred and thirty-three members of this Convention have got just about their share. It is true that many of them are learned and gifted, and they gild their ideas with the forms of rhetoric, and eloquence, and poetry; but they will find, if they go down to the mass of the people, that the plowman and the mechanic have thought of precisely the same thing, and will express them in their homely way, with as much force as if uttered in the polished language of the learned gentlemen who enjoy this right to this body.

Gentlemen need not say that the people of this State will reject this or that amendment which may be made to the Constitution. If this Convention acts honestly and appeals to its common sense, and if members do what their own sense of right demands, there need be no fear that the people of the State will reject our work.

Philadelphia is no longer on trial. I sat in my seat here and listened, day after day, to a trial of Philadelphia. I sometimes thought I was on a jury; and it really did look like a jury when an official, judicial charge came in, and was read from the Clerk's desk. Then I thought we were about to be asked to make up a verdict; and sometimes, from the quarrels of gentlemen from the city themselves, I thought we had better change the venue, and try the city somewhere out in the country. At first all the vices were found in Philadelphia; all the "rounders," and "repeaters," and "ballot-box stuffers" were discovered to be here, and we were asked to inaugurate some reform to save the people of this city from themselves; and when an effort was made by the delegates to this Convention to make reforms in the ballot system, so that the honest and intelligent men of the State could vote properly, and providing for a check on the ballot-box stuffers, and repeaters, it immediately inflamed some of the delegates from the country, and they seemed to forget that the frauds, which are admitted to exist in Philadelphia, might extend into the country.

When an epidemic, such as the cholera or small-pox, appears in Philadelphia, I presume the people in Lancaster and in Tioga and in Dauphin, and even in Allegheny, and, in fact, all over the State prepare for it, and cleanse their cellars and alleys or vaccinate themselves. If, then, it be true that these great festering sores exist in the city of Philadelphia, take care or the virus may extend into the country. It may disturb the stern virtue even of Lancaster county, and the sweet republican simplicity of Dauphin, so graphically and beautifully described by the delegate from that county, who, I regret to see, is not now in his seat, (Mr. MacVeagh.) Aye, and even disturb the purity of the ballot in Allegheny county, so strongly and forcibly insisted on by gentlemen here as still exempt from the calamity of unfair elections, may be reached by this virus. It is to protect the purity of the ballot that we are here, and to protect the beautiful republican simplicity which prevails, according to the accounts of gentlemen, in Lancaster and Tioga, and in York and in Dauphin. I am not prepared to believe that radiating from Harrisburg all over Dauphin county there is the purity and virtue claimed by the delegate.

He who has lived for five or six years in that county can appreciate and realize that we should protect the ballot even in Dauphin county. Our learned and distinguished President—and I have become accustomed to accept all he says as true and wise—suddenly gives us a view of the reverse of the medal, and we are assured that the virtues prevail in Philadelphia. And gentlemen from Philadelphia and from the country fall in the most savage and violent manner upon my friend from the city, (Mr. Woodward,) who dares to say that the city was not the producer of bread. There is one thing, at least, for which we must be thankful to the gentleman who sits in front of me (Mr. Cuyler) and the gentleman who sits behind me, (Mr. Cassidy,) that we have been informed of the beauties of Philadelphia, its power, and its magnitude, and received a good deal of statistical knowledge that we would not have had but for the introduction of the subject of largest interest to Philadelphia. Yet I cannot see what the productions of that city, in manufactures, had to do with the question before this Convention. It was a question of representation.

Now, sir, for my part I would not cut off the city of Philadelphia from a fair representation; and, if I had my way, of course I cannot have it, because there is not theory enough in it for some of the gentlemen of this Convention, I would divide the State into one hundred districts; I would elect three members of the Legislature in each district, making three hundred members, and let each voter vote for two. That would be minority representation. I do not think the Senate need necessarily be one-third or one-fourth the number in the House. I would dignify and elevate the character of the Senate. With three hundred members of the House sitting there, with their seats based on population, I would make the Senate to consist of only thirty-two members, elect them for four years, and by general ticket throughout the State. The House would thus have a membership based on population, and one giving the minority a fair representation; the Senate would represent the whole State. This system would invite the best men of the State into your Senate. You would make them a balance to and constraint upon the other governmental powers. You would dignify and elevate the body, and give to your government a new and strong element which is not found in it at present.

The theory that the Senate must be one-third of the House, or one-fourth of it, I do not agree with, yet I am prepared to vote for such a provision, provided we increase the number in the House.

My learned friend from Chester (Mr. Darlington) has spoken at length against the representation of minorities. What does he mean? Does he mean that we would be better off by putting one side or the other on a general ticket? Then the minority would not be represented. Then, surely, the majority would not be responsible. Does he mean that no minority is to be represented in council anywhere? Surely not. Now we desire to represent minorities in the Legislature for the very reason that he gives against it: That we shall break down the political character of the body. It is true the majority is, and always must be, represented; but the design is, that not only shall the majority be represented, but that the minority of the place where the majority representative comes from, shall be represented—that, for instance, the 7,000 minority republicans in Berks county shall be represented as well as the 15,000 democrats; that the large minority of democrats in Lancaster shall be represented as well as the majority of republicans, and that the minority of democrats of Chester shall be represented as well as the majority of republicans.

By such a system you break down the force of political combinations, as is witnessed in the composition of this Convention. The gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) does not say that this Convention should have been produced differently. On the contrary he admits that it is composed of very enlightened gentlemen; nobody can say otherwise. We all speak of it as such, and we would be false to ourselves if we did not. I do not accept it as any compliment at all; for I take for granted that if we were to take a vote of the Convention on the subject, we would "resolve" that this is the most enlightened body of men that ever sat for a great purpose in Pennsylvania. [Laughter.] There is great consolation in that thought, and there is pleasure in hearing it from the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington.)

We were sent here, Mr. Chairman, to give the minority a representation. I do not care how it is done, whether by cumulative vote, or as I have indicated or as proposed in this amendment. We are here to give the minority representation, and representation in the Legislature—in the popular branch of the government, and I cannot see what harm can come from it. Instead of a minority representation by sections of the State, you give to each county or locality in the State a proportionate and proper minority representation. That is better than giving it to the whole State at large. Besides, there has been no scheme proposed yet by this Convention which would deprive the majority of the people of the State of their proper majority in the Legislature. As in the composition of this Convention, the party majority is only five, so it could be in the Legislature, and a majority of five would be just as effective for party purposes as a majority of twenty-five. Fortunately, however, there has been no occasion in this body for the exercise of party discipline. There has never been a body in Pennsylvania so free from political bias as this Convention. There is no record yet found of a vote in this body with any taint of political partisanship on it. That comes from the fact that the delegates were selected independent of party management. And but for the ingenious and commendable device, provided by the Legislature for the election of the members of this body, the learned gentleman in my front (Mr. Meredith) could never be nominated or elected to the distinguished position he occupies among us, if one-half of what is said about corruption in Philadelphia be true.

Neither could the learned gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black) be here. When we have such a Convention resulting from such a plan, I cannot see what gentlemen have to complain of; nor can I see any proper basis for opposition to a plain, straightforward proposition to give an increased number of Representatives to the Legislature, and to give the minority a proper representation.

I have deemed it proper, sir, to say this much in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington.)

Mr. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: Some weeks ago, when the report of the Committee on Legislature was under consideration, this subject was passed by consent, in order to receive the report of other committees upon the same subject. I was rather surprised, therefore, Mr. Chairman, at the proposition of the chairman of the Committee on the Legislature to call up sections twenty and twenty-one of his report, now under consideration, prior to the report of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation being made. It may have been that committee was somewhat derelict in duty, and I did not, therefore, then ask a further postponement, but the five sections contained in Mr. Lilly's amendment and the two sections contained in Mr. Simpson's proposition were got up with the view of being moved, when occasion should offer, as a substitute, in order to get before the Convention the sense of the Committee on Representation upon this great subject. Now I desire to say, just here by way of explanation, that for the last two days I have been confined to a sick bed, and left it reluctantly this morning from the report I had in the papers of the evening that this subject was to be under discussion to-day.

And you may imagine my surprise this morning to find the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) and the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) my colleagues in a committee, both absent. I am told they are absent because they believed the chairman of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation would also continue absent, and that discussion upon this subject would be postponed.

I make these prefatory remarks in order that my position here this morning may be understood. I feel anxious to embrace this opportunity, weak as I am, to answer some of the fallacious arguments of the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington.) I agree with him, Mr. Chairman, that we have under consideration a momentous question; a question more deeply involving the welfare of this people than any question which can come before this committee or this Convention. Much as I abhor notes, never using them when I can avoid it, yet from the great interest I find in the subject, and the fear entertained that without them I may occupy, if by grace allowed, too much of the time of the committee, I have determined to subject myself to the restraint imposed by their use, and this simply with the view of economizing time; and of this I assure the Convention I will occupy no more of their time, under any circumstances, than did the gentleman from Chester.

The subject which he discussed, and the great subject before this committee is, how shall the right of suffrage be exercised by those to whom it is committed? Shall the voting—now mark—shall the voting be free, so as to allow the voter to cast every ballot he holds for whom he will and thus secure a just representation of all parties and all interests? Or shall it be restricted so as to compel all voters, less than a mere numerical majority, to cast their ballots for so many candidates that their party can elect none? That is the proposition before this Convention, and now, sir, before we proceed in this discussion, allow me to mark some diversities that we may have a right understanding upon this subject, for the most bitter disputes that have ever occurred in the world have arisen from the disputants not properly understanding each others positions. The gentleman from Chester asked whether the distinguished gentleman on his right, (Mr. Curtin,) who occupied the gubernatorial chair of this Commonwealth for six years, was not elected by the people. Who denies that? Who ever denied that the Executive of the Commonwealth, each one of the Executive officers, and every ministerial officer in the Commonwealth, should be elected by a majority vote? Nobody, so far as I know. There is no dispute upon that subject.

Where, then, does this dispute arise? It arises in that class of officers who meet not to perform ministerial duties; not to discharge Executive duties, but to deliberate with each other with a view of acting after deliberation, for the welfare of the whole. And when they come thus to deliberate, they must come as the people would come. They must be an epitome of the people themselves, and as representatives, their constituents are entitled in them to the same rights they would have if personally present. Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to reason at all, we must have some premises; some truths must be admitted, and upon what, in this Convention, can we agree as the basis from which to start? I think I may assume, as the united sentiment of this Convention, that all power is inherent in the people of the State, and that sovereignty resides in them except in so far as they have restricted themselves by the National and State Constitutions. This being admitted—I take it for granted nobody here will deny it—there are a few sequents bearing on the subject before us, to which I call the attention of the Convention.

And first, this Convention being the representatives of this sovereign people, regularly called and qualified, to ascertain and determine not what the Constitution is but what the Constitution should be, is not restricted in the adoption and submission of amendments by the existing State Constitution; nor otherwise except by the law of nature and the Constitution of the United States. These are the only restrictions that rest upon this Convention.

Then again, representation arising out of the utter impossibility of the people acting in mass, and thus being solely of necessity, is of right. This is the second sequent—representation is of right.

It therefore follows that the right to choose a representative is every man's portion of the sovereign power residing in the people of the State. The right of each to exercise his individual portion of this sovereign power is denominated the right of suffrage. It is a delegation by one man to another man of that portion of this sovereign power which, as a representative, he may exercise under the organic law of the State.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MR. METZGER. Mr. Chairman: I move the gentleman's time be extended without limit.

This was unanimously agreed to, and Mr. M'Allister resumed.

MR. M'ALLISTER. Mr. Chairman: The more nearly, therefore, the representative body is made to resemble the body represented, the more exactly the representative body becomes an epitome of the mass, the more fairly, justly and satisfactorily will those to whom sovereign power pertains be represented, the will of the people be maintained and their interests promoted. In the years that are past has the representation from Lancaster borne any likeness to the population of that county, said to be represented? Has the representation from Berks borne any likeness to the population of that county, said to be represented? Each sends three members to the lower House and one to the Senate; the one all republicans, the other all democrats. Is it not manifest that the democrats of Lancaster and the republicans of Berks have not been represented, nay, that they have been misrepresented? In the gubernatorial election of 1869 in Lancaster, thirteen thousand eight hundred and four republican, and eight thousand three hundred and sixteen democratic votes were cast, making the whole vote cast twenty-one thousand one hundred and twenty. In Berks, thirteen thousand three hundred and thirty-one democratic votes were cast, and six thousand nine hundred and seventy-one republican votes were cast, making the whole vote cast twenty thousand five hundred and two. I have made a statement showing exactly how the free vote would have given the democrats of Lancaster and the republicans of Berks, respectively one member, allowing to the majority in each county two representatives, still more than their just share. But time will not allow me to dwell upon these illustrations, and I pass, therefore, to Allegheny county, and, if time permit, to Chester county. To Allegheny and to Chester, because I understand their members are exceedingly hostile to the free vote.

The latest vote to which I have had access, for, unfortunately, the Hand-Book that we ordered the other day has not yet come to hand, and I had to refer to the Hand-Book of 1871, the latest vote to which I have had access is the vote of 1870, as follows:

The Hand-Book of 1871, page 310, shows that the republican vote of Allegheny was seventeen thousand four hundred and thirty-seven, and the democratic vote, eleven thousand one hundred and sixteen, making the total vote cast twenty-eight thousand five hundred and forty-three; which, inasmuch as Allegheny is entitled to six members, must be divided by six, giving four thousand seven hundred and fifty-seven votes as the number justly entitling to a Representative. Give the republicans, therefore, a representative, and take the four thousand seven hundred and fifty-seven votes which entitle them thereto from the seventeen thousand four hundred and thirty-seven, the whole number of votes cast by them, and they have their first Representative, and have left twelve thousand six hundred and eighty votes, still larger than the whole number of votes polled by the democrats. We must, therefore, deduct another ratio of four thousand seven hundred and fifty-seven votes from the twelve thousand six hundred and eighty republican votes remaining, and assign them the second Representative, which leaves seven thousand nine hundred and twenty-eight republican votes yet unrepresented, greatly less than the democratic votes. We must, therefore, take the third ratio of four thousand seven hundred and fifty-seven from the eleven thousand one hundred and six, the whole number of democratic votes, and assign them the third Representative, which leaves six thousand three hundred and fifty-four democratic votes yet unrepresented, less than the republican votes unrepresented. We must, therefore, take the fourth ratio, four thousand seven hundred and fifty-seven from the seven thousand nine hundred and twenty-eight republican votes yet unrepresented, and assign them the fourth Representative, which leaves, three thousand one hundred and seventy-six republican votes unrepresented. But as the democrats have six thousand three hundred and fifty-four votes yet unrepresented, the fifth ratio of four thousand seven hundred and fifty-seven must be taken from the six thousand three hundred and fifty-four, and the fifth Representative assigned to the democrats, leaving, one thousand six hundred and twenty-two democratic votes unrepresented, against three thousand one hundred and seventy-six republican votes unrepresented. Therefore, the sixth and last Representative must be assigned to the numerical majority, thus giving the republicans four and the democrats two members, and leaving but one thousand six hundred and twenty-two democrats, instead of eleven thousand one hundred and six democrats unrepresented. Now can this be done? Is this scheme practicable? Can this end be accomplished? If it can, every member of this Convention should feel the blush of shame mantle his cheek if he did not assist in doing it. Can it be done then? Most unhesitatingly we say it can, in every election at which two or more officers of the same grade are to be elected, and that not by imposing restrictions upon the voter but by giving him the liberty which every voter should have, that perfect freedom from restraint to which he can justly lay claim in the exercise of the natural social right of suffrage. Now let me premise just here that the distinguishing characteristic between the amendment offered by the gentleman from Carbon, (Mr. Lilly,) taken in connection with the proposition of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Simpson) and the section reported by the Committee on Legislature, is this: That the one scheme affords the opportunity of carrying into operation the free system of voting and the other does not. And now, to return to the argument, we assert that the free vote is not only practicable, but that it can be easily carried into effect by simply giving every voter as many ballots as there are officers to be elected, and removing those unnatural and arbitrary restraints upon their use which now compel him to choose between the alternative of not voting at all or voting for so many candidates that his party can elect none. The inevitable consequence of which injustice is to render the representative body wholly unlike the body professedly represented. The candidates elected not only do not represent the body of the people but misrepresent a large and in some instances the larger portion of their constituency. That is unfair, unjust, dishonest, and is eminently calculated to engender distrust, discontent and rebellion. It is the enlargement and aggravation of this principle of wrong and injustice which is now disturbing the monarchies of Europe, but I have not time to dwell upon that thought.

Any body of citizens so respectable in point of numbers as to elect, by the concentration of their votes upon one candidate, are entitled to their representation on the soundest principles of a free republican government. They are a component part of the sovereign power in the State, and entitled to be heard through their own representatives, the right to choose whom, I have already shown, is their own portion of sovereign power. Let us apply the system of free voting to some of those bodies in which reform is needed and most loudly called for by the people; and first and above all to the Legislature.

It is said that we are entering upon an untried scheme. Not so. The scheme which I would inaugurate by the election of the lower branch of the Legislature on the cumulative or free vote system, in Senatorial districts, three Representatives for every Senator, or in the proportion that this Convention may determine, is the plan adopted by the Convention of Illinois. The first election came off in Illinois last fall under that system, and resulted to the entire satisfaction of the entire people, except the court house politicians. The lower House of the Illinois Legislature, elected by the free vote, is an exact epitome of the body represented. So they stand now; but not so the Senate, elected upon the old plan. The necessity which inaugurated, I may say the sense of justice which brought about, the application of the free vote to the lower House in Illinois is the same sense of justice that ought, in this Convention, to bring about similar results, looking to Lancaster, to Berks, to Chester and to Allegheny, and other counties, democratic and republican. From the time the republican party was formed in Illinois until the election last fall, the whole southern part of the State, called Egypt, came up a solid phalanx of democrats; the entire northern portion of the State, denominated Goshen, came up a solid phalanx of republicans. Not a voice was heard from the south coming from a republican source; not a voice was heard from the north coming from a democratic source. And just so has it been with Berks, and Lancaster, and Chester, and Allegheny, and the other districts, although the gentleman from Allegheny, before me, (Mr. J. W. F. White,) the other day took the greatest credit to himself for having, on one occasion, scratched a ticket without the knowledge of his friends and defeated some republican. [Laughter.] These are great evils. They are ulcers upon the body politic, to be borne, I admit, if there is no remedy for them. In the past, the people have looked upon this evil as though it could not be remedied. But let me say, Mr. Chairman, that the true principles of representation in republican governments are but in their infancy. A set of false principles upon that subject came down to us from our ancestors, tainted by the source from which they came, tainted by the false basis upon which they were made to rest. It is in the march of progress, it is under the advancement of the age in which we live, that the system, now proposed to be adopted by this Convention, is offered for its consideration.

There are various objections started to this scheme. One, and that seems to be the one that impresses itself most deeply upon the mind of the gentleman from Chester, is that the scheme of just representation to which I have alluded is undemocratic and unrepresentative. Is it so? He infers that it is because he asserts that the majority must rule. I concede that the majority should and must rule; and under the free vote the majority are to rule. Under this scheme the majority are left to rule, and are now ruling in Illinois; but they allow their political opponents a voice in their deliberations. How else can you satisfy the people? How else can you have a deliberate assembly? The gentleman is content with his three members from Chester all giving the same republican utterances. That satisfies him. He won't allow the democrats to squeak. In his opinion they shall not be heard, but should be satisfied by what satisfies him. But is it a just representation? Not at all. It is an iniquitous principle that can only be justified in morals or politics from necessity. Remove the necessity, as I have shown it can easily be removed, by the free vote, and you have no further excuse for holding on to an error which deprives man of his rights. The gentleman from Pittsburg with six Representatives, all uttering republican sentiments, unites with Chester, and all learnedly argue that it is the theory of republican governments that the majority are to rule, and that the majority have the right on the principles of justice to place their heel upon the neck of their political opponents, and not allow them to be heard even in a deliberative assembly. Is it right? I trow not. If it be right that Allegheny should continue to come with her six Representatives all of one party, would it not be equally right that Philadelphia should elect by a uniform ticket and send her entire delegation of one stripe? Who would tolerate that?

It could be no more tolerated than the iniquity which resulted in a representation to our national Congress years ago, when the States elected by general ticket on the majority vote, and the voice of one party was entirely suppressed at the national Capitol. That injustice cried out for relief and received it, and it is time that the oppressed parties, democratic and republican, in the several counties of Pennsylvania should cry out for relief and receive it at the hands of this Convention.

Again, it is said it is an innovation. An innovation on what? It is an innovation on injustice and wrong; but, Mr. Chairman, in the sense in which the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) would use that word, the establishment of our government in 1776 was an innovation, the greatest innovation that has ever occurred in the world; an innovation upon the divine right of kings, an innovation upon that principle of representation which is still continued in Europe—that representation is not of right, but an emanation of grace from the king, the sovereign power. That is the distinguishing characteristic between representation in Europe and representation in America. The one is claimed by the people in their sovereignty as a right; the other is a gracious concession by the crown to the people allowing them to have a pseudo representation. God forbid that such erroneous principles should longer continue to influence our action and our deliberation in the formation of this Constitution.

There is another obstacle in the way of the introduction of the free vote. And what is that? It looms up in the person of the truckling and court-house politicians, found here and there and anywhere over the length and breadth of this land. They are opposed to the principle of the free vote, because it strikes at their occupation as directly and positively as the worship of the true God struck at the occupation of Demetrius, the silversmith, who called together the workmen of like occupation with himself, and said: "Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth." If you inaugurate the reformed system of voting, and allow parties to be represented in proportion to their relative strength, thus maintaining the ascendancy of the party that has the majority, but giving a minority representation to the minority party, you take away the occupation of these men. Should their hostility prevent us from discharging our duty here? I think not. It may be that I do not fully appreciate the importance of these men. I must confess that I have no love for them, that all my life I have rather had a detestation for them. That sentiment, impressed upon my mind in my boyhood, was greatly strengthened by an address delivered by a distinguished Pennsylvanian, long in public life, before a literary college society, of which I was a member, in which the speaker described the truck politician as a man without moral or political principles swayed to and fro for the promotion of his own interests, "stooping his ear to the very earth to catch the first distant sound of shifting footsteps." That sentiment made an impression upon my mind which has never left it. That day I determined never to be one of that class of men, and, thank God, I never have been. All I ask of this Convention is that it will not be swayed to and fro, in the discharge of duty, by any of them. Let us come up to the discharge of duty fully, and when we have done that, I am sure we will adopt the principle contained in these amendments.

MR. CARTER. Mr. Chairman: Yesterday, at the suggestion of the eminently practical gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Knight,) we confined ourselves to the question of the numbers in the representative bodies, believing that we would understand the matter better, and make more progress by taking up one principle, or one thought or suggestion at a time, but the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) saw, in the proposition, as set forth in the first section, in regard to the election of a board of commissioners for the purpose of apportionment, a supposed snake in the grass, which excited his ire, and he then proceeded to base his argument chiefly upon the supposed dangers of this cumulative or free system of voting. I do not propose to follow the gentleman in the argument, because the gentleman from Centre (Mr. McAllister) has replied to him, nor am I as yet committed to its support. I merely wish to make a few remarks with regard to this matter of apportionment, and I wish to commend it to the serious consideration of all the gentlemen in this house, who have not given it the same amount of thought, perhaps, that the Committee on Suffrage have done. I intend to confine myself entirely to that one subject.

The gentleman assumes as a fact that which, I think, has been disproved by all history, viz: That no partisanship accompanies men into the positions that they assume when elected to office by the people. In theory, said he, a representative ceases to be a partisan, but he represents the people. Well, he means that he should represent the people, and be influenced by party considerations. But is it so in fact? It is not. It has never been, nor will it ever be so. This proposes that this partisanship, which does enter into all the apportionments of the State, shall cease, by taking away the power now vested with Legislature, and entrusting it to a body into which the spirit of partisanship shall not enter. That is the provision.

Now let us see if it is calculated to effect that end, but, before I proceed to that examination, I will answer, briefly, some of the views of the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington.) He thinks that it is the introduction of a novel idea, or a novel principle. I do not so consider it. The subject of limited voting, I think, was referred to in the Convention that met in 1837.

MR. DARLINGTON. By whom?

MR. CARTER. I think by Mr. Charles Brown, sir. And two years afterwards it was again agitated, and the truth of the principle was admitted, and a law was enacted that in the election of inspectors of elections two should be chosen, but no man should vote but for one. There is the same principle. And after a trial of thirty-four years, I ask what fair minded man, in the State of Pennsylvania, would say that we should go back to the old system? Not one, sir. Again; in the selection of members of the Constitutional Convention in the State of New York the same principle was also adopted, i. e. that a certain number of the delegates, to secure a non-partisan body in the formation of their organic law, the delegates at large were so chosen, as I understand it. So also of this body; it was constituted on a similar ground. It is not a novel idea, and I think, sir, that it is eminently proper that that principle should be incorporated into the Constitution with reference to the selection of these apportionment commissioners.

Now, Mr. Chairman, is this reform needed? I hold that it is. If there has been a glaring evil, one that stinks in the nostrils of all honest men, it has been the "gerrymandering" process. There has scarcely been one fair apportionment, I apprehend, in the past, because of this very spirit of partisanship entering into this question, to subserve party ends, and so it will be to the end of all time. The gentleman would say, and has said, that these men forget, or rather should forget, their party feelings when they are elected to positions of this kind; but the fact is they do not; they possess as much partisan spirit as ever.

It is proposed that there shall be ten commissioners, but that no person shall vote but for five, and the action of seven of them concurring determines this question.

Now, as a matter of economy alone, this is worthy of our serious consideration. It was said by some gentleman that the last apportionment bill, estimating, I suppose, the time spent upon it at Harrisburg, cost the State something like seventy thousand dollars.

It is incumbent upon this board to meet and perform this duty. The provision is so hedged around that it is secure from all possible danger, not merely of a partisan nature, to which I have referred, but so that these men can, in no way, be swayed from motives that ought to influence them in the performance of their duty. It renders them ineligible to any office for the term of five years; they must have the same qualifications as Senators, according to the Constitution of Pennsylvania, in reference to age, and so on, so that you see every guard is thrown around the performance of their duty; and it rests upon a fair principle, one in which party considerations cannot enter, and they will have no other motive but a just and fair proportionment.

Now I am not one of those who believe that party should rule in all things. I am a party man, but I still more firmly believe than I ever did, that there are great underlying truths and principles of justice which no party, no nation, nor no individual can violate with safety; that they must act with justice, and justice will not be found in a body constituted as partisans, who, notwithstanding their plain duty, act as partisans, and not in the interest of the whole State.

I would provide in the organic law that this injustice done by partisan Legislatures shall never again bring to shame the apportionment of this State. I think that this provides for it fully and clearly.

I merely want to direct attention to the importance of this, and I will say, in conclusion, that I hope gentlemen will consider this section on its own merits. If it be a remedy, as I think it appears to be to prevent this gerrymandering, this gross injustice, why not adopt it? What do you fear from it if it be right in itself, and if the principle secures the result that it necessarily must secure—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHN R. READ. Mr. Chairman: As this is the day on which the Convention decided to visit the Eastern penitentiary, and the hour having been fixed at three P. M., I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. CHARLES A. BLACK. Mr. President: The committee of the whole has again had under consideration the report of the Committee on the Legislature, and has instructed its chairman to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Leave was granted to the committee to sit again on Monday next.

Mr. DUNNING. Mr. President: I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

So the Convention, at one o'clock and twenty minutes, adjourned until Monday next at ten o'clock A. M.

FIFTY-SIXTH DAY.

MONDAY, March 3, 1873.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M. The President announced that there was not a quorum present.

At half-past ten o'clock A. M. the Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following members answered to their names:

Messrs. Achenbach, Andrews, Baer, Bailly, (Perry,) Baker, Bartholomew, Biddle, Bowman, Brown, Campbell, Carter, Clark, Corbett, Craig, Curtin, Darlington, De France, Dunning, Edwards, Elliott, Ewing, Fell, Fulton, Guthrie, Hanna, Hay, Hazzard, Hemphill, Heverin, Howard, Knight, Lilly, MacConnell, M'Murray, Mann, Mantor, Metzger, Minor, Newlin, Niles, Palmer, G. W., Purviance, John N., Purviance, Sam'l A., Reed, John R., Sharpe, Smith, H. G., Smith, Henry W., Smith, Wm. H., Stanton, Struthers, Turrell, Walker, Wetherill, John Price, White, Harry, White, J. W. F., Wright and Meredith, President—57.

NOT PRESENT.—Messrs. Addicks, Ainey, Alricks, Armstrong, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bannan, Barclay, Bardsley, Beebe, Black, Charles A., Black, J. S., Boyd, Brodhead, Broomall, Buckalew, Carey, Cassidy, Church, Cochran, Collins, Corson, Cronmiller, Curry, Cuyler, Dallas, Davis, Dodd, Ellis, Finney, Funck, Gibson, Gilpin, Gowen, Green, Hall, Harvey, Hopkins, Horton, Hunsicker, Kaine, Lambertson, Landis, Lawrence, Lear, Littleton, Long, M'Allister, M'Camant, M'Clean, M'Culloch, MacVeagh, Mott, Palmer, H. W., Parsons, Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Patton, Porter, Pughe, Purman, Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, James L., Reynolds, S. H., Rooke, Ross, Runk, Russell, Simpson, Stewart, Temple, Van Reed, Wetherill, J. M., Wherry, White, David N., Woodward and Worrell—76.

MR. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I move the Convention adjourn until three o'clock P. M. I submit that many of our delegates, who left the city on Saturday for their homes in the country, will not be able to reach the city until about that time.

THE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state if a motion is made to adjourn it will have to be until the regular hour to-morrow.

MR. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

MR. JOHN R. READ. Mr. President: I move to adjourn until ten o'clock A. M. to-morrow.

The question being taken, the yeas and nays were required by Mr. Darlington and Mr. Corbett, and were as follow, viz:

YEAS.

Messrs. Baer, Bartholomew, Brown, Corbett, Dunning, Edwards, Fell, Hanna, Heverin, Newlin, Palmer, G. W., Purviance, Sam'l A., Read, John R., Sharpe, Walker and White, Harry—16.

NAYS.

Messrs. Achenbach, Andrews, Bailly, (Perry,) Baker, Biddle, Bowman, Campbell, Carter, Cassidy, Clark, Craig, Darlington, De France, Elliott, Ewing, Fulton, Guthrie, Hay, Hazzard, Howard, Knight, Lilly, MacConnell, M'Culloch, M'Murray, Mann, Mantor, Metzger, Minor, Niles, Purviance, John N., Smith, Henry W., Smith, H. G., Smith, Wm. H., Stanton, Struthers, Turrell, Wetherill, Jno. Price, White, J. W. F., Wright and Meredith, President—41.

So the motion was not agreed to.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Addicks, Ainey, Alricks, Armstrong, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bannan, Barclay, Bardsley, Beebe, Black, Chas. A., Black, J. S., Boyd, Brodhead, Broomall, Buckalew, Carey, Church, Cochran, Collins, Corson, Cronmiller, Curry, Curtin, Cuyler, Dallas, Davis, Dodd, Ellis, Finney, Funck, Gibson, Gilpin, Gowen, Green, Hall, Harvey, Hemphill, Hopkins, Horton, Hunsicker, Kaine, Lambertson, Landis, Lawrence, Lear, Littleton, Long, M'Allister, M'Camant, M'Clean, MacVeagh, Mott, Palmer, H. W., Parsons, Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Patton, Porter, Pughe, Purman, Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, James L., Reynolds, S. H., Rooke, Ross, Runk, Russell, Simpson, Stewart, Temple, Van Reed, Wetherill, J. M., Wherry, White, David N., Woodward and Worrell—76.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring in the absent members.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms will proceed to execute his duty and bring in the absent members.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I move the Convention do now adjourn, and I would like to state that I make this motion by request, and upon the motion I call the yeas and nays.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. President: I rise to a point of order, and it is that a motion to adjourn is not in order, there not having been any business transacted since the previous motion to adjourn was made.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the Sergeant-at-Arms has been despatched for the absentees since the previous motion to adjourn was made, and the question of order is not therefore sustained. The Chair also desires to observe that it is in the power of the Convention to adjourn at any time for a want of a quorum without business intervening between motions made for that purpose.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I renew the call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken, the yeas and nays were required by Mr. Darlington and Mr. Howard, and were as follow, viz:

YEAS.

Messrs. Baer, Baker, Bartholomew, Bidle, Brown, Clark, Collins, Dunning, Fulton, Gowen, Heverin, Knight, Newlin, Palmer, G. W., Purviance, Sam'l A., Sharpe, Stanton, Walker and White, Harry—20.

NAYS.

Messrs. Achenbach, Andrews, Baily, (Perry,) Bowman, Campbell, Carter, Cassidy, Church, Craig, Cuyler, Darlington, De France, Edwards, Elliott, Ewing, Fell, Guthrie, Hay, Hazzard, Howard, Lilly, MacConnell, M'Murray, Mann, Mantor, Minor, Niles, Purviance, John N., Read, John R., Simpson, Smith, H. G., Smith, Henry W., Smith, Wm. H., Struthers, Turrell, Van Reed, Wetherill, J. M., Wetherill, John Price, White, J. W. F., Wright and Meredith, President—41.

So the motion was not agreed to.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Adicks, Ainey, Alricks, Armstrong, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bannan, Barclay, Bardsley, Beebe, Black, Charles A., Black, J. S., Boyd, Brodhead, Broomall, Buckalew, Carey, Cochran, Corbett, Corson, Cronmiller, Curry, Curtin, Dallas, Davis, Dodd, Ellis, Finney, Funck, Gibson, Gilpin, Green, Hall, Hanna, Harvey, Hemphill, Hopkins, Horton, Hunsicker, Kaine, Lamberton, Landis, Lawrence, Lear, Littleton, Long, M'Allister, M'Camant, M'Clean, M'Culloch, MacVeagh, Metzger, Mott, Palmer, H. W., Parsons, Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Patton, Porter, Pughe, Purman, Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, James L., Reynolds, S. H., Rooke, Ross, Runk, Russell, Stewart, Temple, Wherry, White, David N., Woodward and Worrell—73.

At eleven o'clock A. M. the President announced that there was a quorum present, the following members having taken their seats in the Convention:

Messrs. Woodward, Church, Brodhead, Broomall, Corbett, Curtin, Hanna and Lear.

JOURNAL.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. NEWLIN asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Long for a few days from to-day, on account of sickness.

PROTHONOTARY'S REPORT.

The PRESIDENT presented a communication from the prothonotary of Chester county, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. TURRELL asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. M'Allister, on account of sickness.

Mr. CORBERT asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Purman, on account of sickness.

Mr. HOWARD offered the following resolution, which was laid on the table for one day, under the rule:

Resolved, That leave of absence shall not be granted in any case, unless the reasons shall be fully stated; and the Convention in every case shall decide upon the sufficiency of the reason, and in case of absence without leave the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be directed to bring in the absent members, and upon their appearing, they shall be reprimanded by the President, at the bar of the Convention.

DISCUSSION ON ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LILLY offered the following resolution, which was read and laid upon the table under the rule :

Resolved, That hereafter all resolutions in relation to the time of adjournment and hours of the session of the Convention shall be open to amendment, and also the speeches on such resolutions shall be confined to three minutes, and no member shall speak more than once upon the same subject.

CAUCUSES.

Mr. CUYLER offered the following resolution, which was read and referred to the Committee on Legislature :

Resolved, That the Committee on Legislature be and they are hereby instructed to consider and report in what manner it is practicable to prevent the decisions of caucuses of members of the Legislature from controlling the judgment and action of members in the discharge of their duties.

ABSENT MEMBERS.

Mr. H. W. SMITH offered the following resolution, which was read and laid upon the table under the rule :

Resolved, That the names of delegates be called every morning at ten o'clock, and all who are not present and do not answer shall not be allowed to speak on that day.

SESSIONS OF THE CONVENTION.

Mr. NILES offered the following resolution :

Resolved, That from and after this date the Convention will meet at ten A. M. and adjourn at one P. M., and meet at three P. M. and adjourn at six P. M. of each day.

On the question of proceeding to the second reading of the resolution, a division was called for, and twenty-one members, not a majority of the quorum, voting in the affirmative, it was not agreed to.

REMOVAL TO HARRISBURG.

Mr. METZGER offered the following resolution :

Resolved, That after the adjournment of the Legislature sine die this Convention hold its sessions at Harrisburg.

On the question of proceeding to the second reading of the resolution, a division was called for, and twenty-two members, not a majority of the quorum, voting in the affirmative, it was not agreed to.

EXPENSES OF THE CONVENTION.

Mr. HAY, from the Committee on Accounts and Expenditures, submitted the following report :

The Committee on Accounts and Expenditures of the Convention respectfully reports :

That it has examined the account of J. M. Hafeigh & Co., for four dozen towels, purchased for the use of the Convention by direction of the Committee on House, and certified to be correct by the chairman of that committee, amounting to $19.

Also, the account of Kay and Brother, for five copies of Purdon's Digest, purchased by order of the Convention, and certified by the Chief Clerk to have been actually furnished, $67 50.

Also, two bills of the Philadelphia gas works for gas consumed at the Hall of the Convention, together amounting to $204 29.

That said accounts are correct and are proper expenses of the Convention, and should, therefore, be paid.

The committee further reports that to enable the Chief Clerk to pay such expenses and accounts as he is or may be authorized to pay by the Convention, it is requisite that a warrant should be drawn in his favor for the sum of two thousand dollars.

The following resolutions are accordingly reported :

Resolved, That a warrant be drawn in favor of D. L. Imbrie, Chief Clerk of the Convention, for the sum of two thousand dollars, for the payment of such expenses and accounts as he may be authorized to pay by the Convention.

Resolved, That the accounts of Kay & Brother, J. M. Hafeigh & Co., and the Philadelphia gas works, mentioned in the foregoing report of the Committee on Accounts and Expenditures, be approved, and the Chief Clerk be directed to pay the same.

The resolutions annexed to the above report were severally twice read and agreed to.

DEBATE IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Mr. MANN. Mr. President: I move the Convention proceed to the second reading and consideration of the resolution offered by myself, on Saturday, in relation to restricting debate in committee of the whole to fifteen minutes.

The PRESIDENT. The Clerk will read the resolution for information.

The CLERK read :

Resolved, That hereafter, in committee of the whole, no delegate shall speak longer than fifteen minutes at one time, nor more than once on the same proposition.

The motion to proceed to the second reading of the resolution was agreed to, and the resolution was again read.

Mr. BAER. I move to amend, by striking out all after the word "resolved," and insert the resolution offered by myself on Saturday, in relation to rule twenty-five.

The PRESIDENT. The Clerk will read the resolution for information.

The CLERK read:

WHEREAS, The resolutions adopted by this Convention, which operate as a change, alteration or modification of rule twenty-five, be and they are hereby rescinded and annulled, and the rule reinstated as originally adopted.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has some doubt of the relevancy of this amendment; he would prefer that the gentleman would withdraw it, and allow the question to be taken upon the resolution.

Mr. BAER. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I move, then, to strike out "fifteen," and insert "twenty," and add, "without leave of the Convention."

Mr. MANN. I call for a division on the amendment. So far as it restricts debate to twenty minutes, I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman modify the resolution accordingly?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment to insert "without the permission of the committee."

Mr. MANN. Mr. President: I hope that amendment will not be adopted. Twenty minutes will certainly give any one opportunity to explain sufficiently on the provisions of an amendment which may have been pending before the committee, and the practical effect of it will be that any gentleman who feels constrained by rule to observe it, will be restricted to that length of time.

It operates awkwardly and very unpleasantly to have a rule restricting debate to twenty minutes, and then, when the time is up, having a motion made for an extension. If there should arise any such occasion as clearly calls for an extension of time, the Convention will give its unanimous consent. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the resolution of the gentleman from Potter (Mr. Mann.)

Mr. JOHN N. PURVIANCE. I move to strike out "twenty" and insert "fifteen."

Mr. HOWARD. I move to amend the amendment, by striking out "fifteen" and inserting "thirty."

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. EWING. Mr. President: I confess to a very great ignorance to the parliamentary rules which will tend to facilitate business; but at the opening of the session of this Convention a committee was appointed by the Chair, consisting of fifteen gentlemen of large experience in parliamentary bodies. Several of them had been in the Convention of 1837; some of them were Congressmen, and some members of the Legislature and of other bodies. After mature deliberation they reported a series of rules, which the Convention adopted. We have spent, I think, on an average, one half hour every day undertaking to amend those rules. I do not know how many amendments have been adopted, all apparently intended to facilitate the business of the Convention. My observation is that instead of so doing they have lengthened our debates. I think there is no advantage in them, and the longer we have tried these amendments the better I am satisfied that the committee of fifteen gentlemen reported a good set of rules for the government of the Convention, and for that reason I shall vote against all these amendments; and if the gentleman from Somerset (Mr. Baer) brings up his resolution I shall vote for that. Let us restore the original rule, and stand by the committee of fifteen.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. President: It seems to me that rule twenty-five, as adopted by the Convention, is a sufficient restriction upon the right of debate.

The PRESIDENT. It is no longer in force.

Mr. GOWEN. It is in force in a more restricted sense, by the amendments adopted by the Convention since. It was the understanding of the committee that reported these rules that there should be no previous question called in the committee of the whole. I do not think that we can adopt a Constitution to govern the State of Pennsylvania for the next fifty or one hundred years, an instrument the construction of which will be in the courts time and again, both as to its substance and the meaning of the language, unless preparatory to its adoption we have a reasonable amount of time for debate allowed to us. If this amendment is adopted no one can speak more than once upon a subject. The chairman of the committee which reports the article may make an address in its favor, and may be prohibited from answering any arguments against it, although the time and reflection spent upon the subject in the committee room may make the members of that committee perfectly able, in a few minutes, to give abundant and cogent reasons why the article as reported should be adopted.

I do not believe in a matter of such importance as this, the adoption of the fundamental law of the State, we can properly discharge our duties unless members are allowed some latitude in debate. It may be said that there is too much speaking. That may be true; and sometimes in looking over the papers I am astonished to find how frequently I have been on the floor of the Convention, and I feel very much ashamed; but when I am convinced that the Convention is not disposed to listen to me I always sit down as quickly and as gracefully as possible. In the English Parliament they have a system of coughing members down, but I consider this very unparliamentary, not at all proper in this Convention, and I do not believe it will ever be adopted. I have heard that in the old Convention they had a wheel, and when a member grew tedious in debate it could be set in motion by means of a string, and the noise it would create drowned the voice of the orator. I think the adoption of some similar device would be better than to cut off debate. If it was clearly understood that the previous question should not be called in committee of the whole, and that there should be a thorough, complete and earnest debate in the consideration of every subject, when we return in Convention itself, the previous question can be called by eighteen members. While we are in committee of the whole we are frequently called upon suddenly to act upon an article we have never seen before, and which may have been in the committee for a week or two, and is thereby fully understood by every member of that committee, and I think the re-establishment of rule twenty-five will relieve us from the trouble. I believe it will really save us more time than all these new amendments are calculated to save, because we have taken more time every morning or two in discussing this question, than would have been lost by adhering to the old rule.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. President: I trust that the Convention will adopt some rule that will be permanent—at least just for more than one day. I am in favor of limiting debate in committee of the whole to twenty minutes, and to fix that as the limit, with the understanding that a motion shall not be made to extend the time of the speaker. Our present rule is ten minutes, and if the gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Gowen) had been in the Convention last week he would have found that almost every speaker had his time extended by motion after he had spoken ten minutes. That is our present rule. The proposition now is to extend the time to twenty minutes, and to limit the speakers to that time. The amendment to the amendment suggests fifteen minutes. I hope that amendment will not be adopted, but that we will extend the time to twenty minutes, with the understanding, distinct and explicit, that the time shall not be extended, and that a member shall speak but once on any question before the Convention. Now, sir, I am in favor of applying this rule to the chairmen of our different committees, as well as to every other member of the Convention. There is no necessity of a chairman of a committee taking up two hours of the time of the Convention in explanation when he presents an article to the consideration of the Convention. We have tried this plan, and we found that it did not meet the wishes of the Convention, and in consequence of that we adopted the rule limiting debate. Let the chairmen of the committees, when they present their reports for the action of the committee of the whole, explain the importance of the subject in a brief manner, for I apprehend that not a single proposition will come before the Convention but that the chairman of the committee can explain it fully and clearly in twenty minutes. In addition to this, the adoption of the resolution will give to other members of the Convention an opportunity of expressing their views. There can be no doubt but that there are members belonging to our various committees who are quite as competent to discuss the merits of a report of a committee as the chairman, and if we give an unlimited time to a few members to discuss the whole article, they will occupy so much time that the Convention will become impatient, and those who desire to express their views will not have the opportunity to do so. I apprehend twenty minutes will be a reasonable limitation, and that every member of the Convention will be content if the resolution is adopted. I am in favor of adopting the resolution giving to each member twenty minutes in which to debate any proposition that may arise in committee of the whole.

The question being then taken on the amendment to the amendment, a division was called, which resulted as follows: Ayes, twenty-one; noes, seventy-six.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. President: I move to amend the resolution, by striking out the word "fifteen," and inserting "twenty-five." In offering this amendment I desire to say a few words upon the subject. I am rather surprised to find gentlemen in the Convention who have occupied considerable time in the discussion of the various reports which have been presented to the consideration of this body, now making a proposition to limit those who have not yet intruded themselves upon the time of the Convention at all. I have abstemiously refrained from participating in the debates of the Convention, because I believed the most important question destined to come before us is the one now under consideration. It was my intention, if I should be so fortunate to obtain the floor, to submit some remarks, but if I am to be dealt with in the manner in which other gentlemen in the Convention have been dealt with, in the discussion of important questions, and if I am not allowed to explain the plan which I have in mind, I submit that the little explanation I can make in the limited time allowed to the members of the Convention, under this resolution, will be of but little avail. In introducing the suggestions which I shall have to make, I do not do it for the purpose of making a speech to go into the Debates, but I feel that the views I entertain in regard to this question would be trammelled if I considered myself confined to twenty minutes. I therefore ask that the debate in committee of the whole be extended to twenty-five minutes.

Mr. WORRELL. Mr. President: While this question is being discussed, I desire to read an article from the Frankford Herald, and it is this:

"The Convention was called to discuss and consider all proposed alterations of or additions to the Constitution, and we submit that that debate is not unnecessary which tends to demonstrate the propriety or impropriety of adopting the amendments suggested. * * * * * We say, therefore, to the Convention that the people are not uneasy and anxious to vote upon the amendments, and that they will not consider that time mis-spent or wasted which brings forth guarantees of official purity and the security of private rights."

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I do not desire to protract the discussion in regard to this question. I have always endeavored not to obtrude myself unnecessarily upon the time of the Convention; but it occurs to me there is unnecessary time consumed in taking up resolutions of this kind. I do not desire to repeat what has been so often said, that it is about time every member of the Convention should remember that we are making an organic law for the State of Pennsylvania to last, we hope, half a century. I certainly think that some scope in our deliberations should be allowed for discussion. I know I have profited by the discussions in this body, and that my mind has been changed during the debate upon the various questions which have been introduced in the Convention. I do not think the public will complain if, in the end, we submit to them a result achieved by due deliberation. I will therefore vote in favor of granting the longest time in committee of the whole for debate upon any question which may arise, trusting, of course, to the good sense and judgment of the members of the Convention in governing them in their discussions. I will vote, then, for the proposition of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. S. A. Purviance) to extend the time to twenty-five minutes. If I had it in my power, and if I could persuade this Convention, I would refuse to limit discussion at all in committee of the whole. I would leave it as it was reported originally from the Committee on Rules. The very object of the committee of the whole is to be relieved from that formality which obtains in the discussions in Convention.

The question being then taken on the amendment, striking out "twenty" and inserting "fifteen," a division was called, which resulted as follows: Ayes, sixteen; noes, fifty-six. So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: I move to strike out the word "twenty" and insert "thirty."

The question being taken, the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the resolution, which will be read for information.

The CLERK read as follows:

Resolved, That hereafter in committee of the whole no delegate shall speak longer than twenty minutes at one time, nor more than once on the same proposition.

The question being taken, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I ask the unanimous consent of the Convention to offer a resolution at this time.

[Leave was granted.]

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That sections twenty and twenty-one of the article reported by the Committee on the Legislature, together with the amendments proposed thereto in committee of the whole, be referred back to the Committee on the Legislature, with instructions to make a report thereon to the Convention at as early a day as is practicable.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the resolution of the gentleman is more properly a motion.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Well, Mr. President, I do not persist in offering this resolution. I submit it merely for the consideration of the Convention. It is well known that when the President vacates the chair, the article reported by the Committee on the Legislature will then be considered by the committee of the whole. It must be manifest to every gentleman of the Convention that some confusion exists. The multifarious propositions submitted confuse a great many of our members, and I prefer very much to have all the various propositions which have been offered referred back to the appropriate committee, and have a formal report thereon. I desire to call attention to the fact that there is an arithmetical inaccuracy in the report of the committee, which I apprehend they can correct at once, and I apprehend the committee will not stand by the report. In deference to the committee, and in deference to what I believe is the interest of this very important subject, I hope that it will be re-committed back to the committee, and I apprehend that the whole article will be reported to the Convention the day after to-morrow.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: If this report of the Committee on the Legislature is to be reported back to the committee, it is my desire that the sections indicated in the resolution of the gentleman should be referred to the proper committee, viz: The Committee on Suffrage Election and Representation. I therefore make the motion to strike out the words "Committee on the Legislature," and insert the words "Committee on Suffrage Election and Representation."

The question being taken, the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: I desire to ask for information whether the resolution which has been introduced purports to refer back to the Committee on the Legislature the article which was reported by that committee, and which has been under discussion for the past several days.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. That is the proposition, Mr. President.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Then I am opposed to it, for after spending several days in its consideration, and after the views of the members of the Convention have been obtained in regard to it, I must confess that I can see no propriety in referring it back to the committee from which it emanated.

The question being taken on the resolution, it was not agreed to.

THE LEGISLATURE.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the further consideration of the article reported by the Committee on the Legislature. In the absence of Mr. Hopkins, Mr. Clark will please take the chair.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. Clark in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee of the whole has again under consideration the article reported by the Committee on the Legislature. When the committee rose last they had under consideration the twentieth section, and the question is now upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington.) The Clerk will read the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

The CLERK read the amendments.

Mr. SAMUEL A. PURVANCE. Mr. Chairman: I consider this the most important question that has yet been before the committee, and if the committee will give me their attention, although I am laboring somewhat from the effects of a cold, I will present what I believe to be a plan that has some merit, in reference to the structure of our Legislature.

In the first place, we should fix the character of our House; that is by far the most important body. It is a body which contains the reflex of the popular will, and if we once fix that body we will have no trouble whatever, in my judgment, in making the Senate correspond and bear to the House its proper relation, but first let us fix the House.

I have given this subject, I believe, considerable thought and reflection, and I have endeavored, sir, to bring within that thought and that reflection the elements which I consider would be essential in the structure of our Legislature. I have thought that if we could make the districts independent, if we could make them equal in representation—if we could equalize representation, if we could make the districts self-adjusting, and if we could put them beyond the reach of being gerrymandered, if, in other words, we could combine these four great elements or principles, it would be a structure such as would certainly possess merit. What I mean by independent is that a district shall not be overshadowed by having counties of diverse political sentiments connected so as to control it, and that this shameless gerrymandering of the State, that has hitherto been carried on, shall be stopped. What I mean by equality of representation is that there shall be no ground of complaint from one end of the Commonwealth to the other in reference to representation. What I mean by self-adjusting is that we can dispense with all apportionments, those apportionments that have been so disgraceful to the Commonwealth. What I mean by being free from gerrymandering is to place the districts beyond the reach of "apportionments" of any kind, to make a district adjust itself, and bring about its own independence.

Now, sir, when I say that my proposition is that each county shall have a member in the lower House, and that for every thirty or forty thousand the county shall have an additional member, and when I provide, as I do in that proposition, that the enumeration of the inhabitants shall be taken as prescribed by law, I mean to set aside both State and federal enumeration, because that might require a county to delay too long before she would come into her rightful representation. I mean that the Legislature may pass a law providing that assessors, for instance, in taking taxables, may make an enumeration, also, of the inhabitants, and when that enumeration is certified by the commissioners to the Secretary of the Commonwealth, the Governor can issue his proclamation, and at the ensuing election an additional member can be elected. The working of that system would be this: Take a population of, say three million five hundred thousand, and divide it by forty thousand, and you get eighty-seven as the number of members, to which add the sixty-six members you give the counties, by concession, and it makes one hundred and fifty-three members in the lower House. In the first place, there will be some outstanding fractions, but these fractions will eventually come in and make the House one hundred and fifty-three. At first it will be about one hundred and thirty. If you reduce the ratio and make it thirty thousand, it would make the House one hundred and eighty-three. Whether that would be too many or not will be a matter for the consideration of this body.

Now I desire to say a word with regard to the concession to each county of one member each. I have in my eye the county of Forest, in the western part of Pennsylvania, through which the river Allegheny runs, and which is rich in pine and hemlock and cherry lumber, and rich in oil territory, owned by men residing in your city, and elsewhere, entitled to representation, and when I concede a member to that little county, I rob no larger county, because when I give a larger county a member upon the same principle, irrespective of population, that county has no right to complain of the concession to the county of Forest. Therefore this, as you see, would be what I say it would be, independent, equal in population, self-adjusting, and free from gerrymandering. These are the great elements which I wish to bring into this arrangement.

Then, if you choose to make your Senate correspond with your House, take the proposition of the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Corson.) That proposition concedes one Senator to each county, and the only objection that can be made to it is, that it might enlarge your Senate beyond its present limit too much. It provides that each city shall have also a Senator, and that with regard to cities having a population of one hundred thousand or over, the population shall be divided by the number of counties in the State, which would be sixty-six, and the result would give the proportion for the number of Senators to which she would be entitled. In a Senate thus constructed, that would give to a city like Philadelphia, in the Senate ten members; it would make the Senate, altogether, seventy-five. It is true the only objection that probably can be made to that is that it is too large; but when you consider that that makes the Senate remain stationary—it is made an inflexible rule by which it is not to be enlarged—it will have to remain seventy-five, and when your House grows, as it gradually would grow by the coming in of the fractions, on my proposition, to be about two hundred and twenty-five, the Senate would just bear the relation to the House that it does at present.

I submit to the committee whether, if we can adopt a plan of this kind, and dispense with the apportionments altogether, it would not be better to do so. I listened to the proposition submitted by the Committee on Suffrage, and it struck me as being a proposition that has not been well considered, and if well considered, and well analyzed, that this Convention will never consent to it. What is it? That the people of the Commonwealth shall elect a board of ten men, by what is called the "restricted suffrage" system. That would bring in five of one view and five of another; and, be it remembered, that a nomination there is an election. Suppose, now, that you bring into a board like that a few men like some of the representatives from Philadelphia, that have been described by our worthy friends from the city. Once elect such men, and although you may provide that a majority of seven shall be required before the apportionment can be made, yet if there are one or two men there who can be corrupted or purchased, would not they be bought over, or brought over, so as to make a majority? And may not an apportionment thus made prove a greater outrage upon the Commonwealth than ever has been made before? This is possible and even probable, under the condition of things to which I have referred. I admit, sir, that your Legislature have disgraced themselves, time and again, in reference to that matter. In the Congressional district in which I reside, by a democratic apportionment, it once reached from within six miles of the Ohio to beyond the Susquehanna. The apportionments made more recently by the republicans in power are just as bad. They have selected democratic counties, and overshadowed them by republican counties, for the express purpose of repressing the voice of the people. In the first instance, if you examine the last gerrymandering of the State, you find Clarion county, which is represented on this floor by our friend, Mr. Corbett, overshadowed by Venango, and Mercer, and Crawford. Greene, which is represented by my learned friend on my left, (Mr. Purman,) with a majority of sixteen hundred, is overshadowed by Lawrence and Beaver. Luzerne, which has a population of one hundred and sixty thousand, has the will of its people repressed by attaching to it the county of Susquehanna. I refer to these facts, because it has been the practice of our Legislature, time and again, to produce this disgraceful state of things, and I want to put an end to it. If we can get a self-adjusting system, let us get it.

What is one of the other provisions made in this proposition of the Committee on Suffrage? It is that when this apportionment is made it so remains for ten years. It is in your organic law, and you cannot reach it by legislation, nor by judiciary process; and the most infamous frauds that we have ever had practiced in the Commonwealth may be practiced again, but must then remain there for a period of ten years. I submit to the committee whether it would not be best that this should be entirely rejected.

I desire to say a word or two in reference to another portion of this report, which now seems to be open to us, and I shall only refer to that which, I believe, has not been referred to by the committee before in reference to Senatorial restriction—city Senatorial restriction—and in that, sir, I beg leave to differ from my learned and esteemed friend from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward.) I do not see why we should ever think of restricting the population of the State, unless we have some reasons for it other than any that I have yet heard on this floor. I was surprised to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Legislature the one and only reason—that combinations may be made by our Senators. Sir, Philadelphia or any other city has a right to make combinations in any matter that concerns her interests. But what can result from this that would be injurious to the people of the Commonwealth? Take, for instance, a democrat elected in Lancaster county and two republicans; then take one republican and two democrats elected from Berks. They go to Harrisburg, and on a question of interest in relation to their county affairs they go together, but when it comes to a party question they adhere to their party. Hence it is that there is no combination that can be made that would be injurious.

There was another argument made to which I would briefly call the attention of the committee, and that is drawn from the supposed analogy of our State to the formation of our confederacy. Why, sir, it bears no analogy. Our confederacy was formed by sovereign States, standing out before that confederation was made as separate, sovereign and independent States; and when they made their bargain, they made a reservation that a small State should have the same power in the Senate that a large State should have. But a city, such as Pittsburg or Philadelphia, is an integral part of your Commonwealth; it has always been such, never less, never more, and, therefore, why make a step-child of one who was on the original platform of the organization of your State. It cannot and ought not to be done.

There is another argument which has not been adverted to, which I will now present to the committee. In the formation of our government, which is a republican government, as was clearly defined by the gentleman now in the chair, some short time ago, we have the right to select electors; we have a right to say from what portion of our citizens the electors shall come; but, sir, when we fix that, when we declare that a certain class of citizens shall be electors, it has been ruled by the Supreme Court of the State that we may regulate suffrage, but we cannot destroy it. I undertake to say, therefore, that when you say that this city, that a body of electors of say eighty thousand in number in this city, shall not vote for more than four Senators, whilst eighty thousand electors in another part of the Commonwealth shall vote for eight Senators, you are destroying suffrage; you are taking away the functions of an elector, a thing that you have no right to do. This is all I need to say on that subject. A word or two more and I have done.

It has been said in this Convention that much of the mischiefs which have resulted to the people of the Commonwealth have come from that Constitution in which my friend on my left (Mr. Woodward) took a very prominent part. I, sir, came to that Convention but a youth. I came there charged with a duty, and that was to strike down life-tenure on the judiciary, and to strike down Executive patronage. Up to that time this Commonwealth was rent asunder in all its social relations, father against son, brother against brother. The Governor possessed the patronage of ten or fifteen thousand appointees, and they increased, of course, in aspirants to probably one hundred thousand. I came there, sir, to stop that; but whilst I gave my votes in that way—votes that I never regretted, votes that I endorse to-day—I have here to say that I have no special attachment for that Constitution of 1838. I admit that thirty-five long years have rolled by. We fixed the House then at one hundred. I admit, and I am not insensible to the fact that our Commonwealth has, since that time, increased in population to a fraction beyond three and a half millions; that our hills and valleys are teeming with rich mineral treasure, demanding additional facilities for development, and that this development must come in the shape of corporations and companies, and combinations of capital and labor; and that there must come from this body authority for the exercise of additional checks and balances, to prevent encroachments upon the powers and liberties of the people, and these must come through your Legislature; and though you may strike down special legislation, and to a great extent I hope it will be done, yet, sir, these results will be effected by general laws, affecting the whole people. I care not, therefore, how conservative you make your Governor and Senate, but let your House, which is the reflex of the popular will, be made stronger, if possible, and be brought nearer to the people.

Mr. Ross. Mr. Chairman: From the remarks of my colleague, (Mr. Lear,) I learned that he and I differ in our views with reference to the question of Senatorial representation. Inasmuch as he thought it right that he should place himself upon record with regard to it, I have deemed it due to myself that I should express my own views upon the subject, that our mutual constituency may know just how we each stand in relation to this question. In the consideration of the question of representation in our State Senate, we of this Convention approach the subject, bound by no organic law—bound to pay obedience to no fundamental rule, but we approach it as though it were a perfectly new subject; guided, it is true, by the light which the experience of the past organic rules, and of the Constitutions of seventeen hundred and ninety and eighteen hundred and thirty-eight may give us. But we approach it, as I have said, as a principle which we are to adopt for ourselves and which is, for the purposes of this discussion, bound by no organic rule.

It has been said that representation is the chain of communication between the people and those to whom they have delegated the governing power. Upon the constitution of each one of the links of that chain, upon the strength of that chain as a whole, depend the rights, depends the freedom, depends the welfare of the citizen, and depend also the limitations and the restrictions upon the governing power. It is therefore an all important question—it is a question in whose determination this Convention can do nothing which will more interest the people of this State or in which they are more deeply concerned. I am, sir, I confess, in a minority, so far as I can learn, in my views in regard to the matter of the Senatorial representation. I believe, sir, that the true theory upon which we should fill our Senate chamber—the true theory upon which the Council of the State—as that House was properly termed by a gentleman on this floor the other day—should be organized, is upon the basis of territorial representation, and upon that basis alone. I would, sir, if I had the power, elect but one State Senator from each county, whether it were Forest, or Cameron, or Elk, or the great city and county of Philadelphia, without regard to population. I would give a State Senator to each county, no more and no less; but as I have said, I am satisfied that that view will receive but little encouragement on the floor of this Convention, and as it is necessary in order that we should accomplish something, that we should all concede something, it will not do for each one of us to stand up inexorably rigid and erect in favor of his own peculiar views, yielding nothing and conceding nothing. As by such a persistence as that we never could arrive at any result. I am, therefore, prepared to modify my views on this subject to a limited extent. I am prepared to say that territory and population both shall enter into the computation upon which the State Senator shall be elected throughout the State; and it has struck me that the proposition which was offered by the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Corson) best attains that object.

That proposition provides that each county in the State shall elect one State Senator, and that the cities containing a population of over one hundred thousand shall have a basis of representation, which will be arrived at by dividing the whole population of all the counties by the whole number of those counties. That proposition embraces within it the territorial idea, and also the idea of population, and that I am prepared to accede to. But here is where I differ from my colleague (Mr. Lear.) I cannot, and will not, vote in favor of unlimited representation from the great cities. I believe that this concentration of power, which we have heard referred to frequently on the floor of this Convention within the last few days, exists in our large cities, is injurious to the best interests of the people of this State. I have lived, not within the limits, but within the shadow, of this great city for the greater part of my life. As a Pennsylvanian I am proud of her—I triumph in her triumph, and I mourn in her defeat—but knowing, as I do, her great importance, knowing, as I do, the inestimable advantages which not only her own citizens, but those of the Commonwealth, and, indeed, of the whole Union, derive from this city; knowing all this, I still know what her power, badly exercised, may be. I know that when she stretches out her sceptre of power—her representatives in the large number in which they now are—if the question be one in which the great city should be interested, as against the country, her representatives, standing shoulder to shoulder, will fight for that particular movement which the city is advocating, as against any other section, and standing together, as they do, in the large number in which they are, and may hereafter be, they will be able to put such a measure through, no matter how vigorously and bitterly it may be contested by the other parts of the State.

There is nothing, as I conceive, in the argument, that to limit the large cities in their representation is open to the objection that the cities are subject to taxation without representation. Why, sir, the lower House is based upon the idea of population. The lower House filled, as has been suggested by the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. S. A. Purviance,) will give to the large cities all the power and protection which they can need, or which they will be entitled to. The State Senate adopts no laws—enacts no laws—it is bound hand and foot, unless it has the concurrence of the lower House in its action. Therefore, I say, there is nothing in the argument that the citizens of our larger cities are liable to be taxed without having themselves fairly and duly represented. There is nothing, again, in the argument, which my colleague (Mr. Lear) used, that a delegate from the country is dwarfing his constituency, and dwarfing his own intellectual stature, when he is apprehensive of the two large cities having a full Senatorial representation based upon population, that the country might suffer. It is not the contest of man to man that we are afraid of, nor the intellectual strife of mind against mind that we dread. Coming from the country, as I do, I say that there are to be found throughout the length and breadth of this State men who are able, and amply able, to compete with those gentlemen who come from the cities, in our legislative halls.

Sir, it is this overpowering of the multitude against the few, it is the rush of the many against the few that I fear; it is the concentration in the cities against the divided few throughout the country. Why it will not be pretended that the country members stand shoulder to shoulder as do the members from our large cities. Such has never been the experience of the past, and I have but little doubt that it will never be the experience of the future.

Now, sir, I have not intended to make any extended remarks on this subject. I thought that it was due to my constituency that I should define my position, inasmuch as my colleague and I differed on that subject, and therefore, in conclusion, as I said before, I am in favor of a territorial representation in the State Senate, modified to the extent of population being taken into consideration also, so that when the large cities come to have their representation in the State Senate, given to them, that such representation shall be, to a certain extent, limited. That limit may be fixed hereafter, in accordance with the sound wisdom and the judgment of this committee.

Mr. METZGER. Mr. Chairman: It is not my purpose, in rising, to discuss the question of cumulative voting, inasmuch as I do not understand that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Carbon, (Mr. Lilly,) which is now under consideration, necessarily introduces that method. The first section introduces what might be termed minority voting, or electing commissioners of apportionment on the plan of limited voting. I am opposed entirely to this plan. It appears to me that the object which the author of this amendment intended to accomplish cannot be attained by the adoption of this amendment. It is evidently the intention that the apportionment should be removed from a political body and placed into the hands of a body that would not be partisan or political. It does not accomplish this purpose. It only removes this business from the people, or from the Representatives elected directly by the people, and places it, in my opinion, in the hands of parties who are nominated and appointed by partisan conventions. It is well known that certain rings in each political party control, in a great measure, the nominations made by the party. If this section were adopted, these political rings who had particular objects to serve, or wished to accomplish certain ends, would make it a point to secure such men on the ticket as they knew would carry out their purpose. This they could, in my opinion, more easily accomplish in the nominating conventions, than they could if these commissioners are elected by the people at large, in the same manner as other officers are elected. But as I said before, or at least intimated, I sympathize with the object which the author had in view in proposing this amendment, and therefore I shall favor any proposition which, in my opinion, will remove this question of apportionment from the political arena, and will so regulate it that it will not hereafter be a bone of contention in the Legislature. I apprehend that this can be accomplished by this Convention, and I believe that this Convention is the proper body to do it. I am under the impression, from what I have seen in this body, that it is probably the least partisan body that has ever sat in this State. I think the apportionment can be made by this Convention so as to meet future demands. I shall therefore favor any proposition looking to the attainment of this object. I believe that amendments have been proposed by gentlemen here, which, if adopted, will remove all necessity for future apportionment.

There is a proposition here to give to each county a Senator. There is another proposition to give to each county a member, and as many more as the county shall be entitled to in proportion to its population. If you were to adopt these propositions it would end this question. Now, while I am not going to argue, Mr. Chairman, that we should give to each county a Senator, my view is that we should either do so, or so parcel out this State that each territory, composed of a certain number of square miles, shall be entitled to one Senator. If we do this, without regard to population, the apportionment is accomplished. Now I think if this Convention will reflect for a moment they will see no injustice in this. If we but re-call to our minds the objects we should have in view of obtaining the creation of the Senate, (and this matter has been fully and ably discussed before in the argument upon a previous question,) we will come to the conclusion that the Senate is formed to serve several purposes. It is not intended merely for the purpose of getting a second House to represent the people, but one of its functions is to form a check to the hasty and indiscreet action of the popular branch. This we suppose to be accomplished when we provide that in the Senate we will require members of more experience, and will also give them a longer term, so that by uniting experience with considerable independence we will make them a conservative body adapted to revising the action of the popular branch. But there is another object for which the Senate is constituted, which cannot be accomplished so well in this way. It is to form a check to the tyranny of majorities over minorities. At the present time we find that our popular cities are increasing much more rapidly in population than are our rural districts, and the day is not far distant when a combination of Representatives of the populous districts will entirely overshadow the representation from the rural districts. If you base representation in the Senate upon territory this can never take place. The thinly settled districts will have an equal voice in the Senate chamber with the more populous districts, and they will form a check to what the popular branch representing the populous districts may do. I apprehend that this is necessary to the perpetuity of our republican form of government. There never could be a worse tyranny than the tyranny of the popular branch of the Legislature representing the populous sections of the State over those that are thinly settled, in case the Representatives of the populous cities combined to pass laws without regard to the interests of the less populous sections of the State, and had the power so to do, by reason of their numbers.

So much in regard to the construction of the Senate. Now, as for the House, I heartily agree to the proposition of my friend from Allegheny (Mr. S. A. Purviance.) His proposition based representation not only upon population, but likewise upon territory. You have, if you adopt his amendment, a member from each county, and you give to the larger counties as many more as their population shall show them to be entitled to have. I apprehend that this is necessary for the purpose of preserving to the people of these smaller counties their rights, and to promote their improvement and their welfare. Under the present system, and the system which is proposed by this amendment under discussion, many of the smaller counties are unrepresented. The injustice that has been done in the past to these small counties cannot be estimated, except by members who have been so unfortunate, if I may use the term, as to represent districts in which small are attached to larger counties. How often does it not happen that a member is elected to represent a district in which smaller counties are attached to larger ones, who, coming from the larger county, as he usually does, scarcely knows a man, much less the wants, of his constituents who reside in the adjoining smaller counties which he is representing? The large county has its peculiar interests, and for that purpose it selects its peculiar instrument, regardless of what the smaller ones may require, and thus the smaller are left at the mercy of the larger ones. In order, therefore, to fully protect the interests of the smaller counties, I maintain that they ought to have a member conceded to them.

Is there any injustice in this method of representation? Will the larger counties lose much by it? No! They are not only entitled to one member, which is conceded to the smaller counties, but they are entitled to be represented by as many more as their population shows they ought to have. The cities, likewise, ought not to complain. They, too, will be entitled to representation according to their population, and all that I would do is to provide a check to prevent the smaller counties from being over-borne, down-trodden and oppressed. Gentlemen may argue that this would increase too largely the number of the House and the Senate. I apprehend, from what I have seen of this Convention, that it is the opinion of a large majority of its members, and I believe that I am justified in saying that it is the opinion of a large majority of the people of Pennsylvania, that a reform of this kind is needed, and we should, therefore, increase the number of our representatives. It has been said that if you make the Legislature a larger body it will be less pure, less honest, less capable and composed of less honorable members. Is this true? Why, sir, if this were true the Pennsylvania Legislature should be the purest in the United States, because, with the exception of one single State, its representatives represent the largest constituency of any representative body of any State in the Union. The gentleman's argument is unfounded. The present history of the times ought to have taught him better. By referring simply to the history of those States in which the representative represents but a small constituency, and in which the States, though much smaller than Pennsylvania, largely outnumber in their representative bodies the Legislature of Pennsylvania, he would have found that in the latter there is, to say the least, less suspicion of corruption than attaches to our Legislature. I am not here to affirm that this suspicion of corruption, by which our Legislature is attainted in this State, is well founded. I only assert there is a suspicion, and if an increase in the number of members will but remove that suspicion we will have accomplished a noble work.

I say the people demand such a reform, because they have, for some reason or other, lost confidence in the House as at present constituted. Although I cannot say that that loss of confidence is well founded, I here affirm that the people demand an increase of representatives, and if increasing the number will satisfy the wishes of the people, and will allay their suspicions and lead them to believe that purity and honesty again reign at Harrisburg, we will have accomplished sufficient to have justified the calling of this Convention. If it will do this, who will not be proud to honor and respect the Legislature of this great Commonwealth? Who would not be proud to speak with the highest degree of respect for the character of our law-making power?

"Oh!" said the gentleman the other day, "if you adopt any plan by which the number is increased you will have a mob." Why, sir, the House of Commons is composed of at least five times the number that composes our Legislature. So, too, the Legislatures of the eastern States, though much smaller States as I have said, are composed of a much larger number than is the Legislature of Pennsylvania. Are they mobs? The reference which he made by way of illustration to the Athenian democracy in his remarks, is totally inapplicable. That was not a representative government at all, but every citizen possessing certain qualifications was a law-maker, and participated directly in the making of the laws. This, it is true, would convert such an assembly of legislators into a mob.

But then again, Mr. Chairman, it is necessary that these Representatives should be brought nearer to their constituency. They ought to be elected by their neighbors and their friends; by men who know them and know their qualifications not only as regards their honesty, but their ability to represent their several districts. But, as I said, under the present district system and under the system proposed here by the gentleman from Carbon, this cannot be accomplished. Many a Representative is representing a territory and a people with whom he is not acquainted, and in whose county probably he has never set his foot. If you bring these Representatives right home to the people, will they be less honorable? I affirm here that you will then see a class of men elected who will do honor to the position instead of hoping to be honored by it.

It is said by gentlemen that the purity of our judiciary is owing to their long term and their independence. This may be true of the judiciary. It is also true of much less important officials. To what is the purity of our school boards and our councils in our small towns owing? Do not the very best men of the State fill these positions, although they do it without receiving any emoluments? I tell you there are men representing you in the town councils to-day who would not accept a seat in the Legislature. And why? They know it is sufficient to destroy a man's character to be accused of being a member of the Legislature, and that honorable men will not aspire to that position. Were the representatives of our ancestors, who, a century ago, represented much smaller constituencies, less honorable because they represented fewer men? Did they act less honestly? Did they do less for the interests of the community they represented? I appeal to the members of this body to answer. There is, therefore, nothing in the argument against an increase in the number of our legislators, and I repeat, again, in conclusion, if there is any reform more imperatively demanded by the people than another, it is a reform of this kind, as well as in the manner of constituting the legislative body.

MR. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I shall occupy the time of the Convention but for a few moments, and shall confine my remarks entirely to the resolution and the amendments offered by the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) and the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Simpson,) and I will say, at the outset, that we have before us a question which, to fairly and properly adjust, is almost a matter of impossibility, and that the best we can do will be to approach that perfection which, from the nature of things, we can never entirely secure.

Now, sir, I object, in the first place, to the manner of selecting the commissioners to make the apportionment, as offered by the gentleman from Carbon. It is true, also, that the method of apportionment by the House and Senate is open to objection, for the reason that the experience of 1871 is such as to show clearly that the House and the Senate did not fairly and did not properly apportion the State. Why, just look at it, sir. In the county of Mercer, with a population of fifty thousand, in a ratio of thirty-five thousand, they have but one Representative; and right adjoining, the county of Green, with a population of but twenty-five thousand, in a ratio of thirty-five thousand, has one Representative. Mercer but one Representative with a population of fifty thousand, and Green one Representative with a population of twenty-five thousand. What fairness is there in that?

Take Washington county, with a population of forty-eight thousand; that county has but one Representative; and Butler, with a population of thirty-six thousand, two Representatives. Now, sir, can anything be more unfair than this sort of apportionment.

Perry and Dauphin counties, with a joint population of eighty thousand, have three members, whilst the adjoining county, Lancaster, with a population of one hundred and twenty-five thousand, against eighty thousand in Perry and Dauphin district, has but three Representatives. This is the gerrymandering complained of under the present system, political entirely, because I imagine men of greater influence or ability in one county, representing that county in their own interests, were superior in diplomacy to those who represented other counties with, perhaps, not the same diplomatic ability. All this proves that it would be unsafe for us to allow the House and the Senate to apportion the State.

The objection to the ten commissioners has been stated by the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. S. A. Purviance,) clearly and unmistakably proving that either of the two political parties will control the ten commissioners, for, from the character of the proposed amendment, ten to be chosen and only five voted for, as the political parties decide, so will the result follow. And then we will have five democrats and five republicans, each with their political maps in hand, contending for supremacy. With these interests paramount, a proper apportionment for different counties throughout the State can never be secured, for as the temptation will be great to secure the end, so will the efforts be great to attain it, and the gerrymandering so much complained of will be equal in the one case as in the other.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the remedy for this? In my opinion the remedy is that we should, ourselves, so carefully and prudently prepare an article in the Constitution that neither the House or Senate, or the ten commissioners, should we see fit to select them, be able to so gerrymander the State and improperly apportion it. To accomplish this all-important result, it seems to me that we could very properly adopt the plan as presented by the gentleman from Carbon, and first fix the House at one hundred and eighty members. To this I suppose that there would be no objection, for as far as I can judge, the members of this Convention agree that the House of Representatives should be a large one. If you fix the House at one hundred and eighty members, and adopt the system of ratios, and where necessary three-fourths of ratios, so that these excessive fractions, which have been so hard to dispose of shall be utilized, then I contend that this State would be by our own act independent of any commission; independent of either Senate or House, fairly and properly apportioned.

It will be observed that if you adopt the plan of one hundred and eighty members in the House of Representatives, that the full ratio of representation for each member will be twenty thousand; twenty thousand times one hundred and eighty being three millions six hundred thousand in round numbers, about the population of the Commonwealth. Now the ratio of twenty thousand would perhaps require some sub-division in order to use up these fractions which we find so difficult to handle, so as to give each county a Representative. But if we would adopt an amendment giving each county having three-fifths of this ratio of twenty thousand, say twelve thousand, one Representative, and giving each county having a full ratio of twenty thousand, and three-fifths of a ratio, twelve thousand, which together would amount to thirty-two thousand, two Representatives; that plan, worked throughout the State, would give us just as fair and just as honest an apportionment as could be made, and as we all acknowledge the basis of representation, as far as the House of Representatives is concerned, to be population, and not by the acre, every one would be satisfied.

I have taken some trouble to work out this plan of one hundred and eighty members for the House of Representatives. Twenty thousand would be a full ratio, and three-fifths of a ratio, or twelve thousand, would entitle a county to a member, and one full ratio and three-fifths of a ratio, or thirty-two thousand, would entitle a county to two members, and I find this to be the result:

Twenty counties, each entitled to one Representative.

Twenty-one counties, each entitled to two Representatives.

Eight counties, each entitled to three Representatives.

Four counties, each entitled to four Representatives.

Three counties, each entitled to six Representatives.

One county, entitled to eight Representatives.

One county, entitled to thirteen Representatives, and

One county, entitled to thirty-four Representatives.

In all, fifty-nine counties with a joint representation, on that basis, of one hundred and seventy-six members, leaving out of the calculation Sullivan, Pike, Fulton, Forest, Elk and Cameron, six counties and four Representatives over to divide among these small counties to make up the full number.

Now if we can apportion the State by this plan, and the calculation I have made is a correct one, what fairer method can we adopt? These six small counties have a joint population, I believe, of about thirty-five thousand, and to divide among that population we have four Representatives. Surely it would not be difficult to do that.

This proposition meets the idea of the gentleman from Allegheny, and will give every county in the State of Pennsylvania its full and fair representation; and will give these six smaller counties, of an average population of about six thousand each, four Representatives. And what more could they ask for?

By this plan, in a clear, distinct and unmistakable manner, we say to whatever commission we may see fit to make: "This you must do; by these directions you must be governed." And then I care not whether it be the House of Representatives or the Senate, or whatever body may be selected for that purpose, they cannot gerrymander, for they must obey the Constitution of the State. It matters not in that case if we have five commissioners from either party, all anxious and eager to contend for their own advantage; we give them an article which they must live up to; we give them an article to which they must subject themselves; we give them an article by which they must be governed, and if it is violated they subject themselves to open censure. Adopt this method, and every county in the State will be fairly and honestly represented.

I now propose to state my objections to the plan as offered by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. S. A. Purviance.) He desires to give every county, great and small, in the State a Representative, and for forty thousand population an additional Representative. How will this work? A county having a population of thirty-nine thousand would be, by his plan, entitled to but one Representative, and Forest county, a county with but seven hundred taxable inhabitants, a county with this spare population, containing three hundred thousand acres of land, thus having nearly five hundred acres of land to every taxable, a Representative. Surely, is this not the borough system? Surely, is this not voting by the acre, and not by the elector? Surely, is this not voting by pinus and hemlocks? Surely, this is not either democratic or republican in its character.

That county pays a tax to the State based upon personal property, valued at the enormous sum of forty thousand dollars. Just look at it—a county with a taxable population of seven hundred! In one of its townships it polled the extraordinary vote of fifteen for one candidate, and two for the other, at the last election; and a personal wealth of forty thousand dollars exerting the same influence in the House of Representatives as a county with many millions of personal property, and thirty-nine thousand population. Now I ask, in the name of justice, in the name of fairness, in the name of everything that is right and proper, should this proposition be submitted to, where, by this plan of ratios as proposed, we can fairly and honestly give to every county a full and proper representation?

Again, sir, by this plan a population of thirty-two thousand would entitle a county to two Representatives. In the State about sixteen counties would come up to this ratio and would have two Representatives.

Now if you adopt the plan of the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. S. A. Purviance,) to give a county two Representatives, it must have a population of forty thousand. Therefore, if we adopt the plan of the gentleman from Allegheny, and reject the amendment of the gentleman from Carbon, we exclude these sixteen counties from their fair and just representation, and give them but one Representative, and placing them upon a footing with a county of four thousand population. Adopt the plan of the gentleman from Carbon, and these counties would be entitled to two Representatives, their full and proper share.

With regard to a plan for the Senate apportionment, that, of course, would be a more difficult matter to work out. Take, however, a Senate consisting of sixty members, and on the same plan of ratios thirty-six counties would have one Senator each, and over, leaving but thirty counties to be districted. The plan would be simple. More than one-half of the counties would be fairly represented by its one Senator, and the other counties it would be a very easy thing to form into proper Senatorial districts. I claim, sir, that no subject can come before us of more vital importance than the one under consideration. Every voter in the State feels a deep interest in securing a fair and just representation. To deprive him of this is to do him an injury, which will, if carried on, imperil our republican institutions. Let it not be said that by our action the power of an elector upon a dividing line is three times as powerful as any other. Taxation without representation can never be sustained. To repel this evil British tea was thrown overboard in Boston Harbor, and Valley Forge, years ago, was the scene of suffering and death. Full, fair representation is demanded by the voters of the State. Equal, exact, even-handed justice to all, without special or sectional advantages to any, should be secured, and to do this effectually and fairly, it seems to me, will be to vote for and adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Carbon.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: The several amendments under consideration involve a large number of subjects. To-day the question which has principally been discussed is the apportionment of the State. Last Saturday gentlemen seemed more disposed to direct their arguments to the question of limited or cumulative voting. I shall confine the few remarks I shall make to the latter questions. That subject is raised by the first proposition of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Carbon, (Mr. Lilly,) and as I consider this a very important, and one involving legal questions, I have prepared my argument, and shall read it from my manuscript. I believe it conflicts with the Constitution of the United States, in at least three of its provisions.

In the first place, I hold that electing a man to participate in the sovereignty by a minority is no election at all, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States.

In the next place, I hold that it is a violation of the fundamental principle of republican government; and in the next place, that it violates the fourteenth amendment, in that it both denies and abridges the right of the voter.

That amendment requires that the right of voting shall not be denied or in any way abridged, and that must be interpreted as we find the practice of the States to be in regard to that right at the time of the adoption of that amendment. I say it violates that provision of the Constitution which guarantees a republican form of government. Under the Constitution republican government is to be guaranteed. This supposes a form of government already established, and the established form is what is guaranteed. Now in no State was there a form where the minority could elect its officers against the will of the majority, to participate in the exercise of the sovereign power.

I take it, sir, that that is a fact that cannot be controverted, that at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States in no State in this Union could a minority of its voters, against the will of the majority, elect persons who could or did participate in the exercise of the sovereign power of the State.

I cannot see my way clear to support this plan of either limited or cumulative voting. The general rule, and that is fundamental, in our State and general government, is that in all matters submitted to the people for their votes the majority, plurality or highest vote shall decide and govern, and there has been no single notable exception to this rule.

In the case of choosing inspectors of election, where two are to be chosen, the voter is limited by law to one vote. These officers are mere clerks, without any powers of government whatever.

The friends and advocates of the limited vote and the cumulative vote start out upon a false theory, a political heresy, and they rear a structure that to some minds appears fair and reasonable, and that might be applied practically and with good effect to affairs of government. Their base of operation is that the minority is not only not represented in the government, but is practically disfranchised, and that society is the loser by the majority rule, and will be the gainer by throwing it overboard and accepting their new political plan whereby all will be represented. In the first place they propose to do what is impossible; by their own theory and plan all will never be actually represented, unless they can devise some plan of dividing society into just two divisions—one the majority and the other the minority. We know practically that is not the case now, never has been and very likely never will be.

Our voting population is now divided into numerous divisions. First, the republican majority; second, the democratic minority; third, advocates of female suffrage; fourth, of temperance; fifth, of anti-temperance; sixth, those who desire to compel the recognition of God in the Constitution; seventh, the Quaker, who is opposed to bearing arms or paying taxes for the purpose of warfare; eighth, the labor reformers. And these are only a part of the strongly marked political divisions into which society is divided now, each one firmly believing they are right and anxious to have their several political opinions incorporated into the government. If it is true that the fundamental principle of our government is a lie, viz: That the majority duly chosen does represent all the people of the country, and are bound to look to the "general welfare" of all, then it is time to look for a remedy; but is the limited vote or cumulative vote a remedy? The evil complained of is that minorities are not represented. Will their plan secure actual representation to even a majority of the minorities? Where is the genius that can devise a plan whereby all factions, fragments and political divisions can be actually represented? In the first place, in nearly all the districts there would not be one-quarter enough offices to go around, and the only consistent plan will be to go on creating offices, so that all divisions can be supplied, because so long as there is a division not supplied there is a minority not represented; then, really, the plan to be at all practical must, in truth and fact, be nothing more or less than a scheme to divide the offices between the real majority and the strongest minority, and the weaker minorities are all left out in the cold. This must be so, because to carry it out to its legitimate results, of procuring representation to all minorities, it is wholly impracticable. But is it true that minorities are not represented in our representative government?

The first rule is that the majority shall administer the government for the benefit of all, and so far as society, in general, is concerned, this rule has, in practice, worked for the benefit of all, and the clear evidence of this lies in the growth and general prosperity of the whole country. The only real point of difference is that one party of men have the offices and the others do not, for the time being; but the "outs" live in hopes, and this makes them vigilant and watchful of the "ins," and this is one of the strongest securities the people have for honest and good government. The limited vote or the cumulative vote would take this away, because the majority and the strongest minority would have all in their own hands—there would not even be a struggle before the people except for the nomination, because the election would be a matter of course; there would be no one to growl but the small minorities. But are minorities represented and protected now? I think they are as fully as it is possible and consistent with the responsibilities of good government. The majority party in power must be held responsible. This plan weakens this responsibility. State and national Constitutions are made to limit and control majorities, and by that limitation and control protect minorities; and the theory of government is, that the majority, administering the government under the limitations and restrictions imposed, cannot injure either the minority or majority of society. All power to do injury is supposed to be taken away from the majority by the Constitution, and the powers granted or permitted are supposed to be such, and such alone, as are for the good of society. To this end the greatest and best men the world has produced have labored. It is to be hoped that all their labors have not been in vain. Under the rule above stated, questions of policy will arise as endless and diversified as the wants and judgments of our people—and no plan of government, or voting or representation can prevent this or ever meet all the demands and caprices of faction or individuals in society.

If all men were honest, this cumulative plan of voting might practically work no great mischief, although it should violate the fundamental principle of government; but suppose we have a corrupt, ambitious and grasping minority, backed by corporate power and combinations of money, and in all States there has been and will be a corrupt minority, more or less strong, according to circumstances, and the weakness or incapacity of society to close up the places that lead men into temptation, that invite them to do wrong by putting it in their power, and this plan will put it in the power of that corrupt minority to secure seats in every department of the government. It will lead to corruption, to a certainty, in the city of Philadelphia for members of the Legislature, if the single district system is abolished, that has worked so badly, and the old system restored, it will give each voter the right to cumulate twenty or more votes on one candidate, and in Allegheny county at least eight; in Lancaster, five, and so on through the State, wherever more than one candidate shall be entitled to be elected in a legislative district. The voter will consider himself worth selling, and candidates will consider him worth buying.

The people believe, and no doubt rightly, that a majority of the Legislature has always been honest, and a minority, more or less strong, always dishonest. This minority are generally smart and enterprising, working under the strong and exciting stimulus of personal interest, working by all manner of schemes and devices to overcome and deceive enough to gain a majority, and we all know that honest ignorance is too often overcome and outwitted. The truth is, the Legislature is a bad place for honest ignorance, because he not only appears to disadvantage himself, but unwittingly votes away the dearest rights of his constituents.

The first section of the amendment now under consideration provides for electing ten commissioners to apportion the State for Representatives, and prohibits the voter from voting for more than five.

Do the advocates of this plan intend to apply it to national as well as State officers? If so there are obstacles in several provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

First, the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the elector shall in each State have the qualification for an elector of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

Under this clause the House of Representatives will have to decide what is meant by the words "chosen by the people," and the legal qualifications for an elector; and the first one will be whether an elector can duplicate himself. If he cannot then there is an end of cumulative voting for members of the lower House of Congress.

The Constitution of the United States requires that the United States shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government. A republic is defined by our best writers to be a "State in which the supreme power is vested in the people, in a well constituted republic as administered in the United States, by representatives chosen by the people."— Worcester's Dictionary.

State society in a republic like ours cannot lawfully vest the exercise of the sovereignty in a minority. It would be in direct conflict with the Constitution of the United States. If you cannot lawfully vest the whole State sovereignty in a minority of the people, you cannot lawfully vest the exercise of any part of it in an officer, notoriously and under the form of law, chosen by a minority of the electors. This is anti-republican, and so completely and thoroughly destructive of the fundamental principle of republican government that the United States would be bound to declare such pretended laws, whether in statutes or State Constitutions, null and void.

Then, again, by the fourteenth amendment, second section, the Constitution of the United States declares that, "When the right to vote at any election for choice of electors, * * * the Executive or judicial officers of the State, or the members of the Legislature is denied to citizens, or in any way abridged," representation shall be reduced in proportion, &c.

If you allow the minority voter to duplicate and multiply himself, you not only abridge but you deny the right of the elector belonging to the majority; you compel him to submit to a rule wholly unknown in the formation of the government; an anomaly so singular that it could never have been, in the remotest sense, contemplated. Worcester and Johnson define "abridge," "to make shorter, to contract, to diminish, to deprive of." Each of these definitions covers the case, as I claim it.

This provision must be applied as the right of the voter stood when it was adopted. How did the right of the voter stand then? He had a clear right to vote for as many candidates as there were offices to fill. If there were three or a dozen members of the Legislature to be elected in the voter's district, he had a clear constitutional right to vote for all of them, and to say he shall not, is to abridge his right. If you can lawfully declare that a minority can elect one-third of the Legislature, you can give that minority power to elect all. This is revolutionary and subverts the government. You can apply your plan to co-partnerships, and corporations organized for the private emolument of individuals—their acts all relate to the management of their own property—they do not in any sense touch acts of government—the sovereignty in which the whole of the society that composes the State are interested.

The minority are as fully and fairly represented now as the wisdom of men can provide, and yet support the principles of republican government.

By the old plan, representatives in Congress were chosen by the whole State; this gave the entire delegation generally to the party having the majority in the State; but in order to give minorities, all that could be lawfully given, the State was divided into single districts, but still preserved the rule that only a majority of the votes cast in the district should elect.

And this plan of districting the State for legislative purposes, for the Senate and House, was to give minorities all the rights that could be conferred without violating the fundamental law of republican government, by allowing an elector to count two, three or more.

How would this plan work in practice? Suppose that instead of single Congressional districts, we had created double districts, and allowed the voter to not only cumulate, but also apply the limit, that but one candidate should be voted for. Suppose in the double district there were thirty-three thousand five hundred votes, and two members to be chosen, and the minority party had a fraction over one-third of this number, say twelve thousand votes, and should cumulate on one, they would poll twenty-four thousand votes. The majority, say have twenty-one thousand five hundred votes, and they cumulate on the other one, they would poll forty-three thousand. Under this plan the majority are practically disfranchised nineteen thousand votes. Is that an equal election? But the friends of this plan will say, we propose to cumulate where there are not less than three candidates, and then it will not work so much injustice to the majority. Would Congress ever say a member was duly chosen in that way? To be "elected" or "duly chosen by the people," within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, the candidate must have the highest number of votes cast. No doubt the States have the right to prescribe the qualifications of their voters, but this plan enlarges and diminishes the capacity in rightful power of the voter. It is not conferring, or requiring an additional qualification, which the State may do, but it is increasing the political power of a minority, or a class of voters which the State cannot lawfully do. It exalts the minority from defeat to success, in devising a plan whereby a minority shall elect its candidates against the will of the majority.

And the advocates of this measure, in calling the minority a second majority, abuse well defined terms and subjects. Is it an election as understood in framing the government? Is it republican? Or is it not in conflict with the several clauses of the Constitution of the United States referred to? What is an election by the qualified electors in the meaning of the Constitution of the United States? It is the choosing of public officers by a majority, or the largest number of votes, each voter being entitled to one vote, and no more, for each candidate to be chosen; and it never was understood that a minority could elect; but, on the contrary, that all minority candidates were defeated. The voter has a clear constitutional right to vote one vote for each and all the candidates to be chosen, and any limitation of that right, like saying that where three officers are to be chosen the voter is limited to two, is both "denying and abridging" the right. Or, suppose the voter is told: "You can vote for all three, but if you do it will be under the penalty of losing your choice, because your neighbor can duplicate himself, and vote twice for one, and once for another, or vote three times for one." Either plan forces the majority to yield to a minority.

The fundamental principle, well understood by all the people in regard to our government, is that in all elections by the people, or upon all questions submitted to the qualified electors, the majority, or the highest vote must elect or decide, but never the minority. As before stated, minorities are now represented by dividing the State into Congressional and Legislative districts, and by wards for the choice of city councilmen. It could be made lawful to elect members of Congress and the Legislature by the vote of the whole State, or city councils by the vote of the whole city. This was once the practice in the State, and the object of districting was to give minorities in localities a chance of representation.

There will always be parties in a free government, and the party "out" should watch the party "in." By this plan, practically, all contest before the people is taken away, the caucus or nominating convention will put their men in the field, and the voters will simply endorse what has been settled between the parties. Neither side will be in fear of the people—it will be a sure thing. The two strong parties, instead of acting against each other, will take what the law has assigned them. The struggle that cleanses, the contest that purifies, the watchfulness of a hungry minority, will all be taken away, because all hands will feed at the public crib just in proportion to numbers, and then who can complain? Who will watch? Who will tell tales, when each party are sure of a suck at the public teats, just in proportion to numbers? The sentinel, that should be hungry and watchful, with full belly, will sleep at his post. The strifes, struggles and watchfulness of minorities out of power (and anxious to get in) are among the strongest safeguards of a free government.

And right here opened the door for corruption. In districts where every voter can be made to count from three to twenty-three votes, money and rascality will be pretty sure to elect, at least, some officers. The law will make the voter of such value that the corrupt candidate will be certain that he is worth buying.

Because the person voted for by the minority voter is not elected, the advocates of the limited or cumulative vote say he is not represented. This is not true, either in theory or practice, as applied to our governments, State or national. It is asserting false premises upon which to build their whole structure. When a majority of the people decide upon a certain line of public policy, permitted by the grants of power to the national government, or not withheld from the State Legislature by the Constitution, that majority has the right, and it is its duty to administer the government in accordance with that line of policy, being responsible to the people. This plan destroys responsibility by partitioning the power between the majority and the largest minority. Better stick to the old plan, that the majority shall rule. It is the only safe plan by which you can administer republican government.

Mr. W. H. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: I do not think the amendment of the gentleman from Carbon, (Mr. Lilly,) or the report of the committee he represents, begins exactly where it should in the matter of apportionment. It says that "at the general election of 1881," &c., commissioners to apportion shall be appointed, and now I would prefix to his amendment these words:

"The State shall be divided into Senatorial, Representative, Judicial and Congressional districts, and the first apportionment of members of the Senate, of the House, and for members of Congress shall be made by this body and continue in force

This is not my own idea. The proposition till 1881, and at the general election," &c., as it is written in the amendment. I am so fully persuaded that this body should make the first apportionment that some weeks ago I offered a resolution that this body, by its Committee on Suffrage, should make the first apportionment of members of Assembly after the number of them shall have been fixed upon. That resolution is printed on page 142 of the Book of Amendments, on the desks of members. There is not only abundant reason why we should make this apportionment, but there is precedent for it, if that be essential. In the following States apportionments were made by Constitutional Conventions, some, as will be seen, for Senators alone, some for judicial purposes only, and some for members of both Houses:

In Georgia, in 1868, for both Houses.

In Louisiana, in 1868, for Senate.

In Virginia, in 1870, for both Houses.

In Texas, in 1869, for both Houses.

In New York, in 1867, for Senate.

In Illinois, in 1870, for Judicial.

In Arkansas, in 1868, for both Houses.

In California, in 1862, for Judicial.

In Minnesota, in 1868, for both Houses.

In Ohio, in 1850, for Senate and judges.

In West Virginia, in 1872, for both Houses.

In Nevada, in 1868, for Judicial.

In Mississippi, 1868, for both Houses.

All these apportionments were made by the Conventions who authorized them, and who knew better than any Legislature could, the purposes such Convention had in view. It will be more necessary for this body to apportion the members if it shall increase their number. And here I may say that I do not approve the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) for the protection of our present State Senators in the remainder of the terms for which they were elected. But, happily, there is a way out of that dilemma. It is simple: As many of the Senators, who may have one or two years to serve, and are not re-elected under the new Constitution, can be paid for the term they would be entitled to have served under the present Constitution. This cannot cost the State over $30,000, at the most. This is all they could possibly ask, and all that can be done for them, I think.

But, it may be asked, why should they be paid at all? The formation of a new Constitution is a great public event, an emergency which demands the cheerful aid, the forbearance, and even the self-sacrifice of any or all of the citizens of a State. Is it not a great matter, Mr. Chairman, if, to harmonize and effectually organize a great reform, some ten or twenty gentlemen should forego, for the general good, a small portion of the official honors to which they may be entitled? To them the fraction of a Senatorial term would seem, or ought to be, a very small matter indeed, compared to the importance of our presenting a completed edifice of organic government, instead of having to wait till 1875 before it can be entirely finished. Mr. Chairman, I do think that the Senators who can justly claim, if they demand the tenor of their bond, to serve one or two years longer, will offer any factious opposition to this Constitution if it shall ordain that their official terms shall end in 1873, instead of in 1874 or 1875. I think there is too much public spirit, too much lofty patriotism among these gentlemen to permit this. Many, perhaps most of them, if they desire it, may be re-elected under the new Constitution. And if they should not be they must even accept the fate of other citizens whose daily callings have been rendered useless to them—whose occupations may have been swept away from them by the skill of ingenious inventors and the almost limitless power of steam. Yet the coopers and the hatters, and the nailmakers, and the shoemakers received no sympathy from the inexorable army of purchasers when they were deprived of the means of making a livelihood by machinery which quadrupled products, and lessened their price one-half. And should law-makers ask any advantages over the brickmakers or any other division of the people whom they profess to love so dearly?

And why not, Mr. Chairman, insert "Congressional" before "Senatorial and Representative" in the second line of Mr. Lilly's amendment? The commissioners would be just as able and more competent to make Congressional districts than the Legislature. Why divide the duty with the Legislature?

I have shown, Mr. President, that in many of the Constitutional Conventions this most important and necessary duty of making the first apportionment has been performed by the Convention itself. We have been called together because abuses and corruption had become unendurable, and it would seem to me to be our duty, not only to check these abuses and corruptions, as far as we can, but to provide against their recurrence in the future. In other and plainer words, to "turn over a new leaf" in the management of our State affairs—to reform things altogether—to organize a new departure. Let the adoption of the Constitution we are making mark the advent of a new era, an era of purer political habits and morals.

But, Mr. Chairman, our proceedings here have been marked by a sad want of coherence. We have talked on every possible subject, but to no effective purpose. Now, in order to try and settle something, I propose we take, as soon as possible, a vote on the question of how many members shall compose the Senate and the House. Let us fix that at one hundred and eighty in the House, and sixty-five in the Senate, as the amendment has it, or some other number. But let us do something definite. Let us get at some starting point, from whence we can proceed with some sort of order or certainty in the business of the Convention.

MR. FULTON. Mr. Chairman: I do not presume to take the place of the chairman of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, from which this amendment emanated; but, as a member of that committee, I desire to make a little explanation on the amendment that was presented by the gentleman from Carbon. I may say that this amendment, while it was recommended by the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, was not fully digested by them. It was prepared in a hurried manner the evening before it was offered in the committee of the whole, for the purpose of having it ready to offer while section twenty of the report of the Committee on Legislature was under discussion; and if some gentleman will make the motion I will favor the reference of it either back to the committee from which it came or to the Committee on Legislature, who reported that twentieth section. I say this in defence of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, of which I have the honor to be a member, and because I believe that committee has now given this subject sufficient attention to be able to digest and report a section that will, perhaps, meet the approbation of the Convention. But I desire to say that I think several propositions in this section have sufficient merit to be put in proper shape for the Convention, and I will say but a few words in regard to the merits of the proposition.

The objection has been made to the first section in this amendment that it leaves the subject of apportionment in a political body, and that that would be disastrous, and to prove it we are referred to the apportionment made by the Legislature of 1871. Now I desire to call the attention of this committee to the fact that that apportionment was a compromise apportionment, made by the Legislature when one of the Houses was republican and the other democratic, and was not a political apportionment at all. I do not know whether the individual interests of the members of those two bodies may not have entered largely into that apportionment, at least that was the conclusion reached by the members of the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation, and they proposed to remedy it. For the purpose of preventing any act of that kind they say, explicitly, in this amendment that none of the members of this board of commissioners shall be eligible to an election to either House of the Legislature, under an apportionment made by them, for a period of five years. I call the attention of the committee specially to that fact, that this provision will take away the inducement from the members of this board of commissioners to gerrymander the State in the apportionment which they may make.

And further, Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a disposition on the part of some of the gentlemen of this Convention to take this power away from the people. They show a want of confidence in the people of the Commonwealth. Now I confess, as a member of this Convention, that I, for one, do not feel the necessity of arrogating to ourselves that we are the only body in this great Commonwealth that can be entrusted with the apportionment of the State, and I do not think that the duty is imposed upon us of constructing such a machinery here as will apportion the State for all time to come, or during the time of this Constitution, independent of the people of the Commonwealth. If such be the fact, if it be true that the people cannot be trusted with this as well as with any other branch of our government, I then deplore the condition of our great State. But, sir, I have confidence in the people, and in their honesty, and I undertake to say here that if ten men are selected to apportion the State of Pennsylvania under the provisions of this section that it will secure a better apportionment than we can get in any other way. I will not undertake to argue the constitutional objection that has been raised to this section. I will leave that for others who take more interest

In this mode of voting than I do; but I desire to say this, that if there is any merit in this new system of voting, that seems to have so many friends in this Convention, this is one of the particular cases that it is adapted to, a case in which there is no great political question involved, a case that requires nothing but a simple calculation, and while I say that I do feel favorable to its adoption in a case of this kind, I do not mean to commit myself in favor of it generally.

I have only one remark further to make, and that is with regard to the proposition made here by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. S. A. Purviance) with regard to the third section of this amendment. Perhaps the most serious objection that was made to this section in the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation that reported it, was that it increased the Representatives to too great a number, and the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Allegheny makes a still greater increase, and that it does not seem to me would be wise.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I cannot understand the force of the argument that by an increase of our representation in the State Legislature we are to get greater purity than we have at the present time. It occurs to me that it is more a question of quality in our representation than of quantity; and how is this to be arrived at? The gentleman from Carbon proposed but a moment ago, that a select committee would be chosen out of this Convention to which this whole matter should be referred. What was his expressed object in making that suggestion? It was for the purpose of getting the very best talent in this Convention to work at this section. Does not the same rule hold good all through our whole political machinery? Is it not the rule that the fewer the number of men you select to fill any position, the more care is taken in their selection? Let me ask the members of this committee to go into one of our township conventions and look at the class of men that are found in those conventions. Not that I desire to say anything disparagingly of the people who make up these conventions, because they are the honest bone and sinew of the country on which we must rely.

But when they come to elect one of their number to represent them in a State Convention, what man do they select? They select the man with the clearest head and the most ability of any man of their number. Then just compare the township convention, where you have, say fifty to one hundred men taken from a small district in some corner of the State, with the men who are selected, perhaps, one or two from each county, to assemble in State Convention, and from which of those bodies of men would you expect the most in making laws to govern our State? I say, sir, that we will gain nothing by increasing the number of our State Legislature.

Then here is another practical objection, that might seem to many gentlemen to be beneath the notice of the members of this Convention. Still I do not know but we had better pay attention to it as we go along. It is well known to every gentleman in this hall that our present legislative hall is about large enough to accommodate one hundred men. Now if we increase the Legislature above that number, it involves the expenditure by the State of Pennsylvania of several millions of dollars, for the purpose of erecting a new Capitol.

If nothing is to be gained by the increase, we are certainly not justifiable in imposing this large expense upon the people of the State.

The question then simply resolves itself to this: Will it justify us to involve the State in that expenditure if nothing is to be gained in the character of our representation.

But, sir, I did not intend to occupy the time of the committee more than a few minutes. I hope this matter will be referred to one or other of the committees from which these two sections come.

Mr. NILES. I move that the committee do now rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The question being upon the motion, a division was called, which resulted: In the affirmative, thirty-six; in the negative, twenty-four.

So the motion was agreed to.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President: The committee of the whole has had under consideration the article reported by the Committee on Legislature, and has instructed their chairman to report progress and ask leave sit again.

Leave was granted.

The PRESIDENT presented to the Convention a copy of the "Ninth census (Vol I,) statistics of the population of the United States," received from the Hon.

John Scott, United States Senator for Pennsylvania, which was laid on the table.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I ask, if it is in order, to make a motion to refer the matter that the committee of the whole has had under consideration to the committees that it came from.

The PRESIDENT. The Convention having just granted the committee leave to sit again, it would not be in order now to discharge it. This article cannot be referred to any other committee until the committee of the whole shall have been discharged from its consideration.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I move that the motion, by which the Convention gave consent to the committee of the whole to sit again to-morrow, be reconsidered for the purpose of making a motion to re-commit this to the Committee on Legislature again.

The question being upon the motion, a division was called for, and resulted: In the affirmative, thirty-four; in the negative, twenty-one.

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is upon granting the committee of the whole leave to sit again.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I move that the article now under consideration, together with all the amendments reported by the committee of the whole, be referred to the Committee on Legislature, to be reported at as early a day as practicable.

The PRESIDENT. The question just now is upon giving the committee of the whole leave to sit again. The Chair would observe that the legitimate effect of the discharging of the committee will be to put the bill on the next stage of its consideration—second reading, when again reported by the committee. The Chair will also observe that, of course, all the amendments that have been made in committee of the whole fall, unless they should be reported again.

The question being, shall the committee of the whole have leave to sit again, it was agreed to.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

It was agreed to.

The Convention then, at two o'clock and seven minutes, adjourned.

FIFTY-SEVENTH DAY.

TUESDAY, March 4, 1873.

The Convention met at ten o'clock, A. M., the President, Hon. Wm. M. Meredith, in the chair.

The Journal of yesterday was then read and approved.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. President: I rise to a question of privilege, for the purpose of making a personal explanation.

On Friday last, when the committee of the whole had under consideration the subject of Senatorial apportionment, I took occasion to submit a few remarks. I see that some of the papers of this city have reported me as being opposed to allowing the city of Philadelphia the same representation in the Senate, according to her population, as was to be given to other portions of the State. I am reported as having said, "that if Philadelphia and other large cities were allowed an equal representation in the Senate with the other counties of the State, the large cities of the Commonwealth would soon control all the legislation of the State." Mr. President, I used no such language. I merely said that such had been the argument of some gentlemen upon the floor. I then stated that I was in favor of dividing the State into Senatorial districts, without regard to the large cities, and of giving to each district the number of Senators to which it was entitled according to population. This suggestion was made by me in order to harmonize the action of the entire delegation of the Convention. I was then, and I am now, in favor of giving to Philadelphia an equal voice in the legislation of the Commonwealth, and for that right I will always contend.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. BROOMALL presented petitions from the Radnor and Goshen monthly meeting of Friends of Delaware county, praying for a prohibitory clause in the Constitution against the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

THE DEATH PENALTY.

Mr. BROOMALL also presented petitions from the same societies, praying for the insertion in the Constitution of a clause erasing the death penalty from the statutes, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXEMPTION FROM MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. BROOMALL also presented petitions from the same societies, praying for the insertion in the Constitution of a clause erasing the provision requiring Friends to bear arms, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SESSIONS OF THE CONVENTION.

Mr. HOWARD offered the following resolution, which was twice read:

Resolved, That on and after Monday next this Convention will meet at ten o'clock A. M. and adjourn at one o'clock P. M., and meet at three P. M. and adjourn at five o'clock P. M.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I move to amend, by striking out the word "three," and inserting "five," for the afternoon sessions.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: Is the resolution debatable or amendable?

The PRESIDENT. Under the rule lately adopted by the Convention the resolution is neither debatable nor amendable.

Mr. EWING. Mr. President: If it is in order, I desire to move a suspension of the rules, in order that the resolution which has been offered can be debated and amended if it becomes necessary. I do not desire to debate the resolution myself, but it is very evident—

The PRESIDENT. The Convention has precluded all debate upon this question. The motion to suspend the rules will be taken.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I now renew my motion, to amend the resolution, by striking out the word "three," and inserting "five."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. EWING. Mr. President: In making the motion to suspend the rules, for the purpose of considering this resolution, I stated I did not desire to debate it, but I desire to give my reasons for making the motion. There is evidently a very great diversity of opinion among the delegates as to the most convenient hours in which to hold our sessions. While I prefer a single continuous session of the Convention, I am willing to agree in any plan that may be suggested that will conform with the wishes of all our members, and I hope, by discussion, we shall ascertain the most convenient hours for holding our sessions. In order, therefore, to settle this question, and to avoid the repetitions of these motions day after day, I have made the motion to suspend the rules, so that a full discussion may be had upon the resolution.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: I suppose it is the design of the resolution to obtain the utmost possible work out of the Convention. The resolution passed the other day provides for sessions of five hours, from ten A. M. to three P. M. The resolution now pending does not propose the holding of a longer session, but merely to divide the hours in order to enable some of our delegates to obtain their dinners at noon. Is it not the experience of every member in the Convention, that we can do more work in a continuous session from ten o'clock A. M. to three o'clock P. M., than we can possibly do by dividing the time into two sessions each day? With the facilities afforded in the ante-room for obtaining lunch, I think we will be able to obtain more work out of the Convention in a continuous session than by any other plan.

Mr. LITTLETON. Mr. President: I move to amend the resolution, by striking out the words "three" and "five," and inserting "four" and "seven."

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. President: I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

"Resolved, That on and after Monday next the Convention will hold sessions from ten A. M. to two P. M., and on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays from four P. M. to eight P. M."

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. President: At the suggestion of several members I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President: It seems to me it is very unadvisable to adopt such a course as the resolution contemplates. I think the members of the Convention should remember there are several committees that have not yet reported to this body, and I would like to know what time those committees will have to meet and act upon the business entrusted to them if this resolution is adopted. If the entire day is taken up in holding two sessions of the Convention, it will be impossible to arrange any time for the meeting of the committees. I desire merely to call the attention of the Convention to this fact.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. President: I hope this resolution will not be adopted. A majority of this Convention have expressed themselves on various occasions, on every occasion, in fact, when the proposition has been made, in favor of one session. I take it, therefore, to be the judgment of a majority of the delegates, that we can do more work in a continuous session of four hours, than by having two sessions a day of five hours. I believe that it is the judgment of every gentleman who has had any experience in legislative bodies, that we can do more work in the hour from two to three, if we will have the patience to remain here during that time, than we can do in a series of two hours in the afternoon, after we shall have adjourned, gone away, dined and returned. I believe that is within the experience of every gentleman who has had any experience on this subject. It is certainly more convenient. We are in much better condition to work intelligently and thoughtfully, coming here in the morning and continuing on at our work, than we shall be after having adjourned, and returned after dining. Every person feels the energy of his system relaxed after dinner, and we shall make a great mistake by adopting this resolution, for we shall prolong the sittings of this Convention far beyond the time in which our work should be completed by doing so. If we will simply continue on with the hours as we have fixed them, we shall soon begin to make progress. I cannot understand this restlessness, this desire to change the hours, after we have fixed them deliberately. It seems to me it is not a healthy spirit. It shows a want of willingness to settle down to hard work. In my judgment, we shall not settle down to hard work until we are willing to sit here five hours, or, if necessary, six hours, in one session. When we have made up our minds to do that, we can begin to hope for the termination of the labors of this Convention and not before.

MR. MANTOR. Mr. President: I offered the first resolution that was offered in this hall for the purpose of commencing the sessions of this Convention at ten o'clock, to end at two o'clock, and commencing again at four o'clock, to end at six o'clock. I offered the resolution in good faith, and at the time was in favor of it, but I discovered immediately afterward that the sentiment of the Convention was in favor of a continuous session. The suggestions made upon that subject were so numerous from different gentlemen on the floor, that I was convinced one session was the more appropriate and convenient, and the next morning I voted with the majority of the Convention on the subject. The following morning the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. Lamber-ton) offered a proposition that we should sit from ten o'clock A. M. to three o'clock P. M., and to that resolution the House agreed. From very good authority in this Convention it was supposed that the Convention would do more work in a continuous session than in these adjourned sessions. And so I believe. "If the Convention will consider this matter properly, we will do more work under one continued session than under two sessions, with a brief adjournment between them.

MR. CURTIN. Mr. President: I desire only to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Potter, who complains that there is a restlessness in this Convention on the subjects of adjournment and on the questions of how long we shall sit in our daily sessions, that have been constantly occupying our attention. The reason of that restlessness is, that we are violating the laws of nature. Nature has provided that at stated times all men must rest. The laborer, the lawyer, and on the Sabbath day the minister of the gospel, rests at noon, and members of this Convention are subjects of the laws of habit. I do not believe that a continuous session of five hours is likely to accomplish more business in this body than two sessions making together an equal length of time.

If we adjourn at noon and go to our lodgings, and take the refreshment which nature demands, we will return here refreshed and ready to proceed with our work. Surely the session of yesterday must not be taken as an example for continuous sessions. We were an hour or two getting ready, because of the restlessness of gentlemen who dislocate the laws of nature by compelling the presence of members of the Convention at the very time when they ought to take the rest of noon-day. There are many of the members of this Convention who are in private lodgings in this city, and they are restless because you hold your sessions at the very hour when they ought to get their dinners; and those who are in that condition, if you persist in holding your sessions at three o'clock, will be driven back to the discomforts of a hotel. I cannot understand why you should debate and discuss this question so long. If you come down to the practical part, and adjourn at the very time that it is the habit of the members from the interior of the State for a time to cease their labors, and take natural rest and refreshment, I insist upon it we will do more business in a day with two sessions of the same number of hours than we will do if we sit that number of hours at once.

MR. STANTON. Mr. President: I call for the reading of the resolution.

THE CLERK. Resolved, That on and after Wednesday next this Convention will meet at ten A. M. and adjourn at one P. M., and meet at three P. M. and adjourn at five P. M.

MR. STANTON. Mr. President: For the purpose of getting to work, I move the indefinite postponement of the whole matter.

MR. HOWARD. Mr. President: A motion to indefinitely postpone is debatable?

THE PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President: I hope this motion will not prevail. While I concede, undoubtedly, that a majority of this Convention have a right to fix the hours for its sessions, and they have a right to determine how long we should remain in session, I submit it is not fair to exact unreasonable hours. There is a question of fairness, there is a question of what is reasonable, of what is right. Very many gentlemen in this Convention have been in the habit, for a long life, to take their dinner at a reasonable hour, and who do not consider four o'clock a reasonable or natural hour at all. If we are to sit here until three o'clock, it will be about four o'clock before the members of this body can get their dinners. The result is, that those who are in private boarding houses must get them in a hotel or in some saloon, or go without. I am perfectly willing to work all that I am able. I have been here at every meeting of this body since it commenced. I have never lost but one hour, and that was when we changed the hour of meeting from eleven o'clock to ten, and with many other gentlemen, on that occasion, I mistook the hour at which we were to meet.

For myself personally, it is not right for me to sit here after two o'clock, my dinner hour, because I feel it injuriously. It affects my health, and therefore if the Convention will adopt a rule, or will continue the present rule, requiring me to be in my place until three o'clock, it will impose upon me a rule that I cannot submit to without inconvenience. Another thing, the habits which men have acquired at their homes, they should continue here if they wish to preserve their health. Therefore, as a question of health, we ought to adjourn so that we can get our dinners at least by two o'clock.

As to this idea that we can do so much work in one session, allow me a word. We know that in the Legislature at Harrisburg, at the first of the session, when they have leisure, they meet only two or three hours a day; when they get down to the dead work, they meet in the morning, work and adjourn—meet in the afternoon, work and adjourn, and then meet and work at night. That is the way they do. Sir, when they find the work begins to press them, and they wish to accomplish the work that is before them, they hold three sessions a day, and I am perfectly willing to meet at ten o'clock and adjourn at one, leaving a reasonable time for dinner; and then meet at three and sit until six—a reasonable time for supper.

For the reasons I have given, I hope the Convention will adopt some rule of that kind, so that we can adjourn to get our dinner at a reasonable hour, and have also a reasonable hour for supper.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: The very reason given by the gentleman from Centre, (Mr. Curtin,) that it is necessary to get dinner before we can work, is the reason which was assigned in this Convention in the early sessions of this body, why we should begin at twelve o'clock, because no man after he got his dinner was fit to work. Therefore, it was urged that we should not meet until twelve o'clock noon, so as to allow the committees the entire morning. No man was ever fit to work after dinner, and I put the question to you, Mr. President, if you can answer it, whether more labor cannot be got out of such gentlemen as we are, in one continuous session of five hours, than in two sessions of five hours, even if we have to meet at nine o'clock and adjourn at two.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. President: In reply to the delegate from Potter (Mr. Mann) that it is evidence of an unhealthy spirit, that many of us are in favor of this proposition, I desire to say that the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak. There are among us many gentlemen who have been accustomed to take a little refreshment in the middle of the day, and if the hour of two or half-past two arrives without that refreshment being taken, we have very decided premonitory symptoms of a dyspeptic attack. I have found that all the acerbity of debate, and the bitterness of spirit which have characterized some of our passages of arms, generally occur when we have empty stomachs, and I think that those gentlemen who are afraid that if they get their dinners in the middle of the day, they will be overcome by the lean and hungry Cassuses who have not taken their noon-day meal-time, will probably be satisfied with the fact that their temper will be in a better condition.

I really believe that we would do more work. I really believe that the trouble which occurred yesterday about one or two o'clock, although the hour of adjournment was three o'clock, resulted from this cause. It was noticed that at two o'clock there was a decided majority in favor of the committee of the whole rising, and after the committee rose, the Convention adjourned, although it was not within three-quarters of an hour of the time of adjournment. Let us meet at ten o'clock and adjourn at one. Those of us who want to eat something at that time can do it, and we can all get back at three o'clock and sit until five, and do a great deal more work, I think, than we are doing now. Certainly that work will be done without the danger of ill-health to the members, that must be incurred if we violate the standing rule that many of us have adopted for a great many years to preserve our health.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the indefinite postponement. On agreeing to this question a division was called, resulting thirty-six in the affirmative, and forty-four in the negative. So the motion to indefinitely postpone was rejected.

Mr. KNIGHT. I offer the following amendment:

"Resolved, That on and after Monday next the Convention will hold sessions from ten A. M. till two P. M., and on Mondays, Wednesdays and Friday afternoons, sessions from four to eight P. M."

This will give us four hours a day for three days of the week, and eight hours a day for the other three. We are now holding sessions from ten till three, which is five hours a day, and the proposition that I make will give us an average of six hours a day throughout the week.

The question being upon the amendment of Mr. Knight, it was rejected.

Mr. W. H. SMITH. Mr. President: I move to amend, by adding "for ten days from to-morrow," so that we will not be disturbed every day by motions to rescind resolutions already passed.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. President: I move to amend, by adding the words "and there shall be no sessions on Saturdays."

The question being upon the amendment, the yeas and nays were required by Mr. Corbett and Mr. Darlington, and were as follow, viz:

YEAS.

Messrs. Andrews, Baer, Baker, Bannan, Bartholomew, Brodhead, Broomall, Buckalew, Corson, Curtin, Davis, Ewing, Funck, Gibson, Gowen, Green, Hanna, Harvey, Lilly, Mann, Rooke, Ross, Simpson, Smith, H. W., Stanton, Van Reed, Wetherill, J. M., Woodward and Meredith, President—30.

NAYS.

Messrs. Achenbach, Armstrong, Baily, (Perry,) Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Barclay, Biddle, Bowman, Brown, Campbell, Carter, Church, Clark, Cochran, Corbett, Craig, Cuyler, Darlington, De France, Dunning, Edwards, Elliott, Fell, Finney, Fulton, Guthrie, Hazzard, Howard, Knight, Lawrence, Lear, Littleton, MacConnell, M'Culloch, M'Murray, Mantor, Metzger, Minor, Newlin, Niles, Palmer, G. W., Palmer, H. W., Patterson, D. W., Patton, Purviance, John N., Purviance, Samuel A., Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, Jas. L., Sharpe, Smith, Wm. H., Struthers, Turrell, Walker, Wherry, White, Harry, White, J. W. F., and Wright—56.

So the amendment was rejected.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Adicks, Ainey, Alricks, Bardsley, Beebe, Black, Charles A., Black, J. S., Boyd, Carey, Cassidy, Collins, Cronmiller, Curry, Dallas, Dodd, Ellis, Gilpin, Hall, Hay, Hemphill, Heverin, Hopkins, Horton, Hunsicker, Kaine, Lamberton, Landis, Long, M'Allister, M'Camant, M'Clean, MacVeagh, Mott, Parsons, Patterson, T. H. B., Porter, Pughe, Purman, Read, Jno. R., Reynolds, S. H., Runk, Russell, Smith, H. G., Stewart, Temple, Wetherill, Jno. Price, White, David N. and Worrell—47.

Mr. MANN. Mr. President: I move to amend so as to make the hour for meeting on Monday morning at eleven o'clock. I make this motion because we were unable to secure a quorum yesterday morning until eleven o'clock, and I apprehend there will be that difficulty every Monday morning.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. President: I move now to add, that there shall be no session on Saturday afternoon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on the resolution as amended. It will be read for information.

The CLERK then read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That on and after to-morrow this Convention will meet at ten A. M. and adjourn at one P. M., and meet at three P. M. and adjourn at five P. M., except on Monday, when the Convention shall meet at eleven o'clock A. M., and on Saturday afternoon there shall be no session."

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. President: Before the vote is taken, I desire to say that that resolution shortens the work in a week by about four hours.

The question being on the resolution as amended, the yeas and nays were required by Mr. Corbett and Mr. Joseph Bailly, and were as follows, viz:

Y E A S.

Messrs. Achenbach, Andrews, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bannan, Bartholomew, Bowman, Brodhead, Buckalew, Carter, Craig, Curtin, Davis, De France, Dunning, Elliott, Ewing, Fell, Fulton, Funck, Gibson, Gowen, Green, Hanna, Harvey, Howard, Lawrence, Lear, M'Murray, Minor, Newlin, Niles, Palmer, G. W., Rooke, Sharpe, Smith, Henry W., Temple, Van Reed, Wherry, White, Harry, White, J. W. F., Worrell and Wright—42.

N A Y S.

Messrs. Armstrong, Baer, Bailly, (Perry,) Baker, Barclay, Biddle, Broomall, Brown, Campbell, Church, Clark, Cochran, Corbett, Corson, Cuyler, Darlington, Edwards, Finney, Guthrie, Hazard, Knight, Lilly, Littleton, MacConnell, M'Culloch, Mann, Mantor, Palmer, H. W., Patterson, D. W., Patton, Purviance, John N., Purviance, Samuel A., Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, James L., Ross, Simpson, Smith, H. G., Smith, Wm. H., Stanton, Struthers, Turrell, Walker, Wetherill, J. M., Woodward and Meredith, President—45.

So the resolution was rejected.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Addicks, Ainey, Alricks, Bardsley, Beebe, Black, Charles A., Black, J. S., Boyd, Carey, Cassidy, Collins, Cronmiller, Curry, Dallas, Dodd, Ellis, Gilpin, Hall, Hay, Hemphill, Heverin, Hopkins, Horton, Hunsicker, Kaine, Lamberton, Landis, Long, M'Allister, M'Camant, M'Clean, MacVeagh, Metzger, Mott, Parsons, Patterson, T. H. B., Porter, Pughe, Purman, Read, John R., Reynolds, S. H., Runk, Russell, Stewart, Wetherill, J. Price and White, David N—46.

THE ARTICLE ON LEGISLATION.

Mr. HARRY WHITE offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of the whole be and is hereby discharged from the consideration of the article reported from the Committee on Legislation, and the same, together with the amendment added and proposed thereto by the committee of the whole, be referred back to the Committee of Legislation, with instructions to report at as early a date as practicable.

The PRESIDENT. It is not necessary to introduce a resolution to that effect. The same end can be reached by a motion.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I make that motion.

Mr. LILLY. I move to amend the motion, by referring the subject to the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman can attain his object by moving to amend the motion, by adding "and that the Committee on the Legislature be instructed to confer upon these subjects with the Committee on Suffrage."

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I accept that as a modification of my motion.

The motion, as modified, was agreed to.

DIVISION OF COUNTIES.

Mr. DUNNING offered the following resolution, which was read and referred to the Committee on Counties, Townships and Boroughs:

Resolved, That the Committee on Counties, Townships and Boroughs be requested to take into consideration the propriety of reporting a section providing that all counties having a population exceeding one hundred thousand the Legislature shall have the power to make sub-divisions thereof, establishing in each sub-division all the necessary courts pertaining to counties, with exclusive or concurrent jurisdiction, and offices for recording deeds, granting letters of administration and proving wills: Provided, That such sub-divisions shall not contain more than forty thousand inhabitants.

DEBATE ON ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I move to take up the resolution I offered yesterday.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The CLERK read:

Resolved, That hereafter all resolutions in relation to the time of adjournment and hours of session of the Convention shall be open to amendment, and all speeches on such resolutions shall be confined to three minutes, and that no member shall speak more than once on the same.

The motion to proceed to the second reading of the resolution it was not agreed to.

RULE TWENTY-FIVE.

Mr. BAER. Mr. President: I move that the resolution relating to rule twenty-five be taken from the table and considered.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The CLERK read:

WHEREAS, All resolutions adopted by this Convention which operate as a change, alteration or modification of rule twenty-five, have thus far only impeded the progress of the business of the Convention, and, in fact, are only a dead letter upon the record; therefore,

Resolved, That all resolutions violative to rule twenty-five are hereby rescinded and annulled, and the rule reinstated as originally adopted.

The motion to proceed to the second reading and consideration of the resolution was agreed to, and the resolution was again read.

The question recurring upon the original motion it was not agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President: I desire to call up the following resolution I offered a few days ago, in relation to leave of absence:

Resolved, That leave of absence shall not be granted in any case, unless the reasons shall be fully stated to the Convention, which, in every case shall decide upon the sufficiency of the reasons; and in case of absence without leave, the Sergeant-at-arms shall be directed to bring in the absent member, and upon their appearance, they shall be reprimanded by the President at the bar of the Convention.

Mr. HOWARD. I move the Convention proceed to a second reading and consideration of the resolution.

The motion was not agreed to.

THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the consideration of the article reported by the Committee on the Executive Department. Mr. Woodward will take the chair.

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. Woodward in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The first section of the report will be read.

THE OFFICERS OF THE COMMONWEALTH.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 1. The Executive Department of this Commonwealth shall consist of a Governor, a Lieutenant Governor, a Secretary of State, Attorney General, Auditor General, a Secretary of Internal Affairs and a Superintendent of Public Instruction.

The question being taken, the first section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The second section of the report will be read.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 2. The supreme executive power shall be vested in a Governor, who shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed. He shall be chosen on the day of the general election, by the qualified electors of the Commonwealth, at the places where they shall respectively vote for representatives; the returns of every election for Governor shall be sealed up and transmitted to the seat of government, directed to the Speaker of the Senate, who shall open and publish them in the presence of the members of both Houses of the Legislature; the person having the highest number of votes shall be Governor, but if two or more be equal and highest in votes, one of them shall be chosen Governor by the joint vote of the members of both Houses. Contested elections shall be determined by a committee to be selected from both Houses of the Legislature, and formed and regulated in such manner as shall be directed by law.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, by striking out the word "Speaker," occurring just before the words "of the Senate," and inserting the word "President." The reason I offer this amendment is that it must be obvious to every one there is no such officer as Speaker of the Senate. The Senate is to be presided over by the Lieutenant Governor, and whenever he shall be called upon to exercise the duties of Governor then a President of the Senate shall be elected.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say in connection with this amendment that—

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHN R. READ. Mr. Chairman: I move the vote to be re-considered by which the amendment was agreed to.

["No." "No." "No."]

The question being taken upon the motion to re-consider, a division was called which resulted as follows: Ayes, thirty-seven; noes, twenty.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I understand the motion is to strike out the word "Speaker," and insert the word "President." I move to amend that motion, by striking out the word "President," and inserting "presiding officer of the Senate." My reasons for this motion are simply these: It has been said, among other things in this Convention, that all changes are not reforms, and I think there are some things that are and ought to be dear to Pennsylvanians, and among some of them I think is the practice which obtains in our Legislature by which the presiding officer is addressed as "Mr. Speaker." There is no reason why this practice should be changed. I do not think the sentiment of the subject requires that it should be changed. If it is the intention of the Convention to create the office of Lieutenant Governor, let it be so, but it is not necessary to change the style of addressing the presiding officer of the Senate while that body is in session transacting its business. If the presiding officer of the Senate is called the President in accordance with the Constitution, of course that will be beyond and far ahead of any rules which that body may adopt. If the words "presiding officer" are inserted in the section the Legislative body can then regulate this matter in due season; and they can continue the style of addressing the Chair as "Mr. Speaker." It is for the purpose of preserving this peculiarity in the legislative system of Pennsylvania that I have offered the amendment striking out the word "President," and inserting the words "presiding officer."

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman: I think a reference to the whole report of the committee will convince every delegate that this amendment will be improper. It will be observed that the word "President" occurs in the fourth section, and also in the fifteenth section, and of course they will have to be changed.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the section, by striking out all after the word "Houses," where it occurs the second time, and inserting the following: "Contested elections for Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall be determined by the Supreme Court in such a manner as shall be prescribed by law."

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: The section reported by the committee leaves this matter to be determined by a committee selected from both Houses of the Legislature, and I suppose it is intended to constitute the committee something like the committees now chosen to determine contested elections of members of the Senate and House of Representatives are selected. When that plan was first adopted in the English Parliament, and at the time of its adoption in Pennsylvania, it was supposed to meet the objections that had arisen to the methods in which contested elections were formerly determined, and that it would be entirely fair. I believe the experience of the English Parliament and the experience of the two Houses of the Legislature in Pennsylvania has demonstrated that it is the worst possible method that can be followed in the determination of contested elections. Now I would very much prefer to entrust this subject to a joint session of the two Houses of the Legislature than to a committee; but it seems to me the best method is to determine all such questions by a judicial proceeding before the Supreme Court. Let the Legislature pass a law which shall direct the manner in which such cases shall be determined, as any other judicial proceeding would be. I cannot see any reason why the legislative branch of the government should settle the question of contested elections for the Executive rather than the judicial department. I prefer, therefore, that all such questions should be settled by the highest court in the State, in accordance with the rules and regulations prescribed by law.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: This motion to strike out and insert is, I suppose, to be indivisible. I am in favor of striking out this clause in the section, but not of inserting the new matter proposed by the pending amendment. Our Committee on Suffrage have had the general question of contested elections before them for consideration, and they agreed upon the general form of a section upon this subject, covering not only the case of a contested election of Governor, of electors of President and Vice President, of members of the Legislature, but of the various State officers and all other officers of the State.

We do need a constitutional provision on this subject. Now the Committee upon the Executive Department have not proposed anything new. This clause is simply a clause of the present Constitution retained in their report, and I am strongly opposed to retaining it in the Constitution, and that for a reason which will appeal to every gentleman who has ever been a member of the Legislature, or has been observant of legislative proceedings in contested election cases. By the existing statute of 1839, based in part upon this clause of the Constitution, it is provided that a committee be drawn by lot from the two Houses of the Legislature, assembled in joint convention for the purpose. Well, sir, under the experience we have had, an experience which was not before the men who placed this provision in our Constitution, we know perfectly well, that in three cases out of four, to speak within bounds, of a contested election for Governor, the result will be determined by the composition of the committee drawn. Every intelligent man familiar with public affairs can judge, or will be able to judge at once, how a contest will be decided, when he knows what is the composition of the committee. These committees will be purely political, as to the constitution of their majority, and in three cases out of four will decide in favor of their political party or of the candidate representing it.

One marked inconvenience is encountered in drawing these committees. As a matter of course, challenges are freely allowed. The number is very great compared to the whole number of names drawn. What is the inevitable result? Why that each party to the contest will object off all the strong men on the opposite side, politically, and the committee will ordinarily be composed of the weakest members of the Senate and House—men of little capacity—men who are not dreaded by their political opponents, when their names come to be drawn, by reason of their conscientiousness, and you will therefore always get a committee composed of comparatively weak and incompetent members of the Senate and House; and these men, lacking intelligence and independence, will vote dead for party in committee on all questions which arise; so that I consider that this clause of the Constitution, as we have it now, and as it is proposed to continue it, is a very bad provision. It should be stricken from the Constitution, and this question of contested elections should be vested in some tribunal which shall possess in the first place more capacity, and next possess independence, and lastly have something of a judicial character—for a contested election presents a purely judicial question, and the members of the Legislature, acting as they ordinarily do with reference to party considerations, claiming for themselves a wide discretion in the exercise of their authority, will not decide anything judicially, and you must make a change. But I agree, sir, with one of the gentlemen who has just spoken, that it is not perhaps expedient to charge this duty upon the Supreme Court. At all events we ought to consider this question in Convention, and the other questions of contested election which will be before us on a separate report, which in due time will be presented by the proper committee. At present I am in favor of striking out this clause, and as the pending amendment proposes to insert new matter, and it is indivisible, I do not know what gentlemen who feel as I do can do but vote down this amendment, and afterward vote to strike out the clause, because I believe in modern practice, after a motion to strike out and insert has been rejected, you can still move to strike out the same clause.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I move to strike out the amendment offered by the gentleman from Allegheny, and insert the following amendment:

"Contested elections shall be tried and determined only in the manner the Legislature shall prescribe by general law."

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: It is very manifest that the Committee on the Executive have considered this subject, and have determined to repose the power to try contested elections in the Legislature; and I observe from the report, that they have left the Constitution just as the statute of 1839 left it. I assume that is the sentiment of the committee. I agree with them to a certain extent, but I differ entirely from the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. Ewing,) who offered the amendment to refer this matter to the Supreme Court. I agree with the report of the committee, in so far as they would allow the Legislature to determine this matter, and take the responsibility of passing a general law to determine the question, but I differ entirely with the report of the committee, in reposing the power to try and determine this question in a committee to be drawn by lot. If this committee of the whole will take the trouble to look at the report of the Committee on Legislation, they will discover that this question of contested election has been passed upon. That committee have seen fit, in their report, to provide that contested elections, in the Legislature, shall be tried and determined by a court of common pleas of the county in which the returned member lives, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman will allow the interruption, I desire to say that there is nothing in the report of the Committee on Executive Department that requires a committee to determine a contested election to be drawn by lot. Nothing whatever.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I am aware of that fact, Mr. Chairman. But from the language of the report, you will discover "contested elections shall be determined by a committee to be selected from both Houses of the Legislature."

Mr. BIDDLE. "In such manner as shall be prescribed by law."

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: That is true; and this evidently contemplates some measure of lot in the selection of the committee. This report is evidently predicated upon the existing rule on this subject.

I reiterate the experience which the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Backlaw) has uttered on this subject. Contested elections in our Legislature have, to a certain extent, been a mockery upon its legislative and upon its judicial tribunals. The Legislature of 1839, in following the Constitutional Convention of 1799, thought they were wise in following the precedent which George Granville adopted in the English Parliament in 1770, and thought, when this matter of lot was agreed upon and secured for trying these cases, a panacea for all excitements resulting from political contests had been secured. But the experience of the past few years in Pennsylvania, where this system only obtains, has been to contravene this conclusion, and it is true, in the main, that the result of a contested election in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, if not elsewhere, depends upon the political complexion of the committee that is selected to try the case. I speak from experience, and I speak from observation upon this subject.

I would change this rule Mr. Chairman; I would break up the system of selecting a committee by lot and allow them ultimately to determine this question. Heated partisan politics, the tenor of party rule, the control of party caucuses if you please, affect the individual members of these committees, and fill not only the atmosphere around the Legislature with scandal and corruption, but the whole Commonwealth, and breed that discontent and want of confidence in the law-making power that is perilous to our institutions. I see no remedy for it but to repose this power in the Legislature; not in the committee, but in the legislative body. Let a committee be selected, in the first place, in such a manner as shall be provided by law; let them be elected upon the limited or upon the cumulative plan, I care not what; require them to make their report to a joint convention of the Houses, or, respectively, to each body, but let that report be passed upon in the Legislature and be scrutinized, and if it cannot be sustained by argument, if it cannot withstand the scrutiny of Senators and Representatives from both sides of the House, why let the report of the committee go under. But I hope the time will come, and that this Convention will mark the period when we have ceased reposing the ultimate power to dispose of contested elections in committees drawn as is provided for by the act of 1839. My amendment, Mr. Chairman, seeks to let this matter be regulated by law, and not to bind the hands of the Legislature to repose it in the power of a committee to determine this question. Let the Legislature pass a general law as in their wisdom they shall see fit, but do not let them say when they select a committee to examine into a case of contested election that such a committee shall have the ultimate determination of the question. The amendment that I offered opens the door and allows a general law to be passed, which will determine all these cases.

MR. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman: The Committee on the Executive Department found the language of this section in the Constitution as it is, and, as no contest has ever occurred in the election of a Governor, there was no abuse to correct, and the committee very properly concluded to let the Constitution remain as it is. For I presume that this committee is called to correct abuses, and not to provide against evils that have not been complained of in our experience. The Committee on Executive Department have, therefore, left the matter with the Legislature, and whether they will determine a contested election for Governor, if one ever occurs, by drawing a committee by ballot, or by the joint action of its two bodies, is entirely immaterial. If the gentlemen from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) and Indiana (Mr. Harry White) are correct, then the political majority in the Legislature, whether found in a committee or in the body of the two Houses at large, will control the result. It is very unfortunate, indeed, that contests growing out of our elections for officers, and carried into the Legislature, would not be determined fairly.

The delegate from Columbia has said that the committee, of which he is a very useful member, have adopted some plan bearing on contested elections, which, in a few days, will be submitted to the Convention. Now, Mr. Chairman, so far as I am personally concerned—not speaking for the committee—I am quite indifferent upon this subject. Finding there was no evil that had grown out of this old section of the Constitution, we incorporated it into the proposition for the amended Constitution. It is alleged by the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Harry White,) who has had quite experience enough in the Legislature of the State, as a member of the highest body, and surely enough as a member of committees on contested election, to know, and we must accept as true what falls from his lips, that notwithstanding the oath of office and the obligation to the people, contested elections are decided by the politics of the contestants and the political complexion of the committee. It is a frank and candid acknowledgment on the part of the delegate, which is very creditable to him, indeed, and may be very useful to this Convention in their future deliberations.

The learned and distinguished delegate from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) has said that they propose to lodge the subject of contested elections with the court—the Supreme Court, or the court of common pleas. In this deluge of political sin which seems to be visiting this State and finds so many ready and eloquent exponents in this body, had we not better take care that in giving too much power to the courts we do not carry the judiciary itself down into the very gutter of politics, in the unhappy and deplorable condition described by the delegate from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) in which we find the committees of the Legislature. I do not believe that it is judicious to give to the courts too much power. I do sincerely think that all these appointments of commissions made in the city of Philadelphia degrade the judiciary. The Supreme Courts are designed to be an abstraction, and to sit there to decide judicial questions of rights of property and person, and I doubt very much whether it would improve the character of that exalted tribunal to give to them the power of meddling with all the political squabbles which occur at Harrisburg, and place them in danger of the taint which may follow them from the committees of the Legislature; but it is a matter of perfect indifference to me as a member of the committee, and I am quite sure I speak the sentiments of the others. It will be for the committee to decide whether it would not be better to amend this section of the article or to pass it for the present, and when the committee have reported on the subject of contested elections that can be changed on second reading.

MR. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I am not able to concur with my friend from Allegheny (Mr. Ewing) on the subject now before the committee, for the reason which has been briefly stated by the gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Curtin.) I feel myself constrained by the reflection that I have given to the general subject, to endeavor to mark out to myself a general plan of action on this general question, and that is, not to add to, but to take from the judiciary all political power. Relieve them from all political labor—let them give the whole of their time and talents to the proper discharge of the functions of their judicial office. I would take from them all political power that has heretofore been committed to them, all power that is of a political character, such as deciding upon contested elections in the city or county of Philadelphia, or other powers of that kind.

I think it would be objectionable on two accounts: First, the imposition of unnecessary labor upon them which they ought not to have; and then the danger of bringing them into the political arena.

How should the contest of an election for Governor be decided? What better can we do, with the lights we have before us, than to leave it precisely where the committee have left it? They found this provision in the Constitution of 1790, and the Constitution of 1838. No better plan has as yet been suggested. If any better plan should be suggested by the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) when his committee shall bring in their report, it will be time enough to be enlightened by it, and act upon it in reference to matters of this character when it comes before us. What better can we do now than to leave the provisions of the Constitution as they are? I submit that there has been no improvement. I suggest that we ought not to undertake a change merely for the sake of change, without being very sure that it is an improvement.

MR. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: There is much force in the suggestion which has been made by the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) and, perhaps, that may be a wise and proper disposition of this question, when it comes properly before the House. We are not yet informed what particular provision the Committee on Elections may present to the consideration of the House, as a substitute for this, and which will embrace the whole question of contested elections, not only of the Governor, but of all inferior officers. I would suggest, however, that in the absence of such report, the provision now under consideration should be adopted as it stands. The question received much consideration from the committee, and it was our judgment that it would be better to follow the Constitution as it now stands, until some definite and distinct proposition is reported from the Committee on Elections, which would cover the entire ground. If they present such a report as will fully cover the contested election of Governor, the Committee on the Executive Department would have no objection, whatever, to its adoption, and that it should then become a part of this article of the Constitution; but as this section is pending only in committee of the whole, and will be fully and entirely within the power of the Convention, when it comes up upon second reading, I would suggest that it would be judicious, for the present, to pass it as it is, and after we have had full opportunity to consider the report of the Committee on Elections, we may then amend this section of the article under consideration, or strike it out upon second reading, if that report should be satisfactory. For the present, therefore, I hope that the amendment will not be agreed to, and that the report of the committee, as they have presented it, will be adopted.

MR. EWING. Mr. Chairman: By the consent of the House, I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If the amendment be withdrawn, the amendment to the amendment goes with it. The question then will be on the section as amended.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I move to strike out the words "a committee to be selected from," so that the section shall read, "shall be determined by both Houses of the Legislature, and formed and regulated in such manner as shall be directed by law."

Mr. HARRY WHITE. That is what I offered.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I understood the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) to be opposed to a committee to be selected to be regulated by law; but to favor leaving in the section the proposal that it should be got at by the committee of both Houses.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: For the purpose of testing the sense of the Convention, I moved my amendment to strike out and insert as proposed.

Mr. CUYLER. That leaves in the words, "the committee to be selected from."

Mr. HARRY WHITE. No, I beg pardon. If you will observe, the amendment speaks of striking out all after the word Houses, in the eleventh line, and insert —

The CHAIR. The question will be upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Harry White,) to the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler.)

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) correctly expresses the view that I had in my mind. I therefore withdraw my amendment. I would like to ask the gentlemen who have had experience in contested election cases in our courts—and I have had some—and my friend from Philadelphia, who sits behind me, (Mr. Biddle,) has had more, when we have ever regarded the contested election cases, in the courts of Philadelphia, as doubtful? I want to ask any gentleman here, who has had experience, whether the result of a contested election in our courts has not uniformly been predicted by the bar before the decision was made? I must say, so far as my experience has gone, and so far as my observation has gone, I have never entertained a doubt. I have never erred in my prediction as to what the result of a contested election case in our courts would be. And just so long as our judges are elected by the popular vote, will that be the fact. Just so long as a judge is taken from the body of the people, and nominated by a political convention, and elected by a political party, just so long the decision of our judges in contested election cases, will be founded upon their political predelections. I charge no corruption, but the influence upon the mind of the judge is so irresistible that he struggles against it in vain. The existence of this influence is perhaps unconscious upon his mind, but it is no less the truth, that his opinion is influenced by his political predelections.

This question has been discussed in the Judiciary Committee. It is the feeling of the committee, and it is certainly my feeling as a member of that committee, that it is one of the most solemn duties resting upon us, to take away from the courts all connection with this question. I would not pollute our courts by bringing contested election cases into their tribunal at all. Some other method must be found. I cannot suggest what, but it must, or certainly should be found, by which these questions can be determined without submitting it to the decision of the courts. This decision of contested election cases has done more to shake the confidence of the people of Pennsylvania in the purity and integrity of their courts than any other class of questions that has come before them. I am far from supposing that the remedy in this section is faultless. I agree with the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Harry White,) whose experience is vastly greater than mine, that the result of the experiment in the Legislature has not been such as to encourage the hope that their decision would be free from party bias, or uninfluenced by partiality; but I accept it as a choice of evils. Let us follow it until something better is devised, as I am sure there will be before we close our labors, but still of the two evils it is the lesser. Rather than deposit the decision of such questions with the courts of justice, and impair the old confidence of the people, would I leave it with the Legislature with all the disadvantages and all the reasons that attend the decision of such questions by that body.

Mr. J. N. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I will remark that the section under consideration received the very deliberate consideration of the committee, and I should regret very much that any change should be made in it in committee of the whole, but if the suggestion of the gentleman from Lycoming (Mr. Armstrong) be adopted, if upon careful examination in Convention it may be deemed advisable to make a change, it can be better done there. I would remark that this section and the language now objected to, is precisely the words of the Constitution of 1838. We have lived under this Constitution a period of nearly forty years, and no citizen of this Commonwealth, from the Delaware to the lake, has ever complained of this clause in the Constitution. It would be unwise, perhaps, on the part of this Convention to strike it out and adopt a new section, because uncalled for, and perhaps it might lead to bad consequences. As it stands now, it is probably as good as we can get it. It is not one of the subject matters that the people have sent us here to correct, and if we go on correcting everything, if we are satisfied with nothing in the Constitution of 1790 or the Constitution of 1838, we shall make such a Constitution as the people of the State will vote down almost unanimously.

Now, I take it that we must trust some tribunal in this State. The whole people of this Commonwealth are not corrupt. If you remove from the Legislature a jurisdiction over its elections and lodge it in the Supreme Court, you may have a tribunal just as likely to be swayed by partisan feeling and by political excitement as the Legislature. The Legislature has, thus far, been the safe repository of that power; let us keep it there, at all events, until there shall be some reason for the change as reported. I trust the section will pass the committee, then in Convention it may be reviewed and more fully considered if it is deemed proper so to do.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: There has been but one Governor in this State who was elected by a very small majority since my recollection. I refer to the election of Wm. F. Johnson, and I submit that because it has not heretofore happened that we have had a contested election for Governor, it does not follow that we ought not to make careful provision for such an occasion in the future.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: At the suggestion of several members I have drawn up my amendment in proper shape, and I desire to have it read.

The CLERK read:

"Contested elections shall be determined by both Houses of the Legislature, in such manner as shall be directed by law."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the section, by inserting after "power," in the first line, the words "of this Commonwealth," so that it will read, "the supreme Executive power of this Commonwealth shall be vested in a Governor," &c.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: We are only legislating, I presume, for the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BOWMAN. If the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) will look at the first line of the first section he will see that his amendment is entirely unnecessary. The reading of that line is: "The Executive department of this Commonwealth shall consist of a Governor," &c. Now, the first line of the section under consideration, which the gentleman proposes to amend, reads: "The supreme Executive power shall be vested in a Governor," &c. What power? Of what? Of this Commonwealth.

The amendment of Mr. Gowen was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the adoption of the second section, it was agreed to.

The CLERK read section third, as follows:

The Governor shall hold his office during four years, from the third Tuesday of January next ensuing his election, and shall not be capable of holding the office for the term next succeeding the term for which he was elected.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I move to amend, by striking out the words "capable of holding office," and inserting the words "eligible to." The difficulty will arise in case of the Governor going back to the Senate, or of his becoming Lieutenant Governor, of his being unable to hold the office of Governor in case of the Governor's death; but by striking out the words "capable of holding office," and inserting "eligible," the true intent of the committee will be carried out.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: The purpose which the Committee had in view was to prevent the Governor from holding two terms successively. It was thought that the word "eligible" might prevent his being a candidate at the second succeeding election, as the word "eligible" takes hold upon the qualification at the time of the election, and would operate to prevent his nomination for the second succeeding term, which would practically exclude him from the office for two instead of one term. The Governor's term commences in January. The election will be held in the November preceding. He might not hold the next term, but he would be enabled to run at the election which would fall in November preceding the time when he would take office, and be eligible for the next succeeding term, if the phraseology of this report is preserved, but it will practically exclude the Governor for two terms if he is to be eligible at the time when the election is held. We sufficiently guard it by the phraseology, which prevents him from holding office for two terms in succession, although we permit him to be elected at the election preceding the time when he would come into office. The phraseology was used with that intent.

The amendment of Mr. Brodhead was not agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, by striking out all after the word "election," in the second line. The provision in the present Constitution is, if I remember it correctly, that no person shall hold the office of Governor more than six years in any term of nine years. I am in favor of allowing that provision to stand. In short, sir, I have never been captivated with this general idea which some gentlemen seem to think popular, of one term for all sorts of people in public office. I think that it is against the public interest.

Now it is true that a considerable amount of opinion has grown up in the country, or at least has been indicated by the press and otherwise, in favor of limiting the President of the United States to a single term, and that opinion, to whatever extent it may have gone among the people, is founded upon a reason which does not exist in the case of the Governor of this Commonwealth.

The President of the United States has very large powers of appointment. His patronage is positively fearful, in the judgment and opinion of those who have considered the question of the organization of our general government carefully. He appoints an enormous mass of men to fill and discharge the duties of the public offices of the United States, and, of course, he has enormous powers grasped in his hand, and mostly without accountability to any earthly power, which he can use for the purpose of re-nominating and re-electing himself to that high office. The check of the Senate upon him, with reference to some of the high offices, goes but a little way in lessening the force of this general statement; therefore there may be fair argument, I grant you, made in favor of limiting the holding of the Presidential office to a single term. But how different is the case with reference to the Governor of this Commonwealth! In 1838 he was stripped of nearly the whole power of appointment which had been theretofore vested in him. He now only appoints his own Secretary and Attorney General, and he fills certain offices for fragments of terms, when they become vacant, throughout the State, and I believe appoints a few inspectors in the city of Philadelphia, and some notaries public here and elsewhere. This power of patronage in his hands is quite insignificant, and his possession of it will not enable him to re-nominate himself, or re-elect himself as Governor of the State, or exercise any considerable influence to that end. Therefore there is no reason, in my opinion, for limiting the people in this matter of their choice of Governor for a second term.

When a man has been placed in that office, and has proved himself to be a man of singular ability, and by his integrity in the discharge of his high office has won the confidence of the people, why deny him the privilege of serving the people for a second term, and compel the people to select a raw man to fill that office and discharge its important duties? If there were great abuses to be apprehended from continuing a Governor in office a second term, I would say nothing against this clause reported by the committee; but as no such abuses seem reasonably to be apprehended, and as our experience in this State has not shown any abuses or mischief in that quarter, I hope no such provision as this will be inserted in the Constitution. I think it would have been a cause of regret during the last twenty-five years, if the people had not been permitted to re-elect several men who have filled the office of Governor of this State with rare ability; and as there seems to be no reason or necessity for the change, I hope we will leave the Constitution as it is.

MR. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: This clause was a matter of anxious consideration in the committee, and as it stands reported to the Convention, I believe I am entitled to say that it received the endorsement of every member. Now, undoubtedly in theory there is no good reason why you should limit the choice of the people at all, because, theoretically, I suppose constituents are able to take care of themselves; but our Constitutions, both State and federal, are full of limitations. We have limitations as to age, as to the qualifications of President, Governors and Senators; and yet it might be said, with a good deal of force, "why make any limitations, and why, if the people choose to elect Senators of the age of twenty-one, are they not just as good as men of twenty-five years of age?" It is difficult to argue and answer these questions on theory alone, and yet I think in practice we find a certain amount of value in these restrictions. Now it is the same in regard to what is called the one-term principle. In regard to the Chief Executive of the federal government, the sentiment is becoming very strong indeed as to limiting him to a single term of office. Whether truly or untruly, it has been believed that during the last year of the first term of office the whole patronage and the whole force of the government is carried in one direction, and that direction is the direction which is supposed to secure the re-election of the incumbent. Now, measurably, this will be the same in the Commonwealth; not to so great an extent, of course, because the patronage is much less, but so far as the whole machinery of the government, the passive and the active machinery, may be diverted in one direction, it may be used to accomplish this same end. I know there are many illustrious instances to the contrary, but it was supposed that where the term was lengthened it would be wiser to restrict the Governor to a single term. The thought of the people at large is undoubtedly running in that direction, and the committee therefore reported this section as it stands. I cannot say that I am absolutely wedded to it, but I think I am entitled to say that, so far as that committee could obtain what they supposed to be the sentiment of the Commonwealth, they had it. We were also fortunate in having most important aid in the large experience of the chairman, himself a former and distinguished occupant of the gubernatorial chair. The sentiment was a general one.

Of course this Convention will do what it pleases, but I think we are leaning in the direction of a salutary change when we report the section and pass it in the shape in which it now stands.

MR. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment to the amendment: Strike out all after the word "office," and insert the words "for more than two successive terms." I ask for the reading of the section as amended.

The CLERK read as follows:

The Governor shall hold his office during four years from the third Tuesday of January next ensuing his election, and shall not be capable of holding office for more than two successive terms.

MR. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I have no desire to intrude upon the time of the Convention unnecessarily in this matter, but my experience and observation in regard to this question of the re-election of the Executive is the very opposite from that of my friend from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew.) I feel like standing by every word of this section as reported by the Committee on the Executive Department. If there is one change—I was going to say reform—I will certainly say if there is one change that is required by many of our citizens who are familiar with this subject in the Commonwealth this is certainly one of them. It has been remarked that there is no reason why there should be any incompatibility to the immediate re-election to the office of Governor in a person who has worthily occupied that position. Without any reflection upon any distinguished occupant of that position, the result of experience and observation is that few men have occupied the gubernatorial chair who would not use its privileges and its opportunities to make capital for their re-nomination. In the matter of pardons the Governor has large power, and it is said that it is the intention to change the Constitution in this respect, but in what manner? If you glance over the report of this committee, you will find that in section ten that power is proposed to be vested in the Governor to remit fines and forfeitures and to grant reprieves, &c., but it is proposed by the committee that this pardoning power shall only be exercised upon the recommendation of the Attorney General, Secretary of the Commonwealth, or other officers in immediate relation to the Executive. Why the Attorney General is the appointee of the Governor, and the Secretary of the Commonwealth is his appointee, and both of these officers are interested in his perpetuity in office. One of the objects, then, in placing this restriction upon the Executive is to secure him independence of character in this important matter of granting pardons. The gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) has said that the Governor has no power in this Commonwealth. Why, sir, in addition to the great power of pardon he has the vetoing power, and in the matter of legislation affecting different interests in different parts of this Commonwealth, hereafter as heretofore, the Governor will be tempted to exercise his power of veto in the interests of his re-nomination and re-election. I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) that experience in public office and experience in legislative matters is invaluable to the people, but there are some offices where re-election would not secure that independence of action which is necessary to the faithful discharge of the duties of a public officer, and the limitation upon the term of office of the Executive, I think, is the most salutary change that has been suggested in the report of the committee.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I desire to add simply a word or two in regard to this question. It certainly should be the object in dealing with a section of this character to provide the means by which the mind and attention of the gentleman who may occupy the Executive chair shall be exclusively directed to the discharge of the duties of that office, and I hold it to be a great evil if any gentleman should obtain that office with any expectation or purpose of continuing himself in that position. I would remove the Governor as far as possible from the danger of seeking something higher and further, to which all men are liable. I would take from him all motive in the conduct of his office that should be in any way calculated to continue him in that position. Nay, I would go further, and, if it were possible, I would remove from him all temptation to seek a higher office. I think the office of Governor of this Commonwealth is exalted enough for any man to look to as the sun of his ambition, and no man should be sent to occupy that high office for the purpose of seeking a still higher position, as, for instance, the collectorship in Philadelphia, which one of our ex-Governors once accepted. I would make the office of Governor in this great Commonwealth so dignified and so honorable that no man should care to look beyond it. Nay, more. For the purpose of removing all possible motive from his mind to attend to any other matters, I would discourage him, so far as it is possible, from any kind of speculation with the view of making money. I would not let his mind be distracted from the discharge of his public duties by anything of that kind, and I would allow him to grant pardons. I do not suppose any man ever granted a pardon for the purpose of making use of a thief as a voter. I suppose all Governors are beyond and above all that. I would not allow him to exercise his office in any way, or for any purpose, with a view to his own advancement. He should look solely to the conscientious discharge of the duties of his office.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion of the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. Wright) is not in order at this time. The amendment of the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) was to strike out all after the word "elections," in this section. If that motion prevails, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. Wright) would form part of the section stricken out, and hence it is out of order at this time.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I withdraw my amendment for the purpose of allowing a vote to be taken upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. Wright.)

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I now renew my amendment, to strike out all after the word "election."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the section, which will be read.

The CLERK:

SECTION 3. The Governor shall hold his office during four years, from the third Tuesday of January next ensuing his election, and shall not be capable of holding the office for the term next succeeding the term for which he was elected.

The section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The fourth section will be read.

The CLERK:

SECTION 4. A Lieutenant Governor shall be chosen in the same manner, at the same time and for the same term, subject to the same provisions; he shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided.

The section was agreed to.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: At this point I will ask unanimous consent of the committee to go back to section one, for the purpose of inserting after the words "Auditor General," the words "a State Treasurer." These words were inserted by the committee, and were omitted in the printing. I did not observe it until this moment, and they should go in to make the report uniform. The section as drafted read:

SECTION 1. The Executive Department of this Commonwealth shall consist of a Governor, a Lieutenant Governor, a Secretary of State, Attorney General, Auditor General, a State Treasurer, a Secretary of Internal Affairs and a Superintendent of Public Instruction.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: While the gentleman from Lycoming is making that correction, I will suggest that he change the words "Secretary of State" to "Secretary of the Commonwealth." That is the term used now.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: The office is named in the report of the committee, as the committee intended it should be, "Secretary of State," which is a more appropriate and shorter phrase than "Secretary of the Commonwealth."

The CHAIRMAN. The correction suggested by the gentleman from Lycoming will be made.

The question is on the fifth section, which will be read.

The CLERK:

SECTION 5. No person shall be eligible to the office of Governor, or Lieutenant Governor, except a citizen of the United States, who shall have attained the age of thirty years, and have been seven years next preceding his election an inhabitant of the State, unless he shall have been absent on the public business of the United States or of this State.

The section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section in order, the sixth, will be read.

The CLERK:

SECTION 6. No member of Congress, or person holding any office under the United States, or of this State, shall exercise the office of Governor or Lieutenant Governor.

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend as follows:

To insert after the word "shall" the words, "be eligible to or."

The section will then read:

No member of Congress, or person holding any office under the United States, or of the State, shall be eligible to, or exercise the office of, Governor or Lieutenant Governor.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: That is right. That was the intention of the Committee on Executive Department, and this amendment expresses that intention more clearly. We intended that a candidate should not even run, desiring to make any person holding a national or State office, or a member of Congress, entirely ineligible.

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. Chairman: I have offered this amendment in order to definitely settle the question, that no member of Congress shall be eligible to the position of Governor or Lieutenant Governor. The confusion and disorder which have prevailed of late years in Louisiana have been mainly due to the eligibility of members of Congress to the office of Governor. I wish to avoid any possibility of such a scene in this Commonwealth.

Mr. WORRELL. Mr. Chairman: I desire to ask the gentleman from Susquehanna when the question of eligibility to office is to be determined, and if it is not when the person elected presents himself to be qualified for office?

Mr. TERRELL. Mr. Chairman: The intention I had in offering the amendment was to prevent any person disqualified by the provisions of this section from accepting a nomination for either the office of Governor or of Lieutenant Governor. If, as the question of the gentleman from Philadelphia would intimate, the amendment does not do that, I will modify it by using another phrase, in place of eligible to.

Mr. CORSON. Mr. Chairman: I think we ought to adopt this section as the Committee on Executive Department have reported it. If anything should be stricken out it should be the four words "member of Congress or," because why we should select a member of Congress as the standard of an officer in the United States government I do not understand. The better way to word the section would be:

"No person holding any office under the United States or this State shall exercise the office of Governor or Lieutenant Governor."

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: I will state that the view of the committee is that a member of Congress is not essentially an officer of the United States. The design was to exclude members of Congress and officers of the United States. A member of Congress is not essentially such an officer.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman from Montgomery will allow me a suggestion, we have retained in this section the language of section five of the existing Constitution, which shows that at least there was a doubt in the minds of the framers of that Constitution. I think it is better to leave it as it is, and not strike out the words "member of Congress or."

Mr. CORSON. Mr. Chairman: If that seems to be the view of the Convention, that this office of member of Congress is no office at all—I never had an idea it was much of an office—I am satisfied with it; and it does seem to me that this proposition, with the explanation which has been made about the members of Congress, is exactly right as it has fallen from the hands of the committee, that no person holding any office under the United States or this State shall exercise the office of Governor or Lieutenant Governor. There is no necessity for an amendment such as has been offered by the gentleman from Susquehanna. A very worthy man might be a member of Congress, or might hold some office under the United States government or under this State government, who would make a most excellent Governor, and we have a right to elect him while he holds that office. But he cannot exercise the office of Governor or Lieutenant Governor until he has resigned the other office. Now if we incorporate any such principle as this which is proposed by the gentleman from Susquehanna, we will cripple the people in the exercise of the right of selection. They cannot elect a man who is, perhaps, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, because he shall not be eligible while he holds that office. Now my position is, that no matter what office a man holds, let him go out of it before he enters upon a new office. That is the law as it stands to-day, and therefore I hope that this section will be adopted exactly as it has been framed.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: While I heartily approve of the theory of the gentleman from Susquehanna, that a person holding the office of member of Congress, or any other office under the United States or this State, ought not to be a candidate for the office of Governor or Lieutenant Governor; to make it effective, I think there should be some other words inserted than those proposed by him, and I am reminded that the gentleman himself proposes to make his language stronger. It was suggested by my colleague, (Mr. Worrell,) a few moments ago, that a question might arise when that eligibility began. A man might be elected while holding the office of member of Congress, or some other office under the United States or of this State, who, for the reason that his term has expired at a time when he presented himself to be sworn in, would claim eligibility. The question might arise, and in order to prevent any trouble, I would suggest that the words, "during his term of office," be incorporated into the amendment.

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. Chairman: I will try to satisfy the gentleman in a way that will, perhaps, meet his approval more than his own suggestion. At the instance of several gentlemen around me, including the gentleman from Columbia, and in order to make this matter more certain, I will change my amendment from "eligible to" to "elected."

The CHAIRMAN. The section as amended will be read.

The CLERK: No member of Congress, or person holding any office under the United States or of this State, shall be elected to or exercise the office of Governor or Lieutenant Governor.

Mr. WORRELL. Mr. Chairman: Just at this point I would like to say that this very question of eligibility arose when you, sir, were nominated for Governor in 1863, and it was then the judgment of the people of this Commonwealth that this question was to be determined at the time the gentleman presented himself to be qualified for the office. It has been so determined in Congress that eligibility under the constitutional provision in regard to age is to be determined when the party presents himself to be qualified for the office. Therefore the word "eligible" would not secure what the gentleman from Susquehanna desires, but the word "elected" seems to meet the whole question.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I look on this proposed amendment as a matter of considerable importance. While it may be true, as suggested by the gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Corson,) that occasionally a congressman, a man actually in Congress, or holding some other office under the United States, might make a very good Governor, I do not think it will ever occur that we cannot find other citizens of the State, who are not members of Congress, who would also make good Governors. We will not be limited to congressmen, and I think that the prohibition proposed is a proper one. I hope that we will, so far as possible, keep our State government as an independent and distinct government, in its sphere, from the United States government. As a matter of experience, and as a matter of fact, in quite a number of the States in this Union, have we had examples of members of Congress, and officers of the United States government, using their power and their influence acquired from that office, to elect themselves Governors and other officers of the State government. We saw examples of that in Louisiana. It has occurred in several of the western States, and may occur again. Now, as a matter of fact, many of the Congressmen in large districts in this State, and in other States, have more power, more patronage, and more ability to use their office to get men to work for them and for their election to State officers, than the Governor of the State has. Under the present system, and as it has stood for many years, the Senators from a State, or the Congressman from his district, controls absolutely every appointment to a federal office within that district. He has large powers, and I think it is a wise provision to put in here, that while a member of Congress, or an officer under the United States, a man shall not be a candidate for Governor or Lieutenant Governor. If it is desired by the people that he should run for the office, and should be Governor, let him resign his United States office; that is easily done. The section may be further amended, so as not to apply to officers under the State government. I would be willing to see that amendment made, but, so far as officers under United States government are concerned, I hope to see them excluded, even from candidacy, for these important State offices.

Mr. D. W. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman: I should like to ask why we should get up machinery here to prevent the people from nominating a man who had been in Congress, and whose term would end in November, say the day after the gubernatorial election. Is it on the ground that we could get no good and honest material from that source? I do not think we should go so far as that. It might be that a Congressman from this State who, by his integrity in Congress and his straight-forward action, has especially recommended himself to the people. Hence I think the section, as it stands, is eminently wise. It contemplates that a man cannot exercise the office if he is a Congressman; but he may be nominated and elected, and if elected, and his Congress-sional term ends within the proper time, it enables him to exercise the office, if the people select and elect him. It seems to me we ought to adopt the plain words of the section, and adopt no amendment, unless we think we have so many citizens in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania who have had public experience that we will not, on any occasion, have to look to a member of Congress, whose term is about expiring, when the gubernatorial election is coming on.

Let us leave the section as it is. I think it is eminently wise, and should be retained and adopted by the committee.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. Turrell, it was rejected.

The question then re-curring on the section as amended, it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The seventh section will now be read.

The CLERK read as follows :

SECTION 7. The Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall be neither increased nor diminished after their election, nor during the term for which they shall have been elected.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman : I offer the following as a substitute for that section :

"The Governor shall receive for his services five thousand dollars annually, and the Lieutenant Governor three thousand dollars annually."

The question being on the substitute, it was rejected.

Mr. ANDREW REED. Mr. Chairman : I offer the following as a substitute :

"The Governor shall, at stated times, receive for compensation for his services the sum of six thousand dollars, and the Lieutenant Governor the sum of four thousand dollars, which compensation may be increased or diminished by the Legislature, but not so as to increase or diminish the compensation of any one after his election or during his term of office.

The question being upon the substitute, it was rejected.

The question recurring upon the section, it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The eighth section will now be read.

The CLERK read the section as follows :

SECTION 8. The Governor shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy of this Commonwealth and of the militia, except when they shall be called into the actual service of the United States.

The question being upon the section, it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The ninth section will be read.

The CLERK read the section as follows :

SECTION 9. He shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of all the members of the Senate, appoint a Secretary of the Commonwealth and an Attorney General during pleasure, and such other officers of the Commonwealth as he is or may be authorized by law to appoint. He shall have power to fill all vacancies in offices to which he may appoint that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session. He shall have power to fill any vacancy that may happen during the recess of the Senate in the office of Auditor General, State Treasurer, Secretary of Internal Affairs, Superintendent of Public Instruction, in a judicial officer, in any other elective office which he is or may be authorized so to fill. If the vacancy shall happen during the session of the Senate, the Governor shall nominate to the Senate, before their final adjournment, a proper person to fill said vacancy. But in any such case of vacancy in an elective office, a person shall be chosen to said office at the next annual election of Representatives, unless the vacancy shall happen within three calendar months immediately preceding such annual election, in which case the election for said office shall be held at the second succeeding annual election of Representatives. In acting on executive nominations the Senate shall sit with open doors, and in confirming or rejecting the nominations of the Governor the vote shall be taken by yeas and yeas, and shall be entered on the Journal.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman : I propose to strike out the words "the Commonwealth," in the third line, and insert in lieu thereof the word "State," for the purpose of harmonizing it with the first section.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman : If it is the design of the committee to use the term "Secretary of State" all the way through the Constitution, so as to make it harmonious, that is all right. We have, however, already passed over some sections where we used the expression, "Secretary of the Commonwealth," instead of "Secretary of State." In the Constitution of 1837-8, and in that of 1790, sometimes one expression is used, sometimes another. If it be the design of the committee to adopt the latter expression altogether, it can be arranged by the Committee on Revision and Adjustment.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: It is the design of the committee to use, uniformly, the term "State," instead of "Commonwealth," and therefore this amendment should be made in order that it may harmonize with the first section.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I am going to vote to retain the old expression of the Constitution. I am opposed to changing the expression from "Secretary of the Commonwealth" to "Secretary of State." I have no special feeling about it, but I see no particular reason why it should be done. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the expression "Secretary of the Commonwealth" is all through our acts of Assembly. It was in the Constitution of 1790, and that of 1838, and all subsequent legislation is careful to observe the expression. Furthermore, the processes of our courts are all done in the name of the "Commonwealth," not of the "State." I would like to see the harmony of the Commonwealth in this respect preserved; hence I am opposed to any change.

Mr. J. N. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I concur with the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) that we had better preserve the old fashioned term—the "Secretary of the Commonwealth," which has been used in our legislation and in all our judicial proceedings—even down to summonses, for a period of a hundred years. The term "Secretary of State," as it strikes me, is more national. The nation is called the "State." The several States of the Union are called "Commonwealths"—as portions of a great State or nation. I therefore hope the word "Commonwealth" will be retained. It conforms to all our legislation and to the seal of the Commonwealth; and for so long a period of time that it should not be altered without some good reason, and I certainly have heard none.

I may here remark that when Mr. Secretary of the Commonwealth Jordan came into office, he signed all his official documents, "Secretary of State," for a period of about a year, but I then noticed that a sudden change to the old expression of "Secretary of the Commonwealth." He no doubt thought the first term he used more expressive of dignity of position, but for the reason that he found all the records to be signed "Secretary of the Commonwealth," and that the very seal of his office so put it, he fell back upon the old title. I trust the older term will remain as heretofore.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman: I agree with the gentleman who has last addressed the committee (Mr. J. N. Purviance.) I think we had better suffer the title of Secretary of the Commonwealth to remain. It has been a long time in existence, and it is, withal, a dignified and elevated title. It is a pure Saxon expression; "State" has vastly too much Latin in it for ordinary purposes. I think "Secretary of the Commonwealth" a dignified and elevated title, and I believe it should be retained.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I shall vote for this amendment, sir, to change the word "Commonwealth" to "State," not only in this instance, but throughout our entire Constitution. I shall also vote, when it comes up, to change the words "General Assembly" to the word "Legislature," and harmonize our Constitution. In our present Constitution the word "Commonwealth" is used about half the time, and the word "State" about as many times.

If I remember correctly, the word "State" is used a few times more than the word "Commonwealth." Frequently these words are used in the same article. Now, sir, I think we had better harmonize by using one expression throughout the entire Constitution. The same remark applies to the words "General Assembly" and "Legislature."

I cannot see why we should retain the word "Commonwealth," a part of the time in the Constitution, because we have been in the habit of using it for so many years. I believe there are but two States in the Union whose Constitutions retain the word Commonwealth. If I remember correctly, Kentucky and Massachusets are the only two States that use the word Commonwealth, and all the States that have recently formed Constitutions have put themselves in harmony with the general government, as well as in harmony with the other States of the Union, by using the word "State," and also using the word "Legislature" instead of "General Assembly." It strikes me that it is, if anything, a more elegant and more dignified expression to say "Secretary of State" than "Secretary of the Commonwealth." As for our laws now containing that and "Constitution," there will be no inconvenience, no trouble, no difficulty arising from using the word "State," because we now frequently use that word in the Constitution, and in the laws interchangeably with the word Commonwealth.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: I believe that no very high degree of importance attaches to the question now before the committee. It is not very important whether the officer designated is called the "Secretary of the State" or the "Secretary of the Commonwealth." There is nothing to commend the use of the phrase "Secretary of the Commonwealth," except the long continued use of that expression. It is a cumbersome and not a very natural designation. The word "Commonwealth" means the public weal, the public welfare. There seems to me no especial propriety in entitling this officer by this designation. "State" is the distinct corporate designation, recognized and known to all judicial proceedings and to all laws. The Secretary is an officer of the State, as an organization, and not an officer having any especial charge of the public weal or welfare. The expression is cumbersome.

As has been already stated, the expression "Secretary of State" and "Secretary of the Commonwealth" are used interchangeably in the State very frequently. The committee has already passed upon the question, possibly by inadvertence, in the first section, and called this officer the "Secretary of State." The article must be harmonious. Either in the first section or in this and others we must make a change. I have no choice upon the question, and rather incline to the continuance of the designation, "Secretary of the Commonwealth." My purpose is to have the same designation consistently carried through the whole article.

Mr. HENRY W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: It has been said that this change of name is a matter of no great importance, but simply a question of taste, and that there is no disputing about tastes. To me it is something more than a question of taste. It is a question of ancient usage, sanctified by lapse of time, and it seems to me a little curious to find so many lawyers, who, from habit and education are conservative, favoring a change without assigning anything that can be dignified by the name of reason. I believe nothing can be gained, but something lost by change. Let us not tear up every association and destroy every reminiscence connected with the old Commonwealth. I feel prouder for being a member of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

In the State of New York, process runs in the name of the people of the State—here it issues in the name of the Commonwealth. All patents for our lands bear the broad impress of the Commonwealth—all commissions are thus issued—the great seal bears that inscription. I would not follow New York in anything pertaining to her State administration, nor deface our process nor break our seal.

A desire for uniformity is urged by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. J. W. F. White.) He says two States only besides Pennsylvania retain or have adopted this word, viz: Massachusetts and Kentucky—if not another State in the Union kept the good old Saxon word, I would cling to it. If uniformity is desired, let the rest come to us, and, if they do not see fit to do that, Massachusetts and Kentucky are good company to stand with. Let no change be made merely for the sake of change, but cling to the traditions, usages and memories of our grand old Commonwealth, until necessity forces change upon us.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman: According to my recollection of what transpired in the committee, we took a vote upon it, and we agreed that "State" should not be the word to be used, but "Commonwealth," because the old Constitution and all our laws contained that word.

Now the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. J. W. F. White) says that the Constitution of 1838 has here and there the word "State" interchanged with "Commonwealth." I would like the gentleman to turn to that page of the Constitution of 1838 where "State" is used in that connection. I cannot call it to mind.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. I did not mean to say that it is used in reference to the Secretary of State. I was using the words "State" and "Commonwealth" synonymously.

Mr. WALKER. I cannot call to mind where the word "State" is used in connection with the Commonwealth. It is "Commonwealth" always in the Constitution of 1790 and in the Constitution of 1838. We took a vote upon it in committee, and my recollection is that we were united, every gentleman on the committee voting for retaining the word "Commonwealth" instead of "State."

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: I will withdraw my amendment, and I will add a word or two of explanation for introducing it. Finding the words "Secretary of State" in the first section as adopted by the committee, my purpose was to harmonize the article. I have no tenacity whatever about it.

Mr. HARVEY. Can we not change the wording of the first section by general consent?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If it be the sense of the committee. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. No objection being heard, the change will be made.

The question now recurs upon the ninth section.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I desire to ask the committee which reported this article whether they properly considered the effect of the words "two-thirds of all the members" in the second line.

["Yes, yes."]

Whether they considered the probable consequence would be that no appointment would be made at all, and that the result of that would be, by the after provisions of the section, that the appointment would be given to the Governor session after session, without any reference to the Senate at all.

Mr. MANTOR. Mr. Chairman: I move to strike out, in the third line, the words "and the Attorney General."

I call for the reading of the minority report, which is to be found in the Journal, page 347:

The CLERK read:

I concur in the report of the majority of the Committee on Executive Department, in all respects, except as to Attorney General. In my opinion that officer should be elected.

If he were exclusively the legal advisor of the Governor, it would be proper and right that he should be appointed by the Chief Executive officer, but as he is the law officer of the Commonwealth, and, as such, is required to give his opinion on all legal questions affecting the interests of the people of the State, especially upon questions of taxation, legislation and revenue laws, it is believed that his election by the people would place him in a position of greater independence of thought and action, than if he held his office upon any uncertain tenure.

In times of political excitement, when grave constitutional questions require deliberate consideration, and when the Governor would desire to be sustained in his views, which might be wholly of a partisan character, a difference of opinion between him and the Attorney General might result in the removal of the latter, that his place be filled by one more pliable and less conscientious in the performance of his duties.

The Attorney General, in the discharge of his duties as to constitutional questions arising from the power of the Legislature to grant corporate privileges and acts on other subjects, many of which may conflict with the rights and interests of the people, should not be restrained or influenced by partisan sympathy, or the power of removal from office.

It may happen, too, that partisan zeal and activity, rather than fitness and honesty, may prompt the dispensation of patronage; and combinations of factions, operating as well in the concentration of power in nominating conventions, as in the popular sentiment, may control appointments prejudicial to the general welfare.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN N. PURVIANCE.

Mr. MANTOR. It is not my purpose, at this time, to attack this report. I regard the report, in general, as a very able and a very fair one. But, sir, I believe there is a desire on the part of many people of the Commonwealth to elect all the officers that belong to the government; and the minority report, which has just been read, is all the argument that I desire to offer on this occasion.

The amendment of Mr. Mantor was rejected.

The question being upon the adoption of the ninth section, it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read :

SECTION 10. He shall have power to remit fines and forfeitures, to grant reprieves, commutations of sentence and pardons, except in cases of impeachment, but only upon the recommendation, in writing, of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, Attorney General, Superintendent of Public Instruction, Secretary of Internal Affairs, or any three of them, and such recommendation, with the reasons therefor at length, shall be recorded and filed in the Department.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman : I move to strike out " Secretary of the Commonwealth, Attorney General, Superintendent of Public Instruction, Secretary of Internal Affairs," and insert " Auditor General and State Treasurer." I have no desire to press my particular view at any length upon the committee. My simple object for making this motion is this : The Secretary of the Commonwealth, and the Attorney General, and the Superintendent of Public Instruction, I believe all of them to be appointed by the Governor.

Mr. BROOMALL. But two are to be appointed.

Mr. NEWLIN. That will give the Governor the majority of the board. Now the Auditor General is elected by the people, the State Treasurer is elected by the people, and so is the Governor, and if the power of pardon is confided to these three, they will be a check upon each other. They will be jealous of each other's powers and their standing in the community, and they will be a very wholesome check upon the actions and views of each other. I have no desire to press this view at any length. I merely suggest it. If the idea is a good one, it will commend itself; if not, it will be voted down.

Mr. JOHN R. READ. Mr. Chairman : I offer the following as a substitute for the section :

The Governor and Lieutenant Governor (or the persons acting as such) and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, or the major part of them, of whom the Governor or person administering the government shall be one, shall have power to remit fines and forfeitures, to grant reprieves and commutations of sentence, and to grant pardons, after conviction, in all cases except impeachment.

Mr. JOHN R. READ. Mr. Chairman : I have but a few words to say in connection with this subject, and it is that I believe that the exercise of the pardoning power in the past has been grossly abused. I think upon this subject there certainly must be an unanimity of sentiment on the part of this Convention. I believe if this pardoning power is clothed with more sanctity than it has been in the past, that it will be exercised in a manner better calculated to promote the interests of the people at large. If gentlemen will refer to the Constitution of New Jersey, they will find that the pardoning power of that State is vested in the Governor, a Chancellor and six judges of the court of error and appeals. In no State in the Union is it more difficult to obtain a pardon, and in no State is a pardon granted more properly or refused more often. I believe if this pardoning power is vested in the Executive, in the manner provided in the section reported by the committee, that it will be almost as easy to obtain an improper pardon as it is now, for we all know how loath we are to refuse signing an application or recommendation to the power that exercises this right, while we might be reluctant to exercise that same power if we were clothed with the same responsibility of granting pardons, and remitting forfeitures. It seems to me that if this Convention would provide for a court of pardons, and thus make the approach to the mercy seat of this Commonwealth more tortuous than it is now, that this power would be exercised in a more beneficial manner in the future than it has ever been in the past.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman : Before the vote is taken I would like to say but one word in regard to this question. It has been demonstrated to a certainty that a court of pardons is necessary to be fixed somewhere. Now the object the committee had in view in fixing the court of pardons was to make it consist of gentlemen who were already elected to office, and whose offices were located at the seat of government. The necessity of creating any additional tribunals outside of those already established was thereby avoided. The committee wisely concluded a court of pardons had become necessary, and I concur most heartily in their action. In arranging this matter it should not be rendered impossible, however, to exercise the pardoning power. An opinion seems to prevail in the minds of some of our members that there must be a tribunal created by means of which it shall be impossible to grant a pardon. Now, although I am in favor of granting pardons as seldom as possible, yet it will not do to say that a tribunal not harmonizing or sympathizing with the Executive shall be established, and thus render the granting of pardons impossible. The officers of the four departments of State on the hill at Harrisburg are in sympathy with the Executive. Two of them are his appointees, and two of them are elected by the people. It will be necessary for three of them to recommend a pardon, and that recommendation must be in writing, and set forth the reasons why the pardon should be granted, before the Governor can consider the matter of pardon at all. Now I think we have sufficiently hedged in the pardoning power of the Governor by this provision, without creating a single additional office, and we think it has been done as cheaply and efficiently as it can be done. I hope, therefore, the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman: The committee in considering this section of the article had also in view the protection of the pardoning power, because after all the abuse of the pardoning power by an Executive generally arises from impositions practiced upon him, and notwithstanding all that may be said of the abuse of that power, and it may have been undoubtedly abused, more than one half of the cases in which an Executive is censured for the exercise of this prerogative can be traced back to an imposition practiced upon him. In a recent instance, which has been spoken of in this Convention more than once, of Executive clemency whereby a man named

Brown was pardoned for an offence committed in this city, the evidence that the Executive was imposed upon is found on the face of the pardon itself, because the man is there described as having been a soldier, and he is now but twenty-three years of age, and as having a family, while in reality he is a single man. The Executive should not be blamed for granting pardons in instances like this. It is only those who have practised imposition upon the pardoning power who should receive the censure. In the discussion of this question the aim of the committee was to avoid, if possible, the creation of any new offices. There are enough already in existence in Pennsylvania, and the committee supposed that it were best to require the Executive to call to his council only gentlemen of the first ability in the Commonwealth, such as the Secretary of the Commonwealth; and abolishing as the report does the office of Surveyor General, and creating in its place an office of large power and of great importance, and requiring the discharge of such duties as would claim the services of almost any citizen in this Commonwealth, with a Superintendent of Public Instruction, elected by the people. The committee, while it did not increase the expense of the Commonwealth, or multiply the public officers, named four persons to consider applications for pardons, and required a recommendation in writing of at least three of these officials containing the reasons why the pardon should be granted before the attention of the Executive can be called to the application at all.

Now this provision was designed by the committee for the protection of the Executive power, for I would not degrade the office of the Executive of Pennsylvania in surrounding him by any board or council of pardons, to interfere with the discharge of any of his official duties. This provision which the committee has reported does not lessen the dignity of the high office of the Executive, but it provides that this extraordinary power of pardon shall only be exercised by that officer after the application, the names of the applicants and the reasons for the application have been sifted through an examination by four of the most distinguished citizens of the Commonwealth. My young friend (Mr. John R. Read) is mistaken in his views as to the exercise of the pardoning power. I would not make the power inaccessible, except through difficult and tortuous ways. I would not surround the Governor of Pennsylvania and take from him part of the Executive power by means of advisers who shall assume part of the responsibility of the discharge of his official duties as an Executive; for this exercise of the pardoning power, although often abused and the Executive continually imposed upon, contains in itself the mercy side of our form of government. There is a period in the history of almost every criminal confined in your prisons when a proper exercise of the pardoning power may restore him to usefulness, and give him a future life honored and respected; when, if he remained within the prison walls, he turns out a hardened villain, abandoned by society, and ready for the commission of new crimes. In addition to this, the exercise of the pardoning power is often called suddenly into requisition. Criminals confined in your prisons become deranged; they are seized with disease, and grow infirm under the solitary system of confinement which, I am sorry to say, is a reproach to the humanity of the people of Pennsylvania. The pardoning power must, therefore, be sometimes suddenly exercised. I would not vest the pardoning power in the courts; it is not a judicial proceeding. It is a subject which appeals solely to the conscience of the Executive, and its exercise does not require a judicial inquiry and decision. When a judge has discharged his duty in sentencing a criminal, after conviction, his connection with the destiny of the criminal should terminate for ever, and he should not be recalled to sit in judgment upon his pardon. I would not select the Auditor General and the State Treasurer as members of this advisory council, although their relations are intimate with those of the Executive; because they are chargeable with the monied interests of the Commonwealth, and it is their duty to attend to the collection and distribution of the public revenues. As proposed we select those officials intimately connected with the Governor—his Attorney General and Secretary of the Commonwealth, and repose in them the duty of examining pardons before they reach the Executive. With them we associate the Superintendent of Public Instruction, who is elected by the people, and as yet none other than the first minds in the State have ever occupied that position. The fourth citizen charged with this duty is the incumbent of the new office we create, which invites to the importance and high responsibility of its duties the first talent and the highest integrity of the State, and we shall then secure such an examination into the merits of applications for pardons that the deserving cannot fail to receive Executive clemency which they are entitled to under our Constitution and our laws.

Mr. JOHN R. READ. I desire to ask the gentleman whether it is not the custom to refer all questions of pardon to the Attorney General's office.

Mr. CURTIN. The Attorney General has nothing whatever to do with the granting of pardons. If it is the pleasure of that officer or the Secretary of the Commonwealth to assist the Governor in the examination of applications for pardons, they can do so, but they are not bound to do so by law.

Mr. JOHN R. READ. I simply asked the question if it was not the custom to refer the subject of pardons to the Attorney General's office.

Mr. CURTIN. I cannot answer the question as to what the custom is now, or was years ago; but I can answer that it was not the custom during the six years I exercised the pardoning power. The question of exercising the pardoning power was not referred to the Attorney General. It was considered a question for the conscience of the Executive alone, and it would be hard to conceive a more painful and unpleasant duty than that of hearing applications for the exercise of this most delicate and useful—nay, necessary power. It is true that the four officials offered by your committee will relieve the Executive of all this inquiry and examination, but it will occasion them serious inconvenience. They must expect, when they travel either for pleasure or business, to be waylaid at their hotels and in their journeys, by constant applications for pardons, and expect to share in the annoyance and inconvenience of the hue and cry raised against the Governor in the exercise of this the most important duty of his office, and I take it this hunting down, this pursuit and importunity of the Governor, which disturbs his peace and confuses his mind, will cease. Your committee purposes to transfers to four officials the responsibility of this duty, and designate them in the Constitution as the persons who shall first examine and report upon the pardons, and then the Executive will not be troubled to grant or refuse pardons, until he is requested by them in writing to do so; and the reasons given for this recommendation, and even then I would keep the dignity of the office, so high that the Governor can refuse to grant a pardon. This section of the article was very fully considered by the committee, and it met the entire approbation of every member of it, and I trust it will meet the approbation of this Convention.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: This section received, at the hands of the Committee on Executive Department, more careful and anxious consideration than perhaps any other, and they have reported it to the Convention after the most careful deliberation. The pardoning power must be vested somewhere, and ought to be vested where it can be easily reached and shall be most carefully exercised. The committee has, in this section, endeavored to surround it with what they believe to be necessary and safe restrictions. The persons who are here appointed are required not only to act with great deliberation and care, but it is imposed upon them that they shall express, in writing, the reasons which have influenced their judgment, and that a permanent record shall be made in the department, not only of the pardon, but of all the reasons that have been given for granting it. This action of the persons designated is advisory only and not conclusive. It is still left in the discretion of the Executive to grant the pardon or to withhold it, as he may deem best. We believe that the power has been carefully and sufficiently guarded against abuse, and that at the same time it has not been placed so high as to be out of the reach of those for whom it ought to be properly exercised. I will not detain the committee by any farther discussion of the question. I rose only to state, that after the most anxious consideration, the report, as it stands, received the unanimous approbation of the committee, and we hope it may commend itself to the favorable judgment of the House.

Mr. JOHN R. REED. Mr. Chairman: In offering my substitute I was actuated by the purest motives. I did not wish to make any hypocritical criticism of the report of the Committee on the Executive Department; but I did not suppose, from a careful reading of the amendment which they had offered to the Convention, that they had provided the best means for granting pardons. The report of the committee, in some respects, commends itself to my judgment, but in others I think it could be amended with advantage. It provides that the power to grant pardons is still reposed in the Governor. With that we can find no fault. To be sure, before any pardon shall be granted he shall have, in writing, the recommendation of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, the Attorney General, the Superintendent of Public Instruction, the Secretary of Internal Affairs, or any three of them. Now who does not know, as I said before, how easy it is to get the recommendation of a public officer to another public officer to do this or that, as the person recommending desires him to do? Two of the persons alluded to in this report are officers appointed by the Governor himself. One of them only is elected by the people. We all know that most of the pardons that have been granted in this Commonwealth, within the few years last past, have been made upon the recommendations of public spirited citizens, both in private life and in public life, by members of the Legislature, by district attorneys and by other prominent citizens. Yet we all know how that power has been grossly abused, and it is not necessary for me, on the floor of this Convention, to allude to instances that have been particularly mentioned during the debates of this Convention.

These are some of the considerations which in good faith induced me to offer my substitute. I am not, however, so wedded to it as when I find that the sentiment of this Convention is not in favor of any particular change, as to insist upon its being put before them; and as the Committee on the Executive Department seem to be determined about it, and as they have no doubt given it a careful consideration, and as they may have had before them the very proposition which I submitted to this committee, I shall withdraw my substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute is withdrawn. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend as follows: By striking out all after the word "impeachment," and inserting the following:

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments pending.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I ask permission of the Convention to say a single word, inasmuch as I offered this amendment, my whole object is to test—

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I did not hear the amendment; I would like to have it read.

The CLERK: The amendment is to strike out the words, "Secretary of the Commonwealth Attorney General, Superintendent of Public Instruction, Secretary of Internal Affairs, or any three of them," and insert "the Auditor General and the State Treasurer."

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: The single word I desire to say to the Convention is this: I offered this amendment. I do not press particularly for any special shape of putting it in, but I offered it for the purpose of testing the sense of the Convention upon the general proposition of leaving to the Executive the unrestricted power of pardon; because I take it that inasmuch as two members of the advisory board, with the Governor, must constitute the majority of the pardoning tribunal, that practically the power is left just where it is. In any case, where there is any public clamor or any political force or power brought to bear upon the officers of the government to exercise the pardoning power in a particular case, in all these instances the officers appointed by the Governor, who are to advise him in this regard, will, by rumor and common gossip, know exactly what influences are brought to bear, and will know what effect those influences will be likely to have in another quarter. Therefore, though there will be no concert of action, there is that esprit du corps, that feeling that exists, and is well known to exist, in these cases, which will enable each officer, in any case of moment, to know how the others will be affected. So that I say, practically, to my mind this leaves the pardoning power just where it is now; and I am strengthened, Mr. Chairman, in that view of the question by the remarks of the distinguished gentleman who sits on my left, the chairman of the committee, (Mr. Curtin,) because his argument, to my mind, is not so much an argument in favor of this particular form of an Executive council, but it is an argument against all restrictions on the Executive; not so much in favor of the detail, but against the principle embodied in this very report; and therefore I take it that the proposition comes up fair and square before the Convention on this amendment whether they will really and substantially restrict the Executive by joining with him those who are in no way subject to his influence, but who come direct from the people, or whether we shall let him name his own advisers.

It has been suggested that the accounting officers of the government are not the proper persons to share with the Governor the clemency of the State on account of the nature of their duties. I conceive that the other officers, who in the committee desire to join with him, are equally, in the nature of things, remote from a court of pardons, and that the duties of their offices are as incompatible with the exercise of the power of a court of pardons as would be those of the Auditor General or State Treasurer. There is nothing in that objection. These two officers are quite as suitable as advisers to the Governor as the others named. The question before this Convention is, whether they will restrict the power of the Governor, or whether they will appoint the semblance of a council, which has no existence in point of effect, as a check upon the exercise of the prerogative of mercy.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: The gentleman who has just taken his seat seems to be in error in his entire presentation of the question. He is all wrong in the premises of his speech. He has assumed what is not in the section at all. He says that the Governor would, under this report, substantially have the control of the pardoning power in his own hands. The simple fact is that the matter is taken partially, and in the initiatory stage entirely, out of the hands of the Governor, and referred to four officers distinctly and specifically named, the Secretary of the Commonwealth, the Attorney General, the Superintendent of Public Instruction and the Secretary of Internal Affairs, three of whom, sir, have to sign a recommendation to the Governor before he can touch it at all. He has nothing to do with it until after the thing gets into the hands of the officers who must examine into the matter and recommend it to him, and the whole argument of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Newlin,) based upon false premises, therefore falls to the ground.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: There are two widely divergent opinions on this subject. One is that no limitation or restriction whatsoever should be placed upon the Executive, but that the section should be left as it stands in the present Constitution. To gentlemen that entertain that opinion, I shall not attempt to offer any argument. I feel satisfied that a change is demanded by public opinion. Now, assuming that some change is demanded, where shall the power of recommendation or of pardoning be lodged? There are several theories upon this subject. You may place it in a tribunal purely judicial; you may delegate it to a board of commissioners, specially chosen with reference to this subject, or you may attempt to place it, as is attempted in this tenth section, in the hands of a body of public servants, who are supposed, from position and from previous training, to be entirely competent to give advice to the Executive upon the subject.

Now let us consider the first two modes. I feel a deep conviction myself that the very moment you impose upon the judiciary any functions apart from the distribution of justice according to law, you impair their efficiency and ultimately break them down. Why is it that we have the painful contrast, drawn more than once in our debates, between other bodies connected with the government and the judiciary? Simply because the judiciary attend to the duties exclusively devolved upon them; and the moment you fasten upon them other duties, to that extent you injure them. As was said by the chairman of this committee, when the judge has pronounced the ultimate judgment of the law, his function with the case is, or ought to be, ended forever. If there are good reasons for a modification of the judgment, they ought not to be addressed to him who is, or who ought to be, as we say proverbially, blind.

But you may delegate this power to a body of commissioners specially selected for the purpose. There are two objections to this: One is, you create a new body of officers, who must be paid for their services, and to the extent of their being paid you impose upon the public treasury an additional burden. Perhaps that is not a very strong objection, if their work could be done efficiently. What particular guarantee have you, however, that by electing or appointing four, or six, or ten commissioners, you get a better body than the body named in this article? You want men of character, men of intelligence, and men of a certain amount of experience. You not only want such men, but you want men who sympathize, measurably, with the people's feelings. Do you think, apart from the question of additional compensation, that you are more likely to get so good a board as by taking the four that are offered by this section? Who are they? Two of them come directly from the people, by election. One of them is the Secretary of Internal Affairs, who, it will be observed, by reference to a section a little lower down, must be a man of pretty broad mind and large experience, if he is at all competent to discharge the duties imposed upon him. The other is the Superintendent of Public Schools, necessarily, to a considerable extent, a trained man—necessarily a man of character—necessarily a man familiar with the youth of the Commonwealth. Upon one point my colleague from Philadelphia (Mr. Newlin) fell into an error; these gentlemen are not appointees of the Governor—they are not subject to his influence—directly or indirectly.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I hope the gentleman will permit himself to be interrupted just a moment. I desire to say that both my colleague from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle) and the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) have misunderstood the purport of my remarks. They have accused me—

Mr. BIDDLE. Oh, I make no accusation.

Mr. NEWLIN. I understand that. They have, I should prefer to say, suggested that I have not properly considered the phraseology of this section. It is true that this "advisory board" is composed of four members, and that it requires a majority to recommend a pardon to the Executive; and that without this it cannot ever come before him for action. What I contend for is this: Two of the four are appointees of the Executive and subject to the influence of which I have spoken. They are in favor of what? Simply of submitting the application for pardon to the Executive, with their formal assent. The third man can be readily got by the very plausible argument that this is not a granting of the pardon, but simply a decision in favor of permitting the case to go before the Governor for the exercise of his discretion upon his own responsibility.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I will answer here the objections of one gentleman which are entitled to weight. He thinks that the Superintendent of Public Instruction is not an elective officer. If he turns to section twenty-two he will find that these officers, the Secretary of Internal Affairs and the Superintendent of Public Instruction, "shall be chosen by the electors."

Mr. NEWLIN. I never said they were not.

Mr. BIDDLE. No; but another gentleman came to me while you were making your suggestions and mentioned that. It would be a very valid objection, but it does not exist. I should like to know why these two men—I do not speak now of the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Commonwealth—are not as well qualified as the two gentlemen suggested by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Newlin.) He suggests the Auditor General and the State Treasurer. Now, assuming that they are men of equal character, standing and experience, for their respective offices—which I feel bound to assume—I do say that the particular duties entrusted to the Auditor General and Treasurer of the Commonwealth have not the slightest relation to the question now before the Convention, whilst the duties imposed upon the other two officers, also elective, have some general connection with it. The first are purely the fiscal officers of the Commonwealth; the second have a general supervision of its economic affairs and of its education; and if you are to take two existing elective officers, I do not know any two better qualified.

In addition to that you have the law officer of the Commonwealth, appointed by the Governor; and his own Secretary. Is it possible that these men thus appointed will be no better than a mere body of petitioners, without any duty imposed upon them, without any obligation resting upon them, in recommending the pardon of a person?

There can be only two valid reasons for a pardon. There may be indirect reasons—there may be suppositions and assumptions; but there can be only two really valid reasons for a pardon. One is, where innocence is discovered after conviction. I suppose we would all agree that a pardon could not be granted too soon, after such a discovery as this. The other is, where there are extenuating circumstances. These circumstances may arise sometimes from the age, sometimes from the sex, and sometimes from the associations and surroundings of a criminal; he or she may have been made a tool of by others, or some other extenuating circumstance may enter into the case which commends it to consideration.

The guarantee you have for proper action on the part of this board is found in these facts: That these men live in the public gaze; two of them are elected and two appointed. Their reasons are obliged to be given to the Executive in writing. This is certainly an additional guarantee, but it is not all. They might be given in writing and they might be thrust aside, where they would never be seen. But this section requires further that they shall be filed, and, in addition, that a permanent record be made of them, which I presume means transcription into a book. These reasons, therefore, if improperly given, will rise in judgment at a future period against these men, and no man who has any regard for self, no man cherishing reputation, will subscribe his name to improper reasons, which will form a part of the records of the Commonwealth.

In addition to this, as was very well said by the chairman of the committee, the Chief Executive is not bound to accede to the request for the pardon. He still reserves his own judgment. He may pardon on this recommendation, but he is not bound to do so.

Now, unless we wish to say one of two things: First, that we desire no change at all, or, second, that we wish a conviction to be irrevocable, and that no circumstance—which is hardly consistent with civilization, not to say christianity—shall ever induce a pardon to be granted to any offender, no matter what the extenuating circumstances may be, I do not see how you are going to do much better. By adopting any of the other plans, I do not see how you remedy the evils pointed out. I see a great many other good points in this plan, which, however, it is hardly worth while developing to the extreme point of development.

The question being upon the amendment of Mr. Newlin, it was rejected.

MR. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I move to strike out "Secretary of the Commonwealth and Attorney General."

The motion was rejected.

MR. HENRY W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the section under consideration, by adding the following words: "No pardon shall be granted except after full hearing in open session, by the persons aforesaid, or a majority of them, of petitioners and exceptants, if such desire to be heard."

The practical operation of this section, if adopted as it stands, might not materially improve the existing state of things. An attorney or agent seeking a pardon would be likely to lay his bundle of petitions, letters and reasons before the officer who happened to be his personal friend, and after securing his signature on personal and friendly grounds, claim the signatures of the other officers named for the reason that one officer had already examined and approved the application. In most cases the reason would not be urged in vain. Members of the pardon board would, from time to time, need favors from each other in the pardon business, and in the end the endorsement of either would be sufficient to secure the rest and obtain from the Governor a pardon. This, we can easily imagine, would prove to be the practical operation of the section.

Should we not guard against such abuse by adopting a proviso requiring an open hearing, before the board, or a majority of them, of the petitioners and exceptants, if such desire to be heard?

Many of the abuses of the pardoning power have sprung from the secrecy attending its exercise. It has not been customary to give notice of the time and place of soliciting a pardon, and undoubtedly many have been granted upon gross misrepresentation, forged letters and petitions. To secure the authorities against fraud, and to afford persons who object an opportunity to be heard, some such provision as that suggested would seem wise.

A further advantage would result in securing the persons named in the section from private importunity. Few men can resist the pleadings of woe-clad women with brimming eyes, and many an improper application has been approved at the behest of mistaken sympathy.

The awful infamies or woeful errors connected with this pardoning business have aroused general public indignation, and if we were not bound by the maxim, "De mortuis nil nisi bonum," a tale might be unfolded which would hasten this Convention on the pathway to reform.

MR. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: The idea embraced in this whole amendment strikes the committee rather favorably. I confess that it meets my personal approbation. I do not entirely like the manner in which it is framed.

MR. H. W. PALMER. I am not at all particular as to the phraseology.

MR. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I have but a word to say in answer to what the gentleman who has just taken his seat has so well said. I am one of those who, if I had it in my power, would entirely leave the responsibility of the pardoning power in the hands of the Executive. It seems to me that the people of the Commonwealth should elect a man to the position of Governor who has the character and the firmness to say no, even at the risk of sacrificing personal friendship, or political support, when his conscience and his judgment tell him he should do so, and I conceive the propriety, the philosophy and wisdom of requiring that this responsibility shall be somewhat divided, and that the character of some other gentlemen, who occupy conspicuous posts in the Commonwealth, shall be put in the scale, and required to support the Governor in every act that he does. In other words, I think it is wise that no pardons shall be granted, as we find things constituted, without they are recommended in writing by a gentleman who occupies the position of Attorney General, Secretary of the Commonwealth, or one of the elective officers.

If I had it in my power, and could make this report de novo, I would not insert the name Superintendent of Public Instruction; I would exclude him. Education is of such a delicate character, so closely identified with the moral status and prosperity of the people of this Commonwealth, that I would not subject that officer to the temptation, which must necessarily follow to those who listen to the eloquent appeals in behalf of convicted scoundrels. I would save this office from that temptation; I find it in the report, however, and shall not attempt to interfere with it.

I think there is much force in the remark of the gentleman from Luzerne, (Mr. H. W. Palmer,) in requiring that this tribunal shall be organized as a board, for the purpose of greater regularity in the performance of their duty, but we are not here for the purpose of codifying laws, and we are to assume that these gentlemen, when they are elevated to their new positions, and clothed with this power, will appreciate the responsibility, and by virtue of their power and of their office, and of their responsibility, will organize themselves into a board, and make their own rules in this regard, to hear parties, publicly, in behalf of pardon. If they fail to do this, if they fail to organize and establish rules for this purpose, it is in the power of the Legislature, after the light of the experience of years, to make a statute to meet this necessity. I would not have this provision in the Constitution; I would let it be as it is, and trust these gentlemen to recognize the propriety of the course. If they fail to do so let the Legislature provide for it by statute.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: After full discussion with my friend from Luzerne, (Mr. H. W. Palmer,) who offered the original amendment, I propose to amend his amendment, by adding after the word "them," "after full hearing of the party, upon due notice and in open session."

Mr. H. W. PALMER. I will accept that modification, and withdraw my amendment.

Mr. GOWEN. Will the gentleman from Lyco (Mr. Armstrong) permit me to suggest the addition of the word "public" after "due?"

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I accept that.

Upon the amendment of Mr. Armstrong a division was called for, and being taken, resulted: Affirmative, sixty; negative, twelve.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHERRY. I now call for the reading of the section as amended.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 10. He shall have power to remit fines and forfeitures, to grant reprieves, commutations of sentence, and pardons, except in cases of impeachment; but only upon the recommendation, in writing, of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, Attorney General, Superintendent of Public Instruction, Secretary of Internal Affairs, or any three of them, after full hearing of the party, upon due public notice and in open session, and such recommendation, with the reasons therefor, at length, shall be recorded and filed in the department.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, by striking out all this section after the word "impeachment," in the third line, and inserting the following:

The CLERK read: "Judges of the Supreme Court shall, from time to time, appoint eight discreet persons, who shall compose the council of pardons. They shall serve without pecuniary compensation, their expenses only being paid by the Treasurer. They shall be convened at the seat of government, whenever required by the Governor. No pardon shall be granted without the consent of at least four of the council, and in no case shall a pardon be granted before conviction."

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I shall ask the attention of the committee for a very few moments. If gentlemen wish to see the substance of this amendment they will find it upon page eighty-three of the "Suggestions."

If there be any question which the people of this Commonwealth have most emphatically expressed their opinion upon, it is that there must be some limitation of the power of pardon. No one who gives any attention to the course of public opinion can close his ears or his eyes to the fact that these-called and supposed abuses of the pardoning power have been so enormous and so great under many administrations that it calls loudly for remedy. I do not pretend to say how far these cries are justified. I have no censure to cast upon any of the preceeding Executives. That is not my business here. It is enough for me to know that there is a thoroughly imbued sentiment in the public mind everywhere; that the power of pardon, in our experience, has been so far abused as to require to be restrained by some other means than those which have heretofore been adopted. Assuming this to be the case, and that I take to be the sentiment of the committee which reported the proposition embodied in the report now under consideration.

If they have proposed to limit the power of the Governor, the question for the Convention to consider is how shall that best be accomplished? Can we safely confide this power to those in intimate and immediate relations with the Executive? Has not the public mind become so poisoned, if you please, with the state of things in and about the Executive Chair in all past time that no confidence will be felt in the limitation which anybody in the vicinity of the Capitol at Harrisburg shall be able to throw around the exercise of that power? Now, whether rightfully or wrongfully, I submit to you such is the admitted fact. There seems to be an entire want of confidence in the pardoning power. I am sorry to admit it, but such is the state of the public mind, and the public mind cannot be satisfied without placing restrictions around the exercise of this power of the Governor. It will be impossible to satisfy the public mind by combining together the very men who are supposed to be connected with the interests of the Executive, and who may partake of the same political opinions. Now can this Convention devise a better plan than the one already in existence? If it is impossible for us to establish a council for the Governor in this body that shall be free from the general taint of public suspicion, we had better abandon our work and return to our homes. If, on the other hand, we can organize a body of men at Harrisburg in whom the public would have confidence it is our duty to do it. I submit that I am ready, for one, to go with any one else here in the Convention in adopting the best plan. I do not pretend to say that the one I have originated is necessarily the best that can be adopted. I can only say that it is the result of my best judgment and consideration. I would not, therefore, entrust the pardoning power to the Executive alone. I would not entrust it to him and to those who surround him, but I would allow him to exercise this power under the limitations and restrictions of other men selected from the various communities in the State. How, then, shall this council be constituted? I have suggested that it shall be constituted by appointments made by the judges of the Supreme Court. While I am opposed, in general, to giving to the judges of our courts any other than judicial functions, yet there are cases in which it seems expedient, because the difficulty that will be experienced in forming this council will be in selecting the men who shall command the entire confidence of the public. The appointees for such a council should be chosen from among those throughout the State in whom there shall be no guile. The men selected should be renowned for their integrity and position in society, and the men above all others to be entrusted with the selection of the members of this council, I think, are the judges of the Supreme Court. This council could be composed of eight, ten, or any number of men, and they could be selected from the neighboring counties around Harrisburg, from Cumberland, York, or Lancaster county, and certainly gentlemen could be found whose characters and integrity are far removed from all suspicion, who would be willing to serve the State of Pennsylvania when called to Harrisburg to discharge a public duty of this kind without pecuniary compensation and upon the mere payment of traveling expenses. I think there would be no difficulty in selecting such a body of gentlemen, who will be ready to devote their time to the public service, and I do not hesitate to say that they can be found in every county. It is not necessary for me indicate who they shall be. Now why should we not trust the judges of our Supreme Court with the power to make these appointments? There is no money in it, to use a popular phrase of the day. There is nothing to be made by these appointments, and there can be no other motive than properly to discharge a public duty; neither would the appointees be influenced by any motive except to discharge their public duty. My friend on the right (Mr. H. W. Smith) might be appointed as one of the members of this council, and who would dare approach him with a bribe, or any gentleman who might be selected from the body of this Convention? The members of this council, when appointed by the judges of our Supreme Court, could assemble at Harrisburg once a month, or oftener if necessary, and the Governor could lay before them all applications for pardons. I would not give to any council, however, the right to pardon, but simply the right to counsel and advise with the Governor when he might be in doubt. I do not know, however, that anything I can say will be listened to by some of the members of this Convention, but it is not of much importance whether it is or not. If gentlemen have no mind to look into this question, or if they have formed their opinions unchangeably, why of course they are as much entitled to them as I am to mine. I do not know that I can instruct the Convention, but I think the question which should commend itself to the individual mind of every member of this body is what is the proper limitation of place upon the pardoning power—on the one hand to guard it from abuse, and on the other hand to aid the Executive in the exercise of that delicate and important trust. I should think that any well constituted mind filling the Executive Chair would be glad to have the advice of a council so selected and so chosen in every case in which he might be called upon to discharge his duty. There is no question but that it is a very high and holy duty. It must rest somewhere, and it cannot rest any where so well as in the hands of the Executive. Whatever difference of opinion may exist in regard to the formation of this council, our opinions concur that there must be a limitation to this pardoning power. I have endeavored to give the reasons I entertain in offering my amendment, but if any plan can be proposed which will accomplish this purpose in a better manner than my amendment contemplates, I shall most cheerfully accept it. The loudest complaints we have heard in reference to the exercise of the pardoning power have been in times of political excitement, when the Governor has assumed to turn loose a man under a recognizance to appear and stand his trial for a criminal offence. I think the wheels of justice should not be obstructed by such unwise exercise of Executive clemency. If a man proves to be not guilty when brought to answer at the bar of justice, be it so. If he proves to be guilty, it will then be time enough for the Executive to interfere with the pardoning power. These remarks contain a brief statement of the principles I entertain in offering my amendment, and I therefore have submitted them for the consideration of the Convention.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Darlington, and the amendment was not agreed to.

MR. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say a few words in regard to this question, and I shall endeavor to be as brief as the importance of the question will permit. The question of the pardoning power in this Commonwealth has attracted a great deal of public attention during the last two or three years. It may be very well in theory, and probably in practice, to admit the fact that mercy is one of the most graceful attributes that can deck the Executive office of this Commonwealth, but at the same time we cannot help admitting that the stream of mercy has flown in such copious volumes during the last two or three years, that if the public can reach this question they will be very apt to take the pardoning power out of the hands of the Executive altogether.

In favor of vesting it with the Executive, that is to say, in favor of vesting it in but one person, there is this powerful argument: That where one person is called upon to perform any public function the sense of responsibility in any well balanced mind is so great that the public is more apt to be protected than when the responsibility is divided among a great number.

In other words, there is no case of responsibility at all attached to the people if they exercise their power by election, for the share that each one bears in the act is so small that it affects him little or nothing. If there is but one man to do it, it is probable that a sense of responsibility will lead him to do his duty. On the other hand the danger to be guarded against is this, that where there is but one person to act, the likelihood or probability of getting a pardon is so great that many people are led, by the ease with which it can be acquired, to seek for a pardon which they would never dare to ask for if they were to attach some publicity to the act of asking. Therefore I think it is well to follow the suggestions of the committee for some advisory board, and I think three or four are enough.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is an objection urged against the report of the committee which is certainly entitled to some weight, and which the amendment of the gentleman from Chester was, I think, intended to cure, and that is this: That this board appointed or suggested by the committee is composed of four people, two of whom are appointed by the Governor himself, and one of whom, the Secretary of the Commonwealth, is in such intimate relations with the Governor as to be almost the Governor himself in many cases, especially in such cases where it is not possible for the Governor to give his own personal attention to the subject. The amendment of the gentleman from Chester, which was voted down, would have cured this; and yet that amendment was accompanied with this, which is to me a very great objection, the objection of vesting in the Supreme Court or in any judicial tribunal of the Commonwealth, for any purpose whatever, except for the administration of justice, in a particular tribunal the appointment of any officers at all. I conceive, as I said before, that nothing can so surely, in the long run, degrade the judiciary of the Commonwealth as to vest in them the power of appointment to office. Reflecting, therefore, upon what has been said, it seems to me that if this section were amended, by striking out the words "Secretary of the Commonwealth," and striking out the word "three," and inserting the word "two," you would then have a board of three persons. Two of them would be elected by the people, over whom the Governor would have no control whatever, the third one would be a member of the bar, by common custom and consent occupying the position which gives to him the leadership of the bar of Pennsylvania, and surely, sir, it cannot be doubted in this Commonwealth that such a man as that, occupying the proud position of Attorney General of the Commonwealth, will be honest in any motive or act of his official position and in the exercise of any pardoning power will be governed only by his sense of right and justice. And the other two are persons elected by the people, with the sense of responsibility which attaches to a position founded upon an election.

I therefore propose to make that amendment, and while I am upon the floor, I desire to say that I propose to suggest another amendment in the shape of a proviso, namely: That no pardon shall be issued prior to the conviction and sentence of the person to whom it is granted, the object being to prevent what we have often seen in this State, and which sometimes may have been granted for most excellent reasons, but which, in my opinion, has been a great abuse—the issuing of a pardon secretly and quietly to a person charged with an offence, who goes into court with the pardon in his pocket, hoping that he may be acquitted, but relying, in case of conviction, upon his pleading the pardon in opposition to his sentence. The amendment I propose, therefore, is this:

To amend, by striking the words "Secretary of the Commonwealth," and by striking out the word "three," and inserting the word "two," and by adding to the section the following proviso:

Provided, That no pardon shall be issued prior to the conviction and sentence of the person to whom it is granted.

In regard to the last proviso there may be many cases, especially in the heat of political excitement in some particular counties of the State, when a person charged with crime may be in danger of conviction on account of political feeling, and in such a case it is proper and right that the man should be pardoned, probably, as quickly as possible after sentence. It can be done the same day. It can be done an hour afterward. But do not let us have the exhibition in our criminal courts of a man coming in before a jury of his countrymen, asking an acquittal, when he knows that he has in his pocket the ammunition that will destroy their conviction.

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: There has been an argument with regard to this matter, based upon the assumption of a fact which has not yet been established by proof. With regard to these officials, I rise not so much to object to the pardoning power being vested in these officers, as for the purpose of forestalling what seems to be regarded as a foregone conclusion, that the Superintendent of Public Instruction is to be elected by the people. That officer; it is provided in one of the sections reported by the Committee on Executive Department, shall be elected by the people. But there is another committee of this body, that I think has just as fairly jurisdiction of this subject as the Committee of Executive Department, and that is the Committee on Education, a report from which has been made, and of which the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) is chairman. In that report we provide that the Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be appointed by the Governor, with the advice and consent of the Senate, I think two-thirds of the Senate agreeing thereto. Now that officer, when he is provided for by the Constitution, when we shall consider upon this subject, it will be time enough for us then to assume the fact he is to be elected by the people. We think that the Committee on the Executive has undertaken to do too much when they have undertaken to provide how the Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be elected, and we think our committee is more appropriate than they to consider that subject, and we recommend that he be appointed by the Governor. We do not think that at all times the people of the Commonwealth are the best qualified to judge of the fitness of a man for that position, or that the people are at all times the proper tribunal in which to repose the selection of such an officer as this, if for no other reason, because they are unfitted to judge of his qualifications. I therefore desire to protest, at this time, against an argument being based on a fact which has not yet been established.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I call for a division of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will be read.

The CLERK: To strike out the words "Secretary of the Commonwealth;" to strike out the word "three" and insert "two," and by adding at the end of the section a proviso, as follows:

"Provided, That no pardon shall be issued prior to the conviction and sentence of the person to whom it is granted."

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I call for a division of the question, to take place at the proviso.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: Before that question is taken, I desire to say that the exercise of the pardoning power is essentially and necessarily the exercise of a discretionary power. It is eminently proper to limit it. It would be disastrous to destroy it. Where you take it away or render its exercise almost impossible you take from the Executive one of the most useful powers with which he invested, and the deprivation of which would be dangerous to personal liberty. The proviso which the gentleman has proposed would take from the Governor the exercise of a power which ought to be vested in his discretion. We cannot foresee all the circumstances which might require the exercise of the pardoning power, even before conviction and sentence. We have already so guarded its exercise that we believe it will not be unwisely nor unfairly exercised, and cannot be used for any other than proper purposes. To say that the Governor shall not pardon at all before sentence, is taking from him a discretionary power, which, under the restrictions of this section, it might be very necessary he should exercise. Guarded as it is, I think it would be unwise to provide that it should not be exercised at all until after sentence.

As to that part of the amendment which proposes to strike out the words "Secretary of the Commonwealth," there should not be any antagonism between the Governor and the persons appointed by this section to consider the question of pardons, and it is eminently right and proper, as it occurred to me, and as it seemed to the committee, that the Governor should have some person in this board of which he is not himself a member, who should represent him, at least in part. It would seem proper that the Governor's views, if he entertained any, upon any particular case, should be expressed before the court of pardons. I think, therefore, that neither of these amendments would improve the section; on the contrary, I think it renders it cumbersome and would exclude the exercise of this discretionary power in many cases in which it ought to be exercised, and which, under the restrictions here provided, will be safely and judiciously exercised.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask the gentleman from Lycoming if it would be right to issue a pardon in a case before conviction?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I could imagine very many such.

Mr. DARLINGTON. What are they?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: It would be a very unwise way of legislating on a question of this importance, to propound an inquiry on the floor and ask for a horse-back opinion. I might not, at this moment, be prepared to give instances, but one has occurred to me in Lycoming county, which Gov. Curtin will well remember, in which a large number were charged with riot in times of great political excitement. Warrants were issued against some eight or ten persons, who would have been put on trial, when it was plain to all impartial persons that the entire proceedings were malicious, and closely akin to malicious prosecution. And I can readily conceive that many instances might occur when, from the malice of the prosecutor, by the easy process of swearing out a warrant, persons plainly appearing, after commitment, to be innocent, might be, as often has been done, placed upon trial, when justice would require that they should not be subjected to any such public disgrace as a criminal prosecution always and necessarily involves. I can very readily imagine many such instances, in which I believe the pardoning power ought to be, and under the restrictions of this bill, would be, wisely exercised before conviction.

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman will permit me, I desire to express one thought upon this subject of pardon before conviction. Is not every man put upon trial, for any crime, presumed to be innocent until proved guilty? And if presumed innocent, upon what is the pardon to rest?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: Of course every man charged with crime is presumed to be innocent until convicted; but when convicted the sentence of the law is imposed upon him, and he suffers for the crime of which he has been adjudged to be guilty. But before conviction there is another punishment, and a severe one, which rests in public sentiment and in the popular presumptions of guilt which too frequently attach to the mere accusation. Nor is such punishment to be lightly regarded. On the contrary there are many cases in which the person accused is subjected to harsh, unreasonable, and very frequently unjust, accusations, and, under proper restrictions, it would seem reasonable that he should be relieved promptly, instead of being subjected to the successful malevolence of an enemy. When such instances occur, it would be in the highest degree advisable, under the recommendation, say, of the board, which must recommend the exercise of this discretionary power, and without which it cannot be extended to any case whatever. It is a conservative power, to be exercised in the interests of public justice, public order, public peace and private happiness. The power to release against oppression should be clear, and its exercise prompt in proper cases. There should be as much reliance upon the clemency of the government as upon its justice, and both should be exercised with equal regard to the rights of the citizen and the peace of the community. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. J. N. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: The section has now, through the amendments offered, got into bad shape, and in order that the committee may have an opportunity of examining it further, in connection with the amendments, I move that the committee of the whole do now rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. President: The committee of the whole has had under consideration the article reported by the Committee on the Executive Department, and has instructed its chairman to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Leave was granted.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. President: I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention then, at two o'clock and forty-eight minutes, adjourned.

FIFTY-EIGHTH DAY.

WEDNESDAY, March 5, 1873.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M., the President, Hon. Wm. M. Meredith, in the chair.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. James W. Curry.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. PARSONS presented a petition from citizens of Williamsport, praying for the insertion of a clause in the Constitution prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE presented a petition from citizens of Allegheny county, praying for the insertion of a similar provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. DARLINGTON presented a petition from the Longwood monthly meeting of Progressive Friends, praying for the insertion of a similar provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition from the citizens of Luzerne county, praying for the insertion of a similar provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

DIVISION OF COUNTIES.

Mr. PARSONS presented the petition of Hon. A. C. Bush, of Tioga county, remonstrating against any change being made in the Constitution in relation to creating new counties or dividing old ones, which was referred to the Committee on Counties, Towns and Townships.

SENATORIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. BAER offered the following resolution, which was read and referred to the Committee on Legislation:

Resolved, That the Committee on Legislation be requested to take into consideration the propriety of reporting a section which shall substantially provide:

I. That the State shall be divided into six Senatorial districts, upon the basis of population, of which Philadelphia shall always be one.

II. Each district shall elect six Senators. Each voter shall vote for not more than four persons, and the six persons highest in vote shall be declared elected.

III. The House of Representatives shall consist of two hundred members, to be elected from districts based upon population.

IV. Districts shall be formed of compact and contiguous territory.

THE LEGISLATURE.

Mr. BROOMALL offered the following, which was read and referred to the Committee on the Legislature:

The General Assembly shall apportion the State for the election of Senators and Representatives according to population, as ascertained by the last preceding census, every ten years, commencing at the first session after the adoption of this Constitution. Senators and Representatives shall be chosen in single districts of contiguous territory, and, as nearly as possible, of equal population, the boundaries being county or city lines where practicable, otherwise by township or ward lines. The number of Senators shall be thirty-three, and the number of Representatives one hundred.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HAY asked and obtained leave of absence for himself for a few days.

Mr. DARLINGTON asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Hemphill for a few days.

EXECUTIVE ARTICLE.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. Woodward in the chair, for the further consideration of the article reported from the Committee on the Executive.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the pending section and amendments.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 10. He shall have power to remit fines and forfeitures; to grant reprieves, commutations of sentences and pardons, except in cases of impeachment.

but only upon the recommendation, in writing, of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, Attorney General, Superintendent of Public Instruction, Secretary of Internal Affairs, or any three of them, after full hearing of the parties upon due public notice and in open session, and such recommendation, with the reasons therefor at length, shall be recorded and filed in the department.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) moved to strike out "Secretary of the Commonwealth," and strike out "three," in the fifth line, and insert "two."

The gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) called for a division of the amendment, and the immediate question before the committee is upon the first part of the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen.)

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the amendment, by inserting in lieu of the words stricken out, "the ex-Governors of this Commonwealth." The motive will be to add those gentlemen to the pardoning board. I am in entire accord with this section. I believe it is the judgment of the committee, that in the main the section is a necessary one. The developments that have been made in the last two or three years, the dissatisfaction with the matter of pardons, show that in justice to the Executive of the Commonwealth, something of this kind is necessary to satisfy the public demand. But I apprehend there are very few delegates who are quite satisfied with the officers named in this section to co-operate with the Governor, and advise with him upon this subject. I therefore make the motion to add to them the distinguished gentlemen who have filled the office of Governor.

This is not my own idea. The proposition was submitted to the Convention in the early part of its session by a distinguished member of the bar, representing the Dauphin district. I claim no credit for the idea, therefore; but when I heard it announced it struck me as the most satisfactory proposition that had been made or has been made to the Convention at any time upon this subject.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman: Will the gentleman allow himself to be interrupted?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BOWMAN. In case there should be no ex-Governor, what would be done?

Mr. MANN. The section will not be affected. It provides for certain other officers, any two of whom can make the recommendation required. The addition which the amendment proposes to make will not interfere in any way with the successful operation of this section; but it is hardly probable that we shall ever be in the condition of having no ex-Governor. We have three now living, in the prime of life, and I believe any delegate, who for a moment refers to these gentlemen, will be satisfied that this is a wise proposition. They have had great experience upon this very question; they were selected because of the confidence which the people reposed in them, and they will, necessarily, always be entirely independent of the Executive, sustaining no such intimate relations with him as could, in any way, affect their judgment upon propositions pending. They would be, Mr. Chairman, the most independent board we could select. They would be selected without any machinery, without any action on the part of the people. They would come naturally and properly to the discharge of these duties, because their attention had been given to them for years. They would have all the information upon this question of pardon of crimes that is possible for any gentleman to have, and in addition to that, it would be paying a proper respect to the gentlemen who have been called to exercise the duty of the Governor of this Commonwealth; and I have no doubt, should this amendment be adopted, and the section become part of the Constitution, we would forever remove this question of pardon from all suspicion of improper influences being brought to bear upon the Executive.

I feel great confidence that the adoption of this amendment would lift this question of the pardoning power out of all suspicion, and remove it from all the unpleasant rumors that we have heard for the last few years.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is doubtful whether the amendment of the gentleman is at present in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: There is a motion to strike out, and I move to insert.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is this: The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) moved an amendment with two parts. The gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) called for a division of that amendment, and that brought us to the question of the first part of the motion of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Gowen,) which is, to strike out "Secretary of the Commonwealth." The Chair now understands that the motion of the gentleman from Potter (Mr. Mann) is, not to strike out "Secretary of the Commonwealth" and insert "ex-Governors," but to add "ex-Governors" to "Secretary of the Commonwealth and other officers."

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) moves to strike out; I move to amend, by inserting.

The CHAIRMAN. But you do not move to strike out.

Mr. MANN. I have a right to move to amend a motion to strike out by moving to insert in place of the words to be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The opinion of the Chair is that the motion of the gentleman from Potter (Mr. Mann) will be in order if the committee shall vote down this amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia, but that in the present posture of the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Gowen,) the Chair is of the opinion that the motion of the gentleman from Potter (Mr. Mann) is not in order.

Mr. MANN. I am then placed in this position: There is a motion to strike out "Secretary of the Commonwealth." I desire to vote in favor of that proposition; but suppose it is voted down? Then I cannot make the motion which I desire to make. I want to make a motion to strike out "Secretary of the Commonwealth," and insert in place thereof, "the ex-Governors." How am I to reach that end in any other way than the one which I am now striving for? If the motion to strike out is defeated, it precludes my motion to strike out and insert.

The CHAIRMAN. It precludes a motion to strike out, but it does not preclude a motion to strike out and insert, which is the substance and essence of the gentleman's motion.

Mr. MANN. I understand that; but I take it that every member has a right to have his motion in that form, to strike out the "Secretary of the Commonwealth," and insert in the place of that. I think that motion will be stronger than to insert it as a separate proposition. However, I waive my own opinion and accept that of the Chair.

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. Chairman: I have listened to the discussion that has been had upon this section yesterday and this morning, and to the suggestions that have been made. They have failed to satisfy me that we shall be able very materially to improve this section as it stands now, with the amendment adopted yesterday at the suggestion of the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer.) It seems to me to have been well considered in all its bearings, and constituted in such a manner as will give confidence to the public that those questions which arise upon the granting of pardons will be considered and not hastily disposed of.

Now the proposition of the gentleman from Potter, (Mr. Mann,) to add ex-Governors to it, it seems to me, would be only to make it cumbersome and inconvenient, as well as open to the objection that it must impose an additional expense. As at present constituted, a leading feature that the committee had in view, in framing this section, was evidently convenience and economy, as well as promptitude of action. The board is composed of officers already elected and at the seat of government; therefore, whenever an application for pardon came before them it could be readily considered and disposed of, and without adding to the expenses of the Commonwealth. To ask the ex-Governors to go to the capital of the State and sit there in session, as provided for in this section, to examine these cases, from time to time, without compensation, would be unreasonable.

So that one view which the committee had in making this economic would be frustrated. These gentlemen would of necessity be called there from time to time. They might have a case under consideration one day, go home the next, and some poor mortal who may be under sentence of death would require their attendance immediately again, to consider his case before he should be launched into eternity. It would put upon those gentlemen an exceedingly unpleasant and onerous duty, to which, doubtless, they would strongly object. This, to my mind, is a serious and conclusive objection. The other arguments which have been presented, in relation to the constitution of this board, have been so fully gone into that I will not take up time to repeat them. It seems to me that we should do well to take this section as it stands, and adopt it.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) very objectionable, that the pardoning power cannot be exercised before conviction. There are cases of that kind where the pardoning power is necessary. Take cases of riot and of insurrection. It might be a very salutary power for the Governor to exercise the pardoning power by a general proclamation. This proviso would prevent the exercise of that power in a case of that kind; and I think it would be very doubtful policy for the committee of the whole to adopt that second division of the amendment.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: What is the precise question upon which the Convention is now to be called upon to vote?

The CHAIRMAN. That the words "Secretary of the Commonwealth" be stricken out from the third and fourth lines, and the word "three," in the fifth line, be changed to "two."

Mr. ARMSTRONG. That is the first division?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

The question being upon the first division of the amendment, it was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the second division of the amendment, that no pardon shall be granted before conviction.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: Is it competent, at this time, to discuss the question? The committee have not been heard from as fully on this point as they would probably like to be, and I trust the Convention will hear the chairman of the committee (Mr. Curtin) on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair believes the question open for discussion.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman: I did not desire to intrude upon the Convention again on the article reported from the Committee on the Executive Department, but the change proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Gowen,) and embodied in the amendment now before the Convention, is, in my judgment, one of such grave importance as should demand the serious consideration of every member of this body. It is to take from the Governor the power of pardon before conviction and sentence.

It is quite true that what is called "previous pardoning" is by no means free from abuse, and the Executive who has the courage to exercise that power generally falls under the displeasure of a large portion of the people, and always the denunciation of the press. I doubt very much whether that power has been often abused; and of all the official functions given to a citizen under our form of government, notwithstanding all that has been said, and the current of abuse and denunciation which has been running for many years against the Executive for the exercise of that power, I do not believe there is any delegated authority or official function less abused than it has been.

For when a man who has the pardoning power approaches its exercise, conscious of its delicacy and alive to the criticisms which will follow, his act will be cautious, and, after all, sir, we must trust men. You may put into your Constitution whatever restraints you can devise and give expression to your disapprobation of the abuse of the pardon in the most positive words the English language affords. You may surround the Executive with threatened pains and penalties, trammel him with restraints and restrictions on his legitimate and necessary powers; nay, you may create armies, if you please, to see that the people are protected in their just rights, and to compel the Executive of the State to perform his duties, and to restrain him from violating or exceeding his duties, and yet we come down, after all, to the plain, practical fact that in our form of government, and indeed in every government upon earth, you must trust men; and all men are alike, mortal and may err. If the men you place in power abuse their trust, our form of government provides the means of getting clear of them. Our prosperity is so marvelously great, and our people are so enlightened, that the ingeniously devised machinery of government runs on, notwithstanding it may sometimes be badly administered. You must have an Executive, and when you elect a citizen to the high position of chief Executive Magistrate of your State, and give him the pardoning power at all, he may abuse it, and it is possible it has been abused, but not to the extent commonly charged, and in a large measure believed by the body of the people. In fifty cases out of every hundred, however, where pardons are granted, your Executive is abused, and no one halts to ask if he has not been imposed upon by his friends, and those who have pecuniary interest in obtaining pardons or those who have some relationship to the prisoner, or special interest in case.

You give your Governor the pardoning power; therefore the power to exercise mercy; and clothed with this beneficent attribute of Government, the properly constituted man will take care that he does not violate his conscience when he is to answer to that monitor in the exercise of a high official authority, and if he is not to have the power to pardon, or if it be not lodged in some official—in some part of the government—then the office of Governor ceases to be of dignity; and you turn away from the mercy side of humanity, and your form of government in this respect will be tyrannical and barbarous. You will suffer courts and juries to inflict punishment; and whether the citizen accused be convicted by mistake from some local excitement, prejudice or jealousy, by any of the passions which so fill the human breast, you turn yourselves away from humanity, and you deprive your fellow-citizens of a positive natural right—the right to demand mercy from man as he can pay for it to God. An Executive may err, it is true, in exercising this power of pardon, but if he errs in exercising that power, he has the sweet consolation of knowing that he is using that beautiful attribute—that sweet inspiration of the human heart, the most precious gift of Providence—mercy! Mercy to a fellow-being, mercy to the poor, mercy, especially, to the poor unfortunate man who may have been convicted of, or charged with, crime by the designing and the cruel, the wicked and the powerful.

Now, Mr. Chairman, how often has it occurred in your experience in life, as a member of the bar—why it has occurred in the experience of the youngest member of the bar holding the honor of a seat in this Convention—that a man is arrested and imprisoned, charged with crime, and his accuser seeks to punish him by the accusation and imprisonment before trial, without the slightest expectation that the trial will result in conviction. He has his personal revenge to gratify. Would it be proper to leave the State without the power to relieve a man thus imposed upon? That is one of the evils in the contemplation of the Constitution when it grants the power of “previous pardon.” You suffer citizens to be arrested and incarcerated in times of high political excitement, against whom there may be prejudice, against whom a hue and cry has perhaps been raised, founded on falsehood and pursued with malice, and if they have committed no act to warrant such incarceration, it is eminently proper that the Executive should be appealed to for relief. It is to meet such and kindred cases that the power of “previous pardon” is granted. If you take away the right to pardon before trial you take away from this section of the article on the Executive department one of the essential attributes of the pardoning power.

It is to be noticed that before the Executive can pardon a criminal, as proposed in this section, the application is to be considered and examined by the gentleman we have named in connection with the Executive department. Now, Mr. Chairman, full one-half the applications for pardon in the State of Pennsylvania are made on account of the character of the sentence. I read in the newspapers the other day that four men were sentenced to the penitentiary for a term of two years and a half, having been found guilty of keeping some kind of a gambling saloon in this city. I have no doubt of the integrity of the court in pronouncing that sentence, and there can be no question that that learned and enlightened court, in sentencing those criminals, believed the sentence was just, but will any member of this Convention tell me that the newspaper clamor and the public excitement on the arrest of these men had nothing to do with influencing the mind of that court in passing a sentence so much heavier than the crime seemed to demand? I venture to say before a year runs around, the jury that tried these men, the newspapers that made the attack, and many virtuous and intelligent people of this city will unite in an application to the Executive to grant a pardon to these men, on the ground that the sentence was too severe for the crime, and it is in such cases as these that the pardoning power should be exercised. Courts err as well as the Executive, and the power that sentences does not always measure the crime, and it is for this reason many, very many, applications for pardon are made, and this tribunal is proposed to be created. By the committee full and just consideration can be given to all applications for release. If the Executive cannot be trusted with the exercise of this power we had better abolish the office. I was surprised to hear the amendment of my friend from Potter county (Mr. Mann) read by the Clerk. I have been speaking of mercy, and I hope that gentleman will be a little merciful. A man who has passed through the pardon mill would like to be in peace the remainder of his life, and when Executives have held the pardoning power and have been subjected to criticism, abuse and misrepresentation, when they have retired from their office,

I beg the gentleman, my good friend, do not persecute them to their graves, for while a man may have held that important trust to the satisfaction of the State in all other respects, he shivers as if he was in the cold shower after a hot Russian bath, when he thinks of the annoyance he suffered through the exercise of the pardoning power, and threatened with it again. If you want ex-Governors to live, in the name of mercy do not place this burden upon them. There are three ex-Governors now living, and I do not think either of them would live under the persecution they would be compelled to endure. I hope, therefore, the gentleman from Potter (Mr. Mann) will withdraw his amendment, and that the section will then be adopted as it is reported by the committee. The section was fully considered by the committee, and I do think has preserved in that section of the article the only means of securing the impartial exercise of this power of the Executive. Mr. Chairman, I regret that some one proposes for me to address the committee again upon this question. I am obliged to the committee for its indulgence, and shall not trouble them again.

MR. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman : I am very well aware that the discussion of this question has been quite full, and I have not desired to occupy the time of the Convention, and had it not been for some remarks addressed to the Convention by the last speaker (Mr. Curtin) I should not have said a word in regard to this section. It is very natural that a gentleman, situated like the distinguished chairman of this committee, should be desirous to speak upon this subject, and, I think, he more fully comprehends the subject than any member of the Convention. I infer, however, from the gentleman's argument, that he would, if he had the individual power, continue the pardoning power in the Executive alone. I say that this seems to be the force of the gentleman's argument. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I understand the feeling of the people of this country in regard to this question, not only within the limits of our own State, but in almost all the States of this Union, and under the general government, it is that there ought to be some restraint upon this power which has been abused. It will not do for the gentleman who has just spoken, or anybody else, to say that the pardoning power has not been abused in this State, in the State of New York, and under the general government. Why, much has been said in this Convention, by gentlemen of distinguished ability, against the President of the United States for having abused this power within the last few months, and it is only recently that he has been censured for having pardoned a most miserable scoundrel named Brown, who repeated at a late election in this city. When I was in Washington, the other day, I found, just as my friend, Mr. Curtin, has said, the President had been imposed upon in the same manner as Governors of this State have been imposed upon, but still this is no argument against the propriety of limiting this pardoning power. I found, in Washington, that a democratic member of the House of Representatives, a most distinguished and upright man, had been endeavoring, week after week, to introduce a resolution before that body, calling upon the Attorney General and the President to produce the papers which accompanied the pardon, and the reasons why the pardon was granted. "Why," said that member of Congress, "I do not desire to implicate the President in anything that was wrong in granting that pardon. I want to exonerate him." He said he knew that the Attorney General had been imposed upon, and that the President usually referred such cases to that official, as happened to be done in this particular instance. Upon inquiry, I learned that gentlemen of standing in this city, whose names I do not know, and I would not repeat if I did, went to Washington and laid the papers containing the application, with forged names attached, before the Attorney General. The Attorney General, who is a very just and upright man, and of decided ability, doubtless sent the papers to the President, who, after an examination of the recommendations and the request positively made, pardoned Mr. Brown. The pardon ought not to have been granted, but it was granted, and only obtained by means of a fraud practiced upon the Attorney General and the President.

Now I have mentioned these facts in justification of the President, because he has been referred to by my colleague from Washington, (Mr. Hopkins,) who is not present in the Convention on account of illness, and by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Gowen,) who censured the President severely, the other day, for granting this very pardon. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Executive Department (Mr. Curtin) has, himself, admitted that the Executive of this State has been occasionally imposed upon, but these facts and instances of the unwise exercise of the pardoning power do not form an argument against its limitation.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that there is a wide-spread sentiment, all over this country, prevailing in the public mind that this pardoning power ought to be restrained. Why, sir, has not this power been abused in New York? It is well known that Governor Hoffman, who is a man of decided ability, has been traduced and censured because he exercised this power probably too often; and now you will read in the papers of to-day that that stern old patriot, Governor Dix, of New York, is in the city of New York conferring with some of the judges about the propriety of pardoning Foster, who was convicted of murder. Governor Dix has refused to pardon some of the criminals in that State; and we must conclude that it will not do to look only to the side of mercy in such cases. Why, I recollect when the chairman of this committee was Governor of the State of Pennsylvania I went to him and sought a pardon for a man in my county, who had been convicted of arson. I narrated the circumstances to the Governor, how the crime had been committed at the instigation of others and through whisky, and the Governor pardoned him. Now he is one of the best citizens in our county. He is an upright, honest man, sustaining his family in the western part of the county, and he exhibits his gratitude on all occasions by voting for Governor Curtin ever since, as he does for your humble servant; so that I do not say that there are not cases wherein this pardoning power may be properly exercised. I would not remove it entirely from the Executive, but I say it ought to be restrained; and when I arose I intended to say that I congratulate the committee in presenting the very best board that could possibly be preselected under the Constitution. This power must either be committed to one man or to several men, and the committee proposes to constitute a board composed of officials already in office; but as my friend from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) who is very prolific in his imagination, yesterday proposed to amend the section by giving the Governor the power to appoint a board, consisting of eight or ten persons, —

Mr. DARLINGTON. No; I proposed giving the power to the Supreme Court.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Well, I concurred with the Convention in voting down the amendment, as I think our courts should not be encumbered with any such duty; but I thought there was something honest in the proposition, because, coming from a Quaker neighborhood, it is not to be supposed the gentleman could be influenced in any way. [Laughter.] I admit, Mr. Chairman, that there is force in the argument presented by the gentleman from the city (Mr. Gowen) yesterday, in reference to the motion which he made, to strike out the words, "Secretary of the Commonwealth," in the section, for he is an officer directly under the control of the Governor, and will almost invariably obey what the Governor dictates, and vice versa the Governor may obey what the Secretary of the Commonwealth dictates. There is much force in the argument used by the gentleman, but it is a question in my mind whether you can devise a more suitable board for the purpose named in the section than by constituting it in the manner devised by the committee. The pardoning power must be placed somewhere, and as it is impossible to destroy it altogether, or remove it entirely away from the Executive, the committee have proposed to entrust the power with the Governor, the Attorney General, the Commissioner of Public Instruction, &c., and then the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer) has suggested that the hearing of applications for the granting of pardons must be in open court, or in other words, "openly." I think, however, this suggestion may be attended with serious personal difficulty to some poor men who may be applicants for pardon; but still, after all, it is the better plan if it is designed to throw additional safeguards around the pardoning power. I do not charge the gentleman from Centre (Mr. Curtin) with having abused the pardoning powers, and I do not desire him to so understand my remarks. I do not know that he ever did, although he has been charged with so doing, as well as his successor; and I think if the history of pardons which have been granted improperly in this State could be examined, it would be found that they were obtained through the influence of the friends of the Governor, or as has been remarked, through imposition or an error in his judgment. This is precisely the trouble. We are naturally kind-hearted, and we do not desire to occasion an injury to any person, and we many times suffer our friends to advise with us in matters of charity. I remember Governor Geary, a short time before his death, told me that he received as many as twenty-five applications for pardon in one day, and that he considered their attention involved more inconvenience and annoyance than any other duty of his office, and I think Governor Curtin will testify to the same effect. The section which the committee proposes, if it is adopted, will relieve the Governor, in part, of the weight of this obligation, and it will divide the responsibility. The only difficulty in the way of this plan reported by the committee working successfully is the one suggested by the gentleman from Luzerne, (Mr. H. W. Palmer,) that special pardons might be obtained by sending the application from one commissioner to another, and thus obtain the individual consent of each commissioner to grant the pardon; but this would not, in all probability, occur very often, and under the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer) it will be rendered impossible of occurrence at all.

I do not want to detain the committee, but I say that the people will sustain us if we restrain this pardoning power. And if we do not do it—if we do not pass some provisions here—if we do not put some provision in the fundamental law restraining this pardoning power, thousands of men in this State will vote against your Constitution, and they ought to do it. I assert again that this power has been miserably abused all over this country, in all the States of the Union. You will find that when men have been called together to frame a fundamental law, as they have been in some of the States, that this is one of the subjects which always engages their attention; and in all the States which have acted upon this subject they have formed some board which has restrained the power which had been in the hands of the Executive. I trust, therefore, that the clause, just as it is, will pass without the amendment of the gentleman from Potter.

MR. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I rise simply to say a word in this regard. It is with great diffidence that I assume to make any suggestion in opposition to the distinguished gentleman from Centre, (Mr. Curtin,) who is chairman of this Committee on Executive Department. But I have three points which I deem to be of importance on this question.

First. If the amendment is not adopted, it takes away, to a certain extent, the right of trial by jury.

Second. The Governor will be pardoning a person for an offence for which he has not been convicted, and about which the Executive is presumed to know nothing at all.

Third. I believe that public necessity requires it.

First, then, it has been suggested here that criminals are often arrested and confined in our jails without an opportunity of trial. I merely beg leave to submit to the committee that the opportunities for trial by jury under our judicial system give every man an opportunity of proving his innocence much easier and with greater facility than he could by an appeal to the tribunal of which the Executive constitutes a part. It cannot be denied, in speaking upon this branch of this question, that the pardoning power has been greatly abused. There is no doubt about that, and the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Executive Department has not undertaken to deny it. He says that it is the exercise of that mercy which pertains to every human being, and he goes on to say, in justification of his statement, that the Executive is not to blame, and that the friends of the prisoner and the friends of the Executive are the persons to blame. Well now I beg leave to say that this is the greatest reason why this amendment should be adopted. If the Executive has heretofore been imposed upon by reason of the pressure brought to bear upon him by friends of the criminal, or by reason of pressure of his friends brought to bear on him, is it just, is it right to the community that Executive clemency should be exercised for such reason, without giving the Commonwealth an opportunity to have the guilt or innocence of a man charged with crime proved regularly before court, and his case passed upon by a jury of his peers? I submit that this is the strongest reason in favor of the adoption of this amendment. It has been admitted by the gentleman from Centre himself, who so long and so honorably filled the chair of the Executive of this State, that the Governor of the State is likely to be imposed upon by the friends of the criminal and the friends of the Executive. I submit that this is the strongest reason why this amendment should be adopted.

Again it has been asserted that very frequently a man can be arrested and thrown into prison, and there would be no disposition on the part of the courts to try his case. In the city of Philadelphia, I presume it is so all through the State, there are regular terms of court. When a man is arrested who is charged with crime, if his offence be trifling, or if he is not a noted criminal in the community, it is easy for him to obtain bail to appear at the next term of court. His case is then submitted to the action of a grand jury, which passes upon his offence. If the majority of that grand jury find a bill of indictment against the prisoner he is taken into an open court, under the same conditions as attach to any other citizen of the Commonwealth. He is surrounded by eminent and learned counsel. He comes before the court and, under the instructions of that court, he has a fair trial, and, more than that, he is given the benefit of any reasonable or rational doubt that may be thrown into the scales of justice, and if that doubt is in his favor, and I do not mean by a doubt any mere figment of the imagination, but any good, substantial reason why the accused shall not be convicted, he is at once discharged. And even after that, if he is improperly convicted, he can go before the tribunal which tried him, and if he can satisfy the court of that fact, under our rules in the city of Philadelphia, and I presume it is the same throughout the State, there is a limited time given to the court to pass upon the sentence of the person convicted, and if evidence of a proper character be submitted to the court, and the court is satisfied that the sentence is harsh, or if it appears that the party convicted has been improperly dealt with, the court can re-consider its sentence, if they see proper and think justice requires it.

How would this operate if the Executive department of the government, constituted as it will be under this section, had the right to pardon criminals before they were tried? Why, you would constitute this very board a board for the trial of criminal cases. It would be run down with business. Its whole time would be occupied by persons coming before this board and asking to have their cases tried before they had been submitted to the scrutiny of a grand jury or been judged of by a petit jury; but, more than that, as the proposition was stated by me in the outset, this court of last resort is not the proper tribunal to try a criminal.

Some instances have been referred to where a pardon has been granted a criminal before conviction. I beg leave to refer only to one. I was not in the hall when the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) spoke upon this subject. I do not know what he said. But I submit that in one instance, at any rate, which occurred in the city of Philadelphia, where Executive clemency was awarded to a criminal prior to trial; it was a great abuse of the pardoning power. It was abused so far that the whole community was up in arms against the Executive for the exercise of that clemency prior to the trial of the criminal. I refer to a person who lived on North-Sixth street, in this city, and because some boys coming along pulled his door-bell, as boys will do, on Hollow Eve night, he shot one of them with a pistol in a most reckless and brutal manner. He was indicted by the grand jury; the day for the trial was fixed but he fled to Europe, and his bail was forfeited, and because he wanted to come back to this country and engage in a lucrative business, an appeal was made to the Executive to pardon him and to remit the forfeiture of his recognizance, and the Governor who last filled the Executive chair of this Commonwealth pardoned him before he had been tried, and there has never been, to this hour, a reason given for what I consider to be such an extraordinary and unreasonable exercise of the Executive power.

Well now, Mr. Chairman, why should we do this? Is there any necessity for it? Is it not forfeiting, to a certain extent, the confidence we have in our court? Why the distinguished gentleman says that in many cases a whole jury will sign a recommendation that a pardon may be issued to a criminal. I do not deny this. I have known cases where I have been retained professionally, in which the signatures of the whole jury have been secured to a petition that the criminal might be pardoned, but they have been rare cases, and I do not think that these rare exceptions should cause us to depart from what I believe to be a cardinal principle in our government, that we should maintain the right of trial by jury, thereby preserving the forms of law, and also give every defendant an opportunity to come before his peers, and have them decide whether he is guilty, and then if the court sees fit to exercise what might be considered a vindictive spirit in its sentence, we can then appeal to this pardoning board.

I am decidedly in favor of this amendment and trust it will be adopted. I could go on and narrate instances of this kind, where I have personally known that the use of the pardoning power has been violated. But, inasmuch as the subject has been somewhat fully discussed, I rest my argument here.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Chairman: I do not think that an hour or so more spent in the consideration of this question will be wasted time, because if the people of this Commonwealth expect one thing more than another, it certainly has reference to a change and a reform in the pardoning power. There is no gentleman on this floor but who can bear testimony that his constituents are deeply impressed with the conviction that there is some remedy needed in this quarter. I desire to say, that if no other means shall be adopted than that reported by the Committee on Executive Department, it will fall far short of the public expectation in this regard.

Now, sir, it is known that the Executives we have had for several years past have desired a change with reference to this matter, and I know that the present Executive of this Commonwealth is exceedingly desirous that a change should be effected, and would rejoice to be wholly and entirely relieved from that function of his office. Now the committee's report, as I understand it, proposes to leave the pardoning power just where it has always been, because that is the effect of their report. It is true they have provided that the Governor, Secretary of the Commonwealth, Attorney General, Superintendent of Public Instruction and the Secretary of the Interior shall be a board of pardons. Well, it will be observed that every one of these gentlemen are appointed by the Governor. These places, therefore, will be all filled by him.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I desire to correct the gentleman. Two of these officers are elected, two appointed.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Chairman: I understand that there is to be a board of pardons. The Governor is to be one.

[Several delegates. No! No!]

Mr. BOYD. The section says:

"He," that is the Governor, "he shall have power to remit fines and forfeitures, to grant reprieves, commutations of sentence and pardons, except in cases of impeachment, but only upon the recommendation in writing, of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, Attorney General, Superintendent of Public Instruction, Secretary of Internal Affairs, or any three of them, and such recommendation, with the reasons therefor, at length, shall be recorded and filed in the department."

Now I understand that it is proposed to take out the Secretary of the Commonwealth, and that it is the amendment pending.

Mr. BIDDLE. That is already voted out.

Mr. BOYD. Very well. Then as it stands, the Attorney General, Superintendent of Public Instruction and Secretary of Internal Affairs shall be the board.

I intend to move, at some time, when it will be in order, to refer this section back to the committee, with instructions, having in view some mode by which this thing can be improved. I shall propose to take it away from any officers connected with the State government, and have it lodged in an independent body.

There will be no impropriety in having the Governor president of such a board but to have it constituted of members of his cabinet would be precisely the same as we have had in it in the past. I have always understood that heretofore the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Commonwealth, the cabinet of the Governor, have had pretty much all to do with granting pardons. This I know has been the case in the recent past, that almost every application for a pardon has been considered in the manner stated, and, as a matter of course, if the Governor is desirous that a pardon should be granted, or issued, his cabinet is very apt to defer to the wishes of the Governor, so that, at least, it becomes the act of the Governor himself; and what I contend for, and mean to insist upon here, will be: That this mode shall be changed, and a board of pardons, constituted either by appointment or election, I do not care which, with the Executive of the State as president of it, the other members to be wholly independent of him, so that there will be no responsibility of one to the other, by virtue of their position in the Executive department of the State; and unless something of that kind is done, I am perfectly convinced that our work here in this behalf will fall very far short of public expectation. I have no doubt that every Governor who has exercised this pardoning power believes he has exercised it in a conscientious manner; but we all know that pressure has been brought to hear upon them of such a character, that is has been found impossible to resist. It is all nonsense for any gentleman to rise here and point out individual instances of the abuse of this power. To relate such instances which have come under the personal observation of the members of this body alone, would simply overwhelm us in the length of time it would take us to recapitulate them. Influences of a political and personal nature are brought to bear, and all that sort of thing always result in a pardon. I therefore shall vote against this section altogether, and against any amendment short of the mode and manner which I have indicated, to wit: An independent board of pardons, of which the Executive shall be the president.

Mr. J. N. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I think it would meet the approbation of this Convention to let this section pass in committee of the whole, and then if there be any material objection to it, it can be corrected on second reading. Now the amendment offered by the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer) is not accepted by the Committee on the Executive, at least not by a majority of that committee, because, I take it, it would almost exclude every application for pardon. If an applicant for a pardon were compelled to go before a board, a kind of a court, and have his attorneys there, and his witnesses, and undergo a kind of a second trial after that due public notice, I apprehend that it would be almost a complete bar to all applications for pardons. Therefore I trust that the amendment will not prevail, but that the section will be adopted as reported by the committee.

Now, I would say, Mr. Chairman, that this section was very fully considered by the Committee on the Executive Department. There were various propositions before that committee; one was, as suggested by the gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Boyd,) to have a court organized, to be appointed by the Governor, composed of some five or six or seven citizens of the Commonwealth, entirely outside of the officials of the government. Another was to confide it to the judges of the Supreme Court. Another was to confide it to four or five president judges of courts of common pleas, and other courts. Another was to confide it to the ex-Governors. All of these propositions were well considered in committee, and none of them met with the favor which the proposition as reported met with. The reasons why the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Commonwealth and the Superintendent of Public Instruction, and the Secretary of Internal Affairs were agreed upon as a board of pardons mainly was, that they are officials of the government already, if this Constitution be adopted. Their residence is principally, and their official duties entirely at the seat of government. They are gentlemen selected generally with reference to their high character for integrity and intelligence, and would be a competent board to represent, properly, the important branch of the dispensing power of the government.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, if there be any abuse of the pardoning power it consists in the fact of its non-exercise. It has not been materially abused in the exercise of it, but it has been, perhaps, from a fear of public clamor, and from other causes that have existed in the State, abused in the fact that it has not been exercised in many cases where it should have been. It has been withheld, perhaps, in meritorious cases, because the Governor desired, as far as practicable, to avoid public abuse which was generally brought upon him for the exercise of this power.

I will refer to the number of pardons heretofore granted by Governors, from Gov. Mifflin down to Gov. Geary, inclusive. I find that the average number of pardons per year was as follows:

Now, sir, I take it there has been no abuse—

Mr. LILLY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Has he any record, or knowledge of any record, of how many convictions there were in those days. I take it that these statistics, without you have the number of convictions and the number of persons in prison, amount to nothing. The pardons granted by Gov. Curtin and Gov. Geary are a very small percentage compared with the rest.

Mr. J. N. PURVIANCE. I agree with the gentleman that they were a very small percentage as compared with the other Governors, because convictions were much more numerous; but we will suppose that in a long period of time, such as I have gone over, three-quarters of a century, that the average of convictions were about the same, proportionate to population, except in times of war, except during the rebellion and other times of war, because, no doubt, on occasions of such extraordinary kind, there were more convictions and more offences, and of a less aggravated character.

I wish, however, to make one remark. The gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer) in his remarks yesterday took occasion to speak in terms very denunciatory of the late deceased Chief Magistrate of this Commonwealth. How he intended the remark exactly is not to be misapprehended. He cited that ancient Latin maxim, "De mortuis nil nisi bonum," but he used it in villification of the memory of the deceased Governor. He refrained from remarks in reference to him, because his tongue is silent in the grave and his earthly career is ended. Now I beg to say that, so far as the record shows, that Chief Magistrate of Pennsylvania stands as high upon the record, in regard to the exercise of the power of granting pardons, as any other Executive that ever filled the gubernatorial chair of this State. Therefore the remark, perhaps, should not have been made, and the few words that I have said in vindication are but just and right to the memory of the deceased Governor.

Then, Mr. Chairman, so far as the committee of the whole is concerned, it is to be hoped that it will adopt the section as we have reported it. If there be any changes thought of they can be made when we are considering this at a subsequent time in Convention. With these remarks I will close, trusting the committee will see the propriety of adopting the section.

MR. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I sincerely hope that this amendment will not be adopted by the committee. I am in favor of regulating the pardoning power, but I am not at all disposed to impair it, and one of the most important and salutary regulations possible will be to make the proceeding upon the consideration of the granting of pardons public, so that parties necessarily and properly concerned in can be heard by the persons who shall be charged with this duty of recommending and granting pardons. Now, sir, pardons before sentence or before conviction are occasionally necessary in every government upon the earth. In case of a riot it may be necessary that your chief magistrate, who has and always ought to have control of the military power of the State, should, by proclamation or otherwise, extend amnesty and pardon to the persons who may be in the act of violating the law, misled by excitement or by the operation of some transient causes. It may sometimes be indispensable to the restoration of the public peace that the chief magistrate shall say to all turbulent persons concerned: "Return to your duties under the law, and you shall not be punished for what has already occurred." This power is also necessary in case of a revolution, and every State is liable to that; we have had one or two in a small way even in our State. We saw the necessity of this power recently in the government of the United States; it was exercised by two late Presidents during and after the late war.

In the case of a revolution in this State this power would be indispensable—a power to act at once, and speak with authority—to conciliate the disaffected element in society that may be in revolt, or in a condition of turbulence. Then, again, how necessary is this power in the Executive, in order to obtain necessary evidence for purposes of public justice?

When persons have been engaged in some criminal transaction, some of whom may be only subordinate agents, and not principals in guilt, it may be important for the purposes of public justice that a pardon should be extended to some of them, in order to obtain evidence against the principal offenders.

With such a limitation as is proposed in the pending amendment, which, in effect, provides that under no possible circumstances, in this government, shall a pardon be extended, or even promised, (because that is the effect of it,) before not merely a trial, but an absolute conviction, or until the end of judicial proceedings, you will cut off all these opportunities for Executive interposition to which I have referred, and, possibly, many others. How can we foresee all the exigencies of the future? Any attempt to narrow—to curtail—this proper Executive power of pardon, as proposed by the amendment now before the Convention, would, in my opinion, be a grand mistake. All that we are required to do, and all that public opinion demands of us, is to regulate the exercise of this power, so as to meet any abuses which may have been developed in our past experience, or are likely to attend upon our future progress. Let us leave the power, unimpaired, remain under such regulations as we may think proper to surround it with. I hope that, eventually, upon deliberate reflection, every gentleman will come to the same conclusion that I have come to, that this power, like all the other leading powers of the government, is a necessity, and that its full and complete existence, under the Constitution, ought to be guaranteed by most ample and certain provisions.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: Neither the argument of my learned friend from Centre (Mr. Curtin) or of my other learned friend from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) as to the necessity for the exercise of the pardoning power previous to conviction, have influenced my mind in the least in favor of their side of the question.

If there could possibly arise, as no doubt there will arise, cases where it may be necessary to guarantee immunity from punishment to one person charged with crime, in order to convict another or others, it is not necessary that the pardoning power of the Executive should be resorted to.

It is a well understood principle of common law, applicable in the administration of justice here and elsewhere, that there is an implied understanding, given by the prosecuting officer to the man who becomes a witness for the Commonwealth, that he shall not be convicted; and no instance has occurred, within my knowledge, either in history or in practice, and, I apprehend, not within the knowledge or experience of any gentleman on this floor, in which it ever was necessary to call upon the Executive for a formal pardon in such a case as that.

I do not conceive that it is necessary that it should be exercised in the case put by the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) when in case of a mob, or a general condition of disorder or revolt, it would be proper to grant amnesty.

Whatever may have been the practice of the general government in the time of the rebellion, it has never had any application, and is not likely to have application, to the case of a State of this Union.

When a body of men rise in riot against the constituted authorities of the State, in violation of all law, and make themselves criminals, I would not entrust to a single Executive, who must belong to one or the other of the political parties, the power to grant amnesty to all his friends who may be engaged in this attempt. I would not put it in his power to say: "If the rioters are political enemies of mine I will not pardon them, but if they are friends I will." That would put the law into the hands of the Executive without examination of the offence, without trial and without conviction? Are the liberties of this people to depend upon the fiat of any Executive? If a man assail or invade my home or burn my property I have a right to demand that the Commonwealth shall do justice upon him, and I have an equal right to demand that no man shall interfere with the administration of the law between the offender and the Commonwealth. It is time enough for him to be freed from the consequences of his crime after he is adjudged guilty by the verdict of his peers, and the sentence of the court is pronounced. What would be the effect of allowing the Executive unlimited sway to grant a pardon to any man and every man previous to conviction? Why, sir, it is impeding the wheels of justice; it is interfering with the administration of justice; it is equivalent to saying that a judge, whose function it is to see that the man has a fair trial before a jury, is not an impartial judge; that he is influenced by other considerations than the facts and the law of the case, and that that man has had an ex parte trial; but it is said that "the prosecutor, who has attempted to inflict this punishment, ought not to be allowed to prosecute this defendant, because he is actuated by malice or other improper motives."

It is also said "there are times of high political excitement when this right must necessarily be exercised." That is equivalent to saying that "the offender was in a minority, and had no business to interfere with the mob; so the mob shall not be tried at all for their offence. I will pardon them at once." What kind of law would that be under which we would be asked to live? Is it necessary, let me ask the gentleman for a moment, that the Governor should interfere to protect the alleged criminal from trial because the prosecution may have been actuated by malicious motives and without probable cause? Why the party accused has ample redress in the courts, by civil action, for malicious prosecution, or malicious arrest, in which a sufficient guard will be held over any man who attempts a prosecution unwisely or improperly. The law is open to him. If any man be improperly charged and is acquitted, there is no danger of any punishment being inflicted upon him. He has his redress in an action for the injury inflicted upon him. Shall it be said that the Executive of the State, on a one-sided hearing, and without listening to any man but one, knowing nothing of the facts but those which the friends of the criminal put before him, shall be at liberty to impede the administration of the law? "High political excitement!" I would allow that excitement to find its quietus in the proper administration of justice in the courts. Whoever is guilty of riot must take the consequences of it, and let not the Governor interfere. If, after conviction, it appears that it was unjust, if it can be made to appear beyond all doubt that conviction was improper, through perjury or fraud, or from any other cause, I would not withhold the mercy of the Governor, but give some chance to the man who institutes a prosecution against another to prove, before a jury and a court, that the man whom he charges is guilty, and if he be guilty, no previous good character, no previous high standing in the community, and no previous association with eminent men, should save him from the consequences of his crime. For these reasons it is inexpedient, in my judgment, to provide for the exercise of the pardoning power prior to conviction for any cases that cannot arise, or for cases of supposed riot where it is not necessary to interfere, and I submit that it is not necessary for such a power to be exercised at all before conviction. For the reason, then, that it is inexpedient it is also improper to allow a Governor to interfere with the course of justice, before justice is begun to be administered, and I would deny him that power.

Mr. DE FRANCE. Mr. Chairman: I have just a few words to say on this subject. I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen.) I believe that pardons should not be granted before conviction in any case. The gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) said it was a necessity. If it is a necessity, sir, it is a necessity that is dispensed with in a majority of the States of this Union. You may take the State of Kentucky; there they do not grant any pardons until after conviction. Massachusetts, I believe, is in the same position. So are Rhode Island and New York, and a majority of the States of this Union. They do not give the Executive the right to grant pardons until after conviction.

Is it a necessity? The only case that has been mentioned is that of times of high political excitement or rebellion. I judge that the Governor, at such times, has the right to issue his proclamation, not, perhaps, of pardon, but exercising his authority as commander-in-chief of the army and militia of the State.

At any rate it does not amount to much, in my judgment. I have failed to see the necessity for this power being in the hands of the Governor, and after hearing the arguments of the gentlemen, especially of the gentleman who has been Governor of the State for six years, (Mr. Curtin,) and of other gentlemen who have held high political honors, I cannot see any reason why Pennsylvania should allow her Governor to grant pardons before conviction, when nearly all the States in the Union deny it to them.

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I desire to make a few remarks directly to the point now before the committee.

I have listened, sir, in vain to the gentleman from Centre (Mr. Curtin) and the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) for any reasons why we should not place this restriction in the Constitution. I listened in vain to those gentlemen for an illustration of a case, such as should call for the exercise of the pardoning power previous to conviction and sentence.

Now, sir, as I said yesterday, and asked the gentleman from Lycoming, (Mr. Armstrong,) is not a criminal, when he is placed in the box, presumed to be innocent until he is convicted; and if that be true, my further inquiry is: If the prisoner is innocent, upon what is this previous pardon to rest? It is an anomaly in our jurisprudence, and should not be recognized by the wisdom of this Convention. There is only one class of cases to which it should ever be applied, and that is the class intimated by my friend from Clarion, (Mr. Corbett,) in cases of insurrection and rebellion, and not in case of riot, as claimed by the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) because a riot may not rise to the dignity of a case, such as would invoke the exercise of a power like that of an insurrection or rebellion, and hence there is no difficulty in appending to the proposition offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) that which will make the exception in the case of rebellion and insurrection.

Now in twenty-two States, a list of which I hold in my hands, it is provided, in some instances, that the Governor shall have power after conviction to grant reprieves, commutations of sentences, and pardons for all crimes and offences, except treason and in cases of impeachment. Again, in other instances, it is provided that the Governor shall have power to grant reprieves, pardons and commutations of sentences after conviction for all offences, except treason, and so on.

This provision is made in twenty-two of the States of the Union, and they are the States of Alabama, Iowa, Nebraska, Ohio, Arkansas, California, Michigan, Wisconsin, New York, North Carolina, Illinois, Missouri, Tennessee, Oregon, Indiana, Rhode Island, Connecticut, South Carolina, Texas, Virginia and Maine. Now, sir, are we going to make a departure from what has been the recognized wisdom of the whole nation?

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: I trust the committee will not adopt the amendment. The limitation proposed to be placed upon the Executive power by this amendment has been exercised in a very few cases, indeed, in this Commonwealth. While I am aware of the fact, as suggested by my colleague, (Mr. Temple,) that in one instance it was, perhaps, exercised where it ought not to have been, I am also cognizant of the fact that in another case it was exercised where it ought to have been exercised. I am clear upon this subject, for I know the parties, and I know all the surroundings of the case. The party should not have been permitted, and called upon to stand his trial, for every lawyer who practices at the bar knows the uncertainty attending jury trials. It has been said that the Lord knows everything, but I doubt if the verdict of a petit jury can ever be predicted with any reasonable degree of certainty. In the case I refer to, the party ought not to have been called upon to run the risk of a jury trial and a conviction before applying to the Executive for a pardon. As the instances have been so few in the Commonwealth, and creating, as the proposed plan suggests, a body independent of the Governor, to examine into and report before a pardon can be issued, I am sure the pardoning power can be exercised without much fear of its being abused. I trust, therefore, the pardoning power will not be taken away from the Governor in cases like these, that his power in the premises will not be emasculated, but that it may continue to be exercised whenever the public interest and justice shall require, in accordance with the provisions contained in the section reported by the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I desire before the debate closes to say a few words in relation to this question. It seems to me the plan as proposed is as good as anything that can be devised by the Convention. It seems to me, in listening to the arguments that have been made, that gentlemen have conceived an idea that they can create, in some way, a tribunal that will not be liable to the same errors, the same temptations, the same feelings and the same impositions that have afflicted those who have heretofore exercised pardoning power, but I think this is a very serious mistake. If the Convention could by any magic power create some tribunal that would be composed of a superior order of beings, who were higher and above common humanity, I certainly should at once support such a plan; but in no possible way can we escape trusting men. The Governor is the highest officer in the Commonwealth, and he is chosen by the entire voice of the people. He is responsible to the people, and it seems to me that there is no person in whom this pardoning power can be more safely entrusted, especially when it is guarded in the manner provided in the report of the committee. It has been suggested that it would be wise to strike "the Secretary of the Commonwealth" from the section, because he is an officer appointed by the Governor; but that is the very reason why I would retain him as one of the members of this board. The Secretary of the Commonwealth is supposed to be the friend and counsellor of the Governor, and it is not to be supposed he would advise the Governor to grant a pardon when it was not proper that it should be granted, and I think, therefore, by all means the Secretary of the Commonwealth, as the friend and counsellor of the Governor, should be retained, as the committee has reported. The section reported by the committee also further provides that "this board shall also consist of the Attorney General, the Superintendent of Public Instruction and the Secretary of Internal Affairs." If this provision is adopted it will possess this additional advantage, which I hope will not be overlooked: That the pardoning power thus entrusted to the Governor shall be exercised by and with the advice of gentlemen already occupying offices in the Commonwealth, and officers that we consider indispensable to the State. I am opposed to the creation of other offices. How could any better tribunal be created, and especially when we consider that the people will know that the pardoning power will enter into their duties, and they will select men to fill these offices with the idea of obtaining talent and integrity, suited to this as well as other duties. I have said, and I repeat it again, that if this tribunal we propose to create could be composed of a higher order of beings, I would be willing to endorse the plan, but as we cannot do this I can see no reason for shifting about and originating devices for the creation of new offices. It is for these and other reasons, Mr. Chairman, that I shall support, most cordially, the report of the committee.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman: Before the gentleman from Lyeoming (Mr. Armstrong) closes the debate upon this question, which I presume is his intention, I venture to submit a few remarks. I came to this Convention deeply impressed with the belief that it was the conviction of the public mind that this power of granting pardons vested in the Executive should be, in some way or other, guarded by the action of this Convention; and I have not yet been fully satisfied that this provision, reported by the committee, has that effect. I have listened to the whole discussion upon this question, and the result produced on my mind has been to leave me still under the impression that the provision reported by the committee is not adequate. I think, sir, this matter of granting previous pardons, although the power has not been so very frequently exercised, is one which has attracted towards it considerable public attention and considerable public disapprobation, and I believe the general sense of the community is that that power ought to be abolished, and therefore, as the question now stands, I shall be in favor of abolishing it; though if this council of pardons were differently constituted, notwithstanding there seems to be something illogical in pardoning a man who is presumed to be innocent, I would, nevertheless, be in favor of retaining the provision in the Constitution. My own idea has been that this council of pardons should be constituted of some different material than that mentioned in the report of the committee. I have never been able to fully satisfy my mind as to what persons should be selected to constitute this council, but the conclusion I have come to is to incorporate a provision something like the following, which I will read in connection with the section now pending:

"The Governor shall have power to remit fines and forfeitures, and to grant reprieves, commutation of sentence and pardons, except in cases of impeachment, but only upon the recommendation, in writing, of the majority of the members of the council of pardons, to be composed of the chief justice of the Supreme Court, the president judge of the court in which the applicant for pardon in each particular case was convicted," and the several officers mentioned in the section reported by the committee.

With the addition of this element I would be willing to commit the whole question of pardon to the Governor and the council so constituted; but I believe it is a defect, that possibly may be irremediable, to leave this power of pardon entirely in the hands of gentlemen who are elected to offices in themselves distinctly political, and who are liable to be influenced by partisan considerations.

Now if you introduce the judicial element, it is not for the purpose of causing the pardon to be granted on legal grounds, but because it would bring into the consideration of the question a class of men who will look at it from a cooler and more considerate standpoint. In the Constitution of the council of pardons, in the adjoining State of New Jersey, the chief justice and the chancellor, either or both, act as members of the council, and I have never heard that the action of that body has not been satisfactory to the community and the people of that State. Now in addition to the chief justice, by introducing the president judge of the district, before whom the trial is had, as a member of this council, all the facts involved in the case will become known to the other members of the council. He can inform the council whether or not the Governor will be justified in exercising the pardoning power. If that amendment were made in this section, I would vote against the proviso, because I could then have confidence in the impartiality of the tribunal; but without this amendment I am in favor of the proviso and against permitting this council so constituted to grant pardons before conviction and sentence, which form a class of pardons that have excited more public dis-approbation than any other that have been granted in the Commonwealth.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: That the pardoning power has been greatly abused in this State there can be no question. It is by reason of this admitted fact that the Committee on the Executive Department have given to this clause of this article so careful and anxious consideration. That there has arisen in the public mind an idea that it is a dangerous power is, I think, too clear for argument. It pervades the entire public mind on this subject. This also was clearly in the minds of the committee when they came to the consideration of this subject. This prejudice has arisen from the fact that the pardoning power has been exercised in the sole discretion of a single person, who, from his position, was necessarily, more or less, under the influence of political considerations. At the same time that I make this remark I am prepared to say that the pardoning power has been exercised in this Commonwealth, as a rule, with exceeding great carefulness.

The gentleman from Pittsburg (Mr. John N. Purviance) has read in the hearing of the committee a statement of the number of pardons which have been granted by the successive Governors of this Commonwealth for many years past. But he overlooks the fact that until the act of 1830 a sentence which was served to the end was followed by political disability, and that up to that time pardons were granted in great numbers, in many instances the day before the sentence would expire, in order that the political disabilities, which attached to the serving out of the full sentence, might be removed. It happened, therefore, that a large number of these pardons were for the simple and only purpose, not of diminishing the weight of punishment, but of relieving the political disabilities which would ensue if the full term of sentence were served out. This was corrected by the act of 1830, and since that time the serving out of the sentence has not been followed by any such disability.

But my friend from Pittsburg (Mr. S. A. Purviance) referred also to the various provisions of the several States with reference to the pardoning power. In a majority of the States where they refused to permit pardons to be granted until after conviction and sentence, it is where the pardoning power is vested solely in the discretion of the Executive, and not where that power is vested in the Executive subject to the recommendation of a council of pardons. The rule in the States is not uniform, but it is the prevailing rule that where there is a court of pardons, or a council of pardons, which must first pass upon the expediency of granting the pardon, the right of pardon before sentence does exist.

We are not considering this question in the position in which it stands in the public mind, as a power to be exercised by the Executive, in his sole discretion, but as a power hedged around with defences which are calculated to, and which, in the judgment of the committee, will effectually prevent its abuse. It does not follow that all of the four persons designated as a court of pardons will be of the same political party. But if they should be, as possibly they may be, they will be gentlemen of such standing, presumably, from the position which they occupy, and so regardless of their personal reputation and character, that from the necessity of spreading the reasons which induced them to recommend a pardon, before the people in a record, which is perpetual and accessible to the public, that they must be constrained to exercise this discretion with exceeding care. No sufficient reason has been suggested why a power, which is essentially discretionary, shall be exercised after conviction, but shall not be exercised before. It is, when properly exercised, in the nature of government clemency, based upon sound and sufficient reasons, and it would be very hard to draw a line of distinction, which should admit its exercise in the one case and exclude it in the other. Nor has it been indicated in this debate by what rule, or for what reasons, it would, for the public interest, that pardons after sentence may be granted, but before sentence shall not be. It is, in its whole entire compass and effect, an appeal to the discretion of the Executive, bounded and circumscribed by the provisions for a council of pardons, in such manner that in no case can it be exercised hastily and indiscriminately. As the section stands, an application for pardon before sentence must take the precise course, and be subjected to the same limitations, as application for pardon after sentence. It would seem, and it did seem to the Committee on the Executive Department, to be extremely unwise that we should fix, by an immutable law, by an organic provision in the Constitution, a limitation upon the Executive power, which is not at all likely to be abused. And when many instances have occurred, and many must suggest themselves, to the minds of members on this floor, in which it ought to be exercised, and in our past history has been exercised with very marked advantage to the public peace, and with equal and admitted justice to the accused. Reference has already been made to the case of an insurrection, and it is proposed to break the force of this illustration by saying that it shall be made a special exception. This assumes that the discretion of pardon ought not to be exercised, except in this particular case. We cannot take in the whole scope of criminal law, nor can we anticipate the contingencies of all criminal administration, nor undertake, as a Convention, to provide for all cases that may occur. The most we can do, is to so construct the organic law that grants the discretionary power we confer shall be exercised with such discretion, that it shall be always with great care and consideration, and with such proper and sufficient safeguards that, whilst we preserve the power, we take care that it shall be so carefully guarded that it shall work no wrong.

The Committee on Executive Department have given to this section, as I have before remarked, their most careful and anxious consideration. They believe that this power ought to be exercised, but that it should be hedged around with such defences as will prevent its abuse. But that to go so far as to provide that no pardons shall be granted prior to conviction and sentence is withholding the exercise of a power which may often be necessary to prevent great injustice, and in many instances seriously and injuriously affect the public welfare. I do not now propose to detain the committee by any enlarged discussion of this question. It has been ably and fully discussed. I desire only to impress upon the Convention, if I can, that the Committee on Executive Department has most earnestly given their attention to this entire subject, and after the most minute and careful consideration have presented this section as the result of their unanimous judgment upon this subject. I hope it commends itself to the favorable consideration of this Convention.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I call for a reading of the amendment.

The CLERK. The amendment to the amendment is to add to the end of the section, as follows:

"Provided, That no pardon shall be issued prior to the conviction and sentence of the person to whom it is granted."

Mr. FUNCK. Mr. Chairman: I ask for a division of that question, so that there might be a pardon granted after conviction and before sentence.

On the question of agreeing to the amendment to the amendment, a division was called, resulting in twenty-six votes in the affirmative. Not being a majority of a quorum, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Potter, and the amendment will be read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: The persuasive speech of the gentleman from Centre (Mr. Curtin) has induced me to withdraw my amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHN M. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman: Before the vote is taken on this question I have one amendment to suggest which, I think, will strike every member of the committee favorably. It will be observed that since we have added the amendment suggested yesterday by the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer) the Governor could not grant a reprieve until after due public notice and a full hearing in open session. This difficulty might arise; there might be a case where a reprieve should be granted without the delay of a single day. Pending the execution of a death sentence, for instance, it may be demonstrated in a day, even the day before execution, that the criminal be innocent, but under the operation of this section as it now stands, it would be impossible for his innocence, though demonstrated to a certainty, to save him from the execution of the sentence. For it would be impossible to give due public notice and have a hearing in open session before a reprieve could be granted, even under such circumstances. I would, therefore, move to amend this section further, as follows: By striking out the word "only," in the third line, and adding after the word "but," in same line, the words: "No pardon shall be granted nor sentence commuted, except," so that the provisions for recommendation in writing, and public notice and hearing shall only apply to the granting of pardons and commuting of sentences, and not to reprieves.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman: I would just remark that under our system an execution cannot occur without a death warrant, and the death warrant must be signed by the Governor.

Mr. JOHN M. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman: I was aware of that. Still it strikes me that a warrant might be issued before the innocence of the man was shown, and the day even fixed for the execution, and the day immediately preceding the time for execution it might be demonstrated that the man was innocent. It is to meet such a case as that that I have offered this amendment.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman: It strikes me that it is a good provision. I make no objection to it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: I would like to hear the section read as it is proposed to amend it.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 10. He shall have power to remit fines and forfeitures, to grant reprieves, commutations of sentence and pardons, except in cases of impeachment, but no pardon shall be granted or sentence commuted except upon the recommendation, in writing, of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, Attorney General, Superintendent of Public Instruction, Secretary of Internal Affairs, or any three of them, after a full hearing of the parties, upon due public notice, and in open session; and such recommendation, with the reasons therefor at length, shall be recorded and filed in the department.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: I suggest that the gentleman from Huntingdon had better include the remission of fines and forfeitures as well as reprieves.

Mr. JOHN M. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman: I prefer the amendment as I offered it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: I now move to amend, as follows:

By inserting the words "fines and forfeitures" after the word "reprieve."

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the tenth section, as amended.

The section was agreed to.

SECTION 11. He may require information, in writing, from the officers of the Executive Department, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices.

The eleventh section was agreed to.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 12. He shall, from time to time, give to the General Assembly information of the state of the Commonwealth, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge expedient.

The twelfth section was agreed to.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 13. He may, on extraordinary occasions, convene the General Assembly, and in case of disagreement between the two Houses with respect to the time of adjournment, adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper, not exceeding four months.

The thirteenth section was agreed to.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 14. In case of the death, conviction on impeachment, failure to qualify, resignation, or other disability of the Governor, the powers, duties and emoluments of the office for the remainder of the term, or until the disability be removed, shall devolve upon the Lieutenant Governor.

The fourteenth section was agreed to.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 15. The Senate shall, at the beginning and close of each regular session, and at such other times as a vacancy may occur in said office, elect a Senator President pro tempore, whose duty it shall be to preside over the Senate during the temporary absence of the Lieutenant Governor; and in case of a vacancy in the office of Lieutenant Governor, or on his conviction on impeachment or disability, the powers, duties and emoluments of the office for the remainder of the term, or until the disability be removed, shall devolve upon the President pro tempore, and he shall, in like manner, become Governor if a vacancy or disability shall occur; his office of Senator shall become vacant when he becomes Lieutenant Governor, and shall be filled by election, as any other vacancy in the Senate.

The fifteenth section was agreed to.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 16. Every bill which shall have passed both Houses shall be presented to the Governor; if he approve he shall sign it, but if he shall not approve he shall return it, with his objections, to the House in which it shall have originated, which shall enter the objections at large upon their Journals and proceed to re-consider it; if after such re-consideration two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, with the objection, to the other House, by which likewise it shall be re-considered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House it shall be a law; but, in such cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for or against the bill shall be entered on the Journals of each House respectively; if any bill shall not be returned by the Governor within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he has signed it, unless the General Assembly, by their adjournment, prevent its return, in which case it shall be a law, unless sent back within three days after their next meeting.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend that section, by striking out in the last line, after the word "unless," and inserting "he shall file the same, with his objections, in the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, and give public notice thereof by proclamation within thirty days after said adjournment."

The amendment was agreed to.

Section sixteen, as amended, was agreed to.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 17. The Governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items of any bills making appropriations of money, embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be the law, and the item or items disapproved shall be void, unless re-passed according to the rules and limitations prescribed for the passage of other bills over the Executive veto.

The seventeenth section was agreed to.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 18. If the trial of a contested election of Governor or Lieutenant Governor shall continue longer than until the third Monday of January next ensuing the election of Governor or Lieutenant Governor, the person who is then exercising the authority of the office in reference to which this contest is pending, shall continue therein until the determination of such contested election and until his successor be qualified.

The eighteenth section was agreed to.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 19. The Secretary of the Commonwealth shall keep a fair register of all the official acts and proceedings of the Governor, and shall, when required, lay the same, and all papers, minutes and vouchers relating thereto, before either branch of the Legislature, and shall perform such other duties as shall be enjoined upon him by law.

The nineteenth section was agreed to.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 20. The Secretary of Internal Affairs shall exercise all the powers and duties devolved by law upon the Surveyor General; and the office of Surveyor General shall cease when the Secretary of Internal Affairs shall be duly qualified. His department shall embrace a bureau of industrial statistics, and such duties relating to the charitable institutions, the agricultural, manufacturing, mines, mineral, timber, and other material or business interests of the State as may be by law assigned thereto. He shall, annually, make report to the Legislature, and at such other time as may be required by law.

The twentieth section was agreed to.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 21. The Superintendent of Public Instruction shall exercise all the powers, and perform all the duties devolved by law upon the Superintendent of Common Schools; and the office of Superintendent of Common Schools shall cease when the Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be duly qualified.

The twenty-first section was agreed to.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: In reference to the office of Superintendent of Public Instruction I wish merely, at this time, to state that the Committee on Education had that subject in charge, and after a great deal of consideration and many meetings, and consideration of the views of all the members, finally united upon it. They have recommended that there should be such an officer, and upon the question whether he should be elected by the people or appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the committee finally came to the conclusion that the latter was the better plan. Believing that the Superintendent of Public Instruction was an officer who should be as far as possible removed from the political arena, and possessing, as he must possess, all the varied qualifications to enable him to discharge the duties of that office properly, it seemed to the committee eminently wise that he should be selected by the Governor and confirmed by the Senate. That being the conclusion of the Committee on Education, it seemed but right that I should bring it to the attention of this committee at this time, as we have not yet arrived at the consideration of the report of the Committee on Education. It will be for the Convention to decide whether the one or the other will be the better mode. The committee whose report is now before us proposes the election of this officer. The other committee recommend that he should be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; both committees agreeing in the length of his term—four years.

With this explanation, which is all that I need to make, I wish to say, merely, that I prefer, myself, and I think the committee also prefer, the appointment of the officer instead of his election.

MR. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman. Would not it be better to so frame the section that the Superintendent of public schools should be elected by the county superintendents at their annual assemblage, or, say every three years, or at any fixed time. If that plan were adopted I think it would be better, perhaps, than to have them elected by the people or appointed by the Governor.

MR. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: The Committee on Education thought over that plan also, but did not approve it, because it was neither election nor appointment, but a half-way measure that did not strike them as at all wise to adopt.

MR. MINOR. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the section, by striking out the words, "and Superintendent of Public Instruction," for these reasons:

In the first place, it is a very strange place to fix any thing bearing on the subject of education in the department of the Executive. It is certainly the last place in which one would think of looking for it. It would seem that the provisions relating to this officer should be under the head of education, and the committee having charge of that subject, of which I have the honor of being a member, taking that view of the case, have provided for that officer.

In the next place, the mode of selection of this Superintendent of Public Instruction is one which is open to discussion. Some favor election by the people, as reported here; others favor nomination by the Governor and confirmation by the Senate, as the Committee on Education have reported. Others favor election by the county superintendents, as suggested by the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly.) Others, again, prefer other modes. That subject will of course be fully discussed, as there is a diversity of views upon it. I suggest to this committee whether the proper place for it is not when we take up the subject of education; we can then take it up in connection with all the other particular branches of education.

It is not for the purpose of committing any one in his opinion as to how he would vote on the question of the appointment or election of the School Superintendent, that I make this motion to strike out; but for the purpose of placing the matter in its proper position in the report of the Committee on Education.

MR. CURTIN. In deference to the Committee on Education, I would say that we have now passed, in the article on the Executive Department, all the powers which the Committee on the Executive specially desire, and as a member of that committee I, for my part, see no objection to striking out the name of that official. I do not know what may be the views of my colleagues on the subject, but I see no objection to it myself.

MR. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I have the honor to be a member of the Committee on Education, and I do not feel at all alarmed about this section as it stands reported by the Committee on the Executive Department. I think this is eminently the proper place for this officer, with his duties, to be designated, because he is especially an Executive officer of our State government. This committee has reported upon the other Executive officers; upon the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Secretary of the Commonwealth, Attorney General, State Treasurer, Secretary of Internal Affairs, and why not also upon the Superintendent of Public Instruction? Why not, I ask? Is he not an Executive officer of the government as much as the Secretary of the Commonwealth, Attorney General, State Treasurer and Secretary of Internal Affairs, all whom are designated in this report? Is he not very properly classified with them? Now as to another point, which the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) has raised. How shall this officer be selected? My colleague has left the committee under the impression that the Committee on Education was unanimous in the report which they have made to this Convention, so far as it relates to the appointment of the head of the Educational Department.

I beg to say, sir, as a member of that committee, that we were not unanimous at all on that subject. For myself and three others of that committee, I can say we are emphatically in favor of making this officer elective and not appointive.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: The argument this morning and yesterday in regard to the pardoning council was that the power was divided—the people electing two of the board and the Governor appointing the other two, and therefore the majority of the board could not in any way be manipulated by the Governor. Now if this section is adopted you place the board entirely in the power of the Governor; as in a board of four he will have the appointing of three. I hope we will hesitate before adopting a section of this sort. If I understand at all the feeling of those whom I represent on this floor, it is that the pardoning power ought to be removed as far as possible from the one-man power, and that the board ought certainly to be out of the reach of this objectionable one-man power; and I do hope, therefore, we will be extremely careful how we vote upon the amendment now under consideration.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: In my opinion the organization of our Common School department is a very much more important question than any question of the organization of the pardoning power. Our common schools constitute a sort of neutral territory, if I may use that term, where all our people stand on common ground.

I would inquire of gentlemen, has there been any complaint made since the organization of the present system of common schools in this State as to the manner in which the School department has been conducted? None whatever. Our common school system has been administered to the satisfaction of the people, and every year we are increasing our appropriation for them, and I believe an amendment is now reported to fix the appropriation at a minimum of one million. There are no abuses in the department of Public Schools; there is no question of politics in it. There are no political considerations connected with its action in any part of the Commonwealth. It stands clear and free from complaint, and always has. With, then, no abuse to correct—no evil to remove—why will gentlemen throw this department into the general pool of election matters, to be managed in political conventions throughout the State, and to be mixed up with political agitation. I trust, whatever else may be done in the other departments and other officers of this government, the School department and its head will be left just where they are. They are now popular and satisfactory to the people, and there is no reason, in my judgment, for this change, except an insane or mistaken notion of symmetry—throwing everything to the people to be voted upon. The same sentiment, vague, indefinite, ill-considered, would throw the offices of Secretary of the Commonwealth, and Attorney General, and every other State office into the popular elections. You have thrown so much into your elections that they have almost broken down; and the great work of this Convention is to brace up, and amend, and strengthen our system of popular election, so that it can carry the enormous load put upon it.

Why throw the common schools also into the elections? Let gentlemen consider what we have been doing in Convention, and refrain accepting this panacea of superficial thinkers, who, whenever they do not know exactly what to do about filling an office, throw it to the people.

I trust, sir, we will leave this department of our government where it is now. Do not let us make any change in our existing Constitution as to any department that has worked well—when there is no complaint—merely for the sake of change. The men in this State who are connected with our common school system are legion. The persons who are directly and indirectly connected with the operations of our educational system are innumerable; and I doubt whether you could make a single change in the Constitution that would be less popular or acceptable to them than this.

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: It seems to me if we adopt the provision contained in this section, relating to the election of the Superintendent of Public Instruction, we will be taking a step backward. This question as to the manner in which this office should be filled was carefully and well considered in the Committee upon Education, and although there were some gentlemen who did not agree with the report of the committee, there were reasons given why this officer should be appointed by the Executive of the Commonwealth, which, it seems to me, should prevail in this committee and before the Convention. The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Wetherill) is opposed to having this officer appointed by the Governor, because he is made one of the board by which the questions of pardons shall be decided prior to their being finally acted upon by the Governor; and if he is appointed by the Governor, and he desires to grant a pardon, concerning which the rest of his advisory council do not agree with him, he has only to remove that particular member of the board obnoxious to him, and appoint another member in his place. Now that objection may be of some validity in some cases, and such cases may possibly occur, but whenever they do occur the Executive of this Commonwealth will have been found of a lower grade than has ever yet existed among the Governors of this Commonwealth; but the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Wetherill,) when he speaks about the election of the Superintendent of Public Instruction, may speak of it and may vote upon it with perfect impunity, so far as regards the position of the officer himself, for the Superintendent of Public Instruction has none or very little supervision over the public schools of the city of Philadelphia.

Philadelphia was carefully protected, in the report of this Committee upon Education, against any innovation by which the general school laws of the State should apply to her. They are not adapted to the wishes and requirements of the educational interests of this city, but we can arrange a system that will be consistent with the interests of all the people. The people of the rural districts concede this much to Philadelphia, and we hope this city will concede as much to us. The person who shall be selected to fill this important position of Superintendent of Public Instruction should be characterized by official purity. When I speak of his official purity, I refer to his purity from all the contaminating influences of political manipulation and management. This official will be compelled to traverse our State from one end to the other, outside of the city of Philadelphia, in superintending the schools in the different townships and counties, and he will be brought into contact with the school directors in the various local districts all over the State. What an exhibition it will be when the candidates for Governor of the Commonwealth, the Superintendent of Internal Affairs, and the Superintendent of Public Instruction, nominated upon a common ticket, shall take a ride around the Commonwealth, stumping the State in behalf of their own election, stirring up the bitter feeling of partisan admiration upon the one side and hostility on the other? What a disadvantage it will be when the candidate who happens to be elected as Superintendent of Public Instruction, in his official capacity, happens to visit the counties where these old substantial, party-bound school directors reside, who think if a man is against them in politics, he is against them for some impure and unworthy motive? It is impossible to eradicate this idea from the minds of some of the people in this State. It does not prevail here in this Convention, of course, but there are numbers of people in the State who believe that a man who is opposed to them in politics is a man unfit to attend to that business, and unfit to be the Superintendent of Public Instruction, or to exercise a general supervision over the school and educational interests of this great State. Now, Mr. Chairman, if this provision in regard to the Superintendent of Public Instruction is adopted, he will have to enter the arena of politics before he is elected, and then, if elected, in the administration of the functions of his office, he will be required to traverse the State again and be compelled to submit to all this personal animosity which the election shall have engendered. Philadelphia, however, will be exempt from this inconvenience and difficulty, because her educational matters will require no immediate supervision. I say, therefore, that this official should be placed beyond the influence and range of political management of a State Convention or elsewhere. He will belong to a party, of course, and he will belong to the party to which the Governor is attached.

There can be no question about that, unless he is controlled by the provision made in our report respecting the confirmation of his appointment by the Senate, but still he will be further removed from contact with the political prejudices of the people. Now, it has been said, that the services of better men are obtained by submitting questions of election to the people. I deny that principle, and the Convention yesterday testified, by the vote they gave upon the question under discussion, that they did not believe that the question of elections should at all times be submitted to the people. When the vote was taken in committee of the whole upon the provision contained in the report of the Committee upon the Executive Department, that the Governor's office shall be limited to a single term, the members of this Convention testified that they were not in favor even of this idea of civil service reform, by permitting him to so serve two terms, and that they were not in favor of the idea that a man who has served in the position of Governor is better qualified by reason of his experience, other things being equal, to fill the office for another term. The Convention, by its action upon this question, announced that it was inexpedient to allow the people, by a constitutional provision, to re-elect a man to the office of Governor after he had served a single term, even though he may have served the State with rare ability. The Governor may be as pure in character as the driven snow which now covers the mountains of Pennsylvania. He may possess all the wisdom and experience necessary for the discharge of the important duties of that office, and yet the Convention has voted in the committee of the whole, upon the article which proposes to remove from the people the power to re-elect a man who, by the purity and ability of his official career, may be the very man most worthy to occupy that distinguished position; and why? It is because we believe that the Governor will be surrounded by political parasites who will control the patronage and manage the affairs of his office for the purpose of securing his re-nomination and re-election for a second term; and therefore the Convention has decided to remove all this temptation for a re-election in order to protect the people against the designs of such men. The Convention does not mean to say that the Governor may not be a wise and prudent officer; but it says that this political management has such a demoralizing tendency, that it shall be removed from the power of those around the Governor to re-nominate him for a second term of office. It is, perhaps, well enough to indulge the pride and gratification of the people by saying that they shall elect every officer of the Commonwealth, but the decision of the Convention has been, and I believe it is an eminently wise and proper one, that the people are not at all times the judges of the qualifications of an officer of our government. Now, in connection with this subject, the person who shall be called upon, in particular, to fill the office of Superintendent of Public Education, should be a man of eminent ability, and not a politician by any means. He should be a person acquainted with all our educational interests, and possessing all the requisite acquirements appertaining to this important public office. He should not be a man who would condescend to enter a State Convention, and by entering into political combinations for the purpose of securing a political nomination, for it is well known that such combinations would invariably sacrifice the public school interest of the State of Pennsylvania.

It has always been found that whenever a particular evil of a particular nature has prevailed for a certain time, public clamor has become rampant, and the excitement which is occasioned demands a strong remedy to correct the evil. Let not this Convention, then, be carried away by any public excitement that has been created against any particular class of evils. Let the tide of public prejudice sweep over this State, if it will, carrying with it the people in their excitement, but when it reaches the door of this hall, let it stop there, and not expect to find an entrance into this body.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman: I agree most heartily with the remarks of the gentleman from Bucks, (Mr. Lear,) and also of the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew.) The most important interest requiring attention in our State is unquestionably that of education. We have in this State one of the best educational systems, perhaps, in the whole Union, and for many years past it has been under the management of gentlemen most eminently qualified for the purpose. The system has produced most excellent results, and I should regard it as a great public calamity if the office of Superintendent of Public Instruction, which has heretofore been filled by means of the appointing power, should be made elective. I can see no possible good that can arise from changing the manner in which that office has been filled, because no harm has arisen from the selection of this officer in times past. I am therefore ready to vote to retain the present system in force, because there has been no request or indication on the part of the people that this office should be made elective. If there is any office that should be entirely disconnected from the excitement of political matters, it is this office, which embraces all those questions which appertain to the educational interests of the children of the State.

I remember, sir, that about two years ago, when it was proposed to take away the special appointment of the Superintendent of the Orphans' School, that when it was suggested by some gentleman in the Senate that the present Superintendent of Public Schools should have charge of it, it was admitted that he had filled the duties so faithfully that by unanimous consent the charge of them was transferred over to him, where it remains at the present time. Now this man, filling the duties of this most important position thus well, would be subjected at the expiration of his term, just when he had come to understand the position and its requirements thoroughly, because it is not a place which a man can fill without much previous knowledge, to have by the candidate of a nominating convention. This would most certainly be regarded as one of the offices not to be filled by a politician. Its petty salary of $2,500 or $3,000 a year might make it a boon to be sought after by political managers, and at once it would be put into the arena of politics, to the detriment, most unquestionably, of the great educational interest of the State. The man who holds such a post may be most eminently qualified for it, but if his party happens to be in the minority he will be removed, though all the school interests of the State suffer, even though it bring detriment to that system, which, above everything else that comes before this Convention, we should most sedulously protect.

With regard to the suggestion of the gentleman from Carbon, (Mr. Lilly,) that the choice be made by the county superintendents, a great objection seems to arise in my mind in regard to that. It seems to me that these men are necessarily somewhat dependent on the officer they would select. They are under the control of the Superintendent to some extent, or under his supervision, and it would be inexpedient to entrust that power to them. I see nothing to be gained whatever by any change in that direction, but the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. J. Price Wetherill) suggests that it destroys the balance of the elective and appointed persons in this board of pardons, and of course that may require some consideration, and a change be made in the matter of choosing one of the others; but for Heavens be cautious of doing aught that might injure this great and most beneficent system.

MR. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say just a word on this subject. I favor the report as it comes from the Committee on the Executive Department, and for this reason: They, after a careful consideration of the matter, reported that they believed the Superintendent of Public Instruction should be elective. The Committee on Education, on the other hand, believes the reverse of this. Now it is for the Committee on the Executive Department to defend that portion of the section. I do not feel called upon to do it. But if they are right then I contend that the amendment should be voted down, as offered by the gentleman from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) because it affects the position of the board of pardons just passed.

Now, sir, continue the line of argument as offered by the gentleman from Lancaster (Mr. Carter.) Every word that he has said in regard to the appointment of the Superintendent of Public Instruction might also be said in regard to the appointment of the Secretary of Internal Affairs. For why? We charge the Secretary of Internal Affairs—according to the section which we have just passed—with all the public charities of the State, as I understand it. Thus every prison board throughout the State must report to him, if we carry out the idea of this section, and give him charge of the public charities, which I understand will be his duty. Shall we make that man elective? The same argument applying to either case, shall the man who has charge of the reformatory institutions of the State, shall the man who looks after the poor convicts of the State, shall the man to whose charge is committed the prison reformation of the State, go from county to county and from city to city, electioneer and endeavor to control this combination and that combination, in order that he may secure his office? Just as strong an argument may be offered in regard to his appointment as was offered in regard to the appointment of the Superintendent of Public Instruction. The people elect their school directors, and they are the ones who come in direct contact with the teacher and the child. They are the ones who control your schools. They elect the county superintendents, and this Superintendent of Public Instruction, throughout the State, is simply supervisory in his duties; and if the arguments apply forcibly in the one case, they will also apply forcibly in the other. We should make the Secretary of Internal Affairs appointive instead of elective, and thus let the board or council of pardons be entirely under the charge and control of the Governor.

Mr. STRUTHERS. Mr. Chairman: I wish to submit the following amendment to the amendment:

To insert after the word "election" the words, "except the Superintendent of Public Instruction, who shall be chosen by the county superintendents of schools in the State."

Mr. STRUTHERS. Mr. Chairman: It seems to me to be very properly arranged in the first section that this Superintendent of Public Instruction is made a member of the Executive department. It seems to me very appropriate that it should be so. It is necessary that, as a member of the Executive department, he should be at the seat of government. He may, therefore, with great propriety, serve as one of the advisers of the Governor in regard to the pardoning power. That all appears to be very right. It also seems to me to be important, as the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) so well expresses it, that you keep the direction and management of the schools as far aloof from every political influence as possible. I understand that now the Superintendent of Schools is elected by superintendents of the different counties. I see no impropriety or inconsistency, therefore, in letting that remain just as it has been, and let the superintendents of the schools of the several counties select or appoint this officer. The school directors elect the county superintendents of the several counties, and the superintendents of the several counties elect this Superintendent of Public Instruction.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman: I desire to inform the gentleman that such was the case, but the Superintendent of Public Instruction is now appointed by the Governor.

Mr. STRUTHERS. Mr. Chairman: I beg pardon, then. I am mistaken about that. But still, I would adhere to my amendment, and let the county superintendents who have been elected by the directors of the several townships in the county meet together and select a Superintendent of Public Instruction. You then would have the office entirely separate from these political influences. I hope, sir, that that view of it may be regarded and considered by the committee, and it does seem to me to be a very salutary one to adopt.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: One objection to the election by county superintendents may be that this office is one which it is not certain will always exist. In some counties I know there is a disposition to abolish it, and it would not be wise to place an appointing power in a power that may be withdrawn.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I call for the reading of the amendment.

The CLERK. To strike out the words, "Superintendent of Public Instruction."

On agreeing to the amendment, a division was called, which resulted forty-seven in the affirmative and twenty-eight in the negative.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the section as amended.

The section as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman: I perceive that the committee has made an error in the adoption of the twentieth and twenty-first sections, and I therefore move to reconsider the twentieth section.

I will state the ground upon which I make that motion. It will be observed by the reading of the twentieth section that we give to the Secretary of Internal Affairs the right to exercise all powers and duties devolving, by law, upon the Surveyor General. These duties and powers are designated in various acts of Assembly of this Commonwealth; and the effect of this section would be to crystallize these acts of Assembly, defining and designating these various powers and duties, into the Constitution of the State. Thus forming part of the organic law of the State, the Legislature could not either repeal any of the provisions of these various acts of Assembly or withdraw from the Secretary of Internal Affairs any of these powers, or amend or abridge them. They would become permanently crystallized into the fundamental law of the State. I think it is proper that this Convention should institute the office, and allow the Legislature to transfer the powers and duties of the office from the Surveyor General to that of the Secretary of Internal Affairs. The same principle has application to section twenty-one, and if this amendment prevails I shall then offer an amendment to the twenty-first section.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: I may add, in this connection, that, while the committee is not prepared to accept the criticism of my friend from Indiana (Mr. Clark) as being a necessary consequence of the language employed in the section as it stands, the purpose we had in view is precisely that which he intended to present by his amendment, and if it removes any possible doubt as to the construction of it, the committee will have no objection to it.

The motion of Mr. Clark to re-consider section twenty was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the twentieth section :

The CLERK read :

SECTION 20. The Secretary of Internal Affairs shall exercise all the powers and duties devolved by law upon the Surveyor General, and the office of Surveyor General shall cease when the Secretary of Internal Affairs shall be duly qualified. His department shall embrace a bureau of industrial statistics, and such duties relating to the charitable institutions, the agricultural, manufacturing, mines, mineral, timber and other material business interests of the State as may be by law assigned thereto. He shall annually make report to the Legislature, and at such other time as may be required by law.

Mr. CLARK. I now offer this amendment: Strike out the words "devolved by law upon the Surveyor General," and insert in lieu thereof the words "which shall be prescribed by law."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman: I now move to re-consider the vote by which the twenty-first section was adopted, upon the same ground.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the twenty-first section.

The CLERK read :

SECTION 21. The Superintendent of Public Instruction shall exercise all the powers and perform all the duties devolved by law upon the Superintendent of Common Schools; and the office of Superintendent of Common Schools shall cease when the Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be duly qualified.

Mr. CLARK. I now move to amend that section, by striking out the words "devolved by law upon the Superintendent of Common Schools," and inserting the words "which shall be prescribed by law."

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: After the action of the committee on the twenty-second section, it would be well to strike out the whole of this section.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Clark) what he proposes to do with the duties of the office of Superintendent of common schools before the act shall be passed putting those duties upon the Superintendent of Public Instruction? He provides for the abolition of one office, and then provides that certain duties may by law be put upon another office. What does he propose to do with the duties of the office in the interval? My remark will apply just as well to the amendment of the other section.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman: The powers and duties which devolve upon the Superintendent of Common Schools are only found in the various acts of Assembly respecting that office. We have no such officer designated in our present Constitution; his office is the creature of statute, and the powers and duties, therefore, devolving upon him must be defined in those acts of Assembly, and nowhere else.

It certainly must be admitted that if you create the office of Superintendent of Public Instruction, and define his powers and duties in the Constitution, it follows, as matter of course, that none of these can be taken away, abridged or impaired by any subsequent legislative enactment. His authority and jurisdiction in such case would be as independent of the Legislature as the power and jurisdiction of the Legislature is independent of him. Now whilst it is not proposed to recite specifically and in detail, in the Constitution, the powers and duties to be conferred, yet it is proposed to grant to this officer "all the powers and duties by law devolved upon the Superintendent of Common Schools," these duties and powers being given in detail in various acts of Assembly, and divers decisions of our courts. Is not the grant as specific as if these "powers and duties" were copied in detail into the Constitution? Is not the effect of the general grant of powers equivalent to a recital in the section under consideration? It is clear that the ascertainment of these various powers and duties, indicated in the section, as much involves an examination of these acts of Assembly as the comprehension of a legal document involves the reading of the exhibits attached and referred to. I regard the constitutional grant proposed in this twentieth section to be commensurate with the powers and duties heretofore by law conferred on the Superintendent of Common Schools, and the policy of its adoption a very bad one. The Constitution should be complete in itself; there is no necessity for references therein to any other paper, or any other instrument, act of Assembly or law to define the extent of the powers therein conferred.

As the material interests of this great Commonwealth shall expand, and its educational institutions enlarge, it may be found to be for the best interests and policy of the State to transfer some of the powers thus conferred to some other department of the government, or, perhaps, to dispense with a portion of the same altogether. In such a case we would find the Legislature powerless to disturb the grant, and nothing less than a constitutional amendment would or could effect the purpose.

It seems to me that the duty of this Convention should be, and is, simply to create the office, with such general designation of its objects and powers as to enable the Legislature to carry the same into effect. After the adoption of the Constitution, containing such general designation, it would be in the power of the Legislature to transfer these powers, and then the evil now complained of could not exist.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I do not see that the gentleman has answered my question. I do not wish to crystallize into the Constitution, as the gentleman calls it, laws that now impose duties upon the Superintendent of Public Instruction, but I do not want to leave an intermission between the destruction of one office and the enactment of the law which will put the duties before that time performed in that office, upon the officer substituted by our action. I would ask the gentleman whether or not the end could not be better attained by an amendment which I will suggest, to insert after the words "common schools" the words, "subject to such change as shall be made by law," so that the section shall read: "The Superintendent of Public Instruction shall exercise all the powers, and perform all the duties, devolved by law upon the Superintendent of Common Schools, subject to such change as shall be made by law; and the office of Superintendent of Common Schools shall cease when the Superintendent of Public Schools shall be qualified."

I ask whether that would not cure the evil which the gentleman speaks of, without creating the evil of which I complain.

In order to bring the question up, I will move as an amendment, that after the words "common schools" in the third line, we insert the words, "subject to such change as shall be made by law."

Mr. BIDDLE. I think that is an improvement. I am not certain, upon reflection, that the criticism which was made after the vote was re-considered was valid, but if there be a doubt, it is better to remove it as we are changing it. I think I prefer the change suggested by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall.)

Mr. MANN, Mr. Chairman: I would simply suggest that the Committee on Schedule will relieve us of all this difficulty. There will be various matters of this kind to be remedied, and the Committee on Schedule can accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall.) Therefore we ought to adopt the best phraseology, without regard to the effect of creating an interim.

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: There is one thing to which I would like to call the attention of the committee, in connection with the subject of the schedule, the proper place for this section. We have a section here which seems to be in its proper place, and which, I think, provides for all that is wanted by this amendment.

"A Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be appointed by the Governor, by and through the advice and consent of the Senate. He shall hold his office for the term of four years, and his duties and compensation shall be prescribed by law."

That is the section reported by the Committee on Education. Now, with that section, why should we have this section twenty-one at all? Would not the object of the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Clark) be just as well accomplished by voting down this section and leaving it out altogether, and then leaving the question of grafting upon this Constitution, the law as it now exists, and provide in the schedule for the time when the duties of the Superintendent of Common Schools shall expire, and then allow the section which I have just read from the report of the Committee on Education, to take its place when it comes to be passed, and do without section twenty-one in this report entirely? I make that suggestion. I think it will answer every purpose.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: The second sober thought is usually the correct one, and upon reflection I am satisfied that the judgment of the committee is correct. The purpose of the committee was not to invest this officer with any power which should be beyond the control of the Legislature, but simply that he should be vested with the powers now exercised by the Superintendent of Common Schools. The word was carefully chosen, and the House will observe that it reads "all duties devolved;" it does not say now devolved; nor is there anything in its construction which would exclude legislative changes in the law. I believe that the judgment of the committee, which was very carefully formed, and in which this expression was very carefully considered, was correct.

I do not, at present, see any particular objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Broomall.) It, perhaps, would make still more clear that which seems to be sufficiently clear already, and in this view I see no especial objection to the amendment. But I cannot perceive any sufficient reason for radically changing the section as has been proposed by my friend from Indiana (Mr. Clark.) The phraseology which he proposes leaves it open to the criticism that no duties be devolved upon the new officer until after the Legislature had declared what duties he shall exercise; and it was part of the purpose of the committee to avoid just that calamity, and clothe the new officer with all the powers and duties of the old and preceeding officer. I believe the language was carefully selected, and that it is not open to the criticism suggested.

As the section has been re-considered, and is now before the committee, I would have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. Broomall,) and I think the section should then stand as reported by the committee with that amendment.

Mr. CLARK. I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall.)

Upon the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Broomall, a division was called, which resulted: Affirmative, fifty-eight; negative, thirteen.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The twenty-first section as amended was then agreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I desire to ask unanimous consent—I do not know whether it will be granted—to make the same change in the previous sentence for the same reason. It cannot be re-considered if unanimous consent is not granted, and in that case I will wait until the bill comes up on second reading.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to going back and re-considering the section that has been agreed to?

["No!" "No!"]

Mr. BROOMALL. Then I make the corresponding motion with respect to that section (the twentieth.) After the word "general," in the second line, insert "subject to such change as shall be made by law."

The question being on the motion to amend, it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The section as amended is now before the committee.

The question being upon the section as amended, it was agreed to.

Mr. MANTOR. I now offer the following as an additional section:

SECTION 23. The Attorney General shall be chosen by the qualified electors of the State at the time and places at which they shall vote for members of the General Assembly, and shall hold his office for the term of four years.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: Is not that inconsistent with section nine, already adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. It is, and is therefore not in order at this time.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following as an additional section. I am not sure, however, that this is the proper place for it.

SECTION 23. The Secretary of the Commonwealth, Attorney General, Auditor General, State Treasurer and Secretary of Internal Affairs shall be entitled to seats in the House of Representatives, and may speak upon questions which shall arise therein relating to their several departments, and may be questioned concerning the same, but shall have no right to vote.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman: I would suggest to the mover that that should be an amendment to the article on Legislature.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I had some doubts about its being in order here. I withdraw it.

The committee then rose.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. President: The committee of the whole has had under consideration the article reported by the Committee on Executive, and has instructed me to report the same back to the Convention, with amendments.

The PRESIDENT. The committee of the whole has had under consideration the article reported by the Committee on Executive, and has instructed its chairman to report the same back to the Convention, with amendments. The amendments will be read.

The CLERK then read the amendments.

The PRESIDENT. The amendments will be entered on the Journal.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The President presented a communication from Adelaide M. Murdock, dated Philadelphia, March 5, 1873, inviting the members of the Convention to be present at a lecture she proposes delivering in opposition to woman suffrage, on Saturday, March 15, 1873, which was laid on the table.

CITIES AND CITY CHARTERS.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the consideration, in committee of the whole, of the article reported by the Committee on Cities and City Charters.

The Convention then, as in committee of the whole, Mr. Darlington in the chair, proceeded to the consideration of the report submitted by the Committee on Cities and City Charters.

The CHAIRMAN. The first section of the article will be read.

The CLERK read the first section, as follows :

SECTION 1. The Legislature shall pass general laws, whereby a city may be established whenever a majority of the electors of any town or borough voting at any general election shall vote in favor of the same being established.

The question being upon the section, it was agreed to :

The CHAIRMAN. The second section will be read.

The CLERK then read the second section, as follows :

SECTION 2. Every city now existing, or hereafter established, shall be governed by a mayor and a select and common council, in whom the legislative power shall be vested.

The question being upon the section, it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The third section will be read.

The CLERK then read the third section, as follows :

SECTION 3. The mayor shall have a qualified veto on all the acts and ordinances passed by the council, shall see that the duties of the several officers are faithfully performed, but shall exercise no judicial functions, civil or criminal.

Mr. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman : I move to amend, by adding after the word "shall," in the second line, "appoint all heads of departments not elected by the people, and shall," so that it shall read, "shall appoint all heads of departments not elected by the people, and shall see that the duties of the several officers are faithfully performed," &c.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman : I move to amend the amendment, by striking out the words "heads of departments," and inserting "officers." In the city I come from we have no "heads of departments," but we have "officers."

Mr. LITTLETON. I accept the amendment.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman : Before that amendment is adopted I should like to hear from the mover of the proposition, or some one else, some good and sufficient reason why we should give to the mayor in the city of Philadelphia, without consent of either branch of the council, supreme power in the indirect expenditure of many millions of dollars annually. It strikes me, sir, that that is giving the mayor of the city of Philadelphia a little too much power. Power, I know, must rest somewhere ; but, at the same time, it seems to me that if it be proper that this Convention should delegate power over the expenditure, directly and indirectly, of so much money, it ought to be by and with the consent of either one or both branches of the council. For my own part I favor the section just as it is reported from the committee. The gentleman who offers that amendment is a member of that committee. I admit his experience is large, from the position that he occupies in the city government, and he knows, perhaps much better than I do what would be for the benefit of large cities, but I should like to hear a reason for lodging with the mayor of any city so much power and so much patronage.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman : I desire to amend the amendment, by adding after the words "heads of departments" the words "or other officers."

Mr. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman : I accept that amendment.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman : I am in favor of the amendment as proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Littleton.) I do not agree with the remarks of my friend Mr. J. P. Wetherill.

I have had large experience in the municipal affairs of the city of Philadelphia, extending over a period of nine years' membership in its select council, and three years as its presiding officer, and I must say, with the experience I have had, I think the suggestion of the gentleman, who is now president of the select council, is full of wisdom. The mayor of the city of Philadelphia to-day is practically powerless. He sees constantly abuses—and growing abuses—and yet he is powerless to remedy them. The reason is that he has no control over the selection or removal of the heads of departments of the city government. They are selected by a joint convention of the select and common councils of the city, purely through political motives and political considerations. They are selected purely for party services rendered in the past, and for those which they may be capable of rendering in the future, and the consequence is, as a practical result, that while our streets are wretchedly paved, while our highways are unclean and filthy, and while many of the departments of the city government are as slipshod as they can possibly be, our mayor, though a gentleman of the highest virtue and largest intelligence, is simply powerless to apply any remedy. It is high time that we should have some redress for this condition of affairs, and I know of no method by which that redress can be obtained except by making the head of the department feel that he is responsible to the mayor of the city, and the mayor of the city responsible to the people of the city for the manner in which his duties are discharged. It may be that some little detail in the amendment of the gentleman from this city (Mr. Littleton) may be desirable. It may be that these heads of departments should receive the confirming vote of the majority of the select council of the city, or something of that kind; but that the mayor of the city of Philadelphia should be held responsible to the citizens for the manner in which the city is governed, and that power should be placed in his hands commensurate with that responsibility, I think is a crying necessity. I am amazed my friend Mr. Wetherill should doubt that it exists. He, too, has had large experience in the municipal affairs of this city, and I am sure his own reflection will confirm what I say, that the mayor is powerless to redress the wrong which he sees constantly before his eyes. I am in favor of a system that shall clothe the chief executive of the city with the largest power and responsibility—a power commensurate with his responsibility and a responsibility commensurate with his power. I do not believe in any other system of efficient administration. I cannot conceive it possible that the city could be wisely governed or its citizens could enjoy, as is their right, the blessings of good police, pure air, and water and light, and clean highways, except there be placed in the hands of the chief magistrate of the city power equal to the responsibility which rests upon him. I therefore shall readily vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from the city (Mr. Littleton.) I would suggest that the appointments made by the mayor be confirmed by a vote of the members of the select council, and the amendment offered by the gentleman will then be in harmony with our usual system.

MR. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman: I will accept the suggestion of the gentleman from the city, (Mr. Cuyler,) and incorporate it as part of my amendment.

MR. JOHN PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I then withdraw the motion I made.

MR. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman: My object in offering this amendment is simply to place the responsibility of these appointments where it certainly ought to rest. Now, under the present elective system by councils, the responsibility is so divided that it is impossible to ascertain upon whom the blame should fall in the event of an improper person being selected to fill an official position. I think the mayor of the city, chosen, of course, as he must be for some good reasons, naturally supposed to be upright at least, should be charged with this duty of appointing the proper heads of departments, and be required to assume the entire responsibility, so that if he appoint improper persons to office he can be held to a strict accountability.

It should be borne in mind that a city does not deal with the natural or civil rights of an individual, but manages exclusively the municipality, and it practically is a question of business and entirely a question of dollars and cents, and the plan which we shall adopt should be that one which shall secure the most effective service in our officials. Now I apprehend that in a large corporation no one would think of selecting its officers by means of a system of popular suffrage. People would scout at the idea, and it would be simply ridiculous. I believe there would be a direct responsibility vested in the mayor of the city by the adoption of this amendment, and I think the interests of the community will thereby be better promoted.

MR. GUTHRIE. Mr. Chairman: I desire to amend the amendment, by inserting after the word "shall" the following words: "Nominate, and by and with the consent of the select council, appoint all city executive and administrative officers, except the city treasurer and city controller."

MR. WALKER. Mr. Chairman: The section originally drawn and submitted to the committee contained the amendment suggested by the gentleman from the city, (Mr. Littleton,) and also other of the views of some of the members of the Convention. The section as first written read somewhat in the following manner: "The mayor shall nominate, and with the advice of the select council, appoint and remove all the municipal officers not herein made electible." The balance of the section read as it has been reported by the committee. It was originally drawn and submitted to the committee by myself, and the committee called before it a number of gentlemen from the city to advise with its members upon the subject. The result of their advice and our deliberations was to strike out the words I have referred to. I am free to say, however, that they were not stricken out entirely with my approbation; but inasmuch as the city of Philadelphia was more interested in this article than any other portion of the State, I assented to the proposition. I think the section itself is a good one, but the amendment which has been suggested, I think, will be an improvement. The amendment I would propose to the section would be the section as it was originally drawn, together with the suggestion offered by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Guthrie;) but the object of the members of this committee, coming, as they do, from all parts of the Commonwealth, was to consult the interests of the city of Philadelphia and the city of Pittsburg. These cities were the most interested in the questions presented for the consideration of the committee, and believing it would best subserve their interests to report the section in its former shape, it was drawn up and submitted to the committee, but after consultation with the city authorities of Philadelphia it was amended as it is now presented in the report of the committee. I desire to state, however, that I would have preferred the section in its original form.

MR. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I have not seen this section as it was originally submitted to the committee, and I prefer it to the one reported by the committee. I desire to ask the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Guthrie) to withdraw his amendment, in order that I may offer the original section as a substitute for the one reported by the committee.

MR. GUTHRIE. Mr. Chairman: I withdraw my amendment.

MR. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I desire the Clerk to read the section as amended, by the addition of the original section.

The CLERK read as follows:

"The mayor shall nominate, and with the advice of the select councils, appoint and remove all municipal officers not herein made electible. He shall have a qualified veto on all the acts and ordinances passed by the council, shall see the duties of the several offices are faithfully performed, but shall exercise no judiciary functions, civil or criminal."

MR. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I offer the section, as read by the Clerk, as a substitute for the section reported by the committee.

MR. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I hope the amendment will not pass in the form it is at present. From hearing it read over I understand the amendment gives to the mayor the power of the appointment of all officers of the city, excepting those made electible by this Convention. Now it is the latter clause of the section to which I object. I am in favor conferring the power on the mayor, with the advice and consent of select council, to appoint all officers, not made electible, but I think there is a large number of officers in a city, who from time to time it may be found better to elect than to leave to be appointed by the mayor. I do not know what officers the article makes electible. It seems there are none, but I am well satisfied that the wisdom of this Convention cannot determine what officers should be made electible and appointable. I prefer, however, some amendment which shall leave this whole question to the Legislature. I believe the city councils to be the worst possible depository for the appointing power, and although conferring the exercise of this power upon the mayor, with the consent of one of the city councils, is a decided improvement, yet

I think the people are the best depository for the appointing power in our cities, and that one-half or more of those officers now elected by the city councils should be elected by the people.

I would be glad if the chairman of the committee would modify the proposition, by inserting the words, "except such officers as shall by law be made elective by the people."

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman: I agree with the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Ewing) in his criticism upon the language of the amendment proposed to be inserted here. We have in Philadelphia, for instance, several officers who are now elected by the people, and among these are the receiver of taxes and the city treasurer. This report of the Committee on the Executive, I believe, does not provide for the election of these officers. I would not like the mayor of this city to have the power to appoint the receiver of taxes and the city treasurer—the men who have charge of the city's money. I think we had better, if the amendment is to be inserted at all, have its language so qualified as to except all those officers who are either now elected or who may be hereafter elected by the people.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. Chairman: I think there is an error here in the word vote. It is a misprint. The amendment reads, "he shall have a qualified vote." It ought to read, "that he shall have a qualified veto." I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, as follows: To strike out the word "qualified," and change "vote" into "veto."

Then, if the amendment be adopted, it will leave the mayor with a veto without qualification.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I will state, for the information of the gentleman, that the word "vote" was only a misprint, and has been changed to "veto," which was intended—

Mr. GUTHRIE. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my amendment. I am advised by many gentlemen to let the word "qualified" remain, and I will therefore withdraw my amendment on that subject.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman: What is before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I would like to have it read again, because I take an interest in this subject, and really do not know what we are considering.

The CHAIRMAN. If the House will come to order, and gentlemen refrain from conversation, the amendments will be read.

The CLERK: The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Littleton) moves to insert, after the word "shall," as follows:

"By and with the consent of the select council appoint all heads of departments, and municipal officers, not elected by the people, and shall see that the duties of the several officers are faithfully performed, but shall exercise no judicial functions, civil or criminal."

To this the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) offers the following amendment: To strike out the section and insert:

"The mayor shall nominate and, with the advice of the select council, appoint and remove all municipal officers not herein made elective. He shall have a qualified veto on all the acts and ordinances passed by council, shall see that the duties of the several officers are faithfully performed, but shall exercise no judicial functions, civil or criminal."

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: The amendment to the amendment is open to the criticism made by my brother from Philadelphia (Mr. Campbell.) For instance: There are certain heads of departments elected by the people, and who, for wise reasons, should not be appointed by the mayor, and certain other officers, such, as for example, the city treasurer, the auditor of the city accounts and the receiver of taxes. They ought not to be appointed by the mayor. They are now, and, it seems to me, should be in the future, elected by the people. Therefore the proper reading of this section should be, in my judgment:

"The mayor shall nominate and, with the advice of the select council, appoint and remove all municipal officers not herein made elective. He shall have a qualified veto on all the acts and ordinances passed by council, shall see that the duties of the several officers are faithfully performed, but shall exercise no judicial functions, civil or criminal."

That would seem to express it, and if the gentleman would accept that as a substitute for his amendment, I think it would meet the difficulty.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Philadelphia accept that as a modification of his amendment?

Mr. EWING. I think the amendment originally offered by the gentleman from this city (Mr. Littleton) covers it completely, and there is no necessity or propriety in naming any officer.

Mr. BIDDLE. I am not certain about that.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I think this substitute much more explicit and definite.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I wish to leave it as it is. I do not object particularly to any provision which will leave it to the Legislature to provide by general law for the election to any office that may be created in the State.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I confess I do. I have never been able, in my experience in the affairs of the city, to conceive how leaving it to the Legislature would work out a wise result. I think it ought to be specially provided for in the Constitution itself. With the permission of the committee I will read this section again.

"The mayor shall nominate and, with the advice of the select council, appoint and remove all municipal officers not herein made elective; he shall have a qualified veto on all the acts and ordinances passed by councils, shall see that the duties of the several officers are faithfully performed, but shall exercise no judicial functions, civil or criminal."

That does not permit the Legislature to take away from the mayor the power to appoint a commissioner of highways, a commissioner of city property and other heads of departments. It does not permit the Legislature to do that. The Constitution itself specifies that the mayor shall have this certain power of making appointments. They are excepted from legislative control; but the Legislature is left free to control the election of receiver of taxes, the city controller and the city treasurer and any others than heads of municipal departments.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman: It appears, from the explanations of a large number of the members of this Convention, that they seem to think this measure is intended only for and will affect only the city of Philadelphia. I do not so consider it. I consider that we are preparing some plan for the general regulation of the State, and not for one particular city.

With due deference to the chairman of the Committee on Cities and City Characters, and to some of my colleagues, I desire to say that I entirely differ with them on this subject. In my opinion this matter is altogether foreign to the Constitution of the State, and has no place here whatever. It should be entirely a question of general law. Now we can readily see from the suggestions made here that hardly two gentlemen upon this floor agree upon any provision contained in this report, and that we are all trying only to form some plan which will suit the city of Philadelphia. I agree with my colleague (Mr. Cuyler) in regard to the question of reposing more power in and of placing more responsibility upon the mayor of this city. But at the same time I am jealous of the rights of the people. Now in the first place this is, to my mind, special legislation. The Committee on Legislation have, in their report, provided for this very case. If this committee will turn to the report of the Committee on Legislation, on page three, they will find that it reported as follows:

"That the Legislature shall not pass any local or special law regulating the affairs of counties, cities, townships, wards or boroughs or school districts."

By general law, therefore, I submit to the committee that this subject should be regulated by the Legislature. That is the proper place for it. Why, sir, this provides that we shall exempt from legislation in the city of Philadelphia the offices of city treasurer, city controller and the receiver of city taxes. No offices of the kind are mentioned in this respect, but what city outside of the city of Philadelphia will ever have such offices? And how are we to provide for all the wants and necessities of the different cities throughout the Commonwealth? I submit this view. Perhaps the people of Harrisburg, or of Lancaster, or of Williamsport may not require more than one branch of municipal legislature. Yet we undertake to say that every city shall be governed by a select and common council. Philadelphia may need this double council. It may be more convenient to this city. Pittsburg may find it more convenient to be thus governed, but Scranton, Wilkesbarre and Lancaster may not find it so convenient, and may be satisfied with one branch. Why should we impose upon them, then, the conditions as reported by the committee? At any time that they desire a double body in the municipal legislature the people themselves can obtain it through the Legislature. They will regulate for all the cities of the Commonwealth. Had we not better let the people of each particular city determine for themselves, under the provisions of a general law, how they shall be governed? If that is done, we in Philadelphia can provide, by general law, what officers shall be appointed by the mayor of the city, and what shall be elected by the people. So in other cities. Our friend says that the mayor of Philadelphia is only a chief of police. So he is, but that was in the act of consolidation; that is under the very charter that the people of Philadelphia asked for and received at the hands of the Legislature. And if it does not suit us can we not, under a general law, ask the Legislature to give us other provisions? Cannot a law be passed authorizing the mayor to appoint other officers? I certainly submit it can, and why should we embarrass and encumber the Constitution of the State by such petty details as that the mayor shall appoint all the officers of the municipality but the city controller, the city treasurer and the receiver of taxes. Why they may not have these officers in other cities, and in order to carry out the plan suggested by my colleague we ought to have a section saying that Philadelphia shall be governed as follows.

I do submit to the Committee on City and City Characters, and to my colleagues who differ with me, that this is not the place for any such plan of municipal government.

MR. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman: I will add but one word. The gentleman from Philadelphia, who has just spoken, (Mr. Hanna,) says that this section should be provided for by a general law. That, undoubtedly, should be the case, if there was any opportunity of ever securing such legislation. It is very easy to talk about, but very difficult to obtain. I contend that anything, no matter whether it is for this city or for any other part of the State in which we can make a general improvement, is proper in this Constitution. It does not do to say here that this is special legislation; but if special legislation for a particular class, or for particular communities, will be a benefit generally to the State, then we should put it in here, and not trust to the chance or mischance of future legislation. My colleague says that this interferes with the rights of the people. I have all respect for such rights, but I maintain that it does not infringe upon what we generally call the rights of the people, the rights which are protected by a nationality or by a State. What have such rights to do with the question of street paving, or the question of water pipe, or any of the many other questions which come before a community like a municipality.

These are questions, as I said before, of business management, purely of dollars and cents, and each community should be placed in a condition to have these services best done and at the cheapest price. You cannot do it, in my judgment, under your general system of municipal management as it exists at the present time, at least that is the result, right or wrong, of my experience. I believe that we should have direct and positive management and responsibility, even if it does take away some of the assumed rights, in a general sense, of the community. I shall be glad, sir, to surrender mine upon that subject, I assure you.

The only objection that I have to the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) is that it renders impossible any change. I am willing to leave to the Legislature, by general enactment, the discretion to say which offices shall be filled by the people. I think it is wiser not to trammel it too much, but I am willing to accept either; but if we prohibit the Legislature from passing special laws affecting this or that locality, of course they cannot change one without changing all; and all over the State the different cities will exercise a supervision upon these questions. It will not be whether the city of Philadelphia is affected or not, but whether all the cities are affected, and therefore I think it better to have it upon the broad principle that the mayor shall have the responsibility placed upon him of selecting all officials, heads of departments and otherwise, who are not elected by the people. If he exercise that power improperly the Legislature has the power to place the selection in the hands of the people throughout the State, not simply in one locality. Therefore, I think, looking at the objection urged by my friend from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler,) it will be better to leave it in that condition; but, so far as I am individually concerned, I have no special preference. I think the amendment, as proposed by myself or by my colleague, (Mr. Cuyler,) should be adopted.

MR. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I have already spoken too often upon this subject, but I trust the committee will bear with me for a moment. I confess that I listened with a great deal of surprise to that which fell from my friend from Philadelphia (Mr. Hanna.) No man knows better than he does the wishes of the people of the city of Philadelphia, and that the Legislature of the State has utterly refused to listen to or recognise the councils of the city. No man knows better than he does how utterly powerless those councils are to-day in Harrisburg, to obtain any legislation they ask for. No man knows better than he does, the fact that if the city of Philadelphia asks she is to be refused, because she asks. Our streets are taken from us and handed over to private corporations. The city councils, with almost entire unanimity, entreat the Legislature not to do it; but the Legislature is silent. So it is with almost everything that is asked from the Legislature of Pennsylvania which has the endorsement of the councils of Philadelphia. To ask it is to be sure to be refused.

Now I do not recognize the distinction which disturbs the mind of my excellent friend from the city (Mr. Littleton.) This Convention is but the embodiment of the people of Pennsylvania. This higher law called the Constitution, which we are to make here, is but an enactment of the people of Pennsylvania, which they shall approve by their confirming vote hereafter, when it is submitted, and will be just as much a law and an enactment of the people of the State as an act of the Legislature would be.

A word as to the particular amendment. The thought that underlies the amendment is, that there must be individual responsibility in these matters that come so closely home to us as the police of the city, the protection of our lives and our property, the enjoyment of pure water, good light and pure air, and a thousand and one things having more to do with the happiness and the comfort of the people of the city than any legislation of the Legislature, or any legislation of the Congress of the United States. If we are to have these blessings, we are only to have them by depositing a large power in the hands of a responsible public officer. Elect him by the people, hold him to a rigid responsibility as to the manner in which he discharges his duties, but give him a power that is commensurate with the responsibility you deposit with him.

I have another reason that moves my mind that might affect the judgment of many members of this Convention. I think that many of the laws that afflict our city have arisen from overburthening our popular elections. We send too many things to the people; we should elect, by popular vote, the chief or leading officers of the State and of our municipalities; but, as for electing the immense number of officers that we have been accustomed to do, I think it is to destroy the value of the popular vote itself, to multiply temptations and incentives to dishonesty in the manipulation of elections, and tends seriously to damage the rights of the citizen which I would exercise in the popular vote not more than the proper administration of the republican system of our government would simply and reasonably require.

I would give the mayor the appointment of these various heads of departments, to lay our pavements and water-pipes, and provide pure air and good gas for the consumption of our citizens. I would give him all these appointments, because I would clothe the citizen with the power to look to some one individual for the manner in which this thing is done, and to hold him responsible for the proper discharge of that duty. If you do that, you must give him power commensurate with his responsibility.

Mr. GIBSON. It is evident, sir, that the committee is not prepared to act upon this article. The differences that exist among the gentlemen from Philadelphia show that the measure has been sprung upon them prematurely. Therefore, sir, in order to give the gentlemen from Philadelphia and the gentlemen from other cities an opportunity of coming to some understanding upon this question, which is, perhaps, of considerable importance, I move that the committee now rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to, and the committee rose.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: The committee of the whole have had under consideration the article of the Constitution relating to cities and city charters, and have instructed their chairman to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Leave was granted to the committee to sit again to-morrow.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

So the Convention, at two o'clock and twenty-five minutes, adjourned.

FIFTY-NINTH DAY.

THURSDAY, March 6, 1873.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M.

Prayer was offered by Rev. James W. Curry.

JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DEATH OF MR. HOPKINS.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has the painful duty of announcing to the Convention that yesterday afternoon, shortly after the adjournment, he received a telegraphic dispatch from Pittsburg announcing that our late colleague, Col. Wm. Hopkins, died at two o'clock yesterday. It is with sincere pain and regret that the Chair makes this announcement. He presumes some gentleman is ready to offer a resolution upon the subject.

Mr. LAWRENCE offered the following preamble and resolutions, which were read :

WHEREAS, This Convention has been informed of the sudden death of Hon. William Hopkins, of Washington county, a delegate from the Twenty-sixth Senatorial district ; therefore,

Resolved, That it is with the deepest feeling and most unaffected regret that we have heard of the sudden death of Hon. Wm. Hopkins, a member of this Convention, so universally esteemed and so highly respected.

Resolved, That in his death this body has lost a faithful and honest member, a useful and intelligent citizen, and his family a tender and devoted parent.

Resolved, That in this hour of deep affliction and grief we tender to his family, so deeply stricken, our most sincere condolence and profound sympathy.

Resolved, That as an evidence of our respect for the memory of the deceased, we do hereby appoint a committee of this Convention to attend his funeral at Washington, Pa.

Resolved, That the Chief Clerk be directed to forward to the family of the deceased a copy of these resolutions; and that we do now adjourn.

By unanimous consent the Convention proceeded to the second reading of the resolutions.

The first resolution was read the second time and agreed to.

The second resolution was again read.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. President: The most certain, and often the most unexpected messenger, death, comes to take us one by one away from these earthly scenes, and whether among the humble and lowly, or the honored and esteemed of the world, the messenger is alike inexorable. He is as a thief in the night, sometimes stealing stealthily, yet slowly and unexpectedly, upon his victims, and then again he attacks boldly and suddenly the vital powers of the system, when the clay tenement yields, and is robbed, by tender and sympathizing friends, in the habiliments of the grave.

When I asked this Convention, on last Friday morning, for leave of absence for my highly esteemed colleague, Hon. William Hopkins, for only a few days, that he might visit his family, to whom he was always so ardently attached, and to whose welfare he took such an undisguised interest, how little did you or I imagine that in five days I should here perform the most melancholy duty of announcing his death, and speaking very briefly of his virtues?

On his way west to Pittsburg he contracted a cold, and was compelled to take his bed at the Union hotel, utterly prostrated, on Friday morning last. Physicians were at once called, and pronounced his disease pneumonia of malignant type, and after a very few days of suffering, surrounded by members of his family and sympathizing friends, at two o'clock yesterday he died.

The deceased was born in the southeastern part of the county of Washington, in the year 1804, and was now in his sixty-eighth year. He was a tanner by trade, but did not pursue the business very long; was appointed justice of the peace by Governor Schultz and re-appointed by Governor Wolf, and served acceptably for several years; was elected to the Legislature, I believe, in 1834, and for several years thereafter, and served as Speaker of the House for three sessions, and was esteemed an impartial and judicious presiding officer; was appointed Secretary of the Land Office by Governor Shunk, and served two years; was a candidate for Congress in 1848, in the district composed of Washington and Beaver, and was beaten less than one hundred votes. He was elected Canal Commissioner in 1852, and served three years. In 1862 he was again elected to the House of Representatives, and in 1863 to the Senate, from Washington and Greene, and served a full term; and then at the last election was elected as a member to this Convention from the Twenty-sixth Senatorial district.

This long and almost continuous service will show that he retained the confidence and esteem of his constituents, and they are equal in intelligence and integrity to any found in the State.

Since my boyhood, the name of Col. William Hopkins has been as familiar to me, and to every man raised in his native county, as that of any public or private citizen, and now, that he is gone, thousands of his early and late friends will express sincere condolence with his family and friends, and cherish the memory of his public and private life.

In politics he was an ardent democrat, having, in early life, embraced the principles of the then dominant party. He clung to them in his early manhood, and in his later years with great firmness, and on all proper occasions was ready to defend and elucidate them before the public.

Personally, he was much esteemed for kindness, his manner to all was (as you know) exceedingly pleasant, and his political opponents could always admire his manly and dignified bearing. He was a member of the Presbyterian church, consistent and exemplary in his deportment, and faithful in the performance of every duty. No man could excel him in his attachment to his family, and at home he found his greatest enjoyment. For a somewhat delicate wife (who still survives) he expressed the most constant and tender solicitude, and his children—how could he have loved them more? I trust a kind Providence will enable them calmly to submit to the fate they cannot control.

Here we have lost a faithful and useful member, one esteemed by us all for his ability, his integrity and devotion to the public welfare. It is a solemn and impressive lesson, which must tend to divert our thoughts from these worldly honors, to the rewards of a higher life.

Mr HAZZARD. Mr. President: It is with profound and sincere regret I have heard of the sudden death of my friend and colleague, the Hon. William Hopkins, of Washington.

I have had the pleasure and honor of a long and intimate acquaintance with him and my poor words will fail to convey to this body a full appreciation of his many excellencies and virtues. These few words of praise and eulogium will only be proper upon this sad occasion as a remembrancer in memoriam, for his public acts have gone into the history of his native State, and will remain there as a lasting monument to his wisdom, integrity, and unswerving and patriotic devotion to the best interests of the Commonwealth. He has been often elevated to stations of honor and responsible trusts, by a confiding constituency, and the public never regretted their choice, for when his work was done, and the trust was executed, and he surrendered these trusts back into the hands of those who gave them to him, the universal acclaim of a grateful people was: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." The slanderous tongue has been silent before his immaculate integrity, and his spotless life and public deeds are as pure as snow, and white as wool. William Hopkins goes to his grave with true nobility stamped upon his brow—the noblest work of God, an honest man.

His domestic virtues were as noteworthy as his public services. He was an affectionate and true husband, a kind parent, a considerate neighbor, a faithful friend, a sound and wise counsellor, and an exemplary christian gentleman. He was charitable to the poor, and foremost in all benevolent and christian enterprises. By his death, his immediate neighborhood will lose the inspiration of his public spirit, his interesting, highly respectable, and intellectual family his kind words of wisdom and advice, and the rich gifts of his social and genial nature, and the State his invaluable services in this Convention.

Mr. W. H. SMITH. Mr. President: Although it was not my privilege to know Colonel Hopkins very long, nor very intimately, I hardly remember the time when his example, as an honest, firm and faithful public officer, was not held up before young men who aspired to political distinction. As his home was some thirty miles from mine, I have only met him as long intervals—and, unlike many here, who have shared with him legislative labors—thus I had no opportunity to know him until I met here, and for a few weeks have enjoyed the privilege of a seat next to his. Yet I claim the mournful privilege of saying a few words in the praise of a man so excellent, that it may be truly said he needs no praise.

I would then beg leave to add my sorrowing testimony to the virtues of the deceased, and to join in the general expressions of regret that come from all sides of the Hall, and evidently from the inmost hearts of those who have spoken—whether they were of his own political faith, or opposed to him in their political views.

I can add nothing to the eloquent eulogies that have been uttered. But his manly virtues have not been too warmly portrayed—his pure and consistent life well deserves all that has been said in its commendation. Among all civilized nations it has been forbidden to speak ill of the dead. And it has too often happened that more good has been ascribed to the departed than was warranted by the course of their lives. But in the case of our lamented co-laborer, nothing like this would happen. Happily for his family, his friends and his brethern in religious and in political association, no tribute to his memory could possibly say too much of his sterling honor and high integrity. A tender and kindly remembrance of his many virtues will long survive him.

It is a consoling circumstance to his bereaved family that nothing can diminish the veneration in which he will ever be held by his fellow-citizens, for it must always be, notwithstanding the unjust apportionment of praise and of blame to those who die, that “Only the actions of the just,

Smell sweet, and blossom in the dust!”

Mr. PATTON. Mr. President: We are again called upon to mourn the loss of a dear friend. Again we are reminded that in the midst of life we are in death. A noble and honorable member of our Convention has been removed from among us by the stern decree of omnipotent power—called home to his reward. Mr. Hopkins, of Washington county, was a gentleman standing high in the estimation of this Convention in intelligence and integrity; a member beloved by us all.

This sad and unexpected event, so shocking in its character, has cast a dark shadow over this assembly, and temporarily unfitted us for the discharge of our respective duties in the contemplation of so appalling an event.

The many bright and honorable positions held by our deceased friend in public life attest the estimation in which he was held by a great army of ardent and devoted friends.

He was a representative man, and has left a proud record in the annals of the Commonwealth, to be inherited not only by his family, but by every Pennsylvanian who admires genius and integrity. The personal relations existing between us were of the most gratifying and pleasant character, and no one will mourn his loss in this body more sincerely than your speaker. It seems to me eminently proper that out of respect to the memory of our departed friend the Convention should adjourn.

Mr. JOHN N. PURVIANCE. Mr. President: I second the motion of the gentleman from Washington. Why the sadness depicted upon the countenance of every member of this Convention? It is that our number is one less than when we adjourned yesterday.

William Hopkins, an honored member of this body, is no more. But a few days ago he was in our midst, apparently in the enjoyment of his usual good health, and an active and useful participant in the proceedings of this Convention. As chairman of the committee of the whole, filling the place now occupied by your honor, he was clear in his perception, sound in judgment and impartial and prompt in his decisions, commanding the respect and admiration of every member of the Convention. His death but adds another instance of the great truth, that “in the midst of life we are in death,” and admonishes all to be prepared for the one great event which is the common lot of all mankind.

Hon. William Hopkins was a gentleman of eminent worth, endeared to all who knew him for his sterling integrity, his manly honor, and his exemplary christian virtues.

It should be the pride of our public men to emulate his bright example. His record as a faithful public officer is without a stain of dishonor, and without the charge or suspicion of a dishonorable or dishonest act. In saying this I but utter the heartfelt sentiment of the thousands of Pennsylvanians who knew him well, and now with us lament and deplore his sudden death.

For over a quarter of a century I have enjoyed an acquaintance with him, and during all that time our relations of friendship were cordial and sincere. As a member of the Legislature and Speaker of the House, as Secretary of the Land Office and Canal Commissioner of the State, and all other public positions which he held, he sustained a character for purity of motive and action which placed him high in the estimation and confidence of the people of this State. His record is that of a faithful public officer, who performed every duty with an honest purpose to promote the public good. As a citizen he was kind, generous and just; as a christian, sincere and consistent in his walk and conversation, and as a husband and father, kind and affectionate. Such, in brief, are the characteristics that strongly marked the life of our deceased brother.

Whilst we deeply sympathize with his bereaved family, and in view of his sudden death, let the great truth be impressed upon each one of us, and sink deep in every heart, "I too must die." And when we look upon the opening tomb let us improve the present hour, for to-morrow death may come.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. President: Born and raised in the same county with the deceased Colonel William Hopkins, I would do violence to the promptings of my own heart, and seem to desert an old friend, if I remained silent upon this mournful occasion, and did not speak at least one word in memory of a distinguished member of this Convention. I well remember the first time I ever saw him. It was in my early boyhood, and he was then in public life, and a man of mark and distinction. His fine personal appearance, and his gentlemanly manners, won my admiration as a boy, and made an impression upon my mind that has never been effaced. The acquaintance and the intimacy of subsequent years only tended to increase my admiration and to deepen that impression when I found that the generous qualities of his heart corresponded with his manly and commanding personal appearance. For nearly forty years Colonel Hopkins had been one of the most prominent politicians of the State of Pennsylvania, but, while ever faithful in the discharge of a public trust, he never neglected the performance of any duty in the private walks of life. In all the relations of domestic and social life he was an exemplar, whose footsteps could be followed with wisdom. As a friend, he was always true, and never failed in the hour of need; as a neighbor, kind and accommodating, and to the poor abounding in deeds of mercy and charity; as a citizen, liberal and public spirited; as a public officer, always honest and faithful in the discharge of the duties of the numerous high and responsible positions he filled. The recollections of his many acts of kindness will linger long, as sweet fragrance in the memory of those whom he benefited. The influence of his example as an honest and incorruptible public officer will be felt years after he shall be laid away in his long resting place, and his name, appearing often in the annals of our State, always without a blot or stain, will be handed down on the long roll of Pennsylvania's honored sons to generations yet to come. It has been but a few days ago since he was here in our midst, moving around with that genial smile and pleasant manner that always characterized him. This day one week ago he presided over this Convention as chairman of the committee of the whole. Now, sir, he is numbered with those who have been. On the evening of that day he was here in this hall making arrangements in reference to his report as chairman of the Committee on the Declaration of Rights, which was then about finished and ready to be reported to the Convention. As he was about to leave the Hall for the cars, a few of us who were here bade good-bye, little dreaming that that was the last time we should see him. He went, to return no more. Soon all of us shall follow him. Follow him "to that undiscovered country, from whose bourne no traveler returns." May we all imitate his virtues while living, and when gone, leave as fair a record behind.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. President: Again are we admonished of the uncertainty of our earthly existence. Quick as the lightnings flash has the intelligence of the sudden and unexpected death of one who was an honored and prominent member of this body, been communicated to every part of our beloved Commonwealth. Less than one short week ago his manly form graced these halls. To day it lies wrapped in the cold embrace of death.

Our deceased colleague was by no means an obscure man. For nearly half a century he had taken a very prominent part in the official administration of the affairs of the State.

Mr. President, I first became acquainted with the subject of this resolution at the commencement of the session of the Legislature of 1863. He was one of the oldest members of the House of Representatives, while I was one of the youngest. He, at an early period of the session, saw my embarrassment, resulting from inexperience, and well do I remember, and ever shall I with gratitude re-call the disinterested counsel, aid and encouragement I received from him. And, sir, it is because of the unsolicited favors that I then received at the hands of a stranger, that I, too, ask to join in the deep and heartfelt sorrow that pervades this Hall.

While it was my fortune to differ with him politically, and especially upon some questions growing out of and connected with the rebellion, then in progress, I never, for one moment, doubted his honesty, integrity, or the purity of his motives.

Sir, I did not know the deceased as long and as well as you did, or as well as other gentlemen who have paid a just tribute to his memory; but, sir, I knew him long and well enough to appreciate his kindness of heart, urbanity of manner, and purity of character, upon which he has left neither blot nor stain, the most valuable legacy that can be transmitted to posterity.

Mr. President: How true it is that "in the midst of life we are in death." We should bear in mind that we have no guarantee for the future. The wind that sings a silent requiem as it passes in mournful cadences through the tall grass that shades the graves of dearly loved but now departed ones, should admonish us that life is short, and that now is the time to prepare for the great hereafter that awaits us all.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President: I would claim the privilege of a few words on this painful Providence that has cast a gloom over this Convention. We can yet scarcely realize, as intimated by the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. J. W. F. White,) that the man whose seat is vacant to-day, so lately wielded the gavel of authority in the committee of the whole on that platform. To me, sir, very suddenly and unexpectedly came the intelligence over the wires that the man I had parted with at the hotel on Thursday evening had been stricken down by disease at Pittsburg the next morning. Not so unexpectedly, but a severe blow, came the intelligence yesterday that the connection between us and him had been suddenly terminated by death.

Many years have I learned to venerate the memory of this distinguished man; living, it is true, as I have, at the other end of the Commonwealth; but fame always brings us intelligence of the great, and of him who does good deeds. I have regarded him ever as a man of the most inflexible integrity; a man of peculiar tenacity of purpose. The rock of faith or principle on which his feet rested to-day, you found them resting upon to-morrow. Not changeable of purpose but inflexible in his position as the polar star. I was glad to renew my acquaintance with this man when the Convention met at Harrisburg; doubly gratified to renew it again here in the city of Philadelphia; and I shall always remember with gratitude and pleasure that for the last two months it has been my privilege to sit in the adjoining chair to Colonel Hopkins, at the same board in that hotel where we had our lodgings. I shall remember always his courteous manner, the ardent and affectionate way in which he demonstrated his friendship. Many times was it my privilege to go to his room, (ever open to my reception,) and be greeted with words of kindness; and there it was that I passed many pleasant hours.

But, sir, aside from the position in public life that has given to him his reputation and his fame, there is another light in which I have lately come to regard the man, and which, in my estimation, places him upon a more elevated platform than anything which political life can. I remember but a few weeks ago when I went into Colonel Hopkins' room one evening. I was informed by him that he had just closed the reading of seven chapters in that sacred volume, the great Book of books. It elevated the man, in my estimation, to a higher degree. I came, then, to look upon him in a new light; not only as a man elevated in political life and favor, but in the higher character of the christian.

And it here does my heart good to believe that that faith which had sustained him through a long life, carried him to that place intimated by the member on the other side of the Hall, (Mr. White,) "that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns." I have a grateful sense of pleasure now, in the opportunity afforded me of bearing a word of testimony to this man, who stood so high in the estimation of his fellows as a man of industry, a man of morality, a man firm and inflexible in his purpose, honest in the discharge of every trust communicated to him, and, above all, a man firm in his christian principles; and to-day I believe that he is reaping the reward of that faith that thus far had led him on.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. President: It has been my privilege to know Colonel Hopkins, both in public and private, for some thirty years, and I cannot consent that this melancholy occasion shall pass without bearing my testimony, feeble as it may be, to the high virtue of the deceased. We all knew him in his public career. You, sir, and most of the members of the Convention, will refer to a period in our civil and political history of great interest, when, but for the wisdom and the firmness of this man, our Commonwealth might easily have been involved in the horrors of civil war. I have always felt that the public owed more to those qualities of that individual man, for averting those calamities, than to all other influences which were in operation at the time.

We have all seen him in the Speaker's chair, at Harrisburg, at times of high political excitement. I remember, sir, a political convention, in which he had been chosen to preside, but had not arrived, when another gentleman was called to the chair. The body, under the administration of an inadequate presiding officer, rushed into utter confusion, and it was on the point of breaking up, when Colonel Hopkins entered the hall, went up and took possession of the chair, and instantly order and peace reigned throughout the tumultuous assemblage. His presence, his presence, and his reputation were sufficient to restore order where other men had failed to enforce it.

I have seen Colonel Hopkins in his own house; I have been his guest; I have seen him in the domestic circle; I have sat by his fireside and at his board, and I do know that the virtues of this man were not more conspicuous in public life than in private. I do know that Colonel Hopkins has been the friend of education and of all social reforms in the community in which he dwelt.

During all this period of more than thirty years a warm personal friendship betwixt us has never been interrupted for an hour. Our sympathies upon public questions were so identical, and our views of public questions and of public men were so similar, that we were drawn together by an electric affinity that was irresistible.

For the last few years I have not had the privilege of seeing much of him, but when I met him in this body I was pleased to see that none of the force of his early years had abated; that he brought here the same solid judgment which characterized him in every other sphere of life, and that he came richly laden with the experiences of a large and varied public service.

It has been said by other gentlemen that he was a man of inflexible integrity. That is true; and, Mr. President, I wish to say that that was the fountain of all the force of his character. It has seemed to me, in contemplating the character of Colonel Hopkins, that he belonged to that august age of the republic when those men of whom we read and have heard of by tradition flourished, and who were men of such position and character as to feel a stain as they would a wound. I have wished that we had more such men in public life. This taking off of Colonel Hopkins is, in this aspect, a great public calamity, the magnitude of which overshadows all private griefs, and all Pennsylvania will and ought to mourn the loss of such a man.

Solon enacted, as a law of Athens, that only that which was good should be said of the dead, and the Roman maxim that grew out of it is familiar to all ears: De mortuis nil nisi bonum. Dr. Johnson made a criticism upon this maxim, and said that instead of bonum it should read verum, nothing should be said of the dead except that which is true, instead of that which is good. Now what I wish to say, is that here is an instance in which Dr. Johnson's reading of that maxim may be applied with safety. We need not insist that nothing shall be said of the dead except that which is good. We may challenge the world, sir, and bid it to say anything of this man which is true, and that which is most true will be his highest eulogy.

I agree, sir, that the crowning quality in this man's character was his christianity. He was a firm and an humble believer in the christian religion, not an obtrusive and intolerant propagandist, but an humble and rational christian man; and, sir, to-day, when he is gone, and when we are mourning his loss, it becomes us to remember that these great public virtues which distinguished his life had, super-added, this grace of a christian character, and thus completed as high a model of manhood as it is possible for us to contemplate. Indeed, I have long thought of Colonel Hopkins, as a model Pennsylvanian. I know not when we shall look upon his like again.

These, Mr. President, are the words which have come to my lips upon the occasion of this melancholy reminiscence. I hope the resolutions that have been submitted will be adopted. I hope, sir, that a committee will be appointed to attend the funeral of Colonel Hopkins, and I hope that this body will bear testimony in all possible forms to the merits of this most honest and most excellent citizen.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. President: It is with profound sorrow that I rise to unite, in behalf of the city of Philadelphia, in paying this last tribute of respect to the memory of our deceased brother. Knowing Mr. Hopkins well by reputation for many years—for his public life was part of the history of our Commonwealth—I had never had the pleasure of personal acquaintance with him, until we met as members of this body. I well recollect of being struck with the commanding figure and strongly marked countenance of a gentleman, in the lineaments of which were unmistakably written simplicity and directness of purpose, integrity, and unswerving firmness, and I asked who it was. Upon learning the name of this man, with whose external presence I had been so impressed, I immediately sought his acquaintance; and during the two or three months that we have been assembled here, in the discharge of a common duty, it has been my pleasure and my privilege to enjoy as close an intercourse with him as was permitted to me in the discharge of my duties here. The early impression made upon my mind has been strengthened and confirmed by this constant intercourse.

Mr. Hopkins, sir, was no ordinary man. He belonged to a class of men from which the very best specimens of American public characters are drawn. Feeling a deep obligation to dedicate to the service of his country the talents and the industry with which he was endowed, he was almost constantly in the public service, in some capacity. We have heard here to-day, from those who knew him intimately, how the lad, drawing from a simple education the elements of knowledge, began early to improve himself, until, by the choice of his fellow-citizens, he was raised in successive steps from one office to another, finally uniting to assist in the performance of the great work for which we are now assembled.

The youthful justice of the peace, for he must have become so before he was thirty, since then it was he first began to represent his section of the country in the halls of legislation, ripened into the statesman, and without anything like sudden, violent advance, his growth was a slow, steady, mature one. He had many of the physical, and, it strikes me, many of the moral and mental attributes which belong to the class of men who are gradually developed. Sturdy, strong and deliberate, he may not inaptly be compared to the deep-rooted, slowly growing oak, whose very power and beauty are, to a great extent, attributable to its tardy development. He was a prudent man, a man not hasty in the formation of an opinion, but when once formed and adopted, slow to yield, requiring always good reason to induce a change. He was not easily swayed. He was a man of tenacity of purpose, and of tenacity to that which is right. He clung to his convictions, because these convictions being of slow growth, and, perhaps, of tardy adoption, he valued them highly; and hence that firmness which we have all more than once witnessed, and which was so remarkably impressed upon his face.

Indeed, with him, as I believe it always is with true men, the face was the mirror of the soul. You would have felt a great moral shock if you had heard that anything like duplicity, subterfuge or indirectness had been found lurking under that countenance. In fact, it would have been a solecism in nature. Such a thing was almost, if not altogether, impossible.

Well, sir, he is gone. He has gone in the fullness and ripeness of years, and, so far as his fellow-citizens could do him honor, in the fullness of honor. We feel keen pain at the severance of the tie which has united us so closely to him during the past winter; but would any one of us, had we the ability to do so; call him back? "After life's fitful fever he sleeps well." He has rounded off a life of great moral beauty, of great usefulness, of great dignity, by a fitting end, and he has fallen before decay had begun to impair his faculties. While to his family, his wife and children, the loss is irreparable; while to the community in which he lived, his loss will be very great; while to us it is considerable; while to the whole Commonwealth it cannot easily be supplied. I esteem him a fortunate man to have passed away as he has passed away, after this short, this sudden illness, well prepared—for we have had testimony, and valuable testimony, on that subject—to receive from his Master the reward for the good he has done in this life.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. President: I can not be entirely silent on this melancholy subject; but I have no words to express my deep grief for the loss we have sustained. If I had the words I fear I would be prevented from uttering them by that choking sensation which I have felt ever since I heard of the death of Mr. Hopkins last night.

I do not underestimate the very high qualities of my surviving associates in this body. I do not think, indeed, that any man here appreciates their various abilities and virtues more than I do; but I devoutly believe that there is no man in this Convention that we could not have spared better than him who has gone.

We shall miss very sadly and seriously his wise counsels and the influence of his high character. His death certainly diminishes the chances which we would otherwise have had of performing the duties which we owe to our constituents acceptably and well.

I do not propose to give an analysis of his character, and it is not necessary to repeat his history. I may say, for I know it, that he was, in all respects, the best balanced man that it was ever my good fortune to know. He was born with a temper somewhat ardent and with impulses rather strong, but his sterling good sense always kept him within the bounds of perfect propriety. His moral and personal courage were often tested; he was one of the most fearless men that ever lived, yet all his measures were in favor of peace, and every one who knew him testifies to the gentleness and kindness of his manner.

He was a most devoted friend of popular government; he believed in the rights of the people and conceded those rights upon all occasions, and yet he had less of the demagogue in his composition than anybody I ever knew. He revered legal authority, and was always submissive to those who rightfully wielded it, but he never fawned upon power, nor begged a favor of patronage. No man could possibly be more faithful to his political convictions; and he was as true as steel to the men with whom he was associated in supporting them. Yet we all know that he never allowed himself to be tempted into any party excesses, nor stained himself with any act of extravagant opposition to his enemies. His religious faith was as firm as the "foundation of the everlasting hills"—it never wavered for one instant, but he was wholly unobtrusive with it; he propagated his faith by example, and proved it by his works. It is fit and proper that the dignity of such a character should be vindicated, and that the value of it should be made widely known.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. President: I trust it will not be thought improper that on behalf of my colleagues upon the Committee on the Legislature, of which Mr. Hopkins was by far the most experienced member, I should give expression over his open grave to the sincere regret with which every member of that committee has heard of his untimely loss. Mr. President, his loss is untimely only in that it has occurred before this Convention has reaped the full benefit of his long life of stainless honor, and of his varied experience in the public service. It had not been my privilege to know him well before we met here, but it has been my privilege, since this Convention has assembled, to have seen much of him, and to have learned to esteem him, and to agree in the opinion of his moral worth, which has been given by those who have known him longest, and therefore who esteemed him most. Such a man, here and now, I am sure every member of this Convention feels, is not easily to be re-placed; and our hearts are all bowed down, not only with sincere sympathy with the afflicted and sorrowing family of our brother who has gone before us, but also with hearty regret that the people of the Commonwealth have lost his services, and that our labors are to lack the advantages which his ripe wisdom, his conscientious regard for duty, and his devotion to the interests of the people, as he understood them, would have given to them.

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. President: I should not, at this time, attempt to add a word to what has been already spoken—and so well spoken—in regard to the life and character of Colonel William Hopkins, were it not for the fact that I am the only member of this Convention who served with him in the Senate of this State. I would do violence to my own feelings of respect for him if I should fail, at this moment, to say a word in testimony of his character. My acquaintance with him commenced in 1863. He was then a member of the lower House, and during the next two years we served in the Senate together. It is well known that we both occupied different sides in politics, and the political feeling at that period in our country's history was accustomed to run very high. Men differed widely and radically in their views, and often upon the floor of the State Senate we met in all the acerbity of sharp debate. But I have this to say of Colonel Hopkins: That never, for one moment, did any of those bitter feelings, so often engendered by political differences, affect the cordiality and the courtesy of his intercourse with me. Colonel Hopkins was a man of a very even temperament, and of great self-command, and through all my intercourse with him never once was there the slightest unpleasantness or ungentlemanly feeling. I became impressed in that acquaintance with his character as a man, with his great honesty of purpose, with his firmness and decision of character, and I ever found him eminently a courteous, christian gentleman.

Mr. T. H. B. PATTERSON. Mr. President: It seems to me that upon an occasion like this, when a christian gentleman, such as William Hopkins, has died in our midst, it is but right that the youngest and the oldest members of the Convention should unite in bearing their tributes to his memory, and in expressing those strong feelings of respect for the goodness and honesty of his life, in order that we, his colleagues and his fellow-citizens, may, if possible, lessen the sorrows of his bereaved family. On a sorrowful occasion like this it is eminently proper we should give our testimony in behalf of a distinguished member of this Convention by re-calling the past services he rendered to the State, and the positions he so honorably occupied. In order that those of us who remain behind him may be more fully impressed with the importance of the duties which have been committed to our care, I have felt to-day I could not utter any appropriate tribute to his memory, but I feel that I would be false to myself and to a personal friend if I did not endeavor to give my humble testimony to the friend and bright example of my early boyhood. Although I have been called here to this Convention to represent another district than that in which Colonel Hopkins resided, yet the county which he represented so ably in this Convention, and the town wherein he resided, is the ancestral home of many generations of my family. All the pleasant memories of my school-boy days will ever be connected with pleasant recollections of Colonel Hopkins as a true, manly and simple christian gentleman, and representative Pennsylvanian, and as I stand here to-day in my place in this Convention, it seems to me as if it were but yesterday that I first became acquainted with him. Although his memory and his name have been associated with my life from my earliest infancy, and though it seems but a short time since I was first introduced to him upon one of the streets of Washington, in front of his mansion, I can never forget the vivid impression which that meeting has left upon my mind. I remember well that he presented the appearance of a model American citizen, dressed in the old fashioned genteel manner, just as we last saw him here in this Convention. At the time of which I speak he was engaged in driving home his cow from the pasture lot, retaining all the simplicity of the customs of his early boyhood, although then a man grown up and covered with honors, and amply endowed by fortune.

He had not forgotten, and, I may say, never forgot, even down to the last day of his life, when at home, those simple customs which he was used to when a child. And often, after my first acquaintance with him had begun, I have seen him driving backwards and forwards his cow in the same old fashioned manner. It is to draw the attention of the Convention to this humble trait in his character, and one which is so rapidly being swept away from among us, that I have adverted to this homely incident in his life. When surrounded by all the honors of public life he still clung to the old fashioned customs of his younger days. His character as an upright and self-made man exercised an influence over my life as I grew up, even in my college days, that I can never forget. And to-day I therefore stand here to add my tribute to his memory, and to express my gratitude for the lesson which his life affords to those of us whom he has left behind to complete his work in this Convention.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that we can never forget him as he stood here among us, such a short while ago, in the earnest discharge of the highest duties the people of any land can entrust to a mortal being. He was sent here as a delegate to this Convention to assist in amending the organic law of the State. And he proved himself an example to every one of us in the simple, earnest and straightforward manner in which he attended to all his duties and listened to all the debates, however trivial in their character, that have occurred upon this floor.

I re-call with pleasure and sadness the last time I remember seeing him in this Convention. In the discharge of his duty as chairman of the committee of the whole, he manifested a deep interest and anxiety in the debate upon the article reported by the Committee on Legislature. And after many days had been consumed in its consideration, I remember well the shade of disappointment that passed over his face like a premonition of his approaching end; when, on the last day he was present with us, the committee rose and the final vote had not been taken. Let those of us who remain behind him, to complete the work which has called us together, remember the character of our departed friend and member, who never forgot the simplicity of the good old time life amidst all the storms of innovation and corruption which have swept over our State. And if we follow the bright example of this noble man in the future, Colonel Hopkins will not have lived in vain, and will not have died in vain.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President: I desire to drop my tear to the memory of our departed friend and fellow-member. It was not my privilege to have known him personally until within a very recent period, but being a native of the same county, and having been surrounded by the same influences which moulded his noble character, I feel that in his loss I, too, have lost a brother. I have known of him, and I have known him by sight and by reputation since the period of my earliest recollection. I have known that he was a man whom the great county of Washington delighted to honor, and that he was one of her foremost citizens; and since it has been my pleasure and my duty to become acquainted with him I have not valued him so much for the public service he has rendered as for the private virtues and character which he possessed.

I esteemed him, sir, as a friend in whom there was no guile nor deceit; a man whose friendship attached itself to you with hooks of steel; a man who when he once gave you his confidence gave it wholly and entirely. But he is gone, as we shall all go. One by one the scythe of the Mower shall overtake us all. Grief shall fill all our heads in death. Sorrow shall fill all our hearts, and when it shall pass we, too, shall have passed to be numbered no more on earth. These thoughts are sad, but they should make us improve the friendship and the blessings of the hour as they pass. We shall have our day. We shall be mourned by friends. Our virtues shall be remembered, and our vices and our weaknesses shall be forgotten. We shall be carried to the narrow house and others shall take our place.

We may regret, sir, that the virtues of the deceased cannot be transferred to other and younger men. Though that cannot be, they shall remain as a sweet incense in all our hearts. I remember him as a friend. I know and have felt the sincerity of his heart. I, too, was one of that little circle, now broken, which has sat by the same table since this Convention convened. He was the central figure. He was the keystone of that little arch; but it has been broken. Ah! before there were three of us. There are now but two.

I know, sir, the tenderness of his heart, because I have heard him speak of that which no man can speak of and yet be insincere. I have heard him speak frequently of the tenderness with which he loved a little grand-child, whose absence and separation from him was the great grief of his life.

With him there is a lesson for us all. Let us improve it. While we must mourn over the departure of our friend, we know that our turn shall come.

"Forever shakes this mortal urn,
And soon or late
Stern death shall beat
With equal feet
At palace and at cottage gate."

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President: I desire to add a few words, on this occasion, before these resolutions shall be submitted to a vote. It is rare, indeed, that I have found myself upon occasions of this kind able and disposed to endorse all that is said in commendation of a departed associate or friend. But here and now I am able to approve and endorse all that has been said by the several gentlemen who have preceded me, in commendation of our deceased associate and colleague. His memory deserves all these tributes which have been paid to him, and all over this Commonwealth, wherever our proceedings go, the hearts and the intellects of the people will endorse what we have said, and what we shall do, when we adopt, by a unanimous vote, these pending resolutions.

This man, who has left us, all his life followed the dictates of duty. Whether its performance was agreeable or painful, he stepped forward steadily and firmly in the path of duty, and he has his reward, not merely in what we say here, or in what will be said abroad by others, but in those tender and cherished recollections which will remain in his own home and among those by whom, in life, he was immediately surrounded.

I will mention one instance of the performance of duty, his latest act as a member of this Convention. You assigned him to the chairmanship of the Committee upon the Declaration of Rights, the ninth article of the Constitution. On Thursday of last week, he insisted that that committee should conclude its work before he left for home, that nothing should be left unattended to which demanded its attention, and that its work should be made complete. His views prevailed. The article was revised and its final form assigned to it, and the same afternoon he left for his home, never more to return and mingle amongst us. It would seem as if a presentiment was upon his mind, that he would be no longer able to work with us and for us in this Convention; that it was necessary before he left on that journey homeward, that the task assigned to him by our presiding officer should be fully discharged.

Mr. President, I have known Mr. Hopkins for twenty-five years, and known him very well, and have enjoyed with him relations of friendship and of intimacy during a great part of that time. What I desire to say, now, is this: That hereafter, in looking back over my little career in public life, it will be among my most cherished recollections, that during his lifetime I held the confidence and enjoyed the friendship of William Hopkins, of Washington county.

Mr. CORSON. Mr. President: I desire to say but one word, and that is supplemental to what has been just said by the distinguished member from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew.) It is true that the chairman of the committee, on which I have the honor to serve, did have the work of that committee completed and printed before he left; and I desire to call attention to the fact, which henceforth will become historical, that he was the author of these simple words, in the preamble of the Bill of Rights, which he proposed to make the first article in the Constitution:

"Recognizing the sovereignty of God, and humbly invoking His guidance in our future destiny."

The second resolution was unanimously agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the third resolution, which will be read.

The CLERK:

Resolved, That in this hour of deep affliction and grief we tender to his family, so deeply stricken, our most sincere condolence and profound sympathy.

Which was unanimously agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the fifth resolution, which will be read.

The CLERK:

Resolved, That as an evidence of our respect for the memory of the deceased, we do hereby appoint a committee of this Convention to attend his funeral at Washington, Pa.

Which was unanimously agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the last resolution, which will be read.

The CLERK:

Resolved, That the Chief Clerk be directed to forward to the family of the deceased a copy of these resolutions; and that we do now adjourn.

Which was unanimously agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution providing for the appointment of a committee to attend the funeral of our deceased associate contains a blank to be filled with the number of the committee, and a blank as to how the committee shall be appointed. How will the Convention fill these blanks?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. President: I move that the blank in reference to the number be filled with five, and that the Chair appoint.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. I will name as the committee Messrs. Lawrence, John N. Purviance, J. W. F. White, Guthrie and M'Clean.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that he will direct the passage of these resolutions to be entered on the Journal as having been unanimously agreed to; and will also ask unanimous consent, informally, to say that the Journal shall be so recorded as to say that the committee of the whole asked and obtained leave to sit to-morrow on the subject of the report of the Committee on Cities and City Charters, so as to save the lapse of the committee, which would otherwise be passed over.

Unanimous consent was given, and at twelve M. the President declared the Convention adjourned until ten A. M. to-morrow.

SIXTIETH DAY.

FRIDAY, March 7, 1873.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M.

Prayer was offered by Rev. James W. Curry.

JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. MANN presented a petition from citizens of Potter county, asking for an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. MANN also presented a petition from certain citizens of Westmoreland county in reference to the same subject, which was referred to the same committee.

CUMULATIVE VOTING.

Mr. W. H. SMITH presented a memorial from Andrew W. Foster, of Pittsburg, asking this Convention to make some provision for cumulative voting, which was referred to the Committee on Suffrage.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. DUNNING presented a petition from citizens of Carbondale, praying for an amendment of the Constitution prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. CURRY presented a petition from citizens of Altoona upon the same subject, which was referred to the same committee.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President: As the Committee on Legislation has acted on that subject, I move that these memorials be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition from certain citizens of Luzerne county relative to the same subject, which was laid upon the table.

Mr. HORTON presented a communication from the citizens of Wyoming county, praying for a provision in the Constitution against the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

SPECIAL ELECTION ON THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. JOHN PRICE WETHERILL offered the following, which was referred to the Committee on Schedule:

The amendments proposed by this Convention shall be submitted to the qualified electors of this Commonwealth, at a special election to be held on the — Tuesday of — next.

The said election shall be held, regulated and conducted in the several counties of this Commonwealth according to existing laws. The said election shall be held, conducted and regulated in cities of 100,000 population under the authority and supervision of three commissioners of election, to be chosen by this Convention, which said board of commissioners, or a majority thereof, shall appoint for each election division, in the said cities, two canvassers to register voters and one judge, two window inspectors and two return inspectors, to hold the said election, in the said division, respectively.

If the said registers shall differ in opinion as to the right of any citizen to be registered, the said board, or a majority thereof, shall decide. No registry shall be conclusive evidence of the residence or other qualifications of any registered citizen, and no name shall be erased therefrom after registration. Nor shall the omission of any name therefrom disqualify any citizen legally entitled to vote. The returns of all the elections herein authorized shall be certified by the officers thereof respectively, in duplicate originals, one whereof shall be forthwith transmitted to the Secretary of the Commonwealth, and the other thereof shall be filed in the office of the prothonotary of the court of common pleas of the proper county. The said board of commissioners, or a majority thereof, shall have full power to make all necessary rules for the making and publishing the said register, and when and how the same shall be done, and all other proper rules as to the details thereof, and shall receive such compensation for their services as the Legislature shall hereafter provide. The canvassers and officers of election aforesaid shall be paid according to the existing laws providing for the compensation of such officers.

LIABILITIES OF MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

Mr. BARCLAY offered the following preamble and resolution, which were read and referred to the Committee on Municipal Corporations:

WHEREAS, It has been held by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, as a general rule of law, that a municipal corporation is not liable for consequential damages to private property by reason of any act done in pursuance of any change or alteration in the grade of any street, even though such private property should be altogether destroyed by such act; therefore,

Resolved, That the committee to whom this resolution shall be referred be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing in the new Constitution that in all cases hereafter when private property shall be injured in consequence of any act done by any municipal corporation, in pursuance of any alteration or change of the grade of any street, such corporation shall be liable for such consequential damages to the party injured, in the same manner as when private property is actually taken for public use.

MEMORIAL PROCEEDINGS ON THE DEATH OF COLONEL HOPKINS.

Mr. H. W. PALMER offered the following resolution, which was twice read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to procure the printing of the proceedings of the Convention, on the occasion of the death of Hon. William Hopkins, in memorial form, and that five hundred copies be furnished the members for distribution.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. President: I move to amend, by inserting "one thousand copies" instead of "five hundred copies."

The motion was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on the resolution, and it was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BAER offered the following resolution, which was twice read:

Resolved, That when this Convention adjourns on Wednesday, the twenty-sixth of March, it will do so to meet again on Thursday, the sixth day of April.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I rise for the purpose of making a correction in the date.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution cannot be amended.

The question being taken on the resolution, the yeas and nays were required by Mr. Corbett and Mr. Temple, and were as follow, viz:

YEAS.

Messrs. Achenbach, Addicks, Baer, Barclay, Biddle, Curtin, Gibson, Hall, Hunsicker, Long, MacVeagh, Porter, Pughe, Russell, Sharpe, Simpson, Smith, Henry W., Smith, Wm. H., Stewart, Wherry, White, Harry and Wright—22.

NAYS.

Messrs. Andrews, Armstrong, Bailly, (Perry,) Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bannan, Bowman, Boyd, Brodhead, Broomall, Clark, Corbett, Corson, Cronmiller, Curry, Darlington, Davis, De France, Dodd, Dunning, Edwards, Elliott, Ellis, Ewing, Finney, Funck, Green, Hanna, Hazzard, Horton, Howard, Knight, Landis, Lear, Littleton, Lilly, MacConnell, M'Camant, M'Culloch, Mann, Mantor, Minor, Newlin, Niles, Palmer, G. W., Palmer, H. W., Parsons, Patterson, T. H. B., Patton, Purviance, Sam'l A., Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, James L., Rooke, Ross, Smith, H. G., Stanton, Struthers, Temple, Turrell, Walker, Wetherill, J. M., Wetherill, John Price, White, David N., and Meredith, President—63.

So the resolution was not agreed to.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Ainey, Alricks, Baker, Bardsley, Bartholomew, Beebe, Black, Charles A., Black, J. S., Brown, Buckalew, Campbell, Carey, Carter, Cassidy, Church, Cochran, Collins, Craig, Cuyler, Dallas, Fell, Fulton, Gilpin, Gowen, Guthrie, Harvey, Hay, Hemphill, Heverin, Kaine, Lamberton, Lawrence, M'Allister, M'Clean, M'Murray, Metzger, Mott, Patterson, D. W., Purman, Purviance, John N., Read, John R., Reynolds, S. H. Runk, Van Reed, White, J. W. F., Woodward and Worrell—47.

RECESS FROM MARCH TWENTY-NINE TO APRIL FOURTEENTH.

Mr. DE FRANCE. Mr. President: I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That when this Convention adjourns on Saturday, the twenty-ninth of March, it will be to meet on the fourteenth day of April, at ten o'clock of said day.

On the question of proceeding to the second reading of the resolution, a division was called, resulting: Thirty-nine in the affirmative and thirty-three in the negative.

So the resolution was read a second time.

On the question of agreeing to the resolution, the yeas and nays were required by Mr. Corbett and Mr. Gibson, and were as follow, viz:

YEAS.

Messrs. Achenbach, Addicks, Alricks, Baer, Brodhead, Clark, Cochran, Corson, Curry, Davis, DeFrance, Dunning, Funck, Gibson, Green, Hall, Hunsicker, Lear, Littleton, Long, MacVeagh, Metzger, Mott, Newlin, Palmer, G. W., Palmer, H. W., Parsons, Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Patton, Porter, Pughe, Purviance, Samuel A., Read, John R., Rooke, Ross, Russell, Sharpe, Simpson, Smith, Henry W., Smith, William H., Temple, Wherry, White, Harry and Wright—45.

NAYS.

Messrs. Andrews, Armstrong, Baily, (Perry,) Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bannan, Biddle, Bowman, Boyd, Broomall, Corbett, Cronmiller, Darlington, Edwards, Elliott, Ellis, Ewing, Hanna, Hazzard, Horton, Howard, Knight, Landis, Lilly, MacConnell, M'Camant, M'Culloch, Mann, Mantor, Minor, Niles, Reynolds, James L., Smith, H. G., Stanton, Struthers, Turrell, Walker, Wetherill, J. M., Wetherill, John Price, White, David N. and Meredith, President—40.

So the resolution was agreed to.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Ainey, Baker, Barclay, Bardsley, Bartholomew, Beebe, Black, Charles A., Black, J. S., Brown, Buckalew, Campbell, Carey, Carter, Cassidy, Church, Collins, Craig, Curtin, Cuyler, Dallas, Dodd, Fell, Finney, Fulton, Gilpin, Gowen, Guthrie, Harvey, Hay, Hemphill, Heverin, Kaine, Lambertson, Lawrence, M'Allister, M'Clean, M'Murray, Purman, Purviance, John N., Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, S. H., Runk, Stewart, Van Reed, White, J. W. F., Woodward and Worrell—47.

PRINTING REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the official reporter be directed to furnish the State Printer, as reported matter, the reports of all standing and select committees of the Convention, and that the State Printer print the same in the Debates.

It seems it was the understanding, I do not know whether correct or otherwise, by the Committee on Public Printing, that the State Printer was not to print in the Debates the reports from the standing and select committees of this body. It must be apparent to every delegate of the Convention that it is entirely proper to have, in their proper places, the reports of the standing committees of this body; otherwise the reading of the Debates may not be intelligible. For the purpose of having these reports inserted in the Debates this resolution is offered.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. President: As the Committee on Printing has been referred to, it is, perhaps, proper for me to state to the Convention that when this matter was first called to their attention the committee was of the opinion that there was no authority for the State Printer to print in the Debates the reports of the standing committees. He prints them in the Journal. The committee expressed no opinion upon the abstract question of the propriety of printing them in the Debates, but was of the opinion that, as the matter stood, there was no authority from the committee to so print them. I say nothing whatever as to whether they should go in or not; I simply make this explanation on the part of the committee.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: If these reports should be furnished by anybody I suppose it should be by the Clerk of the Convention. The official reporters, I apprehend, do not take down the reports of the committees. They are furnished in writing, and the official reporters have nothing to do with them. They are excluded from the Debates, and properly so. I do not see what the advantage is of putting them in among the debates. They are certainly no part of the debates or discussions of the Convention.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: There is probably a misapprehension upon this matter. Let it be understood that it is not the intention to increase the compensation of the reporter by reason of the insertion of this matter in the Debates. The delegates will understand that the mere purpose is to have the articles, when reported from the different standing committees, put in the proper place in the Debates, so that when the Debates are read in turning over the pages, reference can readily be made to the subject matter under discussion. If it is not so, reference must be made to the pages of the Journal which may not be at hand. It will be valuable in the future, and I call the attention of the honorable delegate from Chester (Mr. Darlington) who was a respected member of the Convention of 1838, to the fact that the report of every standing committee and select committee is inserted in the proper place in the printed Debates of that Convention.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: I believe that that is to some extent true, and it is understood to be a perfect nuisance in the Debates to have these reports of the committees inserted. What was intended at the commencement of the session of this Convention was that our Debates should reflect the consideration given to the various questions by the members. If any one wishes to study the whole history of course he will be supplied or he can supply himself with the Debates and with the Journal, but these reports certainly have no place in the Debates.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President: I wish to say but a single word in regard to this matter, because I think that there is a misapprehension in relation to it. The reports of the committees, as I understand it, are proposed to be included in the Debates at the time these reports are made to the Convention, on the ground that unless they are so included, the reading of the Debates will be unintelligible. Now I refer to page 718 of the volume of Debates to which any gentleman here can refer and satisfy himself. I take this merely as an example. The first section of the report of the Committee on Suffrage was adopted, and the form in which it was adopted is printed on this page. Then it states "the first section as amended was agreed to." Then what follows? "The Clerk read the second section as follows," and the second section is put into the body of the Debates verbatim, as it was reported by the committee, and in direct connection with the discussion upon the subject. Now, sir, does that not bring the whole question of what was under discussion before the reader of the Debates? Here is the section and the debate upon that section immediately follows. The debate is set at full on the section of the debates.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. President: It seems to me to be entirely useless to duplicate the reports of these committees. It looks as though the State Printer had drawn up some resolution to add something to his fat job. I am opposed to giving him any more plunder out of this business. So far from any advantage accruing from the printing of these reports, it seems to me mainly a botch. A copy of the Debates of 1838 was sold in open market here, in Philadelphia, a week or two ago, for five dollars, and, if we judge from that, of what the value of these Debates will be, it, perhaps, will not be found necessary to spend several thousand dollars in duplicating the reports of these committees. Therefore I hope this resolution will not be adopted.

The question being upon the adoption of the resolution, a division was called, and but fifteen members, not a majority of a quorum, voting in the affirmative, it was not agreed to.

ADJOURNMENTS.

Mr. STRUTHERS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the eighteenth rule be amended, so that motions for adjournment beyond the next meeting day may be adopted.

The resolution was laid on the table under the rule.

STATE PRINTER'S ACCOUNTS.

Mr. ARMSTRONG offered the following resolution, which was twice read and agreed to.

WHEREAS, It is impossible for the accounts of Benjamin Singerly, State Printer, to be settled by the Convention, because a great portion of the work must be done after the Convention shall have adjourned; therefore,

Resolved, That in the judgment of this Convention it is expedient that the Legislature provide for the settlement of his accounts by the proper accounting officers of the State, on the terms and conditions of his contract with this Convention, and for the payment of such sum as he may be entitled to receive.

DEBATES ON ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LEAR offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the resolution which prohibits debate on a resolution fixing the time for the adjournment of the Convention be and the same is hereby rescinded.

The resolution was laid on the table under the rule.

THE EXECUTIVE ARTICLE.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the second reading of the article reported by the committee of the whole upon the Executive Department. Is it the pleasure of the House to proceed to the second reading of this article?

The Convention agreed to proceed to the second reading thereof.

The PRESIDENT. The first section will be read.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 1. The Executive Department of this Commonwealth shall consist of a Governor, a Lieutenant Governor, a Secretary of the Commonwealth, Attorney General, Auditor General, Secretary of the Treasury, a Secretary of Internal Affairs, and a Superintendent of Public Instruction.

The first section was agreed to.

The CLERK read the second section as follows:

SECTION 2. The supreme Executive power shall be vested in a Governor, who shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed. He shall be chosen on the day of the general election by the qualified electors of the Commonwealth at the places where they shall respectively vote for Representatives; the returns of every election for Governor shall be sealed up and transmitted to the seat of government, directed to the Speaker of the Senate, who shall open and publish them in the presence of the members of both Houses of the Legislature; the person having the highest number of votes shall be Governor; but if two or more be equal and highest in votes, one of them shall be chosen Governor by the joint vote of the members of both Houses. Contested elections shall be determined by a committee to be selected from both Houses of the Legislature, and formed and regulated in such manner as shall be directed by law.

Mr. J. M. BAILEY. Mr. President: For the purpose of testing the sense of the Convention upon whether the words General Assembly or Legislature shall be used in the Constitution, I move to amend, by striking out the word "Legislature" wherever it occurs in this section, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "General Assembly."

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. President: The amendment strikes me as being entirely unnecessary. The word Legislature is a common and very comprehensive term. It is quite common in England, where we know the Houses of Parliament are designated as the House of Commons and the House of Lords, and they are spoken of, practically, as a Legislature. It seems to me there is no necessity for substituting a double word in place of a single word, all through this section.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: I consider it a mere question of taste, which might as well be settled now as at any other time. If we use the term "General Assembly," then the amendment would have to be made all through the section.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: The Committee on Legislation had this subject under consideration, and it was the unanimous opinion of the members of that committee that the word "Legislature" should obtain in our Constitution in lieu of the words "General Assembly." I will not repeat the arguments, which must be apparent to all, that can be made in favor of this term; and in reading the report of the Committee on Legislation, it will be observed that this expression prevails through the whole article.

Mr. JOHN M. BAILEY. Mr. President: I suppose it is proper I should say that I am not particular whether the term "Legislature" or "General Assembly" is used; but I think we might as well finally settle this question as to the term we propose shall be used throughout the whole Constitution. If it is the opinion of the Convention that the word "Legislature" should obtain throughout the whole Constitution, I will withdraw my amendment, and I do withdraw it.

["No." "No." "No."]

Mr. JOHN M. BAILEY. Then I renew the amendment.

The question being then taken, the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. EWING. Mr. President: When this section was under consideration in committee of the whole, I offered an amendment to make contested elections of Governor and Lieutenant Governor determinable by the Supreme Court. After discussion, and with the understanding that the Committee on Suffrage was preparing a section relating to this matter, I withdrew the amendment. I may say that the section, as amended, suits my views now much better than as it came from the Committee on the Executive Department, but I think we should not pass this section finally without allowing an opportunity for amendment, and before we have received the report of the Committee on Suffrage. If I am correct, I understand if the section is passed now, it cannot be amended at any future stage of our proceedings, without unanimous consent. I would, therefore, move to postpone the further consideration of this section.

The question being then taken, a division was called, which resulted as follows: Ayes, fifty-three; noes, twenty-three.

So the motion was agreed to.

CITIES AND CITY CHARTERS.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the further consideration of the article reported by the Committee on Cities and City Charters.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. Darlington in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose the question was upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler,) for section three as reported by the committee.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. JOHN PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: Before the question is taken I should like to make a single remark. I desire that the consideration of this article should be postponed for the present, for the reason that two members of the committee are absent from the city. One of them, the gentleman from Pittsburg, (Mr. Guthrie,) who takes a deep interest in this article, is absent on official business, and I deem it a duty we owe to him, that the consideration of this article should be postponed, at least until his return. The gentleman was formerly mayor of the city of Pittsburg, and possesses considerable experience and information in regard to this question, and for this reason I hope the committee will now rise and report progress.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to.

IN CONVENTION.

The committee then rose, and the President resumed the chair. Mr. Darlington, chairman of the committee of the whole, reported progress and asked leave for the committee to sit again, which was granted, and next Wednesday was named as the time.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I move to re-consider the vote by which the consideration of the article reported by the Committee on the Executive was postponed.

The motion was not agreed to.

THE EDUCATIONAL ARTICLE.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the consideration of the article reported by the Committee on Education. Is it the pleasure of the Convention to proceed to the consideration of the article?

The question being taken, a division was called, and it was agreed to, a majority of a quorum voting in the affirmative.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, to consider the report of the Committee on Education, Mr. Curtin in the Chair.

THE EDUCATIONAL ARTICLE.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee of the whole have under consideration the article reported by the Committee on Education. The first section will be read.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 1. The Legislature shall provide for the maintenance and support of a thorough and efficient system of public schools, wherein all the children of this Commonwealth above the age of six years may be educated.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I do not design to detain the committee of the whole but for a few moments in explanation of the general objects and scope of this article. It will be remembered that the only provision in the Constitution, as it now stands, is that the Legislature shall take care that the poor be taught gratuitous, and the arts and sciences flourish in one or more seminaries of learning. We have out-grown that state of things long since. The Legislature, with the entire sanction of the people of this Commonwealth, has gone far in advance of the constitutional injunction placed there in the early history of the Commonwealth. Perhaps the subject might be safely left to the Legislature still. Indeed there cannot be any absolute necessity for the expression of an opinion on this general subject of education by this Convention; but inasmuch as we might be said to be on the backward road if we said nothing on the subject, we felt that it was better for this Convention that it ought so to recognize the existence of that admirable system of public schools which now prevails all over the Commonwealth as the existing state of things require. It will be therefore perceived that, instead of depending upon the Legislature to establish a system of education, the phraseology of the first section, now before us, we think shall provide for the maintenance and support, merely recognizing the fact as it exists, and merely changing the phraseology from common schools to a system of public schools. This is the general purport of the first section, in which the committee have also introduced the limitation of age at which a child may be educated, and made it at the age of six years. They have named six years as the minimum age at which a child shall be maintained. For myself I feel, as an individual, I will be entirely satisfied to leave that also to the Legislature.

We have made in the second section, it will be perceived, an appropriation for carrying into effect this system of free schools in the State. Whether this will be wise, by the committee of the whole and the Convention remains also to be decided. It is higher than the appropriation made up to this time, as the Committee on Education have named the sum of $1,000,000. But I am glad to say that the wants of the community have been met by the Legislature from time to time, as the system has grown and the ability of the people have increased, and if this sum should be considered insufficient in the future, I have no doubt that the Legislature will be found equal to the occasion, and meet any increased demand upon the educational system of the State.

Now whether the sum which we have named is the proper amount or not, this committee or this Convention will have to determine. And whether it is wise to name a sum or not, it will also be for the Convention to decide. As a general rule, I am opposed to the insertion of any specific sum in the Constitution, whether as salary for an officer or for any other purpose, because of the fluctuating value of money. What would be sufficient to-day may be insufficient to-morrow, or may be entirely too great if there is any change, either upwards or downward, in the currency of the country. But the Committee on Education have agreed to report the sum of $1,000,000 as a sum to be annually distributed among the several school districts as the Legislature may provide, and that question will be for the determination of the Convention.

We have provided further, and this by way of restriction put upon the Legislature in reference to this school system, that no money raised for the support of the public schools shall be appropriated or used by any religious sect for the support of sectarian schools. Inasmuch as we design this system to be a free one, and a universal one, we do not think it wise to permit the Legislature to appropriate the public moneys, raised by taxation, for the exclusive use of any sect, no matter by what name it may be called.

In the fourth section we have provided for a Superintendent of Public Instruction, to be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. This will be inserted either here or in its proper place in the article relating to the Executive. The Committee on Education provide that the Superintendent of Public Instruction shall hold his office for the term of four years, as the committee on that subject have already suggested, and that his duties and compensation shall be prescribed by law.

Such is the tenor of the fourth section. In the fifth section, which we have also recommended in another report, it is provided that neither the Legislature, nor any county, city, borough or school district, nor any public or municipal corporation shall make any appropriation for the support of sectarian establishments. That is its general character and I need say no more than that.

In the sixth section we have endeavored to supply that which exists in the seventh section of the present Constitution: "That the arts and sciences may be encouraged and promoted in colleges and other institutions of learning under the exclusive control of the State." That the arts and sciences and all the varied interests of the State may be encouraged and promoted. We have somewhat varied the phraseology, but this is the purport of the section.

In the seventh section the Committee on Education have provided that the Legislature may establish industrial schools, and require the attendance of vagrant, neglected and abandoned children. I suppose there is no one branch of this whole subject that commends itself more steadily and primarily to the public mind than some means by which those who are without the care and direction of guardians shall be made the wards of the State in this regard. It is evidently the duty of the State to provide for the education and provide also subsistence, and provide it abundantly, for those unfortunate children who are neglected or abandoned, without parents, without care and with no means. Hence it is that we have suggested this for the careful consideration of the Convention to establish industrial schools where children so circumstanced may be educated and instructed in the useful arts.

And in the eighth section, which is the last that we have reported, we have proposed that the Legislature may, by law, require that every child of sufficient mental and physical ability shall attend the public schools, unless educated by other means.

In other words, we have in this section adopted, or recommended to the consideration of this Convention, the system of compulsory education. In that respect, I beg to say, I am ready to go as far as the farthest. I will say to you, Mr. Chairman, and that the man who so far forgets himself, so far forgets his duty to society and himself, so far forgets his duty to the public as to leave his children uneducated, shall be compelled to send them to school. I beg leave to say that the word "may," in the first line, should be "shall," in my judgment. I take it that this committee, that the public, that the whole community have a deep interest in the education of every child in this community, and if, unfortunately, there should exist any man in this community, who fails to send his children to school, or who undertakes to say that his children shall not be educated, it is the duty and the policy of the State to, by proper legislation, compel it. That is a matter all admit ought to be done. If we are all agreed upon any one thing it is, that the perpetuity of free institutions rests, in a large degree, upon the intelligence of the people, and that intelligence is to be secured by education. We provide the means whereby a parent, who cannot pay for the education of his children, can have them educated, and if a parent will not have his children educated, let him be compelled to do so.

This much, and this much only, I will say in explanation of the general views of the Committee on Education in reporting the article.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I am about to make a motion, and before I do so I desire to say a single word in explanation. The Convention suddenly, and to the surprise of a majority of it, went into committee of the whole on this subject. One of the most valuable members of the Committee on Education is unavoidably absent to-day, and he has, to my certain knowledge, some valuable and important suggestions to make with reference to the report of this Committee, as well as important amendments to offer after consultation with a majority of the Committee on Education. I am very desirous, on account of the gentleman from Lehigh, (Mr. Runk,) as well as for other reasons, that this committee shall now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

I therefore make that motion.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I trust that the motion that the committee rise will not prevail. We have been sitting here half of the morning and just as we are getting to work it is proposed to cease business. The committee should not rise on account of the absence of any gentleman. It is the gentleman's duty to be in his seat.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I will state that the gentleman from Lehigh is absent on account of illness.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: Well I am opposed to this Convention coming to a stand still on account of the absence of anybody. I hope that this committee will refuse to rise, but will go on with this bill. We are just as able to do it to-day as we will be when the gentleman from Lehigh is here. When the report of the committee comes up on second reading he can make his suggestion then, and if he has any amendments to offer he will have all the opportunity that he needs.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I trust the motion of the delegate from Cumberland (Mr. Wherry) will prevail. The section on education is second in importance to no other section to be submitted to this Convention. It has been explained fully and ably by the able chairman of the committee. It is short, it is comprehensive, it is understood, and can be acted on at any time. But there are some subjects in it that necessarily dovetail into the report of the Committee on Legislation. That committee has reported, and the report is before the Convention for its action. I hope, then, in view of the fact of the brevity of the report of the Committee on Education, and the fact that some of its features dovetail into the report of the Committee on Legislation, and also in view of the absence of some of the honored members of the Committee on Education, that the committee of the whole will now rise, and that the Convention will immediately afterward consent to set in committee of the whole, so that we can proceed to the consideration of the report of the Committee on Legislation, which is now printed.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I hope the committee will not rise. It will take but little time to go through with this section. I would be very glad if the members of the committee were here to express their views upon it, but an opportunity will still be afforded in the Convention after we have reported the article back. I think we had better proceed with the article.

Upon the motion to rise, a division was called for, which resulted: Affirmative, thirty-seven; negative, forty-two.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The first section of the article is before the committee.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: As a matter of form I suggest that we strike out "Legislature," and insert "General Assembly."

["No! No!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentlemen make that motion?

Mr. DARLINGTON. I am not anxious to press it if it is not the wish of the committee.

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Chairman: I desire to offer an amendment: In the second line, before the word "thorough," to insert the word "uniform," so that it will read, "the support of a uniform, thorough and efficient system of education." I will say but a few words upon the subject. It will be noticed by members, if they will read that section carefully, as it now stands, that there is no limitation whatever to the extent or variety of schools that we may have in this State. It is not required that they shall be limited to any age, except that they shall not go below six years, and it is not required that there shall be any limit to education. You see, then, that this section, if it is adopted, will necessarily authorize the Legislature to introduce a different system of schools into every county in this State, and they may provide for the education of persons during their entire lives in one county, and limit them in another. They may provide for an education running through all the departments of learning in one place, and limiting it to the first four rules of arithmetic in another.

I call the attention of the committee to these propositions. I re-state, then, that they may be understood. Take this section as it stands. There is no limitation upon the power of the Legislature, as to uniformity, or its counterpart, variety in the location, in the time, in the degree of schools, or of education. Now, sir, are we prepared to leave it in that form? Are we prepared to say that one county, one city, or one town, shall have one system, and another shall have another, and so on, all over the State? If we are prepared for that, then we are prepared to vote for this section as it stands, otherwise not. A "thorough and efficient system," I repeat, is entirely unlimited.

I will not now enlarge upon the other two points as to age and extent of education. I simply refer to them in this connection as throwing light upon the amendment which I offer, that is to insert the word "uniform," so that the system shall be the same all over the State, so far as it is carried out. Every citizen, no matter where he lives, shall be under the same system as to education in the public schools, as every other citizen, no matter where he lives.

Mr. HAZZARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MINOR. Certainly.

Mr. HAZZARD. I want to know if the word uniform would apply to uniformity of text books?

Mr. MINOR. No, sir, not necessarily. It is to be a uniform system. Whatever system the Legislature adopts it should adopt the same for the whole State. It may be that every part will not be acted upon at the same time, or extend down to temporary minutiae; but the point now is uniformity of general system. That is my idea.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I hope this amendment will not prevail. If I understand what it means, I do not think it will be proper. If uniformity means uniformity in everything, it is very impracticable. Take a district in the woods where there are only ten or twelve children, and school but three or four months in the year. To make a law for such a district that will apply to Philadelphia would be entirely improper and impracticable. They cannot have the same system of education at all. That may be an extreme case, but you will find that different regulations will have to be made for different parts of the State.

I hope that this word "uniform" will not be inserted, that is if it means, as I believe it does, to bring it down to just one system, and that system be carried out all over the State. In Philadelphia they have female and male schools which we cannot have in the country. We cannot separate them, they must be together. Hence they have certain grades of schools which in most of our country districts would be improper and impossible to carry out in consequence of the expense. I really hope the section will be adopted as it stands.

Mr. HAZZARD. Mr. Chairman: This word that is introduced is susceptible of construction. A uniform system may embrace the same kind of text books. I think it will bear that construction. If that be so, it will be improper to adopt it. In the rural districts they may need one class of books, and in the cities another. If this system is uniform they must introduce the studies of all the higher branches in the country. In some of our schools they teach algebra and the natural sciences. They may not be ready to do that in the country. They may be unable to obtain competent teachers for that purpose. I think this word would bear this construction.

Now there are different systems, although they amount to the same thing. There are different systems of mathematics. They call them systems. The truth is, they are about the same thing, for the multiplication table in one arithmetic is the same as the multiplication table in another. At the same time these authors call their works an improvement. Hence the introduction of the word now proposed would create confusion among the schools. There cannot be a uniformity, for in some of these districts teachers cannot be obtained to teach some of the branches which will be required to be taught in other parts of the State. I have had some experience in this matter, and I know if the amendment necessitated the introduction of the same class of books for all the schools, it would create considerable dissatisfaction in the school districts. The section reads well enough, as it is, "thorough, efficient system." That will admit of some construction also, but I do not see how we can better it. If we make it "uniform" we will find it impracticable, I think.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman: The word uniform was considered in the committee, and the majority of its members thought the introduction of the word, if not fraught with some danger, would, at least be attended with considerable inconvenience. The word "system," of itself, suggests sufficient symmetry, and a sufficient measure of uniformity, without annexing to it so rigid a word as "uniform," because if the Legislature provides for the State a thorough and efficient system of education they will certainly have accomplished all that a constitutional requirement should ask of them. Now, sir, when we affix to that the word "uniform," you require the Legislature to so legislate that they shall create a system which shall be unbending in all its features; and no matter what may be the requirements of any part of the State, no matter what may be the length of school terms required in one part over another, no matter what may be the kind of books which one district may require, no matter, in short, what may be the different local requirements throughout the State, by the use of the word "uniform" you compel the enactment of an iron law.

The committee, therefore, I think very discretely, came to the conclusion that the word uniform should be rejected, and that enough would be attained by the use of the word "system," and when you have affixed to that the adjectives "thorough and efficient," it seems to me you have accomplished all that is necessary to accomplish, and I therefore trust that the committee of the whole will hesitate before it consents that the word "uniform" shall be inserted, as required by the amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say that I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Crawford (Mr. Minor) will not be adopted, for the reason that it will either, on the one hand, prevent our having graded schools, or, on the other, it will reduce them.

I have had some experience in this school system. I have been connected with it for the last thirteen or fourteen years, and I find that even in this city it would be impossible in the nature of things to adopt a uniform system. We have in the more densely populated portions of the city, graded schools—the primary, the secondary, grammar, normal and high school, and in the sections of the city where the population is more sparse it would be impossible to establish and maintain crowded schools, as they are in what is called the thickly peopled settlements.

We must either have graded schools, or else we must have consolidated schools in which the children will be taught everything, from their "A B C's" upward. If it is the idea of the gentleman from Crawford (Mr. Minor) that the "three R's" only are to be taught, then the expression "three R's" ought to be sufficient and ought to be embodied in the section; but if the system is intended to give an opportunity to every child in the Commonwealth to get an equal chance for a good and proper education, the word "uniform" ought not to be put into it."

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: The word "uniform" has no such limited meaning at all, as the gentleman from Washington (Mr. Hazzard) and the gentleman from the city (Mr. Stanton) attach to it. It is simply meant to prevent special legislation in the matter of the common schools. It means "uniform law" with regard to the age at which children are to be admitted; it means "uniform law" with regard to taxation for school purposes; it means "uniform law" in relation to the taking of property for school purposes; it means "uniform law" with regard to all those matters that are of equal importance to all the schools and school districts of the Commonwealth. Only this and nothing more. It has nothing to do with text-books, or teachers, or school houses. These questions are left, as they are now very properly left, entirely to the local school authorities. It simply affects the character of the legislation made under this article of the Constitution, (if it be adopted,) and does not affect in the slightest degree the matters referred to by the gentlemen who opposed this amendment.

There are good reasons, Mr. Chairman, why this amendment should be adopted. To illustrate this, I will refer to the county in which I live. There is there an "independent district," which, though its schools are of the highest order and an honor to the borough sustaining them, nevertheless has been a constant source of irritation, and jealousy. When two independent authorities undertake to do the same work, friction is unavoidable. With us frequent collisions have occurred in supervision, in the organization of county institutes, and in the creation of the committees which examine and fix the status of teachers. But this district is an old monument of the intelligence of our citizens, and we have no desire to destroy it. But if this word "uniform" is not placed in the education article of the Constitution, there is nothing to hinder any portion of the people of this State from, at any time, attempting to have up, and getting themselves set off, as an "independent" district.

I ask whether gentlemen are willing to give this right to any little section of the State; the right to get itself cut off into an independent district and set up, not in conformity with this constitutional provision, but in conformity to some special law which the Legislature may pass in its behalf? Do gentlemen propose to strike down special legislation on every other subject, and leave it have full swing in the affairs of the common schools?

Surely if there be any matter of pride and glory in our State, it is to be found in our system of common schools; and if there be one thing in it of more value than another, it is this uniformity—this rigid, equal and impartial system. Our common schools are the great, broad leveler by which all the children of the Commonwealth are placed in one common arena. Whatever we do let us so fix this educational system that it will remain the honor and the pride of the Commonwealth; let us adopt this amendment, so that whatever there is in it that is good shall be enjoyed equally by all.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: I did not intend to say anything on this section, as I think it is right as it stands. It calls for "a thorough and efficient system of common schools," in which all the children of the State, above the age of six years, may be educated. I cannot, for the life of me, understand what the gentleman is driving at by his amendment. It would certainly diminish the usefulness and efficiency of our common schools in Philadelphia. This whole subject was thoroughly discussed in the committee, and a majority of the committee thought the section, as recommended, would be the best form in which it could be put. If you insert the word "uniform," I can tell, gentlemen, that it will be construed to mean, among other things, uniform text-books; and that is where the difficulty will commence.

Again, there are graded schools instituted throughout the State, but there are certain school districts wherein it would be utterly impossible to establish the same classes and grades of schools as those which we have in Philadelphia. Here are our high schools, for instance, for educating in the higher grades, the children of engineers, mechanics and others—and it would be well to have such a high school in every county, but pupils enough could not be secured to fill such a school were it established.

There is a high school near Lancaster, I believe, which is accomplishing a great deal of good in educating teachers, and children of artisans and others, but the thickly populated district in which the school is located secures to it results, which in sparsely settled counties could not be effected, for the reason previously stated—the want of a sufficient number of pupils. To remove or overcome this difficulty, it would be necessary to provide that a high school district shall include contiguous counties or portions of counties; and such a regulation would be equally objectionable, because the distance of the school, from the residences of a majority of the pupils, would render the system practically inoperative.

If, then, the word “uniform” is inserted, one of two results must follow—every school district in the State must have its system of primary, intermediate, grammar and high schools by mandate of law, whether such system can be established and rendered operative or not, or, on the other hand, those districts like Philadelphia, in which this system already obtains, must abolish so much of it as will reduce the system and the grades of the various schools and departments as will make them come within the provision of the article and place them upon a “uniform” although a lower basis.

If any gentleman can devise a plan by which a more efficient system of public schools and a system of higher education in the public schools can be established and carried into effect, I will be the most earnest of its advocates and will use, in its favor, both my voice and my vote.

I oppose the amendment proposed, because I believe that its adoption would tend to degrade materially the public schools from that high standard which they have attained in this and other cities, and to which they are so rapidly tending throughout the State. These are my reasons, Mr. Chairman, for opposing the amendment.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I desire to ask the gentleman whether he considers the Philadelphia high school a common school, under this section?

Mr. STANTON. Certainly it is a common school.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the gentleman mean to leave the committee under the impression that the word “uniform,” if left in that section, would necessarily imply that every district must establish “uniform schools?”

Mr. STANTON. Certainly.

Mr. WHERRY. Certainly not, it refers to uniform legislation.

Mr. STANTON. If it is for uniform legislation, let it say so.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman: Would it not be better to put an article on this subject, if it is for uniform legislation, into the article on Legislation and let this article stand as it is; then it will not be mis-construed.

Mr. HAZZARD. Mr. Chairman: For the very reason assigned by the gentleman from Cumberland (Mr. Wherry) that this amendment should be adopted, I hope it will not be adopted. It would be very improper to insist, by “uniform” legislation, or in any other way, that our common schools in the country should have a “uniform” system, as that would compel those who wish to study the higher branches of education to go to academies and high schools. We, who live in the west, have no such institutions of learning, and we sometimes organize, in the common schools, a class in the higher studies. We have, in that way, introduced chemistry, natural philosophy, history, algebra and the other higher branches. We give our children the benefit of these studies, under our common school plan, and we do not want it altered. We ask no aid from the State in that regard. We pay our taxes and are content.

Mr. WHERRY. I would ask the gentleman whether every child in the school district enjoys the advantages he refers to, or only a few?

Mr. HAZZARD. All may enjoy them who desire.

Mr. WHERRY. All do not enjoy them.

Mr. HAZZARD. The gentleman might as well ask whether all have the benefit of the colleges of the country.

Mr. WHERRY. The gentleman evades the question; for it must be apparent, on his own statement, that a large number of people in his section are taxed for the benefit of a few.

Mr. HAZZARD. There are a very large number of persons who do not care that their children should go to college; but they will send them to a common school which the State supports from the taxes of the citizens. With a competent teacher in the common school we can have all the advantages of a high school: I have sent my son to such a school in my own neighborhood in preference to sending him to an academy in some other part of the State. They tell me that the system has also worked well, and that it is thorough and good, in the city of Erie.

We do not want to have a “uniform” system. We want to have the right to introduce when and where we please some of these higher branches into our common schools, so that our children who can not go to colleges and academies away from home may go into their own schools, paid for and sustained by the people of the State, and study these higher branches with a teacher of competence. We do not want this word "uniform" here for it may be construed so as to lead to a conclusion on the part of school directors and others that we are to have only the elementary branches so as to be "uniform" with similar schools elsewhere in the country. It will admit of that construction. Why, this word would operate even as against the introduction of chemical or philosophical apparatus into one school because in another school they could not afford to have it.

Let those of us who prefer the plan of giving our children the benefits of the higher studies in their own district, and near their own homes, be allowed to do so. As to the school tax, we can, in any event, only get our share of that; and if we choose to pay something more for the privilege I speak of, over and above the tax, let us have the right to do it. Let us have a higher class of studies where we want it. If you put this word "uniform" into the section, school directors will hesitate and discuss whether they have a right to do anything of this kind or not.

Our common schools, sir, are the pride and boast of Pennsylvania. Do not let us restrict or limit their operations too much. Let it be known that even the ragged boy out of the mine may go in there and get a good education. I am afraid of this word "uniform." I think it would work trouble. Let us in the country have some liberty about these matters. Of course, everybody knows we must keep the common branches of education uniform; that must be so, of necessity; but do not let it be said that we cannot, even if we want to, introduce the higher branches into our common schools.

The question being then taken, the amendment to insert the word "uniform" before the word "thorough," was not agreed to.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the section, by striking out the words "above the age of six years." I offer this amendment, Mr. Chairman, because I think we have reached that standard of civilization in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania which condemns as inhuman the practice of confining children of six years of age in the common schoolhouses of this State. I desire that it should be fully understood throughout this whole Commonwealth that six years is the minimum age at which children can be received in our common schools.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment to, come in at the end of the section: "And the Legislature shall prescribe by law the kind and number of books to be used in the public schools; and changes in books shall not be made oftener than once in ten years."

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I have offered this amendment for the purpose of taking the sense of this Convention upon a subject that has attracted the attention of the people of the State as much as any other in connection with the system of common schools. The frequent changes which have been made in the text books of our schools has been a source of constant complaint among the parents of children throughout the Commonwealth. It has also become a matter of public scandal in many places in the Commonwealth that the agents of rival publishing houses constantly approach our school directors, and in fact are nominated and elected as school directors through the influence of prominent publishing houses in different parts of the country. The effect of such a practice as this has been to supersede certain text-books which have been used in the various schools throughout the State, and to introduce another and probably less desirable quality of text-books. There can be no possible doubt but that there should be some authority given for the purpose of prescribing the kind and number of books that should be used in the schools of the Commonwealth.

This, in my estimation, is a very important question, and one well worthy of the consideration of this Convention. We are now engaged in prescribing a system of education for the children of this Commonwealth, and one which is destined to provide a place for those higher schools that have been heretofore filled by the children of parents who have been unable to give them a collegiate education. The system which we now contemplate adopting, is designed to take the place of our colleges. It is intended to be a system in which all the children of the Commonwealth can acquire the highest branches of education, and, for myself, I would like to see some provision adopted that should prescribe the kind and number of books that are to be used in our schools, so that there should be some uniform system, and that we might escape the continual annoyances by which our schools are subjected, in the daily change that is made in the books that are used in our schools. I desire to say, however, that it is immaterial, as far as I am personally concerned, what the Convention does with the amendment which I have offered. I have offered it for the consideration of the Convention.

Mr. DE FRANCE. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the amendment, by striking out "ten years," and inserting "five years."

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I regard any limitation whatever upon a subject of this kind entirely inappropriate to a fundamental law. It would be a strange spectacle if a Convention engaged in revising the Constitution of the State should stop in its work to say what sort of books shall be used in our common schools, because we do not know ourselves. A book that may be a valuable school book to-day may be entirely superseded in a month or so hence.

Mr. MANTOR. Mr. Chairman: I merely rise to say that I am in favor of the section as it has been reported by the committee, and opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard.) It seems to me the amendment would have been very appropriate had it been offered thirty years ago in the Constitutional Convention, but we live to-day in an enlightened age of improvement, which certainly cannot approve of any proposition which shall prevent the selection by the schools of the various books for the instruction of their pupils. I can see no necessity whatever for such a provision in the Constitution, and I shall therefore vote against it.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: If I fully understand the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. Howard,) I consider it a most valuable suggestion, though I think it is out of place. I had prepared an amendment to come in at the end of the fourth section, which I had intended should accomplish the same object which I understand is the purpose of the amendment which has just been offered. I do not care in what part of this report the amendment is inserted, but that it ought to be inserted somewhere I am very confident. Indeed I see nothing in this whole report that is as valuable as a provision that would require the Legislature to make a law compelling the Superintendent of Public Schools to prescribe uniform school books throughout the State of Pennsylvania. Now, sir, I desire that such a provision should be placed in the Constitution. I do not care where it is inserted, but I do not desire that it should be left to the Legislature. If it is insisted that this would be legislation I agree that it is, but, as surely as you leave it to the Legislature, this provision will not be made. It is of vast consequence to the parents of this Commonwealth that this provision should be made in the Constitution. If you go to New York or Boston, you will find there large mansions and store-houses that have been built out of the money Pennsylvania parents have paid to the publishers of these school books.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman. I desire to remind the gentleman that the Legislature of Pennsylvania has passed a solemn statute which prevents the school directors of any district from changing the school books oftener than once in three years.

Mr. WOODWARD. That does not accomplish the object of this amendment, which is to prescribe, as I understand it, uniform school books for all the common schools of Pennsylvania. I do not see why the school books should be changed every three years. The multiplication table does not change every three years, and the rules of syntax and prosody do not change every three years. I do not know what rule does change every three years. If there must be a change made, I hope the change will be made uniform. But if they must be periodically changed, let that change be uniform, so that if a man moves from one school district into another school district, the books that he has been obliged to buy for his children will serve him in that district to which he goes. I want the same school books to be used in all the districts of Pennsylvania. I want the children of Pennsylvania to be educated in the same manner, and this scandalous speculation, which has been carried on at the expense of Pennsylvania parents, I want stopped.

I do not know that there will be any impropriety in my illustrating my argument by a fact. I raised a family of children and educated them, and I will say to the advocates of the female sex who are about us, that I gave my daughters as excellent an education as I gave my sons. One of my daughters wanted a Latin grammar and I took one down from the shelf and gave it to her. She took it to school and came back with the information that it would not do. She must have Bullion's Latin Grammar. Well I bought this famous grammar, price 75 cents, and examined it, and I found that it was the same Latin Grammar that I had first given my daughter, transposed and a little changed, but essentially and substantially the same grammar. But it was paid for. By and by she must have a Latin reader. I took a Latin Reader down from a shelf and gave her one. She took it to school and it would not do. She must have Bullion's Latin Reader. I bought it for $1.50, and to my horror I found it was Bullion's Latin Grammar bound up in Bullion's Latin Reader. I had bought Bullion's Latin Grammar twice. By and by my daughter must have Caesar's Commentaries. I have a standard edition of that, and I gave it to her. She took it to school and it would not do. She must have Bullion's Caesar's Commentaries, and when I bought it I found that some worthless Latin grammar was bound up the third time in Bullion's Caesar. Thus I was made to pay three times for a Latin Grammar that never ought to have been printed, because the school master was the agent of the publisher of Bullion's school books. That is the way I was operated upon, and I suppose any other man so situated shared the same fate. Then I inquired who this famous Bullion was, and I learned that he was a Methodist minister at Albany, who was making school books, and through this system of local agents and pliant Legislatures the balance of the world were being made to pay again and again for a Latin grammar, which, again and again I say, ought never to have been printed. There is not a thing in Bullion's Latin Grammar that is not found in Latin grammars that were made and printed before Bullion's was born.

Mr. Chairman: I have no interest in this question. I am a man over twenty-one years of age, at which a man can select his own books. I have no children to educate; but there are numerous people who have, and I want to save them, my fellow-citizens and fellow-parents, from the impositions which were successfully practiced on me through this system of school books, and that is why I am prepared to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. Howard,) although I would prefer that that amendment should come at the close of the fourth section and read in this way:

The fourth section reads:

SECTION 4. A Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be appointed by the Governor, by and with the consent of the Senate. He shall hold his office for the term of four years, and his duties and compensation shall be prescribed by law.

I would add to that section these words: "which shall require him, among other things, to prescribe the school books to be used in all the common schools of the State."

I trust that either here, or in the fourth section, or some other part of this bill, some such provision will be introduced. I trust that this Convention will not let this bill pass through their hands without guarding the parents of Pennsylvania from the gross impositions which I do know have been practiced upon them, and which I have no doubt, will be continued to be practiced upon them if we do not put in some such conservative provision.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman: I did not suppose, sir, that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) was really to be seriously considered by this Convention, because from its terms it would impose so much inconvenience upon the people of Pennsylvania, it would subject the directors of the public schools all over the State to so much trouble that it would be found to be entirely impracticable. It is a proposition that we embody in our Constitution a provision requiring that all the school books throughout the State will be uniform. I think that a very little reflection on the part of any gentleman will convince him that it would be almost impossible, certainly impracticable. Why, sir, the wants of every locality differ. The directors are the only ones who should determine what are the wants of the scholars of the schools in their district. They alone understand what the children there require. They have made it a study, and it is for them to ascertain what the peculiar necessities of their district are, what books they will need, besides what particular branches they will study. And who shall pretend to determine the kind of text-books to be used as those who have charge of the schools themselves?

In various parts of the State, under the system of common schools, there are organized and in operation very large German schools. In other districts there are Welsh ones. Now, sir, imagine the inconvenience of the Superintendent of Public Instruction determining that a certain text-book should be used throughout all portions of the State. Why the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) expressed himself as surprised when, on different occasions, his children brought home to him this and that kind of a book. I submit if he would not have been still greater surprised if, on sending children to school, they would bring home to him a Dutch book or a Welsh book?

This proposition is one which scarcely admits of argument. It ought to suggest itself to every one that it should not be adopted. The idea of embodying into the Constitution, which cannot be altered without great difficulty, a proviso of this kind is one that cannot be seriously considered and entertained by the members of this committee. I therefore hope it will be voted down.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: I entirely agree with the gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Landis.) I do not see why this amendment should be adopted, or why any change should be made in the present system of selecting text-books. The present statute on the subject, which seems, in my judgment, to meet the case fully, is as follows:

"The board of school directors of any district, the controllers in cities and boroughs, shall not order, or direct, or make any change in the school books or text-books used in any school under his or their superintendence, direction or control, more than once in every period of three years."

Certainly the directors of any district know better what the children in their district need than the Superintendent of Public Schools, or the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania. They fix the series of books once in three years. At the end of three years if any improvement has been made in the school books during that time, by any of the persons who direct their attention to such matters, then another change may be made. It does not follow as a matter of course, that the system of books is to be changed every three years. The way is only opened if improvements are made that makes it desirable to change the books of any district, for the directors to make the change. And if any change is to be made they are the proper parties to make it. They certainly know more about it than anybody else.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I would like the gentleman to state a reason why the school books of one district should be different from the school books of another district, so that when a man emigrates from one district the books his children used there will not answer in the other, and he must be forced to buy new ones. Can the gentleman state a reason?

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: Certainly I can. It would be perfectly apparent to the gentleman, if he had served as a school director during the last forty or fifty years, that the wants of one school district are quite different from the wants of another, and that nobody can understand them so well as the directors themselves.

I have no doubt that Kirkham's Grammar, Duball's Arithmetic and Cobb's Speller, and the other books which the gentleman studied when he was a boy, were, in his judgment, the best books that ever were made. But I beg him to recollect that the world moves, and there has been an advance since the days when he studied his edition of Anthon's, Cæsar or whatever author he did study. I suppose his experience on the subject of Latin books is unfortunate. His experience with reference to Bullion's Grammar, must have cost him as much as one dollar and twenty-five cents, and all the extra expenses.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I beg the gentleman to answer my question. My question was, why should one school district require different school books from another school district? That is the question I ask him!

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: Simply because the wants of one district differ from the wants of another district. What would suit the Philadelphia high school, would not suit a district in the mining regions of Luzerne county. That is perfectly evident. And what would suit a primary school in the intelligent and cultivated agricultural regions would not suit a primary school in some precincts of Philadelphia. These matters can be better regulated by the school directors, those who are elected by the people who have children to send to school and who take an interest in these matters and who are better qualified to regulate the books to be used than anybody else.

On the subject of the boring of school agents and the interest of school superintendents, I desire only to say that it is made a high misdemeanor for a man connected with the public schools to be in any way engaged in furnishing them with supplies of any kind. I do not suppose such persons are interested in supplying schools with books. I suppose they do their duty, and I believe that all this clamor which is raised about school books, is mainly attributable to the penuriousness of people who do not like to buy books for their children, either old or new, and, by this, I do not mean any personal allusion to the gentleman from Philadelphia. Having had four or five years' experience as a director of schools, in a somewhat flourishing section of the State, where the schools have acquired prominence. I can speak by the book upon this subject.

MR. LILLY. How often were your text-books changed in that time?

MR. H. W. PALMER. We changed books but once in six years.

MR. LILLY. Then, Mr. Chairman, the amendment does not touch the gentleman's case at all.

MR. H. W. PALMER. We adopted a uniform system of books and changed it but once, because more frequent change did not seem desirable, but we should have deemed it a great hardship if debarred from making a change for the better in our school books, when change became necessary.

MR. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I am rather peculiarly situated in reference to this question. I have no children of my own to send to school, and therefore, the purchase of new books does not effect me. But I hear this clamor every time the series of school books is changed in my region of the State, where it is alleged that the change is made in the interest of school directors or others who have the books changed because there is a profit for themselves in the transfer.

The gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer) says that it only costs a dollar and twenty-five cents to make the changes in Latin grammars that were required by the daughter of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward). Let me tell him that the cost of books is, in my section of the State, a tax of sometimes fifty dollars and sixty dollars a year to get all the text-books required. And it is a crying shame that these changes are allowed to be made. I have seen these book agents traveling around, and I have seen them with the school directors, taking them out to hotels, feasting them and treating them and all that sort of thing, and the first thing we know is that when these agents get home the system of textbooks is changed, and the expense put upon the taxpayer and the people who have children to send to school.

As I said, I speak entirely independant of that, because it does not touch my pocket, but I speak of it, because I hear this clamor every year, and sometimes twice a year. If in some districts, where some gentlemen here may be school directors, the books are only changed once in three or four years, the clamor does not reach them; but I will guarantee that in the county of Carbon there is not a school district in which the books are not changed three times in three of four years.

MR. H. W. PALMER. You should look after your school directors.

MR. LILLY. Well, we do, but we cannot keep looking after them all the time, and we cannot always keep them right.

MR. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: I should regret very much to see this amendment prevail. I cannot, for my life, see the advantage of it. In our city we have a system of school books, and have been obliged to take, frequently, an old book, because the act of Assembly prevents us from changing, except once in three years. The author of the book may have revised and improved it, and a revised edition is by us considered a new edition, therefore we are obliged to take the old edition. In reply to the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Woodward,) I would say that there is a law absolutely prohibiting any teacher from having anything to do with the sale of books, or to act as agent for them. We will not even permit an agent to go into our schools and solicit the teachers for the sale of books. What it is in the rural districts of the State I am not able to say.

MR. LEAR. We have the same law.

MR. STANTON. I presumed so; I presume it is an act of the Assembly. In our grammar schools we have supplementary grades called the senior class, in which departments the children receive almost the same grade of education and use the same books as those in the high or Normal schools. We do that because of the absolute demand for it by the necessities of the community. I should be sorry indeed if the school directors who are elected under the act of Assembly cannot grade their schools and select such books as they please. I think it would be utterly impossible for the Superintendent to go all over the State and ascertain properly the wants of the schools. In the city of Philadelphia we have over eighty-seven thousand children in our schools, and the Superintendent could not go around and see these schools and all other schools of the State properly attended to. Therefore the act of Assembly has wisely provided that each school section or ward may have from twelve to twenty directors, whose duty it is to go around and ascertain the wants of the section and represent these wants to the board of education.

The gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) is mistaken if he supposes that the wants of the school districts remain the same all the time. Additional wants are always being discovered, and with regard to the publishers, these men seek the sale of their books all the time, and you cannot make them stay at home. If the eastern men can get up a book cheaper than those nearer home, we will have to take the cheaper book. I would very much like to see a Philadelphia house supply the whole State with school books, but it cannot be done. We are obliged by act of Assembly to advertise for proposals, and to describe in our advertisement what we want. The publishers put in their bids, and we have bids from Boston, New York, Chicago, and from other cities, and there are sometimes books which are printed and published in Philadelphia which we can buy in Boston cheaper than we can here. It is no fault of ours. It is no fault of the directors of the public schools or of the board of education. If there is a fault at all it is in the law. For my part I do not think there is any fault, and I do trust the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. CORSON. Mr. Chairman: I am satisfied the prevailing opinion of this body is to incorporate into the Constitution the spirit of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Stanton) and the gentleman from Pittsburg, (Mr. Howard,) and, by an arrangement between these two gentlemen, the gentleman from Pittsburg (Mr. Howard) proposed to withdraw his amendment to the section, so that the two ideas may be incorporated into one, which I have drawn up to be proposed as an amendment to section fourth.

There is a settled conviction in the minds of the people, especially all those of us who have any children, or ever expect to have, to have some settled law in regard to school books, and there is no reason in the world why they should be changed, and, if we can settle this question for ten years, that will help me out, and the rest can take care of themselves.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I have but one word to say, in answer to the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Stanton.)

He remarked that the law as it now exists operates an inconvenience to the board of school directors in our city; because there are some editions, and various classes of school books coming out within the three years. I beg leave to say to the gentleman and to the committee, that my opinion is that if a constitutional provision, something like this, was adopted, the various editions of which the gentlemen have spoken would not be issued by the publishers. The desire upon the part of the school directors, or those who have the charge of these matters to change is, really, because of the frequent editions brought before the community by these various publishers. It is not the fault of the law; the act of Assembly prohibiting these changes within three years is all very well if lived up to; but I know it is not lived up to in the city of Philadelphia, and there are other persons whose experience in the city of Philadelphia agrees with mine in that respect. It is a very common subject of complaint with people, that their children going to the public schools are obliged to change the books every two or three years, and I understand that in some schools, the teachers have the books there for sale, and are acting as agents for them. I believe, sir, that such a provision as this should be in the Constitution.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask the gentleman (Mr. Temple,) if he can name a single instance where the board of public education of the city of Philadelphia have changed a single book since the act of Assembly.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I only know, as my friend the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Stanton) knows, that it has not been two years since certain investigations were going on in the city of Philadelphia in regard to the purchase of books, by, I believe, the board of control, the complaint being, if I mistake not, that they had made a contract with somebody for a larger consideration than the books could have been got for elsewhere. I am not here to answer conundrums or to make reflections, but the gentleman knows as well as I do that such complaints have been made. I do not know that he has any reason to complain on account of his own children, but it is certain that the complaints have been made.

MR. STANTON. If the gentleman puts a conundrum, and we give it up, he ought to answer it. [Laughter.]

I will simply say here that as I have the honor to preside over the board of public education of the city of Philadelphia, who alone have authority to change the text-books used in our public schools, I assert positively and absolutely that no such changes as intimated by my colleague (Mr. Temple) have been made. The penalty for making such changes is, I believe, a fine of five hundred dollars and imprisonment. Now if such change had been made by the board of education of this city I should not, probably, have the honor of sitting in this Convention at this time. [Laughter.]

MR. PROCHÉ. Mr. Chairman: I have had the honor of being a school director for some fifteen or sixteen years in my section of country, and I look upon this question of the frequent changing of books as one of the great pests of the State. My colleague said he spoke by the books. I, too, speak by the book; because, there is scarcely a year passes that there is not some new school book issued by some publishing firm. They send their agents all over the State to canvass for that book, and how do they do it? In the rural districts they ascertain the names of the school directors and make them friendly calls, and they have no objections to loitering with them over night, provided it does not cost anything. They will go to each director and teacher, offer them an inducement, saying: "If you will adopt my book I will furnish you with books for your own family for so long a time; we will take your old books and furnish our new ones without any extra charge for the first year." Why? So that they can introduce their books into the school district or county. It is a very profitable business. School books at present prices are, I think, the dearest books published, while they ought to be the cheapest, in order that the common people may not find them burdensome.

This does not apply, perhaps, to the city of Philadelphia, for the reason that the board of control furnishes each scholar with all necessary school books free; it is in the rural districts, and in the mining districts, that this vexatious and onerous burden is felt, where the poor laboring man has to buy books for his children. Every new teacher or board that comes in makes a change in the text-books and imposes in that way an onerous tax and burden upon the people. I have heard more complaint from parents, mechanics and working men upon this point than upon any other. I believe that we ought to engraft into the organic law a provision that the text-books should not be changed within five years. We have that arrangement now, for three years, and I think it would be an improvement to make it five, or at least some method adopted by which this constant change of text-books in our common schools should be abated.

MR. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: The difficulty with this amendment is that it is out of place in the Constitution. However proper it may be in a code of school laws, it seems to me that it has no business whatever in a Constitution. That the Legislature will enact a law in this direction is shown by the fact that they have done it, and the only difficulty lodged with the law now in force is that the time is not long enough. That, however, is a question for the Legislature. I am of opinion that these things had much better be left to the people themselves, who are much better capable of judging of what they want than either the Legislature or this Convention; and if not left to the school districts, it should certainly be left to the Legislature to fix from time to time what they may need.

It looks to me monstrous to put a provision in the Constitution that a particular school district, although every person in it may vote to have Bullion's Latin Grammar in use in their schools, cannot get it for ten years, and even then not without the consent of the Superintendent of Public Instruction and the Legislature. It is said that there is a belief that the people are imposed upon by book agents. If we are going to sit here until we can protect all the people of Pennsylvania against book agents, we will have a very long session indeed.

We cannot do better than by leaving this matter to the people or the Legislature, under the penalties imposed by the act which was read by my friend from Luzerne (Mr. E. W. Palmer.) Why should we set about remedying all the difficulties of school directors in the State of Pennsylvania? Why should we suppose that school directors are capable of being tampered with, that the Legislature is capable of being tampered with, and that we ourselves are not?

I sometimes have felt ready to propose that we should resolve ourselves into a continuous body, inasmuch as we contain all the integrity of the State of Pennsylvania. I did not believe that this proposition was going to be seriously pressed until the remarks of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) were made, showing that he was really in earnest; he has a grievance, not a very extensive one, one I believe of the extent of a dollar and a half, and I am sorry for him, as I would not have him imposed upon even to that slight extent, but I do not want a provision in the Constitution of Pennsylvania, placed there for the purpose of preventing some book agent from imposing upon my associate or somebody else. I would leave this to the people of the school districts themselves, acting through their superintendent. I would certainly not go farther than to allow the Legislature the power that it already has without this amendment to regulate the matter under the penalties prescribed.

MR. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman: I do not think that the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) understands exactly the amendment offered by the delegate from Allegheny, (Mr. Howard,) as I understand it. There is no law touching the point spoken of by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Newlin.) The law on the subject is in these words:

"The board of directors of any district, the controllers in cities and boroughs, or any school superintendent, shall not order or direct, or make, any change in the school books or series of text books in any school under his or their superintendence, or control more than once in every period of three years."

That is the act of May 23, 1871, and that is the act to which the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) refers. It does not cover the point referred to, at all.

MR. BROOMALL. The gentleman will allow me to say, that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Newlin,) has not been offered. I was speaking to the amendment offered on the other side of the House.

MR. RUSSELL. As I understood the amendment offered by the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. Howard,) it was to the same effect. This law allows a change of school books every three years in every school district in the State. That is just what we wish to prevent. Here, for instance, is a board of school directors in the borough in which I reside. That board establishes a certain set of school books. Only a few steps from that school is a township with a different set of school books; and if a man moves from the borough of Bedford into the township of Bedford, he is obliged to buy for his children a new set, each, of the set of books.

There is nothing in what the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer) said that touches the point. I do not think that he fully or fairly answered the question propounded to him by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward.) We are not legislating here with regard to the high schools of Philadelphia, or to the series of school books that should be used there, but we are legislating with regard to the common schools of the State; and the act provides that it shall be the duty of each county superintendent to see that in every district there shall be taught orthography, reading, writing, English grammar, geography, and arithmetic, as well as such other branches as the board of directors or controllers may require.

The purpose of the common school system of Pennsylvania is to instruct the children of the State in these common branches of education, and not in the higher branches; and what we wish is that there shall be a uniform series of school books in every district of the State, so that we shall not have in the twenty odd districts of any county twenty odd different series of school books.

I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. Howard,) but would prefer that it should come in at the end of the fourth section, so as to make it the duty of the Superintendent of Public Instruction to say that the same series of school books is adopted in each district, and in every district of the State.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: As this amendment seems to attract a good deal of attention, I will withdraw it for the present.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: Inasmuch as there has been considerable debate on this section, and as perhaps sometime may be saved, if it can be disposed of now, I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the section:

"The Governor, Attorney General and Superintendent of Public Instruction, shall constitute a board of education. They shall have supervision of public instruction, and shall prescribe what school books shall be used, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law."

There seems to be an acknowledged evil just here, which it is difficult to meet. Now, it seems to me, that it is improper to leave to the local boards of a township or a section, a small and unimportant body like that, the settlement of a question of this magnitude, and the difficulty arising from it has been very aptly stated by the gentleman from Bedford, (Mr. Russell,) where, within the same county, in different public schools, different textbooks are used upon the same subject. Again, with regard to the Legislature, it would perhaps be improper to give to it the power alone, of regulating all these matters.

Now, my proposition is to leave it in a general way, subject to such regulations as may be made by law to the proposed board, composed of the Governor, Superintendent of Public Instruction and the Attorney General. Let them prescribe, under such regulations as may be indicated by law, the general course of instruction, let them have a general supervision, the details to be fixed by the Legislature from time to time.

This matter of what books shall be used is, I think, properly left to a board of this kind. I would not leave it entirely to the Superintendent of Public Instruction for fear that officer, having so much to do with the mere details of education, his mind might, to a certain extent, be contracted, his views might be somewhat those of a pedagogue, and by joining with him in this general supervisory power two other officers, the Governor and the Attorney General, it seems to me that perhaps such a general course of instruction might be mapped out for the whole State, the details, of course, as much as possible, being left to the local authorities, as would accomplish general good, and meet with general approbation. Perhaps this amendment ought, more properly, come in at the end, as a new section; but, inasmuch, as there has been extended debate on this subject, it might be as well to take the sense of the body upon the resolution. A board, such as I have proposed, though the officers are varied, exists in the Constitutions of a number of the States, leaving the details for the Legislature to arrange.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I would suggest to the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Newlin) that he add to his amendment a provision that this same board shall prescribe the food which the children shall eat. [Laughter.]

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I rise to a point of order. Is this amendment german to the first section?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman: I was going to suggest to the gentleman, (Mr. Newlin,) that he put it in at the proper time rather as a new section than to offer it now.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: If we were not in committee of the whole, I should move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on the Executive Department of the government, as it mainly seems to affect that department; I think, however, that you are laying upon your Executive and his cabinet more labor than they will ever be able to get through with.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I withdraw it for the present, in order to offer it at a subsequent period as a separate section.

The question being upon the section, it was agreed to.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 2. The Legislature shall appropriate at least one million dollars for each year, to be annually distributed among the several school districts, according to law, and applied to public school purposes only.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: This section strikes me as being not only unnecessary but improper in the Constitution. The excellence of the school system of Pennsylvania, or one of its greatest excellencies is the fact of it being so completely localized, that the control and superintendence of the schools in any immediate neighborhood is under a board chosen by the people who support those schools and who send to the schools. The State supervision is a mere incident of the system. Now in the past the Legislature has made an appropriation from the State treasury, raised from State taxes and distributed among the various school districts of the State, in proportion to the number of taxable inhabitants, if I recollect rightly, either so or in proportion to the number of children in the schools. The object, and the only object that there can be in that provision, or in this appropriation, is this: The wealthy communities, such as Philadelphia, Lancaster, Chester, and other districts, can support their schools more easily than the people in the more rural districts, and where the population is sparse, and where there is less wealth. By these appropriations, made each year, for every one hundred thousand dollars taken out of Philadelphia by State taxation, you perhaps, would return to them twenty-five thousand, so with other districts; Lancaster, I venture to say, pays two dollars for the State tax for one dollar that it gets out of any State appropriations. Now I am entirely willing that this shall continue to be the policy of the State through its legislation. Heretofore, I think, the highest appropriation that has been made for this purpose is about seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. It is not long since it was only three hundred thousand. This section under consideration provides by a constitutional provision that it shall be at least one million dollars. It is a very large increase in an appropriation to be made at once. It is an increase in the expenditures of the State that will have to be met by increased taxation, and I am not willing that it shall come in here as a constitutional provision. The State has heretofore contributed as liberally as was necessary to support common schools throughout the State, and it may be necessary for many years to continue these appropriations; but I hope the time is coming when each community will be able to support its own schools from its own taxes in the immediate neighborhood, and then this provision will be unnecessary. It is the taking of money from each county, putting it in the State Treasury, and then spreading all over the State. It is a waste of money in the collection and disbursement of it, and should not be encouraged any further than is necessary. I do not see the justice and propriety of it; I think it is improper here, and as a constitutional provision is inexpedient.

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say a few words with regard to this system of State appropriations, because there are some reasons in its favor which are not known to those who have not lived in peculiarly constituted communities. In many portions of the rural districts, the school law was put in operation only because of these State appropriations. In the county from which I come, there are certain townships or school districts, where they embraced the common school system with avidity, and the public schools are open for a period of ten months in the year. There are many townships in the county that, for a long time refused to put themselves within the provisions of the common school system. Finally they were induced to adopt it, when the matter was elective with them, by reason of this form of State appropriations, and although it may first have been taken from their own pockets and placed in the State Treasury, they thought, because they got this bonus from the State, that it was an inducement to adopt the common school system in their districts, and they adopted it, and common schools went into operation. At this time, although there is no election upon the question, as to whether they will have common schools or not, yet they cannot get this State appropriation in the various districts, unless the schools have been in operation for a period of five months. If it were not for that limitation, there are townships, even in the intelligent counties of Montgomery, Bucks and others around us, where they would only have a school law in operation for a period of three months in the year.

As long as we have a bureau of education in the State, presided over by the Superintendent of Public Instruction, it is necessary that the statistics of the public schools can be collected and gathered together; and there is a provision, now in the school law of Pennsylvania, that, until the county superintendent has made his report, the amount of appropriation shall not be made, and until the district directors have made their reports there shall be no appropriations; and it is the only way in which the State has control over the local boards of directors, by which they are compelled, in order to get this State appropriation, to furnish their reports of the working of the school system in the respective localities, and it is, therefore, a whip to be held over the heads of unwilling school directors in those districts where the public school system is not popular, that this becomes of great importance, for the purpose of giving vigor, energy and motive power to the public school system of Pennsylvania. For this reason, alone, we should have the State appropriations; and besides that, it enables the districts where they are not wealthy, because wealth does not always go with population, and where we have our farms of many hundred acres, and the population is sparse, the people are more wealthy, but when we get into our mining and manufacturing communities, where there are little huts filled with children—because poverty and population, at least the multiplicity of children seem to go hand in hand, there it is, that the appropriations from the State in accordance with population, or in accordance with the number of children in the schools, as the case may be, is an assistance and help to these localities where children prevail to a greater extent than wealth.

For these reasons the appropriation from the State is of the highest importance to the efficiency of the public school system of Pennsylvania, and we should have a minimum below which this appropriation shall not go, for the reason given by the Superintendent of Public Schools of Pennsylvania to this committee. He said he annually had to go before the committee of the Legislature and beg and implore, and threaten and argue, and use all the means and the devices in his power to get a respectable appropriation. It can be as well and as profitably expended, and for the benefit of the State as any other, and if we are making appropriations for improvements at all, let us make this appropriation for the improvement of the public mind of the State. This subject is probably of more importance than any other one that will receive the attention of this committee, and we should give it a thoughtful consideration.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment: Strike out the first line and insert: "The Legislature shall appropriate such amount as they shall deem proper each year, to be annually distributed."

It is only necessary to remark, with reference to this amendment, that this section allows the sum of one million of dollars, and it seems to me that this amendment will meet any exigencies that will arise from time to time, and the Legislature at last is the place where the sum must be appropriated, and it can well be the place for fixing the amount. The section stands substantially as it is, with the exception of the sum one million being left out.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I hope this amendment will not prevail. I look upon this section, as it stands, the most important one that has been proposed to this Convention. I believe that its adoption will give more encouragement, and aid more to commend the Constitution to the people, than any other one section which we can prepare. In addition to the very satisfactory and conclusive arguments made by the gentleman from Bucks, (Mr. Lear,) in favor of this section, I will make one suggestion which he did not make, in favor of a large appropriation from the State, and in favor of its being certain and fixed in the Constitution, a point beyond which the Legislature shall not go, which, in addition to the statement of the gentleman, show how this appropriation will enable the Superintendent of Public Instruction to reach out to every board of school directors in the Commonwealth, his hand, and hold them up to the support of the law. I would require every school teacher in the Commonwealth, to receive a certificate from the County Superintendent, and it is only through this appropriation throughout the State, that the school boards, and teachers are held up to a high standard. If it were not for the State appropriation, partisan boards of school directors might select teachers without the proper qualifications. I believe in the county in which I reside, the school directors are as earnestly in favor of a school law as those of any county in the Commonwealth, and yet, even there, where education is a great necessity, there are some districts where the boards of school directors are influenced by petty feeling, and they have occasionally sought to put into the schools, teachers who could not secure the certificate of the county superintendent, and who had not the proper qualifications, according to the standard of law now fixed by the Legislature to teach school, but when it has been found that the State appropriation has had to be taken into consideration, and requires a certificate from the county superintendent that the applicant is properly qualified, it has worked a decided and very salutary influence. Teachers, often of an improper character, or an improper standard of morals, would have been installed in our schools were it not for this salutary influence which the superintendent controls by means of this appropriation. In addition to this, the appropriation enables the Superintendent of Public Instruction to extend his influence to every district in the State, and to keep them up to a better standard in regard to instruction, which would entirely fail with a smaller appropriation. When an appropriation of only half a million dollars is divided up, it becomes so small that it cannot possess much influence in the various districts, but if it is provided that the appropriation shall not be less than a million dollars, it then becomes a very considerable item, and furnishes an inducement to every board of school directors in the State to attain all the requirements prescribed by law, in order to secure a portion of its benefits. This is the argument in favor of retaining this provision in the Constitution, and the Committee upon Education have reported it simply because it will give a new impetus to the educational system in Pennsylvania, and it will give the Superintendent of Public Instruction far more influence throughout the various counties, because there will be a larger inducement held out everywhere to school directors to comply with the law. There is now considerable difficulty in securing prompt reports from some boards of school directors, which delays the appropriation, because in sparsely settled communities the appropriation is so small, but as the section proposes the sum of one million dollars to be divided among the various counties of the State, the appropriation will be large enough for every district to secure a prompt compliance with the law, in regard to making reports to the county superintendent. Above and beyond all this, I submit that this increased appropriation will give a new impetus to the cause of education throughout this Commonwealth. It will make the people in every district of the State, personally interested in the cause of education, and feel more energetic than ever before in educational matters. I have no doubt if this section is adopted, that we shall soon become, beyond all doubt, what many of the friends of education earnestly hope, the leading State of this Union upon this question, and that we shall set an example to all the other States, of devotion to our educational interests.

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Chairman: I simply rise for the purpose of stating that by the returns for the year 1872, the children returned as enrolled amounted to eight hundred and thirty-four thousand, three hundred and thirteen. The average attendance was a little over six hundred and thirty-six thousand. The sum of a million dollars was fixed, therefore, because it was thought that the appropriation of the State towards education would be so fixed as to range from one dollar to one dollar and a quarter per scholar.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I will not intrude long upon the valuable time of the Convention. I do not think we can over-estimate the value of this provision reported by the Committee upon Education. If the original provision passes hundreds of people in the poorer parts of this Commonwealth will say, "God bless the Convention." I trust that in view of this, delegates of this Convention will hesitate before they adopt the modification proposed by the delegate from Montgomery (Mr. Boyd.)

tion of this Commonwealth, and succeeded in establishing a common school system for Pennsylvania it was the intention that this great State should reach out its arms as a Commonwealth to take charge of all its children, and give them a proper education, and it was only because of the factious opposition and the blindness of ignorance in some parts of this Commonwealth that the common school system of Pennsylvania was not made a State system; and if I had it in my power to-day, and the majority of the people of this State were to construct a system de novo, I would establish a State system, by which a tax of from three to five mills should be assessed upon all the taxable property, taken into the State Treasury, and paid out thence to the different regions of the Commonwealth, in proportion to the number of children to be educated. That would be fair, and it would be in harmony with the original design of the great system of common school education. I fear the time has gone by for success to be attained by means of this great system, unless an annual appropriation is made from the common treasury for the assistance of all parts of this Commonwealth. Delegates living in the richer parts of this Commonwealth do not realize the struggle which the people in the newer parts of Pennsylvania make to educate their children. Our school tax reaches, in some instances, to one, two and three, and I have known it to reach as high as five per cent. This is oppressive, and the difficulty in collecting these taxes makes the system burdensome and interferes with its harmony while it increases the jealousies that are inconsistent with the true prosperity of our educational system.

The only way then, Mr. Chairman, that the Legislature of the State can inaugurate now, an improvement in our educational system, is by increasing, from year to year, the annual appropriation which shall be equally and equitably distributed. Delegates from the rich old counties in the east, you will receive the benefit of it. Delegates from Philadelphia, you will receive the benefit of it. In the great populous part of the Commonwealth this fund is distributed, according to the number of children, and it may be that you get more than the poorer parts of the Commonwealth. I was surprised when the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Ewing) called the attention of the Convention to this fact. He said it is unwise to fix a minimum sum in the Constitution, and leave it to the discretion of the Legislature. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to legislate in this Convention. Year after year there has been a conflict in the Legislature upon the amount of annual appropriations. Let this Convention, representing as it does, the free sovereignty of this Commonwealth, indicate its wish, that in no event shall the Legislature, for all the great benefits and purposes of education, appropriate less than a million of dollars, and you will have accomplished a mighty thing. It is an important matter, and a proper subject for Constitutional enactment; aye, Mr. Chairman, it is fundamental, for it goes to the education of the people. Nine hundred thousand children to-day, are the wards of the Commonwealth. Your Superintendent of Common Schools is educating them under the system you have adopted. Do not be insensible to the great principles that I know he is not.

It is said by the delegate from Allegheny, (Mr. Ewing,) that we will have to increase the revenue, increase the taxes upon the people, if this greatly increased appropriation is made. Such is far from the truth. Such is a mistake, Mr. Chairman, unwittingly made, I know, by the honorable delegate from Allegheny. Last year the Legislature appropriated, for common schools alone, seven hundred thousand dollars, the first step they had made to that large sum. They appropriated, furthermore, four hundred and fifty and odd thousand dollars for the education of the soldier orphans of this Commonwealth, in propogation and support of that system which you, Mr. Chairman, inaugurated for that purpose, when you occupied the Executive chair of this Commonwealth. The time is coming when all these wards of the Commonwealth will be educated and sent forth in the struggle of life, and this one fund will be relieved from that purpose. Turn it not back to remain as a fund in the treasury! Turn it not back to be appropriated to this charity, and that charity, confined to one section of the State! Let it go into the common fund, which is annually appropriated to the support of the common schools. Then the rich and the poor—those who have been favored by birth, and those who have not been favored—will all get the benefit of it. No increased revenue is required. No increased burden is called for from the people.

Mr. Chairman, I tell no secret when I remark that the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania have, to-day, by solemn vote, resolved to put in the appropriation bill eight hundred thousand dollars! In view of these facts, tell me not that we have no revenues in Pennsylvania! This great growing State; this God blessed Commonwealth is able to educate its children, and educate them liberally.

Delegates, I hope you will stand by the report of the committee, and refuse the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montgomery.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman: I was very much gratified to find that the Committee on Education had reported this section. During the sittings of the Convention at Harrisburg, I offered a resolution that the Committee on Education should be instructed to consider whether such a section should not be introduced, and I have the pleasure of seeing that they have carried the idea into execution. In that resolution, as originally written, the sum of two millions of dollars was named, but upon reflection, I thought that it would be better to fix it at the sum named in the report of the Committee on Education, one million, and therefore named that sum in the resolution.

Such a section should be incorporated into our Constitution. I am looking forward to the time when every school in the State will be a State institution; that is, in other words, that every school will be supported by an appropriation from the State treasury, sufficient to keep every school in every district in the State, in operation during the full term fixed by law. I concur in every word which the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) has said on the subject, and in the argument which the gentleman from Potter (Mr. Mann) has made, in favor of having this section passed in this committee, and inserted by the Convention, in the Constitution, and I hope with him that you will not pass the amendment of the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Corson.)

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment, which will be read.

The CLERK. To strike out the words "at least one million dollars," and insert "such amount as they shall deem proper."

The CHAIRMAN. Read the section as it is proposed to amend it.

The CLERK. They shall appropriate such amount as they shall deem proper each year, to be annually distributed among the several school districts according to law, and applied to public school purposes only.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the section, which will be read.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 2. They shall appropriate at least one million dollars for each year, to be annually distributed among the several school districts, according to law, and applied to public school purposes only.

The section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The third section will be read.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 3. No money raised in any way whatever for the support of public schools shall ever be appropriated to or used by any religious sect for the maintenance or support of schools exclusively under its own control.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Chairman: I was about proposing to amend this section by moving to strike out the word "exclusively," when it occurred to me that perhaps the Committee on Education, that made this report, had some good and sufficient reason in introducing that word, which had not suggested itself to my mind. I will therefore defer offering the amendment until I can hear from that committee.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: The object of inserting the word "exclusively," if I understood it aright, was to preclude any portion of the public money being appropriated to the support of exclusively religious schools, whether Quaker, Catholic, or what you will. In other words, that every school to which money should be appropriated, no matter how raised, whether by the State or by taxation in a district, should be for the public schools, which would be open to all alike, without regard to sect or religious feeling. That is, I believe, all the object we had in view. It was to make the provision of the section so clear upon that point that there could never be any question upon it in the future, but that it would always be understood to mean that it excluded none but those who are exclusively under the control of sect.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Chairman: I am glad to discover that the gentleman from Chester, chairman of the Committee on Education, and myself, agree fully in what would be proper under the circumstances to do. But it seems to me that the language used by the Committee on Education in this section would entirely defeat the purpose intended. As I understand it, it requires that money raised for the support of public schools shall not be used by any religious sect for the maintenance of an institution of education exclusively controlled by that sect. I agree with the gentleman that we should restrict this fund in its application to public schools alone. I would not include any school which would be under the regulation or control of any sect or denomination, in any measure. My objection to the word "exclusively" is that it defeats the purpose which was in the minds of the committee, and which governed its action. For instance, certain schools which are chartered institutions and governed by a board of directors or trustees composed of individuals, all representing one religious sect or denomination, can, without prejudicing their own interest or control, introduce into their boards one or two members who disagree with them in their religious principles. This would exempt them from the operation of this clause, and allow them to partake of this fund, because the control of the sect could not be said to be exclusive. The word "exclusively" enables them to evade the purpose that should govern in this matter, and allows the Legislature to give their school some portion of the money raised for the public schools.

I, therefore, move to amend this section, by striking out the word "exclusively."

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Chairman: I agree with the suggestion that has been made, and I confess my attention had been called to it by the chairman of the Committee on Education. I believe the section would be better without the word than with it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. H. G. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: It occurs to me that the language of this section is indefinite in another respect. It reads, "no money raised in any way whatever, for the support of public schools." What public schools? There are public schools in the State which are not controlled by the Commonwealth.

I move to amend as follows: To insert after the word "of," where it first occurs, the word "the," and after the words, "public schools," the words, "of the Commonwealth," so as to make it read, "the public schools of the Commonwealth."

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I have no objection.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Chairman: How would the section read as it is now proposed to amend it.

The CLERK:

"No money raised in any way, whatever, for the support of the public schools of the Commonwealth, shall ever be appropriated to or used by any religious sect for the maintenance or support of schools under its own control."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. W. H. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: I propose to amend further, as follows:

By adding to the section the words, "and no board of school directors shall issue the bonds of any township, or ward or borough, or sub-division of either, to be sold and the proceeds expended in the buying of lands and the building or furnishing of school houses.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend as follows: To strike out the word "own."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the section as amended.

The section as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The fourth section will be read.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 4. A Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He shall hold his office for the term of four years, and his duties and compensation shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. CORSON. Mr. Chairman: I now offer the amendment which was withdrawn a little while ago, when proposed by the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. Howard,) incorporating the idea which was explained by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward.)

My amendment is to add to the section, "Which shall require him, among other things, to prescribe the school books to be used in all the common schools of the State, and changes in such books shall not be made oftener than once in ten years."

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I renew my amendment, as an amendment to the amendment, to add to the section, "The Governor, Attorney General and Superintendent of Public Instruction shall constitute a board of education. They shall have supervision of public instruction, and shall prescribe what books shall be used, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law."

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I rise to a question of order. In the report of the Committee on Executive Department, in section one and section twenty-two, the office of Superintendent of Public Instruction, with his duties is already prescribed, and this Convention in committee of the whole have adopted those sections. The only thing we can do is to vote this section down, as it has been already provided for.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment and an amendment to the amendment before the committee, which must be disposed of before we can reach the section.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I am opposed to the amendment of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Newlin.)

A system, or a State, that has not a head is in anarchy. This bill provides a head for the common school system of Pennsylvania, and calls him Superintendent of Public Instruction, and that is very nearly the name of a cabinet officer in France and in various other countries. It is a proper thing to have a head for this great interest of public instruction, and the fault of the amendment is that it furnishes three heads—a board—instead of one.

Now, if we have the Superintendent of Public Instruction, who is competent for his place, I submit that the multitudinous affairs of the common school system of Pennsylvania will be better supervised by a single, competent man than by a board composed of officers whose duties lead them to other and entirely different subjects. The Governor and Attorney General are not necessarily interested in the subject of education. The Superintendent is supposed to be devoted to nothing else. Certainly he ought not to be.

Then, sir, the amendment of the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Corson) recognizes the headship of this system in the Superintendent of Public Schools, and requires him to prescribe, from time to time, the school books that shall be used in all the common schools of the State. That seems to me to be a principle of order and decorum, and a fit theory for this Convention to introduce into the Constitution.

The views suggested by the delegate from Bedford, (Mr. Russell,) when the subject was up a little while ago, struck me as perfectly conclusive upon this subject—a demonstration. It answered the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) in regard to the act of Assembly, showing that that act—and no legislation that we have—reaches the point which it is desirable for us to secure. The gentleman from Luzerne gave us his experience on this subject, and undertook to speak authoritatively, because he has been a school director, but he failed to answer the question which I put to him, as to why the children of one particular school district should need any different school books from the children of any other school district. Why should a man be compelled, when he removes from one school district to another, to furnish his children with another set of books? The personal allusion which the gentleman made was no answer to that. It was a question germane to that point—it was pertinent and direct—and it has not been answered.

The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) undertook to answer it, but failed. It has not yet been answered. Why not? Because, there is but one answer that can be made, and that was suggested by my friend from Luzerne, (Mr. Pughe,) and by other gentlemen—that this thing of furnishing different districts with different school books is a job—a great job, in which the publisher, the Appletons, of New York, or somebody in Boston, has an interest; in which their agent has an interest, and in which the school director and even the teacher is made to have an interest. It is a job, set up and running, in its ramifications, all through society. But upon whom does it fall? Who foots the bill? The parents of the State. The parents of Pennsylvania are enormously taxed to put profits into the pockets of this whole class of speculators, from the publisher of these books down to the peddler, who forces them into a school.

But, say gentlemen, what are you going to do with regard to school books, in the case of German and Welsh children? Why, sir, the very object of having a Superintendent of Public Schools is to see to that—to provide German books for German scholars, and Welsh for Welsh. A Superintendent who understands his business, would not force an English school book upon a German or a Welsh child, any more than he would a German or Welsh school book on an American. There is no force in such arguments. They do not commend themselves to my understanding, nor to the understanding, I hope, of this Convention. The question is, shall we protect the people of Pennsylvania from this fraud and imposition, practiced upon them in relation to school books. The gentleman (Mr. Broomall) need not speak about the “loss of a dollar and a half.” That may be very witty, but it is not a very cogent reason why the people of Pennsylvania should not be protected against this enormous tax, that is building up princely fortunes for the book sellers in New York and Boston, but is impoverishing and harrassing the parents of Pennsylvania. My friend on the left (Mr. Russell) says, as I can say, that our houses are full of worthless school books that have been purchased for children, and have been superseded by new books no better than the first.

As one gentleman (Mr. Stanton) has undertaken to speak for the board of control of Philadelphia—and I suppose they are the most intelligent body of citizens engaged in the conduct of the school system in Pennsylvania—he reminded me of a fact, which, if he will go back a few years, he will find to have happened. When Worcester's Dictionary was about to be published, the then controllers of the common schools of Philadelphia passed a resolution that Worcester's Dictionary should be introduced into the common schools of Philadelphia. Well, sir, on looking into the subject a little, I found that meant a series of five dictionaries. I cannot give you the names of them now, but I believe one was a “pronouncing” dictionary, another a “defining” dictionary, another “comparative” or “comprehensive” dictionary. At any rate there were five of them, five separate and distinct books under the one name. “Worcester's Dictionary,” that got into the schools, and the parents of the children had to pay for them. This resolution of the distinguished board of controllers of the city of Philadelphia was carried by the book agents into the country and shown to the school directors there, and of course it was conclusive to their minds.

What higher authority could a country board want than that; the city board had resolved to use Worcester's dictionary. Now when you consider what a dictionary is, I ask gentlemen whether they have any clear idea of how a dictionary is to be split into five separate books? What sort of a dictionary of our language will that be, that is not at once a pronouncing and defining dictionary? What sort of information or education will your children get from a dictionary that has none of these qualities? Why, sir, it was simply a stupendous job. Worcester's dictionary is, undoubtedly, an excellent book, and I do not mean to find fault with the controllers for getting it. I got a copy of it myself, direct from the publishers; and I use it; and the more I use it the better I like it. I prefer it to Webster's; but why trifle with it? Either place Worcester's dictionary—if it be one book—in the schools, or get a dictionary that will be contained in one book, not five. The parents of Philadelphia had in that case to pay five times for one dictionary. When I last addressed the Convention I told you how I had to buy and pay for, three times, Bullion's latin grammar. Gentlemen may speak about this as an "incredibly" matter, and of the money thus spent as an "inconsiderable" sum, but I see no reason that can be assigned, why we should not say that the head of our common schools in Pennsylvania, shall prescribe the same school books for all the children that are to be taught in the schools of Pennsylvania. Some gentleman suggested that he could not attend to it; that it would be beyond the scope of his powers to furnish every child with the right school book. But, surely, the Superintendent has not to do that. He can issue his proclamation, prescribing the books to be used for certain classes in the common schools of Pennsylvania, and he can do that in one hour. This order goes down through all the schools, and is carried into effect by the various local officers and teachers, and the parents are thus protected from fraud and imposition. Then if a man removes from one district into another, he knows he will not have to buy new sets of school books.

We must have a head to the system of common schools. He should be and will be a competent man; and this duty of prescribing the text-books falls right in the line of his duty. Let us, therefore, repose that duty on him. If the scholar to be provided for is a German, he will get German school books; if an English scholar, English school books; if a Welsh scholar, Welsh school books. Will gentlemen say that there is anything peculiar in the education of the children of one district that requires them to have any different school books from the children of any other district? Do gentlemen really mean that the books used in one district are not fit for another district? What is wanted is education—the cultivation and development of the mental faculties of the children. I would like to know what there is that is peculiar in the districts of Pennsylvania that requires in one district a different kind of education from that given in another.

I think, as to rudimentary education, it ought decidedly to be alike throughout the State, so as to give us a population educated upon the same principles. Will any gentleman tell me that the principles of English grammar, and the operations of arithmetic, are different in different districts, and are to be taught on different plans and principles? That seems to be the assertion here, and it offends a man's common sense to hear it. What do you mean by it? Do you mean that the children of Philadelphia are any better or any worse than the children of any other part of Pennsylvania? That they should have a different class of school books? Why, I apprehend not. I think that humanity is pretty much the same everywhere, and that it is not bounded or classified by county lines or the lines of school districts. There is much more danger that we will not educate our children at all, than there is that we will educate them upon a common standard. For my part, I would have a common standard; and I would have it rising higher and higher every year; and I would have all our children educated upon the same basis, and with the same set of books.

It has been suggested that ten years is too long at which to fix the changes of books. I hope the mover of the amendment will consent to the reduction of the term to five years, and I hope it will then be adopted.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman: I think it must be apparent to all that from the first of our assembling we have been desirous, as a general principle or rule of action, to establish guards to prevent abuses and in consonance with the same idea to keep temptations from our public functionaries. It seems to me that the proposition which the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) is advocating looks too much in the direction of affording too great temptation to any individual intrusted with the selection of books for this great State. If he were not a perfectly pure and incorruptible man it would make him in the term of his office a perfect nabob of wealth. There would be nothing to do but to approach this man to get his influence to direct a certain set of school books for the State, and he could become one of the richest men in the State if he held the office for four years. The school book interest is so vast I would not submit any man to such a temptation, and if the choice of all the books be submitted to the Superintendent of Public Instruction, I certainly would adopt the suggestion of the gentleman to my left from Philadelphia, (Mr. Newlin,) that is, I would divide the responsibility with some three or four advisers, and not leave it exclusively to one man to determine. It has been proposed in this State to take away the fees of certain officers on the ground that they secure such immense fortunes that it leads to corruption, the proposition being that there should be some stated moderate salary instead. And in conclusion—we most certainly should not do any thing here which may be a means of or lead to, as it certainly would, such gigantic corruption and fraud, and would make this highly important office, which should be held only by one of our first citizens, to be sought after by the most corrupt politicians.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: The argument of the gentleman from Lancaster (Mr. Carter) might be extended with advantage. It seems to me if delegates stop to reflect a moment on this subject they will certainly never put this power of prescribing school books for a period of ten years together for the Commonwealth in the hands of any one man. Apart from the danger of corrupting that individual, and apart from any tenderness about his virtue, the question of what the people of the State would have to pay for these books may well be considered. I would give a half million of dollars for the privilege of supplying the people of Pennsylvania with school books for ten years, and I would make half a million dollars more out of the job. One gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) talks about jobs of book agents. Does he not understand that it is easier to buy one man than twenty thousand school directors, if there be so many? Would not these small jobs that he alludes to be overshadowed and swallowed up in this great job that would put upon the people of Pennsylvania a tax that they could not endure? Practically how would this amendment operate? The book agents of one book concern, I do not care whether in Philadelphia, Baltimore, or New York, would get the ear of a State Superintendent, and, by the use of proper appliances, obtain the introduction of a particular system, which could not be changed for ten years. There would not be power enough in the Commonwealth to change the system for ten years. Nothing short of a Constitutional Convention called on purpose could change the school books for that period. What would be the result? The publishers, instead of building marble palaces in Boston and New York, as complained of by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Woodward,) would be able to build golden palaces, because these books are copyright books, and they would put such price on them as they pleased. A book that costs a dollar to-day would cost a dollar and a half to-morrow, and under this constitutional limitation, and by virtue and force of this constitutional provision, there will be nothing to restrain the book publisher from charging what price he pleases for his books after his system has been designated by the Superintendent. Now I would like that job. It seems to me that it is infinitely a bigger job than any spoken of by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward.) Let us consider this proposition for a few moments. Are we ready to farm out to any publisher the monopoly of furnishing school books for this State for ten years, five years, or any other period? If the people of the townships and the boroughs and wards of this State are not competent to elect their own school directors and manage their own school affairs and select the kind of school books they desire their children to study, in the name of God what are they competent to do? Now if by any resolution this Convention can provide that the millennium shall dawn within sixty-five days after it adjourns, I might vote for this proposition, but as men are men, and as they will continue to be men after this Convention shall have adjourned, and after this Constitution shall have been adopted, if it is adopted, I shall not go for putting into the hands of any one man more patronage than the Governor of the Commonwealth has, and more patronage than any dozen other State officers have. I certainly shall never vote for putting patronage such as that into the hands of any one man, or extending to any one book concern, be it from Boston, against the publisher of which the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) seems to have a particular antipathy, or from New York or Philadelphia or anywhere else.

Mr. DUNNING. Mr. Chairman: A few thoughts have come into my mind in reference to this subject. From the little experience I have had in the country, in connection with school boards and the management of schools, I know something of the manner in which books are furnished to schools. The gentleman who has just taken his seat has told us that the greatest job that could possibly be thought of is embodied in the proposition now before this Convention, and that under it the school book for which we pay one dollar to-day, we would pay one dollar and a half to-morrow, and the expense would become so outrageous as to be unbearable. Now what is the experience of the past? I appeal to gentlemen who have had experience in country districts, in reference to the manner in which school books are furnished to the different schools. You rarely find a new teacher coming into a district but what a new set of books must be introduced. Every new school board that comes in introduces its own regulation, and introduces a new set of books, and for every change of teachers that you have and for every change of school boards that you have you find a change in the books. I believe it should be the policy of this Convention to fix upon some principle by which we shall have uniformity of books, and that the scholars throughout the length and breadth of this great Commonwealth of ours shall be instructed in the same rules, upon the same principles and in the same books, so that they will be enabled to spell alike, a thing that is almost impossible in the variety of books that are introduced. You find different forms and styles of spelling, taught by different books, and you can hardly find scholars of two schools spell the same words alike.

Let us educate them upon a common principle; let us have them understand that the principles which are fixed are fixed, not for one district, but for the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and there will be some uniformity not only in books, but in the manner of educating our children.

Mr. HAZZARD. Mr. Chairman: For three mortal years I was kept in the old Webster spelling book, and I know it by heart. I can begin with words of two syllables and spell down column after column, right here, and I can repeat the most extraordinary pieces of composition in that book. One, I recollect, was about the boy that got up an old man's apple tree, and the old man tried to get him to come down. I might as well repeat it here: "An old man found a rude boy upon one of his trees stealing apples. He told him to come down, but the young sauce-box told him plainly he would not. 'Won't you?' said the old man, 'then I will fetch you down.' So he pulled up some tufts of grass and threw at him, which only made the youngster laugh, to think the old man would beat him down with grass only. 'Well, well,' said the old man, 'if neither words nor grass will do, I will try what virtue there is in stones.' So he pelted him heartily with stones, which brought the young man down to beg the old man's pardon."

Now, sir, for three years I studied over that, trying to find out the hidden and deep literature of this extraordinary composition of that melancholy story.

I tell you there is a great deal in this matter of changing books. I would say to the intelligent gentleman on my right, (Mr. Woodward,) that his argument would be good if it applied to the case; but what has Bullion's Latin grammar to do in the common schools? Does he intend that we ought not to change these books, but keep every child at the story of the boy and the apple-tree, year after year? I was an apprentice at that time, and I was to have, for my indenture, three months' of schooling each year. The first year I commenced to study in Daball's arithmetic. At the end of the term I got as far as the rule of three, and the next term I was put back to fractions. I would work through as far as the rule of three again, and the next term I would have to commence at fractions. So it was, until I had an opportunity of going to school where they changed the books. These books should be changed. The children get tired of them, and if the people are too stingy to pay for new books, they ought not to have any children.

I used to teach school myself, and I used to think that teachers ought to be as well paid as bar-keepers, but they are not, as a general rule. Now we have been making speeches about changing the books, and they cannot be changed at all in less than three years. The gentlemen who have spoken in this Convention, in regard to this subject, have forgotten that a restraint has been placed by law upon this matter of changing school books. I know considerable about the
