book selling business, and I tell you a man is about correct when he says that the Secretary of the Commonwealth will soon become the richest man in the State if this power is given him to prescribe what books shall be used in the common schools of Pennsylvania. I was offered two hundred and fifty dollars once myself to introduce a geography into our school alone.

Mr. H. G. PALMER. Did you take the offer?

Mr. HAZZARD. I have not said that I did, but if that was a fair bid for one book, what would be the bid for several books that required to be changed? I say it is a power that must not be placed in the hands of any one man. It is evident, however, that the school books will be required to be changed; but the only difficulty that confronts us is the exact time when they shall be changed. It may be three years or five years. Let it be five years, and then there will be no trouble during that time, and, perhaps, by that time the necessity for a change will be made apparent. Various reasons have been urged in support of this provision, and, perhaps, they all may be true; but can it be supposed that a school whose sessions are held only four months in the country, requires the same kind of books used in schools in the large cities, whose sessions continue for eight and ten months? In the schools in the country from which I come, there have been introduced all the appliances necessary for instruction in the natural sciences, and we certainly do not need the same school books used in a little school away out in the country, whose sessions are held only four months? Not by any manner of means. There can be no practicable uniformity in our school books; because, if it was so, the pupils of schools whose sessions are held for ten months can only learn as much as those who attend schools only four months in the year.

The Superintendent of Public Schools can understand nothing about this matter. Let the whole subject rest precisely where it is now, and that is in the hands of the directors. The law now prescribes for a change, and when a book is placed in the hands of a child, let him humdrum it by heart, and I tell you he will learn pretty near everything he can carry in his mind. There may be some sciences in which he should be instructed, and my experience, as an old school-master, has been that after a child has read a book through he ought to have a new one. It is evident that the same books are not required in all schools, and I think where it is directed by law there should not be a change made in the books oftener than once in three years.

Mr. CORSON. Mr. Chairman: I think it is well enough for us to consider, perhaps, just exactly how this section will read when adopted. Strictly speaking I think that the discussion of this question should be confined to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Newlin,) but somehow or other all the delegates who have preceded me have overlooked that amendment, and have come directly to the one which was suggested by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward). I therefore propose to read this section as it will be when that amendment is adopted, as I hope it will be: "The Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He shall hold his office for the term of four years, and his duty and compensation shall be prescribed by law, which shall require him, among other things, to prescribe the school books to be used in all the common schools of the State, and changes shall not be made oftener than once in ten years." Five years, I believe, is the proposed time. The gentleman who last addressed the Convention, (Mr. Hazard,) and who taught school seventeen years and still lives, supposes that there ought to be a change in our school books. Of course there will be a change of books, as well as a change of garments in all these years. We do not propose to keep a man always in his boy's clothes. We do say, however, that grammar is grammar in the same language all the wide world over, and we do say that the principles of mathematics are the same upon the Allegheny mountains that they are in Philadelphia, and that from the loftiest heights of our language the principles are the same; and we say, too, that so far as the ten-months and the four-months schools are concerned, the argument does not follow the gentleman who makes the proposition because the children in all these schools study the same books until they attain to a certain age; and then they are promoted to the study of others, but children attending the four-months schools cannot be educated in the same manner as those who attend the twelve-months schools. We all know that, but we commence with the alphabet, and I believe the gentlemen from Luzerne (Mr. H. G. Palmer) and Washington (Mr. Hazzard) will admit that it is the same alphabet. It is not necessary that grammar should be edited by Smith first, and then by Brown, and then by Jones. It is the same alphabet, and it is the same grammar, the same arithmetic, and the same geography. The little book the gentleman from Washington studied he will find now to be superseded by one not half so good. If he takes up his arithmetic to-day he will find that it does not contain the single rule of three—that favorite rule of all of us, and he will also find that it does not contain anything about old tare and tret, over which “we used to swear and sweat.” He will find that it does not contain many things which we would willingly go back twenty or forty years to have reinstated. Now, Mr. Chairman, I say that there is no fear of danger about which gentlemen in this Convention have expressed so much solicitude—that the Superintendent of the Public Schools will by reason and by virtue of his office have in his hands a gigantic job, which will make his office worth half a million dollars, because he is to be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and his duties are to be prescribed by law, and the Legislature shall have to do something to aid in carrying out this fundamental principle that in the State of Pennsylvania there shall be some sort of uniformity about our educational system. The lawyers are all educated alike in Pennsylvania, although we do not attain to the same eminence, but we are schooled in the same books. Our preceptors place Blackstone before us and we start with that, and then we go back to those old law books, and throughout the State of Pennsylvania, so soon as we can get rid of this curse of special legislation, there will be uniformity in the law as there should be uniformity in the education of the lawyers of Pennsylvania. Now, how about the mechanic? How about the school teachers? Ought not a man who can teach school in Montgomery county be able to go across the line with his family for the purpose of farming, and teach school in Bucks county? It seems that he would not, and that he would have to commence again and re-read his entire studies. How often is a man constantly thrown into the midst of new school books, new systems, and new rules, and all the old rules abandoned. Now let us make this standard firm at least for a period of five years. I would much prefer that it should be ten years, but I am willing to accept the modification.

If we adopt this, then Pennsylvania will outstrip all the other States, in the matter of the education of the rising generation. Because here the people, by this nursery system which will be created, will be a mutual help to each other. No matter whence comes the boy, whether from the far west or from the east, he goes to the school, and he carries in his satchel the same books that he had in his own county, and which are not required to be changed every time a man in one county moves into another. I apprehend, Mr. Chairman, that if we can ever get the Convention to examine this question, that this proposed amendment will be adopted, but it is a very hard piece of business in this Convention to get the delegates to take up any single amendment that is proposed, just because they have an abhorrence of speeches.

MR. G. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: I do not desire to occupy the attention of the committee but a single moment. I regard this question as one of as great importance as any that have been brought before it, and perhaps one of the most important that we shall have. I simply desire to say that the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) has met my view of this case completely, with reference to a uniform system of text-books throughout all the counties of the State. I also desire to say that the young gentleman on my left, my colleague, (Mr. H. W. Palmer,) has also met my view of the case, so far as manipulating the school directors in the interest of big jobs is concerned. I hope we will have uniformity in the system of text-books, and do away, if possible—and I think it is possible—with all big jobs. I hope both of these questions will be fairly and earnestly met by this Convention, and the desired end attained in each instance. That is all I have to say on the subject.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

On the question of agreeing to the motion, a division was called, which resulted twenty votes in the affirmative; not being a majority of a quorum voting, the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman: I do not wish to detain the committee, but I concur with the gentleman from Luzerne who has just spoken, (Mr. G. W. Palmer,) that this is a very important question, and ought to be well considered by the committee before it is decided. I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Corson,) but I think that the time ought to be limited to five years, and he has accepted that amendment, so that will take away any difficulty in regard to that.

Now, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman will allow the interruption. The amendment of the gentleman from Montgomery is not before the Convention. The amendment to the amendment is under consideration.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman: The amendment to the amendment embraces, to some extent, the same subject as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montgomery, and therefore both are before the committee, and in speaking of one, I must speak of the other.

I am opposed to this board of instruction, for the reasons which have been stated by the gentleman on my right, (Mr. Woodward,) and therefore I will say nothing more on that branch of the subject.

I do desire to speak of the other branch, and that is uniformity of books in our schools. But, before doing so, I wish to say that there is nothing in the objection started by the gentleman from Cumberland, (Mr. Wherry,) that this matter was already provided for by an article which has just been adopted in the report of the Committee on the Executive Department. That article provides that: "The Superintendent of Public Instruction shall exercise all the powers, and perform all the duties, devolved by law upon the Superintendent of Common Schools, and the office of Superintendent of Common Schools shall cease when the Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be duly qualified." There is nothing there that imposes upon him the duty of regulating the books which are to be studied in our public schools. I know something about this business myself. I have been, in years gone, and I am now, a director of a school district in our county, and I understand fully the difficulties attending this subject, where they relate entirely to the board of school directors.

When I was up before, I referred to the act of Assembly, which had been spoken of by the gentleman from Luzerne, (Mr. H. W. Palmer,) who addressed the Convention on the subject. I did not read one section to which I wish to turn the attention of the Convention especially at this time. It is the twenty-fifth section of the act of 1854, and provides that:

"Immediately after the annual election of teachers in each school district of the State, and before the opening of the schools for the ensuing term, there shall be a meeting of the directors or controllers and teachers of each district, at which meeting the directors and controllers shall decide upon a series of school books in the different branches to be taught during the ensuing school year, which books and no other, shall be used in the schools of the district during said period."

Under the law as it existed prior to the passage of the act of 1871, the school directors had the right to decide what books should be used during the current year, but these books might be changed every year. Under the act of 1871, they can only be changed every third year; but as I said before, that act did not meet the point which the amendments now offered propose to put into the section we are now considering. What we want is a uniform system of school books throughout the State, not in each particular district, not in each particular county, but a series of uniform school books in each district of the State. If we adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Montgomery, we adopt a uniform series of books throughout the State, and the objection which has been mentioned by my friend from Washington (Mr. Hazzard) will be obviated, because a scholar will not be kept for three years studying in the same book.

He will pass regularly from one book to another in the series, until if he has been long enough in the school, he will have gone through the whole series.

There is an obvious propriety in putting this matter into the hands of the Superintendent of Public Instruction. I remarked that I knew how these books were selected by the board of school directors. The board meets. They are gentlemen who are engaged in other business and have not time to carefully examine the books submitted to them. An agent comes along with a set of books and lays them before the board of directors. He says it is a good series of text-books, presents each of the board with copies, presents the county superintendent with copies, and they will be induced to adopt the series without examination. The propriety of putting this important matter into the hands of the Superintendent of Public Instruction consists in this: That he will make it his business to examine the book, and he will not adopt any book which it is not proper to go into the hands of the scholar. As to the objection of the gentleman from Luzerne, (Mr. H. W. Palmer,) that this would be a job for the Superintendent of Public Instruction it is only necessary to say that the Constitution which is to confer upon him the duties of his office, provides the punishment for the betrayal of that trust, and if he violates his duty he can be impeached, removed and punished.

I am decidedly in favor of adopting a uniform system of text-books throughout the State.

Mr. DUNNING. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to. The committee rose, and the President resumed his chair.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. CURTIS, chairman of the committee of the whole, reported that that committee had considered the report of the Committee on Education, and had instructed him to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

On the question, when shall the committee have leave to sit again? To-morrow was named and agreed upon.

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. President: I move the Convention do now adjourn.

This was agreed to, and at two o'clock and forty-five minutes P. M. the Convention adjourned until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

SIXTY-FIRST DAY.

SATURDAY, March 8, 1873.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M., Hon. Wm. M. Meredith in the Chair.

The PRESIDENT. There does not appear to be a quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The CLERK then proceeded to call the roll, and the following members answered to their names:

Messrs. Achenbach, Alricks, Andrews, Armstrong, Baer, Bailly, (Perry,) Baker, Bardsley, Beebe, Black, J. S., Bowman, Boyd, Buckalew, Carter, Church, Clark, Cochran, Cronmiller, Curry, Curtin, Darlington, De France, Dodd, Dunning, Edwards, Elliott, Ewing, Finney, Hall, Hazard, Horten, Howard, Knight, Lilly, McCulloch, Mann, Mantor, Metzger, Minor, Mott, Newlin, Niles, Palmer, G. W. Palmer, H. W., Parsons, Pughe, Purviance, Sam'l. A., Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, James L., Rooke, Russell, Smith, H. G., Smith, Henry W., Smith, Wm. H., Stanton, Stewart, Struthers, Temple, Walker, Wherry, White, David N., Worrell, Wright and Meredith, President—64.

ABSENT OR NOT ANSWERING.—Messrs. Addicks, Ainey, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bannan, Barclay, Bartholomew, Biddle, Black, Charles A., Brodhead, Broomall, Brown, Campbell, Carey, Cassidy, Collins, Corbett, Corson, Craig, Cuyler, Dallas, Davis, Ellis, Fell, Fulton, Funck, Gibson, Gilpin, Gowen, Green, Guthrie, Hanna, Harvey, Hay, Hemphill, Heverin, Hunsicker, Kaine, Lamberton, Landis, Lawrence, Lear, Littleton, Long, MacConnell, M'Allister, M'Camant, M'Clean, M'Murray, MacVeagh, Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Patton, Porter, Purman, Purviance, John N., Read, John R., Reynolds, S. H., Ross, Runk, Sharpe, Simpson, Turrell, Van Reed, Wetherill, J. M., Wetherill, John Price, White, Harry, White, J. W. F. and Woodward—68.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. President: I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be despatched in search of the absentees.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms will proceed to execute his duty and bring in the absentees.

A QUORUM.

Messrs. John Price Wetherill, M'Camant, Cuyler, Simpson and Addicks having entered the Hall, the President announced that there was a quorum present.

Prayer was then offered by the Rev. James W. Curry.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

JURY ASSESSMENTS.

Mr. BARDSLEY offered the following resolution, which was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be requested to frame a section authorizing the courts of quarter sessions of each county, on the application of parties in interest, to appoint a jury to assess damages for the taking of adjoining lots, for the purpose of squaring up irregular tracts of adjoining land fronting on any streets laid down on the plan of any city or borough: Provided, The whole sum of such damages shall be assessed on the property thus benefited.

PRINTING REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ARMSTRONG offered the following resolution, which was twice read, considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That every report from standing committees, considered in and reported from the committee of the whole with amendments, shall be printed in bill form with the amendments, for the use of the Convention.

AMENDING THE EIGHTEENTH RULE.

Mr. STRUTHERS. Mr. President: I move that the Convention proceed to the second reading and consideration of the resolution I offered yesterday in relation to amending the eighteenth rule.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The CLERK read as follows:

Resolved, That the eighteenth rule be amended, so that motions for adjournment beyond the next succeeding day may be debated.

The motion to proceed to a second reading and consideration of the resolution was agreed to, and the resolution was again read.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I move that as an amendment, that the speeches in the debates be limited to two minutes and that no member shall speak more than once upon the same question.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. President: I move to amend, by limiting the speeches to five minutes.

The question being taken, a division was called and the motion was agreed to, a majority of a quorum voting in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the rule as amended.

The amended rule was agreed to.

THE EDUCATION ARTICLE.

The Convention then, as in committee of the whole, Mr. Curtin in the chair, proceeded to the further consideration of the article reported from the Committee on Education.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the section under discussion.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 4. A Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice of the Senate. He shall hold his office for the term of four years, and his duties and compensation shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. CORSON moved to amend, by adding to the amendment of the section these words: "Which shall require him, among other things, to prescribe the school books to be used in all the common schools of the State, and a change of such books shall not be made oftener than once in ten years."

Mr. NEWLIN moved to amend the amendment by striking out and inserting as follows:

"The Governor, and Attorney General, and Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be constituted a board of education. They shall have the supervision of public instruction, and shall prescribe what books shall be used, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law."

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: My motion was not to strike out, but was to come in at the end of the section.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: The gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Corson) modified his amendment, so that it would read "five" years instead of "ten."

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I earnestly trust that this amendment will not prevail. It does seem to me to be no part of the duty of a Constitutional Convention to prescribe rules on such a subject. Gentlemen do not seem to observe the distinction between a code and a Constitution. We are not here to make a code, but we are here to make a Constitution. To follow out in this article on education the details of the educational system, seems to me to be wholly beyond our duty, and even if it were within the line of our duty, it seems to me to be exceedingly improper. What, in this progressive age of ours, limit our children to human knowledge, as it was ten years ago? What greater farce could be suggested? We do not seem to see that the world progresses, we do not seem to see that we are making advances in science all the while, we do not seem to see that adaptations for instruction are constantly being made, but we are to go back ten years in this age of progress, and stultify ourselves, and disgrace ourselves, for I do not know any other word to describe the condition to which, according to my view, this Convention would be reduced, in the eyes of the civilized world, if it resorted to such a course. We simply have nothing to do with it. Leave it in the hands of the Legislature, leave it in the hands of your commissioners of public education, where it properly belongs; but it would be quite as reasonable, to my mind, for this Convention to undertake to say what books, precisely, shall be used for purposes of instruction, or what teachers shall be employed in our schools, as to undertake to make a provision of this sort. I earnestly trust, for the sake of the credit and the honor of the Convention, that this amendment will be withdrawn, for it strikes me as simply disgraceful.

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I call the attention of the committee to what I think will dispense with any further discussion upon this subject. It seems to me, sir, in furtherance of the views of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, that there is ample provision under the first section of this article, for all that is necessary upon the question now under discussion; but if that is not the case, I ask the gentlemen to turn to the report of the Committee on Legislation, and they will there find these words among the list of specific acts which are prohibited from being passed by the Legislature: They are "prohibited from creating offices or prescribing the powers or duties of officers in counties, cities, boroughs, townships, election or school districts."

Now, it will be observed that when this is passed, as it doubtless will be, there will be nothing but general laws, prescribing the duties of these officers, amongst whom will be the school directors, and they will, undoubtedly, in the general law, clothe the directors with the power to select the proper kind of books. I, therefore, hope that we will dispense with any further discussion of this subject, and wait until this section is before the committee.

Mr. MACCONNELL. Mr. Chairman: I am opposed to the pending amendment, and I adopt the views of the distinguished gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler,) and I would emphasise them more strongly even than he did; but there is another objection to it that seems to me ought to be of great weight in the minds of the members of this Convention.

You propose that no change of school books shall be made for ten years; or, if the amendment is modified, five years. It would be made at the commencement of the period of ten years, or five years, or whatever the period may be, by the Superintendent. After that it cannot be changed by any power at all until the end of the term, be it five or ten years. The Superintendent cannot make the change; the Legislature cannot make it; the school directors cannot make it; the school controllers cannot make it; no power on earth can make it, unless there is a change in the Constitution.

Now, suppose that your Superintendent is intelligent, and that he is honest, it is quite within the range of possibility, it is even within the range of probability, that he might make a mistake in selecting school books. If he does, how is the mistake to be corrected? When the books that he has selected are subjected to trial, they may prove to be not what he expected they would be; they may prove to be not effective; they may prove to be actually injurious to the interests of education, and yet he cannot change them, he cannot get rid of them. Nobody can change them, unless a change is made in the Constitution by some process provided for that purpose. You cannot make any change; the selection must last until the end of the constitutional provision.

It seems to me that that is a thing that hardly any gentleman upon this floor will venture to favor. It is certainly a thing that may happen, and a thing that common prudence, to say nothing else, should require us to avoid.

Mr. HAZZARD. Mr. Chairman: I endorse and adopt everything that was said by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) this morning; and I hope that the words of wisdom that have fallen from his lips, and from the lips of others, will prevail, and that this amendment will not be adopted.

It seems to me that if the Darwinian system be true, there must have been a large number of crabs among our ancestors, for we are advancing backwards. Are we about to introduce a law so that no good thing for ten long years shall be introduced in our common schools? I throw not. Let us leave it under the intelligent and heretofore satisfactory system under the law and under our old Constitution.

Mr. Chairman: You know as much of your family as anybody does, or you ought to, and the school directors know as much about the individual wants and the aggregate necessities of the schools as any gentleman sitting upon high stools at Harrisburg, and they will take care of the wants of the children in these schools. It is far better that it should be so. They are personally interested; their own children attend those schools, and, knowing their wants, they will provide for them. I hope that there will be no such office as this created at all, and that it will be left to be regulated as heretofore.

We have forgotten that the law has provided against this grade of "carpet bagging" booksellers, and our directors are observing the law. It is that they shall not change any oftener than at least once in three years. I hope that the amendment of this section will not prevail.

Mr. ANDREW REED. Mr. Chairman: I have one suggestion to add. I am opposed to this amendment, and it is for a reason that I have not yet heard offered.

If the Superintendent of Public Instruction may adopt a certain series of school books, it is a proposition well enough in itself, and these publishing houses will have a copy-right in these books.

Now the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) says that these publishing houses make great fortunes out of the heads of families in this State in publishing these books. Now, suppose that a certain series of school books are adopted, these publishing houses having a copy-right of them, what is to prevent their placing any scale of prices on their books that they see proper, and there is no power which will enable us to change the books or the prices for five years.

They may increase them three times, and the whole people of Pennsylvania, your Legislature and your courts, and everything else, may feel that it is wrong, and yet they are powerless to change. They must, if they obey the Constitution, keep the same books that they adopt, and instead of hindering or injuring these houses, we would only tend to make a monopoly among them. It would be a perfect monopoly, and we would be unable to change it. We should leave the power somewhere, and the Legislature is the proper repository of that power. The matter of school books is not one upon which the Legislature would be likely to be troubled with any large lobbying influence, which would be injurious to the interests of the State, and the Legislature would always be able to make a rightful decision in it.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say a few words in answer to the various objections made to this amendment, as I had the honor to offer it.

I have been very much entertained by the very diffuse nature of the discussion on this amendment, or supposed amendment. In fact I was sometimes at a loss to imagine really what was before the Convention. I thought at one time we were trying the Boston publishers for some offence against the State or citizen. At another time I thought the "runners" for book publishing establishments were being called to account, on a charge of electing local school directors. At another time we had the Darwinian theory under consideration, and again we were entertained by an apple story. The result being that I was really at a loss to tell what was actually before the Convention. A great many of the objections which have been urged to the supposed amendment are not in point, because they are directed against something entirely different.

Now, in the first place, it has been urged with a great deal of zeal, that it would be very improper to leave with one person the important subject of selecting the books that are to be used in the schools. The amendment does not contemplate anything of that kind, and I propose to join with the Superintendent of Public Instruction two advisers in this respect, who would, to a certain extent, control his action, and regulate the judgment to be formed in this matter, and in that way obviate the very difficulty suggested, of leaving this power to one person. The gentleman at large, from Philadelphia, (Mr. Woodward,) objected to the proposed amendment for that very reason, because he says that this is an Executive department, and there should be a single head for the performance of any Executive functions whatever. The Executive duties of the Superintendent of Public Instruction would continue to be performed by him alone, and he alone would be responsible for all that was done in that regard.

The only thing which it is proposed to leave to this board is to regulate what might be called the policy—the general policy of the State, in relation to education—no details whatever—and connected with the direction of what text-books shall be used in schools of different grades, and all of this subject to the power of the Legislature, from time to time, to give binding instructions, as to the exercise of the powers of the board. Therefore, I take it, that the objection urged by the gentleman from Philadelphia, who sits immediately behind me, (Mr. Cuyler,) that we are not here to make a code, is entirely out of place, because there was nothing whatever in detail, in my proposition—nothing whatever in the nature of a code. It would amount simply to this, that a central board would direct the State in the matter of its educational policy, and regulate the grades of public schools, and provide that in certain grades certain books should be used, and in other certain grades certain other books. The local board would know what grade of school would be required by their neighborhood, so that the locality would really fix the nature and mode of instruction which should be given to the children of their own neighborhood, only the action of the central board would so regulate their discretion that they would act within a limited sphere. They must say that there would be the first grade, or the second grade, or third grade of school, but if they take a certain grade, they must consult the superintending influence as to how they should act, what books should be used in that grade. That is the nature of my amendment, and it is certainly not liable to the objections offered.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I have spoken twice on this subject, and would like to make a few remarks further on it, if I may do so.

Leave was granted.

I should judge from the tenor of the remarks that we have heard this morning, that this amendment (Mr. Corson's) stands no chance of being adopted; but that it is really a great disgrace to this body to contemplate it. I said in the very first words that I offered on this subject, that it was properly a subject of legislation; but, sir, in the whole history of the common school system of Pennsylvania, the Legislature has failed to protect the parents of Pennsylvania against the impositions practiced on them in the matter of school books; and I infer that it will continue to fail to do so, unless this Convention puts a simple and easy rule into the Constitution that will be a law both to the Legislature and the courts. My friend in front (Mr. Cuyler) says it is a disgrace to us to protect the people of Pennsylvania against these impositions.

MR. CUYLER. I did not say that.

MR. WOODWARD. Well, sir, I can tell the gentleman that the people of Pennsylvania will not share the sentiment he did express. Here is a simple proposition to put into the fundamental law a rule that the Superintendent of Public Schools shall prescribe the school books, not that they are to be Webster's spelling books, which my friend from Washington (Mr. Hazzard) told us he was educated upon. I was educated upon it too, and regard it with great reverence and affection.

Nobody has said that the children of Pennsylvania shall be educated on Webster's spelling book. Nobody has proposed that the children of Pennsylvania shall not be educated on the Darwinian system, which the delegate from the city (Mr. Cuyler) refers to. If my friend thinks the children of Pennsylvania would be improved by the Darwinian system, he will have an opportunity to give them all the modern books of which gentlemen seem to be enamored. There is nothing in this rule to shut them up to Webster or to exclude them from the philosophy of Darwin. It is a reference of the whole subject to the Superintendent of Common Schools. The presumption is, that he will be a competent man—that he will be an honest man. Here the objection comes in that the booksellers will bribe him. I have no doubt they will, if he is a bribable man; but, sir, it is possible to find a man whom they cannot bribe.

Take the case of the venerable and excellent gentleman whose loss we have been mourning this week from this Convention. Suppose him to have been the Superintendent of Public Schools in Pennsylvania; why, all the wealth of all the booksellers in New York and Boston, and throwing in Philadelphia, would not bribe that man; he was an honest man. I trust we will find honest men in Pennsylvania to fill that office, and to give to these children of Pennsylvania these new books with that modern philosophy that some minds so crave, [laughter,] if indeed they ought to have it. He will exercise a sound discretion in the premises. This amendment, so far from shutting up the Superintendent to Webster's spelling book, or any particular book whatever, leaves the whole subject open to him, to avail himself of all the excellencies that the wit of man can give him.

I have no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Newlin) to give it to a board, if you have not confidence enough in the Superintendent. Gentlemen would do well to remember this fact, that when you are devolving political and governmental powers, you must trust somebody. I hope we are not all knaves or all fools in Pennsylvania, yet power cannot be exercised except by human hands. You must trust somebody. If the Superintendent cannot be trusted, add the Governor and Secretary of the State, as my friend says. If all three are not to be trusted, give the Senate some power over it also. I do not care how you do it, provided you adopt the principle that some power in Pennsylvania should protect the people from the gross impositions practiced on them by the booksellers through the pliant and compliant boards of control. The principle is, as I say, one that we are bound to vindicate; and if we cannot do that simple thing we had better disband and go home, for I am sure we cannot do the people a better service.

Do not think that I am exaggerating this evil. I have never had the honor of serving in this highly respectable office of school director, nor of maintaining any official relation to the school system of Pennsylvania; but, sir, I have had the honor of being a parent in Pennsylvania, and of rearing a family, and I know what the difficulties of educating children are, and some of these younger fathers will find it out by the time they attain to my age. This very system that was intended to facilitate the subject of education is in the hands of wicked and base men, a difficulty in the way of educating children properly—

Mr. H. W. PALMER. I would ask the gentleman if he ever sent one of his children to a common school on the face of the earth.

Mr. WOODWARD. Well, if I did not, it was because of the directors having charge of them. [Laughter.] If this law now proposed had been in operation, I would probably have had more confidence in the common schools. I do not desire, Mr. Chairman, to enlarge any further upon this question, but I desire to read a short extract from a lecture delivered in this city many years ago. I desire, however, to read, by way of preface, a short newspaper extract to call the attention of the Convention to the immense business done by the firm of Appletons in school books. It reads as follows: "The Appletons are now filling one of the largest orders for books ever received by a single house in this country. All the available space on the principal floor of their vast establishment is filled with books for the school libraries of the State of Ohio. That State appropriates for this purpose $82,000 annually. Piled up in bulk, they measure twenty-five cords, and weigh seventy-eight tons. Piled on end on a shelf, in the usual manner, they would extend a distance of two miles. The Appletons have made arrangements to transport the entire lot by a special freight train, to be run straight through from this city to Columbus. The binding is neat, substantial and uniform, each volume lettered on the back with the title of the book, the author's name, and the mark of the "Ohio State Library, 1859."

I will now read the extract from the lecture to which I referred. It reads as follows:

"Another difficulty in the way of parents is the multiplication of school books. If you change your school, the children must be furnished with a new set of books. If they remain in the same school, revolution and change are the order of the day. Do parents understand this matter? Let me remind them that some of the most rapid fortunes that have been accumulated in this country, in the last few years, have been made by the publishers of school books. They get out a school book, designed rather to lighten the labor of teaching, than to afford facilities to the pupil, and then availing themselves of our common school system, that provides superintendents and controllers, the bookseller sends his agents to these, or to the teachers, by one means and another prevails on them to introduce the new book, and then every pupil must be provided with one at the expense of the parent. As soon as the parents of the land have been made to pay for the first edition, a second edition, or a book pretending to some new improvement, is brought out, and they must pay for that, and then for another and another. The bookseller and the school teacher are thus in perpetual combination against the parent and the child.

You hear of conventions and re-unions of teachers and superintendents every now and then. I am told the bookseller's agent is always on hand to concert new schemes of plunder, and has been known, in some instances, to offer large pecuniary rewards for introducing his wares. It is time that parents held a national convention to counteract the impositions and frauds which are concerted and practiced against them, in this matter of school books.

Doubtless there are some improvements in certain modern school books, but I firmly believe that four-fifths of all that have been published in the last twenty years had better have been burned the day they were printed.

If anybody doubts this, let a test be applied that is fair and sure. Let the tree be judged by its fruits. Look over the land—in Congress, in our Legislature, in the learned professions, or in any of the walks of life—and measure the men who have been educated upon these modern improved school books with those who were educated before they came into vogue.

Try it around the circle of your own acquaintance, and you will find that while more books have been used, less knowledge has been gained; that the circumference of intelligence has been increased only by an increase of superficiality; and that frauds, speculations, quackeries, and empiricisms of all sorts have been the fruitful products of modern improvements.

And still the cry is for change. New books come in like a spring flood. Men who have proved themselves unfit for any other employment betake themselves to the manufacture of school books for our children. And we parents are compelled to have them forced upon us in uncomplaining silence, though they debase and debauch both the intellects and the hearts of our children. So far as I have any knowledge on the subject, I believe the public schools of Philadelphia are the best conducted schools in the State, and yet it is within a month that you have seen in the newspapers an advertisement, a column long, setting forth the extraordinary merits of Worcester's dictionary, and a resolution of the board of controllers introducing it into the public schools of Philadelphia. Every parent in Pennsylvania, having a child to educate, has got to pay for that book. The booksellers will ply other boards of control with the resolution of the Philadelphia board, the judgments of teachers will be taken captive, the word will go home from the school that Worcester must be bought, and very likely the benevolent teacher will consent to act as broker in the business.

The parent will plead his preference for Webster, or Walker, or Johnson, or all of them together, for he may have them all in his family library, but all in vain; nothing will do but Worcester. The decree has gone forth and the word is Worcester. When the over-ruled and subjugated parent commences to purchase, he will be appalled to find that he has got to buy a whole series of dictionaries. Here they are as they stand in the advertisement; No. 1, the school dictionary; No. 2, the elementary dictionary; No. 3, the comprehensive dictionary; No. 4, the academic dictionary; No. 5, the critical dictionary.

I have had no opportunity to see this remarkable series, and shall probably go through the rest of life as best I can without its help; but taking it for granted that the several terms that make up the series are very distinctly marked, and broadly separated from each other, I should like to know what sort of a school dictionary that is which is neither an elementary dictionary, a comprehensive dictionary, an academic dictionary, nor a critical dictionary.

If the advertisement is to be trusted, (and I presume it does not hide any of the merits of the work,) you must understand that whilst your children are in the common schools, they are to get no views of their mother tongue that are elementary, comprehensive, academic or critical. These are to come afterwards by instalments, to be laid on in streaks.

Now I would not have any ardent reformer anticipate very great results from this extraordinary series of dictionaries; do not expect any Patrick Henrys, Channings, Websters or Clays to be reared up on them, for many moons will not wax and wane before Worcester will be kicked out of school as unceremoniously as old Webster has been; and some Boston house, having made a fortune on this book, will announce, in the same solemn tones as before, that a dictionary of the English language is about to be published!

Then will follow the commendatory notices from susceptible doctors of divinity, from boards of control and from teachers; and parents will be put through the motions again and again.

You will be told that the book is paid for out of the public taxes, but do taxes grow spontaneously? Who but parents pay the taxes, and how much difference it does make that new publications are imposed upon him in this form instead of a more direct manner?

I thank the committee for their indulgence in listening to this extract, and having done my duty to the people in this regard, will not longer trespass upon the time of the Convention.

MR. W. H. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: With all deference to the learned and intelligent gentlemen who have spoken so earnestly on either part of this subject, I submit that my amendment offered yesterday to prevent school boards from issuing bonds, which they put aside, was more important than this question. But I do not propose to let that proposition be passed over without at least one other effort in its behalf. Meantime, if I cannot successfully attack this bond business, which is at the root of much of the corruption that has pervaded our common school system, I shall try and assist in the effort to lop off this school book abuse, which has grown to such dangerous proportions.

If the common school system had not been intrinsically good and absolutely necessary, it would have long since died out of the public esteem, or would have been abolished, because of the fearful load of usurpations, large and small, that have been piled upon its broad back by its false friends. You are all familiar with the startling utterance of Madame Roland, as in extreme anguish she was driven to the guillotine prepared for her by the Jacobins—"O, Liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name!" And may we not fairly adopt that exclamation thus: "O, popular education, what constant corruptions are committed in thy name!"

Mr. Chairman, pardon me for saying that I truly think that our common school system has come to be the most effective engine of demagoguism and plunder because more diffused and less scrutinized than any other that this Commonwealth has yet endured or now endures! As I said before, the repeated change and endless variety of books in the common schools is one of the means whereby the people are vexed and victimized, but it is not the greatest. The frequent changes in the common school books are brought about by the united efforts of certain teachers and directors, and the solicitations of scheming publishers. And I cannot consent to put the larger part of the burden of blame on the last named, as was done in the case of poor Oakes Ames, and to let those who gave guilty consent escape with Pickwickian censure. Neither Ames nor the publishers could have succeeded if they had not found willing instruments. And here, Mr. Chairman, let me say a word about the growing assumption and importance of this same order or "ring" of teachers. They call to mind the "literary order" in China, whose tricks and manners they seem to be striving to emulate. The Chinese scholars (the third estate of the Empire, perhaps,) teach abject veneration for the "brother of the Sun," their Emperor, and unanswering obedience to the mandarins and other ruling persons and classes—with implicit confidence in themselves, of course. Our incipient "literary order" teaches that the great things of this world are "wealth, power and knowledge"—but the greatest of these is knowledge, and that they are the exclusive custodians and dispensers of it. They meddle in everything—claim more power over the child than the parent sometimes exercises, and are active in all agitations, including that of woman's rights. They meet in mock solemnity, weekly, or monthly, or yearly, form themselves into mutual admiration societies, and dole out in dreary platitudes, or in forcible, feeble declamation. The little learning they have obtained at the Normal schools, where many of them are yearly educated for teachers at the public charge. Of course, they and the school directors' "ring," one ordained to inflict on the luckless people who may have offspring any books they may choose, and as many of them as they like. And it is not only those who send their children to public schools that have to suffer from this sort of petty combination. Whoever may send his children to private schools will find his charges for books four times what they should be. Is it not presuma-ble, if not manifest, that these teachers of all sorts, and school directors sometimes, derive some pecuniary advantage from becoming the convenient instruments of every compiler of a new school book, and of his enterprising publisher?

And if you whimper about the needless and very frequent change in books, you are rebuked and shamed by both teachers and directors, and told that you have no public spirit, no love for your children, that you will earn the curses of untaught millions. And yet I doubt whether all the directors or all the teachers are the best qualified persons to select books for the schools they control.

The gentleman from Luzerne, the younger Mr. Palmer, would give a million for the privilege of naming school books for the State for the Superintendent's term! Would the gentleman do that? Seriously and calmly, would he here proclaim that he would pay half a million to the State for free leave to plunder her people of an entire million. Let him not confess, and avoid by saying that the booksellers would be the victims and not the people! As he would use the booksellers how would these wicked booksellers restore to their coffers his half million of bonus, his other half million of profit, and make some profit for themselves, besides, if the people who are to buy the books would not pay extortionately for all. Booksellers don't give half millions away in that manner, either to superintendents or to the middle men. And if the aforesaid Superintendent would let the furnishing of the books to the highest bidder, or buy the copyrights himself, or rent them at a royalty, and set up a printing office, the State could supply books to her people very cheaply.

And then he could fix a minimum rate for the books, and allow them to be supplied to their customers at a commission say of 5 per cent. The State Superintendent of Printing could oversee the printing of these books, if the State shall conclude to print them.

If, as the gentleman from Luzerne has intimated, we might as well leave these delicious pickings to the 20,000 school directors, (and their friends among the teachers I may add,) as he seems to admit that they must be paid, I still prefer the Superintendent, for he would give us uniformity in text-books at least; they could be kept till worn out, and then we could watch one official better than we could 20,000. I would guarantee that there would be no more douceurs to complying directors—no more 20 per cent. commissions to teachers of private or of public schools.

But the gentleman from Delaware has said, with great unction, that the people know what they want in this matter. True, they do know—and if there is any one thing that they are all of one mind about—great and small, rich and poor—it is that there are too many school books, too frequent changes in them, and that they cost too much. They regard it, in our region at least, as a continual grievance, and to some it is a serious one.

Now how are the people to tell what they want and have it done, except through the Legislature or through this body? I think the gentleman from Delaware said that if we took the step proposed, that censorious people might say we were tampered with. Surely he said that in pure badinage—he intended, perhaps, to perpetrate a witticism. For whoever heard of any man guileless enough, or disinterested enough or public spirited enough to be “tampering”—that, I think, was the word he used—yes, “tampering” with any legislative body or any Convention to prevent them from passing ordinances that would save the money of the people? No instance of such a man is remembered in these times—and the memory of man runneth not to the period when men were persuaded with bribes not to pass laws that would take money from the pockets of the people.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this reform, as I think it to be, without the slightest apprehension that it will ever be charged against to any one in this body, that they were “tampered” with and dissuaded from protecting the interests of the people by money or its equivalent.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe the gentleman from Lancaster has not spoken on this question.

Mr. H. G. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: I do not intend to make a speech now. I merely wish to make a brief statement. Yesterday, while debate upon the proposed amendment was going on, a prominent gentleman from the State of Maryland, who happened to occupy a seat by my side, * * * * * informed me that in that State, by act of their Legislature, not by a clause of the Constitution—which could not be readily changed—the power now proposed to be granted had been conferred upon the Superintendent of Public Schools in Maryland. He said that rumors currently prevailed that the Superintendent of Public Schools had combined with publishers for the purpose of putting certain books into the schools and making changes. I merely give this statement because we must learn from experience, and the precedent of a neighboring State may be of use to us in making up our decision.

There is one thing certain. If combinations of this kind are ever made, much greater difficulties will be experienced in making them with the teachers and the school directors of this entire Commonwealth, than would be encountered in attempts to make them either with a single individual or a board composed of a few men. I do not think the publishers could bribe all the teachers and all the school directors of this Commonwealth. They might bribe the Superintendent of Public Instruction. They might possibly bribe a board. It might happen that these men would be put in a position where they could be approached, and I would relieve them from that temptation and leave the responsibility for the selection and change of school books directly with the parties who come into immediate contact with the people. Then there would be such close connection as would be likely to prevent any gross abuses.

Mr. SIMPSON. I did not suppose, when the amendment was proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Newlin,) that it would be seriously pressed upon the Convention. I desire to say a word or two against the amendment, and at the outset I may state that I am entirely unwilling that any such power should be given to the Superintendent of Public Instruction, or to any other official. If it is to be put in the control of a small body, I think we had better appoint a committee out of this Convention. I would be willing to be chairman of that committee, and I would like to take my friend from Crawford, (Mr. Mantor,) my friend from Potter, (Mr. Mann,) and one or two other gentlemen who sit near me, as my colleagues, to constitute that board, and if there is any advantage to be derived from it I would like to have my share.

I obtained my education in the common schools of Pennsylvania. I have had, and still have, children attending them. One of my boys has graduated at the High school in this city, and one of my daughters has graduated at the Girls' Normal school. I have one boy still attending the High school, and one daughter attending a grammar school. I have never heard of any charge being made, so far as this locality is concerned, in relation to the frequent changes of school books. In answer to the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. Smith,) who said that parents complained that they were charged too much for school books, I would say that I suppose such parents must be akin to the man who lived in Kentucky. Being asked about the products of that State, he said, "we raise so many thousand bushels of corn, out of which we make so much whiskey, beside that which we waste in making bread." [Laughter.]

I think we had better vote this amendment down, and adopt the section just as it is, leaving the question be where it is now, in the hands of the immediate representatives of the people, controlled by the Legislature of the State.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the amendment, and it will be read.

The CLERK: To add to the section the words, "which shall require him, among other things, to prescribe the school books to be used in all the common schools of the State, and changes in such books shall not be made oftener than once in ten years."

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say only a single word. I am very sorry that anything which fell from my lips may have wounded the susceptibilities of the distinguished ex-Chief Justice of the State, who sits behind me, (Mr. Woodward.) Indeed, I was not aware, until I heard it this morning, that he had spoken on this question, or what position he had assumed. But I am comforted with the thought, that any discomfort he may have suffered is compensated for by the assurance that the toils and labors of the Convention have ministered to the amusement and enjoyment of the Zaccheus of the Convention, who sits in front of me, (Mr. Newlin.)

Now, sir, there are in this State about seventeen thousand public schools, as I observe from the manual which lies on the table before me, about nineteen thousand teachers, about nine hundred thousand scholars, and a permanent investment of about $20,000,000 in school property. About $4,500,000 are expended annually in the salaries of the teachers who are employed in instructing the young. Of course these nine hundred thousand children can only be instructed from books, and books must be provided. My friend, the delegate, practically says, "No." Why not? Why, because some book publisher makes money out of the books. That seems to be the argument, because, forsooth, some editor or some publisher of books makes money out of these books; therefore we are to have no books for the use of our children. In other words, the spots upon the face of the sun disturb the mind of my learned friend so much that he would blot the sun out entirely to get rid of the spots, for that is about the practical application of his doctrine.

The practical question after all is this: If we are to limit our school books to those that would have been correctly studied ten years ago, viewed in the light of the present, we may be constantly teaching our children what we know to be an error. Science is all the while progressing, and in the daily developments that are taking place around us, our children are to be deliberately mistaught, by a constitutional provision of the State, for ten years, and we are to compel our teachers for periods of ten years to teach that which we know and they know to be untrue.

The CHAIRMAN. Five years.

Mr. CUYLER. Five years, sir, if that be the present amendment; it was originally written ten. But it matters not as to the time; the principle is precisely the same. We are to be compelled, by the Constitution of the Commonwealth itself, to teach error to the children of the State for a period of five years, because, perchance, somebody who writes a book, or somebody who publishes a book, may chance to make a legitimate profit on his book. Certainly, to state the proposition is to illustrate its absurdity, is to show how unreasonable it is. And after all, Mr. Chairman, the answer which I gave a few moments ago, when I spoke on this question, is the true answer. It is a question with which we have no business at all. It is not within the province of a Constitutional Convention to act upon this subject; it belongs to a code and not to a Constitution. My friend from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) says we must protect the children of Pennsylvania, yet, in the same breath, he admits that the Superintendent of Common Schools, and other officers of the State, are perfectly competent to pass upon this question. Why, then, incorporate it in the Constitution? I accept his doctrine. We must repose trust and confidence somewhere, and I ask him to apply the same doctrine to this very question. Let him repose all trust and confidence in the Legislature of the State, in the Superintendent of Common Schools, or any such officer as the Legislature may entrust with the consideration and control of this question.

The question being taken upon the amendment of Mr. Corson, it was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the section.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment.

The CLERK read:

Add at the end of the section, as follows: "It shall be the duty of the said Superintendent of Public Instruction to assemble in convention, once in every five years, the county superintendents, and it is hereby made their duty to attend and settle upon the kind of books to be used in the common schools of the State for the next five years."

["No! No."]

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD offered the following amendment, which was read by the Clerk:

Add at the end of the section as follows: "And the Legislature shall prescribe by law the kind and number of books to be used in the public schools, and changes shall not be made oftener than once in five years: Provided, That when this subject shall be considered by the Legislature the Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be allowed a seat in either House, and the right to speak upon the subject."

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I have offered this amendment, the first part of which is, in substance, the amendment that I offered to the first section on a former occasion, because I have listened to this argument very attentively, and have been very much interested in it. I have heard a great deal of objection to the one man power. That has been an argument, in my mind, which had some force. I desire to treat the opinions of all gentlemen with respect upon this and all other questions. I have no idea of being sneered out of this Convention by any man, not to attempt to sneer at others. Men are entitled to be treated with respect upon this floor, and any proposition which they offer is entitled to respectful treatment.

The friends of this proposition, who sincerely believe that the people of this Commonwealth have been abused by the men in authority who have the control of this book question, have introduced this here as a necessary measure, one worthy to be accepted by this Convention and incorporated into the Constitution. Gentlemen get up here and tell us we do not know our business; we do not know our duty; we do not know why we are assembled; we do not know the difference between a constitutional and the business of the Legislature. I suppose that we understand the difference between a State Constitution and a national one. We know that the Legislature of Pennsylvania has all the powers of this Commonwealth that are not taken away by the Constitution of the State; that it is a very different instrument from the Constitution of the United States; that has no power, except simply the power that is granted, that much and no more.

It has been said that we have no business with this subject of founding a system of public schools. The Commonwealth is called upon to support those schools; the Commonwealth is called upon to maintain them; the Commonwealth is to provide the means, and yet it is out of character, it is out of place that in the Constitution you shall prescribe a means of supplying those schools with books, for the purpose of educating the children, and especially when we know, from past experience, the great abuses that have grown out of the old plan of supplying these school books with books.

A gentleman here says the Superintendent of Schools in the State of Delaware has grown rich. If it is true that he has, it only shows the corrupting power of these men who make it a business to impose themselves upon school boards in every part of the Commonwealth. It shows that they will corrupt, if they can do it, and that they exert the power for that purpose.

I would hesitate to vest this great power in any one single man. I think it is most especially the business of the Legislature of the Commonwealth. The Legislature represents, and represents fairly, as I believe, every man and woman and child in the Commonwealth, and the only reason why I put a limitation of five years upon the right of the Legislature to make the contract is to keep these cormorants away for at least five years, who go about the Commonwealth corrupting school boards, whether they be in the lower or in the higher school boards, or wherever they may be. Gentlemen on this floor said they were offered $250. They thus made the strongest argument I have heard, by that statement, in favor of putting this power somewhere beyond the reach of these men that go about corrupting the school boards of the Commonwealth, and imposing upon the parents of this Commonwealth.

This is a great evil. There is not a man in the State of Pennsylvania that has a child old enough to send to school but has felt himself aggrieved by this outrage that was perpetrated—it used to be yearly. But the Legislature, seeing the outrageous corruption that was a disgrace to the system itself, was compelled to step in and say they should not change it oftener than once in three years. Why did the Legislature do that? It was because of this very system of corruption.

The Superintendent of our own State has said that the whole number of McGuffey's Readers, from excepting numbers two and five is a humbug. I believe that this is the experience of every intelligent school director in the Commonwealth, that there is no necessity for the long string of books, only to make money for the publisher, and to take it out of the pockets of the parents who send their children to schools in the State.

Mr. Chairman, it is a proper provision, whatever may be the opinions of gentlemen, whether there be a majority in this Convention or not, it is a proper provision. It is in no sense legislation any more than it is to prohibit or provide for any other thing that we are providing for in this Constitution. We simply say that we vest in the Legislature of the Commonwealth the right of prescribing the kind and number, and that they shall not make this change oftener than once in five years. Now the best argument they can use against is that this is legislation. This Convention has got to put into the Constitution something that will look like legislation. I am perfectly willing to put it into the State Constitution. We could not put it into the United States Constitution. It would not be right and proper, but we are making a State Constitution. We are limiting power; we are not granting it.

Another objection is that these books are copyrighted; that they are patented. I do not believe they can ever patent the A B C, nor the English language, nor mathematics. They cannot patent science and philosophy. They may patent a certain arrangement of words, but I think the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, a great Commonwealth that is preparing to inaugurate a new system, a great system for the education of her children, is able, if it is necessary, to patent right her own books, make them, print them and give them to the parents of the Commonwealth. I think that the Commonwealth can take care of herself. Such an argument is worth nothing. It is worthy of very little consideration; it is in fact none at all, only from the fact that it came from respectable gentlemen of this Convention. I would say unhesitatingly that it is the duty of the State to provide the books for these schools, especially in all the lower departments.

I have said this much upon this amendment, because I believe it to be one of very great importance to the people of this Commonwealth. I believe it will add a hundred per cent. to the value of the system—while it will not add a dollar to the cost. If we have some uniformity in the plan of imparting instruction to the children of the State, and it is for this reason that I have consented to speak upon this subject again, and to press it upon the consideration of the Convention, with the addition that I have provided, that the Legislature shall have the power, and the State Superintendent shall have a seat upon the floor of the House or the Senate, that he may speak upon the question—his advice being fully given.

I think we have provided the best plan in that way and the safest place, where we can lodge this great and important power.

Mr. ALRICKS. Mr. Chairman: This discussion has taken a very wide range. I do not think that any gentleman of this committee differs from the delegate from Philadelphia, (Mr. Woodward,) that this is a great and crying evil, and the only question now is, whether it would be in place to insert the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard.)

We are not, as the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) has said, making a code of laws; but we are considering an organic law, and I apprehend that we are putting entirely too much timber in the framework. We are covering too much space, and that is the cardinal reason why this amendment should not be adopted. We want to establish a few principles that are to govern the Legislature and the people, and we are not to descend to the minutæ; therefore, I apprehend that this amendment that has been offered is out of place, if we attempt to put it in the Constitution.

For many years I occupied a seat in a school board. I know the annoyance to which members of that board are subject, and I know that the change of books in the schools is affected by dint of importunity on the part of those who are sent out to canvass. These are inconveniences that we must expect to occur; but I trust that with the present law on our statute book, which states that a change shall not be made inside of three years, they will be remedied, but it certainly is not for us to do here.

Mr. Chairman, while I am up it is proper that I should take notice of a remark that fell from a delegate at large from Indiana (Mr. Harry White.) He informed us that Thaddeus Stevens was the originator of the common school system in Pennsylvania. I beg leave to dissent from the assertion. Mr. Stevens was a great agitator, and he agitated other questions as well as that of the common school question. Our common school system originated with George Wolf, a German Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. His constituents, those men who elevated him to the high office of Chief Magistrate of this State, were Germans; they were opposed to the common school system, and I have heard Mr. Stevens, on more than one occasion, commend Governor Wolf, for the noble stand he took upon the subject of common schools and the education of the people. The Governor received the main support from the Germans of Northampton, from the Germans of Berks, and from the Germans of Westmoreland counties; but although it was at the peril of his office he placed himself fairly and squarely upon the record, and he established that common school system which is this day one of the great enterprises in this Commonwealth. He, and not Mr. Stevens, is entitled to the credit of it.

Now, I object to introducing this amendment here, for the reason given by the poet, when he was examining a piece of amber:

"The thing is neither odd nor rare,
The wonder is how the devil it got there."

I apprehend that this amendment will be entirely out of place in the Constitution.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. ALRICKS. I am through, sir.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. The delegate from Dauphin (Mr. Alricks) takes me to task for giving Thaddeus Stevens credit, yesterday, for being the author of the common school system. I desire to explain that when I say Thaddeus Stevens is the author of the common school system of Pennsylvania, I mean just what I say—I mean it just as I uttered it.

Doubtless there are others who may divide with him the authorship of the common school law, but when I say he is the author of it, I repeat what the history of the times will support me in saying, and I want his memory to have the credit of it. It was the power and the eloquence of Thaddeus Stevens, as a member of our House of Representatives, when urging the appropriation for the Academy of Fine Arts, in the city of Philadelphia.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the delegate to be putting a question to the delegate from Dauphin (Mr. Alricks.)

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I merely rose, Mr. Chairman, to make the statement which I have, not a digression; but because the delegate from Dauphin took me to task in the discussion of this question, for a remark which I made yesterday.

According to the rules of parliamentary law, I insist that I have a right to explain what I said. I will say then, in short, that what I meant yesterday, when I said that Thaddeus Stevens was the author of the common school system of Pennsylvania, I meant that his eloquence, while a member of the House of Representatives, in favor of an appropriation for the Academy of Fine Arts of Philadelphia, gave an impetus to the common school system in the State of Pennsylvania, which carried the measure ultimately through.

Mr. ALRICKS. That is all right. The statement that he gave an impetus to the measure is correct.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. Howard, it was rejected.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I desire to call attention to the fact that in the report of the Committee on the Executive Department they have provided for a Superintendent of Public Instruction. To make this harmonize, I propose to strike out the letter "a," and to insert instead the word "the," so as to make it read the Superintendent of Public Instruction.

It was agreed to.

The fourth section was then agreed to.

The CLERK read the fifth section as follows:

SECTION 5 Neither the Legislature nor any county, city, borough, school district, or other public or municipal corporation shall ever make any appropriation, grant, or donation of land, money, or property of any kind to any church or religious society, or to any university, college, seminary, academy, or school, or any literary, scientific or charitable institution or society controlled or managed by any church or sectarian denominations.

Mr. SIMPSON. The fourth line provides that no grant shall be made to any university. I desire that that be made more specific, and I move to add to it "or for the use of," so that it shall read that "no grant shall be made to or for the use of any university," &c.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. H. G. SMITH. I would inquire of the chairman of the committee what is contemplated by the term "charitable institution" in this section, and how it came to be there inserted. It seems to me that this committee have nothing to do with charitable institutions.

Mr. DARLINGTON. The object of the committee in using that phraseology, I stated, in part, when I opened the discussion. This article, like all other articles, is the result of the deliberations of a committee, and is supposed to contain, as nearly as practicable, the sentiment of the whole committee. The purpose which the committee had in view was to prohibit any sectarian institution from having control of public money, and to make it impossible to have any public moneys appropriated to academies, schools, literary, scientific or charitable institutions, or managed by any church or sectarian denomination.

Mr. H. W. SMITH. I submit that the charitable institutions of the State are provided for elsewhere, and a limitation as to legislation upon them will be found in the article on legislation. I think these words, therefore, are out of place in this section. I move to amend by inserting the word "or," after the word "literary," in the fifth line, and strike out the word "charitable" in the succeeding line."

Mr. CORBETT. It strikes me that this whole section is out of place here, and that it does not belong to this committee. By reference to the report of the Committee on Legislation, sections twenty and twenty-one, this whole ground will be seen to be covered, and it is clearly a limitation upon the legislative power. It ought, therefore, to come under the head of restrictions on legislation.

Mr. J. R. READ. Mr. Chairman: I think the object of the gentleman from Clarion would be obtained as well as the object of the Committee on Education if we were to strike out the first five words in section five, and insert the word "no," so that it shall read "no county, borough, or other public or municipal corporation," &c.

Mr. JOHN R. READ. Mr. Chairman: I have made this suggestion for the reason that it is already provided for in the report of the Committee on Legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that he had better, perhaps, withdraw his amendment until the amendment of the gentleman from Lancaster (Mr. H. G. Smith) has been acted upon.

The question being then taken, the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. JOHN R. READ. Mr. Chairman: I now renew the amendment to strike out the first five words in section five, and insert the word "no," before the word "county." My object in making this motion is because it is already provided for in the report of the Committee on Legislation.

The question being then taken, a division was called, and the amendment was not agreed to: Ayes, thirty-one; noes, forty-seven.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: I offer to amend the section, by inserting after the word "managed," in the last sentence, the words "either in whole or in part."

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the section.

The question being taken, the fifth section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 6. The arts and sciences may be encouraged and promoted in colleges and other institutions of learning, under the exclusive control of the State.

Mr. DODD. Mr. Chairman: I certainly have no objection to the encouragement of the arts and sciences, but I have a very decided objection to this section, and to the two sections which immediately follow it, for the simple reason that they are utterly unnecessary. It will be well for delegates to remember that the State Constitution is totally different from the federal Constitution. The federal Congress has no power excepting that expressly given to it by the federal Constitution, and consequently it is very proper in the federal Constitution that the language should be used, that "Congress shall have power," but when the State Constitution confers legislative power it is unlimited and absolute, and the language, "the Legislature shall have power," is totally uncalled for and unnecessary.

The Legislature has supreme legislative power, except in so far as limited by the Constitution, and no act of the Legislature is unconstitutional, if it is legislative in its character, unless it is expressly prohibited by some section of the federal or State Constitution. Now, sir, if this is correct—and none who are acquainted with the elementary principles of constitutional law will deny it—the Legislature has already the power which we now propose to grant to that body. It has the power to encourage the arts and sciences, and the adoption of this section by the Convention would not add one iota to that power, and neither would the two following sections, and I hope that they will not be adopted, for the simple reason that they are utterly unnecessary.

We might adopt a provision that the sun shall be permitted to shine, but it would add nothing to the power of the sun, while it would detract wonderfully from the reputation of this Convention for wisdom. If we pass such a provision as this we can accomplish no good results whatever, and will be showing to the world that we are totally unacquainted with the elementary principles of constitutional law.

MR. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: The Constitution under which we have been living since all of us were born, and that others lived under long before we were born, contains the provision that the arts and sciences shall be promoted in one or more seminaries of learning. In framing this report, it certainly was not any part of the purpose of the Committee on Education to take a step backward in the career of educational improvement and enlightenment.

It would not look well for the Convention to say that while we have enjoined it upon the Legislature, in passing a section providing that the arts and sciences shall be promoted in one or more seminaries of learning, by omitting anything in regard to the subject virtually to say that they shall be no longer encouraged.

It was with the view of preserving this idea, and to some extent of amplifying it, that the committee inserted this section in the manner in which it has been reported. I do not think that it is necessary to add a single word in additional explanation, and I therefore leave the section to the consideration of the Convention precisely as it has been reported.

MR. MINOR. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the section, by striking out the word "may" and inserting the word "shall."

MR. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: The amendment certainly meets my approval, and I certainly desire to accept it, but it is probably improper in a member of the committee to do so.

MR. MANN. Mr. Chairman: If the amendment which has been proposed to the section is adopted, it will give to it a practicable effect, for as it stands now, it is entirely without any virtue.

It is only those sections of this article which say the Legislature shall or shall not do a certain thing that possess any virtue whatever.

The other sections are entirely powerless and without any virtue whatever, and the gentleman who proposed this amendment, to strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall," proposes to give to this section its only vital effect, but for this very reason I am opposed to the amendment, and entirely in accord with the sentiments which have been expressed by the gentleman from Venango (Mr. Dodd.)

I think this particular section ought not to be adopted, for the reason that this article, reported by the Committee on Education, is designed to provide a system for the education of all the children of the Commonwealth. It is positive in its provisions. The Legislature, as the gentleman from Venango said, has the power to encourage colleges. The Legislature has supreme power over this whole subject of the section, excepting so far as the article reported by the committee shall restrict that body, and hence the restrictive power in section three and section five, and the direct power conferred upon the Legislature, in section two, is wise and valuable, but the negative power in section six, it seems to me, is without any virtue, and the positive power which the amendment proposes to give, I trust will not be placed in the Constitution. The chief desire of this Convention should be, that all our efforts should be directed towards the interests of the large mass of the children of Pennsylvania who must be educationally provided for, and this section, if it means anything at all, means that the State is to build up a grand State college of learning.

I have supposed the whole purpose, aim and scope of this article is to take care of all the children of the Commonwealth, and to treat them all alike, but this section means to establish a grand State college, in the benefits of which the mass of our children can never participate. I think the adoption of this section will mar the entire article. The common school system of Pennsylvania is now working in a symmetrical and harmonious manner. We have provided by law for common schools, and then for a system of Normal schools, in which teachers can be properly qualified to instruct the children of the Commonwealth, and now I ask why this system should be marred by adding to it a State college, from which the large mass of our children can never receive any benefit. The children of the Commonwealth will receive a direct benefit from each one of these Normal schools, because the teachers therein will be properly educated and well qualified for their work of instruction, and the article, leaving off this last section, will help the Superintendent of Public Instruction to infuse new life into the Normal school districts, and thereby to the common school districts. Adding this other provision will not add anything to the harmony of the system, but will detract from it. I hope, therefore, the amendment will not be adopted, and that the section itself will be voted down.

Mr. HAZZARD. Mr. Chairman: I rise simply for the purpose of saying that I hope this amendment will be voted down. There is no necessity for it either in the old Constitution or the new. To me it seems that it would be an unwise policy to establish schools of this kind. The amendment provides that the State shall have exclusive control of the schools, that is to create institutions of learning which are to be the property of the Commonwealth and by it directed. On this point, sir, we have precedents, and the experience may assist us. Almost all of the institutions of the State, where the Commonwealth was a partner, never came to any good. No good result came from the canals in which the State was interested. No good result was attained by the interest of the Commonwealth in the bridges she erected or assisted in erecting. Many of the railroad enterprises in which State aid was invoked and secured, proved unprofitable, and therefore, judging from the past experience in these matters, I submit that this subject should be left to the management and be exclusively under the control of people who are immediately interested in it.

Let us see what such a plan as is proposed means. It means a scientific school, or two or three of them, under the exclusive control of the State; and then what follows? It necessitates a large retinue of professors at very large salaries, because no professor will take charge of a State school without large salaries. There must be a physician to the school, supported by the State at a very large salary. There must be a landscape gardener with a large salary, and there will be an immense amount of offices created for the purpose to provide a comfortable place for lazy people who have not anything else to do. Is not that the case with all public institutions of this class? Are not men appointed to positions in them not so much with reference to their fitness and worth as for the political service they have rendered some particular candidate or some political party? We know they are, and the arts and sciences will be better fostered and promoted by private enterprise, by our colleges and schools already organized, than under any such State institution as is proposed. And besides, who will go to it? If we establish this institution who will attend it? It will be a fruitful source of heart burnings, bickerings, difficulties and discontent all over the Commonwealth. No source of trouble is so prolific as partiality, and with every institution of this kind, partiality is inseparably associated. Every child has a right to be admitted to such a school, and while a few may be admitted, more will be excluded, and discontent must follow. Not only must such an institution require large expenditures of money, but it will create dissatisfaction.

Let us sustain our colleges that private enterprises have called into being. We have established common schools. We have academies under competent management. They do not require the patronage of the State. So with the Normal schools; they are not under the exclusive control of the State. It has supervision over a part of its economy, but not the exclusive control, and there ought not to be any such thing as a school erected and supported by the State. What do we want with such an institution? Are there not schools in this State sufficient to take care of all the educational interests of the children? Have we not common schools? Have we not schools where we teach civil engineering? Have we not schools where geology and mineralogy and all the branches and departments of art or science are faithfully illustrated, and in which thorough training in any of the varied lines of scientific knowledge can be procured? Are there not educational institutions enough to educate our children in the highest measure that can be secured without adding this State institution, which will be cumbersome, expensive, and eternally so? I think that the educational necessities of the country are sufficiently taken care of by private enterprise, and our mission lies in the support and encouragement of such institutions.

Let us not, sir, make the mistake of creating an institution under the direction and exclusive control of the Commonwealth. Such an institution certainly is not required now. In the future it may become expedient to establish it, but if so the power for its creation, in my opinion, exists in the Legislature. In this I may be in error. Intelligent gentlemen inform me that the Legislature has not that power, but I do not so understand it. What principle of the Constitution would the Legislature infringe by the establishment of such an institution. Suppose tomorrow they would establish such an institution in Philadelphia; if established at all, of course it would be located here, for Philadelphia always gets all the important endowments. What provision of the Constitution would be transgressed or what law violated? I affirm that the power is now inherent in the General Assembly, and it is best to keep it there. If the time shall come when a necessity does occur for such an addition to our educational facilities, when we have not sufficient colleges and universities for the proper advancement of education, it will then be time to consider the establishment of a State institution for the purpose; at present it is neither necessary nor wise to insert this amendment into the Constitution of the Commonwealth.

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Chairman: Being connected with the Committee on Education, perhaps a single remark is due by way of explanation. It will be recollected that in the present Constitution there is a clause identical in substance with this section, except the restricting sentence at the end of it. The present Constitution provides that "the arts and sciences shall be promoted in one or more seminaries of learning." There is where it stopped, leaving the Legislature at liberty to make any appropriation it saw fit, to any institution it saw fit, whether denominational or undenominational, under the control of the State or under the control of individuals. That was the way we found the Constitution and the law when we entered upon our work. But the majority of the committee, as it appears by the report, were not satisfied to leave it there, and hence the design of these additional words was this, to prevent the Legislature from making appropriations to denominational colleges or institutions. To accomplish that the words were used "exclusively under the control of the State." So that if appropriations were made, they should not be made to any denominational college or university or seminary; but, if made, the institution should be under the exclusive control of the State. I mention this by way of explanation. That was the design of the section.

Now, sir, there is a little more involved in it. It is, perhaps, possible that this limitation is sufficiently accomplished by the preceding section. If so, the section under consideration is unnecessary. I leave that to the decision of members.

Thus far I have spoken of the way the matter stood in committee, of the object of the section and the effect it will have if adopted. I am now free to express sentiments of my own, and these are that we should go even farther. I believe that we should not only prevent the Legislature from making any appropriations to denominational colleges, but that we should prevent it from establishing any colleges of its own. I would go farther than this section goes, and put it in such a shape that the Legislature shall not establish any such institutions or make appropriations to them, for reasons in part that have been given by gentlemen already, and also from the light that we derive from experience.

I mention one fact. It is known to all of us that in the State of Michigan there is an institution called the State University. A few years ago there was placed at the head of that University a certain person who stood high in and was one of the shining lights of a particular denomination, and from that time on the State University was largely held up as being the exponent of that denomination. They substantially had charge of the institution and claimed it as theirs. Other denominations accepted the proposition, and immediately went to work to destroy that control by removing the president, and after a contest which shook that State from centre to circumference they succeeded. The result was, that the then incumbent president was ousted, and a president of another denomination was put in, and many honest members of the former denomination, good sober ones, too, declared that the result should, if possible, be reversed, and most bitter feelings were expressed by those who had lost control against those who had taken the charge of the State University out of their hands. They have been in a quarrel there about it ever since, and I presume they will quarrel about it as long as the University is under the support of the State.

What further? There is connected with that institution a medical department, which made it necessary to elect a professor to take charge of that branch of instruction. And at this very time, as I am informed, they are quarrelling about whether it is to be allopathy or homœopathy which shall be taught there. Just as the president's chair caused a quarrel between the denominations, this subject caused a quarrel among the doctors, and the great danger is, that between the scalpels that are used in the two classes of schools, the institution itself will be cut to pieces. There are these dangers to be incurred in the establishment of any State institution of this kind, and while I believe that this Convention ought to provide a broad and ample basis for an unsectarian common school system, yet that colleges and higher institutions of learning should be left to the enterprise of denominations, of individuals, of communities, of scholars, &c. I am also informed that the University of Virginia, established by Thomas Jefferson himself, was a failure, until it passed into private hands. It is a fact, sir, that as long as you have a great institution holding out inducements for patronage and jobs of various kinds, that just so long will it be liable to abuses and unseemly contests, and the interests of education will be deprecated instead of being advanced. I therefore personally, would not object to taking the whole section out, even to seeing a negative one in its place.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman: I am not very particular whether this section shall be adopted or not, but if it is, then I hope my amendment will prevail, because without the word "shall," in this connection, it seems to me, sir, that the section would be without any weight or power whatever. I submit to the cool judgment of the Convention touching this particular point, and therefore, without consuming time in this discussion further, I submit to the vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment, and the amendment will be read.

The CLERK: To strike out the word "may," in the first sentence, and insert "shall."

On the question of agreeing to the amendment, a division was called, which resulted, twenty-six in the affirmative. Not being a majority of a quorum, the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the section.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I trust the committee will give this section careful consideration just for one moment. It is substantially a re-enactment of a provision that has been in our Constitution for nearly one hundred years. There can be no good reason given for striking it out now. It is not a mandatory clause. It leaves the whole matter at the discretion of future enlightened legislators. I freely confess I do not believe all the wisdom of the ages past is centered in this body, nor do I assume that we are the wisest men the world will ever know. I can readily understand that in the progress of civilization, as men struggle and strive for the perfection of this beautiful system of education we have adopted in this State, it may, in the course of time, become necessary to complete the symmetry of the grand design, by putting a State institution of higher learning on the top. All we ask is that the Convention will leave in the hands of the Legislature a power always heretofore entrusted to it, and never, in the judgment of any, abused, so that when the good time comes which we all expect, the Legislature may provide an institution, not to teach our children, for that is already done in the public schools; not to teach the teachers, for that is done in Normal schools; but to educate the teachers of the teachers themselves. This is the acme for which advanced educators in our good old Commonwealth are striving.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: We have provided for a system of public schools upon a very different basis from that provided for in the old Constitution. In the first place, the first section of the article that this committee has already adopted, is a very much broader basis upon which to rest a public school system of the State. The old Constitution read in this way: "The Legislature shall, as soon as conveniently may be, provide by law for the establishment of schools throughout the State, in such manner that the poor may be taught gratis." That is every word there was in the old Constitution, upon which to rear the structure of common schools throughout the Commonwealth, of Normal schools and of high schools, and all the structures that have been reared upon it, a simple provision that the Legislature may provide for teaching the poor gratis. Now what have we provided here? By the first section the Legislature shall provide for the maintenance and support of a thorough and efficient system of public schools, wherein all the children of this Commonwealth, above a certain age, may be educated. Now that we have vested in the Legislature all the power over the subject of providing for public schools, it seems to me if we go beyond that, and we provide for a special and exceptional system in which all cannot, from the nature of the case, participate, it no longer then belongs to that class that should be supported from a common and public purse.

Mr. WHERRY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHERRY. I believe the gentleman did not read the second section of the present Constitution.

Mr. HOWARD. No, I did not; but I understand the arts and sciences shall be promoted in one or more seminaries of learning. That was provided in the old Constitution; but I say the new Constitution that we are now proposing, is so much broader than the provision in the old Constitution upon this subject that it has an ample basis upon which to rear any structure that should be supported from a common fund contributed by the people of the State.

Mr. WHERRY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this section of the Constitution of 1838 has never been recognized in legislation?

Mr. HOWARD. I did not say anything about it.

Mr. WHERRY. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I so understood him.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment:

The CLERK read: Strike off from the end of the section the words, "under the exclusive control of the State," making the section read: "The arts and sciences may be encouraged and promoted in colleges and other institutions of learning."

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: If this amendment should be adopted it would leave the section to stand in the precise words that we have in the old Constitution, and it may be of use to leave it there, although it seems to me to be rather ornamental, but being old, I prefer to let it stand as it now is. The term "encouraged and promoted" may mean something more than an appropriation of money. Colleges and institutions of learning not under the control of the State may be encouraged and aided in many ways by general legislation, and that would not include appropriations of money. Now I would not object to anything of that sort, and I take it that this Convention will adopt a provision, a very broad one, prohibiting the appropriation of any money to an educational institution not under the control of the State. Section twenty-one of the report of the Committee on Legislation is a provision that no appropriation whatever shall be made to any denominational or educational institution.

Mr. HAZZARD. We have already adopted a section just before this, of the same import.

Mr. EWING. I think the provision of that section would have the same result, the one we have already adopted; but there is a still broader section reported by the Committee on Legislation that would absolutely prohibit any appropriation of money. Then, if the amendment I propose would be adopted, it would leave this section to stand so that the promotion of sciences and arts would be encouraged in any college by legislation, whether it was denominational or otherwise.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I do not know whether I am at liberty under the rule to speak or not. It is to be remembered that in the history of this Commonwealth the Legislature has been called upon, technically, to aid institutions of learning, colleges founded by benevolent and public spirited persons, without the requisite means to carry on their business usefully, have applied to the Legislature and have received aid—Dickinson college, Lafayette college—I know not how many more. No one will deny that that has been a highly useful appropriation of public money.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the delegate a question if he will permit me.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I ask if the Legislature could not make those appropriations without any provision at all.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I have no doubt that the Legislature has power without any constitutional provision whatever, and always has possessed it. I look upon the provision, however, as an expression of public will, for it has moral force, for the aid which may be given to colleges by the Legislature whenever they see fit to appropriate—an expression of the moral sense of the whole community that they ought to do so. I do not doubt but that we will progress; that we will become more and more advanced; that we are unwilling to stop with the present state of civilization, but we are all striving for a higher and a better standard for all the people of the Commonwealth. It is right that we should do precisely as we have done in the establishment of our common schools; and it is right that we should do precisely as we have done in this Convention by still further enlarging the sphere of their action if we can, and command the Legislature, so far as our fiat can command it, to appropriate liberally of the public funds to their support.

I, for one, am ready to continue the public support to colleges and seminaries of learning, without restriction, but such is not the view of all the committee. I would not confine it to those immediately under the care of the State. I would allow appropriations to be made in aid of colleges and institutions of learning, no matter under what religious care they may be, whether Catholic or Protestant, whether Episcopal, Quaker or Presbyterian, or what they may be. I would allow the State to appropriate; but such is not the temper of the committee, and probably such is not the temper of the Convention.

Now we propose in this report simply to hint to the Legislature that they have the power to do that. What then? We take away the injunction which has been upon them for the last eight or ten years, and we virtually say that we have commanded you to encourage institutions of learning, and now we cease to command. What is the inference to be drawn? That we have changed our minds; that we care less for the education of our people; that we are more regardless of the instruction for the whole mass of the community than we were before. I say again, as I said before, I, for one, will consent to take no step backward, but rather let us advance, and therefore not only must we continue the injunction upon the Legislature as strong as it has been before, but I would even strengthen it and go further. I hope, therefore, there will be no difficulty about the adoption of this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Ewing.)

The amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the section.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment: I insert after the word "colleges," in the second line, the words "industrial schools."

The object I have in offering this amendment is that we may vote down section seven. The amendment will retain, in substance, the first line of that section, so that the Legislature "may establish industrial schools." I wish to get rid of the second line, that requires the attendance of vagrant, neglected and abandoned children in those schools. If you will consider a moment who are meant by "vagrant, neglected and abandoned children," you will probably see the reason and justice of my amendment. Abandoned children are mainly of two classes; one class is sent to the public alms-houses, and is supported by the State or municipal authorities; the other class is sent to religious and other asylums, and is supported at the expense of the societies or persons having charge of those asylums, or by private charity. Now, if we direct the Legislature to pass a law, under authority of which the Superintendent of Public Schools or the local school officers may require the attendance at industrial schools of children that are supported in religious asylums, it will open the door to religious persecution in the first place, and will lead to great abuses in the administration of our school laws, and consequent dissatisfaction among the people. If we adopt section seven, in the language in which it is framed, it places it in the power of an officer connected with the State to go into a religious asylum and say to the persons in charge, "these children that you have here are abandoned children, in the contemplation of the Constitution of Pennsylvania, and you must send them to our schools, whether you wish to or not."

I do not want any such interpretation to be drawn from any section of this kind.

In reference to the word "neglected," what does it mean? Is it the intention of the Committee on Education to have the Legislature authorize an officer connected with the industrial schools proposed to be established, to go into a man's family and say to that man, "your children are neglected, and therefore you must send them to our industrial school?" I trust that the committee do not wish to place any such power in the hands of a superintendent or any other public school officer, and for the purpose of avoiding the possibility of vesting in him such a power. I would not put in the Constitution the seventh section proposed by the committee. The amendment I offer reserves, to suit the wishes of gentlemen who desire that the industrial schools shall be maintained by the State, that part of the seventh section providing that the Legislature may authorize the establishment of such schools.

I think the amendment would accomplish the main purpose that the Committee on Education had in view in reporting both these sections, (seven and eight,) and it would also enable us to act upon the suggestion made by the gentleman from Venango, (Mr. Dodd,) that seven, eight and nine are entirely unnecessary, because the Legislature has already the power which they, by implication, confer upon it. I agree with him that the Legislature has that power, and that the sections mentioned are entirely unnecessary, but as some gentlemen desire to have a section in reference to the encouragement of the arts and sciences in colleges and industrial schools, I have offered my amendment, with a view to give them an opportunity to retain section six, while at the same, time those who desire to vote against sections seven and eight can do so. I myself intend to vote against both of them.

The question being upon the amendment, it was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the section, it was rejected.

The CLERK read :

SECTION 7. The Legislature may establish industrial schools, and require the attendance of vagrant, neglected and abandoned children.

Mr. DARLINGTON. There is a misprint in that. The word "therein" should come in after the word "attendance," in the second line.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be so amended if there is no objection.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I desire to offer a few words of explanation with regard to this section, especially in view of its relation to the following clause, section seven, with which it is intimately connected. However unwilling we may be to recognize the fact, however distasteful it may be to gentlemen of tender sensibilities to hear it said, there are two distinct classes of children in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, alike demanding her guardianship, her fostering care, her elevating influences. There is that class for which provision has been so nobly and so effectively made; the hundreds of thousands of well fed and well clothed innocent, hopeful, happy children who do now attend the public schools, or may attend them, who are educated in the common schools or may be educated there, if their parents desire it, and if not, are educated by other means at private expense in private schools. But, sir, down underneath this, in dirt and despondency, suffering the realities of cruel want, and breathing an atmosphere of vice, there is lower stratum. It is but idle vanity and unwise statesmanship to longer ignore the unpleasant fact that there is a large class of children in this Commonwealth who, by reason of the ignorance, the indifference, the idleness, the impecuniosity or the vices of their parents and guardians, are absolutely hindered from attending the common schools of this State. It is to provide for that class of children that this section is drawn.

For these we want compulsory education. We want a system that will require and achieve the moral, mental and industrial education of these neglected and abandoned children, and save them from a doomed inheritance of want, and crime and woe!

That is all this section is intended to provide for, and it has nothing to do, directly, with the common school system of the State, as we now understand it.

Mr. HAZZARD. But where are the children?

Mr. WHERRY. All over the State, in every city, town and county. Of this class of children you find twenty thousand reported to the school authorities of this city alone.

There are in my county alone no less than twelve hundred and thirteen children between the ages of ten and twenty-one, who cannot read—a thousand, at least, of these, owing to the criminal neglect of their parents, are not provided for. In our county alms-house, county jail, and belonging to the professional “tramps,” there are from one to two hundred children for whom there is no educational provision of any kind made at all. They would not be in their present condition tolerated at the common school. Children of wealthy families would not sit at the same desk with them. They are paupers and criminal children, and there is not one iota of provision made for them by the State beyond some statutory enactment of a hundred years ago, long since forgotten. They grow up in stolid ignorance and stupidity, in idleness and in want, and furnish the very class of people from whom the great army of criminals of our country is recruited.

I say, here, briefly, but positively, that it is this great neglect of abandoned children that gives us the large proportion of criminals that we find pervading the community.

MR. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I am unwilling to allow this vote to be taken without adding a few words in defence of the report of the committee. The object of the committee, in introducing this section, was to provide for the education of a class of children of whom we all know there are but too many existing among us, children without parents, without protectors, without any means of education or of support. Is it right for the community to allow such children to grow up amongst them entirely ignorant, without any education or means of education being offered to them? You may say that the common schools are open to them. True, but if the common schools are not open to them, if they cannot be clothed and fed, you find them upon your streets and at your doors, children wanting clothing and food, as well as education. Who is to take care of them? We cannot, in common humanity, stop to inquire whether they belong to this religious denomination or to the other. The question is, will we allow them to remain in ignorance? Is it not the duty of the State to employ some of our ample means for the establishment of industrial schools for the proper education of such children? Surely gentlemen will not be content to permit a state of things to exist, which manifestly, and by the consent of everybody, does exist, namely: That there are children among us without any means of education, or anybody being responsible for their support or their clothing. What are we to do? It is the duty of the State, it is the duty of the whole people, to provide shelter for these houseless outcasts, to provide food for them, and clothing, and occupation for them.

This can be done by providing industrial schools where they may be taught to learn the arts of common life. Is it right to say that the Legislature may establish such schools? I would rather say that they shall establish them. It is certainly right to say that they may, and in that way give it the sanction of our voice, showing that there is a class of the community who ought to be taken to school, no matter how they happen to have become neglected, or how they became abandoned or vagrant.

The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Campbell) seems to have some fear that this might allow somebody to go into a seminary or retreat or institution of charity, where children are to be found, and take them out of it on the ground of their being abandoned. I fear nothing of that kind. I have no fears of any disposition to interfere with any charity that is actually taking care of children; but if, unfortunately, there should be existing any institution, which, under the name of charity, so far forgets the first principles upon which it was founded, as to take children under its care and deprive them of education—who would be of the opinion that no education was necessary for them—then I would say that the law not only should but ought to step in and say to that charitable institution: “While you are doing much good, you are not doing all the good that the good of the community demands.” I would not allow individuals or anybody else to raise up a body of such children without education. However, I have no fear of any such difficulty arising, and I think the gentleman from Philadelphia need have none. There is no danger of any private charity being interfered with. Some observations have been made with regard to the next section, which is compulsory also. I would not allow a single man in this land to say, “my children shall not be educated.” He fails in his duty of a citizen of the republic when he attempts to raise up a child without education, and if there be any such wrong-headed men, I would not care, sir, even if they be found in my own brother, or my dearest friend, I would say to him, that by the law of the land and the Constitution of his country, he must educate his children, or if he fails in that duty, the State will take them from him.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman : I am in favor of this section as reported by the committee, and wish to say just a word or two to remove some doubts and difficulties on the part of my friend from Philadelphia (Mr. Campbell.) I think that if he will give a reasonable signification to the language of the section, he need apprehend no difficulty of the kind which seems to occur to his mind.

"The Legislature may establish industrial schools, and require the attendance therein of vagrant, neglected and abandoned children."

I submit that this proposition does not interfere in any way with the class of children to which he refers. They are not neglected children placed in charitable institutions; they are not abandoned, if they are in still under parental care. Nothing can be plainer to my mind than this, so when the gentleman speaks of men going armed with authority to charitable institutions at the poor man's home, he is conjuring up a chimera dire in his own imagination. But, sir, this section is needed to provide for those poor waifs—of those helpless little ones that have been actually abandoned and neglected. And further, sir, I most firmly believe, that for the safety of the State this should be done. I think the gentleman is in error in regard to any anticipation of wrong on that score, but I favor this for the reason that it looks in the right direction, in regard to the educational duties of the State.

This great State of Pennsylvania has taken her position long since, on the high ground that it is the duty of the State, as a matter of justice and self-preservation, that every child in the Commonwealth should be properly educated and trained for the high and responsible duties of citizenship. There is a large class of citizens in our Commonwealth commonly known as the perishing class. I entreat the members of this Convention, before they vote upon this section, to consider whether its adoption will not limit, to some extent, the number of vagrant children, who are now neglected and abandoned. The adoption of this section may possibly lead to the establishment of industrial schools, wherein the large number of our vagrant children can be properly educated in some industrial employment, and properly fitted for their important duties of citizens.

I can foresee none of the difficulties likely to arise which have been predicted by those who have opposed the section. I can, however, perceive a great deal of good that may arise from its adoption, and as a friend, ever and always advocating every measure that is intended to elevate the children of our State, and to every measure that is calculated to promote the prosperity and happiness of all our citizens, I most heartily favor the adoption of this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the section.

The question being then taken on the seventh section, a division was called, which resulted as follows: Ayes, twenty-eight.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: Shall not the negative side of the question be taken?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. Those who are opposed to the section will please rise.

The noes were counted, and were found to be twenty-six.

The CHAIRMAN. There is not a quorum in the Convention.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I submit that the vote evidently shows that there is a majority of a quorum, and that the section has been agreed to.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the question of a quorum can only be taken notice of by the Chair when it is formally called to his attention.

There may be a quorum in the Convention, and by the fact that a quorum does not appear on the count of the vote, it does not necessarily follow that there is not a quorum present in the Convention.

The CHAIRMAN. In accordance with a previous ruling the Chair will decide that the vote just taken is not a vote of a majority of a quorum, and the Chair therefore decides that the section has not been agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The eighth section of the report will now be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 8. They may by law require that every child of sufficient mental and physical ability shall attend the public schools, unless educated by other means.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman: I move to strike out the word "may," where it occurs in the first line, and insert the word "shall."

The question being then taken, the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the section, by adding at the end thereof the following words: "And may establish industrial schools, and require the attendance of vagrant, neglected and abandoned children."

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I rise to a point of order and it is, whether the amendment proposed was not embodied in the section which has just been rejected by the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. Such is the understanding of the Chair, and the point of order is therefore sustained. The section is now before the committee.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman: It really seems to me that there are very important questions pending before the committee that I think are not treated with that deliberation and consideration due to them. I do not know whether it is owing to the sparsity of members present or whether there is a disposition to entirely neglect them. I do not like to see important sections like these embodied in the article reported by the Committee on Education stricken down in this manner and without a quorum voting. I therefore move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The question being taken, a division was called, and the motion was not agreed to, a majority of a quorum not voting.

The question then recurred upon the seventh section, and the section was not agreed to.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman: I rise to a point of order, and it is this: That if the Convention is to be held down to such a rule as this, no proposition can be carried here to-day.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: The article having been gone through with, no motion can be entertained, and the committee must rise.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I desire to offer an additional section.

The CHAIRMAN. The entire report of the committee has been disposed of.

IN CONVENTION.

The committee of the whole then rose, and the President resumed the chair.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. President: As chairman of the committee of the whole, I have the honor to report that the committee of the whole, having had under consideration the article reported by the Committee upon Education, now report the same with amendments.

The PRESIDENT. The amendments made by the committee of the whole upon the article reported by the Committee upon Education will now be read.

THE AMENDED ARTICLE ON EDUCATION.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 1. The Legislature shall provide for the maintenance and support of a thorough and efficient system of public schools, wherein all the children of this Commonwealth above the age of six years may be educated.

SECTION 2. The Legislature shall appropriate at least one million dollars for each year, to be annually distributed among the several school districts according to law, and applied to public school purposes only.

SECTION 3. No money raised in any way whatever for the support of the public schools of the Commonwealth shall ever be appropriated to or used by any religious sect for the maintenance and support of schools under its control.

SECTION 4. The Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He shall hold his office for the term of four years, and his duties and compensation shall be prescribed by law.

SECTION 5. Neither the Legislature nor any county, city, borough, school district, or other public or municipal corporation, shall ever make any appropriation, grant or donation of land, money, or property of any kind to any church or religious society, or to or for the use of any university, college, seminary, academy, or school or any literary, scientific or charitable institution or society controlled or managed either in whole or in part by any church or sectarian denominations.

Sections six, seven and eight were stricken out in committee of the whole.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the consideration of the article reported by the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President: I move the call of the roll, in order to ascertain whether a quorum of members is present.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The Clerk will call the roll.

The CLERK then called the roll, and the following members then answered to their names:

Messrs. Achenbach, Addicks, Ainey, Alricks, Armstrong, Baer, Bailly, (Perry,) Bardsley, Bartholomew, Beebe, Biddle, Black, J. S., Bowman, Buckalew, Campbell, Carter, Church, Clark, Cochran, Corbett, Cronmiller, Curry, Curtin, Dallas, Darlington, De France, Dodd, Dunning, Edwards, Elliott, Ellis, Ewing, Finney, Gibson, Hall, Hanna, Hazzard, Horton, Howard, MacConnell, M'Culloch, Mann, Mantor, Minor, Mott, Newlin, Niles, Palmer, G. W. Palmer, H. W., Pughe, Pucviance, Sam'l A., Read, John R., Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, James L., Rooke, Russell, Simpson, Smith, H. G., Smith, Henry W., Smith, Wm. H., Stanton, Struthers, Turrell, Van Reed, Walker, Wetherill, Jno. Price, Wherry, White, David N., White, Harry, Woodward and Meredith, President—71.

ABSENT OR NOT ANSWERING.—Messrs. Andrews, Bailey, (Huntington,) Baker, Bannan, Barclay, Black, Charles A., Boyd, Brodhead, Broomall, Brown, Carey, Cassidy, Collins, Corson, Craig, Cuyler, Davis, Fell, Fulton, Funck, Gilpin, Gowen, Green, Guthrie, Harvey, Hay, Hemp-hill, Heverin, Hunsicker, Kaine, Knight, Lambertson, Landis, Lawrence, Lear, Lilly, Littleton, Long, M'Allister, M'Camant, M'Clean, M'Murray, MacVeagh, Metzger, Parsons, Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Patton, Porter, Purman, Purviance, John N., Reynolds, S. H., Ross, Runk, Sharpe, Stewart, Temple, Wetherill, J. M., White, J. W. F., Worrell and Wright—61.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the consideration of the article reported by the Committee on Legislation. Is it the pleasure of the Convention to proceed to the consideration of the article?

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I move that the Convention proceed to the consideration of this article.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. President: I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT. Will the gentleman withdraw his motion for one moment?

Mr. NEWLIN. Certainly.

AMENDING THE EIGHTEENTH RULE.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to state that there was an error committed on the part of the gentleman from Warren, (Mr. Struthers,) in offering a resolution relative to the amendment of rule eighteen, which would have an effect not intended by him. His object was to repeal the order made by the Convention in February last, on the motion of the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington.) He now desires to make a motion to reconsider the vote which was taken upon the resolution. Shall he have leave to make that motion?

["Aye," "aye," "aye."]

Mr. STRUTHERS. I move to re-consider the vote which was taken upon the resolution I offered this morning in relation to amending the eighteenth rule of the Convention.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution is again before the House. Will the House agree to the resolution?

Which was decided in the negative.

Mr. STRUTHERS. Mr. President: I offer the following resolution at this time:

Resolved, That the order made by the Convention on the 12th of February, prohibiting debate on questions as to the time of meeting and adjournment be rescinded.

On the question of proceeding to second reading, a division was called, which resulted twenty-one in the affirmative. Not being a majority of a quorum, the question was decided in the negative.

THE LATE COLONEL HOPKINS.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I desire to ask unanimous consent at this time to offer a resolution, which should have been offered yesterday.

Unanimous consent was given, and the resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the House Committee cause the Hall to be draped for thirty days as a mark of respect to the memory of the late Hon. William Hopkins.

The resolution was read a second time, and unanimously agreed to.

THE STATE PRINTER'S ACCOUNTS.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President: I ask leave at this time to make a motion.

Leave was granted, and Mr. Clark said: Mr. President: Yesterday the Convention passed a resolution referring the settlement of the accounts of the State Printer to the authorities at Harrisburg. Many persons have found fault with the action of the committee at that time, and at their instance I now desire to make a motion for the re-consideration of that question. I have no views to express, but in order that the matter may be brought fully to the attention of the Convention, I move to re-consider the action of the Convention on that subject.

The PRESIDENT. How did the gentleman from Indiana vote?

Mr. CLARK. In the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT. Who seconds the motion?

Mr. BIDDLE. I do, sir.

The PRESIDENT. Did the gentleman from Philadelphia vote in the affirmative?

Mr. BIDDLE. I did.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I want to make a motion to postpone the motion of re-consideration for the present, or until Monday, when we can have a fuller House. I move to postpone the consideration of the re-consideration for the present.

The PRESIDENT. The motion to postpone the re-consideration is not in order.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President:—

The PRESIDENT. Nothing is in order but the re-consideration.

The motion to re-consider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I did not design to say anything, but being recognized by the Chair, I will explain my situation in this matter. I was unaware of the action of the House yesterday until the resolution in question had been passed. I confess I thought it was a little hasty myself. But however that may have been, I thought to-day that it would be proper to dispose of this question of re-consideration until there was a full Convention. It is manifest that we are very short of a full Convention to-day. This is not an unimportant matter, and I would prefer that it should go over until next week. The question is up now on its merits, and I therefore move to postpone the consideration of this question for the present.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President: As I offered the resolution, I desire to say a single word in explanation, and ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT. A motion to postpone is not debatable.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I am aware of that, sir, but I ask unanimous consent to say a word.

Unanimous consent was given and Mr. Armstrong said:

Mr. President: I offered that resolution yesterday morning, and it is proper that I should state the circumstances. The gentleman from Pittsburg (Mr. J. W. F. White) came to me the evening before and handed me a resolution, stating that he was obliged to go to Pittsburg, as a member of the committee appointed by this Convention to attend the funeral of Colonel Hopkins, and could not return for several days, and that there was necessity that the resolution should pass immediately. I made some inquiry into the facts and ascertained them to be about these: That a very large amount of work had been done by Mr. Singerly, and that no provision had been made whatever for his procuring payment upon account. The Legislature passed a bill for the purpose of affording him a mode of reaching payment on account, and it was in the hands of the Governor, who had much hesitation in signing it, unless under some expression of approval on the part of this Convention, he having much reluctance to sign a bill which might be construed as an attempt on the part of the Legislature to take out of the hands of the Convention a matter which properly appertained to it. Upon the merits of the resolution as it occurred to me, and such was the view of the gentleman from Allegheny, whom I represented in offering it, although I did not desire, nor did I think it proper to make such a statement at that time, for the resolution met my own view of what was proper under the circumstances.

I will further say that I took the precaution, before offering it, to consult with two or three members of the Committee on Printing, who expressed no dissent at all to the resolution, and whom I understood to approve it, the idea being that a large amount of work will be done for the Convention, which ought to be paid for on current account, and for which payments no provision has yet been made. A very large amount of work will remain to be done after this Convention has adjourned. We have no accounting officer, nor do I see how we can extend any powers or functions of the Convention beyond our final adjournment. I knew of no other mode so fitting and appropriate, by which these large accounts can be so properly and satisfactorily adjusted, as by passing them through the hands of the regularly appointed and experienced accounting officers of the State, and as the Legislature must provide for the payment, it is proper that they should also provide for the adjustment and settlement of the accounts.

Having made this explanation, it is proper to add, I have not the slightest personal interest in the subject, beyond the desire that we should provide some mode by which the work, as it progresses, shall be reasonably paid for, and that the final account shall be justly and properly settled, with exact fairness both to the contractor and the State. If there be any apprehension, as I have heard suggested, that there is something concealed under this, some effort to obtain an undue advantage for the printer, I utterly disclaim it, and would instantly, at any and all times, vote against the resolution, or any proposition which would look to that end. I offered it under the circumstances, and with the view which I have stated. I have nothing further to express upon this subject, but submit it solely to the judgment and discretion of the House, desiring only to add that it is certainly incumbent upon the Convention to provide, without unnecessary delay, some mode in which the contractor can receive payments on account as the work progresses, and this I understand to be his only desire in the premises.

MR. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I ask unanimous consent of the Convention to state what I know about this.

Unanimous consent was given.

MR. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I know the motive of all parties connected with this. I know it, and I am satisfied it is perfectly pure and beyond reflection. My attention was called to this matter by the Attorney General, who was late a member of this body, and who knows how sensitive this Convention was upon the subject, and properly, too, of expenses, particularly upon the subject of printing. I was informed that a joint resolution had been introduced and passed through the Legislature providing for an allowance of $25,000 on account to the State Printer for printing done for this Convention. I inquired of the State Treasurer why this was. The information derived from that source was, that application was made to him by the State Printer to get something on account to assist in defraying the large expenses to which he is subjected. The State Treasurer very properly remarked that before he made any payment on account to him, he wanted some proper voucher, and he called the attention of Mr. Singerly to it. But, inasmuch as this appropriation must be made by law ultimately, at Mr. Singerly's instance, a joint resolution was introduced and passed, without debate, through the Legislature, as a matter of courtesy, I may say, to this Convention. There is now a better feeling between the Legislature and the Convention, if you will allow me to make the suggestion, than there was formerly. There is a desire to show every courtesy possible to the Convention, and this joint resolution was passed without debate as a matter of courtesy to this Convention. The Attorney General having been a member of this body, knew how sensitive the Convention was about controlling its own expenses, and he called the attention of the Governor to it, and the joint resolution has not been signed.

These statements are due to all parties. Now the matter is entirely in the possession of this Convention, and if, after this consideration, this Convention refuses to pass the resolution which was under consideration yesterday, I am satisfied that the joint resolution will not be signed, and this Convention is as able as any other tribunal to judge whether it is proper to pass a resolution of this kind or not.

MR. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman: For the information of the Convention, as it has not been read this morning, I call for the reading of the resolution.

THE PRESIDENT. No copy of the resolution is now in possession of the Clerk, the Journal having been sent to the printer.

MR. ARMSTRONG. A gentleman has handed me a copy of the Inquirer, from which I will read the preamble and resolution:

WHEREAS, It is impossible for the accounts of Benjamin Singerly, as printer, to be settled by the Convention, because a great portion of the work must be done after the Convention shall have adjourned; therefore,

Resolved, That in the judgment of this Convention it is expedient that the Legislature provide for the settlement of his accounts by the proper accounting officers of the State, on the terms and conditions of his contract with the Convention, and for the payment of such sum as he may be entitled to receive.

MR. H. G. SMITH. Mr. President: I ask unanimous leave to make a statement.

Leave was granted.

MR. H. G. SMITH. Mr. President: Yesterday morning, when this resolution was passed through the Convention, sitting in my seat, I heard it very indistinctly while it was read. I tried to listen, but could not catch the full tenor of it. I went to the Clerk's desk, afterwards, and read it in manuscript, as it has been read here this morning. Upon reading it, I thought, perhaps, some members of the Convention besides myself were unable to ascertain clearly the intent and meaning of the resolution, and I thought it probable that not a few might have found themselves in the position in which I found myself, unable to vote upon it intelligently.

Looking at the resolution as it passed, it strikes me, sir, that the first section of it, the preamble, contains a misstatement. If the State Printer complies with his contract, as entered into with this body, there will be no large amount of printing undone when this Convention adjourns. All of the miscellaneous printing will be entirely finished, and there ought not to be a single thing, at the hour when this Convention adjourns, left unprinted and unfurnished to this body, except one day's Journal and one day's Debates. In looking back to the act of Assembly calling this Convention, I find that the Legislature provided that "warrants for the compensation of members and officers, and for all proper expenses of the Convention, shall be drawn by the President and countersigned by the Chief Clerk," &c. The design was that we would attend to our own accounts, and send no accounts to the accounting officers at Harrisburg without having first passed upon them, intelligently, by our own Committee on Accounts. So far as that committee has acted, it has acted intelligently and well, and it has given evidence of its care for the interests of the people. When the reporters from Harrisburg presented their bill here, the chairman of the Committee on Accounts found that they had estimated the amount of what they claimed to be due by counting the matter, which was printed as leaded matter, making one-fifth more than it would make in solid minion type. He very properly objected to that upon the ground that they did not report the leads which the printer had put in, and he cut their account down to a proper basis.

Now I submit that after the various resolutions that we have had here with regard to printing, after the changes that have been made, that it would be a very indelicate thing for this Convention to ask the accounting officers at Harrisburg to go back over our files, through our contract with the State Printer, through the whole course of our proceedings, and without any instructions from our Committee on Accounts, to ask them to settle a question of this kind for us. We would be setting a bad example, sir. We would be leaving our work undone, the very work that the Legislature charged us to do in a proper manner; and, for one, if I were a member of the Legislature, and especially if I had been there last year, when this carefully prepared act of Assembly was passed, I would say to the members of this Convention: "Gentlemen attend to your own business; make up your own accounts, send them in the proper manner and shape to the accounting officer of this Convention, and let them be settled as they ought to be settled." I do not charge that there is a job in it or anything of that sort. I say that we ought, in view of our plain duty, and in accordance with our own dignity, to arrange all our accounts in the proper manner provided by law, and send them to Harrisburg in proper shape, in such shape as will make them intelligible to the accounting officers of the Commonwealth.

THE PRESIDENT. The question is upon the motion to postpone.

The motion was not agreed to.

THE PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon the resolution.

MR. H. W. PALMER. Mr. President: It may be added to what has already been so well said by the gentleman from Lancaster, (Mr. H. G. Smith,) that the chairman of the Committee on Accounts of this body is not present. We know how thorough and careful a man he is, and we know what a thorough and careful committee we have; and it seems to me that it would be proper to have some expression from him on this subject, before a resolution of this character is presented to the Legislature. It is perfectly evident this committee is entirely able to take care of its accounts. It also seems to be clear, under the act of Assembly providing for the expenses of this Convention, that the State Treasurer will be entirely warranted in drawing money from the treasury upon a warrant drawn by the President and countersigned by the Clerk. Why any further machinery is needed is not apparent to me. When the accounts are properly audited, by the Committee on Accounts of this body, who are competent and careful, who can necessarily have more and better information on the subject than anybody else, when the accounts are thus audited, and warrants are prepared by the officers which the law designates to prepare them, why should not the State Treasurer pay the money? Shall we resign to the State Auditor the control of all these matters, or shall we attend to it ourselves as the law contemplates?

It has been very justly said, that if the State Printer performs his contract, which he has not approximated yet, if he does his duty, which he is not doing at present, at the end of the Convention his printing will have been accomplished, except one day's journal and perhaps one or two day's debates, and, therefore, while of course there is no intention probably to express anything erroneously in the preamble of the resolution, there is a misstatement in it. The binding of the reports that may necessarily have to be done after the Convention adjourns, can all be estimated and settled for by the Committee on Accounts before the Convention adjourns, and the printing that necessarily remains will be very trifling; and, therefore, the reason upon which the resolution is based, seems to me to be untrue; and it seems, further, that there are already sufficient means provided for drawing any sum out of the State Treasury that the printer is entitled to, by reason of the work that he has done and the work that he has to do hereafter. Therefore, I hope our Committee on Accounts will not have this slight put upon them, but that they may be left to perform the duty they should perform.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I move that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Accounts and Expenditures with instructions to report a resolution for the payment of such amount as shall be found to be due the printer in his contract with the Convention.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. President: I move the Convention do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

So the Convention, at two o'clock and forty-three minutes, adjourned until Monday next at ten o'clock, A. M.

SIXTY-SECOND DAY.

MONDAY, March 10, 1873.

The Convention was called to order at ten o'clock. Hon. William M. Meredith, President, in the chair.

The roll was called and those present answered, as follows:

Messrs. Achenbach, Addicks, Alricks, Andrews, Armstrong, Baer, Baily, (Perry,) Baker, Barclay, Beebe, Biddle, Black, J. S., Bowman, Boyd, Brodhead, Broomall, Campbell, Carter, Church, Clark, Cochran, Collins, Corbett, Corson, Cronmiller, Curry, Dallas, De France, Dodd, Dunning, Edwards, Elliott, Ewing, Finney, Hall, Hay, Hazzard, Horton, Howard, Hunsicker, Kaine, Landis, Lilly, MacConnell, M'Clean, Mantor, Minor, Mott, Niles, Palmer, G. The PRESIDENT. There is a quorum of members present.

Prayer was offered by Rev. James W. Curry.

JOURNAL.

The journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. ANDREWS presented a petition on the subject of prohibition, which was laid on the table.

FENCING RAILROADS.

Mr. DE FRANCE presented six petitions in favor of fencing railroads, which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. DE FRANCE also presented a petition, signed by over four thousand citizens of Mercer county, in favor of inserting in the Constitution a clause prohibiting the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors; also to have the same referred to the people in a separate proposition, which was laid on the table.

EDUCATION OF ORPHANS, &c.

Mr. WHERRY offered the following resolution, which was read and referred to the Committee on Education.

Resolved, That it is the duty of the State to provide effective measures for the moral, mental and industrial training of truant, incorrigible, neglected, vagrant and orphan children, and children and youth in jails, almshouses and dependent families, who are wholly or in part the wards of the State, whereby no child in the State shall be permitted to grow up in ignorance, idleness and vice.

RAILROADS.

Mr. BROOMALL offered the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Railroads:

Resolved, That the Legislature shall enact a general railroad law, by virtue of which any individual, company, or corporation organized for the purpose, shall have power to construct a railroad between any two points in the State, he or they paying all damages thereby caused to individual owners or to the public where streets or roads are occupied. No ground shall be taken for the purposes of construction or operating a railroad unless the same be necessary, and the question of necessity shall be determined by proper tribunals under general law.

Mr. SAMUEL A. PURVIANCE offered the following resolution, which was read and referred to the Committee on Railroads :

Resolved, That the Committee on Railroads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting an amendment providing an election by the people, every three years, of a board of railroad inspectors, composed of five persons, whose duty it shall be to examine and report upon any insufficient construction of railroads within the State, which, in their judgment, might imperil life or property, and to provide a remedy therefor, to be enforced after due notice to the companies, on pain of forfeiture of charter.

GAMBLING.

Mr. BAKER offered the following resolution, which was read and referred to the Committee on Legislation :

Resolved, That the Committee on Legislation be instructed to inquire into and report to this Convention a clause in the Constitution making the owner of the property in which a gambling saloon is held, or in which games of chance are allowed to be played, directly responsible to any person or persons who may therein lose any sums of money in any game of chance, or in any gambling operation whatever, for the amount so lost, the same to be recovered, together with the costs of prosecution, by due process of law, and the same to constitute a first lien on the property in which such loss was incurred.

LIABILITY OF SALOON KEEPERS.

Mr. BAKER also offered the following resolution, which was similarly referred :

Resolved, That the owner of the real estate in which any saloon for the sale of intoxicating liquor shall be kept, shall be personally responsible for any damages or injury that may be inflicted by any person while under the influence of intoxicating drinks procured in the said saloon, whether the damage be personal or otherwise, or be the cause of withholding from any family the necessities and comforts of life, which could have been procured with the money spent for liquor. And the Committee on Legislation is hereby instructed to present a clause of the Constitution carrying this provision into effect.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HORTON asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Patton for a few days from to-day.

Mr. FINNEY offered the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining :

Resolved, That no incorporated company organized for mining purposes or possessed of mining privileges, shall own, hold or possess the soil or surface right of more than one thousand acres of land at any one time, exclusive of land held for rights of way for railroad purposes by due appropriation of law.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ANDREWS asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. M'Murray for a few days.

Mr. BOYD asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Darlington for a few days.

ELECTION CANVASSERS.

Mr. JOHN PRICE WETHERILL offered the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Schedule :

Resolved, That in proceeding to the election for the adoption or rejection of the amendments proposed by this Convention, when the canvassers shall not agree in registering a name, such name shall be placed on a disputed list, and the right to vote be decided by the election officers on the day of election.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ALRICKS asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Metzger for a few days, on account of sickness.

Mr. EWING asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. T. H. B. Patterson for a few days from to-day.

Mr. ADDICKS. Mr. President : I am instructed by the Committee on House to make the following report, which I ask to be read, and the resolution annexed thereto adopted :

The Committee on House respectfully report that during the arrangement of the fitting up of this hall, and during part of the month of January, until the Convention determined what employees were required, the Committee on House had employed as messenger and for general duty Thomas Cooper. Annexed is his account for services at two dollars and a half per day, total amount due, forty-seven dollars and fifty cents.

On reference of said bill to the Committee on Accounts, said committee declined to order its payment, for the reason that the employment of said Cooper was not authorized or approved by the Convention. In answer to this your committee desire to state that the said Cooper was of great service, and his engagement by the Committee on House was a matter of necessity. We respectfully request that the Convention will adopt the annexed resolution.

JOHN E. ADDICKS, Ch'n,
M. HALL STANTON,
GEORGE M. DALLAS,
JAMES BOYD.

Resolved, That the employment of Thomas Cooper by the House Committee as messenger during a part of the month of January be approved by the Convention.

Upon the question of proceeding to the second reading of the resolution it was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will observe that the rule of the House provides for the drawing of no warrant except upon the recommendation of the Committee on Accounts. The Chair would suggest that the motion be made to refer this resolution to that committee.

Mr. HAY. Mr. President: I suggest that instead of the resolution reported by the committee a resolution be adopted sanctioning the employment of Mr. Cooper as messenger. Upon such resolution being passed, the Committee on Accounts will of course report a resolution for the payment. I therefore move the substitution of such a resolution authorizing the employment of Mr. Cooper as messenger of the House Committee.

The motion was agreed to.

THE ARTICLE ON EDUCATION.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the second reading and consideration of the article reported from the Committee on Education. Is it the pleasure of the Convention to proceed to the second reading?

The question being taken, shall the Convention proceed to the second reading thereof, it was not agreed to.

LEGISLATION.

The PRESIDENT. The next business is the consideration of the article reported by the Committee on Legislation. Is it the pleasure of the House to proceed to the second reading of this article?

The question being taken, shall the Convention proceed to the second reading thereof, it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

ARTICLE —.

LEGISLATION.

SECTION 1. Before any member shall take his seat in the body to which he has been elected he shall take the following oath:

I, A. B., do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States, and that as a member of the Legislature I will, in all things, support, obey and defend the Constitution of Pennsylvania and discharge the duties of my office with fidelity. And I do furthermore swear that I believe myself to be lawfully elected a member of this House without any false return, bribery, corruption, or fraud committed by me or others with my consent.

Which oath shall be administered by one of the judges of the Supreme Court or court of common pleas learned in the law, in the hall of the House to which the member is elected, and shall be subscribed by the member taking it and filed of record in the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth. Any member elect refusing to take this oath shall not be admitted to his seat, and any member violating his said oath shall be guilty of perjury, and on conviction thereof, in addition to such punishment as may by law be prescribed, shall forfeit his office and be ineligible thereafter to either House of the Legislature.

SECTION 2. Each House shall judge of the qualification of its members, but contested elections for members of either House shall be determined by the court of common pleas of the county in which the returned member lives, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

SECTION 3. Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and publish them daily, except such parts as may require secrecy, and the yeas and nays of the members on any question, shall, at the desire of any two of them, be entered on the Journals.

SECTION 4. Either House shall have power to punish for contempt or disorderly behavior in its presence, to enforce obedience to its process, to preserve order in the House or in committees, protect its members against violence or offers of bribes, or private solicitation, and with a concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member for misconduct, not a second time for the same cause, but a member who has been expelled for corruption shall not be eligible thereafter to either House. Punishment for contempt or disorderly behavior shall not bar an indictment for the same act.

SECTION 5. No law shall be passed, except by bill, which shall be preceded by a preamble briefly reciting the reason of the Legislature for its passage, and no bill shall be so altered or amended in the course of its passage through either House as to change its original purpose.

SECTION 6. Bills may originate in either House, but may be altered, amended or rejected in the other. No bill shall be considered unless reported from a committee, and printed for the use of the members.

SECTION 7. No bill shall be passed containing more than one subject which shall be clearly expressed in its title, except appropriation bills.

SECTION 8. Every bill shall be read at length on three different days in each House, all amendments thereto shall be printed before the final vote is taken, and no bill shall become a law unless on its final passage the vote be taken by yeas and nays, the names of the persons voting for and against be entered on the Journal, and a majority of the members elected to each House be recorded on the Journal thereof, as voting in its favor.

SECTION 9. No amendment to bills by one House returned to the other for concurrence shall be concurred in except by the vote of a majority of the members elected to the house to which the amendments are so returned, taken by yeas and nays, and the names of those voting for and against recorded upon the Journal thereof; and reports of committees of conference shall be adopted in either House, only by the vote of a majority of the members elected to each House taken by yeas and nays, and the names of those voting for and against recorded upon the Journals.

SECTION 10. No law shall be revived, amended or the provisions thereof extended or conferred by reference to its title only, but so much thereof as is revived, amended, extended or conferred, shall be re-enacted and published at length.

SECTION 11. The Legislature shall not pass any local or special law.

Authorizing the creation, extension or impairing of liens.

Regulating the affairs of counties, cities, townships, wards, boroughs or school districts.

Changing the names of persons or places.

Changing the venue in civil or criminal cases.

Authorizing the laying out opening, altering or maintaining roads, highways, streets or alleys.

Relating to or incorporating ferries or bridges.

Vacating roads, town plots, streets or alleys.

Relating to cemeteries, grave-yards or public grounds.

Authorizing the adoption or legitimating of children.

Locating or changing county seats, erecting new counties, or changing county lines.

Incorporating cities, towns or villages or changing their charters.

For the opening and conducting of elections or fixing or changing the place of voting.

Granting divorces.

Erecting new townships or boroughs, changing township lines or borough limits.

Creating offices or prescribing the powers and duties of officers in counties, cities, boroughs, townships, election or school districts.

Changing the law of descent or succession.

Regulating the practice or jurisdiction of or changing the rules of evidence in any judicial proceeding or inquiry before courts, aldermen, justices of the peace, sheriffs, commissioners, arbitrators, auditors, masters in chancery or other tribunals.

Regulating or extending the powers and duties of aldermen, justices of the peace, magistrates or constables.

Regulating the management of common schools, the building of school houses and the raising of money for that purpose.

Fixing the rate of interest.

Affecting the estates of minors or persons under disability.

Remitting fines, penalties and forfeitures, or refunding moneys legally paid into the treasury.

Exempting property from taxation.

Creating corporations, or amending, renewing or extending the charters thereof.

Granting to any corporation, association, or individual, any special or exclusive privilege, or immunity.

Granting to any corporation, association, or individual, the right to lay down a railroad track.

Nor shall any bill be passed granting any power or privileges in any case, where the manner, form, or authority, to grant such powers and privileges shall have been provided for by general law, and in no case where a general law can be made applicable, nor in any other case where the courts have jurisdiction, or are competent to grant the powers, or give the relief asked for.

SECTION 12. No local or special bill shall be passed, unless public notice of the intention to apply therefore shall have been published in the locality where the matter or thing to be affected may be situated, which notice shall be at least sixty days prior to the introduction into the Legislature of such bill, and in the manner to be provided by law. The giving of such notice shall not be waived by any person or interest, and the evidence of such notice having been published, shall be exhibited in the Legislature before such act shall be passed.

SECTION 13. The Speaker of each House shall publicly in the presence of the House over which he presides, while the same is in session, sign all bills and joint resolutions passed by the Legislature.

SECTION 14. The Legislature shall prescribe, by law, the number, character, duties and compensation of the officers and employees of each House, and no payment shall be made from the State Treasury or be in any way authorized to any person, acting as such officer or employee, except they shall have been elected or appointed in pursuance of law.

SECTION 15. All stationery, printing paper and fuel used in the legislative and other departments of government, shall be furnished, and the printing, binding and distributing of the laws, journals, department reports and all other printing and binding, and the repairing and furnishing the halls and rooms used for the meetings of the Legislature and its committees, shall be performed under contract, to be given to the lowest responsible bidder, below such maximum price, and under such regulations as shall be prescribed by law. No member or officer of any department of the government shall be in any way interested in such contracts, and all such contracts shall be subject to the approval of the Governor, Auditor General and State Treasurer.

SECTION 16. No law shall be passed which shall operate to extend the term of any public officer, nor to increase or diminish his salary or emoluments after his election or appointment.

SECTION 17. All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose amendments as in other bills.

SECTION 18. The general appropriation bill shall embrace nothing but appropriations for the ordinary expenses of the Executive, legislative and judicial departments of the Commonwealth, interest on the public debt, and for common schools, all other appropriations shall be made by a separate bill, each embracing but one subject.

SECTION 19. The general appropriation bill shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor. If he disapprove the bill, or any item or appropriation therein contained, he shall communicate such disapproval, with his reasons therefor, to the House in which the bill originated, who shall enter such reasons at large upon the Journals thereof, and immediately proceed to re-consider such bill or the separate items thereof disapproved. All items in said bill not so disapproved shall have the force and effect of law. Any item so disapproved shall be void unless re-passed by two-thirds of each House. And as to such bill or any item disapproved the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays, the names of the persons voting yea and nay to be entered on the Journals of each House according to rules and limitations hereinbefore prescribed as to other bills.

SECTION 20. No appropriation shall be made to any charitable or educational institution not under the absolute control of the Commonwealth, except by a vote of three-fourths of all the members elected to each House.

SECTION 21. No appropriation shall be made to any person or community nor to any denominational or sectarian institution, corporation or association for charitable, educational or benevolent purposes.

SECTION 22. The credit of the Commonwealth shall not in any manner or event be pledged or loaned to any individual, company, corporation or association whatever; nor shall the Commonwealth hereafter become a joint owner or stockholder in any company, or association, or corporation.

SECTION 23. The Legislature shall not authorize any county, city, borough, township or incorporated district, by virtue of a vote of its citizens or otherwise, to become a stockholder in any company, association or corporation, or to obtain money for, or to loan its credit to any corporation, association, institution, company or individual.

SECTION 24. The Legislature shall not delegate to any commission of private persons, corporation or association any power to make, supervise or interfere with any public improvement, or to levy taxes, or perform any municipal function whatever.

SECTION 25. The Legislature shall not create offices for inspecting, weighing or guaging any merchandise, produce, manufactures or commodity; this shall not, however, affect any office created, or to be created, to protect the public health and safety, or for supplying the public with correct standards of weights and measures.

SECTION 26. No act of Assembly shall limit the amount to be recovered for injuries to person or property, and in case of death from such injuries, the right of action shall survive, and the Legislature shall prescribe for whose benefit such actions shall be prosecuted.

SECTION 27. The power to change the venue in civil and criminal cases shall be vested in the courts, to be exercised in such manner as shall be regulated by law.

SECTION 28. No money shall be paid out of the treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and on warrant drawn by the proper officers in pursuance thereof.

SECTION 29. No obligation or liability of any railroad, or other corporation held or owned by the Commonwealth, shall ever be transferred, remitted, postponed or in any way diminished by the Legislature, nor shall such liability or obligation be released except by payment thereof into the State Treasury.

SECTION 30. No bill shall be passed giving any extra compensation to any public officer, servant, employee, agent or contractor, after services shall have been rendered or contract made, nor providing for the payment of any claim or part thereof now existing, or hereafter created against the Commonwealth, without previous authority of law, and all such unauthorized contracts and agreements shall be void.

SECTION 31. Every bill which shall have passed both Houses, shall be presented to the Governor, if he approves he shall sign it, but if he shall not approve he shall return it, with his objections, to the House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon their Journals and proceed to re-consider it. If, after such re-consideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, with the objections, to the other House, by which likewise it shall be re-considered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall be a law, but in such cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the Journals of each House respectively. If any bills shall not be returned by the Governor within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Legislature, by their adjournment, prevent its return, in which case it shall be a law unless he shall file the same with his objections in the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, and give public notice thereof by proclamation within thirty days after such adjournment.

SECTION 32. No corporate body for banking and discounting privileges shall be created or organized in pursuance of any law, without three months previous public notice at the place of the intended location, of the intention to apply for such privileges in such manner as shall be prescribed by law. Nor shall a charter for such privilege be granted for a longer period than twenty years, and every such charter shall contain a clause reserving to the Legislature the power to alter, revoke, or annul the same, whenever, in their opinion, it may be injurious to the citizens of the Commonwealth, in such manner, however, that no injustice shall be done to the corporators.

SECTION 33. The Legislature shall have the power to alter, revoke or annul any charter of incorporation now existing and revocable at the adoption of this Constitution, or any hereafter to be conferred by or under any law, whenever in their opinion it may be injurious to the citizens of this Commonwealth, in such manner, however, that no injustice shall be done to the corporators. No law hereafter enacted shall create, renew or extend the charter of more than one corporation.

SECTION 34. Every order, resolution or vote to which the concurrence of both Houses may be necessary (except on the question of adjournment) shall be presented to the Governor, and before it shall take effect be approved by him, or being disapproved, shall be re-passed by two-thirds of both Houses, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in case of a bill.

SECTION 35. Any bill passed in disregard of the provisions and directions prescribed in this article shall be void and of no effect, and when the validity of any law passed by the Legislature is questioned in any court of record, it shall be competent for such court to inspect the Journals of either House, and if it does not appear thereon that all the forms of legislation in both Houses, as hereinbefore prescribed, have been observed in the passage of such law, the same shall be adjudged by such court to be void.

SECTION 36. A member of the Legislature shall be guilty of bribery, and punished as shall be provided by law, who shall solicit, demand, or receive or consent to receive, directly or indirectly, from any corporation, company, or person, any money, testimonial, reward, thing of value, or personal advantage or promise thereof, for his vote or official influence, or with an understanding, expressed or implied, that his vote or official action in any way is to be influenced thereby, or who shall, after his election and during his term of office, consent to become or continue to act as the agent, attorney or other employee of any corporation or person, knowing such corporation or person has or expects to have any personal or special interest in the legislation of the Commonwealth.

SECTION 37. Any person who shall directly, or indirectly, or by means of or through any artful or dishonest device offer, give, or promise any money, goods, thing of value, testimonial privilege or personal advantage to any Executive or judicial officer, or member of the Legislature of this Commonwealth, to influence him in the performance of any of his public or official duties, shall be guilty of bribery, and punished in such manner as shall be provided by law.

SECTION 38. The Legislature, at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, shall provide by law to compel any person who may have offered, or promised a bribe, or solicited, or received one to testify against any person who may have committed the offence of bribery as defined in the foregoing sections, and the person so compelled to testify shall be exempt from punishment for the offence concerning which he is so required to testify, and of which he may be guilty, and any person convicted of the offence of bribery, as hereinbefore defined, shall, as part of the punishment therefor, be disqualified from holding office or position of honor, trust, or profit, in this Commonwealth.

SECTION 39. Nothing in the foregoing sections shall affect the validity of any existing statutes in relation to the offence of bribery.

SECTION 40. A member who has a personal or private interest in any measure or bill proposed or pending before the Legislature shall disclose the fact to the House of which he is a member, and shall not have the right vote thereon.

THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON LEGISLATION.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. Armstrong in the chair, on the report submitted by Mr. Harry White, chairman of the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. KATNE. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment to go in at the end of the section.

The CLERK read: —

[Mr. HARRY WHITE addressed the Convention. His speech, the manuscript of which was furnished to him for revision, has not been returned. It will be published hereafter.]

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: This is a subject upon which I speak with great reluctance. But I am deeply anxious about it. I do most devoutly believe that the destiny of this Commonwealth, and perhaps that of the whole country, depends upon the decision to which this Convention may come. I beg a brief hearing.

It will be admitted that the legislative function is by far the most important one in any free government. It is the supreme power of the State. All others are insignificant in comparison to it, inasmuch as all the others are bound to obey its will. The Executive is absolutely controlled by it in all the details of his administration. It marks out the path in which he shall walk, and it is able to punish him severely for any departure from it. The Legislature cannot appoint the judges; but it can do more, it can command them what they shall do after they are appointed. All the legal justice we get is manufactured at the seat of government and sent down in bulk to the courts, where it is distributed among the people according to the wants and merits of each individual. The Legislature regulates the practice of the courts, makes and un-makes the rules of evidence and furnishes the standard of decision for every cause. It defines all public offences and supplies the remedy for every private wrong. All rights and all obligations are protected and enforced in the way that it prescribes, and cannot be either protected or enforced at all without its aid and assistance.

The members of the Legislature are the custodians and trustees of all public property. They can sell it, or give it away, or they can increase it by making additional purchases. The taxing power enables them to descend as deep as they please into the pockets of the people of every class, and it has absolute control, and appropriates all the revenue after it is collected.

What is a still higher consideration, they are the guardians of public morality. It depends upon them whether virtue shall be promoted, or vice and crime be encouraged. The theory is that the Legislature, being the supreme power of the State, commands what is right and prohibits what is wrong, and, in a certain sense, the mere command or prohibition does of itself make it right or wrong. What we are taught in the Bible is certainly true, that they who frame iniquity into a law, compel the people to become workers of iniquity.

The time was, Mr. Chairman, when the State of Pennsylvania, then a mere colony, containing, perhaps, less than fifty thousand inhabitants, had a reputation throughout the earth for independence, justice, peace and good order—for everything that goes to make up the happiness of an organized society. There was no portion of the world from which the eyes of the best and wisest men were not turned in admiration towards this community. All this resulted from the wise and just system of laws adopted by the illustrious founder of the colony. We lost our character as fast as we abandoned the principles upon which the early settlers conducted their legislation. As we can trace the grandeur, the honor, the high reputation of the State to the just laws of the earliest time, so we can read the history of her shame and her misfortunes in the statute books of a later period. If we can now but unite the high tone of public morality which pervaded our legislation in the better days of the State with the wealth and science of the present generation, then you may hope to see this Commonwealth set higher than ever, the envy and the example of all the world. Without infusing into our new Constitution something which will have that effect, at least in degree, our institutions must, before a very long time, rot to pieces.

What we want above all things upon the earth, is honest legislation; and when I say we want it, I use the word in the double sense of needing it, and lacking it.

After all that has been said upon this floor, it cannot be denied that the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania has habitually and constantly, for the last twenty-five years or more, betrayed the trust reposed in its members; and this has gone so far, that we must have reform if we would not see our institutions perish before our eyes. The horrible character and extent of the evil, will be appreciated when you recall the solemn words of the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) the chairman of the Committee on Legislature. His position in this Convention, to say nothing of his character and conscience, would make him extremely cautious not to be guilty, even of the slightest exaggeration, upon so grave and important a topic. He told us that corruption of the Legislature was a cancer at the heart of the State, which was eating its very life away. Another gentleman, the delegate from Erie, (Mr. Walker,) without intending to be at all condemnatory, but rather the reverse, declared that it was no use to swear the members of the Legislature, because they were, to his certain knowledge, so utterly degraded that they would take the oath and then immediately lay perjury upon their souls, without scruple and without hesitation. I believe him, for he certainly knows whereof he affirms. The evil fame of this thing has gone forth through the length and breadth of the country inasmuch that the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Harry White,) the chairman of the Committee on Legislation, vouches for this statement: That when one of his colleagues in the Senate was traveling in Connecticut, and it became known that he was a member of our Legislature, that fact alone raised a presumption against his honesty so violent, that there was some hesitation about letting him go into an unoccupied room, least the portable property to be found there might disappear when he went out. There was a time when membership of our State Legislature was a passport to honor and admiration everywhere, from a Parisian drawing room to the cottage of a peasant. Now that same Legislature is a stench in the nostrils of the whole world.

There are about seventeen gentlemen on this floor who were formerly members of the Legislature. Of course they passed through the furnace of that temptation without the smell of fire upon their garments. While they have no sympathy with crime, they must naturally be anxious to make the best defence they can, for the reputation of that body to which they once belonged. But instead of a defence, all they can do is to hang their heads and acknowledge, with shame and sorrow, that the accusations are true.

The cry against this corruption comes up, not only from every part of this House, but from every quarter of the Commonwealth. It is borne to us on the wings of every wind. In his speech of this morning, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) acknowledged that the universal demand for a reform of these abuses had brought this Convention together, and without that it never would have been called. Nor is it a mere popular clamor. It is founded upon incontestible facts which have passed into the domain of history, and will stand there forever.

As long ago as 1836, the Bank of the United States pushed its charter through the Legislature, partly by direct bribery and partly by a base combination of private interests, which were openly and shamelessly avowed upon the face of the bill itself. The speculation exploded in the course of a short time; but it scattered destruction everywhere, and brought desolation to a thousand firesides. It disgraced the character of the State; destroyed her credit; reduced her public securities to forty cents on the dollar; branded her with repudiation, and made her name a hissing by-word among all the nations. The perpetrators of that atrocious outrage were never called to any account, and their impunity was an invitation to all others to go and do likewise. For years afterwards, the other banks, combining themselves together, corrupted the Legislature and robbed the public according to the statutes in such case made and provided.

In process of time another class of corporations grew up, composed of more adventurous men with larger capital and with a more plausible claim to public favor.

I think that everybody who has looked at the history of our railroad system will admit that in its original organization it was intended for good and proper purposes. It promised necessary improvements which could not have been made in any other way. One of them, organized to make a road from Harrisburg to Pittsburg, undertook the duty under a charter, every part of which is marked with cautious wisdom. If that company had been kept within the limits originally assigned to it, its career must have been entirely beneficent. But its organization gave it an influence upon the Legislature which it used unsparingly. It swallowed up nearly all the property that the State ever had. It took it substantially as a gift; the five or six millions it paid was no consideration for the fifty or sixty millions it got. But that is not all; the gift of this immense domain was followed by a surrender, upon the part of the Commonwealth, of her right to collect her own revenue, amounting to millions more, and which belonged to her as much as the purse in your pocket belongs to you.

Mr. CUYLER. My friend alludes to the repeal of the tonnage tax.

Mr. BLACK. I do; the learned gentleman understands me rightly. I refer to that fatal, that perfidious statute which the Legislature, the lobby and the railroad company conspired to pass, disarming the State of her just right to collect the duty, which was her own, of three mills upon each ton of produce carried. It was a terrible wrong; for it ground the face of labor to pour a great stream of wealth into the imperial treasury of a corporation which had no claim of right to it. By such dereliction of duty on the part of the Legislature, that corporation has grown so mighty that its little finger is thicker than the loins of the Commonwealth which created it. I do not say that it bestrides your narrow State like a Colossus, for the ancient Colossus of Rhodes was but the image of a pigmy in comparison to this Colossus of railroads. Her stride is across the continent from ocean to ocean. Her head is in the clouds and the arms of her gigantic power stretch out on either side from one horizon to the other.

I hope my very good and most amiable friend from the city (Mr. Cuyler) will take no exception to what I am saying. I would fain speak no evil, either of him or his clients. I know that he never tampered with the Legislature and never advised anybody else to do so. On his brow such a shame as that would be a shame to sit. Nor am I complaining of the corporators themselves. I will take it for granted, if he asserts it, that there is not a man belonging to the Pennsylvania railroad that would not run away from any proposition to make money for it or by it.

He may say, if he pleases, that they have impoverished themselves by going about to do good for the public, or that if they have a little more than their share of wealth, it has been thrust upon them against their will. But this I do say, that the several Legislatures which have stripped me and my fellow-citizens of our just rights, to clothe this corporation with imperial power were treacherous to their duty and basely unfaithful to their high trusts.

Other corporations have powers similarly bestowed and nearly as great. Four of them have had the advantage of the loose legislation at Harrisburg, so as to secure monopolies a thousand fold more oppressive than that which made the name of Sir Giles over-reach infamous in the dramatic literature of England. What was the exclusive privilege of selling sweet wines in the reign of Elizabeth compared to the power which puts its own price upon every basketful of anthracite coal that is consumed in a country like this?

All of the companies represented in this body—nay, my friend on the left (Mr. Gowan) need not protest. I do not say that the Reading railroad is represented here. He represents the same constituent body that I do; he is as faithful as I am; and we are both as true as steel. But I have some idea that my learned friend on the right (Mr. Cuyler) is, or was once connected—most honorably of course—with the Pennsylvania railroad as counsel.

MR. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I beg leave to remind my learned friend that I have had his assistance in that capacity.

MR. BLACK. True; those gentlemen, or some of them, have been my clients, and I desire to speak respectfully of them for that reason, if for no other. They have been, and they probably will be again, when they have a perfectly good and just case and want a thoroughly honest lawyer. [Laughter and applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, the unfaithfulness of the Legislature is the subject with which we are dealing. Let us pass to another point in the arraignment. After the corporators were through with her she had left to her about nine million dollars—the remnant of a once magnificent fortune. That sum was deposited in what was called the sinking fund. It was placed there with special care. It was hedged around with constitutional interdicts. It was declared with the utmost solemnity in the fundamental law itself that it should be applied to no other purpose than the payment of the public debt. Yet a combination of private interests was organized to rob the State of this last residuum. A ring was formed; the Legislature and the lobby gave it their united sanction; they dived into the sinking fund and came up with the nine millions in their hands. The grab was nearly successful; it was defeated only by the interposition of the Governor's veto.

These are only a few of the instances in which the Legislature has proved treacherous. I have not mentioned one in a hundred. Nor have I selected the worst cases. Let any gentleman who wants fuller information look at the two papers made by Mr. Jordan, the late Secretary.

The whole system, according to his description of it, is saturated with corruption from the crown to the toe. It has gone so far that the veto power is utterly incapable of stopping it. He declares that if the Governor would try to stop it, combinations would be made against him, and render him as powerless as the driver of a runaway team after his reins are broken.

But there is one fact stated by him, which will astound you when it is mentioned. He says that the office of Treasurer is the most lucrative in the State. Its profits must, therefore, exceed the enormous sums received by the officers of the State House row in this city. This, he says, induces a regular scramble for the treasurership on the first week of every session; and then he adds that the votes which elect the Treasurer are notoriously bought by the successful candidate. The significance of that simple statement of the Secretary will hardly be understood without a little reflection. Remember that the Treasurer is paid by a fixed salary.

MR. HOWARD. Five thousand dollars per annum.

MR. BLACK. No man holding that office can, by any possibility, make out of it one cent beyond the $5,000 allowed him by law, without being guilty of some act as dishonest as the plainest stealing that ever was done by a common thief. Yet, somehow, the Treasurer of the State gets off from his office enough to buy up a majority of the Legislature, and after making all the deductions necessary for his re-imbursement of that expense, there is enough left in his own pocket to enrich him beyond any other officer. These things, mind you, are not all done at once. The Treasurer does not take all of this sum at one grab; nor does he buy up the members by wholesale. He has to make a separate bargain with each individual. If you could suppose one of these Treasurers to be convicted of every distinct offence that he has been guilty of in a year, and then suppose him to be sentenced according to law, upon each conviction, what would become of him? At the most moderate calculation you can make, it would take him at least fifteen hundred years to serve his time out in the penitentiary, [laughter,] and for a portion of that period he would be accompanied by a majority of the members of the Legislature. [More laughter.] These are the men that are entrusted with the collection and expenditure of all your revenue, with the control of all your public affairs, and with the power which gives or withholds security to your lives and property.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not know that we ought to blame the members of the Legislature too severely. Something ought to be allowed for the temptations with which they are surrounded. They walk among snares, and pit-falls, and man-traps. In fact they do not represent us. We are not governed by the men we send there. Our masters are the members of the lobby. They are organized into a third House, whose power is overshadowing and omnipotent. They propose the laws that suit themselves, and the interested parties who send them there. The other Houses simply register their decrees. That our rights and liberties should be in such hands is disgusting in the extreme, for they are generally the most loathsome miscreants on the face of the earth.

My friend from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) spoke of legislation under the figure of a stream, which, he said, ought always to flow with crystal water. It is true that the Legislature is the fountain from which the current of our social and political life must run, or we must bear no life; but as it now is, we keep it merely as "a cistern for foul toads to knot and gender in." He has described the tree of liberty, as his poetic fancy sees it, in the good time coming, when weary men shall rest under its shade, and singing birds shall inhabit its branches and make most agreeable music. But what is the condition of that tree now? Weary men do, indeed, rest under it, but they rest in their unrest, and the longer they remain there the more weary they become. And the birds—it is not the wood-lark, nor the thrush, nor the nightingale, nor any of the musical tribe that inhabit the branches of our tree. The foulest birds that wing the air have made it their roosting place, and their obscene droppings cover all the plains about them;—the kite, with his beak always sharpened for some cruel repast; the vulture, ever ready to stoop upon his prey; the buzzard, digesting his filthy meal and watching for the moment when he can gorge himself again upon the prostrate carcass of the Commonwealth. And the raven is hoarse that sits there croaking despair to all who approach for any clean or honest purpose.

Mr. Chairman, this state of things cannot go on without bringing us to utter destruction. It is getting worse and worse, and our institutions must utterly perish if we do not stop this mischief. We may preserve the forms of republican government, but the substance will pass away and with it will depart all that is perfect in politics, all that is pure in morals, all that makes life, liberty and property secure; all that makes existence in a free country worth having.

Shall we stand by and see this prodigious ruin rushing down upon us without an effort to arrest it. No surely not. But seeing that we are sent here for the very purpose of stopping it, we will perform our duty, and, with the help of the living God, we will succeed in our mission. We will deliver our good old Commonwealth from the body of this death.

But how shall that end be accomplished? I admit that it is possible to answer this question in different ways, when we come to the details of the remedy. But the common sense and common honesty of the people as represented here will make us unanimous at least on this; that the remedy shall be efficient, radical, thorough and complete. We will not insult our constituents by offering them mere palliatives for the hideous malady with which they are afflicted. They know and we know that this is not a case for the quackery of half-hearted measures. We must cut the cancer out. A surgical operation on a vital part of the body, if it be not entirely successful, always hastens the death of the patient.

I am thoroughly persuaded that there is some fatal defect in our American system of legislation. It has failed ignominiously wherever it has been tried. It is not only here in Pennsylvania that we have rotten representatives and dishonest legislation. The same evil is found in the other States. It exists in its worst form and operates on its grandest scale in the Legislature of the Union. What is the cause?

The President of this Convention (Mr. Meredith) struck the point when, speaking of the misconduct of members of the Legislature, he said that it was because they were not responsible and nobody was responsible for them. Washington said long ago that irresponsible power could never be safely trusted in human hands. By irresponsible power I mean power which may be abused without calling down any punishment upon the heads of those who commit it. In this respect all our Constitutions are anomalous. They are a series of commands without any sanction to enforce them. This is particularly and emphatically true with regard to those who execute the supreme power of making your laws. You trust the members of your Legislature implicitly. The framers of the federal Constitution, who were imitated in all the States, seem to have thought of legislative corruption as the Spartans did of parricide, that it was an impossible crime. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Fletcher vs. Peck, influenced by this delusion because it was embodied in the Constitution, declared that they did not believe in the corruption of a State Legislature, though it was incontestibly proved, admitted by the parties, and found to be true by a special verdict in the very case before them. Now, if anything is established by all human experience it is that no rule of action, no law, no commandment will ever be observed by men who can promote their interests or gratify their passions by breaking it, unless they are deterred by the fear of retributive justice. If you desire men to do right you must punish them for doing wrong. This may seem like a low view of human nature, but we cannot help it; we are as we are made. Men are not equal to angels, and even the angels fell. In all cases every rule of conduct is coupled with a penalty for its violation;—that is in all but ours, and it is true of ours in all except the fundamental and most important part of it. This is also the principle which runs through the divine law. Almighty God, who created the heart of man, understood the impulses which would govern it, and he annexed a sanction to every one of his commandments. There is no brutum fulmen in the Bible. The first law that ever was made for the regulation of human conduct is, in this respect, the model upon which every other has been framed: "On the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." And if Satan had not managed to convince our first parents that the penalty would not be inflicted, the fruit of the forbidden tree would never have been tasted.

Can there be any reasonable doubt that corruption reigns in the Legislatures of all the States and in Congress, for the reason that it can be practiced with perfect impunity? Can you or do you expect any thing else from a body of men whom you surround with temptations of every kind to lure them into crime at the same time that you tell them they shall suffer nothing if they commit it? Such a system can not and it will not come to good. You might as well hope to gather grapes from thorns or figs from thistles.

In deciding upon the nature of the punishment which these great criminals ought to suffer, we must not consult our blood but our judgment. Our new laws must have no ex post facto operation, and the penalties, though certain, must be moderate even for future offences. No sentiment of vengeance must seek its gratification here. If the honest citizens of the State who have been so basely betrayed by these miscreants would obey the impulse of their natural indignation, and had infinite power to work their will upon them, they would set them upon the remotest battlement of God's creation—far out upon the borders of chaos and old night—and then lash them naked around the circumference of the universe through all eternity. But human punishment can be inflicted only for the purpose of defending society; all beyond that must be left in the hands of divine justice: "Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord; I will repay."

We must look, therefore, to see by what means we can prevent these crimes, and confine ourselves solely to defensive measures. While we should avoid that kind of mercy to the guilty which is cruelty to the innocent, we must not lay a hostile finger on the most atrocious criminal, except in so far as that may be necessary to reform him or to deter others. To do even that would not be either wise or just, unless we accompany it by some regulation which will relieve them from the temptations to which they are now exposed. It would not be fair to surround members of the Legislature with snares set for their virtue and then punish them when they lose it. Let us weaken the motives to evil at the same time that we strengthen those which impel towards right. So may the preponderance always be on the proper side of the scale.

I will now enumerate the measures in which we propose to embody these vital reforms. I hope the Convention will believe as I do, that if adopted they may save us from the greatest of all public calamities, and at the same time give no trouble or even inconvenience to any honest and upright man whether in or out of the Legislature.

I. Confine the power of the Legislature within limits as narrow as possible consistently with a proper regulation of our affairs. This cannot be done to any great extent. A free people must have legislation, and the freer they are the more they need it, for there can be no liberty without law. The various opinions and diversified interests of such a people as are ours, multiply the laws that are necessary for their government. After limiting the power of the Legislature as much as you can, you must still leave it in possession of a great deal. Indeed you can scarcely diminish it in any perceptible degree; and what is left in its hands is liable to be as frightfully abused, as if none was taken away.

II. Prescribe certain forms of proceeding which will insure deliberation and publicity. I need not specify these forms. You find them in the report. They require a bill to be reported by a committee, and then read through and through, not once or twice, but three times in each House; the final vote to be taken by yeas and nays, and recorded; each bill to have but one object, and that expressed in its title; every law to be preceded by a preamble, expressing the reasons of the Legislature for assenting to it; the final passage of the law to be concurred in by a majority of members elected to both Houses, and after passage, the title of it to be publicly read immediately before it is signed by the Speaker. These forms will do much to prevent hasty and thoughtless legislation, and make it much more difficult than it is now for members to commit frauds upon one another by clandestinely procuring the passage of bills which a majority do not consent to. But they will not throw any serious impediment in the way of injurious legislation to which a majority of the members can be induced to consent. The most iniquitous laws we are cursed with have been passed without resort to the tricks which these forms are intended to prevent. Corrupt combinations are made every day which carry a majority, with their eyes wide open, through all frauds, and as Secretary Jordan tells us, strong enough to break down the Executive, armed though it be with the veto. While, therefore, these provisions are salutary and desirable, they are not sufficient of themselves to save us. I proceed to show what more seems to be necessary.

III. Define bribery so as to include all sorts of corruption. When a member is to be corrupted, he is not in one case out of a hundred offered money in the plain form of a quid pro quo. Almost never is a contract made in words that the vote shall be sold for a certain price paid down as promised. The money is presented as a gracious gift or as a testimonial of the donor's affection—it is slipped into the pocket of the member without a word, or it is placed under his pillow, where he finds it. Most commonly the object is reached by a wider circum bendibus. The member is employed as attorney for the party interested in his vote, and the bribe comes in the shape of a fee for other services. It is not at all unusual for members who are considered respectable to let themselves be bought in this way. Still oftener the end is accomplished by giving the member an interest in the subject matter, whose value is to be affected by his vote. The stock of a corporation is distributed "where it will do most good," or the member is taken as a partner, into some speculation which he is to promote by procuring legislation. In a thousand ingenious ways it may be made his private interest to disregard his public duty. All these ways are equally corrupt, and the people owe it to themselves to stop them.

IV. Extinguish the lobby at once and forever, by making all private solicitation of members by interested parties or their agents a criminal offence. This is so obviously proper and right that it can hardly be necessary to vindicate it. The hirelings of corruption have organized themselves into a "third house," they have usurped the power which the Constitution gives to the other two; they exercise the supreme legislative authority of the State; the Senate and House of Representatives are degraded into their mere tools, and I repeat that they are the most loathsome wretches that are suffered to live in the world. All men agree to this as a matter of fact. Nobody doubts the omnipotent power of the "third house" or the evil purposes for which it is used, nor has any one ever suggested the least possible good that can result from its continued existence. The total abolition of this "third house" is demanded not only to secure the weak from temptation, but as a measure of protection to the strong and upright from insult and annoyance. By adopting it you purify the Legislature instantly and restore the honor of your government; for there never has been any bribery, corruption, or other improper influence which did not come privately and secretly in that way. Let no man say that we desire to cut off communication between the Representative and his constituents. All public means of expressing his opinions and wishes are to be left open; the right of petition shall be as sacred as ever; the privilege of being openly heard before committee shall be carefully secured; the right of the people to assemble and speak their will, or to discuss their affairs through the press shall not be denied. The Representative ought to be controlled in some measure at least by an enlightened public opinion, but it is not necessary for that purpose that he should open his ear to the insulting whispers of the miscreants who now dog him up and down the board-walk, and follow him to his lodgings, and stand behind his chair when he votes.

V. Make all fraudulent acts of the Legislature void. As the law is now held by all the courts a legislative grant, whether of money, lands or privileges, is sacred and inviolable, no matter how clearly you can prove that it was obtained by fraud, deception or bribery. This doctrine was established seventy years ago by the Supreme Court of the United States in Fletcher vs. Peck. The case itself was a fraud; it was made up at Boston by two men who lived in Tennessee, both of them having the same interest in the same fraudulent grant, and the counsel who pretended to argue it was employed and paid to give the cause away. This is not publicly known, but I assert it on the authority of Judge Catron, who knew the parties well, and was often told by both of them that the case was a sham, and the judgment collusive. The principle apparently decided by it is not found in the common law, and is directly in conflict with common sense and plain justice. It violates all the analogies of our jurisprudence. Not only private grants but judicial decrees and executive concessions are pronounced mere nullities, when brought into contact with any kind of corruption. Yet the grossest fraud upon the public or upon individuals when committed by or through the Legislature is consecrated and protected. It has wrought intolerable mischief. It gives infinite encouragement to the worst form of public immorality. It shelters every villain of a certain class who can get away with his booty; and stifles inquiry into the worst wrongs by making it practically useless. If legislative acts were void from corruption, what man or what corporation would think it worth while to pay bribes? We can and ought to abolish this absurd and iniquitous principle. Let it be done with such reservations as will prevent any loss to innocent people, but let us cease to pay a premium for legislative rascality.

VI. Swear or affirm every member before he takes his seat that he will not only support but obey and defend the Constitution in all things. The oath to support it required by the federal Constitution, was intended as a mere test of political opinion, to exclude the enemies of the new government from office. To support does not mean to obey. You support the church when you rent a pew and pay the preacher, though you do not square your moral conduct by its precepts. But this preliminary oath being promissory in its nature, I do not think it just to make the subsequent violation of it punishable as perjury. Where it has been taken in good faith, with pure intent to keep it, a breach of the promise it expresses does not justify a charge of false swearing. That among other reasons makes it necessary that there should be another oath or affirmation upon which perjury can be assigned.

VII. Require every member at the close of his last session to render an account of his stewardship to his own constituents at home. Make him swear or affirm, specifically, that he has obeyed the Constitution, that he has not listened to private solicitation, or taken any bribe, or knowingly done any other act in his official capacity interdicted by the fundamental law. If his hands are clean he will be willing to show them. If they are not, and he declines to show them, the public can have no further need of his services, and he should not be eligible to the same or to any other office. The necessity of taking this last oath will effectually cut him off from all intercourse with known lobbyists, and free him completely from in-proper influences, for unless he is a moral monster, he will not do a thing with the preconceived determination to swear that he has not done it. I do devoutly believe that this measure, connected with the others proposed, will make our legislation as pure as it was in the days of William Penn.

In conclusion, let me call the attention of gentlemen to the resemblance between these provisions and those which prevail in analogous cases of a private nature. A member of the Legislature is charged with the administration with the most important trusts known among men. If any body should be held, and held hard, to his duty, it is he. Yet we only propose to enforce his obligations by the same means which we use against a private trustee. When an executor, administrator or guardian takes his duty upon him, you swear him to obey the laws. When he goes out you compel him to render an account, on oath, in which he specifies the particular acts he has done, and if he swears falsely, you indict him for perjury. And if he serves his own interests by making a contract in fraud of his cestui que trust you hold him to be void. Why should not the great trust of a legislator be subject to the same rules? Is it because you are willing the public trust shall be betrayed, but desire the private one to be honestly administered? This will hardly be the answer of those who oppose us. What it will be I know not.

MR. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I confess it is with considerable self-distrust that I rise to say a few words in answer to part of that which has fallen from the eloquent and distinguished gentleman (Mr. J. S. Black) who has just addressed this Convention. With much that he said I cordially agree. I listened with earnest sympathy to those brilliant and eloquent words in which he described the condition of the legislation of Pennsylvania, and I share with him in as earnest a hope as he can possibly indulge, for the application of efficient remedies for the ills we complain of. I confess, sir, that I have no hope of remedy in the direction of which the gentleman speaks, for I am profoundly convinced that a man who would take a bribe, whether that bribe were a money bribe, or that more insidious form of bribery than the use of money, which is more often employed, the man who would take a bribe in any form, would take the oath precedent and subsequent provided for by the amendment of the gentleman from Fayette, (Mr. Kaine,) as it has been read in your hearing, and thus calmly disregard it. It is not by oaths, it is not by promises, it is not by pledges, that dishonest men are to be made honest, or untruthful men are to be made truthful. We are to find our remedy, if at all, far back of all this, for unless we have a healthful public sentiment, and unless we have a healthful public action, consequent upon that public sentiment, we shall utterly fail to have any redress, unless we shall provide for purity in our elections, honest nominations, a fair expression through the ballot-box, we shall fail to find any remedy for the ills of which we complain; and if we cannot remedy those things, as I have said before upon this floor, it were better that we abandon our republican system of government and confess it a failure and substitute something else for it.

While I admit the danger, as I say I have no hope in the remedy in the direction to which the gentleman has pointed; not that I would condemn the oath required to be taken by the members of the Legislature before they take their seats; ancient usage and precedent, the custom of all the States and countries reasonably support the propriety of such an oath; but I am sorry to say that I am an utter unbeliever in the thought that gentlemen are afterwards influenced, as they should be, by that oath, and their action as members of the Legislature in any adequate degree controlled by it. If they go there as impure men; if they go there from impure motives and with impure purposes; that oath, nor the oath which is taken afterwards, will restrain them one step in that dishonest direction in which they have been induced to walk.

Now, sir, the learned and distinguished gentleman, alluding to me personally, acquitting me personally, of any participation in, or sympathy with any one of the wrongs he so eloquently condemns, nevertheless denounces interests which I am not ashamed to confess I have a strong sympathy with, and of which, in courts of justice, and in the community, I have been a recognised and not a regretful advocate.

I am not here to say that the great corporate interests of this Commonwealth have not influenced and induced legislation; but I am here to say that they have influenced and induced legislation only because it was necessary for them to protect themselves from the assaults which dishonest men made upon them, and from the efforts made in the Legislature to take away from them that which they lawfully possessed, or to prevent them from acquiring that which the interests of the Commonwealth demanded they should acquire; and I will be pardoned if, following the gentleman who has just addressed the committee, I advert very briefly and impulsively to a few thoughts which he has presented here, and which he has regarded as illustrative of the truth for which he is contending.

I understood the gentleman to say that the legislation which spoke into existence, in the first instance, the Pennsylvania Central railroad company, was wise and salutary legislation, but that much of the legislation which succeeded it was unwise and injurious. The great works of internal improvement of the Commonwealth had preceded the building of that road. The Commonwealth herself had founded her great lines of internal improvements in this State by legislation as early as the year 1836, but they had ceased—though nobly useful in their day and generation—to achieve the purpose for which they had been created. This usefulness, once great, had largely disappeared. Consisting of lines of railroad and canal, constructed in the infancy of the engineering art, once answering the purposes for which they were made. Coming now in competition with improved lines of railroad from the Atlantic cities and connected with the far west, they had ceased to be profitable to the Commonwealth or to the people of the State. Then it was that the Commonwealth, expressing—I wish I could say the unanimous—it ought to have been unanimous—expressing the almost unanimous sentiment of the people of the State, authorized the construction of the lines of the Pennsylvania Central railroad company, which lines were but a protraction of the road built by the Commonwealth, which extended from Philadelphia to Columbia, and Harrisburg to Pittsburg.

The Commonwealth—unwisely, as I think and shall presently show, indeed I am amazed at this late day that it should be necessary that I should say a word in support of such an idea—the Commonwealth, for the purpose of re-paying her own supposed loss upon her own lines of internal improvement, when she had authorized the construction of the road from Harrisburg to Pittsburg, imposed a tax of three mills per ton per mile upon all freight which should pass over the road. Now that was an unreasonable tax. It is always an unreasonable tax to impose a burthen upon your great lines of internal improvement, just as much as it is always an unreasonable tax to impose a burden upon your raw material which you propose to manufacture, or to impose a burden upon the implements and machinery and tools that you use in its process of manufacture.

It were just as sensible for one about to build a mill to construct his race to his mill, then put a dam across his race, as it is for the Commonwealth to construct or to authorize the construction of great lines of internal improvement and then burthen them with charges that sometimes paralyze and always diminish the usefulness of these great and useful public works. It is just as illogical and just as unreasonable for a miller to dam his race as it is for the Commonwealth to charge that burthen upon her great lines of internal improvement. Cheap transportation and unburthened improvements is the great policy of the State, the policy which more than any other develops State, gives value to her property, secures her citizens in the exercise of their individual rights and enables them to cover the whole Commonwealth with the grand fruitage of their labor.

But what was the result of all this? Why the result of all this was, that the Commonwealth gained more money than she ever earned before from the operation of her lines of internal improvement in the increased trade which poured over that portion of her works which extended from Harrisburg and Columbia to the city of Philadelphia, by reason of the protraction of these railways westward to Pittsburg. I mean to say simply this: I mean to say that the increased revenue from what was popularly known as the Columbia railroad, the increased revenue to the Commonwealth by reason of the protraction of that road from Harrisburg to Pittsburg exceeded in amount all that the Commonwealth had ever reaped in the highest days of her prosperity from her own lines of internal improvement. She was the gainer, largely a gainer, and more than that, Mr. Chairman, had it not been for the construction of that extended line from Harrisburg to the city of Pittsburg, the competition of railroad lines extending from New York, from Boston, from Baltimore and the seaboard would have dried up and destroyed utterly the whole trade of the public works except in so far as it had been a purely local trade.

But more than this. I speak, sir, with exact accuracy as to the general facts I state, but at this distance of time and called upon suddenly on the spur of the moment, to state what I do state I am unable to give the precise detail of figures. But I say, Mr. Chairman, that during the four or five years which preceded the year 1857, which was the date of the passage of what is known popularly as the main line acts, that the Commonwealth operated these works at a loss to her treasury at no time less than $1,000,000 per annum, and after a time approaching $2,000,000. These very public works, even after all the benefits accrued to the State from the increased transit over the Columbia railroad, were operated at a loss to the Commonwealth of from $1,000,000 to $2,000,000, and this loss was steadily increasing each successive year.

But again, sir, as I look at yonder vacant seat and to these walls, hung around with tokens of sorrow, I am saddened to feel that I cannot appeal to that excellent gentleman who once held office as one of the Canal Commissioners of the State, but who has departed from us forever—our late friend, Mr. Hopkins. But I do appeal to the elderly gentlemen of this Convention, who will sustain me in what I say, that no more frightful source of corruption, no more productive source of dishonesty, lack of integrity and general demoralization to the politics of Pennsylvania and the integrity of her people, than the control and possession of these great lines of public works ever existed in our Commonwealth. Gentlemen may talk here of the corruption of the Legislature. Gentlemen may speak of the condition to which we have been reduced there, but gentlemen who know how our lines of internal improvement in this State were operated prior to the year 1857, will be compelled to bear me witness of the truth of what I say, that the whole politics of the State of Pennsylvania was controlled, degenerated and demoralized by the possession of these very lines of public works.

What, then, Mr. Chairman, after all this demoralization?

Mr. J. S. BLACK. I deny that it is true. There may have been a few stealings here and there of small amounts, but it was nothing to the large robberies that have since occurred.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: Can it be possible that at this period in the history of the State of Pennsylvania, any gentleman should doubt that this demoralization existed?

Mr. J. S. BLACK. It is true!

Mr. CUYLER. Can it be possible that I should now be called upon to prove that the politics of this State were demoralized by the possession of these public works?

Mr. J. S. BLACK. No demoralization at all. They were an honor. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUYLER. I apprehend, sir, that my friend is speaking sarcastically. I do not suppose he is speaking seriously.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Not sarcastically at all.

Mr. CUYLER. Surely my friend cannot be serious. No man understands better than he that the records of this Commonwealth are burthened with the evidence of this demoralization.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Let us have them.

Mr. CUYLER. I can produce them here, and I will produce them. We all know that the records of the Legislature teemed with reports of investigating committees, who exhibited the dishonesty which prevailed in the administration of these works. The record of the truth of my statement is in the bosom of every surviving Pennsylvania statesman, a witness in the heart of every pure and honest man who hears me, who was old enough to comprehend passing events. While my friend denounces the operations of a great private corporation of immense aggregated capital, which is worked in the interests of its stockholders and is watched over and controlled by them, and says it is necessarily corrupt, will he undertake to say in the same breath that all the lines of public improvement, which were owned, controlled and managed by the politicians of a great State, are not, by the law of nature, necessarily corrupt? Could they be otherwise? If it be true that this private corporation degenerated into corruption such as the gentleman describes, can it be otherwise, then, that these works of the same character, which were administered by politicians elected for political purposes and operating these lines for political ends, did not necessarily degenerate into utter corruption?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: I did not make any accusation of corruption against the Pennsylvania railroad company, or any other railroad company. I did not intend to make any against the gentleman himself, or against his clients, nor against my clients, nor against anybody that expects to be my client. Nor do I propose that anything shall be taken away from them that they have already acquired. What is vested is vested, and what is writ is writ. But I hope, simply, that the gentleman will agree to promise now not to ask for any more privileges or more power than what they have already got, and that if they do get any more they must get it by other and different means altogether from that by which they have acquired that which they have already possessed. If he will leave us with the burdens that have been already fastened on our backs, and give us an honest Legislature for the future, this State is strong enough to walk away under these burdens like Sampson with the gates of Gaza on his shoulders. [Laughter.] But we object to being crushed down as fast as our strength grows, and to be pressed down so that we can never be able to walk away.

MR. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I have no clients here. I am not here as the representative of any corporation, or as the counsel of any company, but I am here as a member of this Constitutional Convention, not unmindful, I trust, of the obligation of the oath I have taken. I am prepared to say, and I am sure my friend who has just interrupted me, and who, by this time, ought to know me well, will endorse me when I say that the wealth of the Pennsylvania railroad company will not buy me on this floor to advocate anything which I did not sincerely believe. I think I know the gentlemen who administer the affairs of that corporation well enough to say that they will not venture to ask me, nor if they had the courage, would they desire to do so. It is not in the interest of any corporation; it is in the interest of truth, it is in the interest of justice, it is in the interest of fair dealing and in the interest of the people of this Commonwealth that I am here, although I cannot indulge much hope, sir, when a gentleman of the breadth of mind, the splendid culture and the masterly eloquence of my distinguished friend who has addressed you, is incapable of rising above these small prejudices and smaller feelings. I cannot hope that men of lesser growth and smaller stature will be able to do it.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have described the condition of things which existed in this Commonwealth in the year 1857, when the act for the sale of the main line was passed. I have described it as a condition of things in which the Commonwealth was losing steadily from one to two millions of dollars per annum; I believe a reference to the books of the Auditor General will sustain the truth of what I say; in which the Commonwealth was losing from one to two millions of dollars per annum by her public works, and was nursing in her bosom a serpent of the wickedest possible character and dimensions. And, however my learned friend may have denied what I say, I reiterate it, and I appeal to the convictions of gentlemen whose memory carries them back to that time, for the truth of my statement, when I say that the argument that mainly carried in the Legislature of this State the bill under which the public works of the State were afterwards sold, was the conviction of the honest public men of Pennsylvania, that the demoralization of the State which resulted from the administration of these works was an evil of transcendent magnitude, which grew hourly before their eyes. Then it was, Mr. Chairman, that in 1857, wisely, thoughtfully, and for the best interests of the Commonwealth, the State passed the main line act of 1857, and authorized the sale—not to the Pennsylvania railroad company—but authorized the sale at public auction to the highest bidder of the main line of her public works. They were put up at auction to the highest bidder. The whole Commonwealth, and the whole land were invited there to competition in that purchase. Corporate authority and power was provided in the body of the bill for any citizens of the Commonwealth, or elsewhere, who should desire to come in and buy this line of public works, in fair, honest competition, at public sale. And they were sold, and they were bought for seven millions and a half of dollars. Further, let me say that after a debate, most earnest and most protracted, as sagacious a man, as able a man, as honest a man, whose integrity is as pure as that of the driven snow, President Thompson, of the Pennsylvania railroad company, did record his vote, and it so stands upon the minutes of the board of directors against that purchase, as being against the sound policy of the company, because the price paid was far beyond its true value.

MR. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I move the gentleman from Philadelphia have leave to proceed without limit. Unanimous consent being given, Mr. Cuyler continued.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I am reminded by a gentleman who sits behind me of the fact, that Governor Pollock, then Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in his message to the Legislature, insisted that it were better for this Commonwealth to give away this line of public works than to hold them; better give them away to anybody who would take them, than that the State should continue to hold them with a loss of millions of dollars, and seas of political and financial corruption in their administration. Then it was that they were put up for sale. Then it was that they were bought, as I have said, and this Commonwealth, in consequence of that purchase, became the gainer.

First. By receiving seven millions and a half of dollars for that which not only was worthless to her, but was a positive sink and loss of money.

Secondly. By getting rid of demoralization, of which I have spoken; and

Thirdly. By the advantage of that great line of public improvement which has enabled this city and this Commonwealth to compete with the other cities and Commonwealths upon the Atlantic seaboard, in the transaction of the great business which extends and daily increases between the seaboard and the interior and western and southern parts of the country. What words of mine, what eloquence of the most accomplished orator of this or any other Convention—nay, can even the splendid utterances of my distinguished friend from York over-state, or adequately state in its fullness and power, the grandeur of the benefits which have thus accrued to this Commonwealth. So that it was from no selfish motive, but in the exercise of a wise and practical statesmanship upon the part of the Legislature of the State, co-operated with on the part of the railroad company, that at fair public sale, where the fullest and most lowest competition from the whole land was invited, that the Pennsylvania railroad company bought this great line of public works—bought it, charged with the tonnage tax, to which I have referred. "There," says my learned friend, (Mr. Black,) "was a stupendous instance of the vast iniquity which has attended the legislation of this Commonwealth, so far as the interests of that corporation are concerned." For whose benefit was the repeal of the tonnage tax? Here is a tax of three mills per ton per mile imposed upon freight carried from the interior—from the western part of the State to the seaboard. In other words, the farmer of Westmoreland county, the farmer of Allegheny county, the farmer of any of the western counties of the State had to pay a tax to get his grain to the seaboard, of three cents per bushel, or of ten cents per barrel, while the farmer of Bucks, or Berks, or Lancaster counties, or any of the counties nearer to the seaboard, got their grain to the seaboard either without the tax or at a price greatly diminished, by reason of their greater proximity to the seaboard than those who live in the western part of the State. So that the people of the Commonwealth, after all, had to pay this tax; and for what? That the Pennsylvania railroad company might get unreasonable compensation? Not at all.

The people of the western part of the State found that there was imposed on them a discriminating duty, or tax, as against their interests for the benefit of the man who lived near the seaboard. That was the foundation of the repeal of the tonnage tax. On what principle shall a farmer or a manufacturer, or any body else in the distant portions of the State, pay a tax upon his labor and his skill and his industry, while the man who lives here shall not be required to contribute his part equally and fairly? What mattered it to the Pennsylvania railroad company? It had but to impose this tax upon the freight that was carried over its line, and then pay it into the State Treasury. It was, therefore, but the collector of the tax for the State. Its private interests were not involved particularly by it. The repeal was little to them, but to the people of this Commonwealth it was an interest of transcendent value and importance.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him one moment?

Mr. CUYLER. Certainly.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Did the law which abolished the tonnage tax reduce the rates of fare proportionately, or at all?

Mr. CUYLER. Yes. The "commutation tonnage act" of 1881, in its third section, limited the company to the then tonnage tariff sheet, and made them deposit a copy of that sheet in the office of the Secretary of State—certainly in one of the public offices—and limited the charges of the company to the rates in that sheet—rates not to exceed those.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. That included the three mills?

Mr. CUYLER. I suppose it did.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Then they just went on making the same charges upon every thing going over the road, as they had before, and instead of putting the money into the treasury of the State, they put it into their own pockets?

Mr. CUYLER. The gentleman has no authority for saying that. The rates of charge by railroads are, I suppose, guided somewhat like the rates of charge of all other enterprises by the laws of trade and by competition. A private corporation, created to establish a line of internal improvement, must be operated in competition with other lines of internal improvement; and it cannot establish a rate of charge higher than that established by others, or it gets no business. It cannot establish rates that are unreasonably high, for that tends to the establishment of competing lines, just as unreasonable profit by a merchant or manufacturer induces the establishment of other like mercantile enterprises or like manufactories. In other words, the mistake which my friend makes—the point which he, in his great intellect, broad cultivation and noble statesmanship, fails to rise to, as might perhaps have been expected only from minds less than his, is that he does not perceive that the same laws of business and trade which govern private individuals—the private manufacturer and the private dealer—laws as eternal as those of truth and justice themselves—must of necessity apply also to private corporations. No merchant, or manufacturer, or corporation can long thrive who conducts his or its business without due regard to these laws, for just so true as there is a God, and God's laws are eternal—just so true is it that that individual or that corporation who does so must ultimately succumb if it persists in violating those laws.

I might add here, that I contended earnestly in the discharge of professional duty, with the grand assistance of the distinguished gentleman who presides over this Convention, and of that other great man who has departed—Mr. Stanton—in the courts of Pennsylvania, and would have done so at Washington, if necessary, that that tonnage tax was an unconstitutional tax—unconstitutional as being a burden upon the trade of other States which passed through our State; unconstitutional as of operating as an unequal burden upon the citizens of our own State—not a fair and equal tax. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, divided three to two, declared so to hold, but the Supreme Court of the United States, within the last three weeks, has so held. The Supreme Court of the United States then, had the Legislature not repealed the tonnage tax of 1861, would have held it unconstitutional and the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania would have lost by the decision of that court, the tax for which my distinguished friend (Mr. J. S. Black) so earnestly pleads before this Convention. But what more? This very act of 1861, distributes $800,000 among the various railroads of Pennsylvania, for the development of the trade and the resources of the State. The State got rid, first, of an unreasonable burden upon her own industry and her own commerce. She got rid, secondly, of that which it now appears, and was then contended to be, unconstitutional; finally, she developed her own internal resources grandly, by the establishment of additional lines of internal improvement, by which almost numberless millions have been added to the wealth and the resources of the State.

I will refer to a single other fact, because the distinguished gentleman himself (Mr. J. S. Black) alluded to it. He talks about a raid on the Sinking Fund. What does he mean? Why, he means that some nine millions of dollars worth of property, that was yielding to the State six per cent. revenue, and otherwise was dead, should be exchanged for other property which should rest on precisely the same foundation of safety and security to the State, while, instead of being dead, it should be vitalized and invigorated, and made a mighty engineery for the promotion of the wealth and prosperity of the State. He means that the State herself should not be the loser, if he puts the case fairly, as I have no doubt he intends to do, that the State herself should not be the loser one single fraction of the capital of this money, or of the security by which it was made safe to the State, and that the State, instead of locking up in her coffers these nine millions of money, should make them vital, and active, and vigorous in the development of the resources of the Commonwealth. It failed, not by "the salutary veto" of the Governor, for the veto of the Governor was singularly unwise and unjust; and did not my respect for the dead compel me to silence, I could prove here what I say.

I beg pardon of the Convention, however, for having been betrayed into saying so much as I have in response to that which fell, so unexpectedly to me, from the lips of the distinguished gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black.) I am not here as the advocate of the Pennsylvania railroad. I am here simply to express my amazement that at this period of the history of the State, a gentleman of the breadth of mind of that distinguished gentleman, should lament that these developments in the business and the prosperity of the Commonwealth, should have taken place. Why let him go back to the condition of things existing in 1857. Let him then contemplate this Commonwealth, growing to its present vast proportions, in wealth, prosperity and happiness through these very measures he condemns as moral, then where would Pennsylvania be? Her population, a million less than it is to-day; her wealth, but one-half what it is to-day. Instead of being the grand spectacle that the eyes of the world now gaze upon with delight and satisfaction by reason of the wisdom of her citizens, and the prosperity that their wise applications of capital have developed in this State, she would be far, very far, behind nearly half the States of this Union. I could not consent to be silent when an engine of such vast good to Pennsylvania, one whose vast resources, as I know, have been applied with so much wisdom and integrity, aye, sir, integrity, to the promotion of the best interests of this city and Commonwealth, was denounced, without at least uttering a word in its defence. It did not need it, however, not in this city of Philadelphia. I said, sir, integrity. I am not here to say, as I stated when opening, that there is no corruption practiced upon the Legislature by those great corporations, but I am here to say that the necessities upon these corporations to defend the rights and interests given to them, from plundering and from vicious hands, and the necessity that these corporations should grow with the growth of the country, and not within vigorous manhood, be clothed in the swaddling clothes of infancy. It is that necessity which has brought about this condition of things. The people of Pennsylvania, while they send many honest and many honorable men to their Legislature, send many men there, and I am sorry to say, some from Philadelphia, whose motives are just as base as the most eloquent words which my distinguished friend (Mr. J. S. Black) could possibly employ could describe.

It will not be until the people of Pennsylvania arrive at some method by which they can select honest legislators, and when they have selected them can secure their return to the Legislature, that we shall ever come to walk in the right path in this matter. Our remedy will not be by changing things only for the worse, not by taking men who are scoundrels and villains, and administering to them oaths of fidelity and expecting them to change their nature. Not by forgetting that the man who will take a bribe will take that oath as readily as he will take a bribe, or as he will, when hungry, take a meal. No, sir, you cannot make men honest by oaths. You must go farther back. I do not doubt the integrity of the people of Pennsylvania. I have belonged all my life long to that class in politics which recognizes the ultimate integrity and honesty of the people of the State. I do believe in their integrity. I do believe that if you can appeal to the heart and conscience and to the intelligence of the people of Pennsylvania, they would cleanse this cage of unclean birds more speedily than Hercules did the unclean stables. All we have to do is to make the people of Pennsylvania know and feel in their heart of hearts what the peril is that surrounds them, and my word for it, when they wake up to action it will be to realize the expression of my learned friend, (Mr. J. S. Black,) who likened it to the feat which Samson performed in walking off with the gates of Gaza upon his back. Sir, they will trample out of existence the men who are doing these things of which they complain. They will bring us back to the grand old days of this Commonwealth, and they will give us a Legislature that will not be a by-word and reproach to the whole country, a Legislature that will be filled with men of integrity, of honesty, of ability, and of character; men of whom the whole State and whole nation may well be proud.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman: I cannot sit quietly in my seat and listen to what has been said here to-day without raising my voice to controvert some of the charges that have been made by gentlemen who have participated in this discussion. One gentleman, after looking around this Convention and seeing that our old friend, Col. Hopkins, has gone from us to return no more, concluded that there was nobody else here that would say anything in defence of the Canal Board. The "inevitable Mott," as the venerable President of this Convention once called me, is here, however, and will answer for himself, in so far as he was connected with that board.

Now, sir, in the first place, the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) is very much mistaken when he says that at the time the improvements were sold the State was losing from one to two millions of dollars a year by the management of its public works. Such was not the case, and the statistics will show that the gentleman made a misstatement.

I will give the Convention a little of the history of those times, and of the transaction referred to. I then had the honor to be a member of the Canal Board. I was elected in 1854, and took my seat in the board in 1855. I found, when I got there, that the Pennsylvania railroad had bought off the two firms which did most of the transporting upon the main line of the public improvements, and that in consequence, we were left with greatly diminished means for transportation upon them. Of the owners of the two lines referred to, one was appointed agent for the region east of Philadelphia, to get freights for the Pennsylvania railroad company upon their lines, and the other was appointed to a similar position west of Pittsburg. The first year that I was in the Canal Board, in consequence of having no power ourselves under the law to supply means of transportation, and having to depend entirely upon legislation, we could do nothing, and when we called upon gentlemen who we supposed were able and willing to take hold of, and provide the necessary furniture and fixtures for transportation, we were told by them that it would not be safe for them to do that, because the agents of the Pennsylvania railroad were constantly agitating the sale of the improvements, and perhaps they would be sold out and then those furnishing means of transportation would be left with a large stock on hand. Therefore, the first year, the main line did not pay what it should have done. It is true that the Philadelphia and Columbia division paid as much, if not more than it had paid before, because the Pennsylvania railroad was throwing its freight upon it in addition to that supplied by the public improvements belonging to the State.

Such were some of the difficulties we had to encounter during the first year of my management in consequence of the movements of this anaconda, which wound its coils about public interests at that early day. What was expected came to pass sure enough. The next winter application was made, and a bill was introduced for the sale of the improvements. This virtuous Pennsylvania company had "nothing to do with it." Certainly not. Mr. Thomson certainly could not have had, for "he voted against the purchase," if we are to believe what the gentleman tells us. Well, that is all very well for buncombe. I, as President of the Canal Board, instituted a proceeding in the Supreme Court for an injunction against the purchase of the public works by the Pennsylvania railroad company, and I think the question raised was argued and defended pretty ably by the employees of Mr. Thomson and his Pennsylvania company. It resulted, however, in the court declaring that the lines might be sold, but that the Legislature should not transfer the tonnage tax and the right of taxation with the sale. In that manner and by their own action the managers of the Pennsylvania company thus reduced the value of the improvements belonging to the State. In the bill of sale they were authorized to abandon certain sections of the canals, which we had been obliged to keep up at a considerable expense and loss.

In the publication made by the Board of Canal Commissioners, just before the sale was consummated, we showed very clearly that if the Legislature had allowed or empowered us to do what they empowered the Pennsylvania railroad company to do, we could make the public improvements pay an interest on fifteen millions of dollars instead of on seven and a half millions only. We could have done this beyond a doubt. Gentlemen need not tell me that there were not corrupt means made use of in that transaction. I know something about that. I know some of the "boys" that got the corruption money, [laughter,] but I am not going to "peach" on them, [laughter,] because I am not a public "inform-er." I know very well when the question of that tonnage tax repeal came up, that the agents of the Pennsylvania company did try to defeat me by sending a man up to my district with from three to five thousand dollars to render my nomination for the State Senate impossible. They knew, sir, that "Inevitable Mott" would be on hand to help defeat the tonnage tax repeal bill, and he was there. I was not offered money myself, but my wife was offered $25,000 to "influence" me to vote for that repeal, and $13,000 to secure my vote for giving the rest of the works away to these fellows up the river here, [laughter,] but she had spunk enough to say to the would-be bribers: "No! we are poor, very poor; but," said she, "I have always traveled with Henry with his head up, and he cannot go back to his county and mine with that sort of money in his pocket." [Laughter.] These, sir, are facts. So it is of no use for gentlemen to talk to me about the "virtue" of this Pennsylvania railroad company. But I expect I have said enough.

["Go on! Go on!"]

Well, all I have to say is, that I have nothing against the Pennsylvania railroad company. I had hoped that that whole thing had been forgotten. I did not expect to have to defend the Canal Board in this Convention, neither do I care specially to do it, having been myself a member of it. There is one thing, however, that I can say of it: I went into that board with such men as William Hopkins and Thomas H. Forsyth, and I went out of it with Arnold Plummer and George Scott; and I do not believe there were four more honorable men than they to be found in the State of Pennsylvania. During the time that I was Canal Commissioner there was not a dollar of defalcation among any of the collecting or disbursing agents, or others connected with the large fund involved in the operation of the public works. There never was an investigation into the conduct of any member of the Canal Board in the history of this State; but I do remember, and would remind the gentleman from Philadelphia, that there was an investigation ordered to be made into the means employed to secure the repeal of the tonnage tax, and that a certain official of this virtuous Pennsylvania company fled the State, and remained absent for months to escape that investigation. [Laughter.] And yet we are to be told, on this floor, that the members of the Canal Board were a "corrupt" set of scoundrels, engaged in corrupting the politics and morals of the State. Let me tell gentlemen that we were no such thing. On the contrary, sir—and with this remark I will close what I have to say on this subject—we served the people of Pennsylvania as faithfully as men could do, and as efficiently as was possible under the circumstances, taking into account the fact that we were impeded and hindered by this hydra-headed monster, the Pennsylvania railroad company, [laughter,] which was ever surrounding us on every side with open jaws. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I desire to offer, as an amendment to the amendment now offered, the two sections reported by the Committee on the Legislature, and numbered in the report of that committee as paragraphs ten and eleven. They are as follows:

Tenth. Every member of the General Assembly, before he enters upon his official duties, shall take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of Pennsylvania, and will faithfully discharge the duties of Senator (or Representative) according to the best of my ability; and I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have not paid or contributed anything, or made any promise in the nature of a bribe, to corrupt or influence, directly or indirectly, any vote at the election at which I was chosen to fill the said office, and I do further solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have not accepted or received, and that I will not accept or receive, directly or indirectly, any money or other valuable thing, from any corporation, company or person, for any vote or influence I may give or withhold on any bill, resolution or appropriation, or for any other official act.

Eleventh. The foregoing oath shall be administered by one of the judges of the Supreme Court, in the hall of the House to which the member is elected, and the Secretary of State shall read and file the oath subscribed by such member; any member who shall refuse to take said oath shall forfeit his office, and every member who shall be convicted of having sworn falsely to, or of having violated his said oath shall forfeit his office, and be disqualified thereafter from holding any office of profit or trust in this State.

The committee will remember that when this matter was before the Convention on a former occasion, it was postponed, at the instance of the gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) and of several other members, until we could have the alternative oaths to be reported, one by the Committee on Legislation, and one, possibly, by the Committee on Constitutional Sanctions. I assume that both these propositions are now before the committee, and in order that the entire subject may be brought before them, I have ventured to offer these paragraphs as an amendment to the amendment.

The gentlemen of the committee will understand the marked difference between the three propositions. The Committee on Legislation propose simply the present oath and an oath that the member has not been guilty of bribery to secure his own election, nothing more—nothing as to his discharge of his official duties, except the general oath that he will discharge them with fidelity. The gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black) or the gentleman from Fayette (Mr. Kaine) proposes to amend the section as reported by the committee, by providing an oath to be taken upon the final completion of the official labors of the Representative, in which he shall swear that he has not corruptly used his office, and that upon failure to take such an oath, or upon swearing falsely thereto, he shall be rendered ineligible for re-election. The Committee on the Legislature thought it wise to present an oath for your consideration, of a three-fold character, as I once before stated; first, the general oath of fidelity to the fundamental law of the nation and of the State, and the usual declaration of the discharge of the duties of the office with fidelity. Secondly, that he comes to the discharge of his duties with clean hands. Thirdly, God helping him, he will leave it with hands as clean. I have listened in vain for any reason why this oath should not be adopted.

It is a preliminary asseveration that up to that time he has not soiled his conscience, and a prayer for the help of God, through all his official labors to prevent him from soiling that conscience while he remains in office. It was suggested that such an oath was degrading. I trust that consideration has disappeared in view of the flood of light which this morning has been let in from every quarter of the house upon the great danger which menaces free institutions in America. We must be thankful that the morning has not been spent in vain, for there is a consensus of authority at last that American legislation is for sale to the highest bidder, and whoever born on our soil and claiming to be an American citizen can look that admission in the face and not be clothed with humiliation as with a garment, will vote against any proposition tending to correct the evil, but those of us who know that the evil exists, who recognize the truth of the unanimity of opinion expressed here this morning, and who will seek as with a lighted candle to find some remedy, at least some partial cure, for this terrible disease, this menacing peril, will, I think, agree to support a more stringent oath than has been reported by the Committee on Legislation. It does not seem to me that it is necessary to travel backwards to distribute a share of blame for our present sad condition greater in one corner than another. I hold, Mr. Chairman, that every member of this Convention—I admit frankly that I am in the number—is in his measure and place responsible for the evil that exists. On a former occasion I trespassed upon your time to state then that the corruption in our legislative borders was only one of the results, perhaps one of the inevitable results, of the era of material prosperity in which you live, and of the great works which have been constructed to develop that prosperity; and it does not seem to me so very important to go to yesterday or last week, or last month, or last year to ascertain what portion of blame attaches to this corporation, or to that individual. It is far more important, I think, that we should all admit to-day that the evil exists, and that we ourselves may fall the victims of this temptation to-morrow. As good men as any of us have fallen in the past, and we should endeavor to discover some antidote; we should endeavor to erect some barrier against its further spread.

It is enough to know that the broad statement of the gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black) is not only true of the Legislature of this State, but is true of the Legislature of almost every American State, and apparently of the National Government itself; that the men elected to frame your laws do not frame them, but that an infamous and corrupt lobby surround the Legislature, and controls its action for private advantage. Now, in some way we must put up barriers that will, if possible, be impassable between the lobby and the Legislature, at least we must do what we can in that direction. We must do what we can to make the profession of the lobbyists impossible, and if we do that we will do much to purify this fountain from which our evils flow.

Considering the average character of American representatives, I believe it must be useful to require these gentlemen at the threshold of their entrance upon official life, to swear that they will not entertain association with the lobby. Certainly that will go a little way. It can do no harm; it may do some good. Degrading to anybody? I beg gentlemen to believe there is no degradation for the proudest in the land, to stoop to the lowest service in order to help to save American liberty and American government, in these days of their trial, and unless some will help in this work they cannot be saved, and I trust, therefore, that we will at least go to the extent suggested. I do not know how the laws discussed this morning were passed. I do not know that corrupting influences were used or were not used. I do not know whether the Executive veto was interposed or withheld from improper consideration, but I know this, that the public interest is shamelessly disregarded, and that corruption stalks unabashed in your legislative halls throughout all the American States, and even in the National Capitol itself; and knowing that, I believe that the professional lobbyist is largely the instrument whereby the money is carried to the representative, and I will go "as far as the farthest" in any measures calculated to make that profession henceforth, in Pennsylvania, an impossibility; at least I will put up the barriers of self-respect, all the barriers of conscience between the legislator and the corrupting influences that assail him. I beg the committee to believe, the members are not corrupt to any very considerable numerical extent, when they first assemble at the legislative capitols. It is not true that the men selected to represent this State at Harrisburg are much worse, if any worse, than we are. They are fair, good honest men, from the country districts, known and respected by their neighbors, but they yield, in some instances, and that is only true of a majority, and perhaps not even of a majority, because very good men vote for bad measures for good purposes frequently, but it is sufficiently true to make the whole result a corrupt result, and therefore I do beg of this committee to consider whether it will not be useful to ask the legislator to take an oath before he enters upon his duty, that he will hold no relations with the lobby, that he will never wear their fetters or serve their ends. I do beg of gentlemen to consider, not whether many men will disregard their oaths, not whether, many men will swear falsely, but whether, taking the average farmer, taking the average artisan from the rural districts, whether this oath will not be an added strength to him against the day of his temptation? Will it not be likely to strike the average legislator as a help to him to resist the evil when it comes?

It is upon that ground, not that it will change the character of men, not that it will cause a paradise of purity and of innocence in legislation, but that it will be at least a little support for virtue and a little barrier against corruption, that I implore gentlemen of the committee to consider it with care, and to decide it as I know they will all desire to decide it, according to what, in their judgment, will be most conducive to the public good.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I hope the committee will pardon me for saying one word. It strikes me that the proposition now under consideration is exceedingly impractical, and I would be false to my judgment at this moment if I did not say so, and I am surprised at the intelligent gentlemen who have spoken upon the subject, seeking a remedy for an evil in such a movement. It is proposed to provide no member of the Legislature shall have his judgment bound by the decision of a caucus, and every member should be willing to swear that he will not before he enters upon the duties of his office. What does this assume; unquestionably without the oath, that every member of the Legislature—republican or democrat, or liberal, if there be such—is bound, notwithstanding his oath of office, under all circumstances to obey party dictation. I have too much respect for the independence and character of individual members of the Legislature, to assume that they will do so. I have had the honor, if it is an honor, of representing a constituency in the upper branch of the Legislature for nine years, and those who know me best know that there are none more decided in their political convictions in our Commonwealth than I, but sir, I have differed from my party, when we met for consultation, time and again. I voted against apportionment bills twice. Last winter I had the honor of assisting to defeat the Congressional apportionment bill, which was supported by a majority of the members of my own party.

Mr. KATNE. I ask the gentleman whether, if a matter in the Legislature had been agreed upon in caucus of which he was a member, he ever voted against the measure?

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I again say that I have refused to vote with my party more than once, when my party had resolved upon a certain course of action, after consultation.

Mr. KAINE. The gentleman is begging the question.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Let me state the case exactly. In common with my associates, I have gone into caucus, consulted about a particular measure, and if I have been satisfied that it was not a proper matter of caucus I would not stultify my judgment, by committing myself to the decision of the majority, and I have left the caucus, and so should any man who values his oath to perform his duty with fidelity above mere party ties. I care not what number of oaths he takes against caucus action, you may pile Pelion upon Ossa mountain high, and you will not affect a change in human nature in this respect. The independent man, the honest man, will always refuse party decisions, when his conscience and convictions prevent him agreeing with a majority of his colleagues. The legislator must not, and does not, always act as a partisan, but as the representative of a free people. Party obligations and decisions cannot hush the still, small voice of conscience. The proposition assumes a depravity in our political organizations insulting to the intelligence and virtue of the people. Sir, the proposition would weaken public confidence in the men you expect to occupy positions in your legislative assemblies. It supposes that after they have sworn to obey the Constitution of the State, and to perform their duty as Senators or Representatives with fidelity, they will disregard this solemn obligation, and rather heed the whisperings of the mere partisan, than vote under the convictions of their judgment and the control of their consciences. I will do no such violence and injustice to the representatives of the people. I am satisfied that this provision will result in no substantial good whatever, and I shall earnestly oppose its passage.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I am clearly of the opinion that the amendment, as offered by the chairman of the Committee on Legislature, (Mr. MacVeagh,) is a proper one, and that the sections which he recommends should be adopted by this Convention. I do not intend to occupy the time of the Convention in an argument in regard to the necessity of an oath. That has been gone into very fully by other gentlemen. But I do say that if we require an oath at all let it be iron-clad, and I do say that the oath as presented by the Committee on Legislature is a much stronger and a much more comprehensive one than the oath as prescribed by the Committee on Legislation. The Committee on Legislation, in their oath, say:

"I, A. B. do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States, and that as a member of the Legislature I will in all things support, obey and defend the Constitution of Pennsylvania, and discharge the duties of my office with fidelity. And I do furthermore swear, that I believe myself to be lawfully elected a member of this House, without any false return, bribery, corruption or fraud, committed by me or others with my consent."

I contend, sir, that that is open to objection; that it is not near as strong or nearly so comprehensive as the oath as presented by the Committee on Legislation:

"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of Pennsylvania, and will faithfully discharge the duties of Senator (or Representative) according to the best of my ability; and I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have not paid or contributed anything, or made any promise in the nature of a bribe, to corrupt or influence, directly or indirectly, any vote at the election at which I was chosen to fill said office; and I do further solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have not accepted or received, and that I will not accept or receive, directly or indirectly, any money or other valuable thing from any corporation, company or person, for any vote or influence I may give or withhold on any bill, resolution or appropriation, or for any other official act."

I will admit all that the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) has said in regard to the uselessness of dishonest men taking oaths. I do say that if a man be corrupt and dishonest, oaths may be of little or no use in his case; but, notwithstanding that, I see a value in this section which has not been alluded to in the course of this discussion. It is this: That if a dishonest man shall run for office, and it can be proven upon him that he is guilty of bribery, he by this amendment will lose his place; he is declared unfit for the office and he entirely forfeits it. I can see clearly that in the case of two men running for the same office, one of the men honest and the other corrupt, both having full knowledge of this oath and this section as law, the honest man can and will watch the rascal, and he will endeavor to detect anything like a bribe, and will make sure of his information and keep it to himself until the proper time comes; and when this dishonest man shall come to the Legislature and show his credentials and shall demand to be sworn in, the honest man can show at once that this man, by his own act, has forfeited and cannot hold the office which he seeks to fill. Here I see the value of this provision—not in the fact that it will in any way make a dishonest man honest—but that the honest man who is running against a dishonest man, or any good citizen, anxious to see the law properly carried out and the purity of the elections maintained, may go up and show that this man was guilty of bribery, and is, therefore, excluded from his seat. There is a point in which, it seems to me, there is very much force in this oath; and I doubt very much whether so much force as that could be secured from the oath submitted in the report of the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I am prepared to vote for the double oath of my friend from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) and if that fails to pass, for the lesser oath of the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) and, in the last resort, for the oath submitted by the Committee on Legislation.

This body, in its very best aspect, is an educational body. It may be true, as the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) asserts, that you cannot reform these old hard-headed sinners by any oath you can lay upon their consciences; it may be true that a man who will take a bribe will take a false oath; but, sir, we have some men growing up in Pennsylvania to be the future legislators, and if you place before them these solemn oaths, as conditions upon which they are to take their seats in the Legislature, and a duty which they are to perform after they have come out of the Legislature, you will, in the process of years, rear up a body of legislators whom you can trust; for the young men who are growing up to be our future rulers, with these oaths staring them in the face, will be admonished that they must be honest in politics; that politics is not a fair business for plunder and bribery and all manner of corruption, which is now the prevalent opinion in Pennsylvania.

You place before the rising generation a better sentiment—you force it upon their attention. Thus while you may not reform any of our present legislators by your oaths, I maintain that you will most certainly provide the State with future legislators of a better quality by virtue of these very oaths. This thought has been weighing upon my mind, and has inclined me to vote first for the oath proposed by the gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black.) I hope it will be adopted, and whatever influence it may have upon existing politicians, be it much or little, I am sure the influence will be salutary upon those who are to come after the present race of politicians.

If the committee is not prepared for so strong a measure, take the proposition of the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh.) He does not propose a subsequent oath.

I am going to vote for these oaths, and in the order I have named—not that I have any Quixotic expectation that they are going to make base men honest now, but in the reasonable, religious and holy hope that they will make men honest in the future.

I do not enter into the struggle of the giants to which we have listened this morning. I leave this part of the discussion exactly where they have left it. When it becomes necessary for us as a body to decide upon these questions, I shall have something to say before I am prepared to cast a vote. But, for the present, I have nothing to say more than to thank the gentlemen for the argument which they have given us this morning.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: I understand that the first section of the committee's report was proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Fayette, (Mr. Kaine,) by adding this requirement for the oath to be taken after the member goes out. Then the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) proposed to substitute the oath reported by the Committee on Legislature for the oath that is in the report under consideration. Now what I desire to know is this: Have we before us now simply the question between the two oaths proposed by the two committees?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the position of the question. The gentleman from Fayette (Mr. Kaine) moved to amend, by adding at the end of the section an amendment, which was read by the Clerk. The gentleman from Dauphin

(Mr. MacVeagh) moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the amendment of the gentleman from Fayette (Mr. Kaine) and inserting his amendment. If the amendment of the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) should be carried, it will be an amendment added to the end of the section, which will then open the entire section, as amended, to further amendment on the part of the Convention.

Mr. Kaine. If the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) will withdraw his amendment, I will then withdraw mine, to enable the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) to offer his amendment as a substitute for the report of the committee.

Mr. MacVeagh. Mr. Chairman: I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. Kaine. Mr. Chairman: I withdraw my amendment also.

Mr. MacVeagh. I now renew my amendment in the shape of a substitute to the section.

Mr. Cuyler. Mr. Chairman: Is a further amendment to the amendment in order?

The Chairman. An amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. Cuyler. I was preparing to amend the section itself, by adding after the word "fidelity," the words "and that I will not submit my individual judgment or action to the decision or control of any caucus or combination of the members of the Legislature."

The Chairman. That cannot be received at this time as an amendment to the section, but it is competent to receive it as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Cuyler. Then I move to add it as an amendment to the amendment. Now, half a dozen words in support of his amendment of mine.

It must be entirely practicable for not more than one-fourth of either House of the Legislature to control the legislation of the entire body, and to bring the people of the State to that condition where, although they are entitled to the deliberate thought and action of the entire body, they will have to submit to the action of only a fourth of the body. If we suppose the House to consist of one hundred members, and the dominant party to have fifty-one of these, of which fifty-one a majority will be twenty-six, these twenty-six can, by means of caucus regulations, control the legislation of the whole State.

That the ill exists no one can doubt; that the remedy proposed here is not as effectual as could be desired is to be confessed, but, after some reflection, my mind has not suggested to me any other mode of arriving at the difficulty.

Mr. Buckalew. Mr. Chairman: I will favor and vote for that amendment if it shall be modified so as to read that the member shall not submit his individual judgment or action to a caucus, on the passage of any law or joint resolution. I do not think it ought to apply to nominations to offices. In cases of that kind there does seem necessity for consultation; and we should, perhaps, be disturbing the practice of the country too far by applying this proposition to cases of that sort. What the gentleman (Mr. Cuyler) means and desires, I suppose, is that in the enactment of no law a joint resolution having the force or effect of law—matters in which the public are all interested—shall there be a subserviency of individual, to aggregate judgment among a portion of the members of the Legislature. I am entirely prepared to vote for that.

Mr. Cuyler. Mr. Chairman: I will modify the proposition as suggested by the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew.)

Mr. Buckalew: The caucus, as it is organized and used in this country, is a body entirely unknown to the Constitution and laws; and yet, perhaps, it is one of the most efficient instruments of power in practical politics. For my part I am prepared to vote for its abolition in all cases except where its propriety may be vindicated by some fair process of reasoning—as in the case of the selection of candidates for legislative offices and in the selection of candidates for United States Senator or any other candidates who may hereafter be chosen by joint vote of the two Houses of the Legislature, or by either House separately. In cases of that sort there is some reason for it. Practically, at this time, as the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) has so well said, by the instrumentality of a caucus you get the rule of but a small portion of the people of the State or country; a majority of the Legislature absolutely controls the ultimate decision arrived at upon any question—upon any act or joint resolution having the nature or effect of law.

It is a power alien to the Constitution, subversive of the just ends of government, and practically, in my mind, is productive of as much mischief in government as corruption itself. That is, I know, a pretty strong statement, but I feel myself justified in making it, by reason of that experience and observation which I have had of public affairs.

While I had the honor of serving this State in the federal government for a period of six years, I did not enter a room of consultation more than twice, and regretted my presence on both these occasions. At Harrisburg, however, this caucussing is one of the practical evils in the management of the legislation of the State, and I am entirely prepared to say that one of the most wholesome changes that we can introduce here is the novel proposition of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler,) to extract from the practical operations of the government a power of which the people have no knowledge, constitutionally, over which they have no control, which is irresponsible in the highest degree, and yet which is despotic beyond any other power or principle which takes effect in the practical action of the government.

I say this in view of the fact that I have been hitherto in my life, although moderate possibly in sentiment, strictly and always a party man, willing to submit to any portion of that necessary discipline which is calculated to unite sentiment in a proper manner and direct it to public ends.

It will not impair the efficient action of parties; it will not take away from them any instrument necessary to the accomplishment of their work, but it will deprive a few enterprising and often unscrupulous men in legislative bodies from imposing their private will upon their colleagues, and infusing into the Legislature of the State a poisonous and degrading and despotic element, which is altogether alien to free institutions, and subversive of their just ends. I arose to suggest the modification, so that this power of consultation shall still remain unchecked in reference to the question of candidates to office.

MR. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I should like members to consider the length to which this will commit the Convention. It prevents upon all matters of legislation, of however political a character—and legislation is sometimes necessarily divided by party lines—it prevents consultation and agreement of opinion in pursuance of party sympathy.

MR. CUYLER. Not at all; it is not so intended.

MR. MACVEAGH. Well, it seems to me to do precisely that; and I do not see how any fair-minded man, who is not a casuist, after taking this oath, could enter into any body of his fellow-members to consult with them, in order to agree upon a common policy to be pursued with reference to any legislation. It seems to me utterly impossible for a gentleman so to do, belonging to either of the political parties; that is, it is impossible for either side to have a consultation together, for the purpose of agreeing upon any matter of legislation. If the Convention desires to go so far as that; if they desire to say that all legislation in this State shall be non-partisan, and that members of the same class of sympathy shall not meet together to agree upon a common basis of arrangements, well and good. If it is only meant to say that caucuses shall not have despotic power over the will of a member, let it be so expressed in some proper form.

MR. CUYLER. That is all that is intended.

MR. MACVEAGH. It seems to me it goes very much farther.

MR. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: It seems to me that this is intended to prevent the very thing the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) has suggested—that when there is a measure before the Legislature, of whatever kind or character it may be, being a matter of legislation, every man upon the floor of the House or of the Senate should have a right to vote as his own judgment dictates; that he, on such an occasion, should not be controlled by his fellow-members, or by any portion of them—that he should not be bound by what he supposes to be a matter of honor—that is, to vote according to the decision of a majority of a caucus. I understand, sir, that this amendment is intended to meet that very thing, and it is for that reason that I propose to vote for it. I have some recollections of transactions of that kind, Mr. Chairman, as you, also, may have. When apportionment bills, or bills of that sort, which are mere matters of legislation, have been agreed upon, no matter what wrongs have been put upon different sections of the State, members feel themselves bound to vote for the bill, because of caucus decisions; and if they did not so vote they would feel themselves dishonored in the eyes of their fellow-members.

MR. GOWEN. May I ask the Chair this question? If this amendment, offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler,) is now adopted, and the amendment of the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) is rejected, can the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) be offered put upon the main section afterwards?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state if the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) is lost, it will fail to go upon the section as a part of the amendment of the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) but that would not prevent the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) from moving it at a subsequent time as an independent amendment.

Mr. BOYD. Suppose it is adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. If it were adopted, and the amendment should not be passed, the amendment to the amendment would fall with the amendment.

Mr. GOWEN. But could not the amendment to the amendment thereafter be offered as a separate amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It could be offered as a separate amendment after the amendment has been voted down.

Mr. GOWEN. I would like to suggest to my friend, the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler,) whether it would not be well to withdraw the amendment in the shape in which it now is, for I believe firmly and truly that no greater measure of reform in legislation can be offered upon the floor of this Convention than that very amendment; but if that amendment is adopted as part of this long oath, there are a great many members upon this floor who do not believe that you can make corrupt people by swearing them to be good, and I believe a great many persons who are in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) are opposed to this oath. As they are both before the committee I desire to say a few words upon this subject.

Mr. CUYLER. My friend will pardon a single word in explanation. I wrote this amendment, being in favor of the section as originally reported, for I did not think myself it was as much in harmony with the substance of it. I am in favor of the original oath as reported.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Does the gentleman withdraw that?

Mr. CUYLER. No, sir.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. If that amendment is made a part of the oath that is presented by the gentleman from Fayette (Mr. Kaine) will the gentleman vote for it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) has the floor.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I always give up the floor to the gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) because the highest compliment I ever heard paid to the intellectual faculties of any man was paid to him by one of the most eminent judges of a high court in this country, who stated that he listened to his arguments when he knew he was wrong with more pleasure than he listened to the arguments of any other counsel when he knew that counsel was right. Now I do not know whether it is incumbent upon me to reply to the elaborate argument of the gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black) made on the floor this morning. He did not say a word about me. He did not say a word about any interest that I am supposed to be connected with, but "the captain with his whiskers took a sly glance at me," and I suppose that he expected that I would reply to it, and I simply desire to say that there are three reasons why I should not reply to that part of the gentleman's argument. The first is, that I am not a representative on this floor of any corporation. The second is, that I do not know anything about these corrupt practices which the gentleman charged, and the third is, that I believe that the basket full of coals which the gentleman spoke about so eloquently is too small a matter for a Convention to amend the Constitution of Pennsylvania to talk about. For these three reasons I will not answer the argument, and I will confine myself, therefore, to what is now before the committee.

First, as to the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler,) I am in favor of it, but I fear it may be lost, by incorporating it upon the amendment of the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) and if I am right in believing that the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) may therefore be offered as a separate amendment, there is no objection to leaving it before the committee now.

A few practical suggestions. It will not do for us to assume that all corruptions in the Legislature are directed to procuring the passage of bills. There may be as much corruption used to defeat a bill as there is to secure its passage. Where the object is merely to defeat a bill, this King Caucus who puts upon his robes and his sceptre the emblem of sovereignty, gives to any corrupt party the right to defeat the whole legislation of the State of Pennsylvania, by securing the votes of nine members of any dominant party in the Senate. One of the best reasons probably given for increasing the members of the Legislature is that it will be more difficult to corrupt them. What, then, does King Caucus do?

There may be an act of great prospective benefit to the State of Pennsylvania. That act may be for the best interests of the whole State, but it may be opposed to some particular party, or some particular influence, or some particular combination of capital, and that party, and that influence or that combination of capital may simply conclude to defeat that bill. All that it is necessary to do is to get nine members of the dominant party, that for the time being happens to have control of the Senate. Suppose the Senate is divided seventeen to sixteen. Those nine members call a caucus of their party, nine members adopt a resolution in caucus, which the other eight are pledged to carry out, and this way the nine members defeat the whole legislation of the State.

I am not much of an advocate of iron-clad oaths, but I do believe this, that if you are to have these oaths, that to be taken at the end of the session is going to be of much more power than the oath taken at the commencement of it. It has been argued upon this floor, by those who are opposed to this subsequent oath, that the very fact that members know they will have to take the preceding oath will bring a better class of members to Harrisburg. If that is true, and if the member knows that before he goes back to his constituents he has to take another oath, will not that serve to make him honest while he is there? I do not desire to press this very much, for while I have no great belief that oaths will cure rascality, I do believe that if any oath is taken at all, the one at the end of the session will be productive of more good than the one at the beginning. I would be perfectly willing to accept the article as it stands, as reported by the Committee on Legislature, with the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia with reference to caucusing. If that amendment shall carry I believe it will cure this evil, and if this other oath is adopted, as it may be, then I will be in favor of adopting the suggestion of the gentleman from Philadelphia. If we are to have one let us have both. If we are to have one of either of the two let us rather have the one at the end of the session than at the commencement.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I beg permission, before this vote is taken, to say that I hoped it would at least have been modified so that it should not be construed to prevent assemblages of members of the Legislature for consultation and agreement of opinion. As it has not been done, further reflection satisfies me that if it is appended to the oath which I moved as a substitute, it will result in the defeat of that oath, and will really result in leaving only the report of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled, very reluctantly, to remind gentlemen that a delegate, under the rules adopted for the government of debate in committee of the whole, cannot speak but once on the same subject.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Chairman: I move the gentleman from Dauphin have leave to proceed.

Mr. LILLY. I object.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: The gentleman from Philadelphia has offered an amendment which, as I understand, will be a very unwise one to have incorporated into the oath to be taken by a member of the General Assembly. As a member of the Committee on Legislation I have agreed to the report as given to the Convention. But on scarcely a single section of that report has any member had precisely his own wish or desire in regard to what words should be in it. Almost every section of the report is a compromise of the ideas and wishes of all the members constituting the committee. I take it that such is necessarily the case wherever members of any deliberative assembly have some general ideas or plans in view. They must consult. They must deliberate. They must compromise and must come to some agreement, and each one must in part yield his convictions to the judgment of his colleagues. Now I take it that that would be prohibited by the amendment under consideration.

Mr. JOHN R. READ. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman will allow himself to be interrupted, I will ask him whether he understands that by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia, consultation of members of the Legislature is prohibited, and whether it does not say that they shall not submit themselves to the result of that consultation?

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I understand it to say that consultations shall not take place between members of a deliberative body. That if a matter was submitted to the consultation of members having the same general object in view, as I understand it, it would prohibit a member from carrying out the result arrived at by the consultations, if not in accordance with his own views, as I understand it, the amendment would prohibit me from doing that which I have done almost every day in this Convention. It would prohibit that which occurred just now on the floor, between the distinguished gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) and the mover of the amendment, when one inquired of the other if he would vote for the oath reported by the committee with that amendment. I think it is impracticable. Now the oath which is reported by the Committee on Legislation is, in my opinion, substantially what should be taken as a preliminary oath by the members of the Legislature. As explained by the gentleman from York, it does more than merely provide that the members shall "support the Constitution of the State." To get the full force of that oath, you must look at the entire provision of the Constitution, and you will find that bribery is to be prohibited. There are a great many things prohibited, and I take it that the oath binds the member to pay attention to, and to observe the forms of legislation laid down here, and a hundred things that it is entirely unnecessary to incorporate into the oath.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: May I ask the gentleman to inform the committee what he understands the word in that oath, "to defend the Constitution," to mean?

Mr. EWING. I understand it to mean that he will obey it; that he will observe in his place as a legislator the directions that are laid down there; that he will in all things pay attention to it and obey it and defend it. Now I take it that we can tell better what oath we should prescribe for the members, after we have passed through this article and have determined what restrictions we will lay on the Legislature or on legislators, to see if when we reach the end of this article we have not covered all the ground that it is intended to be covered by the oath reported from the Committee on Legislation. To my mind it is objectionable to incorporate many things in any oath that simply looks to the future. When a man takes an oath, an official oath, or an oath in any private matter, usually it should be such an oath that the violation of it, or any false swearing, would be punished as perjury.

I take it that the latter clause of that oath covers all that is contained in the oath reported from the Committee on Legislation. If a man has been guilty of bribery, or of corruption, or any undue means by which his election has been secured, he knows it at the time he takes this oath, and if he takes the oath, having committed this offence, he is guilty of perjury. Now the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) stated here I think that the oath reported by his committee was a copy of the oath in the Illinois Constitution. I think if he will examine it carefully he will find that that is a mistake. That is loose enough, and I do not think it would hurt any man who is guilty of bribery or corruption, or who violates his obligations while a member of the Legislature. I do not think it would hurt him very much to take the oath prescribed in the Illinois Constitution. But these gentlemen have been still more careful of the consciences of the members. They provide that he shall not do these things; that he shall not bribe; that he shall not lie; that he shall not take a gift, if he does it "corruptly." If he does not do it corruptly it is all right. He must do it corruptly, or it is no offence. Do you think that you would ever find any person to say that he did it corruptly? If you do not make the very act of doing it a corrupt measure, it is not worth while to put the oath to him.

I hope that this oath, as reported by the Committee on Legislation, will be adopted without any amendment, and if after we get through this article it is found that it does not bind the legislator strong enough, it can be readily re-considered and amended. I would be willing to vote with any gentleman, who thinks then that it ought to be amended, to re-consider the subject.

I may say further, that as a member of this committee, I agree with the gentleman from York in most of the provisions that he speaks of in regard to the prevention of bribery and the endeavor to abolish the "third house." And I am in favor of a future oath substantially as the amendment was offered by the gentleman from Fayette, (Mr. Kaine,) and will vote for it when it comes up.

Mr. CORSON. Mr. Chairman:—

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman will allow me, I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. CORSON. Mr. Chairman: I yield for that purpose.

The motion was agreed to. The committee rose, and the President resumed his chair.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. ARMSTRONG, chairman of the committee of the whole, reported that the committee had had under consideration the report of the Committee on Legislation, and had instructed him to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

On the question, when shall the committee have leave to sit again, to-morrow was named and agreed to.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. President: I move to adjourn.

This was agreed to, and the Convention, at three P. M., adjourned until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

SIXTY-THIRD DAY.

TUESDAY, March 11, 1873.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M. Prayer was offered by Rev. James W. Curry.

JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

INDUSTRIAL HOME.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention an invitation from the Industrial Home for women to visit the institution.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I move that the invitation be accepted, with the thanks of this Convention.

The motion was agreed to.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. JOHN M. BAILEY presented two petitions from citizens of Huntingdon county, in favor of the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition from certain citizens of Luzerne county upon the same subject.

Mr. CARTER presented two similar petitions from citizens of Juniata county upon the same subject.

Mr. G. W. PALMER presented a petition from citizens of Luzerne county on the same subject.

Mr. HARRY WHITE presented a petition from citizens of Indiana county upon the same subject.

The foregoing petitions were laid on the table.

THE LEGISLATURE.

Mr. RUNCK offered the following, which was referred to the Committee on Legislature:

For determining the ratio of Senatorial representation every ten years by dividing the population of the State, ascertained by the last preceding national census by one hundred, the quotient to be the ratio of representation in the Senate. Counties containing not less than the ratio and three-fifths thereof shall each elect two Senators, and one additional Senator for each additional number of inhabitants equal to the ratio. Counties entitled to more than one Senator shall be divided into as many Senatorial districts as there are Senators to be elected, from each of which one Senator shall be chosen. Each district shall be composed of compact, contiguous territory, containing as nearly equal population as possible. No election district shall be divided, and no county shall have less than one Senator. The ratio of representation in the House shall be determined in the same manner, except that the ratio shall be ascertained by dividing the population of the State by three hundred instead of one hundred.

IRREDEEMABLE GROUND RENTS.

Mr. BROOMALL offered the following, which was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

The Legislature shall provide a means, in the nature of a proceeding in partition, for the extinguishment of irredeemable ground rents.

PUBLISHING DEBATES.

Mr. CURTIN offered the following resolution, which was twice read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be requested to ascertain the cost for what the reports of the amendments proposed and Debates can be published in two daily newspapers of Philadelphia, and furnish one hundred or a thousand copies of each paper for the use of the members, and make report to this Convention.

ADOPTION OF SEPARATE ARTICLES.

Mr. D. W. PATTERSON offered the following resolution, which was read and laid on the table.

PRINTING REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. President: I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution to direct the official reporter to furnish reports of standing committees was negatived.

The PRESIDENT. When was the resolution passed?

Mr. BOYD. Last Friday.

The PRESIDENT. Did the gentleman vote in the affirmative?

Mr. BOYD. I did.

The PRESIDENT. Is the motion seconded by a gentleman who voted in the affirmative?

Mr. CURTIN. I second it.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The CLERK read:

Resolved, That the official reporter be directed to furnish the State Printer as reported matter, reports of standing and select committees.

The PRESIDENT. The question is to re-consider the vote upon that resolution.

Upon this motion a division was called for, which resulted: Affirmative thirty-seven; negative twenty-four.

So the motion to re-consider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now upon the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. President: It appears to me that it is necessary to publish these reports in the Debates, in order that the reader may understand what the debate is about. Now, when the report is made to the Convention and published in the Debates, when the subject comes up, the reader can turn back to that report and know what the committee is talking about, and know what relation one part of that report bears to another part. Unless these reports are published in the Debates, a reader of them would often be at sea to know what we were talking about.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: When this question was up the other day, we had the matter very fully discussed, and especially by the gentleman from York, (Mr. Cochran,) who gave us the information that we desired, and upon which we thought proper then to vote down the proposition. Now if he will repeat his argument, and let those of us who were not present learn what it is, or if he can give us some reason why we should change from the vote of the other day, I would like to know it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President: It seems to me that there is eminent propriety in this resolution. The various questions that come before the Convention are printed as to the particular matter which is under discussion; but there is no mode of ascertaining the relation of that question to the entire question which may be under discussion, except by referring to the whole report. That report cannot be found except by a reference to the Journal, which is inconvenient, and oftentimes inaccessible, when the reports might be present.

There are some thirty standing committees, and the entire amount of printing which would ensue upon the printing of all these reports would not, probably, exceed fifty pages in the aggregate. The expense would be comparatively trifling, and the convenience of having them in the reports would seem to me to be very great.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President: It strikes me that it is eminently proper that they should be printed in the Debates.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: Are they not printed in this form, so that all may refer to them? [Referring to the form of legislative bills.]

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Undoubtedly.

Mr. LILLY. Is not that sufficient?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I think not; because the publication of the debates of the Convention is a permanent record, while this form [the form of legislative bills] is merely ephemeral. The reports in that form are not bound, and pass from the knowledge of the members when the Convention adjourns. Gentlemen should remember we are making a permanent record. It ought therefore to be made complete. I do think that it is not worth while, for the trifling expense which will be involved, to make a record of the proceedings incomplete, which we intend to be permanent and to be handed down for many years for the consideration of other persons who come after us.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: Is it designed to print these together in a mass?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. No, sir; but to print them, as I understand, as they are reported from time to time.

Mr. DARLINGTON. But we have a thousand pages printed without them already, and we had better find some other plan to relieve us of the dilemma, for how can we go back now and insert the reports as they were presented?

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. President: As a correction of what the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) has said, I would state that these reports of committees have been published heretofore as they have come from the committees. I would further add that there is only a small edition of the Journal printed, sufficient merely to supply the members, and therefore those who get copies of the Debates will not get the Journals, so that they cannot refer to these documents at all, unless they are printed in the Debates.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: Inasmuch as I introduced this resolution last week, one word of explanation will not be improper on my part. I have reason to know that great convenience has resulted from the operation of the proposition which is now before you. In the matter of the Debates of the Illinois Constitutional Convention it was said, the other day, that the reports of the committees were scattered all through, article by article, as the sections were brought up for discussion. That is quite true, and if the gentleman will refer to the Illinois Debates, and to the Debates of the other States, they will discover the uniform rule to be that the report of the committee is printed in the Debates as first presented, and it is then analyzed, section by section, as the sections come up for discussion. Under the operation of any other plan, if a gentleman wishes to refer to any part of the report he must turn over page after page, and page after page, until he comes to the particular section under discussion; while otherwise, if printed in the Debates, as I proposed, the whole thing would be together, so that he could see all the bearings of one section upon the other.

In answer to the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) I would say that all the reports of the different committees have already been printed in the manner indicated, that is, in full, when presented, and this practice was only stopped when the report of the Committee on Legislature was presented. It would be best to have the rule uniform, and extend to all reports of the committees.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. President: I do not know that I understand exactly the object of this resolution. If this plan had been adopted at the commencement of our proceedings, it would have been, I have no doubt, very advantageous, and should have been done. The reports of committees would be printed in the Debates in place of being printed in the Journal. I find in the proceedings of the Convention of 1837-8, that a different course was pursued; for instance, when a particular article was taken up, that article was inserted in full in the Debates. I have the second volume of these debates now before me, and on pages 230-231 I find the following:

"Mr. STEVENS moved that the second article of the Constitution be taken up for consideration.

"The PRESIDENT stated that the question which had precedence was the second reading of the report of the committee of the whole on the first article.

"On motion of Mr. Mann, of Montgomery, the report of the committee of the whole on the first article was postponed.

"Mr. READ, of Susquehanna, suggested that the fifth article was made the special order of the day for last Monday week.

"The motion of Mr. Stevens was agreed to.

"The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. Clark, of Indiana, in the chair."

That second article is then printed in full before the discussion commences. The difficulty that now strikes me is where we should commence to set the thing right. We have a thousand pages of our Debates now printed, and how are we going to get back and put these reports of the committee in their proper places? I have no particular objection to this resolution, but it strikes me that that difficulty is serious.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I think this proposition of printing the reports of committees in the Debates is entirely useless, so far as this Convention is concerned. If you turn to your Debates you will find that we are always ten to fifteen days behind time, so that all action on the article has been disposed of before we get the Debates, which would show the report, and the only thing that we have to refer to consists of these reports as they are printed in the form of legislative debates. It seems to me that if anything is to be done, which looks to the printing of these reports in full in the volumes of the Debates, it would be better to print them as suggested by my friend from Huntingdon, (Mr. John M. Bailey,) at the end of the volume, in an appendix. I think we have the history of the thing in the Debates, section by section, and if any one will follow the Debates through, they will find everything that they need.

I have become sick and tired of listening to statements about the Illinois Convention. What have we to do with the Illinois Convention? We are here as Pennsylvanians, to make a Constitution for Pennsylvania. We have this word "Illinois" put under our noses almost every day. I hope members will have sense enough to determine these things for themselves, without saying anything about Illinois. I think we shall make a great deal better Constitution than ever Illinois did. I hope we are able to do it, and I hope we will do it.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. President: Since making my remarks a few minutes ago, I have been informed by a gentleman here, who is familiar with this thing, that all the reports heretofore made have been printed in the Debates, and that the resolution was only passed just recently, forbidding anything of the kind being further done; therefore the difficulty in my mind on that subject is entirely removed.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. President: It is very true we are here as Pennsylvanians, but the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) will agree with me, that we have referred with very great advantage to the Debates of the Illinois Convention, and that we have got from them a great deal of information. When this Convention passes away we want our record to be as good as that of the Illinois Convention. It may, perhaps, benefit some other State in the future, which shall be endeavoring to amend its Constitution.

If I understand this question correctly, we started out on the plan of printing in the Debates the reports of committees as they were presented, in full, and if we now have this broken into, it will set the whole thing at sea. It will be neither one thing nor the other. I think we had better continue the practice as we commenced.

Mr. J. M. BAILEY. Mr. President: It strikes me that the passage of this resolution will add to the confusion of our Debates. The reports of committees are presented to the body at least three weeks before they are acted upon. It is not proposed, as I understand it, to print them again when we come to consider them in debate, but to print only the particular section under consideration, and that section is always read by the Clerk from the desk, and is reported and printed in the Debates. Now, when we come to consider the report of any particular committee, every member of the Convention, even if he has the Debates printed, before him on his table, will have to look back through, perhaps, two volumes, before he can find the report of that committee. My idea would be, if it is a matter of convenience to have these reports in the Debates, that they should be printed in an appendix at the end of the last volume, and all the reports of the committees would, in that way, be together, and be quite ready of reference.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President: I shall vote for the resolution before the Convention, because I do not think the Debates will be understood by persons outside, unless they are completed by having the reports inserted in them somewhere. We had a very interesting discussion here, yesterday, but who on earth would suppose that discussion to apply to the important question before the committee? Nobody, and unless the whole report appears somewhere in the volume, the Debates will be incomprehensible. We will have to refer to the Journals or some other documents to ascertain the precise bearing of matters in committee of the whole, upon other matters under discussion. For that reason I shall vote for the making of the Debates complete.

The question being upon the resolution of Mr. Harry White, a division was called for.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. President: Before the result of the vote is announced, I desire to ask whether it is the intention of the Convention still to continue to publish these reports in the Journal, as they are published now?

The PRESIDENT. On the question the yeas are sixty-one, and the nays are ten. The resolution is agreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. President: I had concluded to call the yeas and nays, and I rose before the vote was announced.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman did not rise to call the yeas and nays before the vote was announced.

Mr. BROOMALL. I rose before the vote was announced.

The PRESIDENT. To call the yeas and nays?

Mr. BROOMALL. No, sir; I rose before the vote was announced, to ask a question.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will observe that gentlemen are so much in the habit of standing up in their places, that it is impossible for the Chair to say when persons are up, whether they are there for the purpose of addressing the Chair, or calling for the yeas and nays, or for any other purpose of action. I would ask the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. Broomall,) whether he rose for the purpose of calling the yeas and nays?

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. President: I rose before the vote was announced, to make the remark which I tried to make.

The PRESIDENT. It was out of order; but with the consent of the House the Chair will withdraw the decision, and allow the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BROOMALL. Then I move to rescind the resolution that has just been passed.

A DELEGATE. Did you vote with the majority?

Mr. BROOMALL. I have a right to move to rescind the resolution, whether I voted with the majority or not.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair withdraws his decision. If the gentleman wants to call the yeas and nays, now is the time for him to do so.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. President: Have I a right now to ask a question?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir, you have a right to call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT. Is the call seconded?

["Yes!"]

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. President: Have I now a right to debate the question?

The PRESIDENT. Will the House give unanimous consent to the gentleman from Delaware to ask a question?

["No!" "Aye!" "No!" "Aye!"]

The PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent is not given.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. President: I give notice to the House now that I intend to debate this question, but not at this time.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. President: I hope the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) does not mean to "scare" the members of this Convention. We are not very much affected by scare in this section of the House.

On this question, the yeas and nays were required by Mr. Broomall and Mr. Andrew Reed, and were as follow, viz:

YEAS.

Messrs. Achenbach, Addicks, Alricks, Armstrong, Baer, Baily, (Perry,) Bardsley, Biddle, Black, J. S., Bowman, Boyd, Brodhead, Campbell, Carter, Clark, Corbett, Cronmiller, Curry, Curtin, Dallas, Darlington, De France, Dodd, Dunning, Edwards, Elliott, Ellis, Ewing, Finney, Fulton, Hazzard, Hemphill, Horton, Howard, Hunsicker, Kaine, Lamberton, Landis, Lear, MacConnell, M'Clean, M'Culloch, Mann, Mantor, Mott, Niles, Palmer, G. W., Patterson, D. W., Porter, Pughe, Purviance, Samuel A., Read, John R., Reynolds, S. H., Ross, Runk, Russell, Sharpe, Simpson, Smith, H. G., Smith, William H., Stanton, Stewart, Wetherill, J. M., Wherry, White, David N., White, Harry, White, J. W. F. and Wright—68.

NAYS.

Messrs. Ainey, Andrews, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bartholomew, Broomall, Church, Cochran, Davis, Funck, Hall, Knight, Lilly, Long, Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, James L., Smith, Henry W., Struthers, Turrell, Walker, Wetherill, John Price and Meredith, President—22.

So the resolution was agreed to.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Baker, Bannan, Barclay, Beebe, Black, Charles A., Brown, Buckalew, Carey, Cassidy, Collins, Corson, Craig, Cuyler, Fell, Gibson, Gilpin, Gowen, Green, Guthrie, Hanna, Harvey, Hay, Heverin, Lawrence, Littleton, M'Allister, M'Camant, M'Murray, MacVeagh, Metzger, Minor, Newlin, Palmer, H. W., Parsons, Patterson, T. H. B., Patton, Purman, Purviance, John N., Rooke, Temple, Van Reed, Woodward and Worrell—42.

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. President: I rise to a question of privilege. I move to re-consider the vote by which this Convention resolved that when it adjourned on the twenty-ninth day of this month it be to the fourteenth day of April.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The CLERK:

Resolved, That when this Convention adjourn on Saturday, the twenty-ninth of March, it be to Monday, the fourteenth day of April, at ten o'clock of said day.

The PRESIDENT. Did the gentleman who moved to re-consider vote in the affirmative?

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. I did.

The PRESIDENT. Who seconds the motion?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I second it.

The PRESIDENT. How did the gentleman from Cumberland vote?

Mr. WHERRY. In the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT. The motion is before the House.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President: I hope this resolution will not be re-considered. It is very important to a very great many members of this Convention to be at home on the first day of April. Gentlemen who live in the city can be present here every day and attend to their business also. Gentlemen from the country cannot attend to their business.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is compelled to state that a motion to re-consider is not debatable. The question is on the re-consideration.

On this question the yeas and nays were required by Mr. Edwards and Mr. Lilly, and were as follow, viz:

YEAS.

Messrs. Addicks, Andrews, Armstrong, Baily, (Perry,) Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bardsley, Biddle, Bowman, Boyd, Brodhead, Broomall, Campbell, Carter, Corbett, Curtin, Dallas, Darlington, Dodd, Edwards, Ellis, Ewing, Finney, Hanna, Hay, Horten, Howard, Landis, Lilly, Littleton, MacConnell, M'Culloch, Mann, Mantor, Niles, Pughe, Purviance, Sam'l A., Read, John R., Reynolds, James L., Smith, Wm. H., Stanton, Struthers, Turrell, Walker, Wetherill, John Price, White, David N., White, J. W. F., Wright and Meredith, President—48.

NAYS.

Messrs. Achenbach, Ainey, Alricks, Baer, Baker, Bartholomew, Black, J. S., Church, Clark, Cochran, Cronmiller, Curry, Davis, De France, Dunning, Elliott, Fulton, Funck, Hazzard, Hemphill, Hunsicker, Kaine, Knight, Lamberton, Lear, Long, M'CLean, MacVeagh, Mott, Palmer, G. W., Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Porter, Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, S. H., Ross, Runk, Russell, Sharpe, Simpson, Smith, H. G., Smith, Henry W., Stewart, Wetherill, J. M., Wherry and White, Harry—46.

So the resolution was re-considered.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING. — Messrs. Bannan, Barclay, Beebe, Black, Charles A., Brown, Buckalew, Carey, Cassidy, Collins, Corson, Craig, Cuyler, Fell, Gibson, Gilpin, Gowen, Green, Guthrie, Hall, Harvey, Heverin, Lawrence, M'Allister, M'Camant, M'Murray, Metzger, Minor, Newlin, Palmer, H. W., Parsons, Patton, Purman, Purviance, John N., Rooke, Temple, Van Reed, Woodward and Worell—46.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I move to strike out "twenty-ninth," and insert "twenty-eighth," and strike out "fourteenth," and insert "eighth."

Mr. ANDREW REED. I move to amend by striking out "eighth," and inserting "twenty-second."

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Carbon, (Mr. Lilly.)

The resolution, as amended, will be read.

The CLERK read:

Resolved, That when this Convention adjourns on Friday, March twenty-eighth, it be until Tuesday, April eighth, at ten A. M."

Mr. MANN. Mr. President: I desire to say that this is more objectionable now to members living so far away as those coming from my district, than it was in the first place. It is objectionable in any form that can be named. The proposition is to leave Philadelphia at the most favorable time, so far as weather is concerned, and come back and sit in the heated months of the year. I hope this Convention will have too much good sense to do anything of the kind.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. President: I hope the amendment will prevail, as it will give the Convention ten days vacation, which is long enough to adjourn at any one time.

Upon the amendment of Mr. Lilly, the yeas and nays were required by Mr. Mann and Mr. Corbett, and were as follow, viz:

YEAS.

Messrs. Achenbach, Addicks, Alricks, Armstrong, Baer, Baily, (Perry,) Baker, Bardsley, Bartholomew, Biddle, Black, J. S., Boyd, Brodhead, Campbell, Carter, Cochran, Curry, Curtin, Dallas, Davis, Dodd, Dunning, Elliott, Ellis, Ewing, Finney, Fulton, Funck, Hall, Hanna, Hemphill, Horton, Hunsicker, Kaine, Knight, Lamberton, Lilly, MacConnell, M'CLean, MacVeagh, Mott, Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Pughe, Purviance, Samuel A., Read, John R., Reynolds, S. H., Rooke, Ross, Runk, Russell, Sharpe, Simpson, Smith, H. G., Smith, Wm. H., Stanton, Wetherill, J. M., Wherry, White, David N., White, Harry, White, J. W. F. and Wright—62.

NAYS.

Messrs. Ainey, Andrews, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bowman, Broomall, Church, Clark, Corbett, Cronmiller, Darlington, DeFrance, Edwards, Hay, Hazzard, Howard, Landis, Lear, Littleton, Long, M'Culloch, Mann, Mantor, Minor, Niles, Palmer, G. W., Porter, Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, James L., Smith, Henry W., Stewart, Struthers, Turrell, Walker, Wetherill, John Price and Meredith, President—35.

So the amendment was agreed to.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING.—Bannan, Barclay, Beebe, Black, Charles A., Brown, Buckalew, Carey, Cassidy, Collins, Corson, Craig, Cuyler, Fell, Gibson, Gulpin, Gowen, Green, Guthrie, Harvey, Heverin, Lawrence, M'Allister, M'Camant, M'Murray, Metzger, Newlin, Parsons, Patton, Purman, Purviance, John N., Temple, Van Reed, Woodward and Worrell.—36.

LANDS OF MINING COMPANIES.

Mr. FINNEY, from the Committee on Mines, Manufactures and Agriculture, requested that that committee be discharged from the consideration of a resolution referred to it, limiting the extent of land to be held by mining companies, which was agreed to.

The resolution was then referred to the Committee on Private Corporations.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. DUNNING presented a petition of 1,000 citizens of Luzerne county, praying that an amendment may be made to the Constitution prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

EDUCATION.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order, is the second reading and consideration of the article reported by the Committee on Education. Is it the pleasure of the Convention to proceed to the second reading of that article?

It was not agreed to.

LEGISLATION.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the further consideration of the article reported by the Committee on Legislation.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Convention then, in committee of the whole, Mr. Armstrong in the chair, proceeded to the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I give notice now, that without intending to be at all discourteous to gentlemen who discuss this question, that I intend to keep them to the matter in debate.

The Chairman. The question before the committee is upon the motion of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler,) to amend the motion of the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeigh.)

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I would now call for the reading of the proposition immediately before the Convention, so that the gentlemen may understand what is before us.

The CLERK read the amendment of Mr. Cuyler, as follows:

"And that I will not submit my individual judgment or action to the decision or control of any caucus or combination of members of the Legislature."

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: There are four propositions before the committee on the subject of oaths. The first is the short, comprehensive oath reported by the Committee on Legislation. The second, the more diffuse oath, reported by the Committee on the Legislature, and offered as an amendment by the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeigh.) Third, the oath to be taken by members of the Legislature, after that body adjourns, offered as an amendment by the gentleman from Fayette, (Mr. Kaine,) but generally understood to be the production of the distinguished delegate at large from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) and which, in his view, is to be the panacea for the enormous evils he so glaringly depicted in his speech yesterday. Lastly, there is the caucus amendment, presented by the eloquent gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler,) to which he attributes great healing virtues.

To all the amendments to the report of the committee I am opposed. The oath presented by that committee is short, but very comprehensive. It covers all the ground that is necessary. It binds every honest man as firmly as if it was ten times as long, and contained clauses on every imaginable subject; and I have no faith in the power of an oath to bind dishonest men. A man whose moral sense is so distorted that he will take a bribe, will laugh at your oaths as so much idle breath. Therefore I consider the amendments of the gentleman from Dauphin, and the gentleman from Fayette, as utterly useless as restraints upon bad men, while good men, sensitive men, could not take them without a feeling of humiliation.

I am opposed to them for another reason. Their tendency is to fix a stigma upon one branch of the government, by requiring its members to take an oath which is not required from any other and co-ordinate branch. The members of the Executive Department, and of the Judiciary, are not required to swear solemnly that they will not commit a misdemeanor in office which will consign them to the cells of a prison, and cover them with perpetual degradation. But these amendments, if adopted, require this of your Senators and your Representatives, who compose the highest body in the State, and who come direct from the people, and are clothed with the greatest and most important powers which any body of men in a free government can possess. What object can be gained by degrading the Legislature? Can this high court suffer, and the whole body politic not suffer with it?

The Legislature is that body in the State which, more than any other, represents the democratic element. Without it we must go back to arbitrary power, the one man power or the power of a class. Degrade the Legislature in the eyes of the people, destroy their confidence in their own representatives, and you destroy their confidence in republican institutions, and give them up a prey to ambitious, artful and unscrupulous men.

It is fashionable now-a-days to deride the Legislature, and to speak of it with contempt. Every young fledgling who wishes to display his eloquence on the stump, or his flippant smartness in the press, and to air his virtues and his wisdom before a gaping crowd, attacks the Legislature, and no one rebukes, no one comes to the defence of this foundation-stone of all republican governments. Can we do without a Legislature? Is there any possible mode of preserving our free institutions without it? What folly; what madness then, to seek thus, with suicidal hands, to destroy what should be our glory, but which gentlemen assert on this floor is our shame.

I do not deny that members of the Legislature may have been corrupted. I do not deny that that body may have suffered deterioration in latter years. Is it any wonder? Patriotism is not so prevalent now-a-days as to lead the men who fill all the active walks of life, and who are engaged in the mad scramble for wealth and power, to sacrifice their time to fill an office which yields no emoluments, and which, if we can believe what we have heard here, will only cover him with disgrace. Will it ever be any better if it is to be constantly held up to the scorn and detestation of the people?

How does it come that a part of the members of the Legislature are corrupt? Your individual or body of men outside of themselves must bribe them, if they are bribed. Now we know very well, that very few individuals have enough interest at stake, or have money enough to spare, to resort to wholesale systematic bribery. We are shut up then to the conclusion, that the main source of this corruption is found in those immense and wealthy corporations, which, as was said on this floor yesterday, have special privileges they want to obtain, or to prevent legislation in favor of other and rival interests. If cajolery or threatening cannot accomplish their ends, they resort to bribery by means of paid agents constantly on the ground. This corrupt and corrupting influence has done more to degrade the Legislature, than all the other means combined. Evil disposed persons, finding that men high in society, controlling immense interests, and claiming the most exalted integrity, systematically resort to corruption to carry their ends, have sought membership in the Legislature, for the purpose of sharing in these golden spoils. Yet these very men, these corruptors, these bribers of the wills of their people, will declare in the most eloquent and saint-like manner of the corruption of the Legislature! If the receiver is as bad as the thief, is not the tempter as vile as the man who yields to the temptation!

It is not by iron-clad oaths you can cure these evils. It is not by degrading the legislative department that you can exalt the character. Treat the Legislature as you do the Governor, the Judge; honor the office as one peculiarly belonging to the people, and lay your iron hand on the foul tempter who is sapping the foundation of our republican government, that he may ride into imperial power on the ruins of an insulted and betrayed people.

Mr. Chairman, I am also opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia, which requires a member of the Legislature to swear that he will not submit his individual judgment or action to the decision or control of any caucus of the members in the passage of any law or resolution.

What earthly good this could do, except to annoy some sensitive conscience, I cannot see. The case would lie altogether in the breast of the member, and no one could say whether he had submitted his judgment to the control of a caucus or not. Parties are necessary for the welfare of the State, and the nearer they are matched the better for the State. Party caucuses are also necessary for the proper concentration of the will of the party. Suppose a party is in power in a Commonwealth, and is responsible for the government, and is watched by a sagacious political foe, ready to take advantage of any mistake or error, is it not entirely right and proper that such party should meet in consultation to discuss measures, and harmonize differences? And if there is a difference of opinion, has not a member admitted to such consultation a right to submit his judgment to the will of the majority? His judgment may tell him that it is better for the common weal that he should thus acquiesce in the will of the majority, than that he should break up the continuity of his party, and give the advantage to his political foes. Of course no honest man of any party would submit to any outrage or wrong to his moral sense at the dictation of any caucus, but every member of the Legislature represents a party and party principles, as well as the people in their aggregate capacity, and he is under obligations to promote and carry out those principles to the best of his ability, and in doing so he must necessarily some times find himself in a minority and must yield his judgment, or break up all discipline and harmony in the party. Such a clause has no place in an oath to be taken by a member of the Legislature. It is outside the province of such an oath. It is inquisitorial and pernicious. It goes beyond its proper sphere. It seeks to enter into the reasons which control a man's judgment on questions of policy, for which he is accountable only to his own conscience. And I am surprised that the usually clear headed gentleman from Columbia should have given it his support. His great anxiety to introduce reforms must have warped his judgment, or he has been caught napping when this glittering generality was launched upon the Convention. I am sure no gentleman has been more faithful to party, and to party behests, and to party caucuses than he, and no one knows better how necessary it is to maintain party discipline, if the cherished principles of the party are to prosper.

I would enlarge here, but will not longer take up the time of the committee.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman: The committee of the whole, I believe, sir, have more immediately under consideration the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia, who sits at my left, (Mr. Cuyler,) but I believe that, as a committee of the whole, we have before us generally the subject of oaths, as applied to the two branches of the Legislature. I do not know, sir, that I would have troubled this committee with any observations on this subject, had not my attention, since yesterday morning, been arrested by the statements of members here as to the character of the oath. I have been surprised to hear gentlemen on this floor attribute to it, sir, a want of importance with which I, in my own mind, have always invested it. I have heard gentlemen state here, that in the discharge of official duty there was little or no safeguard in the oath. They have gone so far, almost, as to claim that those who could be guilty of irregularities in other respects could not be restrained by the taking of an oath. When I therefore heard this matter so slightly spoken of, and feeling in my mind the sacred character of the obligation of an oath, I feel constrained to rise this morning and disclaim any sympathy, on my part, with such sentiments, and to enter upon the records of this Convention my protest against their utterance. Why, sir, I ask you, where is the safety for republican form of government, if we have it not in the sacred character of an oath? It is well for men to say that the republican form of government is based upon the democratic idea. That is well, sir, but I ask you what lies at the bottom of it, if it be not upon the enlightened consciences of those who must administer the government? Where is the safety of government found? Where is the safety for society? What have you to ensure you the perpetuity of society and government, if you do not ask that that government will be administered by those who will feel that their consciences are under some restraint? I ask upon what plane those gentlemen walk who do not invest an oath with that religious character which belongs to it? I ask gentlemen upon what meats they feed, who will claim that only those men are to be thought honest who are guided by a feeling of superstition alone, when they assume the sacred obligation of an oath, and not by the convictions and responsibilities of the christian religion?

I stand here then, to-day, in this christian age, simply stating that we are members of a christian community, that we are living in a day of christian enlightened civilization. And when that is said it is all that need be said that this Convention, and the members of it, should attribute to an oath all the importance it demands. Now, sir, we have been told, and it has become a proverb, that those who will lie will steal. I presume they draw from that the argument, a fortiori, that those who steal will certainly lie. Well, sir, to a certain extent that may be true in the every day affairs of life. But I hold that it does not follow, as a logical result, that a man who is prepared to commit peculation, that a man who is prepared to defraud the State, that a man who is prepared to enter into all sorts of combinations and schemes for the purpose of enhancing his own personal fortunes, at the expense of the State or others, is therefore prepared to add to these sins the great sin of perjury, to say nothing about this crime in a judicial sense. I hold, sir, that there prevails in the minds of all men a certain vein of religious sentiment. I hold, sir, that no man can grow up in this day of christian civilization without feeling that there has been educated into him, in spite of himself, a sentiment which shall set at naught all attempts to induce him to commit the high crime of perjury.

It is a principle, sir, if not born in man must, in this day, be educated into him by force of circumstances. A man may be guilty of an offence, of a crime, if you choose, of theft; but, sir, he is not prepared to go so far as to add to it the crime of perjury. If men have no religious profession, or faith of any kind; if they do not outwardly recognize any of the forms of religion, then it's true that they are more or less affected by a feeling of superstition, and that feeling alone may keep many a man from the commission of this great offence, because, where there is ignorance of the christian religion, you will find that, in the majority of cases, it is replaced by that which is one of the elements of ignorance, superstition.

Now sir, with regard to these oaths, I find this, that those who are to take their seats in these two Houses are required to swear that they have made use of no improper means to secure their election, or to secure a false return of their election. Further than that, I see that the oath requires them to swear that they will be guilty of no fraudulent practices. Now, sir, all that is well, but I confess that I would go further than that. I would be in favor of adopting the amendment of the distinguished gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black.) I would require that at the end of the session those who shall have been there acting in the legislative capacity, should swear that they have done nothing to compromise the high position to which they have been called.

I may speak of what might be the feelings of persons under those circumstances. I ask you if a man would not be alarmed in a moment of temptation when he knew there was, as it were, a lion in the path to confront him at the end of the session. His oath will always loom up before him in the moment of temptation; it will always stand before him as a gaunt spectre that must haunt him. It is as though he were to walk down to the valley of a shadow. When he comes to knock at the portals of exit, in leaving the high plane of his official action, to depart to his home, he finds the judge standing there to administer that obligation. Tell me not that this oath will not accomplish all that is asked for it. Tell me not that men of conscience will not be awakened to the responsibility which is thus devolved upon them, for with this specialized form of oath their consciences and judgments are ever on the alert. Let us, therefore, awaken to the true importance of this matter. Let us not treat this as one of the idle questions to come before this Convention, but let us, one and all invest it with its true significance. And let us remember this, that with all your other methods reform you will bring into the Legislature men who are intelligent and pure, and men who will not shrink from taking the oaths which you require them to take. Thus you will not be doing violence to them, but you will be assisting them, you will be protecting them, you will be supporting and encouraging them in the discharge of their duties, and you will, besides that, have gone a great ways towards the accomplishment of reform.

There is still another amendment pending, the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler.) If there is any one thing for which I have felt, in times past, a great feeling of dislike, it is this wonderful power of King Caucus. I have felt, sir, that on more than one occasion he has been far more potent than he should have been, and I for one would be willing, if we could do so, in one way or another, to dethrone this airy sort of potentate; but, with all deference to those who think it ought to be done, I find myself in opposition to the amendment. I cannot bring my mind to the conclusion that this Convention, in framing this great State paper—the organic law of the State—should descend below a certain plane of dignity, if you choose so to call it, for the purpose of meeting an evil which has grown out of the usages of the political parties of the State.

I think there are many occasions in which consultation, mutual conference between those who happen to owe affiliation to one or the other of the great political parties, might be proper enough, and, sir, if you adopt this amendment, I take it that you will prevent anything of that kind. To make the amendment operative, you must make it rigid in its force; you must make it of such grasp and such reach that men cannot possibly elude its intention and its design, or you give to it a fast and loose sort of action, so that it really accomplishes nothing. I therefore feel that I cannot vote for it. I would like to meet the difficulty insome way, but I believe it to be a matter that will have to work out and accomplish its own reform. I therefore feel myself constrained to vote against it, believing that if we adopt it we will defeat the object for which we are laboring.

Mr. CORSON. Mr. Chairman: This amendment which has been interpolated at a late stage of these proceedings is rather an impromptu piece of work upon the part of the distinguished gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler,) and I do not think at first was received with any sort of serious consideration, but having been handed about for a few moments and received some complimentary notices on the part of gentlemen on the right and the left; it seemed to assume some importance, but I apprehend that when the delegates of this Convention come to consider the full import of these few lines which it is proposed to interpolate into the Constitution of the State of Pennsylvania, they will say at once, "away with it!" If such a clause had been in our Constitution during the last decade, when war threatened to disrupt this government, the loyal people of this land would have had their hand tied and their mouths closed, and war would have run rampant over the good soil of Pennsylvania. I therefore trust, that when they come to vote upon this question, they will say "we will allow the people of Pennsylvania to assemble, we will allow them to lay down a rule of action, and we will allow them to consult," as the committees of this Convention, meet in their committee rooms to frame the work and digest the matter which shall be laid before this Convention. So much for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler.)

Now for the other proposition, and we come directly to the question of swearing. Oaths are obnoxious. Why not put into the Constitution, clause after clause, punishing the legislator who commits any of these crimes against which you make him swear, rather than put it in the oath? You might as well put it in the marriage ceremony. Why was it not put in the oath administered to every man in this Convention? Because oaths are obnoxious.

The people despise them. In olden times the world was ridden with oaths, until Jeremiah, the prototype of my distinguished contemporary, (Mr. J. S. Black,) exclaimed, sorrowfully, "for because of swearing the land mourneth." When the multitude followed Him who spake as never man spake, out of Gallilee and Judea, Decapolis and Jerusalem, and from over beyond the Jordan, as He made His way up into the mount to declare the counsels of God, what did they hear from His lips? Not that form of oath prescribed by Abraham to his servant, "Put thy hand beneath my thigh and swear to me concerning the matter." Nor that other flaming oath of which we read in Revelations, "and the Angel which I saw stand upon the sea and upon the earth, lifted up his hand to Heaven and sware by Him who liveth forever and ever, who created the Heavens, and all the things that therein are; who created the earth, and all the things that therein are; who created the sea, and all the things that therein are; that there should be time no longer,"—not that oath, but what did He say who laid down the law for us? "Ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time, 'thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths,' but I say unto you, swear not at all, neither by Heaven, for it is God's throne, nor by the earth, for it is His foot-stool; neither by Jerusalem, for it is the city of the Great King. Thou shalt not swear by thy head, for thou canst not make one hair white or black. Let your communication be yea, yea, nay, nay, for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil." Shall we take inspiration from Christ's Sermon on the Mount, or from the modes proposed by modern men who may claim for themselves superiority to the Savior, but in my view are neither as profound nor as Divine, and I choose to prefer precepts to those of the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I desire to express the views I entertain upon this subject, the more because I apprehend from what I have heard around me that I am in the minority, possibly in a very small minority, in this body. I belong to those who have no faith in oaths. I do not believe that any amount of swearing will make a bad man good, or a good man bad. The good need no obligation, the bad are not bound by obligations. To make the very most of them, they are but traps to catch the weak and unwary who often are more sinned against than sinning, while the great rogues have ingenuity enough to avoid their consequences. We have no special oath prescribed for legislators in the present Constitution. Why that is I do not know. There was none in the first Constitution. Whether that arose out of the habits of our Quaker forefathers, who had the same prejudices against oaths, that some of their descendants have, I do not know, but it is worthy of note that their practice of avoiding the oath was commented upon with favor by a distinguished Frenchman, when he alluded to the treaty with the Indians. He said that it was the only treaty, up to his time, that was never ratified by an oath, and the only treaty that, up to that time, had never been broken. Possibly that is why we have the Constitution as it now stands, without a special oath for the law making power.

Now, the gentleman who has preceded me, (Mr. Corson,) has quoted an essay upon the subject of oaths, worth all that can be said in this Hall. I know it is from an old authority, but it is from an authority that I apprehend some gentlemen in this Hall respect, especially when they can explain its precepts in such a way as not to cross themselves in any way. That essay is contained in the words "swear not at all, but let thy communication be 'yea' and 'nay,' for whatever is more than this, cometh of evil"—and let me add, goeth to evil.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROOMALL. If it is not taken out of my time.

Mr. BLACK. We will give you all the time you want.

Mr. BROOMALL. Well, let it be short. I do not wish to exceed my time.

Mr. BLACK. Has the gentleman overlooked the fact, that this provision is for an affirmation that will perfectly accommodate his tender conscience upon the question of oaths?

Mr. BROOMALL. The gentleman has mistaken my position entirely. I want the communication to be "yea" and "nay"—"for more than that cometh of evil." His affirmation and his oath are upon the same footing, with the exception that one is positively prohibited by the essay I have quoted, and the other is not expressly prohibited. That is all. We took an oath or affirmation, some one, some the other, when we assembled as members of the Convention. Is there a man here who can point to a single act that he has done, or a single act that he has omitted, that resulted from the taking of that oath? Not one. No man here would have behaved otherwise than he has done. I challenge any member of this body to say that he would have done in any respect differently from what he has done, if he had taken no oath at all.

I know gentleman may say that we are patterns of purity, we are perfectly honest; these oaths are only intended for dishonest men. Well, sir, there has been little too much of this thing. I am sick of hearing ourselves self-lauded as being the only honest body that could be raised out of the people of Pennsylvania. I do not believe it, sir. I believe we are like the members of the Legislature. I believe we are like the people that elected us, no better, no worse; and that we are as likely to err as they. I have a great deal of faith in human nature everywhere. I believe the mass of men are good, and that it is only under temptation that they err; and I believe when temptation comes, all the oaths that you can administer will not restrain them.

If I have made up my mind to commit a murder, it will not affect me in the smallest degree that I had before that time sworn I would not do it. If I have made up my mind, as a member of the Legislature, to be guilty of the infamous crime of betraying the interests of my constituents, and of the crime of bribery, it will not hurt me to add the crime of perjury to it. I will not hesitate, because I had sworn that I would not do that thing.

Now, I have said before, on this floor, that the members of the Legislature are not dishonest either when they are elected or when they get through their term. I speak of them as a body. I know there are frequently some who have been misled, some even who have been guilty of crimes for which they ought to be in the penitentiary, but the number of the guilty is small. The manner in which wrongs have been committed in the Legislature is by the body being misled. Why, we had an example of that here yesterday. Did not the gentlemen from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler,) who is not now in his seat, tell us that the tonnage tax repealed was right? Did he not make an argument that would have misled half the members of this Convention, if they had not known something about the subject. Let that argument be laid before fifty men from any part of our districts, who know nothing about the question, and forty-eight of them who do not hear the other side, would say that the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) was right. That is the way men are misled. I am just now told by a gentleman behind me that he (Mr. Cuyler) was right anyhow. There again is a man misled. Do you think that if my friend here had sworn that he would not be misled by the ingenious arguments of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler,) he would have been any less likely to have been misled? Not a bit.

Members of the Legislature are misled, sir. They are not criminals. They do things they ought not to do; but they do them in the best of faith. I speak of the great majority of them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is upon the subject, although it is not very close to it; but I ask the indulgence of the Convention in presenting it. It is this: I believe that this wholesale denunciation of public men and public measures, in which we have indulged, in which the newspapers indulge, and in which the country at large seems now to be indulging, is calculated to produce the very crimes it pretends to try to avoid. It is demoralizing in its tendency. When the people come to have a relish for crime in high places, the people are in a fair way of being corrupted; and if there are members of the Legislature who are weak and easily led away, it is often because they are made by men in high places—places such as we occupy, and by the press, to believe that they are surrounded by dishonest men. Once satisfy a man that he is the only honest man in his neighborhood, and if he is not a saint, he will very soon become a rogue.

This thing has gone too far. The tendency is demoralizing. The exhibition we had on this floor yesterday was pleasing. I liked it as well as others. I grant that I have been so far demoralized as to enjoy those things myself, but I am the worst man for it. If I had the right mind I should have avoided the exhibition of yesterday—should have run away from it as a thing calculated to poison me. We will never get better as a community —never have better leaders, until we learn to have confidence in humanity.

Now, sir, I want a Constitution to be administered by good men. I intend, as far as I can do it, to have this Constitution so framed that it can be well administered, and by good men. I do not pretend, nor ought any body else to pretend, to frame a Constitution that can be well administered by bad men, so as to suit the interests of the country. That thing cannot be done. If we can not get good men to administer the Constitution, the government itself must go down. Hence, I am opposed to all these oaths, and prefer leaving the Constitution as it is.

The provision immediately before the Convention, that a man shall swear that he will not abide the decision of any caucus is amusing. I never attended a caucus with a view of being "bound" by its decision, and I have attended many. I may not accept the decision of a caucus, but I would not say, in advance, that I would not accept it. If the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) wants to prevent conference among members of the Legislature, probably the safest way would be to put a provision in the Constitution, requiring each member to swear that he would not vote for anything that anybody else voted for. Then there would be no reason for conference or caucus. However, I feel inclined to vote for this, just as I would vote for anything else that would tend to carry the whole weight of these oaths down before this Convention, so that we may leave the Constitution as it is, in that respect. There is more good in it generally, than many gentlemen seem willing to see, not only in this respect, but in others, and I will not change it until a necessity is shown for the change.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman: On yesterday, in Convention in this Hall, I expressed myself about in the language of the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. Broomall,) that I would vote for the amendment now immediately before the committee, with a view to kill the whole of it; but a night's reflection and consulting my own common sense have brought me to a different conclusion. I do not think it is the duty of a member of this Convention, on any occasion, to vote for that which he believes to be wrong. I think the amendment of my friend from the city (Mr. Cuyler) is radically wrong, and although I desire to kill all these extra oaths, yet I must vote against it.

While I am up, allow me to say a word or two upon the matter of oaths in general. I never said, as I was quoted as saying by the gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) that I considered an oath unworthy of being taken by any man. I never said that there was not good in an oath. I never said that a good man ought not to be sworn as well as a bad man, but I did say, and I repeat it now, that an oath taken by a bad man, such men as have been described in this Convention, has no effect upon him. It produces no good result. I thought so when I spoke as I did, when the gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black) misquoted me, and made me seem to say the very reverse of what I intended to say, and what I did say, and what I now repeat, namely: That when a man has acted the villain in the Legislative Hall, on the bench or anywhere else, he will not be likely to be honest merely by the taking of an oath.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: I would like the gentleman (Mr. Walker) to allow me to say, that I did not want to mistake what he said, and I want now to state it as correctly as possible. I think he does not recollect exactly what he did say. He said that he was opposed to the administration of such oaths as that which was proposed in the report of the Committee on the Legislature, because he said—and he appealed to the gentleman from Greene, (Mr. ———,) who was then in the chair, to bear him out, that the experience of both of them would prove that legislative oaths were like custom house oaths—easily taken and easily broken.

Mr. WALKER. I did say that.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. And that would continue to be the case, no matter what oaths be taken.

Mr. WALKER. I did say so, and I said so in application to bad men—in application to men who were not bound by considerations of honor and integrity. I said so in relation to those who were unfit to be representatives of the people.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. No. The gentleman (Mr. Walker) said it in reference to such people as were in the Legislature generally.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman (Mr. J. S. Black) misunderstood me. I said it not in reference to such men as are generally in the Legislature, for I believed then, and I believe now, that from the year 1832 down to this time, that there have been, and are now, as pure men in the Legislature as there are in this body.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman: I repeat I did say so; but I said it in application to bad men; I said it in application to those who are not bound by integrity and honor; I said it with reference to those who are unfit to be representatives.

Mr. BLACK. No, the gentleman said it with reference to such people as are in the Legislature; gentlemen—

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman misunderstands me. What I said was said in reference to dishonest men; not such as compose the great majority of the Legislature. For I believed then, and I believe now, that as pure men, from the year 1832 down to this time were, and have been and are, in the Legislature, as there are in this Convention. I will now, Mr. Chairman, while on this point, state that the gentleman from York was unfortunate in the evidences he gave of corruption in the Legislature. He referred to the incorporation of the old United States bank of Pennsylvania, and said that on its face there stood corruption, and that its passage through the Legislature was procured by corrupt means. Mr. Chairman, perhaps I am the only member of this Convention who was a member of the Legislature at the time that bill was passed. I voted for that bill, because I believed it to be right, and I believe it now to have been right. Mr. Chairman, that bank had run its course as a national bank. It had thirty-two millions of money all paid in. It had for the last twenty-five years collected and disbursed all the revenue of the nation without a cent's cost, and without the loss of a dollar. Its charter expired, and it applied to the Legislature of Pennsylvania to be incorporated. The application was received; Nicholas Biddle, together with its cashier, came there as gentlemen representing the bank, and presented it before the Legislature.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if a man should rise up and proclaim that the passage of that bill through the Legislature had been procured by means of corruption, after a silence from the year 1832 down to this day, I would say that that man made an assertion in which there was not a particle of truth. Mr. Chairman, I voted for that bill. I voted for it with as pure motives as those which actuate me in this Convention, where I am endeavoring to do my duty. I know that my motives were pure, and I believe all the rest of the members of that Legislature voted from, and were controlled by, as pure motives as I did. In the Senate there were four gentlemen, John Dickey, Thomas S. Cunningham, Jesse R. Burden and Charles B. Penrose, who, it has been said, were bought. I know nothing about that. There was no buying in the House. We believed the bill was right, and we voted for it. In the Senate, if those gentlemen were bought, they know. They are all dead but one—Jesse R. Burden is in this city. Talk with him about it, and see whether he says that there was any money spent to procure the passage of that bill. I only refer to this as showing that the gentleman from York is mistaken when he asserts here, as he did yesterday, that there was corruption in the passage of that bill into a law.

But then, again, he said that there was frauds in the disposition of the public works, and that the Legislature was guilty of fraud, and he held its members up before you, and before this body, as utterly unworthy of any consideration. Why, Mr. Chairman, do you not know, do not I know, does not every gentleman in this body know, that Pennsylvania demanded, outside the Legislature, the disposition of the public works, as a matter of economy. It was not a matter which originated with the Pennsylvania railroad. It was not a matter which originated in the Legislature. It originated through the recommendations from the Executive. It originated in and among the people. They desired that the public works should be disposed of, and they were disposed of under the act of 1837. Who was corrupted in the passage of that act? Nobody. Who was? The gentleman behind me, (Mr. Mott?) Not a bit of it. He was not there. They were sold for $7,500,000, and the State made just that much by the sale—but that was only the disposition of the Columbia road. The canal from Columbia to Hollidaysburg, the Portage railway, the canal from Johnstown to the city of Pittsburgh—these were sold for $7,500,000, under the act of 1857.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think in that sale there could be no fraud. It was, to some extent, a conditional sale. The Legislature offered or proposed to sell the main line, as stated, for $10,000,000, I believe it was, for the title to that improvement, they to be discharged from the three mill tax that was upon them, or $7,500,000 free from this tonnage tax. The Legislature gave the railroad company the option to take these improvements at that price, $10,000,000, without the tax, or to take them for $7,500,000 retaining the tax. The Pennsylvania railroad company chose the latter. They paid, or agreed to pay, $7,500,000 with the tax, instead of the $10,000,000, the tax being taken off. I blamed that company then; I blame it now, after a suit had been instituted and a judgment of $650,000 recovered against it, and $150,000 more, by an account settled and standing on the books against it. I blamed, I repeat, that company for going to the Legislature and asking in 1861, the repeal of the tonnage tax, relieving them from the amount for which the company was then in arrears. They did do so and it was granted, whether corruptly or not I do not know. The gentleman who addressed the Convention yesterday, (Mr. Mott,) did not allude to that in referring to the $25,000 that was offered at one time, and the $18,000 at another. Why, no, that was a subsequent thing when Mr. Mott was a candidate for the State Senate, and in no way connected with the disposition of the public works. I say, Mr. Chairman, that in his reference to the evidences of corruption in the Legislature, the delegate from York is unhappy and unfortunate. The cases he cites prove neither corruption nor mistake.

But in the year 1868 an act was passed for the sale of the Delaware division, for the sale of the North Branch canal and its extension, and for the sale of the West Branch canal and its extension. They were sold and to whom? Why, they were sold to the Sunbury and Erie railroad company for $3,500,000—that company giving their mortgage and their bonds for this property. Now, Mr. Chairman, where was there any corruption or injury done to the State by that sale? Where did those bonds go? They went into the sinking fund, and under the act of 1869 they were taken out and transferred to the Allegheny Valley railroad company—that company giving their bonds and a mortgage upon the road for the payment. I ask you, therefore, has Pennsylvania sustained any loss thereby? Why, no. It secured the construction of the Allegheny Valley railroad, which proved a benefit to both the western and interior portions of the State. There was no injury arising from these acts of 1857 or 1858 or 1861 or 1869. In my judgment the delegate from York was unfortunate in instancing this portion of legislation as showing corruption. It has shown anything but that. It has shown wisdom.

Mr. Chairman, the delegate said it was wrong to repeal this tonnage tax. I said so at the time and I felt so. Not exactly as a Philadelphian—not exactly as a Pennsylvanian. At that time I was a director in a railroad, a link in roads reaching from the city of New York through to Buffalo, on through the town of Erie, on to Chicago, and clear west as far as the railroad extended at that time, and as a director in that railroad we felt opposed and we expressed ourselves against the repeal of the tonnage tax, and why? Because it was three mills on each ton on each mile traveled in favor of the Lake Shore roads. I was a director in that road, a road in which I have to-day more than I have of this world's goods in any other one thing, except in real estate; but, Mr. Chairman, I see now that it was right to repeal that tax. Right, not because it has been decided since to be unconstitutional, but it was right because it was giving an advantage to the Lake Shore road by the amount of this tonnage tax over the roads of this State, taking from Pittsburgh and taking from Philadelphia, while it turned to Buffalo and from that point to Boston and New York, a trade that legitimately belonged to Pittsburgh, to this city, and to Pennsylvania in particular.

I believed then, and I believe now, that the repeal of the tonnage tax was a wise measure, for the reasons I have mentioned. The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) said yesterday that it was done in order that the Pennsylvania road could compete with the Ohio and Baltimore road. Then, Mr. Chairman, the trade along the south shores of Lake Erie dwarfed that of the Baltimore and Ohio road and equaled that of the Baltimore and Ohio and the Pennsylvania railroad, both combined. When you take into consideration the Atlantic and Great Western and the Lake Shore road, their trade exceeded that of both these other corporations. I say, then, it was right to repeal that tax, even if the Constitution of the United States did not do it, as now decided by the Supreme Court of the United States.

But then, Mr. Chairman, look a little further. Since that time two roads have been constructed through Canada from the east to the west. One road from below the falls of Niagara, through the centre of Canada, reaching the Detroit river near to Detroit. Another, a competing road to that, has been constructed in Canada. That company has constructed a bridge across the Niagara river at Buffalo, and have constructed along the north shore, at Lake Erie, another railroad that is a substantial competitor with that on the south shore, and is an efficient competition with the Pennsylvania railroad. It was in order to enable the Pennsylvania railroad to compete successfully with these corporations that I say, it was wise in the Legislature to repeal the tonnage tax. Instead of its being corruption, it was wise in the Legislature to repeal this tax at the time it did. In this, also, the delegate from York is unfortunate.

Mr. Chairman, upon the subject of oaths—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: I move that unanimous consent be given to the gentleman from Erie to proceed—

Mr. LILLY. I object.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman: The discussion on the pending question has become very desultory, embracing not only the railroads of this State and the nation, but even Canadian affairs; and all this upon the adoption of a form of oath.

I am utterly opposed to this manner of debate; if it is continued we shall not get through our labors here for a year.

We can only hope to make progress in our work when delegates are confined to the discussion of the immediate question under debate.

I rise, then, to say a word on the question of the oath which has been so much disparaged by some of the members who have preceded me in this discussion. I am one of those who are anxious to ascertain which of these oaths is the strongest, and whichever is the strongest I am in favor of. If there is any gentleman in this House who is able to make one stronger than that made by the gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) let him produce it. I will vote for it, and the great christian heart of this Commonwealth will vote for it, if it is submitted to them. They look upon the matter of taking oaths as not a sacriligious act, as not a profanation of the great and holy name of the Deity, but as a reverential act of homage and worship. All christians must look upon it in that light, and it is only those who are infidels at heart, (except those who have conscientious scruples about the form of the oath itself,) who will array themselves against the taking of an oath, and join in with these men to put it down.

Look over the country, everywhere, and who are the men who are clamoring against the administration of an oath? Who are they that are asking for the abolition of the oath? Is it the great mass of the christian people of this country, or is it confined chiefly to the men who profess to be infidels, and yet who are so cowardly that they cannot face the presence of Almighty God when asked to take an oath? They cower then, and for that reason they want it abolished. And for that reason I would make it so strong that infidelity should be made to know, before the days of adversity come, that there is a God. There is no man on this continent, none that ever lived or ever will live, who can, when the last hour comes, deny the existence of God, though he may preach it when he is in prosperity; and the great misfortune now is that the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) comes up and joins in asking that this oath shall be put down, and yet he does not speak for that class. He is one of those whose conscientious scruples I respect, but he is provided for by this very oath, as provision is made for all christians to exercise their choice, and instead of an oath take a solemn affirmation. This ought to be all that he should ask here. Let him go and take that affirmation. There is no insult there to the christian religion.

It is as much in accordance with Holy Writ to "perform unto the Lord thine oaths" as it is to "swear not at all," because the christian heart of the entire world will assume that no man violates the precepts unless he swears falsely.

The supreme power of the State commands that you shall perform unto the Lord your oaths in the way of a confirmation of the truth; and when the State provides a form of oath, which also includes affirmation, a man should take it because he would be absolved if there were really anything wrong in it, as all men must be subservient to the powers that be. For that reason the stronger the oath can be made the more cheerfully will I vote for it. Yes, I would vote for it if it would raise the hairs on the head of a villain like "the quills on the fretful porcupine." I have seen in courts of justice men who have come upon the stand and claimed the right to affirm, under the pretext that they had conscientious scruples, who neither believed in God nor the devil, and who, when put to the wall and required to take the oath, trembled and turned pale, showing that there is such a thing as men quailing when they are made to confront the great Eternal Power. For this reason I hope that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: The discussion seems to have taken a wide range, judging from what I saw in the papers this morning, not having been present yesterday, and the discussion has continued to-day in the same unrestrained manner. A great deal has been said in reference to what has been done in the Legislature in former years, and I suppose that those facts have been brought to the attention of this body for the purpose of showing that members of the Legislature have been suspected of not being pure.

Now, Mr. Chairman, although I have my own opinion about the members of the Legislature, I have that opinion simply because they are taken from the community and are members of this great human family in the State of Pennsylvania. But it is not necessary for the gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black) or the gentleman from Erie, (Mr. Walker,) or any one else, to give particular instances of what has been done by the members of the Legislature to prove that human nature is not sufficient always to withstand temptation. We can find from the same authority to which the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) refers, that human nature needs all the support it can get for the purpose of keeping it from falling into error, if not into corruption. From the time when our unfortunate progenitor partook

"Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
Brought death into the world, and all our woe,
With loss of Eden," down to the period of the speculation in the stock of the Credit Mobilier, there has been every day found abundant confirmation of the Divine declaration that "the human heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked."

The members of the Legislature have, in their bosoms, this human heart thus corrupted by the primal sin, which we carry about with us to this day, and although it has been asserted in this House that we are setting ourselves up for a body of purity, I have never heard it, and I do not understand that such is the case. We all acknowledge our fallen condition, and acknowledge that we are strengthened and supported when we come to the book and appeal to God, that as we shall perform the duty we swear to perform, so may we be helped by that Divine power; and I say that no man, be he christian or pagan, can fail to feel the solemnity of the occasion when that Divine sentiment, that is in every man's bosom along with this fallen condition, is appealed to in this solemn manner. It does not matter whether a man is a christian or a pagan, with regard to this sentiment of reverence. They all have it.

The gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) in speaking upon this very subject, in the introduction of his report upon the Legislature, spoke of it, I believe, as a prejudice. Sometimes it gets to be a prejudice, because it is the natural sentiment without the information and intelligence of a christian; but whatever country we go to, to whatever age of the world we turn, under whatever kind of government it may be, that sentiment of reverence may be found. We may find it in the barbarians every where—we may find people without clothing, without education, almost without language, people without the implements of agriculture, the conveniences of life, and without houses, but nowhere, at no time, and in no spot on the face of the earth, will you find a people without their altars and their gods—and when appealed to by their reverence for the objects of their adoration, you will find that they are restrained in their conduct from performing the things which they otherwise would do; and even in the South Sea Islands, where they eat christians with the utmost relish, the word "tabboo" will restrain a man from going into the sacred precincts of temples and groves made sacred by their religious rites. You find that these people are restrained by this spirit of reverence, and all people where they have governments, are bound by oaths to the performance of their duties, which are changed and modified according to what they may regard as the object of their adoration, and it is said that the "Heathen Chinese" is sworn upon the bowels of a recently slaughtered chicken, while they are in a quivering state, and if these pagans are subdued into reverence by such a process, those who go to our Legislatures, who have no idea of the Divine presence, which would bring them to a proper consideration of the performance of their duties, so that the ordinary oath would be of no binding efficacy, may be awed into reverential solemnity by an oath on the palpitating viscera of a dissected legislative rooster, and the State might be benefited in two ways by adopting that form of oath. Now I am in favor of these oaths.

It is said bad men cannot be made better. I say that bad men have that sentiment of reverence in their bosoms, and they are restrained by calling attention to their particular acts which they swear they will not do, and to the performance of the particular duties which are required of them, by virtue of their office. Details in oaths are not new. The old oath, by which we swear a grand jury, is very much in detail, as every lawyer knows. The oath by which we swear the jury to try a man for his life, is not to perform his duty as a jurymen with fidelity, but that he will well and truly try, and true deliverance make between the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the prisoner at the bar, whom they have in charge, and a true verdict render according to the evidence. The constable that is called up to take the book, is sworn that he will take the jury into some convenient room, in this house, and there keep them, and suffer no one to speak to them, or speak to them himself, until they have agreed, unless it be to ask if they have agreed.

A director in a national bank takes an oath, not only that he will perform his duty as a director, but he takes an oath that he is qualified to serve as a director, by reason of his having the requisite quantity of stock, and that none of it is hypothecated, and that he has not otherwise done such acts as to disqualify him for the office of director of the bank.

I say that this thing then is not new, and the good man, the honest man, the conscientious man, will go back in his mind during the period of his stay in the Legislative body to review his conduct, and look forward to what he had to do to see whether he acts up to the requirements of that to which he was sworn to perform when he first came into that body, and he will be strengthened and enlightened as the juror is, as the witness is, who has sworn to tell the truth, as the constable is, as the bank director is, as all the different officers are, who are sworn to perform their duties in a special and detailed manner. Now, I say, there can be no objection to this. It is not offensive to an honest man. It may restrain some one of the peculiarly constituted men, because while I admit that we all come here under the cloud of the primal sin, and having that defect which has been denounced against human nature, that "the human heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked." Yet there are grades of wickedness in the world, and some men, by practice or by nature, get to be worse than others, and the bad man may be restrained. There may be a sentiment of reverence which is cultivated in his boyhood, and which was taught to him at his mother's knee, and even that becomes debased and corrupted. And the politician, if you please, who is called to take an oath, and who has forgotten the sentiments which were distilled into his mind in early youth, may have them revived by the solemnity of being sworn upon the Gospel to do these particular things, and to leave undone the other things.

That is, with regard to the oath which precedes his entering upon the duties of his office. Whether we should go farther—whether this oath, which I understand is proposed by some gentleman here, but which is not now actually before this Convention, to swear these members at the termination of their official career that they have not done any of those things which they were forbidden to do in the first oath—that they have not taken any bribes, &c., whether that should also be attached to the position of a member of the Legislature, I have some doubt. That might do no good, and might only work a forfeiture of a man's hopes of happiness in a future world, when he takes a false oath; because the man has failed to tell the truth upon his final oath, and only blackens his soul with perjury. I do not know that this Convention ought to prescribe terms by which he should be damned in the future world. It looks like vengeance.

It is true that the Prince of Denmark, when charged with the duty of avenging his murdered father, and when seeking, sword in hand, an opportunity for punishing this great wrong, found his uncle engaged at prayer. The Prince was thereabout to take summary vengeance upon his uncle, but, on reflection, he said in substance: "If I slay him now his soul will take its flight to heaven; I will wait until I find him in his incestuous bed, or in dissipation, or gaming."

"Or some other act or occupation,
Which has no relish of salvation in it,
Then trip him, that his heels may kick at Heaven,
And that his soul may be as damned and black
As hell, whereto it goes."

I always thought that that was a sort of punishment that was beyond the idea of christian retribution. There was too much personal vengeance upon the part of the mad Prince in this act, and that we should have prescribed an oath by which we could only enforce performance of duties, and restraints upon corruption. But to follow his term in the Legislature with an oath, that he has kept faith in his first oath, and performed his duties, and if he swear falsely in this final oath, it will not undo what he has done, and cannot benefit the State; but can only add the crime of reiterated perjury to the delinquent member, and eternally damn his soul, without purifying or correcting the record of his official term.

Mr. Kaine. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say a few words upon this question of oaths. Other questions that have had nothing whatever to do with the question before the committee have been discussed here at great length, and with great ability. It was done, I suppose, for the purpose of illustrating the points desired to be made by the gentlemen partaking in the debate.

I prefer the amendment of the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) to the oath as reported by the committee. The oath, as reported by the committee, is nothing more than the oath required by the old Constitution. If there is any efficacy in it at all, which I believe there is, I am in favor of adopting an oath which shall be as strong as possible. We have always had oaths in Pennsylvania from the formation of the government, notwithstanding the assertion of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) a few moments ago to the contrary. There was an oath embodied in the laws prepared by William Penn, in England, in regard to all officers, great and small, in the State. I read from the twenty-sixth paragraph of these laws:

"That all witnesses coming or called to testify their knowledge in or to any matter or thing in any court, or before any lawful authority within the said province, shall there give or deliver in their evidence or testimony by solemnly promising to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth to the matter or thing in question. And in case any person so called to evidence shall be convicted of wilful falsehood, such person shall suffer and undergo such damage or penalty as the person or persons against whom he or she bore false witness did or should undergo; and shall also make satisfaction to the party wronged, and be publicly exposed as a false witness, never to be credited in any court or before any magistrate in the said province."

That was the oath in regard to officers. Then section thirty-four of the same laws says:

"That all treasurers, judges, masters of the roll, sheriffs, justices of the peace, and other officers and persons whatsoever relating to courts or trials of causes or any other service in the government; and all members elected to serve in Provincial Council and General Assembly, and all that have right to elect such members, shall be such as profess faith in Jesus Christ, and that are not convicted of ill fame or unsober or dishonest conversation, and that are of twenty-one years of age at least; and that all such so qualified shall be capable of the said several employments and privileges as aforesaid."

Under the Constitution of 1776, this was the oath prescribed:

"I,———, do swear (or affirm) that, as a member of this assembly, I will not propose or assent to any bill, vote or resolution, which shall appear to me injurious to the people, nor do or consent to any act or thing whatever, that shall have a tendency to lessen or abridge their rights and privileges, as declared in the Constitution of this State, but will in all things conduct myself as a faithful, honest representative and guardian of the people according to the best of my judgment and abilities.

And each member, before he takes his seat, shall make and subscribe the following declaration, viz:

I do believe in one God, the Creator and Governor of the Universe, the Rewarder of the good, and Punisher of the wicked; and I do acknowledge the scriptures of the old and new Testaments to be given by Divine Inspiration."

Those were the oaths established by William Penn and his immediate successors, and I am in favor of continuing something of the kind, because I believe we need them infinitely more now than we did then.

How did the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) become a member of the Bar?—because I believe he is a distinguished attorney of the county which he represents so ably upon this floor. He must have taken a solemn affirmation—if he is opposed to swearing—that "I do solemnly affirm that I will support the Constitution of the United States, and the Constitution of this Commonwealth, and that I will discharge my duty, as an attorney of this court, with all due fidelity to the court, as well as to my client; and that I will use no falsehoods, or delay any man's cause, for lucre or malice."

That is a strong oath.

Mr. BROOMALL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KAINÉ. Certainly.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to know whether the same oath which the gentleman (Mr. Kaine) himself took, by which he was admitted to the bar, has ever, in the smallest degree, influenced his conduct?

Mr. KAINÉ. I hope it has; and a man who would not regard an oath of that kind—an attorney who would take an oath such as this, and say that it had no control or influence over him, I should be sorry to employ him as my counsel in any cause.

Now, sir, these are preliminary questions in this investigation. We had these oaths before; they have done no harm, and, I apprehend, they have done some good. They were left out of the Constitution of 1790, but not altogether, as the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) says, for he says that no oath at all is required by it. The eighth article of the Constitution of 1790, which is copied precisely into the Constitution of 1837-8, provides that:

"Members of the General Assembly, and all officers, Executive and judicial, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of this Commonwealth, and to perform the duties of their respective offices with fidelity."

That is the oath under which we are acting now. The oath by which we bound ourselves, when we organized as members of this Convention, was that we would support the Constitution of the United States, and discharge our duties as members of this Convention with fidelity.

As was well said yesterday, I believe by the gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) every trustee, every executor and every administrator, before entering upon the discharge of his duties as such, must take an oath prescribed by law, and after he has discharged his duties and fulfilled his trust he must, before being released from his responsibility, take another oath that he has discharged his duties faithfully and honestly; and if he swears falsely in the latter case he can be indicted for perjury.

That members of the Legislature have been unfaithful in times past is not to be denied. I have been a member of the Legislature of Pennsylvania in company with the honorable chairman. Much has been said against the Legislature here, and it has been asserted that no man had dared to rise in his place and speak in defence of that Legislature. I know that as honorable and pure men as are to be found in this body, or as have ever lived, have been members of the Legislature of this State. I know, too, that weak and corrupt men have been there. I have no doubt that men have not been wanting who have given their honor for a price. I am not going to discuss anything about this corruption, particularly on this question, except simply to say that as a matter of history—no man need attempt to deny it—that when the United States Bank was chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, in 1836, the members of that body were bought with a price to vote for the charter.

MR. DARLINGTON. Who were they?

MR. KAINE. I am not going to be an informer here for the gentleman from Chester. The gentleman from Chester knows as well as I do who they were. He knows it just as well as he knows that George III was King of England during the Revolution. He knows it just as well as he knows any event in history. So does my friend, the gentleman from Erie.

MR. WALKER. I rise to say, Mr. Chairman, that I was a member of the Legislature which passed the United States Bank charter. I voted for the measure, as I have stated, and, as I am to answer to God, I did not know then, nor do I know now, did I believe then, nor do I believe now, that any man in that Legislature was bribed to vote for that bill.

MR. KAINE. Well, the gentleman from Erie is a good deal older than I am, but he has certainly not read the history of this State! for if that fact has not become a part of the political history of this Commonwealth, as much as that we had a war with Great Britain in 1812, and that General Jackson fought the battle of New Orleans; then I am entirely beyond my reckoning. At any rate, I say this, that no matter what may be the belief of the gentleman from Erie, nor the gentleman from Chester, it is the belief of the people of Pennsylvania that such was the fact. But that has gone into history. This is neither here nor there. It is only a matter of illustration, to show that something should be done to prevent things of that kind from recurring in the future, if anything can be done. Why, sir, is it necessary for a member upon this floor to say here that it is notorious, not only in Pennsylvania, but throughout the length and breadth of this broad land, that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company controls the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and that our Legislature acts precisely at its beck and will? Whatever they desire is done, whatever they desire not to be done, is not done. The repeal of the tonnage tax has been referred to; whether that was right or wrong; whether it was a matter of good policy or bad policy, I do not pretend to say; but that that measure was passed through the Legislature by the corruption of members thereof, has also passed into history, and is not to be questioned at this day. Large amounts of money have been expended by corporations, perhaps other than this, and by individuals also, in procuring improper legislation from the Legislature. And that, sir, is one reason, and that is the main reason, that is given by Mr. Secretary Jordan for the calling of this Convention. If we are not able to do something in respect to that matter to restrain the Legislature in the future, the assembling of this Convention has been in vain.

MR. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say a very few words in explanation of the vote that I propose to give on this subject, and in stating my reasons, and in giving that vote I shall not be influenced in the least by any fear of the imputation which seems to be thrown out by some of the gentlemen who take a different view of the subject from that which I intend to take. I shall not preface what I have to say by any declaration of faith. I consider such things utterly out of place and out of season here. I shall endeavor merely to give a few, a very few, practical reasons why I think the oath submitted by the Committee on Legislature, and the oath submitted by the gentleman from Fayette, (Mr. Kaine,) and advocated so elaborately by the gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) are out of place in this Constitution. I believe all such oaths, and when I say oath, of course I include affirmation, to be proffered in ignorance of ethical and political science, indeed in ignorance of the past history of the world. I believe them to be utterly inefficacious, and I am rather surprised when I hear gentlemen say, as many have said with a good deal of emphasis, that they will vote for as strong an oath as can be put. They certainly do not distinguish between mere strength of language and efficacy as to the result which is destined to be reached by the words employed. If I thought they would be efficacious then, whether the words were strong or weak, I would go for them. But I am entirely satisfied that they are not. If they were, it would be a very simple and a very easy mode of making us all very good, because you would, only at successive stages in the history of each individual, have to swear him or her, as to past and future conduct, to insure perfect virtue. The laws of Providence, the laws of God, are not framed on any such theory; and when I heard the very distinguished gentleman from York, yesterday, referring to the Divine sanction, I wondered that it never occurred to him that Omnipotence should have pre-ordained from the first the plan which gentlemen seize hold of now as a corrective for all the vices of the community. It would have saved a great deal of trouble in this wicked world of ours.

But as I am not yet prepared to believe this, I shall vote against the amendments. I shall vote against them for another reason. I will not undertake to brand, in advance, the representatives of the people as convicted felons, and then expect them to do their duty as honest men. What mean all these provisions, past, present, and future? They mean, in effect, to say, if they mean anything, that the system of republican government is an utter failure; that the men annually or biennially elected; that the men periodically selected from the body of the people to discharge the legislative functions of the government, are so utterly corrupt, that unless they are hedged around by this formidable fence of oaths and affirmations they will depart from their duty in every single particular. I do not believe this, and therefore I shall never say it by any vote of mine. I do believe that much may be done towards the improvement of legislation, both as regards the elector and the elected, by holding each to their proper functions. When you multiply elective offices indefinitely; when you hold up large money prizes to be voted for, you will inevitably corrupt the elector. When, instead of confining the Legislature to the legitimate functions of devising and promulgating laws for the benefit of the whole community, you send them, as they are sent now, for the purpose of conferring special privileges, for the purpose of granting large gratuities to individuals and corporations, the result will inevitably be an injurious one upon the legislator; and no matter what the sanctions, or supposed sanctions, by which you attempt to bind him, your labor will be but in vain.

Now in this section, in this article, further on, there are, it strikes me, many excellent provisions in regard to the evils which I have just alluded to, that will meet my most cordial concurrence. I think they may require some additions which I shall, at the proper time, suggest; but so far as they go they are most valuable. I do, therefore, beg gentlemen, before they commit themselves to a vote in favor of such oaths as these, to pause for a moment, and think whether, by affixing a stain in advance upon those who are to make the laws under which we are to live, they can expect to produce anything but unmixed evil? I do not object to the ordinary oath of office as I find it prescribed in the existing Constitution. It is found in article eight, and as it consists of but a few lines I will take the liberty of reading it:

"Members of the General Assembly, and all officers, Executive and judicial, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of this Commonwealth, and to perform the duties of their respective offices with fidelity."

That is enough, and when gentlemen say or argue that it is not sufficiently specific, they lie under a very grave error. It does cover every possible offence which can be committed by a public officer or by a representative; and the statute law defines with sufficient precision what these offences are in detail, and points out the punishment. More is unnecessary. The gentleman from Fayette (Mr. Kaine) fell into an unintentional error, I am sure unintentionally, when he attributed to the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) an assertion somewhat different from this. The gentleman from Delaware undoubtedly did say that in the article of the Constitution upon the Legislature, and as he thought in a similar article in the Constitution of 1790, there was no provision for an oath or affirmation; and in saying this he was strictly accurate, as no such provision is there found. The only provision on the subject is the one I have read, which does not assume, as it ought not, to distinguish between members of the Legislature and other officers of the Commonwealth.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: I beg leave to explain. I understood the gentleman from Delaware to say that there was no provision in the present Constitution for any oath whatever.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: What I said was that there is no provision in the legislative portion, no special provision there in the present Constitution, or the Constitution of 1790,

Mr. BIDDLE. My remarks are about being brought to a close. This subject has been very fully, and very ably discussed on both sides; perhaps with a fertility of illustration by some of the gentlemen who spoke yesterday, which went beyond the immediate range of the discussion, but still in a manner that proved very interesting, and with which we have all been very much gratified.

One thing I would like to say to the gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black) before I sit down.

When he undertook to criticise unfavorably, as he did, a man like Jeremy Bentham, he undertook to criticise one of the greatest lights of jurisprudence which this, or any other age, has ever produced. He was a man who worked out theoretically, without the slightest practical knowledge, the whole rationale of judicial evidence. Had he lived but a single generation longer he would have lived to find adopted by every civilized country in which the common law of England prevails, every improvement in the law of evidence suggested by him, which is certainly no ordinary triumph for the philosophic inquirer into truth.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman: This discussion has taken a very wide range. But I shall endeavor, in the few words I say, to speak directly to the point in question. I shall not attempt to answer the gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Corson,) and the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. Broomall,) in regard to the scriptural arguments against oaths; because I do not consider that it is a question or line of argument that concerns this body at all. We have assembled here as practical men to do a practical work; and I cannot believe that any good can arise whatever from examining subjects in that point of view. I think, if it were necessary to go over the arguments of the gentlemen, that they could be refuted, and that it could be clearly shown. The swearing that was then referred to, did not in any form or shape, or in any sense or meaning, refer to the matters such as we are now discussing—I mean judicial oaths, or solemn appeals or statements made in view of responsibility to a Supreme power. It was from a profane appeal in the semi-barbarous condition of the world at that time to certain powers, and appeals to the earth and to the sun, or against profanity, perhaps. That was the kind of swearing that I apprehend was condemned, and it had nothing to do with the matter that this Convention is now discussing. It is enough for me to know, Mr. Chairman, that for years past, for ages past, there has been held to be a certain sanctity, and a certain solemnity, and a binding force which properly attaches to the position of a man standing up and recognizing the existence of the Most High in some form, no matter how rude, that witnesses his actions and to which he must render a final account. That is all we have now to consider. That this has been recognized as having been of binding force for years past, no intelligent gentleman will deny; but the gentleman from Philadelphia who has just taken his seat (Mr. Biddle) seems to agree with the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Corson) and the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) in regard to the inefficacy of this matter of oaths. I think the gentleman is under a mistake. I think that to the average mind, be he a legislator, or officer in any capacity, there is a certain binding force in oaths, and this was recognized as much by the great man whose portrait is over your head, Mr. Chairman, as by any of the great legislators of the past. It is true that he, by a technical distinction, rather than one of principle, held that an affirmation should be used as equally binding, being more simple and equally solemn in its character. He recognized it as equally efficacious, and so it has been proved to be for hundreds of years past.

I think the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle) was wrong in the inference that he has drawn in regard to its inefficacy, or rather the inefficacy of all oaths. Why, I might ask the gentleman, are they retained, unless from a belief, almost universal, that they have weight and influence, and determine the conduct of average class of our citizens. He says, further, that he will never vote to say that members of the Legislature are felons, that he will never vote to impose this oath upon them, as it implies that they are felons. It seems to me the gentleman's objection takes too wide a range. The oath was administered the other day to the President of this great nation. Does it imply that he was a felon? Did he probably so consider it?

No, sir; not at all. It seems to me the principle is very nearly identical. It is no implication of the kind. It might not be necessary for the present incumbent, but it might chance to be necessary for some man who was not restrained by equally high moral considerations, but who, to some extent, would be restrained by the solemnity of his oath. I see no force or weight in the views of the gentleman from Philadelphia with regard to its being impliedly an insult upon the Legislature. I think we have had abundant testimony, without going into the question whether the members of the Legislature have been in the past the most corrupt people in the State, to show that some restraint should be imposed upon a certain class, or certain individuals that might become members of that body; and I do solemnly believe that this class will, to a certain extent, be reached.

Now I submit this view, that inasmuch as it has some effect, that it does reach a certain class, and if the thing be not wrong in itself, why should we not adopt it? If its tendency is to do some good, if it would be some restraint, why not, if it is not wrong in itself, and if no harm would probably arise from it, adopt the measure? It is not necessarily a taint upon a man who is required to take the oath; it does not presume that he is corrupt, or that he intends to do a corrupt thing; and there is a certain class of men who do go into the legislative hall, around whom it is necessary to throw all these restraints.

Although I am exceedingly solicitous to pursue every measure that will assist in this great work of throwing guards around the purity of our legislators; yet I cannot see that much benefit which will be likely to arise from the adoption of the proposition of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) in regard to prevent action by party caucus.

Mr. CUYLER. There must be some confusion here in reference to its meaning. If I mistake not, as the Clerk read it this morning, it was in a different form from what it was when offered yesterday. I may be mistaken with regard to that, however, and I thought it was only designed to apply to caucuses of members of a party when a vote was to be taken on a certain measure. If it could be kept there; that is, if it would compel men to sink party whenever they come to legislate for all parties or for the whole State, and if it would have, or if it were calculated to have, any such effect, certainly I should support it. But it seems to be thought that it simply trammels men in their party sense, and perhaps it would be as well, inasmuch as that it does not seem to be very fully matured, to pass it over.

I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Dauphin, because I think that it goes closer to this evil, if there be any good whatever in oaths, which I still am inclined to believe. I am so old-fashioned as that, and if it can be amended by inserting the well digested thoughts of the distinguished gentleman from York, (Mr. Black,) about which I think there is a certain practicability, that when a man's course is ended, he shall be obliged to take an oath, stating that he has not done such and such wrong, and if he swears falsely he is to be subject to the pains and penalties of perjury—then I think a certain practical end could be gained and I shall vote with much pleasure for such an amendment.

Mr. HUNSICKER. Mr. Chairman: An oath is an obligation which has a two-fold character. It is binding, or supposed to be binding upon the conscience of the person who takes it. And, secondly, we make it binding upon him by adding a temporal pain and penalty to it, in case he violates it.

There is no necessity of justifying an oath by referring to its antiquity, or to its sacred character. To a Convention of intelligent gentlemen, like this, an argument of that kind would be an insult. I have been at a loss to discover from this discussion that there is really much difference between us, because the chairman of the Committee on Legislation (Mr. H. White) contends that his oath covers all that is provided for in the oath reported by the Committee on Legislation, and the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Bidle,) though he started out with a speech against the sanctity of an oath, yet wound up by saying that he preferred the old form of oath prescribed in the amended Constitution of 1838, which requires that the officers shall swear that they will support the Constitution of this Commonwealth, and perform the duties of their respective offices with fidelity.

Now that oath, in just that language, would cover every part and parcel of all these amplifications. It covers the whole ground, and the man who would take that oath on assuming any office, and then sell his official position for money, or take a bribe, or would betray the trust of his constituents, would be guilty of perjury, and would make himself liable to the pains and penalties of perjury here, and would close the gates of Heaven against him hereafter; and the only thing that the friends of an "iron-clad" oath, of whom I claim to be one, desire is, that the same form of oath, so well illustrated by the gentleman from Bucks, (Mr. Lear,) that is administered to a grand jury, which contains, in detail, every part and parcel of their duty, shall be administered to a member of the General Assembly when he takes his seat, and that he shall be conscious, at the time he invokes Heaven to witness the sincerity of his vow, that he has still another oath to take, and this will serve to remind him at every step of his progress through legislation, until he concludes, that when he goes home he must go before some judge, or some one competent to administer an oath, and there, again, with his hands upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, swear a solemn oath, that throughout that legislation, and throughout the discharge of his official duties, he has lived up to the oath that he first took.

I do not believe that there lives a man without a conscience, although a man may affect not to believe in any supernatural power, yet he would, notwithstanding, be reminded by that conscience, which is possessed in common by all mankind, that he perils his present or future happiness and peace, by violating the obligation of any oath, no matter in what form it is administered.

The peculiar form of oath assumed by the "Heathen Chinese," is as binding upon his conscience as the form of oath assumed by the christian is binding upon his. It is in each case in accordance with his religious belief. Let this oath be assumed, and let it be assumed with solemnity.

I am very much pleased to find that both these committees recommend that the oath shall be administered by a judge of the Supreme Court. I, sir, would have him, furthermore, clothed in the robes of his office. I would like to see every man coming up, and with the uplifted hand taking the most solemn form of oath that it is possible to frame, and I would have the ceremony as impressive as possible. The reason why so many of our oaths have been disregarded is because of the hurried manner in which they were administered. The conscience of the individual has not been properly pricked, it has not been properly affected by the sense of the obligation which has been assumed. I shall vote for an efficacious oath, and I certainly believe that that oath is most efficacious which goes to every part and parcel of a man's duty. I shall strike hands with the delegate from Somerset, (Mr. Baer,) and I pledge myself, now and here, to vote for the strongest form of oath which human ingenuity can devise. There is no degradation involved in any oath if a man is honest and means to discharge his duty honestly; he will take a long oath if it be prescribed, and will take it in the most solemn manner, and with a fuller realization of his accountability than if he took a short oath. Why is it that you want a short oath? Is it because a man, after taking a short oath, can argue with his conscience, and persuade his conscience out of the right path? We sometimes see in courts that a man will come up to the witness stand, and when the question is asked whether he will swear or affirm, that he sets up a pretence that he has conscientious scruples against taking an oath. Why is it that, in instances like that, a man will prevaricate and equivocate and avoid the truth, while if he is sworn with the uplifted hand or with the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God in his hand, and which he kisses—why is it that he will then tell the truth? Why is it, too, that in the experience of every member of the bar, and every other person within the sound of my voice, that when a man persistently lies on the witness stand, and you remind him of his oath, he will tremble and turn pale? It is because his conscience has stricken him.

For these reasons I shall vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) because I believe it to be an amplification of the same oath which is reported by the Committee on Legislation. I shall also vote for the after-oath submitted by the gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) because I believe it will have a wholesome influence by reminding the law-maker all the time that his last duty will be to swear that he has performed his duty to the people faithfully. Thus this first and last oath will act as a guard and shield against every temptation that may assail the integrity of the legislator, and thus restore that public confidence in the law-making power which is now so seriously shaken, if not destroyed.

MR. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I cannot let a subject so important as this be decided by this Convention without expressing his views upon it.

The main object for which we are assembled here is to make such changes in the organic law of the State as shall tend to purify the legislation of the Commonwealth, and I believe that I have as earnest a desire as any member on this floor, to give every vote of mine, and to direct every word that I may utter here, with that special view.

In the interest, sir, of a purified Legislature in Pennsylvania, I appeal to the members of this Convention to vote down these amendments. I was for four years a member of the Legislature of this State, and I was as industrious as my health and physical condition would permit me to be. I believe—I may have been mistaken, but I believe—that for three sessions of the time I was there, I could write the name of every member of the Legislature who had ever been influenced by improper motives in the passage of bills. I believe that number in no one of these sessions exceeded fifteen members, and in some of the sessions it did not come up even to that number. I believe that fifteen was the largest number of members that entered the Legislature during my knowledge of it that, in the passage of Acts of assembly, were ever influenced by improper motives.

A majority may have been mistaken; frequently a majority is mistaken. They may have passed laws which a majority of the conscientious men throughout the State thought improper, but, as firmly as I believe in my own existence, I believe in the entire integrity of the large majority of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and I as firmly believe that these oaths which you propose to put upon them will increase the number of those corruptible men rather than decrease it. I say further that of those fifteen, the highest number that I can name, I believe every one of them would have taken these oaths, and you may increase oaths a hundred-fold, and they will take them as calmly as they will take a cup of cold tea. The eighty-five honest men would shrink back from these oaths; and the fifteen would not hesitate to take them. The eighty-five honest men will act honestly without them—the fifteen will not act honestly with them. There are a great many men who would adorn the Legislature, and would deem it an honor to be there, who would never take such oaths as these.

Why, sir, you propose to proclaim in advance by these oaths that a man who consents to be a member of the Legislature is presumed to be a rascal and villain. That proclamation is made upon this record, if you adopt any of these amendments as part of your Constitution. If any man, no matter what his character and reputation may have been before, will consent to enter this body, all the people of the State will have the right to presume that he is purchasable, and he must, by taking one of these oaths, proclaim that he is not purchasable.

Sir, I have never more than once or twice been asked if I considered myself an honest man; cannot recall more than a single such occasion. A man came into my office to employ me once, and asked me that question. I showed him the door, and told him he could leave as quickly as possible. I would do the same thing standing before the Speaker in the House of Representatives. I would show myself the door if asked to swear that I was an honest man; for that is precisely what the amendment under consideration will require. There is not an honest man that does not feel insulted when such a question is asked of him. Notwithstanding the assertion of the gentleman from Fayette (Mr. Kaine) that he has been influenced by his oath as an attorney, I cannot believe it. I took the same oath which he did when being admitted to practice law in the courts of this Commonwealth, but I say, with all solemnity, that from that day to this it never once influenced my conduct in a single particular, for I felt myself bound to do all that the oath asked me to do, and more too, as an honest man.

Mr. Kaine. I should like to ask the gentleman whether, when he took the oath as a member of the bar, that he "would delay no man's cause for lucre or malice," he considered that oath degrading.

Mr. Mann. No, sir; because it was the ordinary time-honored oath, that had been administered for years and years, so long that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. But here you propose to inject into the Constitution a new oath, unusual, implying that all legislators are dishonest, and it is that which makes it degrading. The point I am trying to make is that I do not believe the oath which an honest man takes affects him or his conduct in any particular, because, without the oath, he would feel bound to do all that the oath requires of or imposes upon him.

The only effect which an oath has upon any witness in court, or wherever the oath may be taken, is because of the penalty attached to it. You affect no man's integrity or honesty by imposing oaths upon him. You do appeal to his fears when you impose a penalty for swearing falsely. It is the penalty imposed upon the falsehood that affects him, not the oath itself.

Sir, I believe in penalties. If a man commits an offence punish him for it; and the Committee on Legislation have provided amply for the punishment of bribery or corruption on the part of members. They have provided amply that in the passage of bills the Legislature shall observe such forms of legislation as shall protect the interests of the Commonwealth hereafter.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: Since the gentleman from Potter (Mr. Mann) is giving in his personal experience here, I propose to ask him this question: Whether, if there was no prohibition in the Constitution to prevent him from having any intercourse with gentlemen of the "lobby," he would have allowed that intercourse to go on between himself and the "lobby?"

Mr. MANN. No, sir; I would not. In the four years that I had the honor of a seat in the Legislature no "lobbyist" ever addressed me on any subject, and I know a great many other men that no "lobbyist" ever approached. That is the way to purify the halls of legislation. Send honest men there, and your "lobbyists" will go home; their occupation will be gone.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Supposing he thought it entirely convenient and right to hear what had to be said in favor of a bill by a party that was interested in it, and would permit private solicitations in the absence of any oath to the contrary. Then suppose he is called upon to swear that he will not listen to any solicitations whatever, would he or would he not keep that oath?

Mr. MANN. I say I would do all that without the oath, and I say that the oath has no binding force upon me, because an honest man is required to do it without the oath.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Most assuredly an honest man may listen to the solicitations of persons who are interested in bills. They do it every day, do they not?

Mr. MANN. Certainly they will listen to honest men, men who have a proper business to be there; and I do not propose to prevent that. I, sir, do not propose to prevent the proper communication of the constituent with his representative.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. But suppose you are sworn to prevent it, would you not keep your oath?

Mr. MANN. I do not propose to be sworn. I am opposed to any such oath. What I say is that any attempts to prevent "lobby" influence, and all other improper influence by oaths, must necessarily be a failure. It cannot be done. As to the caucus part of the oath I was not speaking. I was making no remarks upon that part of the proposed amendment to the oath which attempts to prevent any communication whatever between the constituents and their representative. I said nothing about that, although I do not believe in that.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: The gentleman refers to his legislative experience of four years. Will he pardon me for asking him whether, under any circumstances, he voted for a bill because a caucus had resolved to pass it, but which his private judgment condemned, and I would remind him in that connection to the amended registry law of the city of Philadelphia?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: My friend from the city is very anxious about his caucus amendment.

Mr. CUYLER. I am.

Mr. MANN. I was not talking about that. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUYLER. I understood the gentleman's remarks to cover all that ground, the whole ground of legislative oaths.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: What I said was that I believed an honest man would act honestly without oaths. I was going to say directly that some of these amendments proposed requirements that I think ought not to be asked of a member. They are objectionable on that ground.

Now, since the gentleman from Philadelphia wants me to be diverted from the line of thought I was trying to pursue to the question of caucus, I will willingly gratify the gentlemen. I am opposed to the amendment concerning caucus.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I would simply add to my question, in that connection, the metropolitan police bill.

Mr. MANN. I do not remember having anything to do with the metropolitan police bill.

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MANN. One at a time, if you please.

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman will allow me, I only desire to state that the metropolitan police bill never went before any caucus.

Mr. MANN. I do not know anything about that. I was not there.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. About the registry law, then?

Mr. MANN. I do not suppose I am obliged to answer questions that are not pertinent to the matter in hand. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I would just as soon talk about the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia concerning caucuses as not. It proposes to say that there shall be no association or consultation of members of the Legislature that shall affect them one way or the other in the passage of bills.

Mr. CUYLER. I beg the gentleman's pardon for the interruption; I do not so understand my proposition.

Mr. MANN. That is the way I understand it. Perhaps I read it wrong. I am willing to discuss it in the sense the gentlemen understands it. I am opposed to it. It is a poor time, I submit, after a man has received a caucus nomination to the Legislature, after he has been elected by the influence of a caucus, after he has received all the benefits of these influences, to say to him when he gets to Harrisburg, very coolly, "you must not have anything to do with caucuses." If a gentleman were, after being elected by the means I have described, to turn around and say to the caucus of his fellow-members, "I do not pay any more regard to you," it would be a breach of political honor. It would not, at any rate, be my idea of honor. The time to disregard caucus influence is when the convention meets to nominate its candidate. If a man asks for its nomination, if he wants to be a candidate of a caucus, he must be willing to abide by caucus influences. If he wants to be independent of caucus action, let him stand out as an independent man and run on his own strength, and announce himself as the candidate of men who do not believe in caucus. Then, if elected, he can disregard them.

That is my answer to the gentleman from the city. When I make up my mind to disregard caucuses, I will step outside of the influences of caucuses, and not appeal to them. I will do as a friend of mine of other parties, in my district, said when this question was up. "When the caucuses of my party get so bad that I cannot stand them, I will jump over to the other side." That is what I would do, and if they are so bad that I could not stand them, I will jump out of all party caucuses. For that reason I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia. I say it is asking a man to be dishonorable, and I do not like to ask a man to take such a course. I do not believe that the gentleman himself would be willing to submit to his own amendment. If he were elected by the action of his party, he would not want to take any such oath. I am very sorry to differ with the gentleman, because I was very much in sympathy with the tone of his remarks. I understand him to be opposed to this piling up of oaths, and that he is opposed to the pending amendment, and that we are agreed on the main question. Indeed, I am very strongly of the belief that this amendment which he has moved, is just a feeler put out to see how far in the road of foolish action this Convention will go. I do not think he believes in it himself.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I can assure the gentleman that I believe in it thoroughly.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say only a few words.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. I thought you were through.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Potter yield the floor?

Mr. MANN. No, sir. I desire to pay my respects to the gentleman from York. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, if I had not got entirely beyond that period of time when a person can be very much astonished, I should have been astonished yesterday, very much astonished. We had a line of remarks indulged in yesterday that I cannot comprehend at all, except upon the supposition suggested by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle) this morning, that the gentleman from York believed republican government is an entire failure. If that is so, then the remarks of the gentleman made yesterday were consistent. If not, I did not understand what the purport of them was. If I believed what he asserted I should vote to abolish the Legislature entirely. Why, it has become a nuisance beyond purification if the statement which he made be true. But, Mr. Chairman, I believe, with a deep conviction, that what was said yesterday was of as strong a sensational a character as anything George Sands wrote, and as fictitious. It was purely sensational, and the gentleman has become so one-sided on this question, and so absorbed in it, and has been looking so much at the conduct of some of his clients that he can not imagine there are any honest men; and he has just come, as I learn, from the papers, from the successful vindication of a client about whom there has been more allegations of fraud, embezzlement and improper conduct than any other man in the State. And yet, with a little of his learning and his ability, he has brought that man out scot free, and he is as clear as any of us to-day. I do not know how much it would take to have this same ability brought to the vindication of any others charged with fraud and corruption, but I will undertake to say that if they will only secure the gentleman to defend them, they will come out with clean hands and unspotted skirts. Why, sir, the whole community, from Philadelphia to Lake Erie, rung with the charges of corruption, and embezzlement, and crime, in connection with this man. It now turns out to have been pure fiction! There was nothing in it! When it comes to be investigated under the legal ability of my friend from York, there is no crime developed. The man simply made a mistake of a few dollars as to the amount that was due him! Nothing more. Merely a mistake. That is the verdict of the court and the jury, assisted by the legal learning of my friend York, helping to develop that state of things, and to vindicate this much injured George O. Evans from the charges that have been made against him, and I take it that having vindicated the principal in this transaction, all of the accessories have been vindicated likewise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: I move he have unanimous consent to continue.

Mr. LILLY. I object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I merely wanted to add a passage of scripture. But that, I suppose, would not be palatable in this Convention.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: I am not conscious of having done anything wrong in the course of the trial to which the gentleman (Mr. Mann) alludes. I kept my oath. I used no falsehood. I was true to the court as well as to the client. I should be very proud of the vindication it gave to an injured man if I had brought it about; but the verdict resulted from the zeal and ability of my colleagues, from the intelligence of the jury and the justice of the great magistrate who presided. But this certainly looks more like a personal controversy than a discussion of the subject before the committee.

He says another thing, however, which is more to the point, when he declares that the tender of an oath to a member of the Legislature is an insult to him, and that he would so consider it in his own case. When the first President of the United States, the greatest man that ever lived in all the tide of time, whose name no true American ever mentions without emotions of respect and reverence, was called upon to take a specific oath that he would preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States, it never struck him that he was insulted. The provision which required it was inserted by himself in the Constitution, signed with his own right hand. But here is a gentleman who, if not greater than Washington, is far more sensitive about his personal honor. He is ready to be insulted—he blazes up with indignation—when you propose that he shall take an oath like that taken by the great Father of his Country. It is not really a question whether a man shall be sworn or not, but whether it shall be modified so as to make it specific, intelligible and binding. It is proposed that if the gentleman from Potter is ever elected a member of the Legislature, he shall declare, on oath or affirmation, that he will obey the Constitution, not merely that he will support it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I would like to interrupt the gentleman. Does he mean to imply that I object to that kind of an oath?

Mr. J. S. BLACK. You don't object to the kind of oath now required.

Mr. MANN. Not to the ordinary oath.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. No, certainly! Not to the vague, meaningless and flangible oath which is now taken. The gentleman thinks that very good. But when you propose an oath that is unequivocal, and cannot be evaded, then he feels himself aggrieved. He does not object to swearing himself, or making other members of the Legislature swear, provided you don't require them to swear straight up to some point of duty.

Those who think that our rulers should be trusted as we trust nobody else, without binding them to be faithful, even by an oath, for the violation of which they can be punished, ought to remember the admonition of Mr. Jefferson. He said that the security of our liberties rested upon jealousy, not upon confidence. The people of this country are not worthy to be free if they do not watch their institutions most carefully. We ought to encourage the vigilance of jealousy, not the apathy and negligence which results from confidence. The inheritance of free popular government is so precious that I would double the guards at every available point. Let us take all the chances to save its works, not only from the force that masses upon them by open assault, but from the more dangerous, because more insidious, enemy which undermines their foundations by treachery and corruption. Mr. Jefferson was, unfortunately, absent in France when the federal Constitution was adopted. If he had been at home he would, doubtless, have caused some provision to be inserted against the abuses which have since grown to be so monstrous. If his compatriots in the Convention could have foreseen the fatal degeneracy of their sons, they, without his aid, would have done something effectual to save us from the horrible corruption which now reigns in the federal and in all the State Legislatures.

We are told in some quarters that an oath, no matter how specific and clear it may be, will not influence the conduct of a person who takes it in the slightest degree. It seems to be thought that members of the Legislature are, and will always be, particularly unscrupulous about perjuring themselves. The opinion of Jeremy Bentham, that the religious sanction of an oath never has any effect upon the conscience, is fully adopted by some members of this Convention. Bentham may speak for himself. It is probable that he feared God as little as he respected man. But the gentleman from Potter certainly does himself great injustice when he allows us to suppose that he is in that category. He would most assuredly do whatever he might presume to do on his oath or affirmation. He might haggle about taking the oath—he would not like to walk in the path so straight—but he would keep it if he took it, and do what it binds him to do, though the thing be otherwise indifferent. So would the average run of our legislators. I cannot say that I think much of them in their fallen condition, but brace them well with an iron-clad oath and they will not fall. When a new member of ordinary character takes the gospel of God in his hands, or makes a solemn affirmation that he will not have any intercourse with lobbyists, he will give the back of his hand to that infamous fraternity. The oaths will be ever present to his mind, and when the tempter approaches him he will say "Get the behind me, Satan. I see the bright line of duty stretching out before me. I am sworn to follow it. Shall I lay perjury upon my soul? No, not for worlds."

I admit there may be some who have no conscience, and no fear of the Divine displeasure. We have another way of dealing with them. We will, if this Convention assent, catch them by another oath, to be administered after they go out. They shall swear that they have not violated their duty. If they refuse the oath they become incapable of re-election, and we are well rid of them. If they take it and swear falsely, they are guilty of perjury, and may suffer the temporal pains due to that crime. Will not that be effective? Can you conceive of a human being who is at once knave and fool enough to do an act which he must swear he did not do, and take with it the open risk of the penitentiary?

But, Mr. Chairman, the wretches are but few who have no check except human law. Those who deny the general efficacy of oaths ignore the influence and the value of the christian religion. I make no quarrel, at present, with those who dissent from its doctrines, for we are not here to discuss theology. But I take leave to assert, as matter of historical fact, that christianity is not a failure. It has totally changed the moral character of every community that adopted it. The history of its progress through the ages is covered all over with light. Uncounted thousands of men and women have laid down their lives for it. Our fathers came to this country mainly for the purpose of planting the faith which they conscientiously believed to be true. They did plant it. They taught to their children, and to their bond servants, and to the stranger within their gates. It became interwoven with the whole frame-work of their society. It has been propagated over the whole continent, and its principles have everywhere chrystalized into good works. The faith, hope and charity, which are its great elements, exhibit themselves all around. From almost every hill-top you can see the spire of a church. Schools, alms-houses, hospitals, seem to rise like exhalations from the earth. They are the results of that voluntary, but unostentatious benevolence which refuses to let its left know what its right doeth, a benevolence taught in the New Testament, and taught nowhere else. Is this all hypocrisy? You may call it a superstition, if you will, but is it a sham? In every house you find a Bible, and an overwhelming majority profess to believe every word of it. Their deeds seem to correspond with their words. Is there no security in this? Are they mere whitened sepulchres, goodly on the outside, but filled with dead men's bones and all uncleanness? No; to say that there is not faith enough in the country to bind the conscience of a representative man by an oath, is as comprehensive a slander as the most ribald infidel ever uttered against the Being who made him.

But I repeat that we do not mean to trust the mere conscience of any body. We will take something more than a religious sanction. The representatives spawned upon the Legislature by a stuffed and fraudulent ballot-box might probably defy that. Them we will expose and punish. Their sins shall find them out. We will not be so kind as my friend from Potter has been to the fifteen members whom he knew to be governed by corrupt and improper influences. We will not keep their secrets as he seems to have kept those of his colleagues at Harrisburg.

Mr. Chairman, opposition to this oath and to all measures of defense against corrupt legislation, is to be expected. It is not in the nature of things that men who live and thrive by dishonest practices will quit their occupation because we, the people, don't like it. I have no doubt that the opposition will be very serious. When these provisions were first offered in committee, their friends were warned that they would excite the hostility of a large body interested in the present state of things. It was said that they were strong enough to control fifty thousand votes in this city. They can do more than that—they can add twenty-five thousand to the count by fraudulent returns. What combinations they make with political leaders in the country I do not know. But a dishonest faction, which returns seventy-five thousand votes, can generally make its own terms with a party which cannot maintain its ascendancy without them.

The CHAIR. The time of the gentleman from York has expired.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman: With the permission of the chair, I will yield my time to the gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black.)

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I object.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. He can do that.

Mr. WOODWARD. I trust the Convention will allow the gentleman to proceed.

Mr. LILLY. It requires a motion or unanimous consent; and I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, so that the question may be understood by the Convention, the Convention has made a specific order, and it is not competent for the committee of the whole to reverse that order. It is the privilege of any member, sitting in committee of the whole, to avail himself of the order of the Convention; but if, by unanimous consent, opportunity be given for a gentleman on the floor to proceed, the difficulty would be obviated. It cannot, however, be done by a vote, since that would be over-ruling the order of the Convention. The gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Hay) having had the floor, and having yielded it to the gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) the Chair will hold, for the present, that he has a right so to do. The gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black) will proceed.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I move that leave be granted.

The CHAIRMAN. It cannot be done by motion. The gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Hay) was entitled to the floor for twenty minutes, and he has given his time to the gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black.)

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: Do I understand the Chair to say that one member can give his time to another?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may possibly be wrong, but holding it to be the privilege of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Hay) to give his time to the gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) the Chair will for the present, unless overruled by the committee, rule that that may be done.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: The reason why I asked was that this privilege has been refused this morning to several gentlemen, and I did not want to make fish of one and flesh of another.

The CHAIRMAN. The question had not come up in the form in which it came just now.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: I was about to say that this opposition is one which ought to make every man, who has any regard for the future welfare of his country, more zealous than ever to persist in the reforms proposed, and that the hostility with which we are threatened is in itself a reason for persisting. The honest people of the State must not and will not listen to any protest coming from such a quarter. Rogues are not entitled to a veto upon the means that are employed for their detection. If you want a new lock for your door you do not call a convocation of burglars and ask them how it will suit the conveniences of their trade. The rat-catcher does not consult the vermin which he wants to destroy about the trap to be used in their capture. Why, sir, if the insects that infest the head were allowed to determine how they should be caught and cracked [laughter] there would not be a fine-tooth comb in the world. [Renewed laughter.]

A word or two ought to be said in reply to the gentleman from Erie, (Mr. Walker,) who never speaks without entitling himself to the respect of everybody who hears him. He tells you that the "bank of the United States" was a very good institution; he voted for it himself, and he would do it again. Of course, when he talks that way he is conscientious. But can he say that the charter was honestly passed? I know, of my own personal knowledge, that there were men in that Legislature who voted for it upon considerations which they carried home with them in their pockets. The gentleman who introduced the bill, and whose unexampled skill, wielded the influence which carried it through, many, many times between that time and the time of his death, spoke of the measure as the one which had been carried after a fashion which I need not describe; and he sneered at anybody who, in his hearing, expressed any doubt of it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I should like to know whether I am under any more obligation than the gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black) to disclose the "improper influences" that have been used, in connection with legislation. [Laughter.]

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Certainly not. [Laughter.] Neither the gentleman from Potter (Mr. Mann) nor myself make any disclosures; we both keep our secrets. [Laughter.]

But as to my friend from Erie, after all the suffering his bank inflicted upon the people, the disgrace it brought upon the State, the ruin of business men, the plunder of widows and orphans, it seems somewhat late in the day to say that it was right.

He thinks that the repeal of the tonnage tax was all right, also. Strange to say, he was himself a member of the Legislature at the time that measure passed—

["No." "No."]

Was he not? ["No."]

Then he was at some other time when it was proposed. Did he not say he voted against it? ["No."]

Mr. WALKER. I never voted for nor against the tonnage tax. I said I was a director in the Lake Shore road, that the Lake Shore road sympathized with the existence of the tonnage tax because it operated in their favor. I sympathized with them. But I said in my remarks, and I say now, that I was wrong; and that it was, although in favor of the Lake Shore road, against the interests of the State.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Then the gentleman would have voted probably for that measure if he had been there.

Mr. WALKER. I cannot say what I would have done in that case.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. I totally misunderstood the relation of the gentleman (Mr. Walker) to the subject of the tonnage tax. It seems to me that by being out of the legislature at that time he barely escaped doing a very great wrong. But I have no right to put him in the wrong by supposing a case that never occurred. We will not hold him responsible for hypothetical sins.

But, Mr. Chairman, after the facts that have been stated here, general and specific, and established thoroughly by the history of the Commonwealth for the last twenty-five years, is it any use for either of the gentlemen, whatever may be the respectability of their own character—either the delegate from Potter (Mr. Mann) or the delegate from Erie (Mr. Walker) or the delegate from Delaware (Mr. Broomall), to attempt to say that the rights, interests, wishes and feelings of this people have not been habitually betrayed by the Legislature. The chivalry with which they come up to the support of those who would otherwise be defenceless is certainly a thing to be admired, but it is altogether useless to think of "whitewashing" the Pennsylvania Legislature. [Laughter.] That is past praying for. [Renewed laughter.] I admire, most particularly, the gentleman from Erie (Mr. Walker) when he is engaged in this kind of business. I give my unqualified admiration to the magnificent dimensions of his brush, and the skill and energy with which he wields it; but I tell him there is not wash enough in his bucket to go over the twenty thousandth part of his job. He may as well give it up. The question remains, what shall be done for a remedy? How shall this cancer be cut out?

If others can invent any better or more efficient mode of doing it than that which has been proposed by the gentleman from Fayette, (Mr. Kaine,) let them come forward with their proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will take this opportunity to state that, on reflection, I am satisfied that my decision made a few moments ago was erroneous, and I shall hereafter hold that a gentleman cannot rise, be granted the time of the committee, and then yield it to another.

Mr. D. W. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

On the question of agreeing to this motion, a division was called, which resulted: Thirty-two in the affirmative; not being a majority of a quorum, the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: The discussion with which we have been entertained yesterday and to-day has wandered over such far fields that, perhaps, the Convention or the committee of the whole may be unaware of the precise question that is now before us. We have had railroads discussed, the tonnage tax and everything under the sun except the immediate, direct question before this committee. I purpose to say but a few words upon the immediate question now before the committee as I understand it, which is the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) in relation to an addition to the oath relative to caucus action, that members of the Legislature will not be bound by any vote or decision of any caucuses.

It has been very wisely said, Mr. Chairman, that laws that are not enforced, burdening the statute books of a people, give contempt for law, and the more there are of them, the greater the contempt of the people for all laws. I think the remark is a true one, and I think the experience of every gentleman in this committee will bear me out that it is true, that the more laws there are in a government that are not enforced the greater is the contempt of the people for all the laws. I think General Grant very wisely said that he knew no better mode of securing the repeal of an obnoxious law than by enforcing it. Now if this amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia, should be adopted by the committee and by the Convention, and afterwards be ratified by the people and become a part of the oath of office, I want to know by what power that branch of it is to be enforced? You may prescribe whatever penalties you may please, you may say that a man who violates this oath shall never again be permitted to sit in the legislative halls of the State, you may say that he may no longer occupy any office of honor, trust or profit in the Commonwealth; you may go further, and you may say that he shall not longer have the character of the citizen stamped upon him, but like the Chinese, who has been convicted under a law of that country, he ceases, politically, to exist forever; you may say that he is nothing, that is politically a myth, but how can you enforce it, in what way can you prove the crime? It is utterly impracticable for this Convention or for the people of this State to say to the Legislature when in session: "You shall not consult either with your constituents, or with your friends, or with your immediate neighbors, sitting alongside of you, either in the hall of the House, or in a committee room, or in a caucus." But what effect will it have? Suppose that any man in the Legislature is charged with having allowed his judgment to be swayed by the vote of a caucus that had been called to determine upon some question pending before the Legislature, and he says: "I did not allow my judgment to be influenced. I went into that room, and the vote of that caucus was exactly in accordance with my own sentiments." Can you inflict the penalty upon him? Can you convict him of the offence?

Why, then, the necessity of attempting to put upon the organic law of the State a requirement, and a penalty attached to it, upon which you cannot convict any man, and which you cannot enforce? The only effect of it, it seems to me, is that it would bring contempt upon the whole oath. I care not, individually, what form of oath may be adopted by this Convention, and ratified by the people, if I should be called upon to take a seat in the Legislature of the State, and should agree to go there;

whatever oath you may make I would subscribe to; because, when I accept the nomination, when I accept the result of an election, I expect to perform the duty imposed upon me. But I ask this committee of the whole to stop here and now, and, instead of wandering over the broad fields that we have been taken into, as to the propriety of the tonnage tax, and as to the propriety of this thing, and that thing, and the other thing, to come back to the direct question before us. Is there any necessity of passing any such amendment as has been offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia, and, if passed, can you enforce it when it is put upon your organic law? I submit that you cannot, for it rests in the breast of the individual, and unless you can bring home conviction, unless you can prove the fact beyond the possibility of a doubt, it is utterly worthless, and like "the baseless fabric of a vision."

I trust that the committee will not adopt this amendment, Nay, I go further. I trust they will not adopt the proposition of the gentleman from Dauphin, but that they will take the oath as reported by the Committee on Legislation and adopt it.

I am willing to add to it some words that I think, perhaps, ought to be there. I think that instead of a legislator solemnly declaring to support the Constitution, that there should be added to the oath that he will protect and defend it; and I think, Mr. Chairman, that that is all that may be necessary to require of any member of the Legislature.

The question of legislative corruption has been discussed here almost exhaustively, in connection with the subject of the oath necessary or proper to be taken by members of the General Assembly. One gentleman says he knows of corruption, and another gentleman says that he knows of corruption, but, Mr. Chairman, what is the cause of this corruption? What gave rise to it? Let me say, sir, that at least one of the causes of this corruption has not been mentioned upon this floor, and that cause is: The violation of the statute laws of the State as they exist to-day.

Why does not the gentleman from Philadelphia, who proposes to thus purify legislation by incorporating into the oath this agreement, that he will not be bound by the action of a caucus, go one step further, and let every member of the Legislature be required to swear, in addition thereto, that during the time he holds office under the State he will keep all its laws inviolate on his own part, and assist in the enforcement of them against others. Sir, I know, and other gentlemen upon this floor know, that the violation of the laws of this State in Harrisburg, whereby men have sacrificed the salary of an entire session in one single evening, not in a committee room, but in a private room, at a hotel, has been the cause of much of the corruption of members, because having lost all their earnings, it was necessary to retrieve from some other source. Why not put in this oath that members of the Legislature shall preserve and keep all the statute laws of the State, and particularly that relating to gambling? It is more pertinent, sir, than to say they shall not be bound by a caucus engagement.

If you want to reach the root of the evil; if, as says the gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) you want to cut it up by the roots, eradicate it and destroy it forever, let that be added to the oath, and, perhaps, it may restrain some one individual from a violation of the laws, and be productive of some good. At least it strikes me that that may be enforced, while the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia cannot be, because the question as to whether a man's vote has been changed by any influence of caucus rests entirely within his own breast, from which no human being can extract it.

These are the views, Mr. Chairman, that I wish to present to the committee of the whole, to bring them back to the question before them, and to say to them that if I stand alone upon this floor I shall vote against all the amendments that have been proposed, and for the report of the Committee on Legislation as originally presented.

Mr. STRUTHERS. Mr. Chairman: I desire only to say that I believe in the efficiency of oaths. I regard them as sacred things, and they ought not to be used lightly, or trifled with. Perhaps the better way to arrive at what we need in this regard would be to embody, as a section in the Constitution, all the pains and penalties that it is desired to prescribe, and hold it up as a terror to evil doers, and then let the old fashioned general oath be administered to sustain, support and defend the Constitution. You will then have established a general oath that will apply not only to members of the Legislature, but all other officers of the Commonwealth, commencing with the Governor and the judges of the Supreme Court, down through all the other officers of the Commonwealth.

But at this period of the proceedings I do not desire to occupy time, because I feel that gentlemen are anxious to adjourn. I wish only to explain, in the presence of the Convention, the reasons why I shall oppose all these amendments that are proposed, and why I shall oppose every kind of addition to the general oath which we have been in the habit of administering. When we come to that, if no other gentleman does, I will move to strike out from this oath all after the usual form of oath we have in the Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia, which will be read.

The CLERK. "And that I will not submit my individual judgment or action to the decision or control of any caucus or combination of members of the Legislature in the passage of any law or resolution."

On the question of agreeing to the amendment, a division was called, which resulted twenty-one in the affirmative. Not being a majority of a quorum, the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Dauphin, which will be read.

The CLERK read:

Every member of the General Assembly, before he enters upon his official duties, shall take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States, and the Constitution of the State of Pennsylvania, and will faithfully discharge the duties of Senator (or Representative) according to the best of my ability, and I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have not paid or contributed anything, or made any promise in the nature of a bribe, to corrupt or influence, directly or indirectly, any vote at the election at which I was chosen to fill the said office; and I do further solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have not accepted or received, and that I will not accept or receive, directly, or indirectly, any money or other valuable thing, from any corporation, company or person, for any vote or influence I may give, or withhold on any bill, resolution or appropriation, or for any other official act."

The foregoing oath shall be administered by one of the judges of the Supreme Court, in the hall of the House to which the member is elected, and the Secretary of State shall read and file the oath subscribed by such member; any member who shall refuse to take said oath shall forfeit his office, and every member who shall be convicted of having sworn falsely to, or of having violated his said oath, shall forfeit his office and be disqualified thereafter from holding any office of profit or trust in this State.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the section so as to provide that the oath may be administered by the clerk of the court of common pleas at Harrisburg in the absence of the Supreme Judge.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, by striking out what occurs between the word affirm, in the seventh line and the tenth line, and insert the following:

"That I have not paid or contributed, or promised any money or other valuable thing to secure my election, or to corruptly influence votes or voters in my favor, nor have I knowingly violated any election law of this Commonwealth."

Mr. PALMER. This is the amendment that I offered when this subject was under discussion before. It is printed in the Debates, and was discussed a couple of days. It is now nearly three o'clock, and I move the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. At that time the consideration of this subject was postponed, on the motion of the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) until the report of the Committee on Oaths of Office should come in.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to rise is not debatable.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. I understand that. I am only explaining the reason why I make the motion to rise. It would be well to abolish the Committee on Oaths of Office, or give them a chance to present an oath. They have the subject under consideration and, will probably present an oath to the Convention.

The motion to rise was rejected.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: As the committee seems to be averse to rise at this time, I desire to say a word or two in support of this amendment. It seems to me that there is a disposition on the part of the committee to adopt some sort of an oath different from that in the present Constitution. All I desire is, if there is any change made that it shall be adopted to the exigencies of the case.

Mr. CORSON. Does the gentleman desire to discuss this question?

Mr. H. W. PALMER. I propose to discuss my amendment.

Mr. CORSON. Then I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President: The committee of the whole have again had under consideration the report of the Committee on Legislation, and have directed me to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Leave was granted to the committee to sit again to-morrow.

LOUIS Z. MITCHELL.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. President: A committee consisting of certain delegates-at-large, to whom was referred the duty of appointing a delegate to this Convention in the place of Mr. Hopkins, deceased, have instructed me to report the following:

The Delegates-at-large, to whom it was referred to fill the vacancy in the membership of the Convention, occasioned by the death of Hon. William Hopkins, of the Twenty-sixth Senatorial district, do report they have come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That Lewis Z. Mitchell be and is hereby appointed a member of the Convention, to fill the vacancy in the representation of the Twenty-sixth Senatorial district, caused by the death of Hon. William Hopkins, the member elect from said district.

(Signed.) R. A. LAMBERTON,
GEO. M. DALLAS,
WM. I. BAER,
WM. T. CORBETT,
JAS. ELLIS,
SAML. H. REYNOLDS,
J. S. BLACK,
GEO. W. WOODWARD,
A. G. CURTIN,
S. C. T. DODD,
JOHN. H. CAMPBELL,
WM. H. SMITH.

The report was laid upon the table.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I move the Convention do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

So the Convention at three o'clock adjourned.

SIXTY-FOURTH DAY.

WEDNESDAY, March 12, 1873.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M.
Prayer was offered by Rev. Mr. Curry.

JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. JOHN M. BAILEY presented a petition of citizens of Huntingdon county, praying that an amendment may be made to the Constitution, prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL presented a petition of like import from citizens of Philadelphia.

Mr. CRAIG presented a petition of like import from citizens of Lycoming county.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition of like import from citizens of Luzerne county.

Mr. DeFRANCE presented four petitions of like import from citizens of Mercer county; all of which were laid on the table.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON MILITIA.

Mr. PORTER, from the Committee on Militia, presented the following report, which was read:

The Committee on Militia present the following report:

ARTICLE —

SECTION I. The freemen of this Commonwealth shall be armed or organized and disciplined for its defence when, and in such manner as may be directed by law.

The Legislature shall provide for maintaining the militia by direct appropriation from the State Treasury.

The PRESIDENT. This article has now been read the first time.

METHOD OF VOTING ON NEW CONSTITUTION.

Mr. D. W. PATTERSON. Mr. President: I now move to proceed to the consideration of the resolution offered by me yesterday, proposing to add an additional rule to the rules of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. The Clerk will read the resolution for information.

The CLERK read as follows:

Resolved, That the following be adopted as an additional rule of the Convention, to be numbered the forty-third rule: That when any article or articles of amendment, proposed to the Constitution, shall have received three several readings, and been finally passed by the Convention, that one-third of all the members of the Convention shall have the right, by motion or resolution, in the usual manner, to require the separate and distinct submission to a popular vote of any such article or amendment, or separable section proposed and finally passed, as above stated, by the Convention.

The resolution was read a second time.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. President: I would like to inquire of the mover of the resolution, what necessity there exists for it? I think there is an act of Assembly which provides exactly for this very thing, without the necessity of creating a new rule. The provision in the fourth section of the act of Assembly says that one-third of the delegates to the Convention shall have the right to require the separate and distinct submission to the popular vote of any change or amendment proposed by the Convention.

Mr. D. W. PATTERSON. Mr. President: I am perfectly aware of the fact mentioned by the gentleman from Fayette, (Mr. Kaine,) and the gentleman from Fayette must be perfectly aware that none of the members of this Convention recognize that act of Assembly. Strange to say I am not one of them, but there are a number of such gentlemen on this floor, and hence if we do not make it the rule of the Convention, it will require a majority vote to submit any separate or distinct article or section to the vote of the people. While some of us, early in the sessions of this Convention, showed by our vote that we did not regard some of the provisions of the act of Assembly of 1872, I myself did not think that the Legislature could restrain this body in any extent or limitation as to how far, or how much of the organic law should be repealed or changed.

I certainly, in this particular, feel that the contents of the fourth section of this act are an indication of the popular will expressed no later than last year, and I think it is an eminently wise provision, and for that reason, because I always submit to the will of the people, I desire that this new rule should be established so that we will not be taken by surprise when we pass through an article which is somewhat doubtful, and upon which the public mind may have a very divided sentiment.

I want to make the rule now so that we will know whether one-third of this Convention shall be able to submit a separate and separable proposition to the vote of the people, particularly an article or proposition that may be very doubtful as to its wisdom, and more particularly as to its popularity and acceptance with the people.

I have felt that we should bow to the indication of the will of the people as expressed by their representatives, and adopt this rule, so that one-third of the members at any time, under the section of the article if passed, may be able to submit it to a separate vote of the people, either an article, a section, or a separable section. That is the object of my offering this rule, and I have thought that we should adopt it so that we may know what this Convention will do, what are the sentiments of the members of this Convention, and whether or not they are disposed to listen to and regard the popular will of the people, as expressed so recently through their representatives.

MR. DARLINGTON. MR. President: I am very glad, generally, to agree with my friend from Lancaster, (Mr. D. W. Patterson,) for I have generally found him to be about right, but upon this question I am convinced that I am unable to agree with him.

I think, in the first place, it is premature for us to fix anything now by rule as to what we will do when we get through with our work. It will be time enough later in the day for us to make any provisions in regard to this. It is a question, as yet, whether we will submit anything to the people at all. It is a question we will have to well-consider and decide when we get through with our work. There are gentlemen who may consider it impracticable or imprudent to submit anything at all to the people. I am inclined to agree with my friend, the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Woodward,) in regard to this subject. A stage of circumstances may arise during the progress of our work which may render it impracticable to submit anything to the people at all, and therefore I am opposed, at present, to the Convention giving any decision upon the subject. I do not, however, regard the expression of opinion by the Legislature as of any validity at all. For the purpose of testing this question I move that the further consideration of this question be postponed for the present.

The question being taken on the motion, the yeas and nays were required by Mr. Corbett and Mr. D. W. Patterson, and were as follow, viz:

YEAS.

Messrs. Armstrong, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bardsley, Bartholomew, Biddle, Boyd, Church, Curry, Darlington, Ellis, Finney, Hay, Heverin, Hunsicker, Kaine, Lilly, McCulloch, Minor, Mott, Pughe, Read, John R., Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, James L., Reynolds, S. H., Ross, Runk, Smith, Henry W., Smith, Wm. H., Stewart, Wetherill, J. M., Wetherill, John Price, Woodward and Meredith, President—33.

NAYS.

Messrs. Achenbach, Addicks, Alricks, Andrews, Baer, Bailly, (Perry,) Beebe, Bowman, Brodhead, Broomall, Campbell, Carter, Cochran, Corbett, Craig, Cronmiller, Davis, De France, Dodd, Dunning, Edwards, Elliott, Ewing, Fulton, Funck, Guthrie, Hanna, Horton, Howard, Lamberton, Lawrence, Lear, Long, MacConnell, McClean, Mann, Mantor, Niles, Palmer, G. W. Palmer, H. W., Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Porter, Purviance, Sam'l A., Rooke, Russell, Sharpe, Stanton, Struthers, Turrell, Walker, White, David N., White, Harry, White, J. W. F. and Wright—55.

So the motion was not agreed to.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Ainey, Baker, Bannan, Barclay, Black, Charles A., Black, J. S., Brown, Buckalew, Carey, Cassidy, Clark, Collins, Corson, Curtin, Cuyler, Dallas, Fell, Gibson, Gilpin, Gowen, Green, Hall, Harvey, Hazzard, Hemphill, Knight, Landis, Littleton, M'Allister, M'Camant, M'Murray, MacVeagh, Metzger, Newlin, Parsons, Patton, Purman, Purviance, John N., Simpson, Smith, H. G., Temple, Van Reed, Wherry and Worrell—44.

The resolution was then agreed to.

INDEXING THE DEBATES.

MR. HAY offered the following resolution, which was twice read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be requested to have prepared a proper index for each volume of the Journal and the Debates.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I move to amend the amendment, by inserting a proviso at the end of the resolution, that the volumes shall contain at least one thousand pages. I have noticed that one of the volumes of the Debates contains only a little over eight hundred pages, and I find that it makes an exceedingly small book.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President: I wish to state that I think this amendment is impracticable, for the reason that the first volume of the Debates has been concluded, and I think is now in the course of being bound.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I rise simply for the purpose of explaining the amendment which I have offered. It has reference solely to the future volumes which are to be bound by the printer, and not to those which have been already completed.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President: Even in this event it will look very singular to have the volumes of the Debates and Journals bound in different sizes, but if the Convention desire to have it so, I certainly have no objection to it. With regard to the proper index that may be decided upon for these volumes, I would merely suggest to the Convention what has been suggested by others, rather than by myself, that it would be far better to have but one index placed in the final volume for the whole number of books. I do not think there is any necessity for indexing each one of these volumes. I am convinced that one general index will suffice for the whole number. This is the suggestion of other gentlemen, and it is presumed to be a more judicious plan. I am not able to say myself, from the condition of the work at this time, whether or not it would be practicable to index the first volume of the Debates now, or whether it has not been actually bound. If it has been bound, or any portion of the issue has been bound, it will not then, of course, be practicable to make an index for that particular book. I merely desire to call the attention of the Convention to this fact.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President: I move to amend the original resolution, by requiring a general index to be made of the entire number of volumes which are to be published.

Mr. HAY. Mr. President: It certainly seems to me that an amendment of this kind ought not to be adopted. Where the volumes of the Debates are numerous, a general index will be comparatively useless, and, of course, when a single volume is taken up for reference there should be an index to that volume, by which to guide the reader to the different parts to which he may desire to refer. It must be apparent to all that an index is required to each volume, rather than a general index to the entire number, or even if a general index is to be made.

On the question of agreeing to the amendment, a division was called, which resulted: Twelve in the affirmative, and forty-seven in the negative.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President: I move to refer this matter to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HAY. Mr. President: I desire to state to the gentleman that this whole subject has been referred to the committee once, and they have reported this resolution.

The question being taken on the resolution, a division was called, and the resolution was agreed to; yeas, forty-nine; nays, eight.

THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the second reading and consideration of the article reported by the Committee on Education. Is it the pleasure of the Convention to proceed to the consideration of the article?

"Aye!" "Aye!" "Aye!"

THE ARTICLE ON CITY CHARTERS.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the consideration of the report of the Committee on Cities and City Charters. Is it the pleasure of the Convention to proceed to the consideration of the article?

The question was then taken, and it was not agreed to.

THE ARTICLE ON LEGISLATION.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the further consideration of the article reported by the Committee on Legislation. Is it the pleasure of the Convention to proceed to the consideration of the article?

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Convention then resolved itself in committee of the whole, Mr. Armstrong in the Chair, and proceeded to the consideration of the article reported by the Committee on Legislation.

THE OATH OF OFFICE.

The CHAIRMAN. The question pending before the committee of the whole is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Luzerne, (Mr. H. W. Palmer,) to the amendment of the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh.)

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: I desire to modify my amendment by striking out what occurs between the word "affirm," where it occurs the second time in the section, and the word "and," after the words, "the said office," and inserting the following: "That I have not paid or contributed, or promised, any money or other valuable thing, to secure my election, or to corruptly influence votes or voters in my favor, nor have I knowingly violated any election law of this Commonwealth." If I can obtain the attention of the committee a minute or two, I propose a short cut in this business. We have been listening for the last two days to the discussion of the general question whether there shall be a modification of this existing oath or not, and I suppose nearly every gentleman has made up his mind with regard to it, one way or another. The question now recurs, what shall be the form of the new oath? And I judge the Convention is not in a condition of body or temper of mind to take up and critically examine this subject. The oaths that have been proposed here are neither of them equal to the exigencies of the case. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) covers only one phase of the difficulty. It aims at the use of money in elections, and covers only one branch of the disease, to wit: the bribery of the individual voter. It simply provides that the member of the Legislature shall swear or affirm that he has not paid or contributed anything, or made any promise in the nature of a bribe, to corrupt or influence, directly or indirectly, any vote at the election. That is simply one specific branch of the great disease, and it seems to me that if we have made up our minds to make any modification in the oath as it stands now, if we have concluded to administer any remedy for the disease, the antidote should be as powerful as the complaint.

The amendment of the gentleman covers only one of the multifarious methods in which money is used in the elections. The oath reported by the chairman of the Committee on Legislation, is still more objectionable. That oath simply amounts to nothing. My proposition is, that we shall vote down both these oaths in the same manner as when the same subject was considered in the report of the Committee on the Legislature, when we found that objection was made to the form of the oath reported, and then await the report of the appropriate committee to whom this subject belongs. I think we can then take up this subject of the oath and consider it understandingly. It will not be necessary to go over the entire general debate again, and if this course be not adopted there will result at least four more general debates on this subject, because when the report of the Committee on the Judiciary is made, that committee will report an oath, and we shall be obliged to take up that oath and consider it. When the report of the Committee on Counties is made that report will contain an oath, and we shall have to take up that oath and consider it. When the report of the Committee on Counties is made that will contain an oath for county officers, and we shall then take that up and consider it; and when the report of the Committee on Oaths of Office is made that report will contain an oath covering the whole ground, and it will be necessary to go over the whole subject again.

Why, then, should we not refer the whole matter to the appropriate committee. I believe this course should be adopted for a variety of reasons. The first is, because these oaths which have been reported are not adequate; and, secondly, because the Convention is wearied out by two days' consideration of the subject and are not now in temper of mind to critically examine this matter. The third and last reason is, because it is not right to defraud this Committee on Oaths out of their appropriate duties, and it is not right to relieve them from this labor. I desire to obtain the judgment, skill and knowledge of the chairman of that committee. I do not desire that he should be relieved from the performance of his duty in any such way. By adopting this plan we will save time in debating all these modifications, and any oaths that we may hereafter adopt will then be worth something. I do not propose to discuss now the general proposition as to whether there ought or ought not to be any modification, but I am in the position of an old Quaker, who was asked to subscribe to a church organ. He was very much opposed to it at first, but finally gave $500 towards its erection, and when taxed with inconsistency said: "If thou wilt worship God by machinery, I desire that thou shouldst have a good instrument."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Luzerne will not be adopted, for the same reason which I gave yesterday in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh.) The gentleman from Luzerne, (Mr. H. W. Palmer) himself presented a very serious objection to all these amendments and oaths; and that is, that when you undertake to specify in an oath the particular thing which a man should not do, the difficulty is that in having made all the specifications that reasonably ought to be made, you thereby leave it to be inferred that certain other things would be proper to be done, when in fact they would be just as improper as those that are specifically named. Hence, to my mind, the old fashioned oath which our fathers took, and the one that has sufficed from the organization of the State down to the present time, ought to be left in the Constitution as it is.

The argument which the gentleman (Mr. H. W. Palmer) made in favor of his amendment is a strong argument against all these attempts to specify in the oath, things which ought not to be done. But I rise, sir, now, for the purpose of correcting a misrepresentation of my remarks yesterday, than to make any argument upon the amendment of the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer,) for I think that he himself has made a conclusive argument against this whole effort to enlarge the scope of the oath to be taken.

Yesterday, in referring to my knowledge of the improper influences brought to bear upon the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and of the members who had been so influenced, I was very careful to say that I thought I could name the men that had been so influenced, and I was also careful to add to it that I might be mistaken. Now, sir, upon that clear and cautious statement—a mere expression that I thought I could name the men, the gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) in his anxiety to condemn me and destroy the character of the people who have inaugurated a new movement in this country—so anxious was he to destroy every man connected with this new movement, and acting in accordance with it, that notwithstanding he had not the slightest feeling against myself, for we have had intimate and pleasant relations from the time of the calling of this Convention to the present moment, yet he is so determined to carry out his purpose of destroying the character of the people of the country that he represents me as concealing corruption in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and attempts to hold me up to the gaze of this Convention and to the people of the Commonwealth, who may read his remarks, as concealing corruption, when I did not pretend that I knew anything about corruption there. I said carefully and deliberately, that I believed I could name the men who had been improperly influenced, and there is no shadow of excuse for so misrepresenting me.

I acquit the gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black) of any intention to do me, personally, any unkindness. It is simply a part of his purpose. From the time that a majority of the people of the United States refused to accept him and his associates as leaders, he has been determined to represent everybody connected with the new movement as corrupt; and that is the key to all this extravagant denunciation of fraud and corruption. Why, sir, if upon the slight foundation upon which he built, yesterday, his remarks against me, he could charge me with concealing fraud, I ask any candid man what reliability there is to be placed upon his statement when he makes a charge of fraud itself against other people? There was not the slightest excuse for charging me with concealing fraud. I therefore submit it is fair to presume he has no better evidence against men whom he charges with fraud itself. What confidence can be placed in his charges? It is made to carry out a purpose, a determined purpose, and he is so earnest, and has his mind so completely fixed upon that purpose, that he is incapable of fairly representing any individual who does not agree with him in that purpose.

He appeals, sir, to the christian religion also, and represented me as putting myself against the principles and traditions of christian religion. He was as unfortunate in that appeal as in the other. It is a monstrous proposition to say that the principles of christian religion justify the attempt to put into the Constitution an oath which stares in the face a member who has been elected to the Legislature, and which requires him to swear before entering upon his duties that he has not committed a crime, and that he will not commit one while he is in office. There is nothing between the lids of the Bible that justifies any such proposition as that. I do not profess to know as much upon that subject as the gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) but I will read one or two definitions—the grandest that ever were uttered upon this subject—and I submit that they justify my position, and do not justify his, either when he attempts to put me against the christian religion, or when he assaults me with his charges of corruption, or concealing the corruption of others. Of course the italics are my own :

"Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal.

"And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing.

"And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing.

"Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, and is not puffed up.

"Doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil.

"Rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth.

"Beareth all things, believeth all things, endureth all things, hopeth all things.

* * * * *

"And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity."

Mr. Chairman. The tendency of the argument and the denunciations of the gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) are in direct violation of every one of these precepts; and to these I commend him.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I rise, not for the purpose of discussing these oaths, but to explain the vote that I shall give on this occasion, and to second the suggestion made by the gentleman from Luzerne, (Mr. H. W. Palmer.)

I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, of a more full and stringent oath than is contained in our present Constitution; but I am opposed to these oaths being repeated in the Constitution. I am opposed to having an oath for the members of the Legislature different from the oath required for other State officers. I believe, sir, the better plan is to have one oath for all the State and county officers, from Governor down.

In our present Constitution we have an article—"Article VIII"—especially on the subject of oaths; and I wish to call the attention of the committee to this article. It reads:

"The members of the General Assembly and all the officers, Executive and judicial, shall be bound by oaths or affirmation to support the Constitution of this Commonwealth, and to support the Constitution of the United States with fidelity."

We have no special oath for members of the General Assembly; we have no special oath for other State officers. Let us have in the Constitution one oath for all State and county officers. I apprehend that that was what was contemplated by this Convention when we appointed our committees. We have a Committee on Commissions, Offices, Oath of Office and Incompatibility of Office, of which my friend before me, from Fayette, (Mr. Kaine,) is chairman. I apprehend the intention was to have this committee report an oath to take the place of the one in article eight of our present Constitution applicable to members of the Legislature, to all "executive and judicial officers," and I hope we will go further and say "all State and county officers" throughout the whole State. I can see no reason whatever, if we are to swear the members of the Legislature that they have committed no frauds in their election, why we should not apply the same rule to the Governor and to all other State officers, and to all the county officers as well.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I hope that we will pass over these reports by the two committees, which are now before us, or in some way lay them aside until this Committee on Oaths make their report. I think, sir, that we should, in framing a Constitution, try to make that Constitution as brief and express it as concisely as possible, having a place in it for everything, and not repeating the same thing in different parts of the Constitution. If we have in one place this oath applying to the Legislature, we shall have in another an oath applying to the judges, and another applying to State and county officers, thus increasing the length of the Constitution. I think the better plan would be to make the Constitution brief, everything being in its proper place; and make one oath applicable to all State and county officers, and the same oath applicable to members of the Legislature.

I must confess I do not like this thing of swearing members of the Legislature, particularly, against frauds, and make them swear that they will not be guilty of bribery. I do not like that idea to be embodied in a Constitution. I think the members of the Legislature are as good as any other officers we can have, State or county. I do not like singling them out by a distinctive and exclusive oath, applicable to them alone, thus indirectly impeaching them, and making them less worthy of credit than other officers of the State. I do not like it; but I am willing to go for one of these stringent oaths "iron-clad," if you please to call it so, making it applicable to every officer of the State, and everybody in official station, from the Governor down. Then the members of the Legislature cannot say it is particularly aimed at them. I suppose the only way to reach that object is to vote down these propositions at this time. I shall, therefore, vote against all of them now. At the same time I wish it distinctly understood that I am in favor of a strong oath and a general one, and I hope such an oath will be adopted before we finish this article. If not, when this matter comes up before the Convention on second reading, I shall then move to insert such an oath as that I have referred to.

MR. SAMUEL A. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: We have been discussing this question, now, for two days and I am opposed to a postponement of it. It seems to me that we are prepared now to decide upon it. We have, I think, satisfactory evidence that there is a majority in this committee in favor of an oath. What the character of that oath is to be is a subject of controversy here. I think, sir, and have always thought, that there is no degradation in an oath. Why, your grand jurors, since the organization of your government, have been called and sworn to do nothing out of malice or ill will, to do nothing out of fear or affection, or hope of reward or gain, and yet, was it ever for a moment disputed? Was it ever called in question? Was it ever even implied that it was done for the purpose of preventing anything of the kind? It was considered no degradation to take that oath. Every member of the bar, throughout this and other Commonwealths, are sworn to delay no man's cause for lucre or malice. What does that mean? Does it imply that unless they are sworn they will do so? It certainly does no harm to honest men to take that oath, and if there is a dishonest man, one whose conscience is not entirely lost, he, when attempting to carry out his professional duties, may stay his hand in doing an act which, but for the oath, he might have committed.

Now, as to the character of the oath, a word or two. I look upon both oaths, that reported by the Committee on Legislation and that reported by the Committee on Legislation, as defective; and especially the oath reported by the Committee on Legislation. That oath, sir, is but a copy, verbatim, of the oath given in the Constitution of Illinois, and, having examined it some time ago, I was satisfied, as my friend from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer) said a few days ago, that it is so open that a four-horse team might be driven through it. What is it? In the latter part of the oath it says: "That I have not received, and will not receive, any money or other valuable thing from any person or corporation for my vote or influence."

Now let me say to the committee, that when a man makes up his mind to commit a fraud like this, to take a bribe, he does not do it in the way contemplated in that oath; he does not make it a matter of contract, and this implies a contract; hence it is done by hints, or often without hints; it is done in the shape of presents, after the legislation takes place.

It is done by placing on the pillow of a man's bed an envelope enclosing money; it is done by making presents, sometimes even after he has gone out of office. Unless you guard against all these, you have no oath better than a rope of sand.

Now, sir, I would strike out all that, "for my vote or influence," because that contemplates the commission of an offense to depend upon the consideration of agreeing to give his vote or influence, and I would insert "or their agents or employees having an interest in the subject upon which I may be required to vote." That would guard it entirely, because then it would read: "That I will not accept or receive, directly or indirectly, any money or other valuable thing, from any corporation, company or person, or their agents or employees, having an interest in the subject upon which I may be required to vote."

That relates to time before and time after. It embraces presents, bribes and everything of that kind. Unless some provision like that is put into this oath, I regard it as of no binding force whatever. It is a mere copy of the provision of the Illinois Constitution, and was probably taken from it by the committee without proper consideration.

MR. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: Before the gentleman (Mr. Samuel A. Purviance) takes his seat, let me call his attention to one thing in that connection. I ask him to turn over the page of the report and look at section thirty-six. He will there discover that:

"A member of the Legislature shall be guilty of bribery, and punished as shall be provided by law, who shall solicit, demand, or receive, or consent to receive, directly or indirectly, from any corporation, company, or person, any money, testimonial, reward, thing of value, or personal advantage, or promise thereof, for his vote or official influence, or with the understanding, expressed or implied, that his official vote or official influence is any way to be influenced thereby."

If the gentleman (Mr. S. A. Purviance) reads that carefully he will understand that that comprehends the receiving of presents for votes already given, as well as votes to be given, and the man who takes the oath to obey the Constitution, takes it, of course, with the understanding to obey that section.

MR. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I would say, referring to that subject, and in answer to the remark of the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Harry White,) that that is only a section providing punishment for bribery, and is no part of the oath of the member that he has not been and will not be bribed.

MR. BOYD. Mr. Chairman: I am one of the Committee on Oaths and Impeachments. That committee is supposed to be competent to discharge the duties devolving upon them, and it seems to me that that committee is the proper committee to report the necessary oaths that, in the opinion of this Convention, ought to be administered to officials. It is eminently fitting, sir, that this whole subject should be referred to that committee. That committee will now have the benefit of all that has been said and done on this subject, and they will be able to make a report that I have no doubt will be satisfactory to this body. Indeed, sir, it is proper that it should go there at this time, and remain there for some time, for the reason that it is better for them to make that report after the leading articles have been passed upon by the Convention, so that when that committee has before them all these articles, they can frame an oath or oaths that will meet all the articles adopted by this body.

The wisdom of the seeming delay of a report from that committee; the discussion that has taken place here for some days past, shows conclusively the wisdom of that delay. It would show their wisdom still more if they would delay their report until well nigh the close of our labors.

I, sir, for one, came into this body believing in the report presented to us by Secretary Jordan; hence it was natural, in my rural simplicity, to believe in that report, and of course was inclined to think there was some corruption in the Legislature, and that there was corruption elsewhere, and that oaths would be necessary as an aid in our work of reform. But, sir, in the light of recent events, and in the few short months that have rolled around since we have been here, we have it demonstrated beyond a doubt, that there has been no fraud or corruption in this broad land, [Laughter.] We have all read the official evidence from the Congress of the United States, that neither saint nor sinner in that body has been guilty of fraud or corruption, and have all been washed with the blood of the lamb, [laughter,] and have come out pure. The President of the United States has declared that the late Vice President Colfax is clearly guiltless, and that he is a persecuted man, and with him, of course, all the rest in that investigation come out in the same way. And so with regard to the shameless scandal that was entailed upon the State of Pennsylvania during the last fall, in relation to the Evans frauds, when efforts were made to involve other gentlemen with him; it has since been shown before a court of competent jurisdiction, that he, too, was a saint; he has been washed by the courts, and found to be clean, pure and undefiled, and all verified by the most distinguished gentleman in Pennsylvania, the delegate from York, (Mr. J. S. Black.) Now, then, with the fact of that trial, with such an endorsement coming from the source that it does, I am ready to believe the gentleman from Potter, (Mr. Mann,) when he tells me that there is no corruption in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and never was, and that it is not likely that there ever will be, if all these things be true.

It may be that the Committee on Oaths will report no oath at all to this body. They may well conclude that all men are honest and pure, and that it is utterly useless to administer an oath, and thus, by that means, we will be able to spare the feelings of my distinguished friend from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) who considers it an insult to swear a man to perform the duties of his office, and he says that he never will, by any vote of his in this body, put upon a man an oath that he will be honest, because it will imply that he intends to be dishonest. It would follow from this that our judges and other officials should not be sworn for the same reason. And it may be therefore, when we come to consider all these things, we may require no oath at all, or if we want any for forms sake, we can use the old oath, which means nothing, and will not hurt anybody to take it, or in any way effect the most delicate sensibilities. Therefore, without discussing the merits of the kind of oath, if any is needed, I respectfully appeal to this House to refer to our Committee on Oaths this whole question, and that they will wait until that committee reports. That is but due to this committee. It is no more than respectful. Why here we have an oath reported from the Committee on Legislature, an oath reported from the Committee on Legislation, an oath reported from the cities and counties and township officers, and perhaps half a dozen others to come from other committees. Why not, then, leave this whole subject to the Committee on Oaths? Why not allow that committee to have exclusive control of the whole subject? Let them act upon this matter after the reports of all the standing committees have been made, and after the Convention has passed upon the different articles submitted in detail, and then they can shape and form an oath suitable to the articles as adopted. I therefore ask this House, as an act of justice to this Committee on Oaths, who have never done a single thing against any member of this body, (laughter,) and I know they never will; so do not put upon us a slight, and allow our committee to perform its share of labor. If I had time to read the names of the members of this Committee on Oaths, I could show you that that committee reflects credit upon this Convention, and reflects credit upon the eminent president of this body in appointing it, (laughter.) The distinguished gentlemen that compose it are willing to take this subject under consideration, and that will save you a world of trouble and tribulation.

I therefore shall second the motion made by the gentlemen from Luzerne, (Mr. H. W. Palmer,) one of the Committee on Oaths, that the committee of the whole rise and in some way get rid of this immediate proposition; vote down the proposition or dispose of it any manner whatever, and let it go to the Committee on Oaths. Then we will get on with the other sections and be relieved of the agony of the last two days' debate.

MR. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I have no desire to trespass upon the time of the committee of the whole. I agree with much that has been said by my friend the gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Boyd,) but not for the same reasons. I think we should have some kind of oath administered to all officers of the government, legislative, executive and judicial. I do not think, for my own part, that a different oath should be administered to one branch from that which is administered to another. I would not, at all events, be willing to stigmatize any one branch of the government as any more corrupt than any other. I think we do wrong to ourselves, to the people we represent, to the whole State, and to republican institutions and republican government in general, by this wholesale denunciation of the Legislature as unfit to be trusted. The legislators are chosen from among the best of the people, and very many of them are among the best of the people, as much so as your Governors and judges. Then why single them out for denunciation? If it is necessary to bind one to the discharge of his duty by a stringent oath, is it not just as necessary to bind all the others?

Gentlemen may tell me that no corruption has been seen in any other quarters. I know not. The gentleman from Fayette (Mr. Kaine) told us the other day that it is a part of the history of the State that the Legislature has been corrupted. He alluded to the passage of the United States Bank bill and the passage of the commutation bill. I know it is part of the history of the State that it has been charged that the passage of these acts were secured by corrupt means. That we all know. Like all other political things it has been charged, but I do not know that it has ever been established. Can any man suppose that the Executive department of the State would suffer such things to pass without saying a word against it? Does not the member from Fayette know that he who sat in the Executive chair of this Commonwealth at the time of the passage of the tonnage tax repeal is now a member of this Convention, and if he had known or seen any corruption in the Legislature that passed that bill, was it not his duty to sound the alarm, and would he not have done so? Could that bill have been passed by corrupt means without Governor Curtin knowing it? I submit it to the gentleman from Fayette, that the then Governor of this Commonwealth does not know now and did not know then that there was corruption in the Legislature in reference to the passage of that act, and has never opened his mouth against it, because he has had nothing to open his mouth against. The very fact that this gentleman was in the Executive chair and preserved silence on this subject is conclusive of the fact of which I speak. He was there to preside over and guard the public welfare, and no one will charge him with dereliction of duty. He was our noble "war Governor," and his name has gone out over the whole land as the famous war Governor of Pennsylvania. He was honest, and I will not hear him traduced, as he is traduced, without endeavoring to defend him. I will not allow him to be traduced by anybody here telling me that the Legislature was corrupt when he signed the bill that was the result of this alleged corruption.

I do not believe these stories. For myself I believe the passage of the tonnage commutation bill was right in itself. I would have voted for it if I had been there, as the result of my best judgment of what the policy of the State required. Why should any one charge a member of the Legislature with being bribed to do that which gentlemen throughout the land thought was right to do without bribe? Where is the evidence? Why do not the gentlemen tell me who was bribed? I ask them, as I asked them on a former occasion, to point out who were the bribed, and who bribed them. If gentlemen know, let us know, but do not cast a stigma upon the whole people of the State. Do not defame your institutions. Remember that it is our fate to live under republican institutions. Remember that no man here or elsewhere in this Commonwealth expects to change the character of our government. We must still be a republican government, and we will still have a head to that republican government, and we will have legislators. We are a nation of honest men. Say what you will, my experience, however it may disagree with others, has been in all my life, nearly the whole of which has been passed among public men and in public affairs, and which has been now not very short, that the great body of mankind is honest. Honesty is the rule, and dishonesty the exception, every where throughout the land so far as I know it. If other gentlemen have had other experience more varied or different from mine, let them point out the instances, and let us see whether their judgment is founded upon sufficient grounds.

I am opposed, therefore, to fixing any particular oath upon one officer which is not applicable to another. Why should we say to the legislator: "It is not enough that we should swear you to discharge your duty with fidelity. It is enough to swear your neighbor, who is elected to another office, to discharge his duty with fidelity, but your office requires additional obligation." One can be bound by one oath, and the other not by the same oath. Why should the distinction be made? When we elect a judge we say to him, when he is about to be placed on the bench: "We ask no guarantee from you but an oath that you will discharge your duty with fidelity." So with the Governor. So, too, with the Secretary of the Commonwealth, and the Attorney General, and the State Treasurer, whom you propose to elect. The distinction applies to the legislator alone, and to him to say: "You are to be set down as presumptively and prima facie roguish, while another man elected on the same ticket with you, is presumed to be 'honest and not require the oath which is required in your case.' Let gentlemen reflect on this. Let them give me a reason why we should send out this Constitution to one class of our public servants and say, 'presumptively you are roguish,' and send it out to another class and say, 'presumptively you are honest.'"

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Chairman; I rise to a point of order. The question under consideration is the motion made by the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer.) That is it simply, and the only question before the House is, whether this section, with its amendment, shall be referred to the Committee on Oaths. I do not understand the gentleman from Chester to be talking to the amendment. I do not entirely understand what he is talking about, [laughter,] but I comprehend that it is something about creation in general, or at least something which has no relation to the question under discussion. I therefore raise the point of order, that the gentleman should confine his remarks to the subject before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot sustain the point of order. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Luzerne, which is an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh.) It raises the whole question upon the section and its various amendments.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: I would ask for information. What report is now before the committee of the whole, the report of the Railroad Committee or the Committee on Legislation?

The CHAIRMAN. The immediate question before the House is the amendment of the gentleman from Luzerne to the amendment of the gentleman from Dauphin, to the first section of the article reported by the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I will detain the committee but a few moments longer, in reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Luzerne. I understand that while in committee of the whole, no motion to refer a subject before this committee to one of the standing committees of the House, can be in order, according to our rules. The only way that it can be reached, so as to meet the views of those who feel as I do, is to vote down the whole of these amendments, together with the first section as reported, with the understanding that the section is not to be killed forever, but that it is to come up again at a more suitable time and a more convenient season.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: I propose to reply to the remarks that have just fallen from the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington.) I must believe that the gentleman is sincere in what he has just said upon this question, and if I believe that I must believe further that he has talked about a subject, in part, of which he knows nothing. The gentleman asserts that the Legislature has not been corrupt in the past, that there has been no corruption there, and he called upon me for the proof.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I rise to explain what I said, or what I meant to say, if I did not, was that I did not believe the majority of the Legislature was corrupt. I said that the great body of mankind are honest, and only a few are not.

Mr. KAINE. I will ask the gentleman if he does not believe that a great deal of corruption has prevailed in the Legislature for the last ten or fifteen years.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I know it is said.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: The gentleman's conscience is very tender on that subject, and he has taken occasion here to refer to me, and he has also referred to an honorable gentleman upon this floor, a member of this Convention, who, at one time occupied the Executive chair of this State, and he rises here to defend him. I apprehend that that gentleman is able and willing, at all times, to defend himself, if his character and conduct need any such defense, which I utterly deny. How will the Executive know anything about what has occurred in either hall of the Legislature? He is entirely separate and apart from them, and cannot have any knowledge of anything of this kind. The gentleman from Chester says that he does not believe any of these charges in regard to the repeal of the tonnage tax. All I have to say, if the gentleman knows anything about it, and I apprehend on that particular case he must have some knowledge, because I suppose at that time, as he is now, the gentleman was one of the solicitors of the Pennsylvania railroad company, and as such, if he had been a member of the Legislature, I have no doubt he would have voted in the interest of his client; if the gentleman, I say, knows anything about that transaction, if he has read any of the evidence taken by a committee of investigation upon that case, and he does not believe that there was corruption then and there, he would not believe it, sir, though one rose from the dead.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is pending upon the motion of the gentleman from Luzerne, to amend the amendment.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: I wish to withdraw my amendment. It has not been discussed, and I suppose it can be withdrawn at any time before discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to the amendment is withdrawn, and the question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dauphin, which will be read.

The CLERK read: Every member of the General Assembly, before he enters upon his official duties, shall take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of Pennsylvania, and will faithfully discharge the duties of Senator (or Representative) according to the best of my ability, and I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have not paid or contributed anything, or made any promise in the nature of a bribe to corrupt or influence, directly or indirectly, any vote at the election at which I was chosen to fill the said office, and I do further solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have not accepted or received, and that I will not accept or receive, directly or indirectly, any money or other valuable thing from any corporation, company or person, for any vote or influence I may give or withhold on any bill, resolution or appropriation, or for any other official act."

The foregoing oath shall be administered by one of the judges of the Supreme Court, in the hall of the House to which the member is elected, and the Secretary of State shall read and file the oath subscribed by such member; any member who shall refuse to take said oath, shall forfeit his office, and every member who shall be convicted of having sworn falsely to, or of having violated his said oath, shall forfeit his office and be disqualified thereafter from holding any office of profit or trust in this State.

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend as follows: To strike out all after the word person, in the last sentence of the first paragraph, and insert, "or their agents or employees having an interest in the subject upon which he may be required to vote."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: I thought that the Chairman of the Committee on Legislature, the author of the amendment, would accept the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman from Allegheny will not strike out the words providing that a member of the Legislature shall not withhold his vote or influence, on any bill or resolution, or appropriation, I would accept his amendment. The words he has stricken out, it seems to me, are a material part of the amendment I have offered, and strengthen all the rest of it.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: Let us see if we understand the object of the amendment. As I understand the original amendment, it defines bribery so as to constitute that crime only in cases where there has been an actual contract, and not where there has been a mere giving of money or other property. Under this provision it is necessary, in order to make out the offence, that it should be proved that there was a contract between the parties, expressed or clearly implied, that the money or other property should be given for the vote, and that the vote should be given for the money. Now, that narrows the definition of bribery so as to limit it much within the bounds, and that the common law places upon it; and the object of this amendment, as I understand it, is to make the receipt of money or other property from an interested party or his agent, ipso facto bribery, without putting the Commonwealth under the necessity of proving the scienter, or the express contract to that effect.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I only desire to say to the gentleman from York, in answer to his appeal, that my judgment remains that the amendment weakens the oath in one of its most essential clauses. I cannot, therefore, accept the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny. I would do so if the clause he desires to have stricken out was allowed to remain.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: Does the gentleman want to define bribery in such a manner that, in order to prove the crime to have been committed, it must be shown that there was an actual contract, and that the money was given for a vote, on a contract that the member shall vote in the way that the giver of the money proposes? Very well. Is it not ipso facto bribery to give a member money without saying anything about it; to put it, as the gentleman from Columbia says, under his pillow, or slip it into his pocket the way Sir Robert Walpole did with the members of Parliament? When he wanted to bribe a man he would go to him and, after a little conversation, slip a five hundred pound note into his vest pocket, and the next morning the man voted right.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I don't think it is done that way now. [Laughter.]

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Perhaps not. Perhaps the gentleman knows better than I do how it is done now. [Laughter.] But, sir, that is one way it might be done, and will the gentleman say that ought not to be considered bribery, or will he define that offence so that you can prove it without showing that there was an explicit understanding between one party that he should give, and the other party that he should vote a particular way?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Allegheny.

On the question of agreeing to the amendment to the amendment, a division was called, which resulted: Thirty-five in the affirmative, and forty-six in the negative. So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Dauphin.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I have a single remark to make on this subject. If I vote for this amendment it will be a vote given conditionally, and my ultimate vote upon this division will depend upon the question whether it shall be amended. I think there is a fatal defect in this amendment. It does not provide at all against the payment of a consideration to any other party beside the member who is to be bribed. By this oath he swears that he will not himself receive, directly or indirectly, any consideration. If the consideration was to be paid to his wife, or to his daughter, or to his son, or to a friend, or to an association, or to a party to which he may belong, his oath will not cover the offence. It will not violate his conscience in this respect, and in the next place it will impose upon him no danger of responsibility to criminal law.

Now, as I do not know where much of the corruption at which this amendment points is to be found, I suppose, and I think it probable, that in a majority of cases the consideration for corrupt votes is not paid to the party himself, but it is paid in some of the directions which I have hinted. Therefore, unless this division shall be amended, I shall not at a future stage of our proceedings vote for it.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I merely wish to say that it must be apparent to every gentleman on this floor that it is impossible to draw an oath that will cover all this corruption, utterly impossible. And I believe that if you go back to the old oath, as was stated by the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) it is all and sufficient to cover every bit of this thing in general terms, and very much better for us to adopt than any of the suggestions offered to take its place. I must say that I have learned some new ideas since I came into this Convention. Being somewhat acquainted with the Legislature, being somewhat acquainted with the degradation of office generally, both in the Legislature and out of it, and having learned on the floor of this body that gentlemen were willing to give $500,000 for an office if created in a certain way, with certain powers, I am satisfied of the futility of any oaths that can be framed to prevent corruption.

Having listened to all this, and having listened to this elaborate discussion on oaths, I come down to the conclusion that it is all nonsense to undertake to reach it by an oath. If the language of the old oath is weighed judicially, and fairly, and literally, it is broad enough to cover every contingency. Hence, I hope the majority of this committee and the majority of this Convention will see the futility of this whole proposition to take these iron-bound, iron-clad oaths. I hope the committee will vote everything down, and come down to the old oath, which covers every possible point that has been tried to be reached by this elaborate language.

Mr. ALRICKS. Mr. Chairman: When this section was before the committee on the report of the Committee on the Legislature, a very important amendment was made to it. I wish to call the attention of the committee to it now. It is in the tenth line, after the word "well," to insert the word "honestly." I consider that a very important amendment, and I move to amend the amendment by inserting that word.

Mr. MACVEAGH. As that was before inserted I accept it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment, as modified, of the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh.)

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. KAINE. I now offer the following amendment.

The CLERK read:

Within twenty days after the adjournment of the General Assembly sine die, every member of the House of Representatives and every Senator whose term will expire at the next succeeding election, shall go before the court of common pleas, or some judge thereof, for the county wherein he resides, and take and subscribe, to be filed among the records of said court, the following oath, or an affirmation to the same effect :

"I, A. B., do solemnly swear that, as a member of the Legislature, I have obeyed and defended the Constitution of this Commonwealth in all things, to the best of my knowledge and ability; I have listened to no private solicitation from interested parties or their agents; I have voted or spoken on no matters in which I myself had, or expected to have, a private interest; I have not done, or wilfully permitted, any act which could make me guilty of bribery, as defined in the Constitution; I have observed the order and forms of legislation prescribed by the Constitution, and I have not voted or spoken for any law which I knew or believed to be inconsistent with it; I have in no case acted corruptly, to serve the interests of private parties or classes, but always with due regard to the honor, good faith, independence and peace of the Commonwealth, and to the just rights and liberties of the people."

If any member shall fail to take the latter oath within the time prescribed, or as soon thereafter as the state of his bodily health permits him to appear at the proper place for that purpose, he shall not afterwards be capable of re-election or of holding any office of honor, trust or profit under this Commonwealth; and if it be false he may be punished for it as perjury, as in other cases of false swearing.

MR. KAINE. As there seems to be a general disposition to get rid of this matter now, I will withdraw that amendment for the purpose of voting the whole thing down.

THE CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the section.

The section was rejected.

THE CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

THE CLERK read :

SECTION 2. Each House shall judge of the qualifications of its members, but contested elections for members of either House shall be determined by the court of common pleas of the county in which the returned member lives, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

MR. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I desire to call the attention of the committee to the very great importance of this section. It is a grave question, whether the evils of the decision of contested elections by the representative bodies are greater than the danger of imposing partisan duties upon the Judiciary.

The Committee on the Legislature considered that question at great length, and in their deliberations had had the advantage of the life long experience of the gentleman whose loss we have so recently deplored, Col. Hopkins, of Washington county, and I think we reached an almost unanimous conclusion that it was unwise to burden the judicial department of the government with this duty, and that the evil of contested elections decided by representative bodies was of lesser magnitude than the danger which would menace the judiciary if the labor was imposed upon it. I beg leave to call the attention of the committee to a very important fact in this connection. This whole question received, a few years ago, the most thorough and exhaustive discussion in the House of Commons. It was admitted upon all hands that this was a judicial question, that the title to an office was as judicial a question, when the office was political as when it was of any other character, but the opponents of the measure in the House of Commons took the ground that the judiciary could not safely undertake the burden of deciding questions of a political character, in which the passions of men had been so deeply excited and aroused. Nevertheless the House of Commons, after a more exhaustive, voted that thenceforward, contested elections of members of the House of Commons should be decided by Her Majesty's judges, under the rules of law applicable to other causes.

Very soon after that law went into effect a great election contest arose in Galway, Ireland. It interested every citizen of the electoral district. The ministers of the Catholic churches were supposed to feel a deep interest in the return of a candidate whom they were supposed to favor. The advocates of home rule for Ireland were deeply interested in the contest, and the supporters of the government were, of course, deeply interested upon their side of the question, so that it became a very excited and animated contest. It resulted in a contest after the election for the seat, and that question was referred, under the law, to Her Majesty's judges, and when the decision was announced one universal storm of execration swept over Ireland, from north to south and from east to west, so that the judge who delivered the decision was obliged to take refuge in London from the populace, and henceforward Mr. Justice Keogh's authority, as a judge in Ireland, is not worth a farthing, and never will be.

That was the result of the measure there. I do not suggest it as conclusive to this committee, but I do suggest that it is well worthy of consideration, and the fact that by reason of that single judgment the Irish judiciary has received a shock from which, in the opinion of competent observers, it will not recover for many years, should be carefully considered by the gentlemen of this committee before they impose such a burden upon the judiciary.

I do not claim that this section is obnoxious to the criticism of putting non-judicial duties upon the judges. On that subject I trust when the time comes this Convention will be a unit, whatever other differences may exist. I fervently trust that we will utterly abolish the patronage of the courts.

This is, however, another question—whether a burden that is so political and partizan in its character, that the common comprehension refuses to consider it judicial, shall be imposed upon the judiciary. If we are making a fundamental law for the common comprehension of our fellow men, it may be unwise even to impose judicial duties which the common mind refuses to recognize as judicial, and I venture to say that the judicial decisions of contested elections, even in this city, have not resulted favorably, have not resulted in such a manner as to cause thoughtful men to care to amplify the jurisdiction of the courts in this regard. I have, however, done all I desire to do, in calling the attention of the committee to the great gravity of the question, and to the fruits which this change has born in that country from which we have derived almost all of our law, and so large a portion of which is best in our civilization.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: The Committee on Suffrage, as has been already stated, have been considering this question of contested elections, and they will make a report upon the subject. It is possible that the question of contested elections in the Legislature, may be separated from others and be treated in this article; but my own idea is that a uniform principle can be applied to legislative and to all other contests. Now the member from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) informs us that there was an excitement in a certain Irish contested election case recently, under an act of Parliament, which extended throughout the British Empire. He did not inform us, however, that the English Parliament had taken any steps to repeal the law. He did not inform us that British experience against the judicial decision of contested election cases was, in the judgment of Parliament, a failure, or that a repeal of the statute had been enacted. Now this law transferring the decision of contested elections of members of Parliament to the judges, was passed some years since, and many cases have been adjudicated by the judges, and the law yet stands, and, for aught we know, it will stand for a century to come, in that country. At all events the general conclusion to be drawn is, that the law has been satisfactory. If it had not been, a repealing statute would have been introduced, and earnest debate would have taken place upon it, even if it had not been passed. A judge in Ireland is not appointed by the people of Ireland as our judges are appointed by the people of Pennsylvania. A judge goes there amongst the people of that country very often an alien, imposed upon them against their will by the imperial power of the empire, and they are to submit to whatever he does without redress, if wrong be done. This may account, to some extent, for the particular case to which the gentleman has referred, and I think every one will agree with me that that is not a case to quote to us in Pennsylvania, where we have a different system altogether, where the judges are inspired by different feelings toward the people over whom they preside.

There is another consideration to be taken into account with reference to this Irish case, and that is, that it was a religious dispute or quarrel. It was a contest between a minority, so to speak, of the people upon the one hand, holding certain religious sentiments, and a majority of the people upon the other. The gentleman has told us that an assault was made upon the Catholic priests, and therefore indirectly, at least, upon the Catholic church for their alleged interference with the election. Briefly stated, it was a dispute between religious sects with a judge imposed upon the people to whom they were hostile. Besides that, sir, a single case in the course of years, under a general statute, is not conclusive against the wisdom of the statute. The statute being general, its operation may be good, upon the whole, though defective in a particular case. Whatever else may be done by this Convention, I will not agree that contested elections of members of the Legislature shall be determined as they have been heretofore.

Mr. D. W. PATTERSON. Was not the judge in the Irish case a member of the Catholic church himself, notwithstanding his decision adverse to that church?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have no information upon that subject.

Mr. D. W. PATTERSON. He was, and an Irishman at that.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will not agree that a committee drawn by lot, and drawn in such manner that the weakest members of the body are to compose it, shall be permitted hereafter to render purely partisan decisions upon all questions of evidence, as they rise in the progress of the trial, as well as upon questions affecting the merits which enter into the ultimate decision. If you are to have a tribunal of judgment, made up of members of the Legislature, I would at least place over them a judge, who should be armed with authority to decide all questions of law that arise during the progress of the hearing. I would give the same guarantee, at least, for justice in the decisions which you have in the ordinary court, where your jury does not decide the questions of law, but the judge, and where they receive his instruction upon all questions of law that are involved. Unless you make the trial of a contested election case in the Legislature, in point of fact as well as in theory, a judicial proceeding, you never can obtain or secure justice.

I am not particularly anxious that these cases shall be sent to the ordinary courts of law; that they shall be sent to the court of the county in which the candidate whose seat is assailed, may reside. I care nothing about the particular form which our amendment shall take; but I insist upon it that it is a necessity, in the interests of public justice, that you shall make trials of contested election cases, that are judicial in character, judicial in fact, and thus secure the just rights of the people, as they may enter into these cases of contested elections. That is all I care to say at this time.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment:

The CLERK read: Strike out and insert: "Each House shall judge of the qualifications of its members. Contested elections shall be determined by the House in which the contest arises, in such manner as shall be directed by law."

Mr. BIDDLE. I wish to say a very few words. The existing clause is: Each House shall judge of the qualifications of its members, but contested elections for members of either House shall be determined by the court of common pleas of the county in which the returned member lives, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

I have modified that so as to leave the ultimate judgment in the House. I deprecate very much the proposed reference of these subjects to a court. I wish to speak most respectfully of the courts of justice of Philadelphia, but I am compelled to say that whenever an election case, so far as my experience goes, is before them, the case is decided—and I have not the slightest doubt, decided conscientiously, according to the political predilections of the judges who sit there.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: In behalf the committee which made this report, I desire to say a word in answer to the alarm sounded by the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) against the section, also as to the amendment offered by the honorable and intelligent gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle.) No feature of this report was more carefully considered by every member of the committee than the section as you find it upon your files. I say, in all frankness, I was over-ruled in my opinion by a majority of the committee. Since the report has been made, since I have turned it over in my mind and talked with my associates, and viewed this subject in all its aspects, I have come to the conclusion that the majority of the committee was right, and I am earnestly, and with all my heart, in favor of this reform.

Delegates will observe that this merely gives to the Legislature the discretionary power of passing a law to determine the manner in which contests shall be tried. They shall be tried in the county where the returned member lives, in such manner as shall be regulated by law.

Mr. BIDDLE. It shall be "determined," not "tried."

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Shall be determined, I meant to say. It is understood by this that the Legislature has a large discretion in enacting a statute regulating all the details of the trial. This is a radical change and I think it is imperatively demanded by the experience of the times. The eloquent gentleman from Dauphin

(Mr. MacVeagh) has spoken of the experience of England. In echo of that sentiment, allow me to remark that our experience with the statute which we have, being almost a transcript from the English law, and under which our contested election cases are now tried, has not been favorable to the course of justice. When George Granville, in 1770, introduced into the English Parliament the code which we have tried; he thought he had discovered the panacea for every ill attendant upon the trial of contested elections. The experience of more than half a century has convinced us that the trial of such cases by partisan Legislatures has not been fair and even-handed justice to the parties interested or to the people at large. Something must be done, and the question is, will you now adopt the theory suggested by the honorable delegate from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) or will you trust it to the courts of the locality in which such cases arise.

I approve of the sentiment of the delegate from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) that these trials should be of a judicial character. Where can we best have it? Undoubtedly in the courts of the Commonwealth. The only argument against placing such jurisdiction in the courts is that they would become partisan. The statutes passed by the Legislature from time to time enlarge the jurisdiction of courts over a great number of cases of the trials of contested elections. Recently, on taking up a daily paper, I discovered that in the trial of a contested election case, for one of the most important county offices, involving large local interests, in the court of Luzerne county, the honorable court rendered a most intelligent decision, which I trust will meet the approbation of all, and I am satisfied that the court has not dragged itself into the mire of politics by having jurisdiction of such a case.

I find in the case of Mann and Cassidy, which established a record of fraud in the elections of this city without a parallel in the political history of the Commonwealth, that it was decided by a majority of the political friends of the gentleman in whose favor the decision was made. From time to time, in different courts of the Commonwealth, this jurisdiction has been exercised in the most valuable and important offices. What creates more excitement in the minds of the people of a county than a contested election case for the office of sheriff or some other remunerative office in the gift of the citizens of the Commonwealth? And yet the courts are clothed with ample power to try and determine the cases. Why should we not allow the courts to determine the cases of contested elections when the rights of a Representative or Senator to his seat in the Legislature is involved? I am in favor of the section as it is reported, and I trust this Convention will endorse it, leaving the future to determine whether it shall be accompanied by the results the friends of the section now anticipate.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman: I have only a few words to say in reference to this subject, and I am impelled to express them, from a deep sense of the importance of the matter. I trust the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) will not be adopted. It is simply a modification of the existing state of affairs. We have been referred during the discussion of this question to the practice of the British Government. It is well known that our present act of Assembly, framed under the Constitution, is a re-enactment of the Granville act, under which the British parliament practiced in cases of contested election for, perhaps, a century. The experience of that government in these matters, and in judicial questions generally, is of great importance in guiding us to a just conclusion in regard to this matter. The British government prefaces their act with these words: "Whereas, it is expedient to amend the laws whereby elections are held, and to provide more effectually for the prevention of corruption practiced at parliamentary elections," &c. The object of the law was not merely to determine the question as to who was entitled to the seat, but it was intended to go deeper and prevent the corruptions practiced at parliamentary elections.

We are well aware that in the present system of investigation, the question of title to office is the only matter of inquiry in the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, and the practice and the method by which the office has been attained, seldom, if ever, reaches the public eye, and in no way is punishment visited, of any kind whatever. From the very earliest times the judges of England have been the creatures of the ruling power. We know that the bar itself must be and is subservient to the strong power that controls the government. The silk gown is conferred upon a subservient counsel, and a sergeant is created by the will and pleasure of the monarch. Then when the judge is required to render a judgment, we are aware that he is obliged to conform his rulings to the views held by that power that controls in the government, but we will also know that, notwithstanding the monarch and notwithstanding the judges, there is a sentiment in the minds of the British people that can wrest justice from both monarch and judges. In due time the very excitement which alarmed the people, and perhaps to us would cast a finger of warning, is in the British Constitution the very evidence of its life and its power, and that it will create a more wholesome sentiment and a better security for the liberties of the people.

We know that the Wilkes case shook the British empire from centre to circumference, and from that case arose principles which will be eternal in this question of the right to office and of the right of the people to elect whom they please to elect to office. Now this is eminently a judicial question. The gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) admits that there can be no denial of this fact. When an election has taken place, and the ballots have been deposited, and a man has a clear majority, he has a vested right to the office to which he has been elected, and it is clearly and plainly a simple judicial question, to decide and determine in whom that title has vested.

Now, if we refer these questions to the judiciary, will it necessarily follow that the judiciary will be degraded? It may to some extent have that effect, but is that a reason why these questions should not be so referred? It does not involve a new principle. The judiciary of Pennsylvania have now the right to determine the title to office in a great many instances throughout the Commonwealth, and why should they not have the power to determine cases of contested elections for members of our Legislature? There should be in this Constitution some uniformity in the determination of these questions, and I think it is of the utmost importance that there should be one uniform principle running through the entire Commonwealth, not only with regard to county officers and judges of courts, but also with regard to members of the Legislature and State officers. We would derive great advantages from such practice, and inasmuch as it is a judicial question, it will be determined upon principles that will govern our judges in its ultimate decision.

They will not be allowed one day to make a ruling, and the next day to reverse themselves, if this power is conferred upon the judiciary, for out of this plan for the determination of these questions will grow a system that will be of great value to the people of Pennsylvania in assisting in determining the rights of the electors for all time to come. It will be a system that will be of great value to the State, and the question that it will degrade the judiciary ought not to weigh the slightest against this proposed section. We must elect men who are fully competent to discharge the duties of their judicial positions, and if they do not determine these questions according to law, the remedy will then rest with the people to elevate better and abler men to these positions.

The determination of these questions of contested elections, as now practiced, is a matter of mere thimble-rigging. It depends entirely upon the manner in which the tickets are put in a box and drawn out of the box. A man may know how they were placed in the box, but no man can tell how they will be drawn out, except the man who put them in the box. It is simply a mere game of chance, and while it continues we shall have neither confidence nor principle in the system, and will lose all confidence in the result of popular elections, which it is the utmost importance for us to restore and preserve.

Mr. JOHN R. READ. Mr. Chairman; I am unqualifiedly in favor of the section as reported by the committee. I believe with the gentleman who has just taken his seat, (Mr. Ellis,) that the determination of these questions of contested elections has become a great abuse, and one that is in sad need of correction.

Let us for a moment consider how these legislative committees are constituted. Let us, in other words, make a diagnosis of the disease, which, by this section, we are endeavoring to cure. If carefully made, we shall find that the present system has worked perniciously, and with the light of our experience, seems to have been devised as a method of rewarding political favorites, and men of consciences elastic. The power of these committees is as great and mighty as that of any other tribunal in the State of Pennsylvania, because, sir, they step between the representative and the people who elect him. They can, by a scratch of the pen, reverse the decision of the people. When any tribunal can do this, I assert that it is a power too great and mighty to be regulated by the doctrine of chances.

These committees sit as a judicial tribunal. They hear evidence for and against the petitioner, but they do not give speedy and exact justice in their deliberations, and justice is frequently denied, and is often for sale. The hearings in these cases of contested elections are often prolonged until the end of the session, and the disappointment of the defeated candidate is then alleviated and assuaged by the payment of his costs and expenses, and the same salary as that allowed his opponent and other members, so that it has become quite common for persons who were fairly and honestly defeated in the elections to inaugurate these contests for the purpose of filching from the treasury of the State the disbursements and expenses made and incurred by them in an unprofitable political campaign.

It is well known, sir, that the justice of these committees is not blind. It winketh its eye and bows its head in meek submission to the mandate of the party caucus, or follows with servile complacency the advice of the party leaders. But if, perchance, there should happen upon one of these committees a man with sufficient independence and virtue to enable him to assert his manhood, and to manifest a disposition to be guided by the evidence, the party whip is cracked loud and long, and descends with wicked cruelty upon the back of the would-be faithful member, and he is then, under threats of expulsion from the ranks of his political associates, forced into abject contrition, and to do meek penitence by signing the degrading verdict, even though he shudders in secret sorrow.

Mr. TEMPLE. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he believes the judiciary, as a class, are more honest in the determination of all election cases, than the Legislature itself?

Mr. JOHN R. READ. I do, most unhesitatingly.

Mr. TEMPLE. Then I can only say your experience has been different from mine.

Mr. JOHN R. READ. I cannot believe that the gentleman was serious in asking this question. If I believed that the judiciary were not more honest in the determination of election cases than legislative committees, then would I fear that the frame work of this government was so rotten and decayed that it would fall to pieces at the first rude shock of contending forces. Now, as was said by the gentleman from Schuylkill, this is a question which is purely one of title. The Judiciary will not be called upon to decide the qualifications of members of the Legislature. They are not to decide whether he is of age, but they are simply to decide whether he has been elected by a majority of the votes of the people who send him to that body, and I believe, as that is a question which depends upon legal and proper evidence, and one which Judicial tribunals can best decide, that it should be submitted to them alone.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, what is the remedy proposed by the committee? It is, sir, that all these questions should be decided by courts of justice, in the county from which the returned member comes. To enable this to be done, without fear or favor, I would elevate our judicial tribunals so high above the narrow plane of party politics that they could afford to do right and dare to be independent. The Legislature can prescribe such ways and means for the taking of the testimony, and the time at which it shall be taken, so that exact and speedy justice can be done to the contestant and person who has received the certificate of election. The courts can then issue to the contestant or person who claims to have been elected a certificate of election, if that shall decide that he is entitled to the same, and that person can then go to the legislative halls and be received as a member, provided he should be otherwise properly qualified. I am free to confess that, for manifold reasons, I am in favor of making some important changes in the tenure of our judiciary, and, perhaps, in their qualifications. I would make them ineligible to election until they shall have arrived at the age of forty years. I would give them a term of twenty-five years, and make them ineligible to re-election, and I would confer upon them a retiring pension of whatever sum might be deemed proper by the Legislature. By these changes, if it is possible to have an independent judiciary, without adopting the life tenure, we would have gentlemen occupying judicial positions who would dare, if human consciences are not relics of antiquity, to do what seems to them to be right. I believe that the decision of courts so constituted would be received without suspicion, and with a confidence that is most desirable. Entertaining these views, I am, as I said in commencing these remarks, unqualifiedly in favor of the report of the committee.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment to the amendment: Strike out the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia, and insert the following: "Each House shall judge of the qualifications of its own members, but contested elections for members of either House shall be determined by both Houses of the Legislature, acting jointly in such manner as shall be prescribed by law, and in no case shall a subcommittee of the Legislature determine the said contest."

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I endeavored a while ago to obtain the floor to offer the amendment which the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle) has offered. I think his proposition is much better than the present law, and greatly better than that reported by the committee, although little can be said even in favor of it. The present mode is a bad one for the reason pointed out, among others, by the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) that in drawing these committees, each party endeavors to cut the strong men of the opposite party off from them, and the result is that the committees are ordinarily composed of the weak men of the body, who would be very likely to decide the question in accordance with their party predilections. The usual mode of deciding contested elections—that adopted by Congress, and I believe by most of the States of the Union, is evidently an evil one. This mode allows the body to decide by a majority vote which of the contestants is entitled to the seat. I have witnessed some twenty contested elections and taken part in them, and I am obliged to confess, although it is humiliating, that in almost every instance the votes that were cast were cast according to party predilections. I believe that has been the case in every instance, with an occasional exception, where the members of the majority, perceiving that their votes were not needed to secure their friend his seat, came forward and appeased their conscience by casting their votes for the opposite party. This is simply humiliating. I admit the defects of the present system.

Little can be said in favor of the practice of allowing a legislative body to decide the question of the right to a seat of its members by what is usually a mere party vote, but I do not see at present, that there is any better mode, and even as it is now, I consider it better than the one suggested by the committee. I am afraid to entrust to the courts of common pleas the decision of questions that I have always seen decided elsewhere upon party grounds. The last thing I desire to see happen to the courts of the country is to make judges political. The decision of these questions has always made the tribunals so deciding them political in their nature and I have no reason to believe they will not produce the same effect upon our judges. The observation of the gentleman who offered this amendment is to the effect that wherever this experiment has been made of trying contested election cases in courts, the decisions either were, or there was reason to believe that they were, of a partisan character. It matters very little whether these decisions were rendered in a partisan spirit, or were supposed to be by the community, the result is the same upon the standing of the court. When the courts are supposed to be political in their feelings and actions they will lose the confidence of the community. They might as well be political as to be supposed to be by the people. Now this question, I am glad to see, is engaging the attention of the Committee on Suffrage. I am in hopes they will devise some plan by which we shall have all questions of contested elections of State officers decided in accordance with some satisfactory plan. Let us create some tribunal somewhere, if it is considered necessary. Let it, of course, be a judicial tribunal, for the questions are in the nature of judicial ones. The Committee on the Judiciary I suppose will report a provision for an intermediate court. Whether that court will be so constituted as to be safely entrusted with these questions I do not know; I have some doubts about it. The only plan I could suggest is the constitution of a special court, the judges of which should hold their offices during good behavior, so as to be utterly independent of party, and so that they could afford to be impartial, and ultimately would come to decide these questions strictly as legal questions.

Now, the importance of creating some tribunal to decide contested elections in a better manner than they have been decided yet, is manifest to every one who reflects upon the consequences of a contest for Governor of the State. If a contest for Governor should be decided by a majority of the Legislature happening to be against the party manifestly elected, and in a case where the contest is made purely because the body deciding the question has the majority, the consequences would be serious. This will most surely happen if the present plan is continued. Let it be remembered there is now no plan for deciding the right of electors for Vice President and President of the United States to their seats. There is no way to decide those questions, and when the difficulty shall arise in a State like Pennsylvania, in a case in which both parties may with some plausibility claim the election, where both sets of electors meet and send the result of their labors to Washington, and where the question of which set of electors shall be counted, governs the whole question of who shall be President and Vice President of the United States, then there will be revolution. I had my attention called to this peril at the first election of General Grant, when the State of Georgia was ruled out; and it was admitted on all sides, that if the electors of the State of Georgia, being counted, would have changed the result, the consequences might have been terrible.

Now, the States must settle the question of contested elections of electors for themselves; and I mention this as one of the reasons why some tribunal should be constituted that will stand so high and independent in public estimation as to be known by everybody to decide these questions according to law. Such a tribunal as this should be constituted while we are free from the dangers which may come upon us. I trust that the duty of determining these questions will not be imposed upon the courts of common pleas of the counties. I do not wish to see those tribunals made political, and I trust that the Committee on Suffrage will mature and bring forward some plan covering the whole ground. In the meantime, I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle) will be adopted.

MR. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I apprehend that the great difficulty in our present constitution in regard to this subject is, that it strives to point out a specific mode of determining cases of contested elections. The Constitution of 1838 says, "contested elections shall be determined by a committee to be selected, formed and regulated in such manner as shall be directed by law." The Constitution itself requires a committee to be appointed. It was specific in that particular, and made it obligatory upon the Legislature to create a committee to try contested election cases. According to the language of the Constitution, it would seem that the report of such a committee would be conclusive upon the subject, and I believe that has been the practice in the Legislature. Now, in consequence of that, as a matter of course the committee could not be chosen until the Legislature met, when the contest of one of the members of that Legislature should arise, and in every case in which a contest arose for a member of the Senate or House of Representatives, the committees have to be called, selected and formed out of the very members who compose the Legislature at that time, after the election occurs. Now, sir, I am unwilling to place a provision in our Constitution that might bind us down irrevocably to any plan. It seems to me that this is continuing the very vice now in our Constitution. I am opposed, therefore, to saying in the Constitution we are now framing, that contested elections shall be determined by the courts, and be fixed irrevocably in that form. Why not leave these questions, in the broad language of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) so that they shall be determined in such manner as shall be prescribed by law, and if the Legislature thinks proper to confer this power upon the courts, let it do so. Let the experiment be tried, and if found to work well it will be continued, but if found to work badly, it may be repealed. If you place the provision reported by the committee in the Constitution it becomes irrevocably fixed, and must always be resorted to.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle) will accept the modification that I shall suggest to his amendment, because I am opposed to the amendment which has been offered to the amendment.

I propose to add to the gentleman's amendment these words: "Existing at the time the election took place." The gentleman's amendment concludes with these words: "Contested election cases shall be determined in such manner as shall be directed by law."

MR. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I have no objection to accepting the proposition of the gentleman as a modification to my amendment.

MR. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: The object of the modification which I have suggested to the gentleman's amendment is to prevent the Legislature from passing an act in reference to some special cases that is before them, for the law existing at the time the election occurs must prevail with reference to the contest arising at that time.

When the act does not apply to any case then existing, when it cannot apply to any contest at that time existing, but must apply to contests in the future, all parties will desire to have a fair and impartial law on the subject. It will cut up this special legislation in reference to any particular contest.

Now, sir, with the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) I stand utterly opposed to giving this power to the judiciary of our State. In my judgment the judiciary of our State is by far the strongest power in our government, the strongest for good and the strongest for evil. We can control and limit the Legislature and the various other departments of our State, but our judiciary, from its very nature, stands almost beyond reach, and I am utterly opposed to conferring anything like political power upon the judges of our Commonwealth. I wish those judges to be removed as far as possible from party influence and from the influence of politics, not only while they are on the bench, but also in their election; and I call gentlemen's attention to this feature of the case. We have had elections in this State when the persons who were candidates of the party opposed to the dominant party in the county have been elected as judges. We can all call to mind instances occurring in different parts of the State where candidates of the minority party have been elected judges. I wish that the judges shall be so far removed from politics that that may be oftener done. But if you put upon the judges of this Commonwealth the decision of contested election cases you make their election a matter of politics at the very outset. Why, sir, if politicians and parties know that the judges are to determine all these contested election cases, and they will arise frequently, under the section reported by the committee here, I ask you if all parties will not look at that question in its relation to the decision of the court? It will decide the election of the judges themselves; it will become an element in their election, the passing upon these political issues. I wish to avoid that. I wish to have the judges, as far as possible, removed from politics and all political influence in their election, as well as when they get on the bench; and I am willing to trust the Legislature to pass a general law and a good law on the subject. Further than that, if they feel disposed to do it, as I have said—to confer this power upon the courts—they can do so under the present proposition. They could not do so under our present Constitution, because that says it must be determined by a committee. Under the proposition of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) as modified, the Legislature may confer this power on the courts, and they could try it.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I think the gentleman from Allegheny misunderstands the amendment. I would like to have it read.

The CLERK read:

"Each House shall judge of the qualifications of its members. Contested elections shall be determined by the House in which the contest arises, in such manner as shall be directed by the law existing at the time the election takes place."

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. I confess that I misapprehended his amendment. I shall not vote for that. I shall not vote for saying that it shall be determined by the House, because I wish to leave it open, and I wish the Legislature to have power, if they choose, to try the decision of such cases by the courts. I prefer it as it is, but I am willing to vote for that broader proposition. At the same time I wish to express my conviction of the impropriety of conferring additional powers upon the courts, especially in political matters; and to say here, that unless I greatly change my opinion I shall, on no question, and in no vote, favor an increase of the powers of the courts. I wish them to be purely judicial; and to strip them of everything except judicial powers and duties, and limit them thereto by Constitutional provision.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I am aware that this matter of deciding a contested election is a judicial one: it is so understood by the legislative committee, sitting as judges, and bound by rules of law, the same as a court of justice. Yet, at the same time, we know that political questions constantly arise in the determination of contested elections; that it has been impossible to exclude them, and they have been decided just precisely as the committee happens to stand—the majority being of one political complexion or another.

Now, sir, I belong to a class of men—perhaps a minority—who believe that the judges are just about as good, altogether as good, as other men—liable to the same influences and the same temptations when placed under like circumstances. And, sir, if I have read history aright, I have found that political questions have found their way into the highest judicial tribunals of this country—both in our National and State governments. Political questions, every time, have been decided just as the majority of that court happens to be constituted, politically, at the time. We have not to go very far back, either, in the history of this country, or in the judicial or political history of our State, for illustrations. When the question of the draft; when the question of the suspension of the habeas corpus; when the question of the payment of bounties; when all these questions, growing out of the great war of the rebellion, were judicially considered, they were decided every time as political questions, and in accord with the political party views of a majority—as the majority of the judges representing one political side or the other.

The chairman of the committee says that the courts now may determine, and do determine, contested local elections; and why not give them the power to determine the question of contested elections of members of the Senate and House? In the contests arising out of local elections there are no questions of political power or political government at all. But the determination of a contested election for a member of the Senate may determine the political power of the Commonwealth one way or the other, and then they would bring to bear upon the tribunal that determines that question the same influences that they would bring to bear upon a committee, or upon any other number of men, in whom this power may be lodged. Gentlemen look at this proposition only from the stand-point of the manner in which contested elections have been determined. Well, we say they have been determined sometimes wrongfully. We know they have been determined just in accordance with the party views of the political majority; and I say, so far as the judgment of the judges can be ascertained, in every question of great political significance, they have decided them precisely in the same way. And, Mr. Chairman, a feeling, somehow or other, has got abroad in the Commonwealth that because the legislative power resided in the Legislature, and because that Legislature had the right, and the privilege, and the power to confer very important favors, that that body has been corrupted, in a measure, by the great corporations of this Commonwealth.

And, sir, there is another opinion now getting abroad among the people, and that is, that the same great corporations are trying to entrench themselves in the fortress of the judiciary. I once had a little experience, myself, going to prove this idea. I happened to be a delegate to a Convention that met at Keokuk, in the State of Iowa, for the purpose of devising some plan by which to improve the navigable waters of the Mississippi river and its tributaries, and also for the purpose of removing or preventing "obstructions" of those great natural water-courses. The "obstructions" complained of were bridges erected by railroads; and the objection was not to the fact that bridges were erected, but it was to the manner of their erection. In some instances they seemed to have been erected with a view to obstruction, in order to throw the trade and travel on to the railroads, instead of letting them take their course upon the rivers. I know that in that body we had to encounter a judge of the United States Supreme Court, a member of that Convention, who there represented the railroad interest, and opposed the river men. And when his attention was called to the indelicate position he occupied as a delegate there, when he knew the object of that Convention, and that it was called by the river interests, and when it was stated that questions might arise out of their deliberations that might come before the Supreme Court of the United States for decision, he stated in his place what his decision would be. Would I trust such a man as that with any question of this kind? I would not trust him any more than I would trust the lowest whelp that ever had a seat in the Legislature. I know, too, that that was the general opinion of gentlemen that had a seat in that body.

Mr. Chairman, I do not mean, by any word that I have to say here, to cast any reflection upon the judiciary of our Commonwealth. I know they are an able and learned body of men. I would like to keep them pure by not bringing to bear upon them influences that we know have corrupted other bodies of men that were, perhaps, just as good and just as honorable as they are. Contested elections raise difficult and troublesome questions, and gentlemen should look upon it in that light, whether, by creating a different body of men to determine them, they will really determine them in any different or more satisfactory manner than heretofore. I am utterly opposed to placing this power in the hands of the judiciary. If the candidates whose seats were contested should happen, if seated, to have the balance of power in their hands, so that they would give the majority, one way or the other, a tremendous contest—a fierce fight would be made for the purpose of carrying that election in a particular way, and every power would be brought to bear upon that court to influence them; fairly, if possible, and corruptly if it must be.

We should not place the judiciary in that situation. Let them decide cases arising in the courts between man and man—the ordinary legal business—but these contested election cases, although called judicial, are, we know, decided by the political bias of the men who decide them.

We know, too, after all, that when the party lash is applied, and when political questions have been decided heretofore by the judiciary, they have been decided for their party.

MR. MINOR. Mr. Chairman: I cannot subscribe to the amendment to the amendment, nor exactly to the amendment itself. I think, sir, the true position has been indicated by the gentleman from Allegheny, whose seat is on my right, (Mr. J. W. F. White.)

Now, the grand objection, it will be observed, which has been given in every case where a proposition has been made to refer anything to the judiciary is the fact that heretofore, by purity of character, it has commanded our respect and confidence. That is the reason which is given, and it is the reason which exists. That being true, up to the present time, as a general rule, I think it becomes the duty of this Convention to see to it that it shall leave the judiciary in such a position as that that reason shall not cease to exist. I think, sir, we owe a most solemn duty to the judiciary of this State, and to the people whose judiciary the judges are, that the ermine shall not be soiled, and that no man shall be able to put it in such a position that it can be suspected or charged with being soiled when it is not.

I care not how truly, honestly, or correctly a judge may decide a question of this nature, yet if he does decide in the direction of his own political proclivities, though, as I said, honestly so, he will be charged with having been biased by political influence. There is the difficulty. Now gentlemen undertake to answer this by saying that the act of a judge is a judicial act. That is no answer at all, sir. While the court itself is judicial, the subject is entirely political. The act, of course, is judicial; it cannot be anything else; but the trouble is that the question to be decided is purely political in its nature, and purely political as to the persons affected by it. The judge is really to say which political party shall have an increase in its power and which diminished, as the result of his decision. That result of his decision cannot be escaped. It is the very thing he is asked to decide. "How shall the political power of the State stand," so far as his decision can affect it? The result, therefore, is manifestly political, although the act itself is judicial. Then I will go a step farther. I said we should protect them from being subject to these charges; we should also save them from any possibility of having the reputation of being affected by political influence. Suppose a judge's term of office has almost terminated, and there comes before him a case of contested election, and he has reason to believe from the facts that the contest should be decided in favor of the candidate of the minority party of the county. Yet, in view of his desire for re-election, you place him in the position of being obliged either to decide, according to his conscience, against the dominant party, and thus defeat his own re-nomination and re-election, or to decide according to his interests and against his conscience, in order to secure his own re-election. There are men, I know, that will always do what is right; they will be just though the heavens fall; but suppose the judge decides in favor of the candidate of the dominant party; he is immediately charged with having so decided in order to secure his own re-election, and he is so situated as not to be able to deny it.

I say, then, it is not right for us to put a judge in that position, so that his character may be ruined beyond the power of man to save it, and that often without his fault; and when you ruin the reputation of a judge unjustly, you certainly make a terrible break-in upon the influence and integrity of the judiciary, and the high position that it now occupies in this State, and ought always to maintain. I remember once when at law school, listening to an address delivered there by one of the professors, and who was a judge of the supreme court, in which he said :

"Young gentlemen, I want to tell you that this State honored me with all the political offices I desired. I aspired to nothing but what they were willing to accord me politically; but I went on the bench in order to be independent of politics, and I have always rejoiced that in my decisions my mind would be free; and I say to you, that in your future labors, in connection with the laws of the country, see to it that the judiciary is left independent, and free from the opportunity of political bias."

That charge, thus given, I have never forgotten. The influence that it made upon my mind exists to-day, and I repeat the sentiment of that eminent jurist, and say: "Let our judiciary be kept so that it shall not be subject to the power of political influences," at all events so that it shall not be ruined by charges against it which are unfounded, and yet which it is so situated as not to be able successfully to meet. For these reasons we ought not to tie up the Legislature, as is done by this section. One word more, and I have done: I admit there are evils in the present plan, and great evils, and we have experienced evils because we have been tied up to one mode in the old Constitution. The other mode would be also full of evils, even greater than those which exist now. We have been tied, unfortunately, in the past, and if we adopt this section we will be tied, unfortunately, in the future. I believe, sir, that wisdom will not die with us. I believe good men are to live after us; and I think we may put in a section leaving it to the Legislature, to the wisdom and experience of the future, to suggest what shall be the best remedy. If one way is not the best, it can try another. I do not believe we can do better than to leave it there. I believe the suggestion made by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) to the Committee on Legislation is right, (contained in "No. 1" of the "suggestions,") and I read it as part of my remarks.

Mr. HUNSICKER. Mr. Chairman: I had not intended to take any part in this discussion. I did not dream that this section would receive any discussion. I presumed it would be adopted unanimously; because, if there is any evil which cries for reform—which needs reform, it is the subject of contested elections in the Legislature. The committees are drawn by lot, and as soon as the political complexion of a committee is known, it is determined who will get the seat. And that a man should be seated in the Legislature who has it in his power to pass a law to take away my liberty, my property, my life; that the man who exercises the supreme power of the State should sit there and legislate and enact laws, and yet, have never been elected or called to that place by the voice of the people; that his right to hold that position should be determined by lot, and that the report of a committee should be final and conclusive on the subject, is monstrous. Gentlemen seem to be very solicitous about "preserving the purity of the judiciary." Who has assailed the integrity of the judiciary? They have, for these long years past, tried and decided contested election cases. All our county officers; all our township officers; all our borough officers are made the subjects of contest before the judicial tribunals, and I have yet to know of more than a few isolated cases where they were decided according to the political predilections of the judges who happened to preside over the tribunal which tried them. When you come into court, you come into the court of the very county from which the member is elected, and there, in a solemn and judicial proceeding, you proceed to determine who has been lawfully elected. There is a record made. The witnesses generally reside there. The proceeding takes place right in that community having most interest in its result. The witnesses are called up, and after the case has been fairly and thoroughly examined, a decision is rendered by that court, and if there is any error in the decision, any error of law, it may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the State. Thus, it having been judicially ascertained who shall legislate and make laws for the protection of life, liberty and property of the citizens of the State, the right man will get the seat. And I do not think it is worthy of consideration that we should thus tend to make the judiciary liable to an imputation of being governed by partisan motives. The judiciary are above and beyond that reproach, with all its powers, and for that reason I shall vote against all the amendments offered, and vote for the section as reported.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I am in favor of this section as reported from the Committee on Legislation, for the reason that the judiciary can be so formed as to put them above and beyond parties. But after that is done, after the judiciary have been placed above and beyond parties, as I hope it will by this Convention, then all the arguments on this point submitted by gentlemen in the Convention, will fall to the ground. It is well known, and it has been said here over and over again, that these contests before the Legislature are perfect farces and no proper results are ever arrived at. It has been said here, and I presume it is true, that in later years, as the committees were drawn in the Legislature, so did members get their seats, the result having been determined according to the political complexion of the committee. I have not, however, known that to be the case in my experience, but it has been said in this Convention over and over again.

It has been said here, also, this morning, that the judges are inclined to decide according to their politics the questions of contested elections brought before them. I may be mistaken, but I think I heard some of our members say so. Now, I would cite the case of a decision that has been rendered in Luzerne county recently, which is a flat contradiction of that statement. The judges of the court are all Democratic, with, I believe, one exception, that one being a Liberal Republican; but they decided to give a Republican his seat to an office claimed by him, because it was right and just that he should have it. This decision was unanimous, as I understand it, and the seat was given to this Republican, because the vote showed that he was entitled to it, and the court did not desire to over-ride the vote.

But I have a plan to suggest that I think can lift the judiciary out of the influence of politics. I do not expect that I can make my opinions on this subject potent enough to carry them through this Convention, but I think that if the judiciary were constituted as my plan would constitute them, they would be taken entirely out of politics, and all these questions of contest would come before the judiciary properly. An office that a person has been elected to is a valuable thing, the title to which is valuable, and the courts ought to decide all questions of property in valuable things. They are constituted to do that, if I understand their functions correctly, and I believe that that is the place for them to go. My idea is to have the judiciary appointed, not elected. I believe that we have seen the error of the elective system as applied to the bench, and I conscientiously believe that if we leave it to the vote of the people, they will to-day vote against electing the judiciary. There are gentlemen around me who say that they do not believe such to be the case, but I believe it. I may not, perhaps, be able to speak intelligently for other sections of the State, but among my immediate constituents, the people of the Lehigh valley, I have not heard a man express an opinion on this point who is not opposed to electing the judges. I wish to see them all appointed for life. Make them ineligible to appointment of any kind while on the bench, and for two years, or a term of years, after they leave the bench. Take away all party from them by this plan of appointment for life, and you will have pure, and honest, and square men elected, and they will do as the honest men of Luzerne county did in the case I have referred to—decide contests according to their merits.

I hope the committee of the whole will adopt this section just as it came from the Committee on Legislation. The gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) asserts that the Committee on Suffrage, Election and Representation have a general section in view for all contested cases. Their report would coincide with this very well, and I trust that this committee will sustain the action of the Committee on Legislation in this matter.

MR. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say but a brief word upon this subject. If we change the Constitution in this regard it will be because we believe there are some abuses under the present system of determining the election of the members of the Houses of the Legislature; and if we make that change we simply do it as an experiment, to see whether we can get anything better. Whether we will improve the plan or not is a matter which I cannot tell; but while we try that experiment as to whether the mode will be improved by what we do or not, let us take care that we do not involve another department of the government, about which there is no complaint, in this experiment, and pull that down to a level with the character of the Legislature.

I do not desire to discuss the character of the Legislature. If for no other reason I would abstain from it out of deference to the sensitive feelings of my friend the gentleman from Potter (Mr. Mann); and I do not intend to object particularly to any amendment which will provide a different mode of determining this matter before the Legislature. But I do object to the question being referred to the courts of the Commonwealth, for the reasons which have been given by several members of this committee, and especially by the gentleman from Crawford, (Mr. Minor,) who has given almost my views upon this subject. But of the effect of this question upon the judiciary there can be no doubt. There is nothing that so stirs up the feeling of the people of any community as a question involving a political issue; and men take sides with more determination upon an issue of that kind than they do upon even the question of religion, and the whole community may be divided upon a question of this kind, with all the bitterness of party animosity, whereas the ordinary contests that come into our courts only involve the parties to the contest and their particular and immediate friends. This, however, would involve the whole community, and could not help but bring the judiciary into suspicion, and thus lower it and its character. Nay, more than that, it would not be long, if it did not corrupt the judiciary, before the people would carry the election of the judiciary into politics and elect the members of the courts to suit the contests which would be likely to come up. I was told, since I have been in Philadelphia, by a member of the judiciary here, that they feel their power weakening under their feet, because so much has been put into the courts. So many duties, inconsistent with their judicial functions, have been assigned them that politicians are organizing for the purpose of selecting a judiciary to suit the parties who have particular interests involved in their appointments.

Now, whatever we have to regret in Pennsylvania—and we have many things—and whatever we may have to humiliate us in this State, there is one thing upon which the people will ever look with gratification and pride, and that is their judiciary. Whatever may be said about the other departments of government, the executive and the legislative, there never has been a breath—to any considerable extent at least, except in special localities—with regard to the official integrity and personal purity of the members of the judiciary; and it is there that we must look at last. It is the last resort to which the people look for their personal rights, the rights of property, and the sustaining of the laws which may be created by the Legislature, and executed by the Executive. It is there, at last, where we—if we have had our rights invaded—present our claims with confidence, and have those claims allowed. Now let us not try an experiment, because this is but an experiment, by which we will endanger the confidence of the people in the high purity of that department of government about which, at this time, we have no doubt.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: Certain gentlemen near me have asked me how I would vote. I propose now to tell them and the whole committee at once, and at the same time to give a very brief reason for my conclusion. A contested election—the question whether one man or another is entitled to a seat in the Senate or House of Representatives—is, as everybody will admit, a judicial question purely. It involves the determination of matters of fact according to evidence, and the application of the law to the fact, after it is ascertained. Now it is a principle, not only of this government of ours, but of all free governments, that the judicial authority of the State shall be vested in the ordained and established courts. It is not safe anywhere else. The judges sit with open doors. They are obliged to hear a full discussion. They receive nothing but legal evidence. They exclude all evidence that is not pertinent to the subject, or which appeals merely to the passions. They are obliged to give satisfactory reasons for the conclusions that they arrive at, and a violation of their duty in any of these respects exposes them to a very severe punishment.

To take a question like this, or to keep it, out of the hands of the judiciary, and to put it into the hands of any special tribunal, is a violation of this fundamental principle. All the experiments that have ever been made of determining judicial questions, otherwise than by the regular courts, have been failures. That is the reason why the court of Star Chamber and the court of High Commission had to be abolished. That is the reason why military commissions and ecclesiastical tribunals have become infamous all the world over, and it is also the reason why nobody has any confidence in legislative committees.

We have had some experience upon this subject, and we are extremely unwise if we do not profit by it. It is said that "experience is a dear school," but that even fools will learn in that school when they are put at it long enough. The questions of contested elections were tried in the British Parliament, from time immemorial, until recently, by committees appointed for that purpose; and I need not say to you, nor any body who has read the history of that country, that there never was such a thing as a fair and upright decision in any case except where it accorded with the political wishes and interests of the committees, and the authorities of that country were driven, by stress of actual necessity, to provide some other mode of getting justice done. It is true that excitable population of Ireland—in Galway, the extreme west, where they are more excitable than any where else—charged, truly or falsely, that a judge in an election case had prostituted his official functions to a political purpose. But that was the only instance of dissatisfaction that has arisen since the new arrangement for trying such cases has been made.

Here in the city of Philadelphia, and elsewhere in the State, all contested elections, except for members of the Legislature, are tried, and heard, and determined by the courts. Here, perhaps, the strain upon integrity and the purity of the courts would be stronger than anywhere else in the known world. Yet I think the universal testimony is to the effect that the judges have acquitted themselves like fair and honorable men—not always deciding every question rightly, perhaps, not always able to do it with perfect freedom from some kind of prejudice; but the decisions upon subjects of that kind have been generally as fair as upon other subjects—as fair as you can expect from human tribunals.

But then, on the other hand, Mr. Chairman, look what has happened in cases before legislative committees. Can any gentleman point out a case in which the decision was believed to have been fairly and impartially made? Why, nobody looks for anything of the sort. A committee man who would vote according to the truth, in opposition to his political friend, would be punished by expulsion from his party. Now I don't say this without authority. I don't speak of our own Legislature so much as I do of some others that I have more acquaintance with. A gentleman—a member of Congress, and a very distinguished one—who was for a long time (ten years I think) chairman of the Committee on Elections, delivered an address before a convention, a "social science" meeting, or something of that kind, in New York. He spoke upon contested elections, and of their history for the previous ten years, (all which he saw and part of which he was,) and he told them, in effect, that there was no such thing as impartial decisions, and gave divers reasons why it could not be expected.

I was concerned once for the sitting member in a contest. The case was too plain to talk about. The simplest exposition of the facts made the case entirely clear; yet there were indications that my client might be deprived of the seat to which he was undoubtedly elected. I met a member of the committee afterward, of the majority party, who undertook to quiet my alarm by telling me that they did not intend to decide against the man who had the right. And he said, "I will tell you the reason why. We have got members enough on our side in this Congress, and we do not want any more. It is not necessary for us to do this wrong for any political purpose, and therefore we won't do it." [Laughter.] I am thoroughly persuaded that, plain as that case was, my client would not have stood half a chance if there had been a partisan reason for throwing him overboard.

The ground upon which I put my vote, simply stated, is this: That we have a reasonable assurance that rights will be protected if you try the question before the judicial tribunals, and that if you go before the Legislature itself, the chances are all against justice. Let us try judicial questions before the judicial authorities, and leave to the Legislature no functions but that which ought to belong to it, namely, the making of laws.

MR. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: There is one view of this whole question which does not seem to have been referred to by any speaker that has occupied the attention of the committee thus far. By the constitution of the Senate and House, which I have not heard any one propose to change, the House has the sole power of impeachment, and the Senate to try and adjudge, not only the Governor, but all judicial officers; and the judge to whom you propose to commit the power to decide whether one man or another shall be elected to the Senate may be the very man who is to be tried by your Senate for high crimes and misdemeanors. It might happen that one vote in the Senate would decide the question of the judge's remaining in office or going out. At all events he would have the power of deciding which of the two candidates were elected to the Senate, and his decision might be in favor of the man who would acquit him, when he comes to be tried before the Senate. Now, is it right to give the power to decide upon who shall be the Senator, to the man who has to be tried by the Senate, or who may be tried by the Senate? Are we not running into utter confusion in this respect? Suppose it be a member of the House—the House has the sole power of impeachment—the man whose seat may be contested; and to whom the judge deciding upon it may grant a commission, may be the majority who will decide upon the question whether he shall be impeached or whether he shall be convicted, or say who shall be the majority in that body, who is to impeach or to try

Now, this is one argument that, it strikes me, deserves the serious attention of the committee. But more, no one has yet suggested any change, as I have said, in the constitution of this high court. It will be sufficient, as far as the integrity and qualifications for the trial of your highest officers, your Governor, your Secretary of the Commonwealth, your Attorney General, all your civil officers. Every judge in the land who may be charged with high crimes or misdemeanors must be tried somewhere. The people have said in all time past that the proper tribunal to try these officers is the Senate. Why? Because you can imagine no tribunal better qualified. The human mind has not devised any better tribunal, and, therefore, the highest tribunal in the land may try your highest officer, and may adjudge him innocent or guilty, as the proof shall be, and yet the gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black) would have you believe that nobody is pure but the judiciary. You trust the Senate to try the purity of the judiciary. They are pure enough for that purpose, but not pure enough for any purpose connected with their own organization. Would it not be a strange spectacle if you were to assert that you will trust the House of Representatives with the sole power of impeaching all your officers, and yet deny them the authority, because they are unfit to say whether one of their number, be he who he may, is not elected or qualified to serve. Why should they not be trusted with the lesser function, when they are trusted with the greater?

Now, sir, it is said that this is a judicial function—everybody calls it a judicial function—and yet there is the least possible quality of judicial function about it. Contested elections, in nine cases out of ten, as the gentleman from York will, himself, concede, are purely questions of fact that any mind, not judicial, is as well qualified to decide as a judicial mind. Questions of law are very rarely presented in these contested election cases, and therefore you might organize a body to decide these questions with or without judges, as you please; they will not be any the less questions of fact. Does not every one know that in the last seriously contested election in Philadelphia, it depended upon a count of votes? And the judges at the first count made some mistake, or some one did who was summing it up, and they were obliged to go over it again. It was decided that that was wrong, and the seat was given to the contestant upon a pure question of addition; and yet you would debase the judicial mind by bringing it down to a question which every election officer is competent to decide. That is precisely where you are attempting to invest the judiciary with a question which is not strictly judicial. You cannot place it in the hands of the judiciary without degrading that office. There is no need of placing it there; it is better without it. It will be more honored and more respected. Besides, highly as I honor the judiciary, judges are but men, and men are necessarily interested in the government of their country, and they will take sides in a question of policy, differing honestly as to what shall be the best means of carrying on the government. We must expect that. We are divided into two well known parties, each having its own views of what the government, State and National, should be; and judges, whether they be elected or whether they be appointed, because, if appointed, they will be appointed by a power which has political proclivities, will have their political tendencies and associations, and although they are, in the main, pure and generally impartial, upon political questions they cannot safely be said to be wholly impartial. Allow me to suggest, that even the Supreme Court are not always impartial on political questions, and I would not trust such questions to them if it could be possibly avoided.

Entertaining, as I do, a very decided objection to imposing any more duties upon the courts, for they are already overburdened; we hear but one voice from all parts of the State, and that voice is, the judiciary are overloaded with business; and we are here to devise ways and means to relieve them of this burden, by appointing a greater judicial force or in some other way. While this is the case, and it is acknowledged to be so all over the State, why will we increase that burden by casting upon them duties which are not strictly judicial, for which there is no necessity, and which would be much better discharged by other tribunals.

Now, there has never been, in the history of this State, any great wrong perpetrated by either the Senate or House of Representatives, admitting a man to his seat who was not entitled to it. I challenge any gentleman to point out to me any instance in the history of the State where the introduction of a member, supposed not to have been elected, resulted in any great wrong to the State at large. True, it may have deprived one of the honors of the office, and it may have given those honors to another, who was not entitled to them. It may have been that he was the representative of the minority, but some of us are in favor of minority representation, and do not consider that a very great wrong. I do not think that any one can put his finger upon any legislation of the country that ever was influenced for evil by a man who was introduced into the body when he was not elected. Show me any instance; give me a fact; do not rely upon assertions; let us see whether the State has been injured in any time past by an improper decision in either house of the General Assembly in the introduction of a member. I must adhere to my judgment, that it is not wise to commit such power to the judges. I would leave it precisely as the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle) proposed to leave it, to each House of the Legislature, under such regulations as they shall prescribe.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Temple) to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) which the clerk will now read.

The CLERK read :

"Strike out the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia," and insert: "Each House shall judge of the qualifications of its own members; but contested elections for members of either House shall be determined by both Houses of the Legislature, acting jointly, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law, and in no case shall a special committee of the Legislature determine the said contest."

Mr. TEMPLE'S amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) which will be read.

The CLERK read :

"Each House shall judge of the qualifications of its members; contested elections shall be determined by the House in which the contest arises, in such manner as shall be directed by the law existing at the time such election takes place."

Upon this amendment a division was called for, and the amendment was rejected; twenty-six members, not a majority of the quorum, voting in the affirmative.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the second section.

Mr. ELLIS. I move to strike out the words "common pleas of the county," and insert "courts."

Mr. BARTHOLOMEW. Mr. Chairman: I move to strike out the words "common pleas of the," and insert "circuit court holden for the."

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I am not going to debate the question, but will merely remind the committee that the question of the court was decided by the committee, and it was thought wiser to give it to the court of common pleas in the county where the returned member lived.

Mr. MANN. It would be a very great hardship, in any county of the State, to send them to the circuit. We have no circuit court in our county, or within a hundred miles of us.

Mr. BARTHOLOMEW. There will be.

Mr. MANN. I hope there will not be.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say that the amendment which I offered may lead to confusion, and as an opportunity will be presented to offer it after the report of the Committee on Elections and other committees, I will withdraw it for the present.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment: Strike out, in the second section, after the word "determined," and all after the word "lives," so that the section will read: "Each House shall judge of the qualifications of its members in contested elections for members of either House shall be determined in such manner as shall be prescribed by law."

Upon this amendment a division was called, which resulted: Affirmative, thirty-three; negative, forty-five.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question being taken upon the section it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read :

SECTION 3. Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and publish them daily, except such parts as may require secrecy, and the yeas and nays of the members on any question shall, at the desire of any two of them, be entered on the journals.

The section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read :

SECTION 4. Either House shall have power to punish for contempt or disorderly behavior in its presence, to enforce obedience to its process, to preserve order in the House, or in committees, protect its members against violence, or offer of bribes, or private solicitation, and with a concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member for misconduct, not a second time, for the same cause; but a member who has been expelled for corruption shall not be eligible thereafter to either House. Punishment for contempt, or disorderly behavior, shall not bar an indictment for the same act.

The section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read :

SECTION 5. No law shall be passed except by bill, which shall be preceded by a preamble, briefly reciting the reason of the Legislature for its passage; and no bill shall be so altered or amended, in the course of its passage through either House, as to change its original purpose.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I move to strike out all in relation to the preamble.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Chairman: There seems to be a point here that will be subject to difficulty. It provides that each bill shall be preceded by a preamble, briefly reciting the reason of the Legislature for its passage. It occurs to me that that would be a physical impossibility. The Legislature may not know all the reasons. I certainly do not see the object of putting in this clause. I move to strike out that part of the section.

Mr. CORBETT. I rise to a point of order. That the question was just decided, and the committee refused to strike it out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand it.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I submit that that question was voted on.

Mr. LILLY. That was my original wording, but it was restricted. The committee did not vote on my original wording.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment, that there be no confusion.

The CLERK. The amendment is to strike out these words: "Which shall be preceded by a preamble briefly reciting the reasons of the Legislature for its passage."

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: It appears to me that this is a very singular feature to put into a Constitution, that every bill must be preceded by a preamble. I think it would endanger a great many bills if the bill did not accord with the preamble. I see no necessity for it, and I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Does not the gentleman think a great many bills ought to be endangered?

Mr. D. W. WHITE. That may be, but we do not not mind to endanger them when we pass them.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Unless the Legislature that passes a law can give a reason for what they do, ought they to do it? If they are not able to understand the grounds upon which they vote, they ought not to pass it at all, and if they are able to understand it they are surely able to state it briefly, in the form of a preamble. This is one of the restraints, that is intended to be put upon the Legislature so as to prevent them from acting hastily.

Mr. D. N. WHITE. I think that all the preamble we want in the bill is the bill itself.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. I am sure if the gentleman himself were a member of the Legislature, and I believe he has been, he would not vote for a bill without being able to give, in a few words, the reasons why he voted for it, stating the mischief of the law as it stands, and the necessity for a change in the law. In times past all the old English acts of Parliament contained preambles, and it lets more light in on the meaning of a law itself than any thing you can do.

Mr. D. N. WHITE. That depends upon who writes the preamble, and how it is written.

Mr. ANDREW REED. Mr. Chairman: I hope the committee will strike this out. We put in here in our organic law, a provision which makes it absolutely necessary that all bills passed must set forth the reason for their being passed. Now, one member may have a particular reason why he votes for a bill which may be directly opposite to the reason which influences another member, and you cannot get both the reasons in, because they are directly opposite to each other. One man may vote for a bill for the reason that he believes the provisions contained in it will promote the interests of a particular class, and another man will vote for the same bill because he believes that it is opposed to the same class of interests, and they will both vote for the bill. How will you fix it in a case of that kind? They will both be in favor of the bill, and yet each will have different ideas of the effect of the bill upon their constituents or the country at large. They will both wish the bill passed, but one will conceive it to have one effect, and the other will conceive it to have a directly opposite effect, and in a case of that kind what will you do with it?

For that reason I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Crawford.

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: This provision, if put in here at all, must be put in for some purpose. Now if it is absolutely requisite that this preamble should precede every act of Assembly, then if it does not precede the act of Assembly, it is no act, and would be unconstitutional. Then if the matter gets into court, where it must be determined at last, whether it is constitutional or not, the question will be raised, that this act cannot stand because it is not preceded by a preamble containing the reasons upon which it is based, and then will come the question, whether, if it has reasons in this preamble, they were sufficient to authorize the Legislature to have enacted the law. I claim that if that be the case —

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: I beg to call the gentleman's attention to the thirty-fifth section of this article of the Committee on Legislation in connection with his argument, which just corroborates his idea.

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: My attention has just been directed to another section, section seven, which I think contains enough to provide against any sort of legislation getting into bills of the character which, in legislative parlance, are called "snakes:"

"No bill shall be passed containing more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, except appropriation bills."

That is already in the Constitution, having been put in recently.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Read the thirty-fifth section.

Mr. LEAR:

"Any bill passed in disregard of the provisions and directions prescribed in this article shall be void and of no effect; and when the validity of any law passed by the Legislature is questioned in any court of record, it shall be competent for such court to inspect the Journals of either House, and if it does not appear thereon that all the forms of legislation, in both Houses, as hereinbefore prescribed, have been observed in the passage of such law, the same shall be adjudged by such court to be void."

Now, then, it seems to me that it must be apparent to every member of this committee that unless this preamble is to the act it is, of course, void, and unless the reasons contained in that preamble are, in the estimation and judgment of a court, sufficient to have warranted and authorized the Legislature in enacting the law, then it is unconstitutional. I say it is well enough, as the gentleman suggests, that acts of Parliament and acts of our Legislature should contain preambles. It is well enough to have these explanations before us, if they set forth the mischief which was intended to be remedied, or why it was that the Legislature was called upon to enact a particular law that they have passed. But, at the same time, when it is required by the Constitution that these reasons shall be contained in the preamble, then there come up the varied opinions of the judges of the courts of common pleas in the first instance, and of the judges of the final power of adjudication in the next instance, to determine whether the Legislature have had good reasons, whether these reasons have been sufficient, whether, in other words, as appears by the preamble, the Legislature was justified in passing the law. Now it seems to me that it must create interminable confusion and raise questions which should not be raised, and which it is not intended by this committee should be raised before courts of judicature.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: I do not think there is any necessity at all for this section. Section five reads that "no law shall be passed except by bill, which shall be preceded by a preamble, briefly reciting the reason of the Legislature for its passage, and no bill shall be so altered or amended, in the course of its passage through either House, as to change its original purpose." Nobody ever thought of passing a bill in any other way under the rules and practice of the Pennsylvania Legislature. Then the seventh section, which, I believe, is a transcript from the present Constitution, reads, "no bill shall be passed containing more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, except appropriation bills." Now if this section is voted down, I propose to amend the section, by adding thereto this much of the present section, "and no bill shall be so altered or amended in the course of its passage through either House, as to change its original purpose."

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I did not intend to say anything upon this subject, but I cannot concur in the construction given to this section by the gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black.) The thirty-fifth section requires a bill to have a preamble, or it might be void, but I apprehend there is nothing in the report that authorizes the courts to declare a bill void which contains a false preamble. If there are any words in any section of this report, as will allow any construction of this kind, I would like to have it pointed out. The section requires every bill to have a preamble, which is a matter that may be very necessary, because in the construction of an act, if a corrupt reason is assigned to the preamble, it may have great weight in the construction of the law, but there is no portion of this report, or any clause in it, which renders a bill null and void, if it has a preamble. I do not care how false or bad the reason is that may be assigned. If there is any provision of this kind I should like to be pointed to that section or clause.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I do not know whether I understood the gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) but my understanding is that he said if a bill contained a lying preamble, it would be declared void by the courts. If this is the law, I am certainly opposed to this section as it now stands. Suppose that some falsehood should happen to creep into the preamble of a bill. There might be, as often happens in deciding this question, a difference of opinion, and when that difference was balanced, there might be a majority of the court who would say that the preamble was false; suppose that question did not arise for ten or twenty years, and millions of dollars had been invested under that act of Assembly. Would it be right to give our courts the power to say that because some falsehood had crept into the preamble, therefore the act was null and void? I think we should take care not to vote for such a monstrous proposition as that. I was not aware that it had been held, that because the Legislature may have stated some falsehood as a reason why they passed an act of Assembly, therefore the act should be judicially declared null and void. I am unwilling to see any such provision introduced into the Constitution. It is certainly something extraordinary. We, of course, expect it to have something new, but such a provision is remarkably new.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. As the report now stands, the construction which would be placed upon it is the one which the gentleman from Clarion (Mr. Corbett) says is the true one. That is: That the validity of a bill will depend upon the question whether it contains any preamble at all, false or true; but I suggested that there ought to be an amendment to the thirty-fifth section, and that that could be considered when that section came up, making the bill void, not only for want of a preamble, but for want of a true preamble.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I understood the gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black) to state that an act of Assembly was null and void if it was preceded by a lying preamble. Now, whether that be true or not, if the courts were to decide that an act of Assembly was void, because it contained a falsehood in the preamble, I certainly would not support this section for other reasons. There might be an act of Assembly with one short section, and there might be a preamble as long as this room, because every member of the Legislature has a right to put his reasons in the preamble. Each individual member has a right to insert his reasons in the preamble as fully as the committee that reported it, and the preamble would be just as much susceptible of amendment as the bill itself, and when the highest law—the Constitution—requires that the reasons and the truth shall be inserted in the preamble, every member that votes for the bill will vote to have his reasons incorporated for voting for the act of Assembly. It may, indeed, be said that it would be a practical impossibility to pass a legislative act under such a provision as this.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: The object of this section is a manifest one. There is no provision in our present Constitution which prescribes the manner in which laws shall be passed. In order to avoid confusion it was deemed proper to provide that no law shall be passed except by a bill. The word "bill" occurs all through the section. With this explanation it is thoroughly understood. If the section is read it will be discovered that the section provides that no bill shall be so altered or amended as to change its original purpose. Now, the suggestion, preceded by the preamble, states, for instance, what its original purpose and object was. Then, furthermore, I call the attention of delegates to the fact that preambles now precede a great many of our bills. There is nothing to restrict the practice but the discretion of the Legislature. This section will increase the volume of our laws, and I remind delegates of the fact that it prohibits special legislation, and that it will largely restrict the amount of legislation hereafter. In addition, I may add this suggestion of preambles to the bills passed in the Legislature is an additional restriction or prohibition against the increase of special legislation. There are some items of special legislation which may not be covered by the prohibitory clause in section eleven, and consequently if a preamble is required there is an additional prohibition not covered by these other prohibitions, if not readily understood by the committee having jurisdiction of the bill. I think, then, the section affords a valuable reform in this respect.

Mr. ANDREW REED. Mr. Chairman: I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Suppose there is a bill introduced in the Legislature to repeal the usury laws, and one member desires the reason to be inserted in the preamble that it will cheapen money, and another member that it will make money dearer. How can the preamble be arranged in such a case as that, and what would be the effect?

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I do not think my intelligent friend from Mifflin intends that as a serious question. The question carries its own answer with it. There will be no reason at all; the bill will be sufficient. It has been decided in the case of Gentile vs. State of Indiana, to be found in 39, Indiana Reports, that any bill passed by the Legislature, concerning which the Legislature exercised, the exercise of that power could not be inquired into by another tribunal. Under this view, any reason which shall be given in the preamble for the passage of the bill, will be given after the bill has passed. No other tribunal can inquire into them.

Mr. RUNK. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "briefly," intervening before the word "and," and insert the following, "and truly recites the purpose for which it is passed."

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I am decidedly opposed to the section and the amendment now pending. My opinion is that the section is entirely unnecessary, and that its only practical effect will be trouble, difficulty and embarrassment, both in the Legislature and in the courts. There is now no existing abuse or evil in regard to preambles to acts of Assembly, for whenever they are thought expedient they are inserted, and when they are deemed otherwise they are omitted. Why, then, should a change be desired in the Constitution in this respect? If the section is passed there will be lawyers all over the Commonwealth arguing against the validity of statutes that may be passed because the preamble does not recite the particular purposes which the law is to be construed by the court to cover. Let our laws hereafter be construed upon their text. I am convinced that every gentleman of the bar, in looking at this matter, will be convinced that the only effect of placing such a provision in the Constitution, will be to produce trouble and difficulty hereafter without the slightest practicable advantage in any direction.

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment, a division was called, which resulted as follows: Ayes, forty-nine; noes, thirty-two.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the section as amended.

The sixth section was read:

SECTION 6. Bills may originate in either House, but may be altered, amended or rejected in the other. No bill shall be considered, unless reported from a committee and printed for the use of the members.

The sixth section was agreed to.

The seventh section was read :

SECTION 7. No bill shall be passed containing more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, except appropriation bills.

It was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman : Is it in order to move a re-consideration of section four?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be in order to-morrow.

The eighth section was read :

SECTION 8. Every bill shall be read at length, on three different days, in each House. All amendments thereto shall be printed before the final vote is taken, and no bill shall become a law unless, on its final passage, the vote be taken by yeas and nays, the names of the persons voting for and against be entered on the Journal, and a majority of the members elected to each House be recorded on the Journal thereof as voting in its favor.

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman : I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. J. M. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman : I move to amend, by adding to the end of the section the words, "and published in the pamphlet laws."

I suppose the object of this section is to place upon each member of the Legislature the responsibility for his vote. That is certainly the principal object of this section. It is proposed to place the name upon the Journal. Now who sees the Journal? It is true you have a section here which says it shall be published daily; but who will see that? Very few, I trow. If the object be, as I take it, to place the responsibility for his vote upon each member, let us show that we are in earnest, and let his name be placed upon the records of the Commonwealth, that the people see, side by side with the statutes, what he should be responsible for. This is the object of my amendment, and I hope the Convention will seriously consider it before voting upon it.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman : I think the gentleman (Mr. J. M. Bailey) is mistaken in regard to the object of this section. It is not particularly to make the members responsible, but to prevent hasty and ill-considered legislation, and to prevent the signing of a bill by the members, or its pretended passage when it is not actually passed, by having a bona fide call of the yeas and nays on the Journal, where it can be found. Most of us never thought of the reason suggested by the gentleman from Huntingdon, (Mr. J. M. Bailey.)

Mr. CORSON. Mr. Chairman : I move that the committee now rise.

Not agreed to.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. J. M. Bailey, it was not agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman : I move to amend, by adding after the words "printed," in the second line, the word "of substance." It may not be convenient always to print every little mere verbal amendment.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman : I hope that will not prevail. Such a provision as that might give opportunity or excuse for sneaking some bill through that would not otherwise be passed.

Mr. BUCKALEW : Let us not leave our work so that it will be a source of unnecessary trouble to the Legislature. Corrections of grammar or of style may be necessary, and it would be altogether unnecessary to print them.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. Buckalew, it was rejected.

The question recurring on the section, it was agreed to.

SECTION 9. No amendment to bills by one House, returned to the other for concurrence, shall be concurred in except by the vote of a majority of the members elected to the House to which the amendments are so returned, taken by yeas and nays, and the names of those voting for and against, recorded upon the Journal thereof, and reports of committees of conference, shall be adopted in either House only by a vote of a majority of the members elected to each House, taken by yeas and nays, and the names of those voting for and against recorded upon the Journals.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman : I offer the following substitute: "Neither House shall concur with amendments proposed by the other, or adopt the report of a committee of conference, except by a vote of a majority of the members elected to such House, taken by yeas and nays, and recorded in the Journals thereof."

Mr. MACVEAGH. I think the original section is better.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I withdraw my substitute.

Mr. J. R. READ. Mr. Chairman: I renew it.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I would say that my proposition is entirely the same as the section, but in different language. The section as printed is longer, and possibly more explicit. The substitute is short.

Mr. J. R. READ. Mr. Chairman: I concur entirely with the chairman of the Committee on Legislation, (Mr. Harry White,) but I differ with the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh.) I think the substitute is better than the report of the Committee.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee do now rise.

It was agreed to.

So the committee rose.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President: The committee of the whole has had under consideration the report of the Committee on Legislation, and has directed me to report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Leave was granted.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I move that we do now adjourn.

It was agreed to.

The Convention then, at two o'clock and fifty-eight minutes, adjourned.

SIXTY-FIFTH DAY.

THURSDAY, March 13, 1873.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M., the President, Hon. Wm. M. Meredith, in the chair.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. James W. Curry.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. DUNNING presented a petition from nine hundred citizens of Pittston, Luzerne county, praying for the insertion of a clause in the Constitution prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. HORTON presented a petition from citizens of Rome, Bradford county, praying for the insertion of a similar provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

RAILROAD FENCING.

Mr. DE FRANCE presented a petition from citizens of Lycoming county, praying for the insertion in the Constitution of a clause requiring every railroad in the State to be substantially fenced, which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

FEMALE SUFFRAGE.

Mr. CARTER presented a petition from citizens of Lancaster county, praying that the Constitution be so amended as to secure to women the exercise of the right of suffrage, which was referred to the Committee on Suffrage and Election.

THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. LILLY offered the following proposition of amendment, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"That the Supreme Court shall consist of — judges, learned in the law, who shall be appointed by the Governor, by and with the consent of the Senate; they shall continue in office during good behavior: Provided, The said judges shall be retired at the age of seventy-five years, or for mental or physical disability, upon full pay.

"That the State shall be divided into districts, as from time to time shall be necessary, and that a sufficient number of judges, learned in the law, shall be appointed from time to time, as they may be required, to perform the requisite duties; when such appointments are required the Supreme Court shall name to the Governor at least five names of gentlemen learned in the law for each appointment to be made, from which number the Governor shall appoint.

"That all judges, learned in the law, shall hold office during life or good behavior: Provided, That all judges shall be retired at the age of seventy-five years, or for disability, upon full pay; no judge of any court of this Commonwealth shall be eligible to any office, either appointed or elective, except in the judiciary, while in commission, nor until after at least two years have elapsed after retiring from the office of judge."

VAGRANTS.

Mr. BROOMALL offered the following proposition of amendment, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"That the Legislature shall enact proper laws for the arrest of all vagrants, and the employment of the adults, the compulsory education of the young, and the care and protection of the aged and infirm among them."

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GUTHRIE asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Curry for a few days.

Mr. ALRICKS asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. M'Allister on account of sickness.

Mr. JOHN M. BAILEY asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Hall for a few days.

PRINTING ARTICLES.

Mr. LAMBERTON offered the following resolution, which was twice read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the expediency of having printed on the Journal, or in bill form, the several articles of the Constitution, with amendments in the committee of the whole, and reported to the Convention.

Mr. EWING. I think, if the gentleman will look at his file, he will find that these articles are already printed.

Mr. LAMBERTON. I withdraw the resolution.

SHERIFF SALES.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman: I hold in my hand a resolution in relation to the publication of legal notices, sheriff sales, &c., which was referred to the Committee on Counties and Boroughs. I move now, that that committee be discharged from the consideration of the resolution, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

THE ARTICLE UPON EDUCATION.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the second reading and consideration of the article reported by the Committee upon Education. Is it the pleasure of the committee to proceed to the consideration of the article?

["No." "No." "No."]

THE ARTICLE UPON CITY CHARTERS.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the further consideration of the article reported by the Committee on Cities and City Charters. Is it the pleasure of the Convention to proceed to the consideration of the article?

["No." "No." "No."]

THE ARTICLE UPON LEGISLATION.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the further consideration of the article reported by the Committee on Legislature. Is it the pleasure of the Convention to proceed to the further consideration of the article?

["Aye." "Aye." "Aye."]

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, and proceeded to the consideration of the article on Legislation, Mr. Armstrong in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. J. R. Read,) to strike out the ninth section, and insert the following:

"Neither House shall concur in an amendment proposed by the other, nor adopt the report of a committee of conference, except it be by a vote of a majority of the members elected to such House, taken by yeas and nays, and recorded on the Journal thereof.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman; I desire to state that the mover of the amendment is not here this morning. The gentleman did not so tell me, but I understood after the adjournment yesterday, that he intended to withdraw that amendment, and perhaps bring it up on second reading. This was done after some consultation with the Committee on Legislation, and I would suggest that for the present it be voted down. It will probably be offered on second reading, according to an understanding made with the Committee on Legislation.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the section, which will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 9. No amendment to bills by one House, returned to the other for concurrence, shall be concurred in except by the vote of a majority of the members elected to the House to which the amendments are so returned, taken by yeas and nays, and the names of those voting for and against recorded upon the Journal thereof; and reports of committees of conference shall be adopted in either House, only by the vote of a majority of the members elected to each House, taken by yeas and nays, and the names of those voting for and against recorded upon the Journal.

The section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 10. No law shall be revived, amended, or the provisions thereof extended or conferred by reference to its title only, but so much thereof as is revived, amended, extended or conferred shall be re-enacted and published at length.

The section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

Mr. ROSS. Mr. Chairman: I beg to offer the following, to come in at this time as a new section:

SECTION —. The Legislature shall enact no law, the operation, force and effect of which shall be limited or conditioned upon its approval by a majority of the citizens, at a general or special election, or which shall be dependent for its enforcement upon the majority vote of the electors of the State, or any of them.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that all the presumptions and prima facies are in favor of a report coming from any one of the standing committees. The standing committees are composed of gentlemen who have been selected by the President, and who have given the subject matter before them their due consideration, who have made a specialty of it, and it is presumed, therefore, that their report, under the circumstances, will be better and more reliable than the views of the members who perhaps have not devoted so much time and attention to the subject matter.

But, sir, I have carefully examined the report of this Committee on Legislation, and I do not find that in any of its provisions there is a clause similar to that which is contained in the amendment which I have had the honor to offer. Believing, as I do, that the fundamental law should contain a provision of this character, I have thought it right to offer this amendment to obtain the sentiment of this body in regard to it. The object of this section is simply to impose upon the Legislature, upon the law-making power, a duty which the Constitution necessarily does impose upon them, and a duty which the report of the Committee on Legislation has already imposed upon them. Now, sir, the people are the supreme source of power in this state. The people have delegated the law-making power to the Legislature. They have prescribed three great departments, the Legislative, the Executive and the Judicial, and the powers and duties of each one of these departments are clearly defined; and no one department can trench upon the powers of the other. To the Legislature has been delegated the law making power, and this amendment proposes to compel the Legislature to exercise that power, which the people have delegated to them, and to prevent them from escaping from the exercise of it.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that when a bill is enacted by the Legislature, when the force and effect of that bill depend upon the vote of the people of any portion of the State, it is no law; it is not an exercise of the law making power, which has been vested in the Legislature; and further, sir, when a bill has been enacted whose enforcement depends upon the vote of the citizens of the State, then I submit that the Legislature have not fulfilled their duties, and have not carried out the objects and purposes for which they were elected, and are failing to enact laws. Why, sir, it is cowardly upon the part of the Legislature to enact a bill which shall depend for its vitality upon the votes of the people of the State; and it is right and proper that the fundamental law shall impose upon the Legislature the purposes and the duties which they have sworn to assume, and that they should not be permitted to fly from those duties and to throw upon the people of this State the responsibility which they themselves should properly assume. It is a delegation of a delegated power. The people delegate to the Legislature the law making power, and the Legislature have no right to re-delegate that power into the hands of the people to determine whether a law shall become a law or not.

If an act is passed which depends upon the vote of the people, I should like to know when it becomes a law? Not certainly when it leaves the Legislature; not when it passes away from the legislative control; not when it has received the approval of the Governor. It is a dead letter until the people breathe vitality into its inanimate body by the expression of their opinion at the polls. As well might the sculptor point to a block of marble, and say to a person: "There is a statue, you take it and carve out the figure I say it contains," as for the Legislature to enact a law which is dependent upon the vote of the people for its life and for its very existence.

I submit to the committee of the whole, that this is a proper provision to be inserted in our fundamental law; that it does simply nothing more than to compel the law making power to exercise their duties, and to enact and pass laws which shall be complete and perfect laws when they leave the legislative body, and which shall not depend upon the voice of the people in any respect whatever. Why, sir, we are liable to have dangerous and mischievous laws enacted by a process of this character. Public clamor, the voice of fanaticism, the voice of the enthusiast, may call into being a law which the Legislature, if they had acted within their own province, would have failed to have passed. I submit, for these reasons, that this section should be incorporated in the report of this Committee on Legislation.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: This proposition now before the committee, is very far reaching, and is designed to reach a class of legislation that is now under consideration in the Supreme Court, having been argued upon at a very recent date. It will prevent the passage of local option laws, giving to the voters of any one locality the right to say whether liquor shall be sold by license or not within their boundaries. It will go further. It will prevent the creation of new counties, dependent upon the vote of either the old county or the portions proposed to be united together to make the new one. It will prevent the change of county seats by a vote of the people, and a variety of questions that naturally and properly belong to the people in a particular locality, who understand their wants far better than the Legislature can do. If this amendment is adopted by the Convention it will prevent all that kind of legislation, and prevent the wants of the people from being satisfied according to their own desires.

I ask the committee of the whole to consider this question in the light of matters now pending, and whether they will engraft it upon the Constitution. The Supreme Court have said that a law that is entirely dependent upon the will of the people is not a law. That is sufficient. It is unnecessary to put any such clause in the Constitution. But if they should pass a law and permit it to be submitted to a vote of the people upon any moral question, or one entirely affecting the people of a particular locality, no such denial ought to be engrafted on the Constitution. I do not think the committee of the whole understood this proposed section when it was read, and that is the reason why I make this explanation, and call their attention to it thus briefly.

Mr. DODD. Mr. Chairman: I had intended, at the proper time, to offer an amendment to the Constitution, exactly the reverse of the one offered by the gentleman from Bucks, (Mr. Ross,) and I intend, if this amendment is voted down, to offer an amendment to the effect that the Legislature shall have power to refer the execution of any law to a vote of all the electors of the State, or to the electors of any portion of the State to be affected thereby. By adopting an amendment of that kind we will not be violating any well known rule of constitutional law. It is true, as has been ably argued here, that the legislative power is a delegated power. It is a well known maxim of law, that a delegated power cannot be re-delegated. But who is principal and who agent in this matter? The power delegated to the Legislature is delegated by the people of the State. Now, while an agent cannot choose another to act for him, and can not place the responsibility of the trust which the people have placed upon his shoulders in any other hands, why cannot the agent refer back to his principal the decision of important questions which affect that principal alone. The Legislature never has, and never proposes to place back in the hands of the people the responsibility of drawing, framing and passing any law. That would be impolitic and unwise. But the Legislature, after it has framed a law, may refer it to the qualified electors of the State, to decide whether that law should take effect or not. I claim that this is wise and just. I claim that it is not only practicable in cases of the erection of new counties; in the removal of county seats; in the creation of election districts, and the hundred other cases in which it has been done in this State; but it is wise in the case of a general law, such as the local option law that is now pending before the Supreme Court. It is clear to my mind that the Supreme Court, in deciding, as it has done in Pennsylvania, that such a law is unconstitutional, because it is an attempt on the part of the Legislature to delegate its powers, is incorrect, but such decision renders it necessary for us to put in this Constitution a provision which will bring us back to correct principles on this subject.

I wish to read an extract from an opinion delivered by Ruggles, chief judge in the case of Barto vs. Himrod, in eighth New York Reports, page 489, which puts this matter on a true basis. He says:

"It is worthy of consideration, however, whether there is anything in the reference of a statute to the people for acceptance or rejection which is inconsistent with the representative system of government. To refer it to the people to frame and agree upon a statute for themselves would be equally impracticable and inconsistent with the representative system. But to take the opinion of the people upon a bill already framed by representatives and submitted to them, is not only practicable, but is in precise accordance with the mode in which the Constitution of the State is adopted, and with the action which is taken in many other cases. The representative in these cases, has fulfilled, precisely, those functions which the people, as a democracy, could not fulfill; and where the case has reached a stage when the body of the people can act without confusion, the representative has stepped aside to allow their opinion to be expressed. The Legislature is not attempting, in such a case, to delegate its authority to a new agency, but the trustee, vested with a large discretionary authority, is taking the opinion of the principal upon the necessity, policy or propriety of an act which is to govern the principal himself."

Why, sir, if the amendment of the gentleman, as offered, be adopted, we never could call a Convention again as this Convention has been called. The Legislature could not even refer to the people of the State the question whether they should have a Convention to revise their Constitution. All will admit the propriety of such action in such cases. All will admit the propriety of such action in the case of local option laws, and laws of that character, and I am not only opposed to the resolution which the gentleman from Philadelphia has offered here, but I am strongly in favor of a resolution which shall place this controverted question beyond controversy, and give to the Legislature this power which ought to be exercised by them in many cases.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I merely wish to state in regard to the action of this committee on this precise subject, that at one time, just the day I believe that our report was made up, the Committee on Legislation agreed to report a section providing for the local option law, making it constitutional, and carrying out the suggestions of the gentleman from Venango (Mr. Dodd.) It was afterwards deemed better under the circumstances, the matter being before the Supreme Court, and for other reasons, that that question should be laid over for a time, with two or three other matters that the committee expect to have before them hereafter. I may say that a majority of the Committee on Legislation were in favor of and did adopt that section, and they expect to have it up and to consider it at some future day.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the section proposed by the gentleman from Bucks (Mr. Ross.)

The section was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

Mr. DODD. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following as a new section, to come in at this place:

"The Legislature shall have power to refer the adoption or rejection of any law to a vote of the qualified electors of the State, or of that portion of the State to be affected thereby."

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: My idea is that making this legislative regulation is doing an unnecessary thing. Besides it would invite the Legislature to submit everything of difficulty and dispute to the people of the State, or of divisions of the State, and escape their just and proper responsibility. The submission of questions for popular vote connected with the enactment of law is a power that should be very sparingly exercised, and the placing of such a provision in the Constitution would be to invite its exercise. Therefore, sir, it would be an unwise practice and we should avoid it. For my part I have a general opinion of the power of the Legislature to submit questions for popular decision, and I aver that the courts have not determined that they cannot do that. They have only determined that where the enactment of a law is to be directly determined by the popular vote, that it is inconsistent with the grant of legislative power to the General Assembly. But they have never decided that the Legislature cannot submit any question whatever to the popular vote in order to ascertain the views of the people thereon. When, in a certain way and under certain conditions the Legislature has enacted a law, but made its operation dependent upon popular assent, the law has been held valid.

I hope that in this, and other cases arising upon this article, we may avoid doing anything that does not seem indispensably necessary to reform.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

Mr. BANNAN. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following, to come in as a new section:

"No act of the General Assembly shall take effect until the fourth day of July next after its passage, unless in case of emergency (which emergency shall be expressed in the preamble or body of the act) the General Assembly shall, by a vote of two-thirds of all the members elected to each House, otherwise direct."

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I move to postpone the consideration of that section or the present.

The CHAIRMAN. That cannot be done in committee of the whole. The committee must vote upon the section.

Mr. BANNAN. Mr. Chairman : I have offered this section, finding that no section of that character had been reported by the Committee on Legislation. In examining the Constitution of Illinois, of 1860, I found that the time fixed for a law to take effect after its passage was three months. They tried that and were dissatisfied with it, and in 1870 they inserted this provision exactly as I have offered it here, with the exception that they specified the first day of July, and I have named the fourth day, because I thought that more proper. The people, if this section be adopted, will become acquainted with the passage of laws, and the time when they will go into effect. It would be known not only to lawyers, but to the people in general. I have had several instances within my own experience where distributions were being made upon decedents' estates when, while the matter was before the auditor, an act was passed in relation to the orphans' court sales, altering the whole law, and before the auditor's report was made the act was again repealed. I recollect several instances of this kind where, before the distribution could be made, the law was changed some two or three times. This, I think, is a difficulty which could be avoided by this section, and I have offered it for that purpose. We should have a general day upon which all our laws should take effect. It is a clause that has been introduced into all the new constitutions recently framed, and I think it is a very serviceable one.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman : In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Legislation, I submit that we should proceed only to consider the article as reported by that committee. I do not make this suggestion with any desire to prevent the proper discussion of these new sections. There will be ample time after we have gone through with the article, as reported, to put in all the new paragraphs that gentlemen can desire. This one now under consideration, and indeed all of these special subjects, seem to be more appropriate at the end of the article than in the place where they are now sought to be put in. Therefore I ask the gentleman who proposed this pending section to withdraw it, and I appeal to gentlemen to permit the committee of the whole to act upon the article as reported from the Committee on Legislation before offering new paragraphs.

Mr. BANNAN. Mr. Chairman : For the present, then, I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is withdrawn, and the question is upon the next section, which will be read.

The CLERK read as follows :

SECTION 11. The Legislature shall not pass any local or special law—

Authorizing the creation, extension or impairing of liens.

Regulating the affairs of counties, cities, townships, wards, boroughs or school districts.

Changing the names of persons or places.

Changing the venue in civil or criminal cases.

Authorizing the laying out, opening, altering or maintaining roads, highways, streets or alleys.

Relating to or incorporating ferries or bridges.

Vacating roads, town plats, streets or alleys.

Relating to cemeteries, grave-yards or public grounds.

Authorizing the adoption or legitimizing of children.

Locating or changing county seats, erecting new counties, or changing county lines.

Incorporating cities, towns or villages, or changing their charters.

For the opening and conducting of elections, or fixing or changing the place of voting.

Granting divorces.

Erecting new townships or boroughs, changing township lines or borough limits.

Creating offices, or prescribing the powers and duties of officers in counties, cities, boroughs, townships, election or school districts.

Changing the law of descent or succession.

Regulating the practice or jurisdiction of, or changing the rules of evidence in any judicial proceeding or inquiry before courts, aldermen, justices of the peace, sheriffs, commissioners, arbitrators, auditors, masters in chancery, or other tribunals.

Regulating or extending the powers and duties of aldermen, justices of the peace, magistrates or constables.

Regulating the management of common schools, the building of school houses, and the raising of money for that purpose.

Fixing the rate of interest.

Affecting the estates of minors or persons under disability.

Remitting fines, penalties and forfeitures, or refunding moneys legally paid into the treasury.

Exempting property from taxation.

Creating corporations, or amending, renewing or extending the charters thereof.

Granting to any corporation, association or individual any special or exclusive privilege or immunity.

Granting to any corporation, association or individual the right to lay down a railroad track.

Nor shall any bill be passed granting any powers or privileges in any case where the manner, form or authority to grant such powers and privileges shall have been provided for by general law; and in no case where a general law can be made applicable, nor in any other case where the courts have jurisdiction, or are competent to grant the powers or give the relief asked for.

Mr. MANTON. Mr. Chairman: I desire to express my hearty concurrence in this section, as it comes from the committee.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: I would suggest that we consider this section by the sub-divisions into which it has been divided by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the order of the House? ["Yes, yes!"] The first paragraph is:

SECTION 11. The Legislature shall not pass any local or special law, authorizing the creation, extension or impairing of liens.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: The gentleman from Crawford (Mr. Mantor) has undertaken to explain this section. I would therefore ask him what that paragraph means—what evil it proposes to remedy?

Mr. MANTOR. Mr. Chairman: I simply desire to give my views in relation to the section itself—in relation to its subject matter, namely, special legislation. These views shall be brief. I will not trouble the House long.

Mr. Chairman, this section contains so many propositions with relation to restricting special legislation that I feel it my duty to give it my entire sanction. The first paragraph of the section is as follows: Section 11. The Legislature shall not pass any local or special law, authorizing the creation, extension or impairing of liens. The residue of the section, in substance, is as follows, and every sentence should meet with the hearty concurrence of every delegate on this floor. It reads: Regulating the affairs of counties, cities, townships, wards, boroughs or school districts; changing the names of persons or places; changing the venire in civil or criminal cases; authorizing the laying out, opening, altering or maintaining roads, highways, streets or alleys; relating to or incorporating ferries or bridges, except for the erection of bridges crossing streams, which form boundaries between this and any other State; vacating roads, town plats, streets or alleys; relating to cemeteries, graveyards or public grounds; authorizing the adoption or legitimatizing of children; locating or changing county seats, erecting new counties or changing county lines; incorporating cities, towns or villages, or changing their charters; for the opening and conducting of elections, or fixing or changing the place of voting; granting divorces, erecting new townships or boroughs; changing township lines or borough limits; creating offices or prescribing the powers and duties of officers in counties, cities, boroughs, townships, election or school districts; changing the law of descent or succession.

Now, sir, nothing will strike the people of this State with as much force as this question of barring special legislation, that the people feel more interest in this one subject than any other which this Convention will be called upon to decide. I would therefore say that equal privileges for all, exclusive privileges for none, should be the sentiment of every citizen of this Commonwealth. If we depart from this principle we are at sea without a chart or compass. A general law, granting privileges to incorporate companies, is made for the benefit of the people of the State; the privileges granted thereby may be enjoyed by all the people of every locality in the State. There can be no special monopoly created by pursuing this course. No company can be organized under general laws which can occupy any particular locality or carry on any particular kind of business to the exclusion of all other companies for the same purpose. I am in favor of adopting a principle into our Constitution which will permit all people to combine with the same privileges. I would not give to the Legislature, through this Constitution, power to grant privileges to which all persons are not equally entitled under general law. I would place a restriction on the legislation in this Commonwealth, and say to it, thus far and no farther, so that if one man points his finger at you, and says, "I have a right and privilege under such a law," you can answer him, "so have I." There would seem to be a kind of general fairness in such a principle as this. But when you permit, through a Constitution, a legislative body to assemble, and allow them—with hardly a restraint—to pass any act they may choose, to incorporate any company, to establish any special charter, you at once tolerate arrogant legislation, and the people will sooner or later see and feel such oppression, and for a thorough contention for their rights may seek a different form of political revolution. I would, therefore, restrict special legislation by placing around it a proper safeguard, like that which this section suggests, and also that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation throughout the State; nor shall any act, except such as relates to public schools, be passed to take effect upon the approval of any other authority than the General Assembly except as otherwise provided in this Constitution.

This last suggestion is one of the provisions incorporated into the Constitution of the State of Ohio, (and some other States,) which have felt the weight of local legislation, but has sought to remedy it by careful safeguards in their Constitutions. Our State legislators, in their anxiety to be heard, have at times overleaped all bounds of propriety and equal fairness, with, perhaps, in some few instances, an honest desire to favor local wants. We can readily understand from whence this evil had its origin. Men rarely refuse power, when they are thoroughly backed by privileges, and if we fail to insert in this Constitution, where the power may rest, and trust to legislation to give it its proper interpretation, we may well dread the results of legislative enactments. At the time our Constitution was revised, some thirty-eight years ago, those men who took part in the work had but a very limited idea as to the future of this State, and I wonder not at the latitude given and entrusted to the Legislature, the confidence that those men had, that privileges granted would not be abused, and the abuses that have grown out of such latitude given is but that warning voice that came up to us this day and says to us to make haste and profit by the experience of the past. We have the Constitution of a State before us which seems to checkmate many of the abuses growing out of local legislation. I refer to the Constitution of the State of Illinois. In her revised Constitution of 1870 we find under article four, and section twenty-two, entitled special legislation, prohibited some twenty or more specific subjects that cannot be bartered and traded away at the mere beck or nod of some unscrupulous lobbyist, who lounges about the State Capital, whose business it is to manipulate the foul work of their masters. If we adopt this section as reported in this Constitution, we shall receive the thanks of the many whose eyes are now upon us. We may rest assured, unless we meet the expectation of the people of this Commonwealth in some way of this kind, that the work we are doing here will be repudiated by them, and with the advantages they have, they will not be slow in making up their minds, and will be prepared to give their solemn verdict against our work.

We have grown rich, it is true, under our legislation, as bad as it has been in many things; we have been, so far as special legislation is concerned, acting like so many independent provinces—seeming to care only for special privileges, and thereby gratified special wants—yet the evil has been, and is growing on us day by day, and we stop right here to view the situation, and are preparing the way to check the evil. Why, sir, when we take into account what we ought to have done by way of encouraging reciprocal business relations between different sections of the State, we can conjecture, and without much forethought either, that the interests of the people have been divided by granting to each and every part of the State any legislation it demanded. We aver that it has been this evil of special legislation that has kept back, and is keeping back, that which is always a necessary requisite to a healthy growth and a prosperous future.

We have not been studying the interests of all the people, but through these special grantings we have been widening the breach that has divided us. Philadelphia, the first city in the State, and second to but one in the Union, is beginning to wake up to a broader idea of commercial wealth. So far as this State is concerned, it has been but a few years that she began to realize that, west of the Alleghenies, in this State, were some possessions enclosed in the Commonwealth, of which she but formed a part, and where there was large business interests in which she should long since have been a partner.

But, as a Pennsylvanian, I take great pride in speaking of Philadelphia as our city, and can but hope that every law passed, after adopting this Constitution, shall be so broad, so completely affecting all interests on every subject of like character over the State, that it will cement our commercial relations, and that in the future we shall act with a oneness of purpose for the good of all.

In looking over the acts which the Legislature has passed for the past few years, say commencing with 1866 and ending with 1872, we find the following results:

In 1866, general laws passed were 50; special laws were 1,093.

In 1867, general laws passed were 86; special laws were 1,392.

In 1868, general laws passed were 73; special laws were 1,150.

In 1869, general laws passed were 77; special laws were 1,276.

In 1870, general laws passed were 54; special laws were 1,276.

In 1871, general laws passed were 81; special laws were 1,353.

In 1872, general laws passed were 54; special laws were 1,232.

So you see that in seven years there were passed 475 general laws, and 8,755 private acts. The number of acts which the present Legislature of 1873 have passed are many, and, I am told, will duplicate the number of the acts of any one former year. This is undoubtedly correct, and is but another proof of the necessity for this Convention of adopting this section with all its paragraphs complete.

From 1866 to 1871 the legislators passed for railroads, and granted them corporate privileges, some four hundred and fifty special acts bearing on railroads alone. These were, perhaps, not all the laws that were passed in which railroads were not directly or indirectly interested.

But, Mr. Chairman, what a fearful comment is this on the abuses of special legislation. By a restrictive section in this Constitution, the best and largest interests of a free and industrious people like ours, in this State, would be protected. Without it we have not much faith in the ultimate results, for as we are carried forward by the political maelstrom, we shall find that our political rights will be swallowed up by granting special privileges to soulless corporations. Now, sir, what sort of justice, I ask, can there be that will allow the law-making power in this State to change, at each and every session of the Legislature, some act, because a few favored citizens desire it; this ought not to be tolerated for one moment. Necessary legislation is greatly retarded, the expenses to the Commonwealth are greatly enlarged, the assumption of such rights degrades the dignity of any legislative body, and with all impairs the efficiency of legislation for good to the whole people. Now, should we so frame this Constitution that any law made under it should require a change, why change it so that all may be benefited by the change. If you restrict any by law, restrict all under like circumstances.

It is not democratic to give one man special privileges which are denied to all others, whether it is for the purpose of corporations or for any purpose whatsoever. I deny that privileges granted by the legislative body of this State, giving such large scope for corporations, and with hardly a seeming restraint, is just and equitable. The people all over the State are asking that we shall circumscribe the acts of our legislation by incorporating in this Constitution a section like this, that will make all laws general. I am one of those who believe that nearly all objects for legislation can be equally accomplished under general law. The agriculture and mining wealth of our State is large. Generations are to live after us, who will become more and more interested in those grand developments; and let it not be said of us that we chained their energies. It will not be denied that there is a fevered anxiety about the abuses growing out of special privileges. We should meet this matter at the threshold and grapple it with the strong arm of the Constitution, only looking to the best interests of the present and the necessities of the future.

MR. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the paragraph, by striking out the words "or impairing," and inserting the word "or," after the word "creation," so that the section will read, "authorizing the creation or extension of liens."

I do not know what the committee had in view in placing a provision in the Constitution that the Legislature should not impair liens by special laws. I take it that the Legislature cannot impair liens by any law, either general or special. I have therefore moved to amend the paragraph, so that it shall read that the Legislature shall not pass a law authorizing the creation or extension of liens.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I cannot say that I am very particular about the word "impairing" in the paragraph. I am not aware that there is any great evil that it is intended to reach; but with reference to the creation of liens I think this paragraph is intended to strike at all local laws creating liens in particular localities. I may take, as an illustration, several instances which have occurred in some of the counties of this State. In the western part of Pennsylvania there is a special law for Venango county; there is another law for Butler county, while there is a different law for Clarion county, which is supplemental to the original act, and they are, each and all, the most complicated pieces of machinery in legislation that can be originated. I think this paragraph is intended to strike at all special laws creating liens for particular localities. It does not, of course, increase the power of the Legislature, by general law, to create liens.

The question being taken, a division was called for, which resulted as follows: Ayes, thirty-nine; noes, forty-two.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the paragraph, it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"Regulating the affairs of counties, cities, townships, wards, boroughs or school districts."

The question being taken, the paragraph was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"Changing the names of persons or places."

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I would like to know what reason influenced the committee in denying the right of a place to change its name?

The question being taken, the paragraph was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"Changing the venue in civil or criminal cases."

The question being taken, the paragraph was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"Authorizing the laying out, opening, altering or maintaining roads, highways, streets or alleys."

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I desire to ask the chairman of that committee whether the paragraph has any application to turnpikes.

Mr. EWING. I suppose a turnpike is a road or highway.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: I doubt very much the propriety of that portion of the paragraph prohibiting the Legislature from passing any special law laying out a road. So far as the residue of the paragraph is concerned, perhaps it may be proper enough. Now far so as the roads in the counties are concerned, there is no necessity for any legislation upon the subject. That is a matter that belongs, and has for years belonged, to the court of quarter sessions of each county, but where a road is wanted from one county to pass through two or three counties, how are you to attain the object without the assistance of the Legislature? We might want a road in the county of Indiana, passing through the county of Westmoreland, through the county of Fayette, to the Virginia State line. Some of these roads have already been established, and acts of Assembly have been passed for that purpose in years gone by. Now how can the courts of Indiana county, the courts of Westmoreland county, and the courts of Fayette county provide for a matter of that kind? How can the Legislature, by a general law, provide a remedy for this difficulty? Why, the Legislature appoints A., B. and C. by a special act of Assembly to lay out a State road through these three or four counties. I think it would be utterly impracticable. I therefore move to strike out the words "laying out" and "opening."

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I hope the amendment of my friend from Fayette (Mr. Kaine) will not prevail. I apprehend there is, and will be, no difficulty in providing such general laws as will meet the cases that are mentioned. If several counties desire roads through their territories, it will be very easy to frame a general law so as to reach the particular case by the joint action of the several courts, or otherwise. They may be empowered to act jointly or severally, and accomplish the object. If the people desire it, of course their petitions will be heard and will prevail. If the people do not desire it, the application will be rejected.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this clause is designed to meet the very cases mentioned by the gentleman from Fayette, (Mr. Kaine,) and let me say that in portions of western Pennsylvania I have known of some twelve or fifteen bills having been passed for the laying out of as many State roads. Commissioners have been appointed and have performed their duty, and not in one single instance have those roads ever been opened, and it is a crying evil, producing expense to the several counties, and no benefit to the citizens. Parties get up these petitions in particular localities, present them to the Legislature and have a special act passed for laying out a road for many miles through different counties. The road is laid out, but it is never opened. I do not think, within my knowledge, and I think I know of many of these cases, and of many roads located under special acts, of a single one that has been opened through and through. In some instances they are opened for a short distance, and then allowed to remain. Not only that, but frequently we have contests over these matters. Parties procure an act to be passed; other parties go to the Legislature and get the act repealed; the first parties go back and get it re-enacted. Sometimes acts are passed throwing the matter in the courts, and after the courts have decided it, they go back to the Legislature and get the whole thing set aside. It is a crying evil, and this amendment is intended to meet the very cases alluded to by my friend from Fayette (Mr. Kaine.) The committee believed that general laws can be passed, and through the action of the courts any relief that is necessary to the people in the shape of roads can be obtained, and that was the proper mode, and they the proper tribunals through which to seek to obtain it.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman: I hope the gentleman from Fayette (Mr. Kaine) will not press his amendment. If this is an evil complained of in the interior, I can safely say it is also a mischief and has been productive of serious result in our great cities. I will only instance one case. A square and a half from this spot is a street called Prune street, which runs only to Fourth street. A few interested individuals on the line of that street were anxious that it should be opened eastward to the Delaware river. Instead of applying to the councils of the city to have the street opened, knowing their petition in that direction would not be granted, because it would involve the city in an expense of half a million of dollars, the individuals interested applied to the Legislature for an act to open Prune street eastward to the Delaware river, and commanding the chief commissioner of highways, within sixty days after the passage of the act, to open, grade and pave the street. Any gentleman familiar with that locality will remember that the street, if opened, would pass through blocks of dwelling houses, stores and ware-houses, requiring their demolition and ruin to a very large extent, the expense of which would mainly be upon the tax-payers. Fortunately the bill was defeated. To prevent such attempts at special legislation is the object of this section and this clause, and to require that parties who desire to have streets and avenues opened in particular localities shall apply to the proper authorities under a general act of Assembly. Now, why cannot a general law be passed giving the local authorities full jurisdiction in regard to laying out and opening streets, roads and highways. I insist that this is a valuable provision which has been carefully considered by the Committee on Legislation, and is intended to meet the very evils complained of by the gentleman from Clarion, (Mr. Corbett,) and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman: I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Fayette (Mr. Kaine) will not prevail. I remember a case that occurred in my county a few years ago, when, during the last days of the session of the Legislature, an act was passed providing for the laying out of a State road, one mile long, from Williamsport to a certain cemetery in Lycoming county, and providing that three commissioners should be appointed to lay out the road, and if the township did not open it and pay the expense, the cemetery company should open the road. The township refused to make the road. The cemetery company opened it, and brought an action against the township to recover the cost. The township was defeated in the common pleas, and carried the case to the Supreme Court, putting their defence upon the ground that the act was unconstitutional. The Supreme Court decided that the act was constitutional, and the township had to pay the sum of eight hundred dollars for opening the road. Such being the law of Pennsylvania nia, it seems to me that it is our duty to correct it in the fundamental law.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: I will withdraw the amendment. I have been so much impressed by the remarks made by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Hanna) that I am willing to forego any little inconvenience we might suffer in the country for the benefit of the city of Philadelphia. I am willing to yield, and I do it with the greatest pleasure.

The paragraph was then agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read: "Relating to or incorporating ferries or bridges."

Mr. WHERRY. I simply desire to ask a member of the committee what necessity there is for this clause ten in consideration of clause thirty-eight. Does not thirty-eight, being the whole, include ten, which is only a part?

Mr. LEAR. I desire to offer an amendment, to add, at the end of the paragraph the words, "except for the erection of bridges crossing streams which form boundaries between this and any other State."

The object I have in offering that amendment is to leave open the power to pass acts for the purpose of erecting bridges across streams which form boundaries between Pennsylvania and any adjoining State. Now, sir, it is a fact, that if we pass this provision as it stands it will prohibit us from having any other bridge erected across the Delaware river between the States of Pennsylvania and New Jersey. There is a compact between this State and New Jersey, by which it was agreed, many years ago, that the Delaware should always be a highway, and should not be obstructed by bridges or otherwise, except by an act concurred in by the Legislatures of the two States. It must be special legislation, or the power cannot be given. And when we are providing for some special evils which we have, it is well enough to be careful that we do not run to the other extreme. We ought not to tie our hands so that the river Delaware should not be bridged in any place for the convenience of commerce and travel, whether for a wagon road or railroad, whenever the convenience or necessities of the people require a bridge to cross it. I have no objection to this paragraph, so far as it relates to the incorporation of bridges and ferries, that there should be no special law relating to the incorporation of these companies, and I desire to add the amendment which I propose: "Except for bridges to be erected crossing any stream which forms the boundary between this and any other State," in order that we may meet this difficulty, growing out of a compact between the people of Pennsylvania and the people of New Jersey. There may also be other States with which such compacts have been made. The Delaware river, where it divides Pennsylvania from New Jersey, is directly in the line between the east and the west, and with railroads that may be created by general or special laws—national roads or any other—bridges may be required over this navigable stream, which could not, according to this compact entered into between these two States, be erected except by the concurrent action of the Legislatures of Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Therefore I ask that this amendment may be added, or else that the first words, "relating to," be stricken out.

Mr. JOHN R. READ. Mr. Chairman: I have spoken to a few of the members of the committee, and those with whom I have spoken agree that this amendment is proper.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I do not think the gentleman is right in speaking for the committee.

Mr. JOHN R. READ. I have surely the right to say what those gentlemen told me.

Mr. ANDREW REED. Mr. Chairman: I trust the Convention will adopt this paragraph. The gentleman from Cumberland desires to know whether this should be adopted in connection with paragraph thirty-eight. We have an instance in the county which I have the honor to represent which will show the propriety of the present paragraph. Section thirty-eight refers to "creating a corporation, or amending, renewing or extending their charters," while this section reads, "relating to or incorporating ferries or bridges."

There was an act passed for Mifflin county some three years ago by the Legislature, requiring the commissioners of Mifflin county to build a bridge in a certain place in that county; and another section requiring them to buy an incorporated bridge. Now, that act was opposed by nine-tenths of the tax-paying and voting people in that county; yet it was passed through the Legislature by the influence of two or three interested parties. A bridge had been endeavored to be procured through a general law which exists on the statute books, and the constituted authorities of our county, the grand jury and courts, declared that it was unnecessary, that the public did not require it to be done; and yet, in spite of that, the county commissioners have been compelled by the mandate of the Supreme Court of this State to go on building that bridge, although it would have been better for the county to have bought out, at a fair valuation, the land and everything else intended to be affected thereby.

This section will prevent the happening of such a case, because, under it there can be no special law passed in relation to bridges. There is no necessity for incorporating a bridge company to get a bridge built. There was no incorporation of a company in the act that I have just mentioned; it only required the county commissioners to build it. That is the difference between these two paragraphs. The repeal of the act mentioned is now, and has been, pending in the Legislature, and it is with the greatest difficulty it can be effected. I do not think that there is any other provision that would be more beneficial to the interests of the State than this.

Mr. BEEBE. Mr. Chairman: I hope this paragraph and this section will be adopted. Among those things which it is expected are to assist in destroying this great Commonwealth is special legislation, and the ipse dixit has gone forth that it shall be hereafter wiped out. That subject is very fully handled in this section. Let us, therefore, put it through at a "two-forty" pace, word for word, and line for line, and if anything is needed to make it complete, let us add it quickly and cheerfully.

I found, upon calling at Harrisburg last week, the full number of private and special bills on the calendar, and was privately and confidentially informed by members of the Legislature that they were almost daily requested by members of this Convention to hasten the passage of the private bills in which they or their constituents were interested—although they did not desire to have that fact stated, and I therefore state it confidentially, that the high moral prestige of this body may be maintained. [Laughter.] I learned sir, that the general feeling among the representatives of the people there is that all special bills must be quickly disposed of, for where a constituency is interested in a special bill they are urging it as usual, and it is hoped by the advocates of these bills there that by a special effort, and by the grace of this Convention, sufficient time will elapse before the adoption of this Constitution, to enable these little "williams" to go safely through and be duly signed, and conveyed back to the people in accordance with their request.

I am free to confess here, sir, that having been the author of a great deal of special legislation in Venango county, and accused of the authorship of all of it, and having had a special bill before the Legislature very recently, I was careful to anticipate the storm that I saw coming by getting our own little "william" put through, and at the same time intimating to my constituents that they could hold me responsible for no more. It counts nothing now that it was a measure of great importance to the borough in which I lived, and was called for by the unanimous vote of all the tax-payers. It was a bill to enable a much-needed Union school house to be built in Pleasantville, and without which, though already partially built, the structure could not have been completed, and there was no general law authorizing the issue of any bonds for more than one-third of the amount required, or the collection of any taxes more therefor. But while that is all true, the great evil to be corrected in this Commonwealth is special legislation, and we must wipe it out. I trust, therefore, that all factious opposition will be withdrawn, and that this will be put through, word for word, and line for line, and that we will not hesitate to do, and do quickly, as much more as may be necessary to cure this crying evil and to save the Commonwealth.

Seriously, Mr. Chairman, I admit that special legislation has grown to be a great evil by its abuse; but that the interests of many sections of this Commonwealth have been greatly benefited by it heretofore I do most assuredly believe, and that it could still be so used I am equally clear, were it not for its abuse. And much inconvenience will be experienced in time to come, until general laws can be well matured to cover the necessary ground, and the people will certainly feel it.

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Chairman: I would like to say to the committee that this matter was once very forcibly brought to my attention in connection with some property of my own. I was called away for about two months, and when I came back I found there a bridge and a ferry, the bridge erected and the ferry established, and families living there and doing a thriving business, all on my land. I asked the person in charge how all that came about, and he coolly replied, "I have got a charter from the Legislature." There was my property tied up, without the slightest notice to me, and without redress."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I cannot see the propriety of a paragraph requiring anything to be done with regard to "incorporating a bridge." I think we had better make that word "bridge company."

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I move to add, "or to incorporate any bridge company in this State," so that it will read, "relating to ferries and bridges," or, "incorporated ferry and bridge companies within this State."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment as amended by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. D. N. White.)

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I think that the amendment itself is rendered unnecessary by the adoption of my amendment, which puts in the words, "within this State."

Mr. STRUTHERS. Mr. Chairman: I think we ought to have the amendment of the gentleman from Bucks (Mr. Lear) incorporated in that paragraph. It may be that New Jersey would be willing, under the compact existing between that State and this, to pass a law with relation to bridges crossing the Delaware river, and that they would say in that law that it shall take effect when similar legislation shall be passed by the State of Pennsylvania. Without this amendment, if you adopt this clause, that legislation by Pennsylvania to correspond with the legislation in New Jersey, could not be had.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman: I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. D. N. White,) which contains the words "within this State," to be intended to meet the objection with regard to this provision interfering with the building of bridges across the Delaware river between the States of New Jersey and Pennsylvania. I understood the idea to be to so limit this paragraph as not to prevent the Legislature from authorizing the building of bridges in common across the Delaware or any other stream which is the common boundary between this and any other State. If it has that effect the amendment of the gentleman from Bucks is entirely proper.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the paragraph, as it will be, as amended by the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. D. N. White.)

The CLERK read: "Relating to or incorporating ferries and bridges, or incorporating ferry and bridge companies, wholly within this State."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Bucks accept this as embracing the intention of his amendment?

Mr. LEAR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then your amendment may be considered withdrawn.

Mr. LEAR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the question recurs on the paragraph as amended.

Mr. WHERRY. I move to amend, by adding after the word "to," in the first line, the words "turnpikes or turnpike companies."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: It seems to me that this paragraph as it now stands will not accomplish the object in view. It speaks of "bridge companies wholly within this State," and I understand the object is to have this apply to a bridge or bridges over the Delaware river. As drawn it seems to me to apply only to bridge companies. A company may be wholly within this State, and yet be authorized to construct a bridge over in New Jersey.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: Did I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Cumberland (Mr. Wherry) was adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been adopted.

Mr. CORBETT. All right. I think, sir, it would be better for us to strike out the words "wholly within this State," and adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Bucks, a few minutes ago. I say this because I think there is great force in what the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) has said.

The CHAIRMAN. The words referred to cannot now be stricken out without a reconsideration.

Mr. CORBETT. Then, sir, I move to reconsider the vote upon that amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment.

Mr. CORBETT. I move to strike out the words "wholly within the State," and insert the words offered as an amendment by the gentleman from Bucks (Mr. Lear.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment to the amendment.

The CLERK read: "Except for bridges crossing streams which form boundaries between this and any other State."

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: Were not the words "for the erection of" in there?

The CHAIRMAN. They were stricken out.

Mr. LEAR. They were in my amendment as offered by me.

The CHAIRMAN. They will be restored.

Mr. LEAR. They formed a portion of my amendment. I do not want to prohibit the restriction of special legislation; that they shall not be incorporated. What I want to provide against is not that we shall have corporations of this kind by a general law, but that the Legislature shall have power when, by this general law, a private corporation is erected to authorize the erection of the bridge; to add that additional power to a corporation created by general law; and that the Legislature shall still have power simply to authorize the erection. That expression was used by me for two reasons.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman: I am in favor of the paragraph which has been reported by the committee if it affords some protection against the legislation that has already occurred in the State in relation to bridges. I know that in one county railroad companies have bridges which span the waters of the Delaware without the first particle of redress on the part of the lumbering interests of the valley of the Delaware in the event that they obstruct the navigation, and in spite of all I have said and done they were passed over my head, as a representative. I do protest that there should not be an exception made in favor of railroad companies as against any and every other company. Let them take their chance, and let them go to the courts, and then we shall feel that we have some protection against the obstruction of the navigable waters of the Delaware.

The question being taken a division was called, which resulted: Ayes, forty-three; nays, thirty-nine.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The paragraph, as amended, was then agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"Vacating roads, town-plats, streets or alleys."

The paragraph was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"Relating to cemeteries, grave yards or public grounds."

The paragraph was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"Authorizing the adoption or legitimating of children."

The question being taken, the paragraph was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"Locating or changing county seats, erecting new counties, or changing county lines."

Mr. DUNNING. Mr. Chairman: I move to strike out the entire paragraph. In making this motion I desire to say that I am in favor of general laws, or rather in favor of restricting future legislation, as far as practicable, to general laws and the action of courts; but, sir, let us not, in our zeal to do away with special legislation and to invest the courts with authority, forget that it is possible that questions may arise where the same fairness could not be obtained under general laws, or from the courts, that you might have a right to expect from legislative enactments. Now I can well believe that the large majority of the people of the Commonwealth are opposed to the division of counties.

Members of this Convention will doubtless recollect that about sixteen years ago the Constitution of our State was so amended as to amount to an absolute prohibition, or nearly so, of any division of counties in this Commonwealth, and since that amendment, notwithstanding efforts have been made in the Legislature to procure the division of a county or two, and, in one instance, presenting a case of great merit, the provisions of that amendment adopted in 1857 were of such a character as to defeat a most worthy object. Now, sir, notwithstanding that provision still remains as a provision in the Constitution, it now contemplated to place it beyond possibility for any county to be divided in this Commonwealth. It provides also that no legislation shall take place that can, in any manner, affect the removal of the county seat.

Now, any gentleman will see at a glance that it would be impossible to fix any general law that would cover the interests of all the counties in this Commonwealth in this respect. Will it be supposed that if this authority is vested in the courts of any single county in this Commonwealth, no matter what may be the interests of the case, that the courts would agree either to a removal of a county seat or to a division of the county? That, sir, would be unlike the history of any transaction in connection with these two propositions with which any of us are acquainted. Why, sir, suppose for a moment the instance of a county seat established sixty or seventy years ago, and established, too, in that quarter of a county best calculated at that time to subserve the interests of the people of that county, and since that time developments of its mineral and other resources have occurred in different and in remote parts of the county which have concentrated the business interests in an entirely different section of the county. In such a case as this shall it be said that the county seat shall remain where it was established originally, and in a spot where you hear neither the sound of a hammer, nor the voice of a stranger, except when the courts are in session? Or shall the Legislature have power to make such necessary change when it is patent that the courts will not do it?

I speak, however, Mr. Chairman, more particularly in regard to the division of counties, which is proposed to be cut off in this paragraph. I have distinctly in view my own county, which contains one thousand four hundred square miles, with a population of one hundred and sixty thousand, and for the last thirty years the question of the division of the county has been agitated, and I am satisfied the interests of the county demand that it should be divided. Why, sir, in the county of Luzerne we have three courts, two mayors' courts and a court in Wilkesbarre, with an assistant law judge and the entire year, and yet it is an utter impossibility for the business to be transacted in those courts, and hence there is a discrimination made against that county which could not be made applicable to any other county in the Commonwealth, and I think that no general law could be enacted for the benefit of the county of Luzerne, while the majority of the counties represented in the Legislature conceived themselves to be all nicely fixed without division. The great majority of the members of that body know that the people of the particular counties which they represent are opposed to the division of their own counties, and hence would not enact a general law favorable to any division, for fear of affecting counties where division is not a necessity.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, that injustice may not be done to my own, or any other county, I trust this paragraph will be voted down.

Mr. HAZZARD. Mr. Chairman: I hope I may be able to secure the attention of the committee for a few moments, while I express my views upon this subject. I know that I am talking to a Convention composed largely of lawyers, who, for the most part, are comfortably located in their homes, at the county seats of their respective counties, and that there may be a determination upon their parts that there shall be no division of the counties in which they reside. I feel the responsibility of addressing the committee, knowing that I may be in the minority with regard to this matter of counties; but I have a word to say in behalf of my constituents, and while I may know that there is among some a desire that there shall be no division of counties, I flatter myself that at the same time they are gentlemen of great integrity, and that they will recognize the rights of the minority, that I, perhaps, represent, and they will be able to rise far above all selfish considerations when we come to vote upon this paragraph of this section.

It is better for the State that our counties be divided. I have thought more upon this subject than upon any subject I expect to address this committee upon during its session, and I make this assertion, that it is better for the State, and it is better for the individual that there be small counties. This will strike many a mind as perhaps not true, but allow me to bring some facts to the attention of the committee.

If you will take the Auditor General's report you will find that in all the small counties the taxes that are due to the State have been paid in more promptly than from the larger and more unwieldy counties. I have examined that subject, and I know it to be true. It is better, because they collect the taxes quicker and easier. It brings the tax collector nearer to each individual in the county. It is better for the individual in a hundred ways, and some of those ways I will now state to the committee.

Before I go any further I will state that it seems to me that this word "locate" in this section will not allow the State to look for one moment into the place where it is supposed a new county would be located. They shall not even turn their eyes toward it. They shall not look at it at all. They may close their eyes and "go it blind." I say there must be some way worked out by which a new county may be erected, but they must not look at it; it must not be located.

Mr. HANNA. This section reads "locating or changing county seats." It is not "locating counties."

Mr. HAZZARD. The paragraph reads, "erect new counties or changing county lines." It does say "locate." Now are we ready to say that in all time to come, for the next fifty years—for I hope we shall make a Constitution that will last that long—are we willing to say that during all that time there shall be no machinery by which a new county may be erected? I hope that such an injustice will not be perpetrated by the intelligent gentlemen who compose this committee. I said it was good for the State that counties should be small; it is certainly better for individuals. In what way?

It costs less in every respect. It costs less for commissioners. You start a commissioner out to build a bridge. He is paid a per diem. In our county he may be fifty miles away from a bridge, and it must take him one day to go. Then it takes one day to contract with a bridge contractor, and he must return on the third day, costing nine dollars. If our county were divided, as which it ought to be—if I had my way I would make four counties out of it—the business could be done, and the commissioner could return the same day, and the cost would be but three dollars.

It would be cheaper in every way. If I am sold out by the sheriff it would not cost me so much to bring the sheriff to sell and cross me out. It would cost me less if I went to prove a will. As it is, I must get out my carriage and horses and trot the witnesses to the county seat, twenty miles. When I reach my place of destination my horses are so tired I cannot come back the same day. If it were not more than ten miles to the county seat, as it ought not to be in any county of the State, I could wait until after dinner and get my witnesses in, and go to the county seat, prove the will, and come back again without any cost.

It costs less to collect taxes in a small county. In our county, I want to say, that there are twenty-five or more places where our county treasurer goes to collect taxes, and he must be at great cost, and must be paid a large salary in percentage out of what he collects, to go around to these twenty or thirty places to collect taxes. If it were a smaller county we could go to the county seat after dinner, and pay our taxes, and save the expense and percentage of the county treasurer traveling around. If you want to record a deed or to search a record, you must get on your horse early in the morning, by daylight, and trot off, as we have to do in our county, as far as thirty-six miles, in order to reach the records, or you must leave it to an attorney at great expense. If you wish to transact any business in the office, you must travel thirty miles across our county to do it. It is better for the individual in any light that you may please to look at it, and yet you propose to put into the Constitution that it will be impossible to render this aid to or bestow these benefits upon the people who live in remote corners of large counties. Let the population be as it may; let the necessities be as they may; let large communities gather, as they are gathering at this time, as my friend from Fayette (Mr. Kaine) knows, along the river which bounds our county upon the east, no change can be made. There is a population pouring into that valley that is now engaged in the mining business, that will create large communities, that will be denied the privilege of trying their cases in courts only after long delays. I think there are something like fourteen hundred cases upon our docket. It will cost no more; it will cost less. It will cost the individual less to carry on his business so far from the county seat.

Mr. M'CLEAN. I would suggest to the gentleman that the proposition before the committee is not to prevent the erection of new counties.

Mr. HAZZARD. It amounts to that.

Mr. M'CLEAN. It is to prevent special legislation with regard to the location of new counties.

Mr. HAZZARD. It proposes that they "shall not be located." How are you going to erect new counties without locating them?

I hope, sir, that however strong a prejudice may be in this committee against tearing down old lines, and I know that we adhere to this old line with great tenacity, that whatever antipathy there may be to the enactment of anything of this sort, that it will give way before the majority of the right of the minority in this committee, and that this provision will be stricken out. You cannot fix a law appointing a commission to decide these matters as you can to locate a bridge. It will be unwieldy.

I hope, therefore, this one thing will be left to the Legislature, and that they will not be crippled in this paramount and great interest of very many of our citizens in this State.

M. H. G. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: The changes which have been made in this State from time to time in the formation of the counties have led to disputes in different localities, and to corruption in the Legislature. In order to prevent the abuses which had crept into the practice of the Commonwealth, an amendment was made to the existing Constitution providing "that no county shall be divided by a line cutting off over one-tenth of its population, either to form a new county or otherwise, without the express consent of such county by a vote of the electors thereof; nor shall new counties be established containing less than four hundred square miles." That amendment would seem to be calculated to prevent abuses, and yet, sir, at this very time, in the Legislature of this Commonwealth, a bill is pending which undertakes to evade all the limitations of this clause in the Constitution. A gentleman in this Commonwealth, who has been a distinguished member of the lobby, and who happens to be the owner of a watering place along the line of the Northern Central railroad, in the county of Bradford, desires, for his own personal convenience, and for the convenience of certain of his friends, to make his watering place hotel the centre of a new county. In order to do this he presents to the Legislature of Pennsylvania a bill, carefully prepared. He does not undertake to subtract from any county one-tenth of its population, because if he did that, the people would defeat his project, but he avoids that difficulty by taking portions of four surrounding counties, Bradford, Lycoming, Tioga and Sullivan, containing less than one-tenth of the population of each. Sullivan county is small, containing but a fraction over four hundred square miles. The bill now before the Legislature provides for the subtraction of a large township from that county. Should it pass the Legislature, and there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent its passage, the little county of Sullivan will be reduced below the constitutional limitation.

For the purpose of preventing abuses of this kind, and avoiding violations of the Constitution by cunning contrivances, such as I have described, the restriction embraced in the pending paragraph has been proposed, and from the fact that a bill is now pending at Harrisburg which is designed to evade both clauses of the existing constitutional provision to which I have referred, the necessity of this amendment ought to be apparent to every member of this Convention. No special act of the kind to which I here referred ought to be passed. But it will be perfectly competent for the Legislature of this State to provide for such contingencies as may arise in the formation of new counties, the change of county seats, &c., by a general law. Whatever is good for the whole Commonwealth, will no doubt be promptly done by the Legislature. While we are amending the Constitution, let us get rid of the evils I have endeavored to point out, among others.

Mr. HAZZARD. Mr. Chairman: Can the Legislature, under this act, pass any general law regulating such a question at all? Let me read: "Locating or changing county seats." It is not a special law for one county, which I admit will be a special act, but this says "there shall be no act passed by the Legislature, locating or changing county seats, or erecting new counties." A general law is disregarded, and we can never have a new county while the Constitution lasts.

Mr. H. G. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: I would reply to the gentleman from Washington that each clause of this section is preceded by a common commencement, which would make the paragraph read as follows: "The Legislature shall not pass any local or special law locating or changing county seats, erecting new counties or changing county lines." A proper general law, providing for the formation of new counties and the locating of county seats, can be passed at the first session of the General Assembly after this Convention adjourns, if its work is accepted by the people; and a general provision can be made which will meet every proper case that may arise, whether it be locating or changing county seats, erecting new counties or changing county lines; and in passing this section as it is reported from the committee we do but what we ought to do—provide that in this, as in other things, the Legislature shall act by general laws and not by special laws, enacting iniquities such as are proposed by the bill which is under consideration at Harrisburg this day.

Mr. HAZZARD. Mr. Chairman: I move that the further consideration of this section be postponed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot move to postpone in committee of the whole. The committee may dispose of it by voting it down.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I was anticipated in my remarks somewhat by the member from Washington, (Mr. Hazard,) who stated that this whole subject belonged properly to another part of the Constitution. We have in the Constitution at present a provision, which was drawn by me many years ago and adopted by the people of the State, which provides that no county shall be erected containing less than four hundred square miles of territory; nor shall any county be divided by a line which shall cut off over one-tenth of the population, without the express assent of the people by a popular vote. Now, sir, if you desire additional limitations in the erection of new counties, that clause will be the place to put them, and this other subject of changing county lines and the subject of the removal of county seats all belong to the same place. They constitute together one general subject, and ought to be disposed of in that part of the Constitution relating to counties and townships and their organization. Here the subject is interjected in the midst of this legislative article. It is evidently out of place.

Now, sir, I am strongly against the undue increase of counties. The amendment of 1857 has, no doubt, prevented the erection of twenty or thirty new counties in this Commonwealth, and if there is a limitation necessary as to county seats, or county lines, let us add it at the proper time and place.

What is this section? It is, practically, to destroy utterly the whole power in the Legislature, of authorizing the removal of county seats, and making new counties. I will undertake to say that a general law on this subject is impracticable. You will have to lodge your power to make the new county somewhere under the general law. Is the Legislature to lodge it in itself by a general statute? That would be absurd. The only end that we should aim at is the imposition of some wholesome limitation upon this legislative power, and not to render the Legislature powerless to act upon this subject.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I hope the limitation which is contained in this paragraph will pass the committee. We know very well that there are squabbles in the Legislature every year about new counties, and about changing county seats. Some members have wholly mistaken the effect of this clause if adopted. It merely prevents special legislation upon this subject. If nothing else is done by the Committee on Counties, &c., as to the formation of new counties, the Legislature would have power, by general law, to prescribe how they should be erected, and how county seats should be changed. I do not apprehend that this is liable to the objection raised by the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) that it did not belong to the Committee on Legislation. It certainly did come legitimately within the scope of their power. We have not undertaken to regulate how new counties shall be formed. We have not undertaken to prescribe, by any provision, any mode by which they shall be created. That belongs to the Committee on Counties, and when that committee comes to report, they may report some mode by which this end can be obtained. It is their duty to do it. If they do not do it, it will be left to the Legislature to prescribe by general law.

I hope that this provision will pass, and I apprehend in the case of large counties, where they ought properly to be divided, instead of the limitation operating in such a manner as to prevent division, it will finally aid such division. The Legislature will be compelled, by some general law, to prescribe how new counties may be created, either submitting it to a vote of the citizens or otherwise. The Constitution of Illinois provides that new counties shall be formed by a vote of the people.

Mr. DUNNING. I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: With all due deference to the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) whose views I generally subscribe to, I submit that this paragraph is a proper one in this section, which is treating upon the particular matters of legislation, and is defining the subjects which the Legislature shall not pass upon by local or special law, and I respectfully suggest to the members of the committee that it, in no manner, interferes with their proper prerogative. It does not undertake to say how many square miles of territory a county shall consist of, or how many people it shall contain, nor anything relating to it. It simply prohibits the Legislature from passing upon questions of that character by a local or special law, just as it does upon all the other questions. I submit to the committee that all these restrictions upon local legislation should be in one article, where the members of the Convention, running down the article, can see this set forth in this article, and not scattered through the Constitution in various articles and sections.

It was for that purpose that the Committee on Legislation went over all the subjects which they thought ought not to be legislated upon by special law. It does not touch the question which properly belongs to the Committee on Counties, in any way. In addition to what the gentleman from Lancaster (Mr. H. G. Smith) said upon this paragraph, I have just this to add, that upon every occasion where the question of changing the county seat, and changing the county line, or erecting a new county, comes before the Legislature, there is more corruption connected with it than with any other one thing that ever comes before it, and if you want to purify the Legislature of Pennsylvania this paragraph ought to be adopted. It does not interfere with the duties of any committee, any more than any other paragraph. It simply proposes to prevent the corrupt influences in the Legislature that are always connected with special legislation upon this question. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that a general bill may readily be passed that will cover all the cases that will ever arise in the Commonwealth, and in the passage of that bill there will be no corruption whatever. It will be passed upon general principles. I challenge any delegate in this Convention to name any general bill in this Commonwealth that was ever passed by corrupt influences. I never knew one. I do not believe one has ever been passed, and there will be no corruption connected with a general bill upon this subject, but upon any special or local bill there will be corruption. I hope, therefore, the paragraph will be adopted.

Mr. W. H. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: I hope this paragraph will pass, and I hope that we shall see no more postponements of any section of an article that may be presented for the consideration of the Convention. I regret exceedingly that so many postponements of the consideration of questions before the Convention have been made. It has only been a few days since the report of the committee on the Legislature was postponed to await a report from another committee, upon the subject then under consideration. I therefore hope that these continual postponements will not be made hereafter.

The question being taken, the paragraph was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"Incorporating cities, towns or villages, or changing their charters."

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: move to amend the paragraph, by striking out the words "towns or villages," and inserting the word "boroughs."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question being taken, the paragraph was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"For the opening and conducting of elections, or fixing or changing the place of voting."

The paragraph was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"Granting divorces."

The paragraph was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"Erecting new townships or boroughs, changing township lines, or borough limits."

The paragraph was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"Creating offices, or prescribing the powers and duties of officers in counties, cities, boroughs, townships, election or school districts."

The paragraph was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"Changing the law of descent or succession."

The paragraph was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"Regulating the practice, or jurisdiction of, or changing the rules of evidence in any judicial proceeding or inquiry before courts, aldermen, justices of the peace, sheriffs, commissioners, arbitrators, auditors, masters in chancery, or other tribunals."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the paragraph: "Or providing or changing methods for the collection of debts, or the enforcing of judgments."

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I wish to say that the members of the committee have no objection whatever to the amendment, but I think it should be placed in a better form. I feel satisfied that the section as reported does not cover the ground intended by this amendment; it was not in contemplation. I offer to amend the amendment, however, by adding the words, "or changing the effect of judicial sales of real estate."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman: I desire to request my colleague from Allegheny, the mover of this amendment, to permit my amendment to be voted on before any action is taken upon the amendment which he has offered, which may require discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. That cannot be done unless the amendment to the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I withdraw the amendment to the amendment. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I now renew the amendment to the amendment, by adding at the end of the paragraph the words, "or changing the effect of judicial sales of real estate."

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Ewing) how he could change the effect of a judicial sale. If a sale has been made, how is it possible to change its effect after it has been made? I must confess that I do not understand the amendment.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: What I mean is precisely this: I do not propose nor suppose that any court or any person would think that a law passed after a sale has been made would affect it; what I intend to cover is this which is an abuse. There has probably not been a session of the Legislature in the past ten years in which some special law has not been passed for some county, determining the effect of judicial sales of real estate. An orphans' court sale in some counties will divest all liens, and in other counties it will not divest mortgages which are first liens. In one county an orphans' court sale for payment of debts of a decedent will divest all liens, and in other counties it will not. I am familiar with cases myself in which parties have gotten up a petition for an orphans' court sale and presented it, and had an order of sale made, and afterwards it turned out that a few days before the order of sale was made the Legislature had passed a law changing the effect of that sale.

Mr. CORBETT. After the sale was made?

Mr. EWING. No, not after the sale was made; but I submit that we do not want a special law applying to one particular county that is not general all over the State.

Mr. CORBETT. I now understand the object of the gentleman's amendment, and I certainly shall vote in favor of it; but I suggest that it would be more proper to frame a section incorporating this idea and to offer it separately.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question being taken, the paragraph as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"Regulating or extending the powers and duties of aldermen, justices of the peace, magistrates or constables."

Mr. HAZZARD. Mr. Chairman: I desire to offer an amendment to this paragraph, but before I do so I should like to understand the exact meaning of the paragraph. I took occasion to write, last year, to various portions of the State in regard to the jurisdiction of justices of the peace. I know very well that they are a class of our communities very much underrated by some people, but the general tenor of the information I received was in favor of enlarging the jurisdiction of justices of the peace to $300. I am in favor of a law extending the jurisdiction of justices of the peace to $300, and there is no reason why it should not be, because $100 in 1810 was just about equal to $300 now. I desire, however, to amend the paragraph, by adding after the word "constables," the words, "of any single county."

Mr. JOHN R. READ. Mr. Chairman: I think if the gentleman will read the first paragraph in connection with the paragraph now before the committee, the difficulty which exists only in his imagination will entirely vanish. I think I can answer the gentleman's objection by illustrating one of the evils which this paragraph is intended to correct. Some time in the year 1869, I think, there was an act of Assembly passed, by which the prothonotary of Schuylkill county was authorized to commence suits before the justices of the peace of that county for costs against plaintiffs and defendants in suits that had been instituted in the courts of that county during his prothonotary's term of office. By that act of Assembly, jurisdiction was conferred upon justices of the peace of Schuylkill county to issue writs to any part of this Commonwealth, and by the same act the constables of that county were authorized to send these writs to such persons as they might select in the county of Philadelphia, or any other county in this Commonwealth, who had the power to serve writs of summons. The rules of evidence were also changed by that act of Assembly, so that the books of the prothonotary were made prima facie evidence of the costs that had been incurred by the plaintiffs, or that were chargeable to the defendants in these suits. Under that act of Assembly some three or four hundred suits were brought, during a period of less than six months, before the justices of the peace of Schuylkill county, for the sum of one dollar, to which was added ten or eleven dollars mileage. Those writs were sent down to Philadelphia and served upon some three or four hundred different persons, who had in years gone by instituted suits in the county of Schuylkill, and judgments were obtained against them for the sum of one dollar, and eleven or twelve dollars costs, without an opportunity being given to these parties to appear in that county; and it is the purpose of the committee in offering this section to provide for just such cases as these, and to prevent such special and local legislation from being enacted in the future. I do not think the question of the jurisdiction of aldermen or justices of the peace has anything at all to do with the paragraph now before the committee, and I trust the committee will not so consider it.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the paragraph, by adding after the word "regulating," the words "the fees."

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman from Chester will turn to section sixteen, he will ascertain the views of the committee in regard to the salary or emoluments of public officers. It provides that the Legislature shall not pass any local or special law which shall operate to extend the term of any public officer, nor to increase or diminish his salary or emoluments after his election or appointment.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I have read that section, and have found it has an entirely different application from the one contemplated in my amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I entirely agree with the intention of the Committee on Legislation in reporting this paragraph; but I think it is objectionable, perhaps, in its statement. It will be observed that the paragraph concludes with the words, "and the raising of money for that purpose;" the word "that" evidently referring only to the last purpose named in the paragraph, viz: "The building of school houses," which evidently was not the intention of the committee. I would suggest, as a further amendment, to strike out the word "common" and the words "the building of," and insert the words "public" and "school houses."

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I wish to ask the gentleman from Cumberland if his amendment will absolutely prevent the Legislature from creating independent districts. I do not want the Legislature to be deprived of that power.

Mr. WHERRY. Certainly not. They will have the right to create independent districts under a general law.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: They certainly can provide, by general law, for the creation of any school district, but not under any special law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Cumberland, which is to strike out the paragraph and insert: "Relating to public schools and the building of school houses."

Mr. J. M. WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I suggest the word "common."

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend further, by striking out the three last words, "for that purpose."

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: The Committee on Education have reported against the use of the word "common," as applied to our schools. If the gentleman from Schuylkill will refer to the report of that committee he will find that they have used the word "public schools" everywhere.

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. Chairman: I have been laboring under a misapprehension. I did not understand that the amendment was a substitute for the paragraph, and I ask that the amendment be read for information.

The CLERK: The gentleman from Cumberland moves to strike out the paragraph and insert, "relating to public schools and the building of school houses."

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. Chairman: Then I will withdraw my amendment, to allow action on the substitute.

On the question of agreeing to the amendment, a division was called, which resulted thirty-one in the affirmative. Not being a majority of a quorum, the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the paragraph.

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. Chairman: I now move to amend, by striking out the words, "for that purpose," at the end of the paragraph.

Mr. Chairman, the paragraph as it stands limits the raising of money for the management and building of schools and school houses. I would not limit the raising of money to the buildings, because from what I have seen in practical life, if limit be imposed, no good will come from it. I have seen a school house repaired at a larger expense than the original building cost, and then an application made to the Legislature, by the school directors, without the citizens knowing anything about it, to give them the power to borrow money, at a high rate of interest, to meet the expense of such repairs.

Mr. CORBETT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Susquehanna if he will not accomplish his purpose better by not striking the words out, but by making them read, "for such purpose."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Susquehanna accept the modification?

Mr. TURRELL. I think it would be better to simply strike the words out, but I will partially accept the suggestion of my friend from Clarion, and will modify my amendment so as to propose to insert, after the word "building," the words "and repairing," and to strike out the word "that" and insert "such." The paragraph will then read: "Regulating the management of common schools, the building and repairing of school houses, and the raising of money for such purpose."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman: I suggest to the gentleman from Susquehanna, to see if it meets his approval, that he make another change, so that instead of the section reading as it does now, it may read as follows: "Relating to common schools and school buildings, and the raising of money for such purposes."

Mr. TURRELL. Mr. Chairman: I think it is preferable as it is now.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the paragraph as amended.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I am satisfied that if the committee had given careful consideration to the amendment that I offered, it would have been adopted. It is plain to my mind that the section, as it now stands, does not meet one of the greatest evils that we have to cure. One of the greatest evils—

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I rise to a point of order. There is no question before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph is before the committee, and the gentleman is addressing the House on the paragraph.

Mr. WHERRY. One of the greatest evils of the school system as it exists to-day is the creation of new districts, and the alterations made in the old districts.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman will allow me, that is provided for in the fifteenth paragraph of the printed report.

Mr. WHERRY. That relates to officers alone. It relates only to certain officers, and has nothing to do with the creation or alteration of school districts.

I now move to amend this paragraph as it stands, by adding to the end thereof the words: "Or creating or changing school districts."

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I fear we are acting hastily on this whole subject. There are instances in my district in which it was absolutely necessary to establish an independent school district. The same cases have existed all over the Commonwealth. Population changes. School houses that have been erected years ago are not sufficient to-day, either in point of location, or in their size, and as these accommodations fail it is necessary to establish new ones. On the line of two counties there may be no school district on either side, but join them and you can form an independent district. This requires special legislation, and it requires also that the citizens affected by the creation of these independent districts have the power to raise money, either by taxation or effecting loans to establish their school houses. Now, is it improper to go to the Legislature to authorize the establishment of independent school districts, with the power to build houses of a better class than are usually called for, and either borrowing money, or paying it themselves to do it? What is the objection to it? I fear that by the general sweeping terms of this clause, as you have it now, you would prohibit all advantage now derived by the creation of independent school districts and the erection of independent school houses, and I do not want this admirable system restricted.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I think the purpose the gentleman from Cumberland has in view is already provided for in section eleven, in the second paragraph.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: Will the gentleman allow me to answer that the paragraph relates only to the "affairs" of school districts?

Mr. HANNA. That covers it.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: There can be no "affairs" of a school district until the district is first constituted. Now, the constitution of a district, and the management of its affairs after its constitution are entirely different things.

Mr. J. M. WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask a question of some of the gentlemen having this matter in charge. We have in the State an agricultural college which seems to be maintained by some special laws, and which may in the future require additional special laws. I would ask whether it is considered that this section effects that?

Mr. EWING. Certainly not.

Mr. BIDDLE. It relates only to common schools.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Cumberland.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: If it be the fact that the committee having the subject in charge have denominated "common" schools "public" schools, I will suggest that we here change "common" to "public."

Mr. WHERRY. That is the fact.

Mr. CORBETT. I then move as an amendment, unless it can be done by common consent, if that be so that word "common" be stricken out, and the word "public" inserted.

Mr. BARTHOLOMEW. Mr. Chairman: I would suggest to the gentleman from Clarion that he make his motion so that it will apply to the whole report, wherever the words "public schools" occur.

The CHAIRMAN. That would not be in order at this time.

Mr. BARTHOLOMEW. Mr. Chairman: Can it not be done by common consent?

Mr. CORBETT. I will modify my amendment so that it change the word "common" to "public," wherever it occurs in the sections that have been already adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order.

Mr. DARLINGTON. It can be done by common consent.

The CHAIRMAN. It cannot be done by common consent, because the sections are not before the House. The only question before the House is this section.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I suggest that the change be made in this paragraph by common consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Clarion proposes, by common consent, to change the word "common" to "public." Shall the change be made? [No! No!] It is objected to.

Mr. CORBETT. Then I move to amend, by striking out the word "common" and inserting "public."

The amendment was agreed to, there being, on a division, ayes forty-two, noes thirty-eight.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: Allow me to offer another amendment to this paragraph: To strike out the words "regulating the management of," and insert the words "relating to." My object simply is this: The word "management" is too restricted in its sense, and it does not at all cover the ground which the Committee on Legislation intended it to cover.

On the question of agreeing to the amendment a division was called, which resulted twenty-nine in the affirmative. Not being a majority of a quorum the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the paragraph as amended.

The paragraph as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows: "Fixing the rate of interest."

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I want to know from the Committee on Legislation what that means?

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: It means to prohibit all special laws fixing a special rate of interest, not to allow interest to be fixed by anything except a general law.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I want still to inquire whether the purpose is to prohibit a city, county or borough from borrowing money at one rate of interest, where they can get it at that rate, and allow another city to borrow at another rate of interest.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I apprehend it applies to a city, corporation or person, to every person alike, and to every person, corporation, city or borough; it says no rate of interest shall be fixed by special law. The law must be general.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: Then I submit that it is impracticable in its operations, and for this reason: You cannot obtain money for a city like Corry or like Pittsburg, even, at the same rate at which it can be obtained in Philadelphia. This is an attempt, it seems to me, to deny to a city or town with less ability, and less power, and less capacity to borrow money at all, unless it can do so at a rate at which it is impossible to obtain it.

What is the use of such a clause? What good is to be attained by it? Why should not any community be allowed to borrow money from its citizens, and why should not the citizens be allowed to loan it to that community at any rate of interest they can agree upon, whether it is five, six or seven per cent? Why should we prohibit them from borrowing at all because they cannot get it at the same rate that other cities can?

Mr. W. H. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: This section says that the Legislature shall not pass any local or special law fixing the rate of interest. That does not interfere with the boroughs borrowing money, except to say that the rate of interest shall be fixed by a general law, affecting all equally, and not any one specially. Now there are institutions all over the Commonwealth whose charters allow them to loan money at widely different rates of interest. Some chartered institutions are allowed to charge six per cent., while others are allowed to charge ten per cent., the power being conferred by special charter. It is to prevent any special enactments of this sort that this clause is designed. There exist in our city of Pittsburg, and I have no doubt all over the State, institutions that have the right to loan money at ten per cent. under a special law, and I hope this paragraph will be adopted to prevent such a thing as this.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I desire only to say one word in addition to what has been said by the gentleman from Allegheny, and that is that this clause was agreed upon by the Committee on Legislation to prevent the very thing that the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) advocates. The committee thought that it was better that the Legislature, by a general law, should allow any city to contract such rates of interest as it has authorized them to do under a general act, and not to allow one city to pay one rate of interest, and another city a different rate. That was the very purpose we designed to prevent. We want, by a general act, to define this whole question of interest upon some sensible plan, which has yet never been done. There are now in this State saving funds and banks having rates of interest from six all the way up to ten per cent., according to the charters granted by the Legislature. One year the Legislature will pass these charters and allow the banks to charge ten per cent. interest per annum, and the next year pass another law, restricting them to six per cent. Such banks are in existence in this State, and it should be remedied, and it cannot be remedied by any other provision than just this one. I have heard it stated that we are to have a report from another committee which will supplant this; but until we have it, let us adopt this paragraph as it stands.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: Before the gentleman from Potter sits down, I want to ask him a question, whether it is the intention of the Committee on Legislation to allow the Legislature, in pursuance of this provision of the Constitution, to permit persons or corporations to make any contract they please in regard to the loan of money?

Mr. MANN. No, sir. They propose that the Legislature shall regulate this subject by a general law.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: The gentleman misunderstands me. I desire to know whether the Committee on Legislation expect that the Legislature will pass a general law, allowing parties to make any contract which they please in regard to interest?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I am not authorized to say what the committee expect beyond what I have already said, that the view of the committee was that it worked injuriously to have this special legislation on the question of interest, and it ought to be eradicated.

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. Chairman: For the information of the committee of the whole, I beg to state that the Committee on Agriculture, Mining, Manufactures and Commerce proposes to offer a clause, something as follows: "In the absence of special contracts the legal rate of interest or discount shall be seven per cent. per annum. But special contracts for higher or lower rates shall be lawful. All national and other banks of issue shall be restricted to the rate of seven per cent. per annum." This we propose, when our committee reports, to offer to the Convention, and it will be a general law, not fixed by the Legislature, but fixed by the Convention itself, legalizing the rate of interest to be charged by banking institutions of issue at seven per cent, and leaving the rate of interest where contracts are previously made at a higher or lower rate, but to be binding and lawful.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: Do I understand my colleague to say that such a proposition is now pending before the Committee on Agriculture, Mining, Manufactures and Commerce?

Mr. KNIGHT. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. STANTON. Then why should not the committee of the whole vote this paragraph down, and wait until the proper committee reports?

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. Chairman: We do not see that this paragraph at all interferes with our report.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I hope that this committee of the whole will pass this paragraph as it stands. It is possible that something may be reported from the Committee on Agriculture, Mining, Manufactures and Commerce, to which the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Knight) belongs, that will obviate the necessity of it altogether, and, if so, there will then be no objection to striking it out. But we cannot anticipate what this Convention will do, even after the committee to which the gentleman belongs reports. Therefore we ask that this be now adopted by the committee, and reported to the House, and if the necessity of it is obviated it then can be struck out.

The paragraph was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next paragraph will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"Affecting the estates of minors or persons under disability."

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: It sometimes happens that in the examination of titles, a defect, real or apparent, is discovered which prevents an advantageous sale of an estate, and then there is no so convenient remedy as to go to the Legislature and get an act of Assembly to cure that defect. Now I must remind the legal gentlemen, by whom I am surrounded, that Blackstone tells us that acts of Parliament are one of the forms of conveyance sometimes resorted to, and resorted to with good effect. When designing men undertake to obtain an act of Assembly to take away from minors, women, and others under disability, their estates, I agree that the Constitution should restrain them, if possible; but we should not make that restraint so general in its terms as to prevent the occasional necessary interpositions of the legislative power which are quite according to the common law, and according to the practice of Parliament.

Therefore I propose an amendment to this paragraph. I would strike out nothing in the section, but I would add these words to the end of the clause, with a view of accomplishing the special end I have in view:

"Except after due notice to all parties in interest, to be recited in the special enactment."

The purport of that amendment is to qualify this restraint upon the legislative power by requiring, in case of any such special act of Assembly, full notice to all parties in interest before the act is passed, to be recited in the special enactment itself. I think that that will guard the interests of the defenceless, and those under disability, while it will not take away the power to relieve families and individuals in cases of extreme hardship. Take the case of an estate about to be sold for a valuable sum of money, and a defect is discovered in it which no court under any general legislation has power to remedy. If that defect can be promptly cured, the family is benefited by the price that can be got. If that defect cannot be cured the family is deprived of that price. Now there is no power in the Commonwealth that I know of that can remedy such a defect, except it be the legislative power.

I would restrain it to that class of cases. I would require the applicants to prove full notice to all parties in interest which should be recited upon the face of the law, and if not so recited, or if the notice was not competent, a court could hold the law invalid for that reason.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman from Philadelphia will modify his amendment slightly, I can see no objection to it. If he will modify it so as to make it read that the application shall be by guardians or trustees of estates, it will meet my views.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I would have no objection on point of principle to such a modification, but it does not exactly reach the case. The application to the Legislature may come from any parties. It may come from a proposed purchaser, as well as from guardians of minors or trustees. The suggestion of the gentleman from Potter would narrow it too much, but from whomsoever it came, full notice is required to be given before the Legislature can act upon it. If that is done, then I cannot see how any evil could result.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask my honorable colleague from the city, whether or not such a case as he refers to could be provided for under a general law. I would remind him of the act of 1853, called the Price act, which provides for every supposable case which can arise under a settlement of a decedent's estate, and for all persons under disability, lunatics and everybody else. Why cannot some general act be made to cover the point?

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: It is not competent for the wit of man to provide for every case which will occur in human affairs. It is impossible that any one act shall comprehend all things. On the contrary, the next day after the law is enacted, a case will arise which is not within it. Such is the character of human affairs, that to attempt to adjust a statute to all possible cases, is to remind me of Judge Gibson's figure of a mantua-maker, who would prepare a dress for a lady before the customer came into her shop. It cannot be done; we cannot tell what cases are going to arise. But we all know, that in point of fact, these sporadic individual hardships do occur. We cannot anticipate them; we do not know when they will arise, and that is the reason why power to relieve them must reside somewhere in the State, if you mean that the people shall be a free people. That is exactly the reason why Parliament possesses it in Great Britain, and our Legislature ought to possess it here.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I do not exactly see the cases for which the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) wants to provide for. This section itself is intended to prevent the Legislature from passing special acts by which the estates of minors shall be converted. It intends to limit those cases to general laws under the action of the courts. Now if a sale takes place, and there is a defect in the proceedings such as renders it void, and if it has not the effect of rendering it void the estate passes, but if the defect be such as renders the title void, I apprehend no Legislature now can cure it. They cannot divest an estate. It is only by a sale under regular proceedings, either by special or general law, that they can divest a minor's estate now.

This is intended to strike at special acts by which the estates of minors are converted. It intends to confine this class of estates to general acts; and I apprehend that we cannot cure a defect now by which the estate can be converted. I am opposed to any exception or limitation of this section, and I hope the committee will adopt it as it stands.

The amendment of Mr. Woodward was agreed to.

The question recurring on the paragraph as amended, it was agreed to.

The CLERK read the next paragraph:

"Remitting fines, penalties and forfeitures, or refunding moneys legally paid into the treasury."

It was agreed to.

The CLERK read the next paragraph:

"Exempting property from taxation."

It was agreed to.

The CLERK read the next paragraph:

"Creating corporations or amending, renewing or extending the charters thereof."

It was agreed to.

The CLERK read the next paragraph:

"Granting to any corporation, association or individual any special or exclusive privilege or immunity."

Mr. W. H. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: I desire to amend, by adding at the end of the forty-first line, "or giving to contractors, builders, landlords, or any other class of creditors preference or priority of liens against the personal or real property of any debtor, except for wages."

I do not see any better place for this than here. I offered this as a suggestion some time ago, and it will be found on page twenty-four of the suggestions. I have been looking for the proper place to put it in, and presume this is it.

Mr. T. H. B. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman: I would call the attention of the gentleman from Allegheny to the second paragraph of this section, prohibiting special legislation, "authorizing the extension, creating or impairing of liens." It seems to me that covers the point. Certainly that was the idea of the committee in adopting it. I think the amendment ought to be voted down.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. W. H. Smith, it was rejected.

The question then recurring on the paragraph, it was agreed to.

The next paragraph was read:

"Granting to any corporation, association or individual the right to lay down a railroad track," and it was agreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I move to insert immediately after that paragraph the following:

"Nor shall the Legislature indirectly create such special or local law by the repeal of any general law."

I apprehend that when this local legislation shall be stopped a greater evil will probably be attempted to be perpetrated on the State by individuals, who, wanting to get a local or special law, get a general one, and have it repealed, as to all except the thing they want. I therefore propose this as an amendment at this point, so as to guard against the class of cases referred to.

The question being upon the amendment of Mr. Broomall, it was agreed to.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment, to come in as a new paragraph, after the one just adopted:

"Regulating labor, trade, mining or manufacture."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

"Nor shall any bill be passed granting any powers or privileges in any case where the manner, form or authority to grant such powers and privileges shall have been provided for by a general law, and in no case where a general law can be made applicable, nor in any other case where the courts have jurisdiction, or are competent to grant the powers or give the relief asked for."

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following as an amendment:

"Nor shall any law be passed empowering courts to grant a divorce, a vinculo matrimonii, for any cause, arising after the marriage took place, except adultery."

In doing this I feel that I have entered grounds that may possibly be hard to maintain, but the greater reason exists for the effort. I shall at least not die without a struggle. All I ask of this Convention is an open field and a fair fight.

As, however, this subject is a comprehensive one, it will be impossible for me to give my views upon it inside the twenty minutes allowed by rule to members addressing themselves to the discussion of any question. I would, therefore, ask leave, at this time, to have an extension of time in advance. I would ask the Chair to take the decision of the Convention, as to that point, before I begin.

Mr. BIDDLE. It is certainly a very important subject. I hope the time will be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is necessary. Shall the gentleman (Mr. Bear) have unanimous consent? ["Aye!" "Aye!" "No!"] Unanimous consent is not given.

Mr. DARLINGTON. The time can be extended if the gentleman (Mr. Baer) should not get through in twenty minutes.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman: I rise with great diffidence to defend the amendment just offered. I know that it is radical, but founded in truth and justice; and I believe that now is the time and here the place to introduce it; but I am overawed by the consciousness that I am wholly unable to do justice to the subject.

That the proposition, in the present state of society, will not only meet with much favor, but would be endured by a overwhelming majority of the electors of this State if submitted to them, I have no doubt. But I fear I shall be unable to win much favor for it in this Convention, and will possibly succeed in verifying a prediction made by one of our members early in the session, when the question of publishing the Debates was under discussion, that it would be quite likely more than one of us would, during our discussions, write himself down an ass.

Did I not, therefore, deem it an imperative duty imposed upon me by an innate sense of right, and a consciousness that I would fail to do my whole duty here, if I failed or neglected to urge such amendments as I believed would tend to the general welfare of the people of the State, and would make our fundamental law entirely consistent with the great and eternal principles which underlie all good government, I would hold my peace—for "it is hard to kick against the pricks." But having introduced the amendment early in our session, and finding that it had found no favor in committee, I am compelled to offer it here where I may give such reasons as I can for the faith that is in me, and establish, if possible, that it is at least worthy of consideration. The principal involved in the amendment is, that marriage, which is the very foundation and life of society, from which spring all the joys and happiness of mankind, and upon which are based the hopes and well-being of a nation, is not a civil contract, but an institution arising out of the nature of man and society.

Very many men I know flatly deny this, but they do so, in my opinion, in consequence of what I deem a false sentiment of this and previous ages, created by those who, though they succeeded in moulding public sentiment, did so in virtue of their acknowledged intelligence, but not upon the plain principles of common sense, as found dwelling in the average human mind, and as applied to the nature of man's being and his relation to God, but upon some fancied theory of the prime original state of man antecedent to all society, and independent of the law of his being, or of his relation to that great and holy being, who created man in his own image, and that, therefore, both society and marriage are founded on contract.

The two theories indicated raise the whole question involved, and upon the adoption of either depends the truthfulness or untruthfulness, the vice or the virtue of the principle embraced in the amendment. If one theory is adopted, my amendment is founded in error and should fall. If the other is adopted my amendment is founded on the eternal principles of truth, co-extensive with man himself, and with him must stand. And in order to determine the question intelligently and correctly we should examine both theories and see which is true.

Now, I call upon the one hundred and one lawyers in this Convention, who are ready to proclaim law a science, and the common law the perfection of human reason, to rise up to the full standard of their professional dignity, and meet this question upon its merits—to analyze it as they would any other great fundamental principle—to leave out of consideration exceptional consequences and statutory enactments of mere human origin—go back to the source and fountain of society—survey the whole field of laws, human and divine, and see whether, in all its proportions, the laws of marriage and divorce will square with first principles, which are eternal and underlie all sound laws.

And I call upon the thirty-two very learned and intelligent lay members of this body, to examine the question involved, carefully and conscientiously—free from all previous prejudices or convictions, arising from existing customs or existing laws, but in the light of reason and the well-being of society.

In order fairly to discuss and understand the length and breadth and depth of the question involved, it is necessary to go back to the beginning of all things—to the days when man first appears upon the stage, and ascertain what was his condition then.

There are those, and in vast numbers, who teach and believe, "that society exists by virtue of a social compact, and that prior to the formation of this social state, man was found in a state of nature, when, as the poet says,

"Wild in the woods, the noble savage ran, Ere arts and manners first corrupted man."

"That in those days man appeared upon the earth as does the brute or the beast of the field—going where, and doing as he would—existing as an individual, independent of all other men—having nothing to do but to eat and drink, and do whatever his heart moved him to do, in which state of nature there were no husbands—no wives—no property—no family—no nation—no rights—no wrongs—no worship. Nothing but the individual man on the same plane with the beasts of the field."

That therefore his rights were unlimited and man was supreme.

They would have you believe that from this state of nature men came voluntarily together and constituted society by compact, each renouncing a portion of their original rights as a price to society for securing others.

This theory, I am sorry to say, is advocated, directly or indirectly, by a great mass of mankind, who would consider it a very great insult to be called anything else than christian.

Another theory, not more heathen to my mind, than that just mentioned, assumes, "that at first men crawled out of the earth as worms, which gradually and constantly developed from a lower to a higher order of creation, and in due time appeared upon the stage as brutes and dumb animals, fighting, at first, with fists and scratching with nails for acorns and wild fruits, and finally with arms which necessity invented; their rude cries they gradually formed into articulated language; and then having gradually ascended in the scale of being, and having assumed an erect form they came together; by means of their crude language they made a social compact, which constituted their first and fundamental law and in it provided for marriage."

But what evidence, I ask, exists anywhere that sustains either of these fancied prime original states of man, antecedent to all society and independent of the inherent law of man's being? Search the traditions of earliest days; examine all records, sacred and profane, and where do you find the evidence of such a state? Writers on christian ethics may well exclaim: "Lo! in the historical records of the whole world there is no record of such a state or such a compact." It exists only in fiction and theory, and has no foundation in fact.

Go to the orient and get the first glimpse of man, and tell me how do you find him there? Tell me, does he roam in the forest with nothing but instinct as a guide, in the capacity of individual man, or as a being possessed of reason, and in society? Your answer can only be: We find man, wherever he is found, even in the fewest numbers, whether in the orient or occident, in the state of society; and on pushing the investigation still farther, you are compelled to acknowledge that man enters society as a member of a family. Adam and Eve are the first male and female man we have any record of. They are the source or root of all human beings, if the records are true, and their first appearance is in society, "male and female made he man," and every subsequent human being was born into society. But if you will not concede the Adamic origin of man, and deny the truth of the statement, will it follow that upon the mere denial thereof the converse is proven?

Let us see. Take me to any place upon this globe, "where from newness of a country—famine, war, pestilence, desolation or emigration—only one family is found, and can you show me man in the independent a individual state roaming at pleasure and doing as he will? No, you cannot; for, whether you go to the old or the new world to demonstrate your theory, everywhere you will be confronted by the presence of man as a member of society. Wherever he has first been seen he has been found in society, and though you may find a spot on this earth, remote enough from all other places, and find upon it a human being at all, it will be at least "one family, a man and wife; a social organization, which is at once a family; a nation in embryo, and a church, and the head of it, at once the father, the king and the priest," with no evidence of origin; and you only know, but your thereby know it truly, that this organization is coeval with man. Assuming, now, that you find these relations existing, how then do you find man? Does the condition you find him in warrant the assumption of the heathen story "that man surrendered part of his natural rights to society in consideration of his being made more secure in those that were left him?" What rights in the fancied natural state could man possibly have had that were at all commensurate with his rights in society? Has not a man in society ten thousand rights a savage never dreamed of?

Suppose it were true that man in his natural or savage state could do as he pleased; was he not restricted by his power and ability? Surely he was not omnipotent. It at most could mean that he could do as he pleased within the limits of his ability; and does not the history of the world, and of the human race, prove, conclusively prove, that man only becomes powerful in society, and that the higher a nation attains in the scale of intelligence and civilization the more powerful it becomes?

Aye, "a mere glance at man in his fancied state of nature, and at civilized man in society, will satisfy any man that society enlarges, develops, secures and defends the rights of man; and that unless murder, robbery, theft, lying, contempt for the marriage bond and all crimes, melum in se, were prime original natural rights, he has surrendered none," and this feature in the social compact theory falls.

If this theory were true; if it were based on incontrovertible facts, not assumed but proved; then indeed would society depend upon contract, and marriage be an institution of society; and the conclusion would be irresistible that marriage is a civil contract, and may be annulled for any cause, and if the argument was carried to its utmost limits, might be annulled for no cause at the mere pleasure and will of the parties. For it is a principle of law and of common sense, that they who can make a contract can also unmake it, as will be seen by the following definition of a contract:

"A contract is a convention or agreement by which two or more persons consent to form between themselves some lawful and binding engagement, or to rescind a preceeding one or modify it."

Are you ready to endorse this civil contract theory, and destroy the family, undermine society, degrade public morals, and out of the marriage bond make a mere rope of sand? Consequences that would necessarily follow.

Nay, you would not; but, as men, you throw yourself back upon the State, and console yourself with the solacing conclusion, that as the State adopts the heresy, your skirts are clear.

But, sir, to-day, and now, this body represents the State, and in the future the State will just be what this body makes it to be, and for all iniquities which shall be crystallized knowingly, into the fundamental law, this body is responsible.

The State proclaims marriage a civil contract. But behold the sovereignty of the State, after having violated the very nature of man's being by proclaiming marriage a civil contract, resorting to a miserable subterfuge to shield herself from the dreadful disaster which is sure to follow the monstrous heresy, by a principle of law of her own creation, and declares, that a contract between the parties to a marriage, to annul the same at pleasure, or for any cause whatever, is against public policy, and therefore void.

Why against public policy? and why void? Let the champions of the civil contract theory answer.

Sir, I assert that it is against public policy, because it is against the law of nature and the law of man's being, and is void, not because it is against public policy, but because it is in conflict with the laws of nature, and the revealed law of God, and that the restriction against the annulling of a marriage by agreement of the parties, is an unwilling recognition by the State, that marriage is not a mere civil contract, but has its existence as an institution of the law of nature, which law itself proclaims that any dissolution of the marriage bond, except for the cause of adultery, is not only against public policy, but void, "inasmuch as by it no injustice—no immorality—no wrong to individuals, or society can be justified or excused."

Go back as far as historical research will carry you, examine the lives, the history, the customs and the habits of all nations, communities and peoples, from the most civilized, refined and intelligent, down to the rudest, most barbarous and savage.

Aye! go back, view man as he emerges out of chaos, at the fiat of Almighty power, or as he gradually develops from a creeping thing in the proud stature of an erect intelligent being, possessed of God-like faculties, and show me where is the evidence of the institution of marriage as a mere social contract? Who were the first parties to it? where was it consummated? and what were the terms?

Failing to adduce any evidence of the fact, by direct proof or by implication, don't ask intelligent men to believe it on mere bold assertion, or as a deduction from premises, assumed by an infidel philosophy.

The fact that marriage is found existing from earliest days, and among all nations and people, affords no presumption that its institution was by contract. As well might you ask us to presume, that because the beasts of the forest, the brutes of the field and the birds of the air, though destitute of reason, and lacking all the elements which enter into the making of a contract, do nevertheless mate and in couples agree, such mating is based upon contract.

As the common intelligence of man must revolt at such a conclusion, I ask, sir, to what conclusion does it unerringly point? I answer it myself, because it is the voice of the ages. All animated nature do so mate and in couples agree, by virtue of a law of their being, and not by virtue of a contract. For bears and lions to mate and in couples agree, is quite as much a part of their nature, as it is for them to growl and fight.

And if the history furnished us by naturalists, has any truth, many animals can be found from whom lessons of duty and fidelity might well be learned by man.

The lion, by instinct led, will not forsake his bride. Nay, while the lioness nurtures and cares for the young ones in the den, the noble giant of the forest roams at large in quest of food for this royal family. And woe betide the rival who, at any time, dares to enter his paradise uninvited.

So while the female bird sits upon the nest, and attends to the family duties at home, her mate is out in search of food for both; and nobody ever heard of the gentleman bird playing false to his bride.

Man only descends so low in the scale as that. In the absence then of all proof of a contract, the existence of the fact of marriage and the mating in pairs in man and beast from earliest days, is a conclusive proof, that the institution is one of nature and not of contract.

If by contract, there must have been a time where man and woman roamed as individuals—man being the strongest, was lord of the forest and “might making right”—he would seize upon every woman in his way—there being no eternal fitness of things, and man not led by instinct, as the balance of animated nature, and unable to subdue the flesh, as has always been his history, would make the life of woman intolerable. She would be at the mercy, not only of a man, but of all men.

Behold her in the days of gestation—the hours of parturition—the months of nutrition, weak, but lovely—how is she to be protected from the fiery passions of man, roaming where, and doing as he pleased? How is she to be nurtured when days of travail are over? Could she, like the hen, run clucking, her brood following her with the shell yet on their backs?

Oh! the deep damned infamy that would rest the foundation of society on such a hell-born basis!

Stop for one moment! annul with an Omnipotent fiat, all laws human and Divine—resolve society into the original elements of individual man and individual woman, independent of any natural and revealed law; let loose the reins of passion and lust; sever the domestic and family tie; turn loose the libertines and lascivious devils, who but wait to lay hold of the most virtuous and beautiful woman that passes their way; and a score of them will, against her will, know her in an hour. Like the wandering jew, she could have no rest day nor night.

Imagine all laws and restraints removed and set aside in this city. Ye gods! who could contemplate the scene.

Is it possible that any sane man believes such a state ever existed? Will you still insist that such a state as we find the other animals now exist in, may at one time have existed for man?

I tell you, sir, all nature gives it the lie. For all animals, except man, are guided by instinct, which never errs—it is true and constant as the needle to the pole. While man having the god-like faculties of reason, knowing good from evil, and having the power to choose, is not led by instinct, which, in him, is very weak, but acts independent of instinct, and without regard to any imperative law of his being. And while instinct always leads animals of the same class and genus in the same direction, reason, operating in the minds of individuals, excites, impels, moves and determines each man differently; and as the powers and lusts of the flesh are stronger than the powers of the will, as the history of man fully demonstrates, he is led by them, as by an ignis fatuus, into all sorts of absurdities and crimes. All animals, except man, are to-day what they were originally, and man, occupying a higher sphere than that afforded by instinct, alone fell. Having, I think, shown that neither society or marriage are creatures of contract, but that they are institutions arising out of man's nature, it is necessary to go farther before we can determine the question at issue.

From the premises established, how far can the civil or municipal law go in enlarging or restraining the original institution?

The acknowledged doctrine of this State is: That sovereignty, or the supreme power of the State, is inherent in the people. If therefore, the absolute sovereignty is in the people; if society was originally formed by man in a state of nature, where they were free and untrammelled by any law; coming together and forming a compact, then the laws passed and ordained by such society would, indeed, be supreme. And if it should enact that murder is a virtue, stealing honest, lying honorable, promiscuous concubinage right, and marriage a civil contract, so they would be, whatever consequences might follow. And we to-day, being here by express delegation, representing every human being in this State, would be, for the specific purpose of framing a fundamental law, the supreme power of the State. If we enacted the section, as it stands, it would be the law. If we rejected that, and adopted the amendment, it would be the law—assuming, always, that our work would be ratified by the people.

If there were no other questions or principles involved, it would follow that whatever this Convention enacted as law, would on the particular subject matter be the law; whether wise or unwise, beneficial or injurious to man or society. But our enactments cannot become anything more nor stronger than municipal law, which is "a rule of civil conduct prescribed by the Supreme power of a State, commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong;" and within this rule is found another recognized principle, which declares that all governments are founded by the people and for the people, for the purpose of promoting the general welfare and greatest happiness of the greatest number "salus populi supraemallex" has come down from the ages, and is as much an axiom to-day as at any previous period. Our enactments must, therefore, be strictly in accordance with public policy; and if this were the only limitation upon our power we should content ourselves with the inquiry: Does the section, or the amendment, or either or both, accord with the principles of public policy? But we can best solve this question by going a step farther.

For on the examination of the true spirit and essence of municipal law, we find that the supreme power of a State which establishes and ordains municipal law, is, in its sovereignty, limited by the law of nature and the revealed law of God, which are not only superior laws, but are the ultimate abodes of sovereignty. And therefore our fundamental law, when we shall have done with it, will be supreme only, in so far, and no farther, as it is in harmony and consistent with the principles of public policy, the law of nature, and the law of God. And as the law of nature and the revealed law of God are the Supreme law, and all other laws or rules are subordinate, the only inquiry necessary for us to make is, are our enactments in harmony and consistent with this Supreme law, for the principles of public policy themselves are founded on the same great law, and the moment we establish any subordinate rule or law to be consistent with the Supreme law, that itself also establishes its harmony with all valid subordinate laws.

What is this law of nature? Our best and wisest authors define it to be:

"A law prescribed by God to all men, not by formal promulgation, but discoverable by the light of reason—it comprehends all the duties we owe either to the Supreme Being, to ourselves, or to our neighbors. It is superior to all others, binding in all countries and at all times; all laws and constitutions which are valid derive their authority directly from it and from the revealed law of God, (the Bible,) and all in violation of either, or both, are void."

So we read as lawyers, and so we profess to believe. Does our faith and practice agree? Let me suppose a case. Suppose a man and a woman of full age, and free from any of the legal bars or restraints which would make the marriage void, mutually agree that they will unite as man and wife, but that the being of the husband, for the most purposes, shall be merged in that of his wife, and that under her protection and cover he shall perform everything. In short, that the wife shall be head of the family, and the husband shall be baron covert, as by the existing rule the wife is feme covert, that she should be clothed with the governing attributes of the man, and that the husband, in the family, should obey the wife. That, as part of a marriage contract, they mutually agree that the man shall not take the woman away from the neighborhood of her mother without the consent of the wife, and that the marriage was solemnized by incorporating this agreement in the ceremony. Will the advocates of the civil contract theory tell me whether this contract is valid or void, and if void, why? I answer, the contract is void, but the marriage is nevertheless valid, and this, because marriage is not a civil contract, but an institution of the law of nature, which law can not be modified by any contract or condition which man and woman or society can make. I assume now, from all that has been established, that marriage is an institution of the law of nature, and as such I assert it can not be annulled; because,

1st. "Marriage, as defined by the Roman law, and the definition everywhere accepted, is the union of a man and a woman, constituting an united, habitual course of life, never to be separated; a partnership of the whole life, a mutual sharing in all rights human and Divine;" and the common law goes farther and treats them, for many purposes, as one person.

2d. Independent of this definition, which accords with the nature of the institution itself, it is plain that inasmuch as the institution is not by contract, it cannot, like a contract, be rescinded by the parties to the marriage; for that only may be rescinded which was made a contract by competent parties.

3d. As it is an institution of the law of nature, it is therefore a part of that law; and as, under our theory of government, no law, in whole or part, may be annulled or repealed except by the supreme power, and as the sovereignty of this State is only supreme when it acts in harmony with the natural and revealed law of God, and is to all intents and purposes subordinate to that law, and as the annulment of marriage would, to that extent, be equal to an annulment or repeal of the law of nature, it follows that all contracts or laws having for their aim the granting of divorces, by which the marriage bond is annulled, are void, as it would in effect be the elevating of a subordinate power over the supreme power. The declaration of Holy Writ is therefore a mere reflex of the law of nature: "What God has joined together let no man put asunder."

Is this a mere figment of the imagination? Let us see. "A man and woman unite in marriage, become one flesh, sharing in mutual joys. One of the ends of marriage is to pro-create children and propagate the species. A new era and new life dawns upon them—the man becomes father, the wife mother; and this new relation is like the perpetual union itself; it runs through the whole life. Nothing but death destroys the relation of father or mother—nay, not even the death of the offspring—nothing short of the death of the father and mother themselves; for once having become a mother, though her child die, and though her husband desert her, yet can she not bring herself back to the ante-nuptial period, before the womb was opened. It has become a part of her nature, is co-extensive with her life. Can you dissolve the bond and put the parties in the same condition they were before? If so you would have some reason for claiming to deal with it as a civil contract. If you cannot, and who is there here bold enough to maintain such a doctrine, then only can you act through violated law.

Up to this point in the argument I have endeavored, though in a disjointed and rambling way, to prove the truth of my position, outside and independent of Holy Writ, using whatever I could find in legal and moral science, which bore upon the question, in order, if possible, to convince those, if any there are, who do not believe that the Scriptures are divinely inspired and binding upon the consciences of all men, that the principle involved in the amendment is founded on truth, and has been established independent of the laws of Moses or of Christ.

And I am bold enough to assert, that no matter how illogically and awkwardly expressed, the great truths of the argument do nevertheless establish the fact that marriage is an institution of natural law, which law binds all men whether they will be bound by it or not, independent of any religious belief; and that man, willing or unwilling, must by his own inherent nature, if true to himself, acknowledge that the marriage bond is perpetual, that only one woman was born for one man, and one man for one woman; that husband and wife are so essentially one.

That on the plain principles of common sense, no human power is strong enough to annul it by contract or legislation; and that though you should separate the parties, the union in its mysteriousness continues to exist, and will continue to exist until death or adultery dissolves the tie.

But, may I not hope, that for this Convention, there is an irresistibly conclusive argument in favor of my amendment, found in that Book of books—that living word which is the reflex of Jehovah himself, and which to us and all men is the supreme law, pointing out to us the way of life and holding forth the hope of glory.

Its utterances are the way, the truth and the life—accepted by us all without reasoning or demonstration. All christians receive it as the oracles of the living God, and to us all it is a thus saith the Lord of Hosts.

Let it testify in this cause.

On this plain we have no grappling in the dark to discover the origin of man. The Record proclaims, and on the sixth day the Lord God made man; out of the dust of the earth made He him; male and female made He them. Man, as made, was one at first; but when the Lord God said it is not good that man should be alone—from his flesh and bone He made a partner for him.

Man was the original creation; and woman was made out of the substance of the man; flesh of his flesh and bone of his bone; adapted by their very nature and constitution to union in marriage; the one for the other.

And to establish for all time the certainty of the divinity of the institution—the union of the man and the woman—God made but two, one man and one woman, the one for the other as a necessity of their creation; the man out of the dust, the woman out of the flesh and the bone of the man, so that the two contain but the flesh and the bone of the original man, and hence the two were, and were so declared, one flesh, henceforth existing as male and female man. Making them one flesh, so that no contract or choice could intervene; neither could do without the other, if either would—the very law of their being impelled their union as husband and wife.

There was no formula used in that original marriage, nor was there any occasion for Adam's saying, "I take you, Eve, for my wife, as long as we shall live or agree, or for good and for worse, in sickness and in health, in adversity and in prosperity, to support and protect." Nor need Eve reply, "I take you, Adam, as my lawful husband, as long as we both shall live or agree, for good or for worse, in adversity and prosperity, in sickness and health, to love and obey, until such time as you, Adam, shall look smilingly upon some other fair dame.

But it is a fair implication, from all that is recorded of this primitive marriage, that Adam, looking lovingly upon Eve, and finding her the most beautiful and lovely being upon all the earth, did not go through the tedious modern custom of courting; but at a single bound, rushing to her side and embracing her, says, as he had the right to say: "I am no longer myself—no longer a man; I am only the greater fraction of a man; I am utterly and hopelessly ruined for all time to come, unless the other fraction be restored again. Oh, me! How can I be lord of creation, short of a perfect man?" And addressing Eve, says: "The Lord God, when I was asleep, took one of my ribs, bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh, and made you, my darling Eve. You are the other part of myself—the fraction taken from me, as man—nothing entered into your composition but bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh; you, in your entirety, are only the rib which was taken from my side; together we represent the sum of all the parts of the original man. The sum of all the parts is only equal to the whole—the whole was man, and any fractional part is less than man—without you, then, I am not man, and you not man; but with you, I am myself again, lord of creation, and head of the race. Henceforth you are mine and I am thine, and together we are man."

Because of this mysterious union of husband and wife, a man shall leave his father and mother, and shall be united unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh. "The natural tie of parent and child, close and tender as it is, and far exceeding any mere contract alliance, shall be superseded by one infinitely closer and dearer, in the relation of husband and wife. So closely and truly shall man cleave and be united to his wife, that they too become one flesh. And though a son partakes of the elements of his father and his mother, which in him are inseparable, and make the relation of parent and child one of the closest ties imaginable, yet this is far excelled by that mysterious union of husband and wife, whereby they become one flesh.

Is the injunction, then, a strange or unnatural one which proclaims: "What God therefore joined together, let not man put asunder?" Not in the least. It follows logically from the relation established; for if husband and wife are once made one flesh—one life—then nothing but death can destroy the relation. Death, alone, is an extinction of life. Hence, though you may separate the parties, the oneness continues—the union is perpetual, and has become a part of their nature, which death alone can change or modify.

The Scriptures teach that husband and wife are one flesh, so one that, by Christ's law, nothing but death can disunite them. One, so that the unbelieving husband or wife is sanctified by the believer. One, as Christ and his church are one. One in a mysterious union, incomprehensible to us, but true, because revealed as a truth in God's holy word.

St. Paul, in Eph. v, 22, says: "Wives submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord, for the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is head of the church, and he is the Saviour of the body." * * *

"So ought men to love their wives as their own body, for he that loveth his wife loveth himself; for no man ever yet hated his own flesh." * * *

But close as is the union of husband and wife, though they have really become one flesh, and are, jointly, but one perfect man, by a union, for the whole life. Yet it is clear, from the Scriptures, that the tie, strong as it is, may be dissolved; but for one cause only, and that the foulest, meanest, most infamous and degrading, yet least punished of all crimes, adultery.

This is plainly asserted in the nineteenth chapter of the Gospel of St. Matthew: "The Pharisees also came unto him, tempting him, and saying unto him, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause? And he said unto them, have ye not read that He which made them at the beginning, made them male and female, and said for this cause shall a man leave father and mother and shall cleave to his wife, and they twain shall become one flesh. What, therefore, God hath joined together let no man put asunder. They say unto him, why did Moses then command to give her a writing of divorcement, and to put her away? He saith unto them, Moses, because of the hardness of your hearts, suffered you to put away your wives; but from the beginning it was not so. And I say unto you, whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery; and whoso marrieth her which is put away, doth commit adultery."

Here, then, is the conclusion: You may permit husband and wife to live separately, as under our divorce, a mense et thoro, they now may do. If, for any good reason, it is impossible to live harmoniously together, but they shall continue to be one person, and the relation still existing, they are bound to fidelity to the marriage bond. But the bond itself, which is a part of their nature, you shall not destroy, nor permit it to be destroyed, so that the parties become disunited, with all the powers and immunities of anti-nuptial contract again attaching, including the reciprocal right of marrying again, except for one cause only, and that adultery.

This crime is so enormous in the eyes of humanity and of God, that all the essential elements originally entering into the marriage union are destroyed, and that as effectually in regard to its operation on the innocent party as by the death of the guilty party.

Love, affection, trust, confidence, fidelity, all have disappeared. Mutuality of the marriage joys has flown, one of the parties to the original marriage, with a broken heart, is made miserable for life, while the other, the guilty cause, having severed the most sacred earthly tie, by defiling himself in a foul nest, soon finds the gates of hell ajar, ready to receive him into the final abode of all the damned.

Now, sir, in this day and generation—in the light of the law of nature, and with the revealed law of God before us—with the municipal law as our guide in what is right and what is wrong—and it declaring that all laws inconsistent with the natural and revealed law are void. I ask, will you vote down this amendment, and crystallize the iniquity into the fundamental law?

Don't excuse yourselves by any mere subterfuge, such as, that the section as it stands, don't violate the principle. I charge that it does, because it recognizes the right of granting divorces by courts of record or other tribunals by virtue of general laws, and that without any limitations whatever.

And it must be plain to the common sense of all men that the evil that the people are complaining of is not that the Legislature, like the courts, grants divorces, but that both the Legislature and courts grant divorces in violation of the christian law and of municipal law. And that it is quite as degrading to the public morals, to have illegal and unwarranted divorces granted at one place than at another.

To-day, sir, I am informed there are no less than forty cases pending at Harrisburg; add to these the number pending in the courts of each county of the State, and you will swell the list to such monstrous proportions that even the champion State of Indiana will pale before it, although in its capital town last year, one divorce was granted for every six marriage licenses issued.

No one dreams of the extent of the iniquity, without specially investigating the matter.

A friend cites me to Connecticut, where last year nearly five hundred divorces were granted.

And Ohio, the Quasi Yankee State, furnishes one county where the proportion of divorce to marriage was as one to nine.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I find, sir, in looking over the files of amendments proposed, that propositions have been submitted to this Convention contemplating a provision in the preamble of the Constitution, recognizing Almighty God as the Supreme Being and Ruler of the universe, and acknowledging our dependence upon Him. I take pleasure in saying now and here, that no man will more cheerfully vote for such a proposition than I will, if it is presented at the proper time, and shall be found, when presented, to be entirely and fully consistent with all our work, so that the whole may, without spot or wrinkle, and entirely free from blemish, be dedicated to Him who holds in His hands the destinies of nations and of men. And I am very sure the great christian heart of this good old Commonwealth is in entire harmony with our good designs.

But I must be permitted here to call earnestly and pleadingly upon all the true friends of that proposition to rally in support of the amendment I am advocating, as one infinitely above and beyond that they are seeking to establish, in its bearings upon society, and without the adoption of which, with some kindred propositions that will yet arise in this Convention, all these labors, though they should succeed in accomplishing their purpose, would not only be inconsistent, but to the minds of intelligent men would appear hypocritical, unchristian and absurd, and possibly not very far removed from blasphemy. They want to have the world believe that we, as a people, recognize Almighty God as the great and Holy Being, existing from all eternity, Creator of all things, Ruler of all nations and Judge of all men. I agree with them, this is well. But is this all that is intended by the proposition? Do they want it merely as an advertisement of the theology of this State, to draw the kindest sympathies of the wise and good of all nations towards it? Or is it proposed as a public profession of the faith of the State, as one great perennial and perpetual act of worship—a great and glorious Te Deum Laudamus, which shall ascend constantly and unceasingly to the Throne as the voice of a mighty people, saying: We praise Thee, O God; we acknowledge Thee to be the Lord. All the earth doth worship Thee, the Father everlasting.

If its purpose is to recognize the sovereignty of God, and acknowledge a nation's dependence upon Him, whereby the natural and revealed law are proclaimed supreme, and as a consequence municipal law subordinate, I am with you with all my soul. But let me say to the friends of that great measure, while their cause is just, their labors are herculean, and must be consistent.

It is manifest from some amendments, or propositions offered, that an effort will be made to remove all disability, ostensibly on the ground of religious belief, but in reality to make men eligible for office, and eligible as witnesses and jurors, who have no religious belief at all, and who deny the very existence and being of God, although the Scriptures declare that "the fool only in his heart says there is no God." When this proposition comes up, how will you vote then?

Propositions will be made to exempt men from military service on account of conscienceous scruples against bearing arms, based upon the teachings of the Master whom we profess to follow. When it comes before us, how will you vote then?

And in the proposition now pending, you have before you the great evil of modern society, an evil whose existence is a disgrace to the State and the age, and an insult to the christian sentiment of all the good people of this Commonwealth. You have here and now an opportunity to show your zeal and your faith by your works. Will you stand up and help to fight on the side of the Lord of hosts? Will you help to lead the van in all these States, asserting, by your votes to-day, that marriage is not a civil contract, but an institution existing in the very nature and being of man and his relation to God, and recognized and proclaimed in the revealed law? That husband and wife are one flesh, joined together by God himself, and may not be dissolved for any cause arising after the consummation of the marriage, except for adultery?

If you do all this, you will do all that in this regard is asked or looked for. Your work will be consistent, and you can safely unfurl the doctrines of the preamble at the head of the instrument, and it will be a true emblem of the character of the instrument itself. But if you want to emblazon this great principle of the preamble at the head of the instrument, without caring what the instrument itself shall contain, you will have put yourselves in the position of the skillful painter, who, too, professed that he was master of his profession, and his work gave rise to a story which I shall relate, as it contains a stronger argument for my cause than I can make. In times gone by, when swinging signs were the last and best thing out, a landlord in a thriving town was prevailed upon to have a sign painted, that should, to some extent, indicate the leading trait of his business. And as his was the headquarters for horse drovers, and the place where persons in search of a good horse invariably came, he was easily persuaded to have the noble animal painted on his sign.

The artist who claimed to be master of his profession, went vigorously to work, and in a few days his work was swinging as a sign at the village inn. It was a wonderful picture, painted in the most gorgeous colors, and dazzling in the sunlight like a constellation of diamonds. It soon drew the villagers together, who stood in awe, gazing at the painting. But unable to decide what it was intended to represent, the inquiry became universal, what is it? What is it?

It happened the picture had been painted to fill the imagination of the painter, and was not understood by anybody else, and it became necessary for him to print below the picture, in letters large and brilliant: "This is a horse."

Now if this Convention wants to make terms with the devil in the body of the Constitution, by adopting the licentious and infamous doctrine of marriage, which nature, God and christianity unite in denouncing, then vote against this amendment, which denounces the christian and natural law doctrine, that marriage shall not be annulled except for that foul, unnatural, rope and hell-deserving crime of adultery; and assert, by your votes, that the civil is above the natural and revealed law, and you will have succeeded in painting a picture that does not express the true, christian sentiment of this State, and like the painter, you will be compelled to print in large letters the name of the image which you were expected to paint, but which can't be discovered in any other way. By dedicating it in the preamble to that great and Holy Being in whom the people of this great Commonwealth trust.

If, however, you are in earnest, if this Convention does really represent a christian State, and if the effort to adopt such a preamble is intended to afford a true expression of the faith of the State, then embrace this amendment in the Constitution, and make it possible honestly to use the preamble. We will thereby reflect the will of a vast majority of the people of this State—will make the provisions of the fundamental law consistent with the natural and revealed law as well as with itself.

We will purify society; will remove a stain from our fundamental law; will reflect honor upon the marriage state; will do justice to the pure wives and daughters of the Commonwealth; will assure them that the marriage bond is not a mere rope of sand, which may weaken with failing health and decaying beauty; will reconcile discordant elements in families where love does not reign; will convince the world that it is quite possible and agreeable for some husbands and wives to live together and enjoy all the blessings of a married life, who before could not tolerate one another's presence. But not only this; home will be the dearest place on earth—a perfect paradise for husband, wife and children—in which the wife will pull through love—and Constitutional Conventions will not soon be troubled again by advocates of woman's rights, all having been restored by declaring the true character of the marriage union.

And, inaugurating this great reform, what State more able or more worthy to lead the van than this land of steady and conservative habits founded by the immortal Penn?

We will thereby elevate our wives and daughters; make them feel that husband and wife are not joined together by a mere rope of sand, that may weaken with decaying health and fading beauty. That having become one flesh by marriage they have entered a perpetual union, extensive with the whole life so mysteriously yet truly united and made one, that nought but death or the foul, unnatural, soul-destroying crime of adultery can dissolve it.

Woman will thereby appreciate her true sphere in society; will fill the mission of her being; will realize that she is a queen in the family, and will there rule through love. Strong-minded women will disappear from the stage, and woman's rights, having been restored by conforming the civil to the natural and revealed law, will not trouble a Constitutional Convention again.

And we, as a State, will lead the van in a reformation that no state in the Union can lead better, with more consistency or greater prospect of ultimate success, than this State of steady and conservative habits, founded by the immortal Penn.

The amendment of Mr. Baer was not agreed to.

Mr. T. H. B. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the section, by adding to the end the following: "Provided however, That bills may be passed repealing local or special acts."

I would state that this matter was the subject of consultation in the committee, and it was the general understanding of the committee that this provision would appear in the report, but, by some misunderstanding or other, it did not.

It is evident to anybody, on the simple statement of the matter, that without this provision we would fasten upon the people of the State all the special acts—all the local legislation—that have been passed, because there is scarcely any subject on which you could get the members from all the sections of this State to agree in passing a general repealing act, and as the paragraphs of this section are general in their terms, and provide that no special act shall be passed upon the subjects enumerated, of course one of the effects would be to prevent all special or local repeal. Hence I offer this proviso. It is the general understanding of the Committee on Legislation that it should be adopted.

The question being on the amendment, it was agreed to.

The question recurring on the paragraph, it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the section as amended.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I move a re-consideration of the paragraph, beginning at line twenty-five. I am apprehensive that it may not be understood, and merely desire that it should be. It is that as to "regulating the practice or jurisdiction of courts." I voted in the majority.

The question being upon the motion, it was not agreed to.

Mr. J. M. WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: It would be an advantage to have these paragraphs numbered "first," "second," "third," &c. I propose to add to the first line the words, "upon the following subjects," and then number the paragraphs.

Mr. CORBETT. I submit that that cannot now be done. We have passed that some time.

The CHAIRMAN. Now that the section has been gone through with, in detail by paragraphs, any member can move to amend the section.

Mr. J. M. WETHERILL. If there is any objection, I withdraw my amendment.

The question being upon the section, it was agreed to.

The twelfth section was read as follows:

SECTION 12. No local or special bill shall be passed, unless public notice of the intention to apply therefor shall have been published in the locality where the matter or thing to be affected may be situated; which notice shall be at least sixty days prior to the introduction into the Legislature of such bill, and in the manner to be provided by law. The giving of such notice shall not be waived by any person or interest, and the evidence of such notice having been published, shall be exhibited in the Legislature before such act shall be passed.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following as an amendment:

"No local or special bill shall be passed, unless notice of the intention to apply therefore shall have been published in two newspapers printed nearest to the locality where the matter or thing to be affected may be situated; which notice shall be published at least eight times in each of said newspapers prior to the introduction into the Legislature of such bill. Such publication shall not be waived by any person or interest, and the evidence of such notice having been published in the regular editions of such newspapers as aforesaid, shall be exhibited in the Legislature before such act shall be passed, and shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth."

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman: I have no disposition to debate the amendment, but I think it would be unwise to leave this section as it is reported by the committee. This provides that notice of a bill shall be published in the locality, without providing how that publication is to be made. It is true that a subsequent line of the section provides that notice shall be published in a manner to be provided by law; but I submit that is giving too much power to the Legislature. There is a certain class of gentlemen there known as "roosters," and they will endeavor, in every possible way, to avoid this provision, and any other judicious one that we may adopt.

In addition to that, the section provides that evidence of such notice having been published shall be exhibited in the Legislature, but it is not provided what that evidence shall be, nor what shall be done with it. My idea is that the evidence shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State. Then when the act comes before the House, the fact of publication can be examined properly.

In the locality in which I reside we have had special legislation until we are sick of it. There are a few persons who go to Harrisburg every winter, and before anybody is aware that they have left us, a special bill of some sort is passed. An act was passed in that way two years ago, abolishing our judicial district in two hours. If the provision be inserted in the Constitution that notice of special legislation shall be published in two newspapers nearest the place to be affected, it will cover the objections made by the gentleman from Carbon, (Mr. Lilly,) that there may be no newspaper published in the county.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment:

"No local or special law shall be enacted until after notice thereof, and of the proposed application therefor, (with the name or names of the person or persons intending to make such application) shall have been printed in two newspapers at least six times, the first of which times shall be not less than sixty days prior to the introduction of the bill into the Legislature, which two newspapers shall appear by affidavit, to be made by an applicant for the bill, and filed in the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, to be those published in or most nearly to the locality in which such law may be intended to operate or to apply."

In looking at this section it has struck me, as it has the gentleman from Lycoming, (Mr. Parsons,) that it is crude and incomplete for the purpose it contemplates. The amendment which he has offered to the section is, in many respects, in my judgment, better than the section itself. But, as I heard it read, it did not cover all the ground that I desire to have covered by the section as I would amend it. The section reported by the committee provides that no local or special bill shall be passed, unless public notice be given, and that is the end of it. How notice is to be given it is not stated, except that it is to be provided for by the Legislature.

I see no reason why this Convention should not fix the manner of that notice, and put it beyond doubt. The purpose of this section is a restriction upon the Legislature, and, certainly, it is not reasonable to provide that the Legislature shall be restricted in a manner to be fixed by itself.

I have provided, therefore, by my amendment, that this public notice shall be given in two newspapers, published in the locality to be affected, or two papers most nearly located thereto; and that it shall appear that such notice has been given in the manner suggested by my amendment, I would further provide that an oath, by an applicant for the law, shall be taken, and the affidavit be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, so that it may become a record of the State—filed amongst its archives—and may be there, at any time, found. The section, as reported, provides that the giving of such notice shall not be named by any person or interest.

Now, sir, I cannot understand, and am quite ready to be informed, how this committee supposes that a constitutional provision could be waived. The fact that the Constitution provides that no law shall be passed without a certain prerequisite, it seems to me, is enough to render the waiving of such prerequisite impossible. There is no more reason for putting that provision here than in any other section of the Constitution. We might, with equal propriety, wait until we get to the end of it, and say no part of the Constitution shall be waived. I think if this Constitution is adopted by the people of Pennsylvania, it is not in the power of any person or interest to waive any part of it, and that no law, not passed in conformity with it, can be a good law.

The section then continues: "And the evidence of such notice having been published, shall be exhibited in the Legislature before such act shall be passed." Now, sir, I suppose there can be no possible necessity for that. If an affidavit showing compliance with this section shall be, in every case, filed, as it ought to be, in the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, it will be always there for reference. But to exhibit the evidence in the Legislature cannot serve any good purpose, and is not necessary, because persons applying for an act will always want it passed in such a manner as to assure its validity, and they will not ask its passage in violation of the Constitution, for it would be void and of no avail.

In one other thing my amendment to the amendment differs, both from the section and from the amendment. I would require the parties applying for the law to publish, not only notice thereof and notice of the application, but of the names of the persons who are applying. In a great many instances that would be very valuable information to the people of the locality to be affected by a special law.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to, and the President having resumed the chair, the committee of the whole, by its chairman, (Mr. Armstrong,) reported that it had had under consideration the report of the Committee on Legislation, and had directed him to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Leave was granted the committee to sit again to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. Stanton, at two o'clock and fifty-five minutes P. M. the Convention adjourned.

SIXTY-SIXTH DAY.

FRIDAY, March 14, 1873.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M., the President, Hon. Wm. M. Meredith, in the chair.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SESSIONS OF THE CONVENTION.

Mr. PORTER offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That on and after Monday next the sessions of this Convention shall be held from ten o'clock A. M. to one o'clock P. M., and from three o'clock P. M. until six o'clock P. M., except on Saturday, when only one morning session shall be held.

On the question to proceed to the second reading and consideration of the resolution, a division was called, and it was decided in the negative. Ayes, twenty-eight; noes, forty-six.

Mr. J. M. WETHERILL offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That when the Convention adjourns to-day it will be to meet on Monday next at eleven o'clock A. M.

On the question to proceed to the second reading and consideration of the resolution, the yeas and nays were required by Mr. Mann and Mr. T. H. B. Patterson, and were as follow, viz:

YEAS.

Messrs. Ainey, Armstrong, Baer, Baker, Bannan, Bardsley, Bartholomew, Black, J. S., Bowman, Brodhead, Broomall, Carter, Clark, Cochran, Curtin, Dallas, Davis, Dunning, Elliott, Ellis, Ewing, Hemphill, Hunsicker, Kaine, Lamberton, Lilly, M'Camant, Newlin, Niles, Palmer, H. W., Parsons, Pughe, Rooke, Runk, Sharpe, Simpson, Smith, H. W., Stanton, Stewart, Van Reed, Wetherill, J. M. and Wherry—42.

NAYS.

Messrs. Achenbach, Alricks, Andrews, Baily, (Perry,) Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Beebe, Biddle, Boyd, Campbell, Church, Corbett, Craig, Darlington, De France, Dodd, Edwards, Hall, Hay, Hazzard, Horton, Howard, Lawrence, MacConnell M'

Clean, M'Culloch, Mann, Mantor, Patterson, T. H. B., Porter, Purviance, Sam'l A., Russell, Smith, Wm. H., Struthers, Turrell, Walker, Wetherill, John Price, White, David N., White, J. W. F., Wright and Meredith, President—40.

So the resolution was read a second time.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Addicks, Barclay, Black, Charles A., Brown, Buckalew, Carey, Cassidy, Collins, Corson, Cronmiller, Curry, Cuyler, Fell, Finney, Fulton, Funck, Gibson, Gilpin, Gowen, Green, Guthrie, Hanna, Harvey, Heverin, Knight, Landis, Lear, Littleton, Long, M'Allister, M'Murray, MacVeagh, Metzger, Minor, Mott, Palmer, G. W., Patterson, D. W., Patton, Purman, Purviance, John N., Read, John R., Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, James L., Reynolds, S. H., Ross, Smith, H. G., Temple, White, Harry, Woodward and Worrell—40.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were required by Mr. Joseph Baily and Mr. Corbett, and were as follow, viz:

YEAS.

Messrs. Ainey, Armstrong, Baer, Baker, Bannan, Bardsley, Bartholomew, Black, J. S., Bowman, Brodhead, Broomall, Carter, Clark, Cochran, Curtin, Dallas, Davis, Dunning, Elliott, Ellis, Ewing, Hemphill, Hunsicker, Kaine, Lamberton, Lilly, M'Camant, Newlin, Niles, Palmer, H. W., Parsons, Pughe, Rooke, Runk, Sharpe, Smith, Henry W., Stanton, Stewart, Van Reed, Wetherill, J. M. and Wherry—41.

NAYS.

Messrs. Achenbach, Alricks, Andrews, Baily, (Perry,) Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Beebe, Biddle, Boyd, Campbell, Church, Corbett, Craig, Darlington, De France, Dodd, Edwards, Hay, Hazzard, Horton, Howard, Lawrence, Lear, MacConnell, M'Clean, M'Culloch, Mann, Mantor, Patterson, T. H. B., Porter, Purviance, Samuel A., Russell, Simpson, Smith, Wm. H., Struthers, Turrell, Walker, Wetherill, Jno. Price, White, David N., White, J.

W. F., Wright and Meredith, President—41.

So the resolution was rejected.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Ad-dicks, Barclay, Black, Charles A., Brown, Buckalew, Carey, Cassidy, Collins, Corson, Cronmiller, Curry, Cuyler, Fell, Finney, Fulton, Funck, Gibson, Gilpin, Gowen, Green, Guthrie, Hall, Hanna, Harvey, Heverin, Knight, Landis, Littleton, Long, M'Allister, M'Murray, MacVeagh, Metzger, Minor, Mott, Palmer, G. W., Patterson, D. W., Patton, Purman, Purviance, John N., Read, John R., Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, James L., Reynolds, S. H., Ross, Smith, H. G., Temple, White, Harry, Woodward and Worrell—50.

PRINTING THE DEBATES.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman: I beg leave to ask if the Committee on Printing is prepared to report on the resolution which I offered a few days ago, and which was passed by the Convention, in reference to the publication of the debates in the Philadelphia papers.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I was about to ask leave of the Convention, for the Committee on Printing to sit during the session of the Convention. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATION.

The Convention then, as in committee of the whole, Mr. Armstrong in the chair, proceeded to the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee of the whole is the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas) to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Lycoming (Mr. Parsons) on the twelfth section, and upon this question the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas) had the floor.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say to the committee that the gentleman from Lycoming, (Mr. Parsons,) who offered the amendment to which my proposition was an amendment, and myself, have agreed upon a substitute for the amendment. I therefore withdraw my amendment, in order that he may have an opportunity to present a modification of his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Lycoming (Mr. Parsons.)

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman: I withdraw my amendment, and offer this in lieu of it: "No local or special bill shall be passed, unless notice thereof and of the intention to apply therefor shall have been published in two newspapers published in or nearest to the locality where the matter or thing to be affected may be situated, which notice shall be published at least eight times in each of said newspapers, the first of which shall be no less than sixty days prior to the introduction of such bill into the Legislature. Affidavit of such notice, having been published in the regular editions of such newspapers, shall be exhibited in the Legislature before such act shall be passed, and shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth."

Mr. BARTHOLOMEW. Mr. Chairman: I propose this as an amendment to the amendment, to come in at the end:

"Provided, That the certificate of the Secretary of the Commonwealth shall be conclusive evidence that the publication required by this section has been duly made."

Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to say, in behalf of this amendment to the amendment, that without some such provision as the one which I have offered, after a law has been enacted and approved by the Governor, unless there is something which renders it beyond a doubt a valid enactment, no person would feel safe for one moment, no man could invest money or put his interest into any proposition if it were possible, fifteen or twenty years thereafter, that an act of the assembly could be attacked for want of constitutionality by reason of the fact that the evidence required was not exhibited to the Legislature. That would be a matter that would depend entirely upon the proof, and the character of the proof would necessarily make it subject to destruction and loss. There must be something beyond the mere preserving of the publication, because that is liable to destruction by fire or loss, or a thousand other means.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman: I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Schuylkill (Mr. Bartholomew.)

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I move to strike out "sixty" days, and insert "thirty" days.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I think a little reflection will satisfy the members of the committee that none of these amendments are needed. The Constitution, as it now stands, has a similar provision in relation to charters of banks, and I ask the attention of the committee to its language: "No corporate body shall be hereafter created, renewed or extended with banking and discounting privileges, without six months' previous public notice of the intended application for the same, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law."

Can any gentleman point to any inconvenience, or any doubt, or difficulty that has ever arisen under this provision? The Legislature might, after the adoption of this clause, provide by law for the proper manner of giving notice, and I believe that no company has ever been incorporated under that act, unless the proof of the notice was submitted first to the Legislature and then to the Governor, and several vetoes have been sent in to former Legislatures, and some to the present one, vetoing bills because the notice was not given to the Governor that this provision of the law and the Constitution had been complied with. Now, gentlemen, the committee, in preparing the section under consideration, followed the language of the present Constitution, because no evil had ever resulted from it. It contains precisely the old requirements, that six months' notice shall be given, not only for these corporations, but for all special laws, following the exact language, only making it cover all special legislation. I appeal to you, if the Legislature cannot be trusted to determine the method and kind of notice to be given, what in Heaven's name can it be trusted with? I hope the committee will not put into this section of the Constitution proper and legitimate legislation.

Mr. DALLAS. A single word in reply to the gentleman from Potter (Mr. Mann.) The section of our present Constitution to which the gentleman has referred applies only to banks; nor is its language precisely that of the section now under consideration. This section, as it came from the committee, provides that "no local or special bill shall be passed unless public notice of the intention to apply therefor shall be published in the locality," but it does not say, however, where, or how, or when, or how often such notice is to be published; and there is no reason why we should leave our own work only partially done. There is also a provision that this section, if adopted, shall not be waived by any person or interest whatever; and the amendment that I have offered proposes to omit such proviso, because I have assumed that a constitutional provision cannot be waived, and that we should not suggest or imply that it is possible that it can be done. Those are the only changes which I propose, except some few alterations in language merely, which, I think, if gentlemen will read the section as reported in connection with the amendment as it will be read from the Clerk's desk, they will think it prudent to adopt.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I was not present when this section was adopted in committee, and I have no feeling about it, but the very amendments which have been offered here, and the discussion of them, would satisfy me that it is altogether improper to undertake, in a constitutional provision, to determine the precise manner in which the notice should be given. That is a matter of detail which may require change. It is a matter of detail which is properly and fairly left to the Legislature. It has, I believe, never been abused, and the section as reported by the committee, I think, properly leaves the proof of that notice to the House. As I understand the amendment the proof of notice is simply to be filed with the Secretary of State. An affidavit is to be made. It provides for the evidence which shall be conclusive. I do not know that under that provision the House could go back of the affidavit and inquire whether or not that was correct. I take it that a law fixing the manner of this notice ought to go more into detail than the amendment here offered does.

I think the provision with regard to notice not being waived is a proper one. The section without that might be construed as merely directory. Such interpretations have frequently been given to such provisions in the Constitution; and if there were added to this section a provision that this proof of the publication should be spread upon the Journal of the House, I think it would cover everything that the gentleman proposing the amendment wishes to have in it.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman: I am aware that under the old Constitution there was a proviso requiring that notice of applications of charters for banks should be advertised, and the wording of the old Constitution was that it "shall be advertised in such manner as shall be prescribed by law." Now the object of the amendment that I have offered is to prevent the Legislature from passing such a law as they did after this section of the old Constitution was adopted. They passed a law requiring notice of application for charters of banks to be published in newspapers in Harrisburg. The consequence was that, very few persons taking those papers throughout the State, it was not known when there was an application to be made and the expense went for nothing.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: The gentleman is mistaken. The requirement of the law was that the notice should also be published in the paper where the bank was to be located, so that the people, not only where it was to be located, but all over the State, had notice.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Chairman: I would ask if it is not notorious that banks have been chartered under this provision of the Constitution, and under the law regulating the advertisement, without having been legally advertised.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I answer that I do not believe such a thing exists. It may, but if it does, will the amendment prevent it? All the amendment proposes is to require notice to be published in the newspapers. The present law requires that, and if the one can be evaded the other can be.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Chairman: I am aware, if the gentleman is not, that banks have been incorporated in this Commonwealth under this provision of the Constitution without any notice whatever, either at Harrisburg or at the locality it was to go. It is a fact, and I state it with regret, that charters have been passed by the Legislature without any advertisement, and sold—huckstered about to any who would buy them. Such charters have been passed in our county and in adjoining counties. Now I understand that the Legislature construes that because they provide the manner of advertisement, by statute law, they can set it aside, and ignore it. If we put it in the fundamental law it will be binding upon the Legislature, and they cannot set it aside. I am in favor of passing the section in a positive, certain form, and shall vote for the amendment for that reason.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly.)

Mr. LILLY. My amendment was voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Lycoming (Mr. Parsons.)

Mr. T. H. B. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman: I ask that the section, as amended, be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute for the entire section, which will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 12. No local or special bill shall be passed, unless notice thereof and of the intention to apply therefor shall have been published in two newspapers published in or nearest to the locality where the matter or thing to be affected may be situated, which notice shall be published at least eight times in each of said newspapers, the first of which times shall be not less than sixty days prior to the introduction of such bill into the Legislature. An affidavit of such notice, having been published in the regular editions of such newspapers, shall be exhibited in the Legislature before such act shall be passed, and shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. T. H. B. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman: Before the vote is taken I would like to know whether that word in the substitute is "affected" or "effected."

The CHAIRMAN. The word is "effected." It is evidently intended to be "affected."

The substitute was agreed to, there being on a division, ayes fifty-one, noes twenty.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the section, by inserting after the word "published" the words "with the names of the applicants." I think the members of this Convention are cognizant of the fact that the newspapers of the State are always full of notices containing applications to be made to the Legislature for the charter of certain banks. These notices are published without containing any information as to the locality where the bank is to be situated, and without the names of the parties who are interested in its incorporation. I think that the public ought to know the names of the applicants who desire the charter to be passed by the Legislature; and also whether they are bankrupt men or men who possess sufficient capital to enter into the banking business.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say the amendment now proposed, that the names of the applicants should be published, was included at one time in this section, but upon consideration, however, with some of the friends of the measure, it was ascertained that this suggestion was not approved of by them, because instances might arise by which the Legislature would be imposed upon by the insertion of false and fictitious names in the application. I became convinced by this argument, and subsequently withdrew the words from the section which the gentleman has suggested.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the section, by adding the words "and the enrollment of any law shall be conclusive evidence, in all courts of justice, that such publication has been made." I offer this amendment for the reason that the certificate of the Secretary of the Commonwealth might not be conclusive evidence of the passage of an act ten or twenty years afterwards, if his authority was disputed by the courts.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: The Convention will perceive the difficulty that will be occasioned by the adoption of this amendment. The ordinary mode in constitutions is a provision which requires applications for private bills to be published in the locality from which the application shall come, leaving the Legislature, as in ordinary cases, to pass a statute providing all the machinery necessary for the success of the provision. A provision has already been adopted by the Convention, prescribing what evidence shall be introduced into the House, and into the Senate, of the publication of a notice to introduce these bills, and that evidence is to be the certificate of the Secretary of the Commonwealth. The gentleman who offered the amendment points out a difficulty, and suggests a remedy, but I think all these details are quite improper in the Constitution of the State, and if we undertake to go through every amendment that we propose, and provide the details and machinery for their application in this manner, we shall have a Constitution of the most fearful length, and, presently, we shall find, in practice, that a thousand things we have not foreseen are injuriously affected by our details. I think that we should leave the moulding of general principles, contained in the provisions to the Constitution, to the ordinary legislative power. I regret that the House has adopted any amendment to this report. The committee has provided that public notice shall be given in all the localities of these applications, and I think the details should be left to the Legislature.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I would like to ask the gentleman whether, if the validity of such a charter is disputed, ten or twenty years afterwards the certificate of the Secretary of State will have to be introduced into courts to sustain that charter as evidence that the publication was made?

Mr. BUCKALEW. The gentleman seems to suggest a difficulty in his question that I do not propose to answer off-hand without time for deliberation. I cannot perceive the necessity of incorporating all these details into constitutional provisions. We are engaged in establishing immutable laws, and we do not know where they may strike; whereas if a mistake is made in questions of details in one session of the Legislature it can easily be corrected in the succeeding session.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I merely wish to say that I concur in all that has been said by the gentleman from Columbia, and I trust this section will pass as it has been reported. It gives all the securities that are necessary in regard to the passage of local laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the section, as reported from the committee, is not now before the committee of the whole. It has been amended by the adoption of the substitute of the gentleman from Lycoming, (Mr. Parsons,) which is now open to amendment.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I move to re-consider the vote taken on the substitute.

Mr. BOWMAN. I desire to suggest to the gentleman that his object can be reached when the vote is taken upon the substitute offered in place of this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the substitute has already been adopted, and now takes the place of the section reported by the committee.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: If it is in order, I move to re-consider the vote by which the substitute was adopted. I voted in the majority, and I will just say that I voted for the substitute hesitatingly.

The motion to re-consider was agreed to.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I will state that I voted for the substitute, supposing it would be acceptable to the committee, but from the discussion that has arisen since, and from the various propositions which have been offered to amend it, I am convinced of the impropriety of endeavoring to legislate in the Constitution. I believe myself the section as reported by the committee is sufficient for all purposes, and we had better leave it in that shape.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the section, by striking out the words, "the giving of such notice shall not be waived by any person or interest."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask the members of the committee who reported this article whether there is any objection on the part of anybody to the names of the applicants being published with the notice.

Mr. CORBETT. I answer that I do not think the committee has any objection whatever to the amendment.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I then move to amend the section, by inserting after the word "therefor," in the first sentence, the words "with the names of the applicants." I have endeavored to state before the evils which have arisen, and are constantly arising, in the case of bank charters. A bank charter is applied for without the public knowing in any way the parties who make the application. I remember an instance in which parties made an application for the charter of the bank of Brandywine. Although considerable inquiry was made it was impossible to ascertain where that bank was to be located, whether at the lower or upper end of a stream forty miles in length. The object of the notice, I think, certainly ought to be to convey information as to the parties who make the application for the charter, so that some idea can be formed in regard to where the bank is to be located.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I have found, in conversation with the friends of this section, that it would perhaps be better not to incur the section with the amendment. Of course the committee has no objection to the section being perfected, as far as possible. I presume this is a matter that can be provided for by legislation, and under such restraint as the Legislature may see proper to adopt. I think, therefore, it probably would be better if this matter was left entirely to the Legislature.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. Chairman: I now renew my amendment, to be added at the end of the section, viz: "And the enrollment of any law shall be conclusive evidence in all courts of justice, that such publication has been made." The objection I desire to overcome in offering this amendment is the want of ample evidence of this publication. The fact is that a large number of banks have already been chartered in this State, and, I am credibly informed, without any publication of the notice of the charter having been made. Now if the charters of those banks are attempted to be invalidated, nothing can save their charters from being revoked, because under our present law there is no place to find the necessary evidence. If a charter, passed under this Constitution, is attempted to be invalidated, I ask this Convention where the evidence of the publication of the notice for the charter could be procured? I think the State should certainly do something to protect the stockholders of these corporations, and after the act has been signed by the Speakers of both Houses, and signed by the Governor, I think it very proper that the enrollment of that law should be conclusive evidence of the validity of a charter in the courts of justice hereafter.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: I desire to call the attention of the gentlemen who are in favor of having some provision of this kind, if it is absolutely necessary in the Constitution, to such a modification of the section as this. It will read, if adopted thus, in the following manner: "No local or special bill shall be passed unless upon petition of which public notice shall have been published in the locality where the matter or thing to be affected may be situated, which notice shall be at least sixty days prior to the introduction into the Legislature of such bill, and in the manner to be provided by law, and the fact of such notice shall be conclusively proved by the certificate of the committee which reports the bill, endorsed on the petition."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer that as a substitute for the section?

Mr. J. S. BLACK. I offer it as a substitute.

The substitute was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the section as amended.

The question being taken, the section, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 13. The Speaker of each House shall publicly, in the presence of the House over which he presides, while the same is in session, sign all bills and joint resolutions passed by the Legislature.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I believe the title of "presiding officer of the Senate" has been adopted by the Convention. The word "Speaker" is used in this section, and I therefore move to strike out the word "Speaker" and insert the words "the presiding officer."

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

"The presiding officer of each House shall, in the presence of the House over which he presides, sign all bills and joint resolutions passed by the Legislature, after their titles have been publicly read, immediately before the signing."

I desire to state that the reason I have offered this amendment is if this section is intended to be of any use at all it should require the presiding officer of each House to sign all bills at the time of their publication. I have sat in the Legislature time after time when I have seen the Speaker, with a file of bills before him, busily engaged in signing his name. I think the presiding officers of the Legislature might as well sign bills and joint resolutions in his chamber as to be required to sign them publicly.

Mr. BOWMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he ever heard of a presiding officer of either House signing a bill that had not been duly passed by both Houses?

Mr. LILLY. I do not know such to be the case, but I have heard it said, and I know that charges to this effect have been made, time and time again. I remember one case where the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) endeavored to have a certain bill repealed, because it had been signed by the Speakers of both Houses without going through the legislative body at all. I think if there is any use at all in the section which has been reported by the committee, that the chairman will accept the amendment I have offered.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman: I am surprised at the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Carbon, (Mr. Lilly,) and particularly since he has been a member of the Legislature he certainly ought to know that a suggestion like this can have no other effect than to obstruct public business; and the idea of requiring every bill, after it has been read three times and passed both Houses, to be publicly read during another session of the Legislature, I think is entirely impracticable. Such a provision as this would require a longer session of the Legislature than is deemed necessary by the public.

Mr. LILLY. The gentleman either does not correctly represent or correctly understand this. He does not want the bills read before signature; but the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) will tell you that many a time bills have been so signed that had never been passed.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Over and over again.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: The object of the section is to do away with what has been, in some instances, a flagrant evil in legislation. From time to time gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives, have arisen in their places and complained that some bill which the Governor had signed, and which they understood to have become a law, was never passed by the Legislature, and the consequence is, very frequently, the appointment of a committee of investigation and the delay of legislation. The subject has been a prolific source of scandal upon the Legislature. There is a very important bill upon the statute book—the act preventing railroads from crossing at grades—which, it is said, never passed the Legislature, and I believe myself it never did pass. The object of the present section is to make the act of signing a public act, so that there can be no mistake about it.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) whether such a thing would be possible under the provisions of the report of the Committee on Legislation now, requiring that every vote shall be taken by yeas and nays, before the bill be passed, and that that vote shall be printed in the Journal.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I can hardly imagine that which could not be possible. I am not prepared to say, at a moment's notice, whether it is possible or not; but, it occurs to me, that it might take place. If the gentleman (Mr. Ainey) will reflect a moment, he will discover that the details of a bill are not entered on the Journal—it is only the manner of the passage—and a different bill, perchance, may be presented to the Speaker, and signed, from that which was actually passed. As we propose, the form of expression will be something like this: "The following bills have been presented for signature, and will be signed." That is then done in the presence of the House. I do not imagine it is cumbersome at all, and I think it is wise to attempt to save the Legislature from the scandal which has come from the signing of bills which never passed.

Mr. MACCONNELL. Mr. Chairman: I consider this a very important matter, and I will state my reasons for so thinking. A case involving this principle came within my observation some years ago. An act was presented in the borough of Manchester, authorizing a plank road company to erect a gate on one of the streets of that borough. It was opposed very strongly by the inhabitants of the borough, and when the pamphlet laws came to be published, the act appeared among the acts without the name of the Speaker of the House or the President of the Senate to it, but it had the name of the Governor approving it. We were very well satisfied that it had never been passed, and I am satisfied now that it had never been passed. We contested the right of the company to keep up their gate; it was carried into the court of common pleas; the court decided that the act was valid, although not signed by the President or the Speaker of either House. It was taken to the Supreme Court, and it was there held that it was not necessary to the validity of an act that it should be signed by the Speaker of either House. Now, in that case, I am satisfied, and very many in the neighborhood were satisfied, that it never had passed into a law. I, therefore, believe that it is a matter of great importance to make the validity of a bill depend upon its being signed by the Speaker of each House, and also that the signing should be done in public.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: It is not clear to my mind, I confess, that this section is absolutely necessary, with the previous guards we have been providing; but if the section is necessary, then, I confess, I cannot see the grounds upon which we are to decline to accept the proposition of the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly.) The object certainly is to have the bill signed as a public official act, and if it is intended that the signature of the bill shall be an official act, and done in the presence of the Legislature, surely it is proper to call the attention of the body to the bill that is being signed, by the reading of its title. That is all. It will take but very little time. If, therefore, the section is to be adopted—and certainly, as the committee has fully considered it and reported it, I suppose it will be adopted—then I trust the proposition of the gentleman from Carbon will be adopted also.

The amendment of Mr. Lilly was agreed to.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I move to add at the end of the section the words, "and the fact of signing shall be entered on the Journal."

The amendment was agreed to.

The section, as amended, was then agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 14. The Legislature shall prescribe by law the number, character, duties and compensation of the officers and employees of each House; and no payment shall be made from the State Treasury, or be in any way authorized to any person acting as such officer or employee, except they shall have been elected or appointed in pursuance of law.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, by adding at the end of the section the words, "and shall have actually performed the duty of the position."

The reason why I desire to add that is that there has grown up at Harrisburg a very reprehensible practice. When I was a member, twenty-two years ago, we had but nine employees, and we were well served. Everything that the members desired was done efficiently, and we got along entirely well. That number included the firemen, pasters, folders, sergeant-at-arms, doorkeepers and their assistants. Now, I understand there are between fifty and sixty employees there. Each man of the dominant party who has influence will get some friend appointed. This friend's name is then placed on the roll, and he goes home, and does not present himself again, except, perhaps, once a week, until the end of the session, when he draws his salary.

I desire that no man shall be employed in either House, nor draw pay, who is not needed there. Some members of the Convention with whom I have talked on this subject seem to think it is rather a small thing to put into a Constitution; but the evil is so great that I think a few words in the Constitution would be of great service, as it is very important we should put an end to that practice.

Mr. ALRICKS. Mr. Chairman: The principle objection to the gentleman's amendment is that it is entirely too long. The same end could be accomplished by striking out some words from the earlier portions of the section, and striking out the words "as such," where they occur in the fourth line; and also striking out the words "except they have been," in the fourth and fifth lines, and inserting the words "except to an officer or employee," so as to make the section read, if my amendment is adopted: "The Legislature shall prescribe, by law, the number, character, duties and compensation of the officers and employees of each House; and no payment shall be made from the State Treasury, or be in any way authorized, to any person, except to an acting officer or employee elected or appointed in pursuance of law."

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I accept that.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. Lilly, as modified, it was agreed to.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask what meaning they propose to give to the word "character," in the second line. "The Legislature shall prescribe by law the character of an employee." Of course they shall prescribe the number, the duty and the compensation. Is not that all the law requires, and should not that be sufficient?

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: In answer to that I would say that "the character" of course means the kind of office—it is the designation; it is the name.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: That matter, I suppose, can be corrected hereafter. I confess I do not agree that the character of an officer is necessarily the kind of office he fills. I trust the chairman of the Committee on Legislation will re-consider that dictum. It is very often necessary to distinguish between the kind of office a man fills and the character of the man that fills it. I think it will be well if the chairman would see whether he cannot frame the paragraph so as to cover the point without the use of the word "character."

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: To avoid the possibility of misunderstanding, and as I have no objection to striking out the word "character," I move that it be stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to amend the section by adding, "and have performed the duties of said office."

I do not know whether the section as read covers precisely what is covered by my amendment; but I have personally known of officers having been frequently appointed at Harrisburg, and perhaps discharged some very slight duty, and have never been seen there during the rest of the session; yet they have drawn their full pay.

Mr. ALRICKS. Mr. Chairman: The word "acting" covers that—"an acting officer." He must act in the capacity for which he was paid.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HAZZARD. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, so that it will read, "the Legislature shall prescribe by law the number and kind of offices and the duties and compensation of the officers and employees of each House." The object is that the number and duties of the officers shall be prescribed, and that the duties pertaining to each of these officers and employees should not be distinctly stated. I do not know that anything ought to be put into a Constitution about the character of the officers; but, certainly, the character of the duties ought to be included. I understood a few days ago that there were six door-keepers at Harrisburg. It seems to me that is rather too many.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the section as amended, it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read, as follows:

SECTION 15. All stationery, printing paper and fuel used in the legislative and other departments of government shall be furnished, and the printing, binding and distributing of the laws, Journals, department reports, and all other printing and binding, and the repairing and furnishing the halls and rooms used for the meetings of the Legislature and its committees, shall be performed under contract, to be given to the lowest responsible bidder, below such maximum price, and under such regulations as shall be prescribed by law. No member or officer of any department of the government shall be in any way interested in such contracts; and all such contracts shall be subject to the approval of the Governor, Auditor General and State Treasurer.

The fifteenth section was then agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read, as follows:

"No law shall be passed which shall operate to extend the term of any public officer, nor to increase or diminish his salary or emoluments after his election or appointment."

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: Does the Chairman of the Committee on Legislation think that the words "which shall operate" are desired to apply to the operation of law? Would it not be better to say that "no law shall be passed to extend the term of any officer," &c. The expression, "which shall operate," is a phrase used rather as applied to medicine than to law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Dauphin move an amendment?

Mr. MACVEAGH. I should like to strike out the words, "which shall operate," in the first line, and let it read: "No law shall be passed to extend the term," &c.

Mr. EWING. Certainly the gentleman has not considered that amendment. It no doubt would be interpreted to mean what this does mean—or probably would; but the law may be passed ostensibly for some other purpose, and yet it would incidentally operate to extend the term of office.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Is not that a matter of construction by the courts?

Mr. EWING. Perhaps so.

Mr. MACVEAGH. And if the object of it be put in the title, and it has to be read three times, ought we to put a phrase in about how it should "operate?" It will operate as the courts construe it.

Mr. EWING. But it will apply to any act which would indirectly affect the matter intended to be reached by the section.

Mr. MACVEAGH. You may use the word "operate" if you choose. I do not think it is good English in this connection. Should any constitutional provision furnish a standard of construction for the courts? Is it not clearly a question of judicial construction? When we prohibit the passage of a law for this purpose, we prohibit everything we ought to prohibit.

Mr. EWING. What is the effect of a constitutional amendment passed at the last election? It is an amendment to authorize the people to elect a State Treasurer. Its operation is to extend the term of the State Treasurer. There might be a great many cases of the same kind.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Can you prevent that if the court so construes it, by putting in a clause that it shall not operate in a certain manner.

Mr. EWING. That is not the question. The point is that it shall not indirectly do so.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Do you not effect your purpose when you say that they "shall not pass any law to," &c.?

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Chairman: I would suggest that it would read better if you strike out the words "operate to," and leave the word "shall" in. Make it read: "No law shall be passed which shall extend the term," &c.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I do not know that a further amendment is in order now; but I would suggest that the whole purpose can be effected by striking out more words than anybody has yet suggested. Strike out the words "be passed, which shall operate to," so that it shall read: "No law shall extend the term," &c.

Mr. MACVEAGH. I agree fully with the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Dallas,) but I think the phraseology of the other sections of this report is of such a character as to need that some of these words be left standing to preserve the symmetry of expression.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Dauphin accepts the amendment of the gentleman from Lehigh, (Mr. Ainey,) and the question is on the amendment.

Mr. DUNNING. Mr. Chairman: I move to further amend as follows: To insert after the word "extend," the words "or shorten."

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I ask the gentleman from Luzerne whether it is possible for the Legislature to reduce the term of office after a man is elected and in possession?

Mr. DUNNING. Mr. Chairman: I think it has been done. A law has been passed, for instance, abolishing an office, and men have been legislated out of office.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: How does the precise question before the House now read?

The CLERK: It is proposed to strike out so as to make the section read: "No law shall be passed which shall extend the term of any public officer, nor to increase or diminish his salary or emoluments after his election or appointment."

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I hope the amendment will not prevail. It has been the common practice to get a law passed to simply change the time of holding an election, in order that the term of certain officers might be extended another year. Now, although that would not be a law passed to extend the term of any officer, yet the law would operate to carry the terms of these officers over. If I understand the object of the Committee on Legislation in reporting this section, it was to provide against just such cases as this. Therefore I think the amendment of the gentleman from Dauphin will not be adopted.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I submit that the proper way to reach that end would be to say that no election shall be postponed. That is one thing, and if the fact be as stated by the gentleman from Allegheny, it can be met in that way, but not in any other. I venture to say that the evil will not be reached in the way the gentleman indicates by leaving in the words "operate to." No court can declare an act unconstitutional that is not forbidden, because one of its indirect consequences will be that some man will hold office longer than he otherwise would, if that is not the object of the law. If it is constitutional otherwise, the fact that it permits an increased term of office in one or in a few cases will not make it unconstitutional under this provision. Let us understand this thing. Is there any lawyer now here who holds that if it is constitutional for the Legislature to postpone an election, and one of the incidental consequences of postponing the election a circumstance not mentioned in the bill, and having no necessary relation to its text, is that a certain man will hold a certain office for a year longer than he otherwise would, that the Supreme Court would declare such a law to be unconstitutional, under any such clause as this, that a law shall not be passed to operate to extend the term of any public officer? The way to make that unconstitutional is to say that no special law shall be passed changing the time of elections, and I think that we have done that already.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I desire simply to suggest to the gentleman from Dauphin that he draw his amendment so as to read in this manner, which I think will, in part, cure the difficulties suggested by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard:)

"No law shall extend the term of any public officer, nor increase or diminish his salary or emoluments after his election or appointment."

Mr. DALLAS. That is my suggestion; I was going to move it as an amendment.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: My friend from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas) suggested that, but I think the previous clause is in this form. If not, I will accept that.

Mr. CORBETT. If you strike out the word "to" in the phrase "nor to increase or diminish," it will be all right.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: Very well. I will do that.

Mr. BIDDLE. Will the Chair have the paragraph read as amended?

The CLERK read, as follows:

"No law shall extend the term of any public officer, nor increase or diminish his salary or emoluments after his election or appointment."

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I have no objection to abbreviate any section, so far as I am concerned, and I always receive with great deference any amendments proposed by the gentlemen who have been proposing this. But it occurs to me that the section, as reported, will relieve the courts possible, and the Legislature certainly, from applications in regard to the very difficulty that has been named here and which we are all desirous to avoid. This question was considered carefully by the Committee on Legislation in that regard, and the words, "shall operate to," carefully weighed. I can well imagine how that may be done by indirection, which cannot be done directly. For instance, the charter of a city may be modified, and the effect of it, indirectly, may be to extend the term of an official. The courts and the Legislature may be relieved from difficult applications made to them from time to time, if the words "shall operate to" are left in. That is the reason why it was so worded.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I think that to leave in the words "shall operate to" will make it less specific. I do not see that anything which it is intended to imply by the section, as reported, is not implied in its amended form, and the clause seems to me to be much more precise, as it stands in the amendment of the gentleman from Dauphin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: The amendment which has just been added here, I understand simply was intended to relate to the term of office of any public officer. But the language of the clause makes it also apply to the increase or diminution of his salary or emoluments. I do not apprehend that such was intended, yet it seems to be the inevitable effect. The truth is, a general clause of this kind, universal in its application, that no compensation of anybody shall be increased or diminished, is one of some tenor, and we had better know how it is going to operate before we take final action on it.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: As I understand it, the purpose of this Convention is to abolish fees and perquisites, and to fix salaries for public officers, and I do not think that these salaries ought to be increased or diminished after a man has been elected to an office for a definite term of years.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: Take the case of the office of justice of the peace, an office that lasts five years, and various other offices of high emolument. I suppose, at all events, that the term emoluments had better be stricken out.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend as follows:

To strike out the word "emoluments."

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the section as amended, which will be read:

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 16. No law shall extend the term of any public officer, nor increase or diminish his salary or emoluments after his election or appointment.

The section, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 17. All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose amendments as in other bills.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: Why not use the word "to" instead of "as in other," at the close of the clause. My friend from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas) makes the suggestion, and I think it proper. Is not this a clerical error?

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman will allow me to explain, I find that this is an exact copy of the clause in the Constitution of 1838.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Then I withdraw the suggestion.

The section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 18. The general appropriation bill shall embrace nothing but appropriations for the ordinary expenses of the executive, legislative and judicial departments of the Commonwealth, interest on the public debt, and for common schools; all other appropriations shall be made by separate bill, each embracing but one subject.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I think the word "for," before "common schools," is superfluous, and should be stricken out. I ask that it be done by common consent.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: That would make it read "interest on the common schools."

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I thank the gentleman from Philadelphia. I withdraw my request; I see I was mistaken.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, by striking out the word "common" and inserting the word "public," to make the section harmonious with the report of the Committee on Education.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I accept that to make it agree with the report of the Committee on Education.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the section as amended, which will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 18. The general appropriation bill shall embrace nothing but appropriations for the ordinary expenses of the executive, legislative and judicial departments of the Commonwealth, for interest on the public debt, and for common schools; all other appropriations shall be made by separate bills, each embracing but one subject.

The section as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 19. The general appropriation bill shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor. If he disapprove the bill, or any item or appropriation therein contained, he shall communicate such disapproval, with his reasons therefor, to the House in which the bill originated, who shall enter such reasons at large upon the Journals thereof, and immediately proceed to re-consider such bill, or the separate items thereof disapproved. All items in said bill not so disapproved shall have the force and effect of law. Any item so disapproved shall be void, unless re-passed by two-thirds of each House. And as to such bill, or any item disapproved, the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays, the names of the persons voting yea and nay to be entered on the Journals of each House, according to rules and limitations hereinbefore prescribed as to other bills.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman: I move to strike out the section entirely. It is already provided for in the sixteenth and seventeenth sections of the report of the Committee on the Executive Department, which has been adopted in committee of the whole.

Mr. MANN. That is correct.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I will be glad if the gentleman from Erie (Mr. Bowman) will send the sections he refers to to the desk to be read.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman: The gentleman from Indiana will find the sections on page five of the report of the Committee on Executive Department.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I have not a copy of that report. Let the section be read.

Mr. MANN. I will read them if the committee will allow me.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say that the sections already adopted, as reported from the Committee on Executive Department, cover this case entirely.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Let them be read by the Clerk.

The CLERK read as follows, from the report of the Committee on Executive Department:

SECTION 16. Every bill which shall have passed both Houses shall be presented to the Governor; if he approves he shall sign it, but if he shall not approve, he shall return it with his objections to the House in which it shall have originated, which shall enter the objections at large upon their Journals, and proceed to re-consider it. If, after such re-consideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent with the objection to the other House, by which, likewise, it shall be re-considered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall be a law, but in such cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for or against the bill shall be entered on the Journals of each House respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the Governor within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the General Assembly by their adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall be a law, unless sent back within three days after their next meeting.

SECTION 17. The Governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items of any bills making appropriations of money, embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be the law, and the item or items disapproved shall be void, unless re-passed according to the rules and limitations prescribed for the passage of other bills over the Executive veto.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: It is the last section which supplies this. I have no objection to section nineteen being voted down. The section just read is the same in substance.

The section was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 20. No appropriation shall be made to any charitable or educational institution not under the absolute control of the Commonwealth, except by a vote of three-fourths of all the members elected to each House.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: Before adopting this section I desire to say that I think one of the most beneficent matters of modern legislation has been that which links the charity of the State to the assistant charity of individuals. I think that it is one of the very best uses that can be made of the public money, and as now the English speaking people everywhere are studying the best method of dealing with distress, with pauperism and with misfortune in the different forms in which it afflicts humanity, I submit that it is not wise to limit the Legislature by the terms of this section. Wherever you can secure of the wealth of any man a considerable proportion for really worthy and charitable purposes, I think it is always wise to supplement it with the charity of the State. Therefore the committee of the whole ought to consider this subject carefully, and not adopt this section as matter of form. It appears to me now that the section should be voted down, although I shall be very glad to hear from the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) and others upon it. As at present advised, I would not put any obstacle in the way of the Legislature which would prevent it from meeting the wishes of charitable citizens who come before it, and saying to those who are doing all they can to relieve want, "the State will give you $50,000 or $100,000 to assist in taking care of the orphans, of the destitute, of the insane, of the halt, the lame, the blind, or of any of the forms of suffering in which charity is so urgently needed in all modern societies."

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend as follows: To strike out "three-fourths" and insert "two-thirds."

Mr. MACVEAGH. Why not let a majority do it?

Mr. BARTHOLOMEW. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the amendment, as follows: By adding after the word "except," the words "under the rules and limitations prescribed for the passage of other bills over the Executive veto."

Mr. BARTHOLOMEW. Mr. Chairman: I will simply show the inconsistency of this proposition. Here they say that the Governor shall have the right to veto any particular item of the appropriation bill, but if that appropriation shall be passed by two-thirds of the members of either House then it shall become a law, as other bills that are subject to veto. Then in this section on the appropriation to charitable purposes, or for charitable institutions, they fix the limit at three-fourths. Now I take it that the appropriation that shall be made to a charity will be in the appropriation bill, and therefore will pass under the general rule. Yet if the Governor should veto such an appropriation as that in the general appropriation bill, under that section it would pass by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: It cannot be in the general appropriation bill under the section. The appropriation bill is the subject of a separate section.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I merely wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Schuylkill to a section already passed, which would require an appropriation of that sort to be made a special bill.

Mr. BARTHOLOMEW. Mr. Chairman: I see by section eighteen that my point is not well taken, and I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I submit this amendment as preliminary only to the general question upon this section. If we are to have a limitation at all, it ought to be the usual, ordinary limitation of the two-thirds vote. The Convention will observe that by it the absent members are counted in the negative, in this case, or in the case of all other bills under the provisions of this report, so that the two-thirds limitation is much more stringent under this proposed article of the Constitution than under the existing Constitution. Now, sir, I desire, at all events, to have a change in favor of a two-thirds limitation, if the limitation is to be retained, and then afterward, on the general question of whether such a limitation is to be retained in the Constitution or not, when we come to consider it, I may have something to say.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I hope that three-fourths and two-thirds will both disappear from this section. I know that some of the most meritorious charities in this community, which are very largely supported by private beneficence, receive annually moderate assistance from the State. Amongst others, I enumerate the Deaf and Dumb asylum, the House of Refuge, the Orphan asylum, and institutions of that sort, which are for classes of persons who are in absolutely destitute circumstances, and which classes cannot be increased by charitable aid. You do not make people deaf and dumb, you do not make people blind, by the misapplication of charitable assistance and a community that does not take care of such persons does not deserve the name of a civilized community. Now do not let us throw any impediment in the way of such institutions, obtaining moderate aid from the State, simply because they are not under its absolute control. None of the institutions named by me fall under that category. They are under some State control, but not under its absolute control. There is no fear of money being thrown away in that direction, at least I have never heard it suggested that such appropriations were misused, and there is great danger of doing harm by leaving the section as it is. I hope, therefore, the whole section will be stricken out.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I perfectly agree with what the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) has said on this question. I would not desire the limitation contained in this section retained at three-fourths, but I hope it will be fixed at two-thirds. Such a limitation is necessary to protect the treasury of the State from organized combinations, that under the cover of charity claim large donations of public moneys. It is not only the honestly-deserving association which asks aid from the State, but new-fangled institutions send representatives to Harrisburg to demand relief, and some of these things are got up only to make positions for somebody, and to make a splurge in the world. Nay, I am informed that in some cases—and I believe my information is correct—that out of these very appropriations that the State makes for these charitable purposes, the men who go to Harrisburg to get these laws through, receive ten per cent. of the gross amount, and this business has grown to be a profession. There are persons who go from member to member in the Legislature, and from office to office in the State department—men of polished address and women of culture, who dress elaborately—and solicit for these charities at the time the appropriation bill is before the two Houses of the Legislature. I have no doubt, that in some cases at least, ten per cent. of the sums donated to these charities is kept out of the treasuries in this way. This is an evil we ought to cure, and the two-thirds vote, if it is kept at two-thirds, will be a security that the charity will be bestowed wisely, and that all really necessitous cases will be provided for. But it would be equally proper to ask for aid for our county poor houses as to ask for appropriations for many of the institutions that claim it. We in Carbon county, as in many other counties of the State, pay a poor tax, and we do not ask the State to help us, and while some of these institutions are worthy, others are made to order, for the purpose of receiving public appropriations, and it is to guard against them that the two-thirds vote ought to be left in. I am willing to strike out the three-fourths, but the two-thirds ought to remain to protect the treasury, and protect the people from these organizations that without merit in themselves always have received public appropriations and probably always will.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: What a spectacle would we not present to the world if we would here deny to our Legislature the power to assist the individual charity of this or any other city, or community, with the public money of the State. We all know that these noble charities are to be found in and about the large cities, because of the aggregated wealth and the munificence of those endowing them. It is there that these institutions most ordinarily grow and flourish. But they are not exclusive. Our insane and our deaf and dumb from all parts of the State are admitted to the benefits afforded by these institutions in the cities. It is not alone the locality in which these institutions happen to be that is interested in them. All parts of the State are benefited by them. The people of all parts of the State have admission to them and are interested in their prosperity.

Is there any more noble use to which we can devote a small portion of our public funds than to the aid of these charities to assist in taking care of those, who all acknowledge, we must take care of, and who we must take care of as amply as it is possible for us to do? It would be a crime for us to take a step backward in a direction like this. If we are in danger of having some money misapplied, if we are in danger of giving our charity to some unworthy object, far better is it to err on that side than not to reach out at all a helping hand to those who stand in need of assistance. We had better permit some of the public money to be given in charity, even if it does not go to worthy objects, than to dry up the stream of benevolence which has honored and elevated us as a christian people. It will not do, in my judgment, to say that because a charity is under the control of a religious society, it therefore must not have a share of the public funds.

I belong to no religious society asking aid from the Commonwealth. My Quaker education, fortunately for me, was in a society where we take care of all our own poor, of all our own insane, of our deaf and dumb, and blind. We do not call for the aid of the State in anything. But this is not the case with everybody else, and I am willing that a portion of the public funds in which I am interested, shall be given in aid of those charites, although they may be maintained and controlled by benevolent people of other societies.

Now I am in favor of striking out this whole section and leaving the Legislature in that position where it has always been.

There is no danger of any abuse there is no danger of any money being appropriated improperly to these objects. Guard the treasury against plunderers, but give freely to charity and with a liberal hand.

Mr. W. H. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: I want to say two words on this subject. I think there should be a restriction to this indiscriminate voting of money to charitable institutions.

The gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) has said that he believes it is a business to "lobby" for these bills at Harrisburg, and that the average price is ten per cent. I believe, sir, that the price is more than that. I know of a single instance myself where there was an amount of $8,000 asked on behalf of a charitable institution to be appropriated by the Legislature. It went to a committee of conference, and there the members of the committee were divided, and it became necessary, in order to get that item put through, that the man who was "engineering" for this charitable institution to pay $4,000 to get the appropriation made, and he paid it, as he alleges, and as I believe. The institution knew the money was coming, and as the slang phrase is, they "went back" on this man they had hired. He handed them $4,000, and when they asked him where the rest of the money was, he said he had given it to the members of the committee on conference, and that he did not have it. They said it must be produced, and they sued him for it. It was afterwards paid for him by a request of one who was a friend of his, and also a friend to the institution.

That is only one of probably a number of cases in which that sort of thing has been done.

I believe, for my part, in giving to some—only a few—of these charities. I believe, as was said by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) that it is the system, that is the circumstances connected with the system, that are wrong. It is not the fault of the children that they are born blind and lame, insane and idiotic. There ought to be some restriction—some discrimination. I do not believe the Legislature has a right to tax the people heavily and then give away the money they extorted, without just discrimination. A mere reckless system by which excessive appropriations are made is what should especially be guarded against.

Mr. HAZZARD. Mr. Chairman: In these educational matters I am very much interested. I am somewhat afraid that by this provision we should endanger Pennsylvania in her educational interests. It is well known by every delegate on this floor that these Normal schools are favorite schools of Pennsylvania. They are not under the exclusive control of the State, but they are doing a great work. They are beginning at the very foundation; they are educating the teachers. They are preparing for the education of all the rising generation of this country, and if we pass that section we strike all these down. We have an institution of that kind in our county, which is the pride of the county. We feel its benefits in the proportion of teachers that go out from it into the schools of the Commonwealth. The State of Pennsylvania has liberally contributed to the struggling people of a little borough of not more than three thousand inhabitants, perhaps not so many, that has expended over one hundred thousand dollars, and are building—

Mr. MANN. Let me interrupt the gentleman, to say that the committee do not propose to cut off the appropriation for the Normal schools of the State.

Mr. HAZZARD. I do not know anything about what is to come; I only know what is before us. If it is proposed to except them, I do not know that I have anything further to say.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman: I offer an amendment to the amendment, to insert after the word "Commonwealth," in the second line, these words: "Other than Normal schools established by law, for the professional training of teachers for the public schools of the State."

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I hope the Convention will vote down this entire section. I have heard no good reason given why it should be adopted. If there is any reason in the argument of the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. W. H. Smith,) that because it costs money to secure these appropriations, therefore some of them should not be made, I would ask if it costs a certain sum of money to pass a bill by a bare majority, how much more will it cost to pass that bill by a three-fourths or two-thirds majority? If you look carefully over these charities you will find that to restrict them by such a veto as this is very improper. We appropriate to the charitable institutions of the State about $500,000, annually, and of that amount eighty per cent. will, if gentlemen will examine the matter, be found to be devoted to the clearest and truest objects of charity, a charity broad and comprehensive, a charity which will be of incalculable good to the afflicted throughout the State. It will not do for gentlemen to say that they themselves take care of the poor in their counties. Do they do it? They certainly do not, for instance, take care of the blind, or the deaf and dumb poor as they should be taken care of. They cannot do it. This class of people must, of necessity, be kept and cared for differently from the class that is kept in county poor houses. I hope the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) will, on reflection, see that there is but little force in his own argument in that respect.

In regard to the Soldiers' Orphans' schools, it will cut off some of the appropriation from them, because the State has not absolute control over them. It will cut off, probably, thirty or forty per cent.

of their annual appropriation. Surely it is not desirable to do this. But, sir, do we want a check of a three-fourths majority in this matter? Have we not a sufficient check already? Have we not the Governor as a check? If an excessive or unreasonable appropriation is asked for, will not this power, properly evinced, restrain excessive appropriations? This power is the only check we need or should desire in this matter. Do not let us by an action secure a reputation for being less liberal than heretofore, when all admit that these charities are of the most deserving character. I hope the Convention will not disturb the present status of that question.

MR. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I have a few words to say on this section. The object of the section is one exceedingly valuable and useful to the Commonwealth. Its necessity, or the necessity of a section somewhat like it, has been demonstrated by the experience of the past. The object of the section is to keep the Commonwealth as near to a plain political corporation as possible. For years there has been a conflict between private or local, and general and public charities. No one complains against the reasonable appropriation of the public fund to what are known as the State charities. Among such are the asylums for the insane, located in different parts of the Commonwealth; the asylum for the blind, and the asylum for the deaf and dumb. Nobody in the Legislature or out of it, in this enlightened age, disputes the propriety of these appropriations. A gentleman, who was formerly the Executive of the State, and now occupies a seat in this body, (Mr. Curtin,) sent a message to the Legislature of 1833, in which he expressed, more forcibly than I can do it, the bearings of this question, and from that time forward there has been a conflict between private and public charities. Yet no gentleman who lived in the locality of the blind asylum or the asylum for the deaf and dumb, or the insane, are disturbed on this section, because these institutions are regarded as State charities.

MR. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Whether the Pennsylvania Deaf and Dumb asylum, in the city of Philadelphia, is under the absolute control of the Commonwealth?

MR. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: The intelligent gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. J. Price Wetherill) knows the situation of that as well as, and better, possibly, than I do. I merely say that it is regarded as a public institution, and that no difficulty whatever has been found to exist in relation to getting a two-third vote, or a three-fourths vote, or, indeed, a unanimous vote for its appropriation.

MR. MACVEAGH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) on what grounds he asks this Convention to make it more difficult to pass a law in aid of a charitable purpose, than to pass an ordinary law in aid of an ordinary selfish purpose?

MR. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: The object of the Legislature, the object of the government of Pennsylvania, should be to make our laws uniform, to make the benefits of the government uniform, so that the rich and the poor, the sparsely populated and the more thickly populated sections of the State may have the equal benefit of them. That is the reason why we should have some reform in this respect. What is the situation to-day? The great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania is building institutions for the insane in different parts of the Commonwealth. There is a lunatic asylum established at Harrisburg; a lunatic asylum has been established, at an expense probably of a million of dollars, in the town of Danville; and but the other day the Legislature passed a joint resolution providing for the location of another insane asylum up in the north-western section of the State.

These institutions will be State charities, and under the control of the State. What is the situation of Dixmont to-day? It is a private corporation. The State annually appropriates about $250,000 for it—a large amount—yet, being a private corporation, a lien or judgment creditor can sell out its corporate franchises, and deprive the institution, and the public, and the State, of the benefits of the appropriation. It should not be so. That institution, and others like it, should come under the control of the State.

There is no objection whatever to enlarging the power of the Legislature, in relation to granting aid to the Normal schools, which are part of the common school system of the Commonwealth. I think the time is coming when the State itself should and will take charge of its common school system in every department. Reason and experience have demonstrated the necessity of something of that kind. In the town where the honorable gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) resides, there is a Normal school. Last year the Legislature appropriated $10,000, in addition to the $15,000 which were already appropriated to it. Yet it was and is a private corporation. The institution is about bankrupt, and about to close; the writ of levari facias is now in the hands of the executing officer, and it and the State will lose the benefits of the money already gratuitously given it. The object, then, is to have this and other institutions become exclusively of a public character. They should be absolutely under the control of the State. I have no objection whatever to the amendment in regard to Normal schools, for they are such a character of institutions as should be provided for from the public fund. But, sir, appropriations to them should be made in such a way as to save the rights of the Commonwealth therein. These, sir, are the reasons that induced the committee to report the section as submitted.

MR. HANNA. Mr. Chairman: I have given this subject of appropriation for educational and charitable purposes by legislative and municipal bodies considerable attention, and I have become fully satisfied that the whole system of donating or giving away public money in charity is radically wrong. I am opposed, not only to all union between the church and State, but also between the State and private charities. I maintain, as a principle, that no legislative body—no representative body of the people has the right to give away the public moneys raised by taxation for specific purposes to any charitable purpose whatever. I contend that these bodies have no right to divert the public money raised for one purpose to another. Now, sir, in connection with this subject, I would state to this committee a remark made in the Committee on Legislation by a distinguished member of this Convention. He remarked to me that "one of the most rascally virtues of mankind was generosity with other people's money," and is not that true?

How easy it is for any member of a legislative body on a mere pretence of charity thus to vote away the money belonging to the people, without assuming any direct responsibility. It does not affect him directly, and therefore he can afford to be generous. Now will any gentleman in this Convention say that this system in itself is right and proper? Why, sir, I submit that private charities should depend upon the sympathy and the generosity of private individuals. They are organized for a private and special purpose, and are not controlled by the State at large, and no portion of the money in their possession has been raised from the pockets of the tax-payer to be given to private charities. I therefore submit that no legislative body has the right thus to divert the public money from its proper channel. This subject received very careful consideration, and while the committee was not willing to go, perhaps, as far as I would go in this particular, they have submitted this proposition, and have thrown a safeguard around it, which will protect the Commonwealth. Now, sir, this proposition does not go so far as to say that hereafter no special appropriation, or any gift or donation shall be made, but it provides that no appropriation shall be made to any charitable or educational institutions except by a vote of three-fourths of all the members elected to each House. The chairman of the committee has well remarked if any special subject is brought before the attention of the Legislature, and it is a meritorious one, it will receive the necessary support, and will commend itself sufficiently to the members of that body. Why, sir, let us see to what extent appropriations are carried. Private charitable institutions have frequently been brought to the attention of the Legislature and have procured large appropriations when they have owned extensive and valuable real estate. What do they then do? They ask not only for a donation from the Legislature, but also to be exempt from taxation. In the city of Philadelphia, to-day, real estate belonging to private charitable institutions, whose assessed value amounts to twenty-five or thirty millions of dollars, is thus exempt from municipal taxation. Why should not these institutions pay their quota of the municipal taxation? Why, I say, should they not pay their quota, at least for the police protection of property, and the paving and lighting of the city? Why should they not contribute towards the improvement and prosperity of our city?

It has been well remarked that the very moment these institutions are exempted from paying their proportion of the taxation, an additional burden is at once cast upon the remainder of our tax-payers. Now, sir, I do submit—

Mr. LILLY. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he is in favor of the appropriation for the centennial?

Mr. HANNA. That is a foreign question entirely. I was about to remark, Mr. Chairman, when interrupted by the gentleman, that I fully concur in the section containing, as it does, a certain safeguard which will be thrown around these appropriations, and fully approve the idea that provision should be made for meritorious questions that may be submitted before the Legislature, in order that they may receive proper consideration. I submit, however, that the State of Pennsylvania cannot afford to be charitable and the Legislature ought not to be charitable with other people's money. But, sir, when these cases are brought to our notice that should depend entirely upon private sympathy and charity, the people of the State at large should not be asked to divide the money which has been raised to carry on the business purposes of the Commonwealth for the support and encouragement of these private charitable and educational institutions. Now, sir, I am willing to vote for this section as reported by the committee. If it is thought proper and advisable to alter the qualification or limitation by changing the vote of three-fourths to two-thirds of all the members of each House, I shall entertain no particular objection; but I do insist that while we leave the door open for these appropriations or donations, we should at the same time throw every safeguard around the exercise of this power conferred upon the Legislature, as shall ensure the protection of the people of the Commonwealth in all future time.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: If the Convention is ready to put into the Constitution a provision that all county lines shall remain, from this time forever, as they now are, and determine that there shall be no alteration whatever in changing the county seat, or otherwise, they will vote for this provision, as reported by the committee, because this, certainly and surely, will be the result of the whole thing; but if there is to be no change in population, or in business, and it is desirable or necessary to change the county line, then this provision should be stricken out. I think the world moves, and I hope the Commonwealth moves, and I hope the population of the State will go on increasing, and, I presume, the time will come when we will, probably, have twice as many counties as we have now, to be able to have our courts so arranged as to do the business required by the people.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I desire to enter my most solemn protest against the adoption of this section, as it is reported by the Committee on Legislation. I trust the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania will never depart from that high standard of charity to which she has held hitherto from the very foundation of our government, and I trust that her arms will never be shortened, but that her hands will ever be stretched out to aid the unfortunate, and those who may be deserving of her charity. Gentlemen, in speaking of these appropriations for charitable institutions, have endeavored to make the impression that they are easily obtained from the Legislature. I have had considerable experience in these matters, and I know, Mr. Chairman, that it is one of the most difficult things in the world to procure an appropriation for a charitable institution from the Legislature of Pennsylvania. I can enumerate more than a dozen instances, in which the most worthy institutions have presented their petitions in the halls of the Legislature, year after year, which have been finally rejected, and various communities in the State have suffered in consequence. The gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) has referred to the case of the North-western Insane asylum, and I wish I only had the time to give a history of that institution. For three years have the good people of the community in which it is projected, backed by the best men of the Commonwealth, been asking for an appropriation sufficient to build an institution upon a decent foundation, and they have not been successful to this day.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I would like to ask the gentleman what he means by the North-western Insane asylum.

Mr. WHERRY. I was saying that there has been an application made to the Legislature for a sufficient appropriation for the building of an insane asylum, in the northern part of this State, and it was not yet granted.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I think the gentleman from Cumberland (Mr. Wherry) has misunderstood my remarks. I meant to say that the State was taking charge of all these insane asylums, and had appointed commissioners to locate an insane asylum in the north-west. I do not refer to the one at Erie. It is possibly to be located in Crawford county.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I believe that is the fact so far as the gentleman states it, but the friends of that institution have been for the last three years endeavoring to obtain such an appropriation from the Legislature of our State as would enable them to erect a suitable and commodious building, and to furnish it for the accommodation of patients. In consequence of their inability to obtain that appropriation, the State has been compelled to rent a miserable hovel, in which to confine the insane people of that section of the State. In my own county today, there is a miserable hovel rented by the State, in which a number of our insane population are confined.

Mr. D. N. WHITE. I would like to ask the gentleman where that North-western Insane asylum is situated?

Mr. WHERRY. It is not yet located; as the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) has said.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Is there any such institution at all?

Mr. WHERRY. It is not yet located, but I was remarking that the friends of the institution have been endeavoring to obtain an appropriation from the Legislature for its location and completion, and that they have been entirely unsuccessful. That is all I was saying. Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit again that gentlemen are entirely mistaken if they suppose it is an easy matter to procure these charitable appropriations from the Legislature. I tell you that legislators are not distinguished for their charitable deeds, and they are not a class of men likely to dispense charity. On the contrary they are mostly local politicians who look to their own interests, and their own advancement, who will vote against any appropriation of money for any purpose excepting where their own elections and party interests are advanced thereby. This is notorious, and it must be palpable to every man in this body, who has had any experience whatever in these matters, that it is the most difficult thing in the world to obtain an appropriation for a charitable purpose from the Legislature of this State.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman: I concur in the sentiments entertained by the gentlemen who have advocated the total striking out of this section from the report of the Committee on Legislation. I believe the section is very objectionable, and that it would be a very great reproach to the Convention if we were to determine or fix such a limitation as this to any appropriation of money for charitable purposes. We have all guarded against, as I apprehend, the danger of log-rolling together on this subject, so as to combine influence in favor of any institution which might not possibly be content to stand on its own merits. We have already passed a section which provides that no bill shall contain more than one object, which shall be distinctly stated in its title. Now, when an institution of a charitable nature comes before the Legislature for an appropriation, it must stand there on its own merits. It cannot combine with any other institution, and it cannot receive an appropriation, simply because it deserves it and commends itself to the judgment of the Legislature; and I think when we have fixed such a restriction as this, in itself a wholesome restriction, that we may well submit this question of public charity to the judgment and feelings of the members of the Legislature themselves.

These charities have nothing in them to arouse a feeling of greed, or to excite a selfish or pecuniary disposition in the minds of the members of the Legislature. These institutions do not belong to that class, but they do belong to the class which is supposed as proper and necessary to the due administration of the affairs of this Commonwealth, and the maintenance of its public reputation and character, as any other class. They range themselves right along side of your public school system, and they stand, in fact, upon the same principle, because this Commonwealth has a great necessity in providing for the charitable objects which exist within its bounds as it has in the education of its youth. It has a great necessity in restoring sanity to the insane, and strength to those who are decrepit and broken down in life, and in all the other forms of public charity it has as great a necessity in restoring them to usefulness in the community as it has in educating and bringing up its youth to be useful and beneficial citizens of the State. And, sir, on that ground I submit that this matter of public charity is a matter of public concern, and should be favored and promoted just as much as we would favor and promote the cause of public education. For this reason and others that have been stated by other gentlemen in the Convention, and which I do not desire now to repeat, I hope this section and the amendment will finally be stricken out of the report of the committee, and that we will leave the subject of public charity remain in the hands of the representatives of the people and the Governor of the State.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Chairman: I agree entirely in the remarks that have fallen from the gentleman from York, (Mr. Cochran,) but if I understand the matter correctly, the State has already provided for the promotion of charitable institutions, as far as the judgment of its representatives in the Legislature have deemed necessary. This section, I apprehend, was intended by the committee only to provide for exceptional and extraordinary cases that may arise, and I think when such an appropriation is asked at the hands of the Legislature, its propriety ought to be so apparent, so clear and so unquestionable, that it would commend itself at once to a two-thirds or three-fourths vote of each House. I am in favor of limiting it to three-fourths vote, and I fully concur in the remarks made by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Hanna) on the subject of charitable appropriations. I believe that gentlemen are too often willing to be more liberal with other people's money than with their own, and I think we should hedge around the Legislature in this respect, and adopt tangible and proper limitations for their protection from too frequent importunities in behalf of charities of doubtful character, as well as the State from these raids on its treasury. I am, therefore, in favor of the section as reported by the Committee on Legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) is not germane to the amendment now pending, and it will be held, therefore, that it is not in order at this time. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) striking out "three-fourths" and inserting "two-thirds."

Mr. H. G. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: I do not feel desirous of occupying the time of the committee, but there has been so much said in the Convention during its session respecting the corruption prevailing in the Pennsylvania Legislature that I beg leave to point out what I have discovered, by observation, to be, perhaps, the most fruitful source of corruption in this Commonwealth. I do not believe that the Legislature of Pennsylvania is bought up by the direct use of money as often as some seem to imagine. Instances of notorious and unblushing corruption have undoubtedly occurred, and great evils have sprung from that source, but I say to gentlemen of this Convention that, so far as I have been able to ascertain, greater evils have arisen from combinations made by members from various portions of the Commonwealth for the purpose of carrying out certain designs than from any direct influence of money that has been brought to bear upon the Legislature. This has been the case in regard to almost every species of legislation. You find men in your legislative body actuated by selfish purposes and sectional feelings from which they cannot be expected to free themselves while human nature remains what it is. The members being thus actuated, combinations are formed for the purpose of carrying out sectional and selfish designs, and those who are reaping in the field of public largess are willing to condone in others those offences against the public from which they expect to glean private profit. The influence of such combinations, or conspiracies, for we may properly call them such, has been frequently seen when general appropriation bills have been under consideration. Appropriations for this and that private purpose, for this or that local charity, are proposed. A small body of members favor one provision, a large number favor another, and each is willing to aid the other in depleting the State Treasury. Thus do a number of small rings make up a majority of the Legislature, and thus are improper appropriations of public money frequently made. Gentlemen need not fear that the Legislature will fail to pass any proper bill for the appropriation of public money. Every proper charity will be properly sustained in the future, as it has been in the past.

Mr. WHERRY. I would ask the gentleman if this section does not apply only to educational and charitable institutions? And if it does, I do not think the gentleman has a right to include other institutions.

Mr. H. G. SMITH. My remarks are intended to apply to the system that prevails in the Legislature of the State, and if the gentleman has heard what I said he could not readily have misunderstood me. I am arguing, Mr. Chairman, in favor of the insertion of a section in the Constitution that will strike at the root of one of the evils which this Convention has been assembled to destroy. Combinations, I repeat, are formed in the Legislature of this State, year after year, for the purpose of obtaining appropriations for charitable, educational and other purposes. Every year, when the general appropriation bill comes up for discussion and consideration, the same scene occurs. Small combinations of men, forming, when fully united, a majority of the Legislature, urge the passage of appropriations for charitable institutions in different parts of the Commonwealth, and it has not unfrequently happened that money has been improperly appropriated. It is to prevent this abuse that the pending paragraph has been prepared and presented.

Mr. JOHN M. BAILEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if those poor unfortunates, the deaf and dumb, the blind and halt, are at fault if these combinations are made in the Pennsylvania Legislature?

Mr. H. G. SMITH. Nobody makes any objections to such appropriations, nor ever did, as the gentleman to my right, (Mr. Mann,) who has had very considerable experience in the Legislature, has just remarked. Nor will any man, who fairly represents the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in the Legislature, ever make objections to proper objects of charity. The design of this section, as reported by the committee, is to strike at the root of a great evil that has crept into the legislation of Pennsylvania, the formation of combinations which annually take large sums from the treasury of the State in an improper manner.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows of any instance wherein one dollar of an appropriation made for a charitable purpose has ever been misappropriated?

Mr. H. G. SMITH. If reports be true, if what I have heard upon the floors of the Legislature when the appropriation bill was under consideration was to be credited, and if I understood the legislative proceedings as I witnessed them, there have been great wrongs perpetrated in the manner which I have attempted to describe. In the passage of every general appropriation bill through the Legislature for some years past, these combinations have been formed. If the proposed paragraph is placed in the Constitution, so that appropriations of the character named shall not be passed, except by a vote of three-fourths, or, if you please, two-thirds of all the members of each House, the evil which I have tried to portray will be nearly, if not completely, eradicated. There can be an exception inserted with regard to Normal schools, and properly so, because they are a recognized part of the common school system of the State; but I do hope this Convention will sustain, by a large majority, this wholesome provision, which has been carefully considered by the committee from which it has been reported. In my judgment it is one of the very best paragraphs contained in the report of the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman: I am fully convinced, after mature consideration, that the section reported by the committee, when amended by the substitution of two-thirds for three-fourths of both branches of the Legislature, is required and will be found eminently useful to correct abuses in the past, when a bare majority could make these donations.

I differ entirely from the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. McVeagh) and the gentleman from York (Mr. Cochran) in the general idea they hold or the principle they advocate in regard to the almost indiscriminate charity. They seem to think it is the duty or province of that body to bestow. That is the radically wrong idea I would combat. In my humble judgment I do not think it is the duty of the State to respond so promptly to all these appeals for aid from the various charitable institutions in the State. I do not conceive that this duty comprises any very important part of the functions of the legislative body, in whose power is placed the normal and proper disposition of the funds of the Commonwealth. There are certain great objects of charity, such as the deaf, the dumb and the blind, that appeal to the heart of every man. The State recognizes their unfortunate condition and provides for them with a liberal hand; but there are numberless charities which, perhaps, have but small foundation for soliciting the assistance of public generosity, or, at least aid from the public coffers. The argument of the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) if it was followed out, would lead to continual solicitation by every man in the community, who felt benevolently inclined, to proceed to the Legislature, and ask the State to extend a helping hand to the almost innumerable charitable projects. I think, therefore, this section is wise, as it will have a tendency to lessen the number of these annual appropriations for purposes which may not be, perhaps, strictly meritorious. I do not consider it to be the duty of this Commonwealth to adopt the views entertained by the gentleman from York, (Mr. Cochran,) for I think they would be found in the future as they have been found in the past—a wrong committed against the interests of our citizens.

Mr. MACVEAGH. I would like to ask the gentleman, and I only ask for information, whether he is aware of a single appropriation made by the Legislature for a charitable object that was either misappropriated or that ought not to have been made.

Mr. CARTER. I do not propose to discuss that question, simply because I have no list thereof on hand or memorandum, or anything of that kind before me, but I assume as a fact that there can be no question about it, and no candid intelligent man will deny it. But my main objection is, that the taxes are levied, and treasury kept replenished, for the purpose of defraying the legitimate expenses of the government. There cannot be a greater error than the gentleman from York (Mr. Cochran) that these donations rested on the same grounds as the aid the State gives to the public schools. When the Legislature gives public aid to other than those indicated in the first part of my remarks, the necessity should be made so plain as at once to command a two-thirds vote.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: I hope this whole section will be voted down. It is designed to strike dead the public and private charities of the State. It is alleged that great abuses have crept in under the cloak of obtaining aid for meritorious charities. I hold in my hand the appropriation bill, as reported to the Legislature for the present year, and I find the sum total of all the moneys given by this magnificent Commonwealth for charitable purposes of every nature, including the salaries of the officers, of the officials of the Eastern and Western penitentiaries, and $100,000 each for the Pennsylvania university and Jefferson college, is only $727,000. We spend $7,000,000 to educate the children, and less than one-half a million for the care of the insane and helpless. The charities of Pennsylvania have ever been the pride and boast of her citizens. Few States can exhibit a record so fair and large. I am unwilling to tarnish a reputation gained by a century of giving by any such provision. Until some instance of misappropriation of money, some case of mistaken charity, some allegation of wasted funds is made, it seems cruel to shut the bountiful hand of public alms-giving and forbid the State to extend the mantle of her protection over the weak and helpless. For the sake of the multitudes bereft of the light of reason, of the aged and infirm, smitten in the winter of life with cruel destitution, and the hapless little children, out-cast and shivering on the threshold of a cold and cheerless life, now and here after to become the objects of public and private charity, I beseech you to pause before inserting this forbidding and heartless section.

Mr. HUNSICKER. Mr. Chairman: I think the passage of this section will have a tendency not only to dwarf the character of this Convention, but to degrade the State of Pennsylvania. It is the duty of the counties composing the State to provide for their poor, insane and infirm, and if private charities, prompted by religious and charitable motives, relieve the counties of a portion of that burden, I think it is a worthy object, and one which should be encouraged. Gentlemen grow very economical, and say that it is robbery to vote away the money of the people for charitable purposes. They seem to forget that the Legislature represents the people, and that the people are voting away their own money. They certainly are voting away their own money. The funds which the people of the State contribute under the forms of law, and pay into the public treasury, the people of the State may appropriate, unless you tie their hands by a constitutional provision.

The proudest ornaments of which Pennsylvania boasts are her charitable and educational institutions, and I trust, therefore, that this section and the one that follows it, which is even worse than this, will be voted down, and that this matter will be left to stand as it stood before; and I will add that, in my judgment, the sum of money which has been heretofore appropriated for the support of educational and charitable institutions has been a contemptible sum, considering the wealth and the greatness of this Commonwealth.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman: I am in favor of the purpose of this section as it came from the committee. True, I would not regret the change from the three-fourths to the two-thirds. I think the intention of the section is a proper and benevolent one. No gentleman in or about the city of Philadelphia need fear that an appropriation cannot be obtained for any of her institutions from the State. That has never been denied. It never will be denied. It will be given not only by a two-thirds or a three-fourths, but by an almost unanimous vote. As long back as I can remember such benevolent institutions have been sustained by the Legislature. It is in the human heart to do it. You must make that heart as bad as some gentlemen here think it is before it will refuse to support those institutions.

Mr. Chairman, this section, as I learn—for I am learning as I go along, or am endeavoring to do it—is to guard against improper, injudicious and ill-advised legislation. It is to guard against giving away the public money for sectarian purposes, not to guard against giving to the well established benevolent non-sectarian institutions of the State that the committee had in view in this section. I am for that reason in favor of the section, as it came from the committee, though its purpose might be more clearly expressed. I could not be otherwise. Always, when in the Senate and the House, I voted freely and willingly, and I never heard it contested, that these institutions should not be sustained, and sustained amply up to the requirements.

The gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) in his remarks just now, alluded to the poor of the county of Erie, stating that the insane there were running the streets, shivering and naked. If I understood the gentleman—

Mr. MACVEAGH. I understood that the physicians of the north-western part of the State are now demanding an insane hospital to be built there by the State, on the ground that their insane poor have no refuge, winter nor summer, but are running the streets uncared for.

Mr. WALKER. The physician in the north-western part of the State, or any other part, who communicated that information to the gentleman has communicated a falsehood, clearly and distinctly. I so brand it. For near fifty years I have lived in the city of Erie. Her poor and her insane, her blind and her sick, are as well cared for as they are in this city or in any county in the State.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the gentleman mean to affirm on this floor that application for reception of insane at hospitals have not been denied?

Mr. WALKER. I do not know whether an insane person from the county has or has not been denied at an insane hospital.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Has not the medical society of Erie specially demanded a State Insane hospital?

Mr. WALKER. Unquestionably. That is not what the gentleman said. As I understood it he said that the poor and insane of Erie county were shivering in the streets of Erie, for the want of protection and proper care.

Mr. MACVEAGH. So I am told.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman was told so, he was told an untruth. The insane poor are as well cared for in the county of Erie, as the records of that county will show, as in any other locality of the State. We send them to the asylum at Dixmont; we pay for them there, and our yearly expenditures show that they are well cared for, or, at least, that Erie county pays for good care. I know that we have at Erie a Marine hospital, built at a large expense. I did not know how much until one gentleman mentioned some $200,000. Those $200,000 have been thrown away. We knew it there. It was not because Erie county demanded it. It was not because an institution of that kind was specially wanted there, but because we were then represented in the Legislature by one who cared more for carrying out his own opinions than serving the best interests of his constituents. And, in this instance, it has happened that a friend in Erie made some money and cheap glory out of it, than it has done good to the State or the citizens of Erie.

We, in the north-west know that the State has, in this instance, been imposed upon. We know that it will be imposed upon again if an appropriation is given to that as a benevolent institution. It is to guard against just such villainy as that, to guard against just such injudicious appropriation of money as that, that I will vote for this section now before the committee. I know what I am affirming, when I state that this Marine hospital has proved thus far, and promises to prove, a failure as such hospital. If you turn it into an insane asylum, and put the gentlemen in there who obtained the appropriation for it as a Marine hospital, and then maintain it as an insane asylum, it will be an institution deserving the aid of the State.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I have no objection to accepting the amendment of the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew.)

out "three-fourths," and insert "two-thirds."

The amendment of Mr. Buckalew was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman: I now renew my amendment.

The CLERK read:

Insert after the word "Commonwealth," in the second line, these words: "Other than Normal schools established by law, for the professional training of teachers for the public schools of the State."

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: It is obviously proper that this exception should not be made, if it is the intention of the committee to adopt the section. The State has already aided Normal schools in several portions of the State. It has aided the Normal school at Westchester. We ask nothing more, but there are other Normal schools which ought to be aided.

Mr. HAZZARD. Mr. Chairman: The gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Clark) offered the amendment while I was speaking before, and I was not quite done. I hope the section will now pass with this provision, because Legislatures are very apt to make charitable appropriations in order to carry some other infamous thing, and if we pass this, these charitable measures will be voted for on their own merits, and they will be careful not to encumber their favorite bills for appropriations, by putting it in the general appropriation bill in which these charitable appropriations are made, for that will injure it.

The amendment of Mr. Clark was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the section as amended.

A division was called for, and resulted: Affirmative, fifty-one; negative, thirty-three. So the section as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read:

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman: I offer to amend, by striking out the section and inserting —

The CLERK read:

"No appropriation shall be made for any denominational or sectarian purpose, or to any institution, corporation or association, created and maintained for objects limited or restricted by any particular religious denominational or sectarian views."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman: The section under consideration, it seems to me, goes further than is wise or prudent. It prevents any appropriation to any institution, corporation or association for charitable, educational or benevolent purposes, which is managed or controlled by any religious society. That would prevent the granting of State aid to any hospitals or orphanages, which were originally established and are most largely maintained by religious societies. It seems to be the settled policy of the State to encourage private benevolence, and to grant its aid to private institutions of this kind. And if such is to be the future policy of the Commonwealth, the section under consideration should be somewhat amended. I do not know, for myself, that I would be always in favor of State aid to private charities, or in favor of the State acting as a benevolent society at all; but if this is to be the course of events, then I think it would be well, and that it is necessary, to restrict the power of the Legislature in this matter to some extent; and that the restriction should be substantially that incorporated in this amendment.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I would like to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Legislation to the language of this section as reported. It is written: "No appropriation shall be made to any person." Much depends upon what you may imagine as to its punctuation in determining how it should be construed and understood; but, certainly, it is not intended to provide that no appropriation shall be made to any person. The rightful salaries of State officers, I believe, depend on appropriations, the propriety of which nobody can doubt. But here is a section that might be understood to mean that no appropriation shall be made to any person or community, for any purpose, nor to any denominational institution, corporation, or association, for charitable purposes.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. The whole section, I think, is clear and explains itself, that "no appropriation shall be made for charitable, benevolent or educational purposes to any person, community or any denominational institution."

Mr. ANDREW REED. Mr. Chairman: I do not think there is any necessity for this section. If the committee will turn to section five of the report of the Committee on Education they will find, I think, that it embraces all that is intended to be covered by this, and that has already been passed.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: It does not cover all. With reference to sectarian institutions, the adoption of the fifth section of the report of the Committee on Education does cover that. But there is another class of appropriations that this is designed to strike out, and which are peculiarly private charities. We have made appropriations to communities, to towns destroyed by fire, and this section is intended to strike at such appropriations, to apply the knife to the very core and eradicate such appropriations altogether. Now, for myself individually, I have no objection to any amendment of this section, so that it will reach that object. As to the other portion, that as to sectarian institutions, it is already provided for and adopted by the committee of the whole on the article on education.

Mr. MACCONNELL. Mr. Chairman: I desire to ask the gentleman a question, viz: Whether the committee intended, by this section, to prevent the State from giving pensions to wounded soldiers?

Mr. CORBETT. All that I can say is, that it was not intended to reach any case such as the member proposes, but it was intended to reach the case of appropriations to merely private charities.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, by striking out the word "community." My reason for that is that it is contrary to what the gentleman from Clarion says. I can conceive there can be a fire which may involve everybody in a community in suffering. A conflagration in a city or large town may destroy a large portion of the place, and that during the sitting of the Legislature.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Carbon will permit the Chair. The gentleman offers an amendment to the amendment, to strike out a word which is not in the amendment.

Mr. LILLY. I beg pardon of the Chair. I did not know there was an amendment pending. I ask for its reading.

The CLERK read as follows:

"No appropriation shall be made for any religious denomination or sectarian purpose, or to any institution, corporation or association created or maintained for objects."

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I think that is governed by the article alluded to by the gentleman from Mifflin, (Mr. Andrew Reed,) but I withdraw the amendment I offered.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: At first sight it does not strike the committee of the whole what is the distinction between this and the preceeding section. Now section twenty-one is as follows:

"No appropriation shall be made to any person or community, nor to any denominational or sectarian institution, corporation or association, for charitable, educational or benevolent purposes."

This section is very comprehensive, and the purpose of it is to stop appropriations to sectarian institutions. That is the policy of the committee. Furthermore, the policy has obtained, or the precedent has been established in some instances, of appropriating to communities where there has been destruction by fire. An appropriation was made to the town of Mifflin for $20,000. An appropriation has been made to the town of Somerset of $75,000. I am not complaining of these, nor do I speak of them as abuses. Let them stand upon their own merits. But I do not think, for one, and I believe that this committee will agree with me in that opinion, that the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania should turn itself into an insurance company. These precedents have been established, and if a fire occurs in a rural district or in a town, and an appeal is made to the Legislature for assistance, in view of these precedents how can it be resisted.

Application was made to me once by a gentleman who had a valuable piece of property burned because he had prosecuted certain liquor sellers, and he alleged that, in vindicating the laws of the State, he had been punished by those who had been convicted, and that the State should reimburse him. Well, that was a fair case; certainly quite as fair for reimbursement, or quite as worthy, as the cases of communities which have been relieved when they have suffered loss by fire. The only way to cut these off is by a constitutional provision such as this. I don't intend to reflect upon any body, or to reflect upon any interest; but this policy is unwise, and I think it ought to be restricted by the organic law.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: Would it not relieve the committee of a great deal of embarrassment about the true construction of this section if it should read:

"No appropriation for charitable, educational or benevolent purposes shall be made to any person or community, or to any denominational or sectarian institution or association."

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Dauphin move that as an amendment?

Mr. MACVEAGH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to transposing the words as suggested by the gentleman from Dauphin?

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I will have to interpose an objection at this time, because I do not think the suggestion meets the difficulty.

Mr. HAY. I desire to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Legislation that the differences between the section as reported by that committee and the amendment which I offered, are these, and I will state them very briefly:

In the first place, the amendment offered provides distinctly that no appropriation shall be made for any religious, denominational or sectarian purpose. This is not provided for in the section reported from the committee. I should think there would be no difference of opinion in this Convention upon that subject. That certainly ought to be adopted. The section as reported from the committee provides, further, that no appropriation shall be made to any denominational institution at all, even if its objects be entirely general and undenominational. I take it that a hospital, for instance, which is under the control of, which is maintained and managed by, one religious denomination, such as the Presbyterian hospital, existing, as I understand, in the city of Philadelphia, is a denominational institution, because it was established and is managed and controlled by a particular denomination of christians. Yet its objects are not confined to the Presbyterian denomination at all. Its objects, as are the objects of many other such institutions in this Commonwealth, are as wide as the world. It gives and extends its aid and benefits to all who need them, without regard to their religious belief or their nationality. I think, therefore, that an institution such as that ought not to be excluded from receiving the benefit of State aid, if aid is to be extended by the State to any charities whatever.

Mr. LILLY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Are there any institutions which confine their aid to persons of the one religious belief?

Mr. HAY. There are charitable institutions of various kinds, the sole object of which is the relief of the distresses of persons professing the religious belief of their founders.

Mr. LILLY. Of what sort?

Mr. HAY. There are orphan asylums and homes for aged men and women, for instance. I could mention others.

I think that the State ought to be permitted to help institutions which extend their benefits to all, without regard to religious views, notwithstanding the fact that they may be managed by one religious denomination alone. The difference, therefore, between the amendment and the section as reported is just this: That the amendment does not prohibit the extension of State aid to institutions which may be managed by one religious denomination for the benefit of the public, and whose benefits are not confined to persons of the particular religious views of the founders of the institution. I may also suggest that the amendment does not cover the case of communities which may need or desire State aid on account of conflagrations or any such extensive misfortune. I purposely omitted including any reference to such cases in the amendment, in order, if that question was raised, that it could be voted upon separately; in order that it might be raised distinctly, and voted upon separately upon its own merits. I suggest that if an amendment should be offered to the amendment offered by myself, adding to the end thereof these words, "nor to any person or community for charitable, educational or benevolent purposes," that this object would be secured and a vote could be taken upon the question whether State aid should or should not be extended to charitable institutions, created and maintained for public benefit, without complicating that question with the entirely distinct and different one—whether or not State aid should be permitted to be extended to communities suffering under extensive calamities.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Allegheny move that as an amendment?

Mr. HAY. No, sir.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Would this section cover the case of a town destroyed by a raid of a public enemy?

Mr. BIDDLE. Certainly. It covers every case.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: Then I am against the whole section. Shall it be said that when by the "act of God or the public enemy" the people of a whole community are stripped of homes and property, the hand of State charity shall be closed to them forever? If that be the meaning of this section, I am against it.

A citizen might lose his limbs in the service of the Commonwealth, and this section would prevent the State from appropriating a dollar to his relief. No pension, gratuity, perhaps not even a debt, can be paid when this shall become a part of the Constitution. I submit that it is an unwise and niggardly provision.

What evil has been suffered that is to be remedied by a section like this? Can any gentleman name an instance?

If a conflagration sweeps away a whole village, and impoverishes a whole community, and if the representatives of the people of the State are willing to extend the public bounty, why should they be forbidden the privilege? Who are the persons that compose the Legislature but the chosen representatives of the people, vested with authority over the finances of the State, and whose money is it they vote away but the people's money? And shall not the people, through their representatives, bestow their charities and do what they will with their own?

To appropriate money for the propagation of any particular religion would violate the fundamental principles of our government, and such power I do not ask to have conferred upon the Legislature; but before we paralyze the hand of public charity so that the needs of a suffering people stripped by unavoidable calamity may not be relieved, let us pause and in the name of humanity consider well.

MR. STEWART. I confess, sir, to no little surprise, when, upon reading this section, I discovered it contained the limitation which is now being discussed. I regret that this Committee on Legislation saw fit to make any such report, for I have the profoundest respect for that committee, and I am satisfied in my own judgment that the section, as it stands, does justice neither to its intelligence nor to its liberality. For, sir, why? It proposes to deny to this Commonwealth the high privilege of doing that which, if well done, magnifies and makes honorable. I am at a loss to understand what reasons governed the committee and induced their action. If I were called upon to defend this section as it stands, I would feel myself shut up to one of two theories, either that the State, as a State, has no right to be an almoner, or that our experience in the past has been such as to make us dread the exercise of any such power by the Legislature. In other words, either that it does not comport with our understanding of what a State is for her to distribute charity, or that the exercise of this power has been so abused as to put it beyond human ingenuity properly to regulate it.

Now I submit to this Convention, is either of these considerations worthy of discussion? What delegate will rise in his seat and say that the State of Pennsylvania has no right to be bountiful, no right to be charitable? What public teacher ever proclaimed any such doctrine? What State ever practiced any such doctrine? If such a doctrine has ever been proclaimed or practiced, I know not of it. I speak now from conjecture, and not from research, because I have not had the opportunity to make an examination; but I dare to say that in all the United States there is not a Commonwealth that has a similar provision in her Constitution. I am willing to be corrected. I am speaking, as I said, from conjecture. I have no actual knowledge of the fact, because I have not had the time to make the examination. But if there be any such Commonwealth, it should not be conclusive upon our action here, because we of Pennsylvania regard Pennsylvania as something more than a mere State, as a mere organized government. We are a Commonwealth, not simply a people closed in by certain geographical lines. We are a people united by a common sympathy in a common interest, and have a common political weal, and shall it be said that this Commonwealth must say to any one portion of its people, overshadowed by a terrible calamity, that while she failed to be their protector, she dare not be their benefactor? I utterly repudiate any such doctrine as that. It is inconsistent with the high office of a State not to be charitable.

Now, sir, can it be said that the exercise of this power by the Commonwealth has been abused in times past? Let any delegate rise in his chair and point me to a single instance. The distinguished chairman of this committee, the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Harry White,) has cited two instances in which the benefactions of this Commonwealth have been extended. He has told you of a little town which was almost destroyed by a terrible calamity, and its people made homeless and dependent upon the charities of the world. Was it an abuse of this power in the Legislature to extend a helping hand to that people bowed down with misfortune? Was it an abuse of this power in the Legislature to say to that people, "despair not, but re-build your homes with the bounty of a generous State." He cited another instance, the town of Somerset. The same misfortune befell the people of that village, and was it an abuse of this power for the Legislature to extend a helping hand to that people? I submit that, unless the gentleman can point us to some circumstance in which this power has been abused by the Legislature, this section ought not to be insisted upon as it stands. I repeat, that if I were called upon to defend this section I would feel myself shut up to one of these two theories. Either one, if found to be true, would justify this measure. But I submit here that neither of them can be defended as true in fact, and unless gentlemen can fortify themselves by some undeniable truths like these they ought not to insist upon the adoption of this section by the committee of the whole.

I trust, therefore, that it shall be voted down, or at least that the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Hay) shall be accepted by the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope this section will not be voted down. Instead of that I hope it will be made stronger and clearer. I was not aware, until after I had read it over carefully, of the meaning of the section. At first I could hardly comprehend what the committee had intended, and I hope it will be made clearer, so as to express that this State shall never "loan, or otherwise appropriate, the public money for or on account of any damage caused by the public enemy, or the troops of the United States, in time of war." Nor would I have it construed so that they could not pay pensions on proper application. I have listened to the arguments of the delegate from Franklin (Mr. Stewart.) I have heard these arguments before. I have heard the parallel drawn here between the cases of Chambersburg and Somerset, and in the case of Chambersburg—

Mr. STEWART. The gentleman will pardon me: I made no reference to Chambersburg.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand the gentleman did not name Chambersburg, but the remarks of the gentleman certainly had allusion to Chambersburg, and such communities as suffered by the war.

Mr. STEWART. The gentleman will allow me; they had no such reference whatever.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, perhaps, they had not; I can give them the benefit of it. Perhaps they would not apply to such a case; but I can use them as having some similar application to illustrate my meaning. The gentleman has no objection?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly not; I simply wish that the gentleman shall not misconstrue anything I said.

Mr. HOWARD. Unless he has a patent right for them. Mr. Chairman, this matter has been annually before the Legislature. The people of the Commonwealth never objected to the first half million of dollars that was appropriated for this purpose. They thought, under all the circumstances, that it might be right, as an urgent charity, but they always thought that the proper place to apply was to the national government. In the first place, the State of Pennsylvania, in time of war, is not the military protector of her people, and these damages, caused in time of war, if they are a proper claim, belong to the national government to pay or satisfy. The gentleman has asked the question, whether the Commonwealth, being the protector, should not be the benefactor. The Commonwealth, in time of war, is not the protector in a legal sense. The power that is bound to supply protection is the power to appeal to, in case of injury or damage, either for compensation or benefaction. There can be no question that the damages for which these moneys have been appropriated, from time to time, were caused in time of war, flagrant and public war. I understand that in the case of a riot, or in the case of mere rebellion that is confined to the boundaries of the State, to be a legitimate State affair, and I understand what is the duty of the Commonwealth in such case. I apprehend that the citizens of this Commonwealth, even if it were not a proper claim against the State, would not hesitate to be charitable in a proper case. But, in every instance, these pretended war claims have been presented to the State of Pennsylvania as proper and legitimate claims upon the national government. Whenever an appropriation has been made by the State, the State has made appropriations as though she were buying up these claims. I find in the pamphlet laws of 1871, page 224, where an appropriation was made of three hundred thousand dollars, in certificates payable by the State in five years, with eighteen thousand dollars to pay the first year's interest on them. This provision:

"Upon payment of these certificates, the State shall become the holder of such claims, and the Governor shall demand the payment of the amount heretofore paid, and hereby appropriated to such claims from the general government, and appoint such agents for the purpose of collecting the same as may be deemed necessary."

Now, if any portion of the people of this Commonwealth have got claims against the government of the United States, and we buy them up with the funds of the people of the Commonwealth, we must take our chance of collecting them; that is precisely the transaction that has been going on at Harrisburg from year to year in regard to this class of claims. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am wholly opposed to this. If they have got a legal claim let them present it at Washington. If it is a proper claim for charity let them present it there, because the United States certainly owe protection to the people of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in time of war. They owe protection to every community and to every individual in this Commonwealth, for during that great war the United States claimed and did exercise the entire war power of the whole government. The Commonwealth, as it were, was powerless. She was stripped of her military strength, which was all mustered into the service of the United States.

The United States government is the proper place to look for charity or for compensation. I know that very great corruptions have been connected with these claims. I remember very well, at Harrisburg, in 1870, when an agent of what were called the border raid claims came there, opened up shop in one of the committee rooms of the House, and there undertook to set up his three million bill to make a raid upon the Treasury of the Commonwealth, having first made a contract with all these different persons who pretended to have, or who may have had, these claims. He had a bargain for fifteen or twenty per centum of the amount, and he came to Harrisburg to buy up the representatives of the Commonwealth, and boldly and openly this man took charge of one of the committee rooms. Into that room members was taken one at a time, their names put down, and the amount arranged which they were to receive for voting for these bills.

MR. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask the gentleman whether he raised his voice about the appropriation to Pittsburg after the calamity of 1844?

MR. HOWARD. I remember the occasion, for I was there. If there was an appropriation to Pittsburg, however, I am not aware of it; but if the appropriation was made, it was properly a charity, and it was not caused by the public enemy, and we had no claim upon the United States. If the gentleman (Mr. H. W. Palmer) understood me at all, he will remember that I stated the difference when I started, between the case of Somerset and these claims that grew out of the act of the public enemy.

MR. SHARPE. Will the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) permit me to ask whether, in the case of Pittsburg, the people did not have their policies of insurance to fall back upon?

MR. HOWARD. I am not talking about Pittsburg.

MR. SHARPE. Well, I am.

MR. HOWARD. I know; but, I say, in a case of that kind, the Commonwealth heretofore has afforded relief. I have not objected—I am objecting to this class of claims on another ground.

MR. WHERRY. I would ask the gentleman whether a calamity is any the less a calamity because it is perpetrated by the public enemy?

MR. HOWARD. Well, there are proper places to go for redress for certain calamities. I was making the distinction that this is a class of claims that properly belong to the government of the United States. I was making the further point that there was corruption in the claims to which I referred, for I got a member of the House to go into that committee room, under the idea that he would take part in that game that was being played, to plunder the treasury of the Commonwealth. He ascertained the names of some who were to vote for it, and the prices that were to be paid therefor. And when he came out of the committee room, and the man having the matter in charge asked him if he was not going to sign his name and pledge himself to put that thing through under a suspension of the rules—they would not even print the bill—he said "No; he would take a little time to think over it." This member came immediately to the Senate chamber and told me what had occurred; he was followed into the House of Representatives by another person, and the question was put to him, "Are you dissatisfied with the amount that you are to get? If you want a higher sum for your vote you can have it." "No," he said, "I am not dissatisfied; but I have concluded not to go into the transaction at all."

I have mentioned this merely as one circumstance connected with this business of settling up this class of claims. They are not claims against the Commonwealth. The claims had been gobbled up by the speculators who took them to our treasury to get the money, and leave their certificates for the State of Pennsylvania to collect from the government of the United States, when they knew well that the government of the United States, in all probability, would never recognize them as lawful or legal claims. Let such claims as these go direct to the United States. The United States should be charitable if any charity is due; and if there is no valid legal claim, let them ask of Congress what they are importuning the members of the Pennsylvania Legislature to do for them. We should particularly insist upon this course when we know that these claims have fallen into the hands of the class of men that I have described, if not altogether, at least in a very large measure.

For these reasons I hope that this section, if it is broad enough to cover that class of claims, and drive them out of this State, to Washington city, will be adopted; and if not strong enough to answer that purpose, I hope it will be made stronger.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I offer an amendment to the amendment, as a substitute:

"No appropriation shall be made to any denominational or sectarian institution, corporation or association, nor to any person or community for denominational or sectarian objects."

The twentieth section, which the committee have already agreed to, distinctly applies to charitable and educational institutions, and upon receiving a two-third vote in the Legislature they may have appropriations made in their favor. I suppose it cannot be the intention of the committee who reported this article to make a discrimination in favor of institutions and corporations and against persons. It is said that "a charitable institution may, upon receiving a two-third vote, have an appropriation," and still, in the section now under consideration, they would say that no person shall, with any vote, have an appropriation for a like purpose, namely: An educational or charitable one; and I do not suppose it to be the purpose of the Committee on Legislation to discriminate against individuals and in favor of societies and corporations.

The evil which I would correct by such a provision as that we are now discussing is one and only one, and that is the evil of different religious sects and denominations going to the Legislature for appropriations in aid of their special purposes, and for the advancement of their particular doctrines. It always happens that some one sect acquires an advantage over the rest. My amendment limits the prohibition simply to all denominational or sectarian appropriations, and I think that every good purpose proposed by this section will be met by adopting my proposition.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: Since this debate has taken a somewhat wider range than at first, and especially since the attention of the committee has been called to the proposition to strike out this section altogether, I confess it has interested me, and some of the remarks that have been made on the other side of the Hall seem to me to be worthy of notice. It has been suggested by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Hanna) that the State ought not to appropriate money to charitable, religious and educational objects, because it is the money of the people.

There are several forms of reply to such an observation, but the one that I choose to adopt is this: At this time, in Pennsylvania, most of the revenue of the State comes from the corporations of the State. Our banks, our railroads, our insurance and mining companies, and other corporations, are taxed as no other forms of property have ever been taxed in Pennsylvania, and the aggregate of the corporation taxes is a very large revenue. Now, sir, if you go to any one of these corporations to subscribe to, or assist in building or maintaining a hospital or a home for friendless children, or for any other of these various charities, you will be politely received, and informed that it would be submitted to their board of directors, and when it is submitted to them, my experience has been that they refer it to their lawyer to advise them whether they may appropriate corporate funds in that way; and when the question comes before that lawyer he says to himself: "If I advise this, it will diminish my fees; if I advise against it it will increase my fees," and, sir, the charity never gets the aid from the corporation. I speak what I know, for I have seen it tried, accompanied with the offer to obtain legislative authority for what was asked for.

Now, sir, we live in a State governed by corporations, possessed by them, almost swallowed up by them. How shall we make them contribute to these charities? Not by direct appeal; that cannot be done. Why we will do it through the State. The State can enforce the payment of large taxes into its treasury, and then the State, acting upon a sentiment that is worthy of the State and every individual in it, may appropriate a reasonable amount of these revenues to charitable and religious objects; and thus the money of these corporations, through the treasury of the Commonwealth, is made to contribute to the relief of suffering humanity. If you tell me that the corporation charges this money upon the people again, through its freights or its insurance, so that the people, after all, have to pay it, I answer that I admit that. It is true; but then that is a consequence of our condition. We are governed by corporations. All their profits are derived from the people; but in the great power they possess, and the exclusive control they have over affairs in Pennsylvania, you cannot make them feel for the poor and the suffering; they cannot feel if they would try to, for they have no heart; and they certainly do not try to feel, nor can you make them feel.

When can you make them contribute any essential portion of their wealth unless it is done through the power of the Commonwealth? I ask if it is unreasonable that the State should take some of the money of these corporations and give it to these beneficial institutions? But the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) says that the general government ought to take charge of these matters. I am of the opinion that the general government should keep its hands, as far as possible, off of the domestic affairs of the people. I think, with Fisher Ames, that the State government was a beautiful fabric, but that it was situated on the naked beach, and the Union was the dyke around it to fence out the flood.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to remind the gentleman that I only alluded to that class of claims that grew out of the war.

Mr. WOODWARD. I believe that the government did appropriate something when Chambersburg was destroyed by a common enemy, but I do not know if Chambersburg would not have fared better if she had been left to herself and to State charities. What I wish, however, to meet is this idea of looking to the general government for appropriations for charitable purposes. It was never intended for any such purpose. There is a document that possesses such importance in our country's history that I think I will be pardoned for referring to it, for it lies very much out of the line of reading of many men. I mean the Declaration of Independence. That document undoubtedly contains some absurd recitals in its beginning about the equality of men, but it is full of the most salutary teachings. I have never seen such an excellent definition of a State as is contained in that instrument. After setting forth the reasons that lead to the formation of the government, and declaring that the States composing this unit of government ought to be free and independent, Mr. Jefferson proceeds to define what a free and independent State is, "and that as free and independent States they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract loans, establish commerce and perform all other acts and things which independent States may of right do." "All other things" include christian charities—a declaration that has never been made by any intelligent man in regard to the federal government of this country. That government is one of limited powers, expressly delegated or necessarily implied, and is not empowered to do all other things that free States may do. Pennsylvania has.

Now this visible corporation that we call a State—this essential entity—proposes to contribute out of her treasury, and out of the taxes of corporations, sums of money for the promotion of the charitable institutions of the country. And what does this article in the Constitution propose? To make these appropriations in behalf of any institution that is denominational in its character? Listen to the reading of the section:

"No appropriation shall be made to any person or community, nor to any denominational or sectarian institution, corporation or association, for charitable, educational or benevolent purposes."

This sovereign, free and independent State, which has the right to do all things which other free and independent States may do, is to be tied down, restrained and prevented from doing that which every benevolent man in the State would wish her to do: Contribute to the relief of the sufferings occasioned by calamities that sometimes befall towns and cities, and contribute to the aid of hospitals that relieve the sufferings of our common humanity. Mr. Chairman, this disposition to relieve the sufferings of our fellow-man is one of the distinguishing characteristics of the age, and we sometimes hear it said, in the pulpit and in our fourth of July orations, that the ancients had no hospitals and infirmaries. Now, I think, we do not quite do justice to antiquity by that line of remark, because there was a time when every castle was a hospital, and every monk's cell an infirmary; and under the feudal system there was as much care taken of the tenantry as there was under the slave system in our Constitution. The tenantry, in those days, received instruction and relief, and there were as many benevolent institutions, in proportion to the population, as there are to-day in this country, and in this christian age. I know that the charitable enterprises of this day are undertaken in a more ostentatious manner, and large buildings are erected, and many of our citizens become interested in their welfare. We make loud proclamations of all we are doing in the way of charity. I do not say it is wise, but this is the form in which our charity manifests itself, and, I must confess, that we are not apt to follow the Scriptural teaching, not to let our left hand know what our right hand doeth. We do not conceal our deeds of charity from anybody, but we take pleasure in letting the world know of them. We put up large hospitals, in the most conspicuous places, and surround them with all the ornamentation that is calculated to attract the attention of the stranger or the passer by, and we tell the world what the fact is, and I rejoice the fact is so, that we are a benevolent people, and that we live in a charitable age. Charity is one of the attributes of our nature, and it is better it were dispensed in our way than not at all.

The world has long since passed from the feudal age, and this country has extirpated its slavery, and I am glad of it, and we must now confer our charities on another, though more ostentatious form. I say that this Convention will be very cruel to the people of this great Commonwealth if it does not encourage charitable objects that are educational, benevolent and religious, and the reason is monstrous that all encouragement is to be refused because these institutions are generally founded and built up by denominational influences. Why, Mr. Chairman, of what value is a man in Pennsylvania who does not belong to some denomination? If you subtract the denominational class of our citizens from the population of Pennsylvania, what do you say of the residue? Do they ever build hospitals or encourage charities in the State? I tell you no; the people of Pennsylvania are a denominational and a sectarian people. They all belong to some class of religious belief. Why, even my friend from Chester (Mr. Darlington) belongs to a religious sect, and in fact I believe he claims to be a Quaker, [laughter,] and yet he, too, is a denominational man, and belongs to a sect that is distinguished above others for charities. Would I not trust Presbyterians to dispense charities? Certainly I would; and then there is another denomination that I certainly would trust in dispensing charity, and it is the Episcopalians, to which sect I have been long attached. The Episcopal hospital, of this city, has never, to my knowledge, received one dollar of assistance from the public treasury, and yet it is an invaluable institution. Its doors are always open, and when relief from suffering is sought, it never stops to inquire the religion of a person. It is enough for its officials to know that the sufferer is one of our fellow-men, and that he needs relief, and they relieve him. Shall it be said that Pennsylvania is not a denominational Commonwealth, and that this provision shall be placed in the Constitution, in order that it shall not dispense denominational generosity? I do not believe there is a denomination in the State of Pennsylvania that does not provide some mode for the relief of suffering humanity. I do not know of a church, sect or denomination that ignores these words of our Saviour: "The poor ye have always with you." The church, sect or denomination that has no poor, or neglects its suffering, possesses no religion. That church, you can be sure, has no Christ, because Christ was the friend of the poor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, does this Convention consider what they are asked by the Committee on Legislation to do when they are asking that the Legislature of Pennsylvania shall be denied the power to aid and assist denominational and benevolent charities throughout the State? Why, sir, I would be ashamed to see such a provision in the fundamental law of Pennsylvania. If a certain denominational institution asks an appropriation from the Legislature for a special purpose, and present the objects and necessities of their institution before the members of that body, they will be refused, and the only reason given for the refusal will be that that some benevolent man in that denomination originated this charity, laid its foundation and built a hospital for the care of the sick and the infirm, and therefore for this free and independent State of Pennsylvania, with money in her treasury, extracted from the pockets of the people, will not lend its hand in encouraging and promoting this noble and worthy object.

This is the philosophy of the section which has been reported by the Committee on Legislation. If it rests upon any philosophy whatever, it rests upon the philosophy of denying to aggregated Pennsylvania the right to perform a duty that would be honorable to each and every one of that aggregate. We mean to do in our aggregate capacity that which would be honorable and proper for any of us to do in our individual capacity.

Suppose the chairman of the committee who presented this amendment would patronize a Presbyterian or Quaker hospital. I do not suppose that this section contains anything that denies him that right, but when a unit of the people in this creature that we call a State, although endowed with powers vastly beyond those of all the individuals composing it, proposes to do the same thing, then this fundamental law shall step in and prevent its accomplishment.

Well, sir, if the State does not do it, it will not be done. If the State does not patronize these institutions, they cannot be built and sustained.

The chairman of the committee mentioned the deaf and dumb asylum of this city this morning, in some of the remarks that he made. I have some knowledge of that institution. I have been a very unworthy member of its board for some twenty years, and I know that it is a well-conducted institution, and that the Legislature appropriated only twenty thousand dollars to its support, and the institution educates, upon the State foundation, more boys and girls than those twenty thousand dollars pay for. So the State gets, in the educated mutes of its population, from that institution, more than it renders. It has some endowments beyond this State appropriation, or it could not exist. It has been patronized by denominational men, and I imagine that every man who has given a legacy or contributed to its endowment has been a denominational man of some sort. It has considerable endowments of this kind, which, with the inconsiderable contribution from the State, enables it to educate all the mutes of our State and some from the State of Delaware, and I believe some from the State of New Jersey. It is the most efficient charity of any in our midst. The "blind institution," I believe, is also in the same catalogue, although I have not the same personal knowledge of that that I have of the deaf and dumb.

The gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer) proposed to strike out this section. The gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Stewart,) who made an excellent speech in support of that motion, has given good reasons for striking it out. The gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. Howard,) it seems to me, has offered no satisfactory reason for retaining it, and I confess that I am prepared to vote for striking out this and all similar provisions. My friend from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas) proposed to modify it, but I do not care about the modification. I prefer to strike out the clause entirely. I conceive, sir, the thing is wrong in itself, and that it is, in some sense, while it is not so intended, an insult to all that class of our population who are sectarian, who belong to one or another of the religious denominations. I see no occasion for condemning them. These divisions and schisms in the church are matters and things to be lamented undoubtedly. I think the church greatly weakens herself in the popular estimation by dividing her forces and fighting each other instead of the common enemy. I would that all men were of one mind upon this subject, but I see no prospect of uniting men in their opinions on this or any other subject. We are to have as many minds as we have men, and whilst we have them, and whilst we have these different jarring denominations, all coming, however, to a common point, I certainly would not discourage unity by preventing their contributing to and sustaining common charities. While they dispute about doctrines endlessly, and the longer the war of words is waged the less is learned, yet they agree in this, that the poor shall be cared for, the hungry shall be fed and the naked shall be clothed. Now here is a ground of unity. This constitutional amendment proposes to take away that ground, and leave the denominations to wage this unmitigated warfare with each other. Sir, I have said enough to indicate my reasons for intending to vote for the motion of the gentleman from Luzerne, (Mr. H. W. Palmer,) to strike out this provision from the report of the committee.

MR. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman: It is impossible for us to do without a Legislature. It is the highest and most useful branch of our government, and yet this Convention seems to have been struggling, from the first day of its session down to this day, to abolish that useful branch of our government, through and by which the will of the people is expressed, and the long discussions on the subject of the action of the Legislature on granting corporate powers generally, and the contractions of the powers of that body proposed by this committee, had seemed to me to have gone so far that it was scarcely necessary that this Convention should put a restraint on charities of the State. Until you can form different men for electors, and send an entirely different class of men to the Legislature, and that inspiration from the Almighty taught in the Scriptures, and which every man finds in his heart, will lead the members of the Legislature to do charity, and to do it at the public expense, when it is judicious and proper, notwithstanding what has been said here, of the means by which the State has been induced to do charity through the Legislature, I confess I have some doubt of it.

It is said that in order to get an appropriation of money for a charity from the Legislature, it is necessary to pay money; and yet gentlemen who have had the honor of seats in the Legislature complain here of the presence and importunities of committees. If to pay money is all that is necessary, why do the committees of benevolent women and men importune honorable members of the Legislature in their seats and their homes, for appropriations of the public money? If they pay money for legislation, and if it is true that legislation of such a character can be procured only in that way, they could find men who would take the contract for all the charities in this State, and attend to it professionally and with more certainty of success than the importunate men and women who give their time and energies to such work of benevolence.

I am opposed to the whole section, and approve much that has fallen from the lips of the distinguished and learned delegate from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) upon the subject. There never has been in Pennsylvania a more beautiful charity and a higher justice than that which induces the people of this great State to protect the orphans of the men who have fallen in the war to save the government from destruction, and yet, sir, when the power was given to the Executive, in a single section, to form a plan, as suggested in a message to the Legislature, to educate and nurture the orphans, his plan was to put the child of every man that fell, into a sectarian institution of the same denomination of his father, for the reason that no institutions were in the State for this nurture and education, except sectarian; and I never heard any complaint that that charity was not proper and good. It grew and enlarged until it became a department of the government, and that feature is not yet entirely abandoned. The boys on the streets of this city, now in blue clothes, the children of the men who died that this country might live, are in a sectarian institution, and money is paid by the State in support of the institution they are in. The gentleman had better take care, or he will cut off the Lincoln institute from all appropriation of money.

It is distinctly and clearly a sectarian institution, and it is provided that the children in that school should be raised and nurtured and taught in the Episcopal church, and the Executive, although not an Episcopalian, but a Presbyterian, of the sternest sect, to protect these orphans, gave a full share of the sacred fund to the good men and women who manage this institute; and notwithstanding they propose to instruct the pupils in the Episcopal faith, and he feels none the worse for having done so. But it is said, unless we restrain and restrict the Legislature, they may make an appropriation, such as they made to Somerset or Juniata counties, following the example of an appropriation when a great calamity befell the city of Pittsburg in 1845, the city so ably represented by the eloquent gentleman (Mr. Howard) who makes such serious objections to an appropriation of that character. Since that time various occasions have occurred on which the state has lent a helping hand to relieve the people from great calamities.

MR. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I do not like to be misunderstood. I was speaking only of this other class of appropriations. I gave my entire argument to them. I stated that the appropriation to Somerset was proper.

Mr. CURTIN. I accept the explanation; but the other instance he gives is still worse, the payment of the people of Chambersburg who suffered, and I understand it if such a calamity should occur again, if we adopt this section as it comes from the committee, the Legislature would have no power to do anything to relieve the suffering of those who have lost their property.

During the war the people of Pennsylvania were, from time to time, called to defend the border—this same border—and the wonderful spectacle occurred of thirty-six thousand men appearing at the capital in ten days, in answer to one of such calls, and when the enemy were driven beyond the border, and the people returned to their homes, it was found there was no appropriation of money at Washington out of which they should be paid. The Legislature was not in session, and there seemed to be no means of discharging the just obligation to these men who left their homes to defend the State. The Executive of the State came to this city and assembled the presidents of the banks, and on the mere promise that the Legislature would be asked to refund the money, they gave him six hundred and forty thousand dollars, with which the troops were paid, and it is proper to say, in this connection, that the endorsement of the note by the Executive would have embarrassed him very much if he had been liable personally. When the time arrived, and Congress failed to pay the money, he communicated the fact to the Legislature at ten o'clock in the morning, and at three o'clock in the afternoon he signed a bill unanimously passed by both branches of the Legislature, refunding the money. Prompt action to maintain the honor and good name of our Commonwealth by the Legislature so much abused on this floor.

Now the calamity at Chambersburg presents to my mind the strongest reason why we should put no such feature into our Constitution as this. In the beginning of that terrible conflict we raised in Pennsylvania an army intended for the domestic protection, but the defeat of the armies of the federal government required their presence out of the State, and they were immediately surrendered. At various times during the war, troops were raised in Pennsylvania to protect the border, but were demanded by the national necessity and went forward. In 1864, by an arrangement with the federal authorities, seven regiments were raised in Pennsylvania for border protection. Care was not taken as to the selection of the men; many were older than generally required for military service. Many were not in wealth; some had been in the service and had contracted the diseases which many of our gallant and true men suffered in the south, and not a few had been wounded and discharged as unfit for military service. These seven regiments were all that were necessary for the protection of the State. The rebel armies advanced north in the summer, as we all know, and the seven regiments were called for, for the protection of the Capitol at Washington.

At first it was declined. The battle of Monocacy resulted in a defeat of the army under General Wallace, and the armies of Breckenridge and Ewell approached the national capital, and then it was declared that the presence of these troops from Pennsylvania might be a positive necessity to the safety of the federal capital, and the whole force was sent forward, and three days after they were sent from Pennsylvania; many of them died in defence of Washington. The rebel army burnt Chambersburg; and will any American citizen tell me that it is not proper to relieve these people? Why, in the brilliant record made in that State during that terrible struggle, her fidelity was never more illustrious than in uncovering her own border in order to protect the capital of the nation. In doing that, the beautiful town of Chambersburg was exposed and burnt, and the country around it was ravaged by the enemy. And, houseless and homeless, without food or raiment, cast into the field, where private charity could not reach them, they were succored by the State. Will any man desire to put in the Constitution of the State a section declaring that the people shall be debarred from assisting their fellow-men in such a time of calamity and distress? Go to Washington for charity, the delegate from Allegheny says. That, sir, is the wrong place to go to for charity. They are not your brothers, they are not your friends and kindred, at Washington. They are from all over this vast continent. It is a severe and a close government, at Washington, and it ought to be such, and only give according to national law; all the people of the country ask only the administration of law there. We are a State. Our government is domestic, and our institutions are equally so. Our government should act like an individual or community—like a town, or city or county, under like circumstances. And when you find a part of your people distressed, by such a calamity, when private charity alone cannot succor them, the public treasury must—according to some gentlemen here—be closed against your brother when his property is thus destroyed, not by his own act, but by the public enemy; and destroyed, too, when the State shows its loyalty for the nation, by uncovering its own border to save the nation's capital. My friend from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) was unfortunate in his illustration, and surely this Convention will not deny a member of the Legislature the power of giving the charity of the State on such an occasion.

It is painful, sir, to hear so much said of the Legislature of the State. I am sorry we so defile ourselves by telling all these painful histories of bribery and corruption on all occasions. Is there no honesty left? Can we find men in Pennsylvania who will administer the government faithfully? I have never have had the honor of sitting in the Legislature, but I have been by the side of that department of our government for several years, and I must confess, in the presence of all the evidence as to the corruption of the people sent there, that I do not think it is all reliable. My friend from Potter (Mr. Mann) says fifteen was the number of corrupt men he believed he knew and could name in the House of Representatives. Sir, the men at Harrisburg who would be bribed or corrupted are as well known as their names to the public.

It is not a majority of the Legislature, but an abandoned few. And you must remember that there is the giving and taking of interests; there are the various local laws in the passage of which reciprocal votes are given; there are some members, doubtless, who take money for their votes. But if it be true that the Legislature is as bad as we make it out to be, then what are we to do, for we must have a Legislature? We may sit here for five years; we may put in our Constitution articles, and sections, and amendments to restrain the powers of our government, to limit the action of the Legislature, yet we must trust men. We must have a Legislature, and we must have a Governor, and we must have State officers. We must put men into office. Do what you may, you must have your government administered by men; and in my judgment men are just about as good now as when the Declaration of Independence was promulgated. My experience of life is not that all men are dishonest, but, on the contrary, that very few of them cannot be trusted, compared with the vast multitude now in our country. There are more people in our country now than there were at the period when gentlemen claim so much virtue, and I suppose there are, therefore, more corrupt men. But, today, in all trades and occupations, you find the majority of men whose word is as good as their bond. Unfortunately, however, many of the men who are not of that character, if it be conceded that what is said here is true, and I accept the declaration of gentlemen who must know more about it than I do, many of these men get into office.

I am very thankful to know that there is a different class of men in this Convention however. I am exceedingly glad to find that this Convention is without taint.

I speak in all seriousness when I say that no body of men ever assembled in Pennsylvania who had to sustain them, a stronger, a better defined, and a larger measure of public confidence than this Convention, and the people of Pennsylvania are looking forward to judicious and prudent reforms in our organic law. If we make these reforms wisely, honestly, and fairly, depend upon it they will be accepted by the people. I do not think that the good people of Pennsylvania desire that we should put a section in our organic law in restraint of charity; and certainly not for the reasons given here by the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. Howard,) and some others who have advocated it.

Mr. HUNSICKER. Mr. Chairman: I am satisfied that this most proscriptive and intolerant section will not be able to stand the test of discussion. I have very little to add to the analyses of the section so well made by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) and the gentleman from Centre, (Mr. Curtin,) because they have ably exposed its faults, and have completely demonstrated that it would be, as I have already said, dwarfing the proportions of this Convention, and it would be dwarfing the Constitution of the State of Pennsylvania to place in the fundamental law a provision that, in effect, means that so soon as a charity is instituted by a church it becomes connected with something wicked, and is no longer worthy of the charitable aid of the State. The section that we have just adopted allows the Legislature to appropriate to charitable and educational institutions. An educational or charitable institution, not under the sanction or direction of a religious institution, can receive charitable aid from the State; but the moment a charitable association becomes fostered or encouraged, or is upheld and maintained by people who worship God in conformity with a creed, and according to the dictates of their own consciences, then the arms of the Legislature are tied, and when these charities call for aid they are told, "we cannot aid you because you worship God in a particular way."

I do think, sir, that the proposition is monstrous. There is a want of conscience in it. Let me go a little farther. If this Convention cannot be reached by an appeal to its conscience, let me appeal to its fear. As the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) so well said, strike out from the population of Pennsylvania those who belong to churches, and what portion of the population have you left. Array, if you please, the denominations and the sects against the work of this body, and what becomes of it? It will be buried so deep by an indignant people that it can never be resurrected. It will never be ratified by the people of Pennsylvania.

I have been quite surprised to hear the arguments of the gentlemen who favor this section. I have not yet heard a single word, or line, or sentence, in favor of it, which has any convincing force whatever. Why such a proscriptive and intolerant section as this should have been reported I am at a loss to conceive. We are accustomed to being scared by stories of the corruption that exists, or existed, at Harrisburg. But you have "bottled up" the Legislature already. You have tied them hand and foot. Do you propose to adopt here a code of laws that shall last until the end of time, or do you propose simply to erect a frame-work of government? Why cannot the Legislature be trusted as well with the work of aiding the charities of the State, as they can be with the making of the laws which regulate the manner and mode by which you shall enjoy your liberty and your property?

I do submit that this section is wholly unnecessary, and that if there have been any abuses in times past in the disposition of public funds the difficulty can be corrected by an appeal to the people. The Legislature represents the people. It comes fresh from the people. If the people make any complaint and elect representatives upon that issue they will vote as the people desire them to do. Let me ask gentlemen who have had more experience than myself where has there been a candidate for either branch of the State Legislature who has run upon the issue that there should be no appropriation to a charity or sectarian institution for charitable purposes? Where has there been a man who has been opposed because he would aid Somerset or Chambersburg? Has there ever been such a case? Not to my knowledge certainly. I trust the good sense of this Convention will prevail, and that the hateful section will be voted down.

MR. EWING. Mr. Chairman: For one I have been very much entertained by a considerable portion of the discussion, and by some of the speeches of the learned gentleman, and also very much gratified with some of them. I am exceedingly glad that the distinguished gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) has got to examining the Declaration of Independence. There are some excellent truths in it; though how he deems the doctrine of sectarian charity from the definition of a State contained in that declaration, I was unable to see. I was also very much entertained and gratified with the eloquent speech made by the distinguished gentleman from Centre, (Mr. Curtin,) who gave us an account of the war and the payment of the troops, and all that sort of thing. It is good history and it is entertaining, and there are certain gentlemen who are entitled to a great deal of credit for the part they took in those transactions, but what these things had to do, or in what way they bear on the section under discussion I have been unable to see. I was also gratified to learn from the distinguished gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) that so large a portion of the people of this Commonwealth were religious people—denominational people, and really, if I had not examined the section and known what it meant, I should have thought it was an attack upon the churches of this State and the church-going people.

I do not so understand it. Now, charity is a noble thing—a grand thing, and it is a most magnificent subject to talk about. It is a wonderful easy thing to go round and get subscriptions from others for a charitable purpose, if you do not have to subscribe for it yourself. Most of us have seen a little of that. It is a very grand and an equally easy thing to vote away other people's money. Now for one, I think I feel just as charitably disposed as any of the gentlemen here, under circumstances of that sort.

Mr. STEWART. How does the gentleman apply that to legislative action? He says it is a very easy matter to be charitable with other people's money.

Mr. EWING. If the gentleman will wait he will hear about it. This section is not aimed at the charities of the State at all. I do not see how the question of the State being charitable comes up here at all. The question here is, what is the proper direction to give to the charities of the State. Who are the proper objects to receive the charities of the State, and who should be the almoners of the State. This section may fairly be divided into two portions. There is one that refers to the charitable donations of the State, to particular communities that may fairly and properly be separated from the balance of the section.

I do not propose to discuss at any length the subject of the State appropriations to communities or persons, and on which there have been some magnificent speeches made. I have to say, for one, that, notwithstanding the denunciation of all who are so uncharitable as to think that the State should not vote money to communities for these purposes, I think that the appropriations spoken of here—I refer to Chambersburg, and Somerset, and Pittsburg—if it got an appropriation—were improper, and did not fall within the line of the legitimate business of the State.

But there has been a great deal said here with regard to the denominational question, and I have no doubt as to the meaning of this section as reported by the committee upon that point. It means precisely this, that the Presbyterian hospital that my friend from Allegheny (Mr. Hay) talks about, is just the thing that should not have an appropriation from the State, nor the Episcopal hospital, if there be such a one. I do not think that the Presbyterian hospital is asking for an appropriation from the State, nor is it likely to ask for one. The gentleman tells us that the Presbyterian hospital and the Episcopal hospital are open to all the world. I presume that if some sick, lame or diseased person, with proper recommendation, should come to one of those hospitals they would not turn him out simply because he happened not to be a Presbyterian or an Episcopalian as the case may be, but does not every man, woman and child know that the Presbyterian hospital is for Presbyterians alone? ["No!"] Do they not know that the Episcopal hospital is for Episcopalians? ["No! No!"]

True it may give its charities to others, but that is what it is intended, what we all mean by it, it is for denominational effect. It is no more a public charity than are the contributions made in a particular church to build a mission church, or to support the poor. I am a denominational man. I belong to a denomination myself, and believe in it.

Mr. AINEY. Does the gentleman understand that the purpose of this section is to prevent any discrimination or preference being given to any religious or denominational institution?

Mr. EWING. Yes, sir.

Mr. AINEY. Then I would ask the gentleman whether that is not sufficiently provided for in the bill of rights in section three: "No preference shall ever be given by law to any religious form or mode of worship."

Mr. EWING. If he means it in that limited sense, that is not the object of this section. They talk in this amendment offered about refusing appropriations to churches and other societies for denominational purposes. I see no use in that—it don't strike at the way the thing is done. I cannot see any reason for a denominational institution of charity or of education, unless to support the poor of its own church, or to extend the church. If it is for the general public why not make it a public charity? Why cannot Episcopalians, and Presbyterians, and Methodists, and Catholics and those who are not such join and erect a common hospital? That would be free from the objection of sectarian; but just because our people are divided into denominations you cannot make an appropriation to charitable institutions that are strictly denominational without giving preference to one over the other.

But we are warned that the limitation contained in this section is unpopular. This proposition is one instead of being unpopular would be rather popular in the State. I am not afraid of the people voting against that, as the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Hunsicker) is.

I do not think the people approve of appropriations to strictly denominational institutions, whether they be charitable or educational; and if, as the learned and honorable gentleman from Centre (Mr. Curtin) says, that it would cut off the appropriation from the Lincoln hospital, which, he says, is a denominational institution, if it be such, and provides that all its pupils shall be brought up and educated in the Episcopalian faith, as he says it is, I think the appropriation ought to be cut off from it.

Mr. BARTHOLOMEW. Will the gentleman give way until I make a motion for the committee to rise at this time?

Mr. EWING. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLOMEW. Mr. Chairman: I then move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President: The committee of the whole have again had under consideration the report of the Committee on Legislation, and have instructed me to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Leave was granted to the committee to sit again to-morrow.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, MINING, MANUFACTURES AND COMMERCE.

Mr. FINNEY. Mr. President: I ask unanimous consent of this Convention to present a report from the Committee on Agriculture, Manufacture, Mining and Commerce. I would like to have it read, as it is very short.

Unanimous consent being granted, the Clerk read:

SECTION 1. In the absence of special contracts the legal rate of interest and discount shall be seven per centum per annum, but special contracts for higher or lower rates shall be lawful; all national and other banks of issue shall be restricted to the rate of seven per centum per annum.

SECTION 2. The Legislature may provide for the establishment of mining schools, to be located in the coal regions of Pennsylvania, for free instruction in mining and the mechanic arts and sciences.

SECTION 3. No combinations of employers or employed, to enable the one to control the business operations of the other, combinations to maintain arbitrary prices for manufactures, merchandise or the products of labor of any description, or for labor itself (including professional services) shall be allowed; nor shall any combinations of individuals, associations or corporations, to obstruct the free course of trade, or to make or maintain arbitrary rates for freight or passage on rivers, railways or canals, be permitted, and the Legislature shall pass laws to prevent and punish such combinations.

SECTION 4. The Legislature shall provide by law for such appliances and regulations in mines, manufactories and workshops, and in the erection of buildings, as may be necessary to protect the health, and secure the safety of the operatives, and shall by law regulate, and may prohibit, the employment of children under the age of ten years in mines and manufactories.

SECTION 5. The Legislature shall regulate by law the manufacture and sale of carbon oil, so as to insure the safety of life in its use for light.

SECTION 6. The Legislature shall provide by law for an equitable assessment of benefits in favor of mine owners and operators whenever, by works and expenditures in mines, draining or tunneling, they produce results which inure, directly or indirectly, to the benefit and advantage of any contiguous or adjoining mines.

Said article was read the first time and laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT. This article has been read the first time. It will be laid upon the table and printed.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. CORSON, by unanimous consent, presented a petition from citizens of Montgomery county, in favor of the prohibition of the manufacture and the sale of intoxicating liquors, which was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: At the request of several friends about me, I move that when the Convention adjourns to-day it will adjourn to meet on Monday next at ten o'clock.

Mr. CORBETT. I make the point of order that that has been passed upon.

Mr. KAINE. No, the resolution passed this morning was to meet at eleven o'clock, not ten.

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order to make that motion at this time.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President: I move the Convention do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

So the Convention, at two o'clock and fifty-seven minutes, adjourned.

SIXTY-SEVENTH DAY.

SATURDAY, March 15, 1873.

The PRESIDENT called the Convention to order at ten o'clock, and announced that there was not a quorum of members present.

Mr. WORRELL. Mr. President: I move that the roll be called.

The PRESIDENT. The Clerk will call the roll for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not there is a quorum present.

The roll being called, the following named members answered to their names:

PRESENT.—Messrs. Achenbach, Alricks, Andrews, Armstrong, Baer, Baily, (Perry,) Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Baker, Barclay, Bartholomew, Biddle, Bowman, Brodhead, Campbell, Carter, Corbett, Craig, Curtin, Dallas, Darlington, Davis, De France, Dodd, Ellis, Ewing, Guthrie, Hanna, Hay, Horten, Kaine, Knight, Landis, Lawrence, MacConnell, M'Clellan, M'Culloch, Mann, Mantor, Mott, Newlin, Parsons, Porter, Purviance, Sam'l A., Russell, Sharpe, Smith, Wm. H., Stewart, Struthers, Turrell, Walker, Wetherill, John Price, Wherry, White, David N., White, J. W. F., Worrell and Meredith, President—57.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Addicks, Ainey, Bannan, Bardsley, Beebe, Black, Charles A., Black, J. S., Boyd, Broomall, Brown, Buckalew, Carey, Cassidy, Church, Clark, Cochran, Collins, Corson, Cronmiller, Curry, Cuyler, Dunning, Edwards, Elliott, Fell, Finney, Fulton, Funck, Gibson, Gilpin, Gowen, Green, Hall, Harvey, Hazzard, Hemphill, Heverin, Howard, Hunsicker, Lamberton, Lear, Lilly, Littleton, Long, M'Allister, M'Camant, M'Murray, MacVeagh, Metzger, Minor, Niles, Palmer, G. W., Palmer, H. W., Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Patton, Pughe, Purman, Purviance, John N., Read, John R., Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, James L., Reynolds, S. H., Rooke, Ross, Runk, Simpson, Smith, H. G., Smith, Henry W., Stanton, Temple, Van Reed, Wetherill, J. M. White, Harry, Woodward and Wright—75.

Mr. BARTHOLOMEW. Mr. Chairman: I move that the Convention now adjourns until Monday at ten o'clock.

The yeas and nays were required by Mr. Darlington and Mr. Dallas, and were as follow, viz:

Y E A S .

Messrs. Bartholomew, Carter, Curtin, Ellis, Ewing, Hanna, Kaine, Landis, Parsons, Porter, Struthers and Worrell—12.

N A Y S .

Messrs. Achenbach, Addicks, Alricks, Andrews, Armstrong, Baer, Baily, (Perry,) Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Baker, Barclay, Beebe, Biddle, Bowman, Boyd, Brodhead, Campbell, Corbett, Craig, Dallas, Darlington, Davis, De France, Dodd, Guthrie, Hay, Horton, Howard, Knight, Lawrence, MacConnell, M'Clellan, M'Culloch, Mann, Mantor, Minor, Mott, Newlin, Purviance, Samuel A., Russell, Sharpe, Smith, H. G., Smith, Wm. H., Stanton, Stewart, Temple, Turrell, Walker, Wetherill, Jno. Price, Wherry, White, David N., White, Harry, White, J. W. F. and Meredith, President—52.

So the motion was determined in the negative.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Ainey, Bannan, Bardsley, Black, Charles A., Black, J. S., Broomall, Brown, Buckalew, Carey, Cassidy, Church, Clark, Cochran, Collins, Corson, Cronmiller, Curry, Cuyler, Dunning, Edwards, Elliott, Fell, Finney, Fulton, Funck, Gibson, Gilpin, Gowen, Green, Hall, Harvey, Hazzard, Hemphill, Heverin, Hunsicker, Lamberton, Lear, Lilly, Littleton, Long, M'Allister, M'Camant, M'Murray, MacVeagh, Metzger, Niles, Palmer, G. W., Palmer, H. W., Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Patton, Pughe, Purman, Purviance, John N., Read, John R., Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, James L., Reynolds, S. H., Rooke, Ross, Runk, Simpson, Smith, Henry W., Van Reed, Wetherill, J. M., Woodward and Wright—65.

PROHIBITION.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a petition from the Philadelphia Methodist conference, praying for the insertion of a clause in the Constitution prohibitory of the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. DODD presented a petition from citizens of Venango county, praying for the insertion of a similar provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

FENCING RAILROADS.

Mr. ARMSTRONG presented a petition from citizens of Lycoming county, praying that railroad companies passing through that county be required to fence their roads, which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

RESCINDING THE XIII RULE.

Mr. LAWRENCE offered the following resolution, which was laid on the table:

Resolved, That the XIII rule for the regulation and proceedings of the Convention, requiring a member to be at his desk when he makes a motion or addresses the Chair, be rescinded.

THE HOPKINS'S MEMORIAL.

Mr. KAINE offered the following resolution, which was twice read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing is hereby directed to have the proceedings of the Convention on the death of Hon. William Hopkins—heretofore ordered to be printed—printed in this city, in pica type, double leaded, with black rules around each page, carefully printed on superior tinted paper, and bound in fine cloth—octavo form—with a portrait and autograph of the deceased.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: After consultation with the Committee on Printing, I have concluded to offer this resolution. I was not present in the Convention, on the occasion of the announcement of the death of our friend, the late Colonel Hopkins, nor was I present when a resolution was passed, upon the following day, which is to be found upon page 396 of the Journal of the Convention. The resolution, as adopted by the Convention at that time, reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to procure the printing of the proceedings of the Convention on the occasion of the death of Hon. William Hopkins, in memorial form, and that five hundred copies be furnished the members for distribution.

The Committee on Printing do not feel authorized, under the resolution referred to, to have a portrait engraved, and desire the Convention to indicate the manner and style in which it wishes the work done.

As a friend of the late Colonel Hopkins, I desire a memorial offering worthy of the Convention, and of the memory of the man whose past services and life it is intended to commemorate. Colonel Hopkins was a member of nearly every public body in this Commonwealth, from the year 1834 down to the day of his death. He filled many important offices, with credit to himself and honor to the Commonwealth, and now let this Convention honor his memory in the publication it is about to make.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say that the resolution in regard to the printing of the memorial proceedings of the Convention, upon the announcement of the death of Colonel Hopkins, which was referred to the Committee on Printing, was very vague, and left a very wide margin as to the manner in which it should be carried out. In view of the fact that this matter of printing has always been a very sore subject to the Convention, and inasmuch as it is difficult to harmonize the views of gentlemen upon this subject, the Committee on Printing thought it would be more satisfactory to the Convention, and certainly more satisfactory to the committee itself to have something definite by way of resolution as to the manner in which this publication should be made. I entirely concur in the views of the gentleman from Fayette, (Mr. Kaine,) that this publication, if it is made at all, should be made in a proper manner, and the manner indicated in the resolution is perhaps the best that could be adopted.

The question being taken, the resolution was agreed to.

THE ARTICLE ON LEGISLATION.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the further consideration of the article reported by the Committee on Legislation. Is it the pleasure of the Convention to proceed to the consideration of this article?

["Aye." "Aye." "Aye."]

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Convention then resolved itself in committee of the whole, Mr. Armstrong in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon section twenty-one of the report of the committee. The pending question is upon the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Dallas,) which will be read.

The CLERK read as follows :

"No appropriations shall be made to any denominational or sectarian institution, corporation, or association, nor to any person or community, for denominational or sectarian objects."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Ewing) has the floor.

MR. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I remarked yesterday, and I desire to call the attention of the committee to it again, that the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas) is a material and vital change of the section as reported by the Committee on Legislation. That amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia appears to have been drawn with his usual skill, to effect the object which, I presume, he has in view, and that is, to completely emasculate the section and render it worthless. The amendment provides that "no appropriation shall be made to certain institutions and persons," and so on, "for denominational or sectarian purposes." Now, although the section of the existing Bill of Rights, referred to yesterday by the gentleman from Lehigh, (Mr. Ainey,) I suppose was intended merely to indicate that there should be no State church in Pennsylvania, yet I apprehend that that section would prevent any such appropriation as would be covered by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas.) I presume there never has been a time, in the history of this State, where there was an attempt made to obtain an appropriation of money for any society, ostensibly for denominational and sectarian purposes. Although some members of the Convention intimated yesterday that it had been done in New York, I think, however, that a reference to the appropriations, made either by the city or State of New York, will show that they were made in the same manner in which they have been made in this State, and that where an appropriation has been actually made for denominational and sectarian purposes, it has been made under the form of an appropriation, not for "sectarian and denominational purposes," but for educational or charitable purposes. That is the form such appropriations have uniformly taken, and I think the power has been greatly abused, and is likely to be abused in the future. I conceive it to be an objectionable practice, and that it should be entirely prohibited. I regard the amendment which has been offered as entirely useless, and as superfluous as it would be to insert a provision that would prevent the Legislature from legalizing theft.

No one has attempted to obtain an appropriation from the Legislature directly for a denominational purpose, nor is it likely to be attempted in future. This question it seems to me has been very fully and erroneously argued by gentlemen in the Convention, as though it were a question of charity and a question of humanity, and a question of religion. I conceive it to be nothing of the kind. While some gentlemen think that the State should not be permitted to make appropriations for charitable purposes, some of us entertain a contrary opinion, and believe that it is entirely a question of the direction which the charity of the State shall take. Those of us in favor of the proposition as it came from the committee, think that its charities should be directed by the State for certain specific objects. We believe that asylums are necessary for the relief of the insane—the deaf—the dumb—the blind, and other infirmities to which humanity is subject, and which the smaller communities cannot be expected to fully relieve. But we believe that this charity should not be dispensed through denominational institutions. I was yesterday approached in a very friendly manner, at the close of the Convention, by a gentleman who told me that I was mistaken in supposing that the Presbyterian hospital or Episcopal hospital, I do not know which, refused admittance to persons belonging to an entirely different denomination. Why, I never supposed for an instant that these hospitals were closed against sufferers of other denominations any more than I supposed that the Presbyterian church is closed against all persons except Presbyterians. I have supposed that churches are built to receive every person who was willing to attend the service, no matter to what denomination they may belong.

MR. HAY. I desire to ask the gentleman if he does not know that there are many charitable institutions in this Commonwealth in whose benefits persons belonging to their respective denominations can alone participate.

MR. EWING. I can answer that; I know of two or three instances of that kind, but they are rare. By denominational institutions I understand institutions whose management and control is necessary, by their constitution, to be confined to members of a particular denomination. Now,

I take it that such institutions are just as much denominational as a church; they are instituted and maintained for some denominational or sectarian purpose, and conducted, perhaps, merely for denominational glory, perhaps to make proselytes, but always for a denominational purpose. It may be that the donors think that this is the best way in which they can bestow their charities. Very well, I certainly shall make no objection. They are grand and noble institutions, and confer honor upon the churches that sustain them, and upon the members who contribute, but they are nevertheless sectarian, and are therefore improper objects to be the recipients of the bounty of the State. In this matter of charity and contributions to institutions I maintain that all the people of the Commonwealth stand on an equality. If an association of infidels proclaiming their doctrines organize an association for charitable purposes, providing that their association shall be wholly controlled by infidels in all times, they would be a sectarian association. I would bid them God speed in their work of charity for the sake of humanity, but I would never consent to allow the State to contribute anything to their assistance, nor would I any more have the State contribute to an Episcopalian or to a Presbyterian or other denominational institution of the same kind. I maintain that all these institutions are built for denominational purposes, and I think it is an admirable plan in which the charity of our churches can be bestowed.

I had occasion, a few days ago, to visit the "Friend's Hospital for the Insane," in the north-western part of the city. I found it to be an admirably managed institution, and I do not understand that it has ever asked any aid from the State. There are many of these private institutions throughout the State, and they are managed well. They are a credit to their supporters, and should be encouraged by all charitable people of the particular denomination, but they need no State aid. Now, a word in regard to the other portion of the section. I remarked yesterday that it is fairly divisible. There is a marked distinction between appropriations for the aid of sectarian or denominational institutions and appropriations to "persons and communities." I can very well understand how gentlemen can argue that the Legislature should have the right to make appropriations to communities or persons for charitable purposes, and not to contribute anything to sectarian or denominational institutions. I think, myself, that they stand on different ground. I do not think that at this time there is any necessity for leaving that power in the hands of the Legislature, to be abused as it is likely to be, and as it has been in the past. I was not aware, when this subject was first under discussion, that there had been, what seems to me, abuse of that very power to so great an extent. I understand that the Legislature of this State made an appropriation to Pittsburg. I have nothing to say upon that subject. I also understand that the State made an appropriation to the town of Mifflintown, or Lewistown, I do not recollect which, and I am also informed that the division of this appropriation, which was made for the restoration of property that had been burned, has been a subject of discord and heart-burnings in that town from the period of the appropriation, and that the dispute remains unsettled until this day.

I also understand that the Legislature has made appropriations to Chambersburg in 1864, $100,000; in 1866, $500,000 more, with a pledge that no more should be asked from the State. In 1866-8, $300,000 more was appropriated. All this was paid out in money. If I have been misinformed, I desire to be corrected. A year or two ago, under pretence of obtaining proof, and establishing the claims to be presented to the United States Government for payment, an act of Assembly was passed creating a commission (at an expense of some $50,000 more) to take proof of claims for property destroyed by the rebels in the "border raids," and issue certificates to the parties. This, under the stipulation that the State should not in any event be liable for the payment of such claims. Under this commission certificates have been issued to an amount over $2,000,000. And now the parties, or their assigns, are with the lobby knocking at the legislative door for another appropriation to pay the interest on these certificates. What a powerful lobby, with a large corruption fund, may accomplish in future, we can guess at from the past. The town of Somerset is also asking for an appropriation of $100,000 to repair the ravages of fire. Many other towns have equal claims on the benevolence of the State.

I have no harsh word and no unkind thought for these people, who, by the visitations of Providence, or by the ravages of war, have lost their property, and have besought and received the bounty of the State.

If the people who actually lost their property have received a fair division of the money appropriated, or if the appropriations were obtained by honest means, the public opinion in the Commonwealth is sadly at fault in regard to the facts. But granting that no dishonest means were used in obtaining the appropriations, and that the money was fairly and honestly distributed among the unfortunate sufferers. I, for one, believe all such appropriations to be outside the legitimate scope of legislative authority, not proper cases for charitable appropriations. If there is any legal claim for compensation in any case, it would not be affected by this section. I believe the power of the Legislature, in this matter of appropriations to communities and persons, has been abused; that it is a power likely to be abused in any case of its exercise, and that it should be restricted by the Constitution.

Mr. SHARPE. Mr. Chairman: I am so entirely averse to obtruding myself upon the attention of the Convention, and feel so diffident of my ability to influence the opinion of a single delegate, that I am quite sure that I would have remained silent during this discussion, had not certain remarks been made which seem to require my notice. I voted against the twentieth section of this article because I believed it to be uncalled for by any consideration of public welfare, and because it is wrong in principle, and I shall vote against the section now under examination, for the same reasons. Some short time ago, when we were considering the report of the Committee on Legislature, I took occasion to make some observations about the dignity and value of the law-making power of our State. The immediate subject then before the committee involved the qualifications of legislators, and how the constituent membership of the legislative body should be made up and apportioned throughout the State.

But, sir, we are now engaged in the examination of an article reported by the Committee on Legislation, which rises in importance far above every other question or matter appertaining to this branch of our government. Whilst it is certainly of great moment that the Legislature itself should be judiciously and properly constituted, it is still of much greater moment that its functions and powers should be so prescribed and defined, as that it shall be able to do injustice to no citizen, but equal and impartial justice to all.

It should have all the authority which a great State needs for the development of its material resources, for the education of its people, for the security of their lives, liberty and property, for the relief of the suffering, for the advancement of art and science, and for the cultivation of those moral sentiments and christian virtues which ennoble society and adorn human character. A Legislature possessing such authority, in as high a degree, and hedged in by as many safeguards against abuse of its high functions, as man's ingenuity can devise, would be as perfect a human institution as is now attainable, and could be productive of very little that would not be for the advantage of the people.

But a Legislature with its hands tied, with its feet wearing chains, with a load of jealous restrictions upon its back, is an anomaly in a free government, and will be a spectacle for the world to point its finger of scorn at.

Mr. Chairman, I am for reform; I loathe corruption with an intense loathing. I despise the public functionary who barter away his honor and the rights of the people for filthy lucre. I know quite well that laws have been passed in the Legislature which ought not to have passed, and that influences have been habitually used there to tempt the avarice of legislators, and sap their virtue. But, sir, I would not begin the redress of this enormous wrong. I would not attempt to purify the legislative halls by destroying the dignity, functions and august beneficence of the law-making power of our State.

Let the people purge the Legislature of bad men, and bad legislation will cease. From this soil the upas tree has grown, and not from the chart of legislative power found in our present Constitution.

We are just now engaged in framing and perfecting an article containing the powers which the people are willing to delegate to the Legislature.

I am absolutely sure that every gentleman on this floor is anxious to do exactly right, and to reach a correct conclusion in this business.

I will not arrogate to myself the assertion, that during our progress in the consideration of this article, we have already made some fearful blunders, but I am greatly apprehensive that we have.

The limitation of legislative power, under all circumstances, is an exceedingly delicate operation. But the limitation of legislative power in a great Commonwealth like Pennsylvania, traversed by stupendous lines of public improvements; with vast resources; with ever shifting interests, and ever increasing wants; with a people of varied language and race, is an experiment of extreme hazzard.

We must recognize the fact that all innovations in the science of government are not reforms, but often prove disastrous to the prosperity of the State. Now, sir, a reference to the eleventh section of this article will show that in that single section we have taken from the Legislature the power to pass local or special laws, on twenty-six distinct and separate subjects.

I lay no claim to the possession of prophetic ken, but I predict that the oldest member of this Convention will live to see the day when bitter experience will teach the people that this has been a mistake.

It can hardly be possible that in the future, special or local legislation about some of these twenty-six subjects will not become an absolute necessity.

Let us remember what we are doing. We are not passing acts of legislation which can be repealed as soon as they are found to be mischievous, but we are framing an organic law which, if accepted by the people, must stand, unchanged and unchangable, until its oppressions become so grievous as to compel the calling of another Convention, to undo the wrong which we have done.

I have sat silent whilst all these manacles were being forged for the Legislature.

When the twentieth section was under consideration, which provides: "No appropriation shall be made to any charitable or educational institution not under the absolute control of the Commonwealth, except by a vote of three-fourths of all the members elected to each House," I still remained silent, although I was amazed and mortified that the delegates of a civilized and christian people should think it proper to place greater restrictions upon the Legislature in dispensing charity to suffering humanity, than in forwarding the selfish schemes of individual and corporate cupidity and of aggrandizement.

But I was content to demean myself thus, because I observed that while State charity was hampered, it was not wholly destroyed.

But, sir, when the twenty-first section was reached, which provides: "No appropriation shall be made for charitable, educational or benevolent purposes, to any person or community, nor to any denominational or sectarian institution, corporation, or association;" and when I heard from gentlemen on this floor, the wide sweep which they propose the section shall have, and the special, imaginary evils, which it is intended to prevent and eradicate, I felt that further silence would be a wrong to myself and an insult to my constituents.

The section has two distinct branches. The one prohibits the appropriation of money to any denominational or sectarian institution or corporation for charitable, educational or benevolent purposes; the other prohibits the appropriation of money to any person or community for like purposes.

The first branch announces a proposition of astounding novelty. It contemplates nothing less than the damming back the stream of State charity, unless it flows through a non-sectarian channel, to relieve non-sectarian suffering. It goes even beyond this, for it declares that the bounty of the State shall not be used to educate any but the non-sectarian mind, and that it shall exercise no benevolence that shall not be free from the taint of sectarianism.

Now, happily for us, the State and church are divided in this Commonwealth. We have no established State religion, no State formula in sacred things, no State ecclesiastics, and no test oaths.

Every man's religion is a question between himself and his God. No one would wish to change this, even if it were possible to do so. But is it a fair and proper conclusion, from these premises, that the State should withhold all aid from every institution or corporation that is under sectarian government, or cherishes sectarian religious trusts? I grant that it would be wrong for the Legislature to appropriate money in aid of one particular sectarian institution or corporation, to the exclusion of all others, for this would lead, in the end, to the establishment of a State religion. All discriminations between sectarian institutions or corporations are forbidden, alike by our sense of justice, by the Constitution under which we now live, and by the genius of our government.

But this is quite a different question from that which we are now considering. It is said the State ought not to aid sectarian schools and hospitals. Why not? Is an institution, established for the most beneficent objects, to be ostracised, and put beyond the pale of State assistance, because its managers are Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Methodists, Lutherans, Baptists, or Catholics? What is ~~the~~ the rationale for this condemnation? Are the good works of sectarian enterprise to go for nothing, because of an insane bigotry which distrusts all sects alike? One of the first and noblest duties of a State is to relieve suffering. The great heart of the people declares that this relief shall overleap all sectarian barriers, and feed the hungry, minister to the sick, and clothe the naked, of whatever faith, and wherever found. Whatever is given for the love of God, and the love of man, is charity. In this love of God, and love of man, all creeds harmonize. They may quarrel about forms and about doctrines, and about ecclesiastical government, but in this common love of God, and love of man, they are a unit.

To what charity will the State make appropriations, if it excepts everything that is sectarian? It is doubtful whether the gift that is laid upon a non-sectarian altar is sanctified.

The people understand these things better than we do. Their moral perceptions are always about right. They appreciate the blessings that flow in almost every community from the good works of sectarian institutions. And when misfortunes overtake such institutions, when their means become straightened, and their circle of usefulness narrowed, the people have always been willing, and always will be willing, that the State shall grant proper aid. No abuses have appeared in the past, growing out of such appropriations. Nothing but good has resulted from them, and the probability is that nothing but good shall hereafter proceed from them.

At all events the people have not demanded this restriction upon legislative power. They have not asked us to dry up the fountain of State charity so that it may not hereafter run in a sectarian stream. They have not asked us to take away from them the power to bestow their bounty upon whom they please. Until they do ask it, and upon sufficient grounds, I shall never consent to do so.

It seems to me that this attempt to hide a niggardly State policy behind the antipathy which is supposed to dwell in the vulgar mind against everything sectarian can never be a success if the people get to understand the matter. Should it become a part of our organic law it will invite the people to a wide-spread contempt for sectarian institutions, and a deep-seated skepticism about sacred things, which none will deplore more than the intelligent gentlemen who have been instrumental in its consummation.

But the other branch of this section forbids the appropriation of money "to any person or community for charitable, educational or benevolent purposes."

This steers clear of the sectarian aspect of the other branch of the section. We are informed that its purpose is to prevent, in all cases and under all circumstances, gratuities to individuals or communities.

This kind of relief has been sparingly but very beneficially exercised in the past by the State in relieving individuals and communities suffering under some overwhelming calamity. Are we prepared to say that no such relief shall hereafter be granted? Are we afraid to trust the integrity of the Legislature in a matter of this kind? When has the bounty of the State ever been abused in this direction? Turn over your statute books, gentlemen, supporters of this proposition, and point out to me in whose behalf the Legislature has done wrong? Tell me, if you can, of an appropriation that has ever been made by the State Legislature to a stricken community that ought not to have been made.

Let me suppose that a conflagration shall sweep over this magnificent city, leaving its stately buildings a heap of ashes; its marts of trade a desert; its business men bankrupts; its citizens houseless and homeless. Let me suppose that a pestilence shall walk through its streets, destroying at night, and wasting at noon-day; what christian man will say that the State ought not to grant immediate and liberal relief to the suffering and afflicted? Let me suppose, again, that this stupendous calamity falls upon a rural district, crushing its people to the earth, what man of proper sensibility will say that the State has no business to alleviate such distress? We are told that private charity is always prompt enough, and generous enough, for such cases. He who asserts this has but little experience in such affairs. May my right hand forfeit its cunning, and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, if I ever assist in incorporating into the Constitution a proposition to dam up the charities of the State, within any bounds whatever. There is not a particle of danger that the Legislature will ever become too charitable. I will leave this question with the law-making power, just as those who have gone before us left it, and may God defend the right. But, sir, I suspect that this provision would not have found its way into this section were it not for the intense dislike which seems to be lurking in the minds of certain gentlemen on this floor, against what are commonly known as the "border claims."

The distinguished gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) has given expression to his feelings. He has stigmatized these claims as frauds, which are seeking to deplete the treasury of the Commonwealth. He says that they have been bought up and transferred to a lobby, which has for years been attempting to procure the payment of them, by corruption and other foul practices. That the demand upon the State by the claimants is preposterous and without the slightest merit, and that he advocates the proposition now under consideration, chiefly because it will have the effect to debar the State from ever paying these war damages, and he avows himself ready to support a still more stringent restriction, if the present one is not sufficient for that end.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I did not say that they were frauds nor without merit. But I stated distinctly, positively, earnestly, that they had no right to be presented to the State of Pennsylvania, but that if they are proper claims they ought to be presented at Washington city.

Mr. SHARPE. Did not the gentleman from Allegheny state that money had been used to secure their passage?

Mr. HOWARD. I stated that an attempt was made most fraudulently and most rascally—and I know it personally—to set them up and corrupt the Legislature of this Commonwealth.

Mr. SHARPE. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman knows personally, he knows more than I do.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, I do. Understand me when I say a thing distinctly.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I would like to understand how the gentleman knows it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I move that the gentleman be given unanimous leave to proceed.

This was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. SHARPE. Mr. Chairman: Now, sir, let me tell the gentleman from Allegheny some facts which may shed a few rays of light even upon his prejudiced judgment, in regard to this subject.

On the morning of the thirtieth of July, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four, Chambersburg was a prosperous and thrifty town. At dawn of that eventful day, a thousand rebel incendiaries, under command of General McCausland, entered it, and in two hours left it, a smouldering heap of ruins. About two millions of property were destroyed; hundreds of its citizens, who rose from their beds in comfortable circumstances, before noon were beggars. Hundreds of families wandered away, houseless and homeless, old age upon its staff, infancy in its mother's arms, and the sick carried upon their beds of pain. The earnings of a lifetime were licked up by the relentless demon of flame. Would that I could transport the gentleman from Allegheny, and set him down amid the smoking ruins of those devastated homes. Had this scene of desolation ever fallen upon his vision, I am very sure that his kindlier feelings would have been aroused, and he would have commended the wisdom that put it in the power of the Legislature to grant relief. Who, sir, were these people that were ruined by the casualties of war? Were they rebels? No, sir. Were they of doubtful loyalty? No, sir! Were they lukewarm in their support of the government? No, sir! They sent more than a regiment of gallant soldiers into the field. They invested their money in government securities; they nursed the sick and wounded that were carried from the battle fields of Antietam and Gettysburg to their hospitals; they were in all respects loyal and true citizens. The blow that laid Chambersburg in ashes, was aimed at the whole north. Chambersburg was the break-water that stayed the wave of rebel vengeance and hatred from overflowing the State. Why should her citizens, who shared the common calamities of the war, be subjected to these extraordinary damages which were not experienced by other portions of the State?

The injuries having been inflicted by a public enemy, all the policies of insurance on the destroyed property were worthless.

Will any gentleman rise in his place and say that the Legislature did wrong in appropriating money for the relief of Chambersburg.

It cuts me to the quick, sir, to hear gentlemen sneer at the calamities of my constituents. It pains me to hear them assert that they especially want a constitutional provision, that will debar the payment of these losses.

The claims are honest in amount, and have been adjudicated by a commission of upright gentlemen of which the gentleman from Centre, (Mr. M'Alister,) and John Briggs, Esq., and Colonel Jordan, of Harrisburg were members.

I totally deny, sir, that any improper means have ever been used to procure the appropriations that have already been made; I totally deny that a single one of these claims has been bought up and transferred to a third party; I totally deny that any lobby has ever been authorized by the claimants to use improper means to secure payment.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman will allow another interruption, I desire to ask him: Have there not been contracts made with agents in consideration that they would use their services as representatives or otherwise to get the State to assume these claims, by which they would receive a certain percentage, twenty or twenty-five per cent.?

Mr. SHARPE. Who did that?

Mr. HOWARD. I ask you if it has not been done. Have not the owners of the claims generally made contract with persons by which they have agreed to pay a certain percentage of the claims, if allowed, in consideration of these persons getting the State of Pennsylvania to assume them?

Mr. SHARPE. There has been an arrangement made by which certain moneys have been appropriated to defray certain necessary expenses in getting up the papers, in getting out powers of attorney, and for work of that kind, but none for any purpose such as the gentleman suggests.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I am sorry the gentleman does not understand the subject better.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Chairman: Will you allow me one word? The gentleman from Allegheny asserts that the gentleman from Franklin, who addresses the House, does not understand his question. I hope the gentleman will repeat it and elicit all the information he desires.

Mr. HOWARD. I said that the gentleman from Franklin did not understand the subject in relation to which I asked.

Mr. SHARPE. Mr. Chairman: The sufferers have never regarded this as a matter of grace; they have always insisted that the duty of the State to pay them was imperative.

Did time permit, I think I could prove that it was the duty of the State to protect her citizens against rebel invasions, and failing to do so she is bound to reimburse their losses.

The gentleman from Allegheny admits that the general government ought to pay these claims, but asseverates that it never will. I presume he is right in his last assertion, so long as they remain in the hands of their present owners. But let the State pay them as she ought to do, and then let her carry them before the tribunal of the nation; let her hold there, that the regiments raised for the protection of her borders were yielded to the government in its extremity of peril. Let it be proved there that these regiments could have prevented the calamities that fell upon Chambersburg, and I believe the United States will recognize the justice of the demand and satisfy it promptly.

But, sir, this is not the day nor the occasion to discuss the liability of the State to pay these claims. Should that question legitimately arise at some future time during our deliberations, I may then speak to that end; but now it is enough for me to ask gentlemen whether they are ready to vote this proposition into the organic law to meet a special case? Are you ready to say that under no circumstances, individuals or communities shall receive help from the State? Will you stay the beneficent hand of the Commonwealth lest its touch may heal the wounds of Chambersburg? Will you dare go back to your constituents and say to them, we were afraid that your sense of justice would some day impel you to pay the sufferers of Chambersburg; we distrusted the Legislature, and have, therefore, so fixed it that you cannot satisfy these claims, although you desire it over so much? Will this great Commonwealth tie a constitutional ligament about its heart which, in all future time, will hinder the out-pushing of its streams of benevolence—lest a small portion of their invigorating influences may send joy and plenty along its borders? Until I see it done, I will never believe such a consummation possible.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: My friend and colleague, Mr. Woodward, objects to that part of the section which prohibits the appropriation of public money to sectarian purposes, and he certainly did prove it to be very unwise.

All or nearly all the great charities of the country have been founded and conducted by the spirit which animates the various christian churches. If a meritorious institution be Methodist, or Presbyterian, or Catholic or Episcopalian it is none the worse on that account. Such things do not, as a general rule, come from any other quarter. And if you say that you will not recognize the charity which they teach and practice, you must ignore all the good that there is in the world, and give yourselves up to the undisputed dominion of Satan.

But that is not the serious question in this case. You cannot avoid a controversy between the different sects, which will be injurious to them as well as to the general interests of the community, if you allow appropriations to be made for any of these purposes. If you make members of the Legislature the distributors of your charity they will give what you put in their hands to those institutions which are carried on under the auspices of the largest church, and the weak and the unpopular will stand no chance at all. Before a Protestant Legislature what chance would a Catholic institution have? And what show for a donation would be given to the sect everywhere spoken against—the people first called christians at Antioch? Why they could not muster a thousand votes in the State, while their enemies could pay a premium of a hundred thousand without any trouble.

Shall you under any circumstances put the charities of the country into the keeping of the public authorities of the State? The State has one function to perform; the church has another, and a totally different one. The faith and charity, as well as the hope, of the christian church will be polluted and mutilated by any kind of connection that you can possibly contrive with the coarse and vulgar machinery of the State government. The founder of christianity and all His apostles declared that they came to establish a kingdom which was not of this world. The men who settled our institutions and achieved our independence determined that they would build up between the church and the State a wall of perfect and complete partition, so that the organization of one could never be used for any purpose of the other. The reason which they gave, and to which every man sensible has always assented, is that they cannot be combined for any common purpose, without doing excessive injury to both. The history of the whole world makes it perfectly clear that the church is more successful when it stands entirely alone and unaided. The voluntary benevolence of those who belong to it is worth a thousand times more than all the legal contributions which can be made to its power. It would be far better for the church, and everything that concerns the church, that it should encounter the fiercest persecution of the State, than to languish under the patronage of political power. The christian religion is as hardy as the mountain oak, when planted in the open air, where the sunshine of heaven can settle upon it, and the free winds can blow among its branches. But it is no hot-house plant. It withers and dies when you place it under the forcing glass, and subject it to the stimulus of an artificial heat.

My friend, to whom I have already referred, (Mr. Woodward,) is in favor of patronizing sectarian charities because he cannot patronize christianity without patronizing the sects into which it is divided. He would not make any distinction between them, or do more for one than another. But how will he help it if he leaves it to the discretion of the Legislature? That is probably the last body on earth whose impartiality in a matter of that kind could be trusted. I would confine them to secular duties, and give them as little rope as possible even in that department. I am, therefore, in favor of the section without the anti-sectarian qualifications, and would prohibit all appropriations of public money to charitable or pious uses.

But my brother (Mr. Woodward) thinks it would be right to tax the corporations, and apply the proceeds to pious purposes. I like his ingenuity. The arrangement he proposes would do good both ways. It would punish the sinners by taking their property without their consent and at the same time reward the virtuous and enable them to multiply their good works. It would much improve the spiritual condition of the corporations, while it would fill the treasury of the Lord. But is not this doing evil that good may come? Have we—has anybody—has the State, a right to plunder with one hand in order to be charitable with the other. Is it charity to transfer property from one person who owns it to another who don't? Is it for the honor of the church or its members to be the recipients of a forced benevolence, or creditable to the State to be the instrument of a pious fraud?

My friend mentions a particular case, which, he says, did actually occur. An application was made to one of these soulless corporations for a donation to some charitable purpose. Instead of responding, as was expected, without hesitation the directors referred the subject to their counsel, and the counsel failed to advise them that they had a right to do what was asked. I think that the counsellor was right in declining to give the advice which seems to have been expected; as a matter of law and conscience he acted properly; his conduct is not at all open to the condemnation which my friend pronounces.

MR. WOODWARD. Will the gentleman allow me to explain? I do not know that I did state, but I, perhaps, ought to state, that the counsel was told that legislation could be obtained. That, if the company had not the power, that legislation could be obtained to give them the power. That was part of the case.

MR. J. S. BLACK. That does not help the case one whit. Neither the Legislature, nor the board of directors, nor the counsel, nor anybody else, could honestly appropriate money to charitable purposes that was in the hands of the corporation, in trust, for another use. Would the gentleman himself, even with an act of Legislature directing it, advise an application of corporate money or property to any purpose, however meritorious, in conflict with the object for which it was committed to its charge? If it was a railroad company, as I suppose it was, (because they are the chief sinners in this country,) the funds were donated to public use—the building of a public highway for the Commonwealth. If the road was already built the surplus was held first for the creditors, and next for the stockholders. No matter how you look at it, you must see that what the counsel refused to advise was simply a breach of trust. To me it seems that the charitable gentleman who made that request might have been better employed than in going about tempting trustees to cheat their beneficiaries, and promising that the Legislature should be made (or got) to assist in the wrong. Certainly they did no honor either to church or State.

But again; are members of the Legislature fit to be the almoners of the people? Those men who, according to what seems a prevalent notion here, have so little conscience that they can't be bound by an iron-clad oath, are they to be trusted with the distribution of our charities? I am charged with having too little charity, and I confess I have it not in super-abundance, but I would be unfaithful to my own convictions if I did not answer this question in the negative. The claim of the border counties, for injuries by the invasion, was perfectly clear, legal and just. But there is a very strong suspicion entertained by a great many persons, and by the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. Howard,) there is something more than suspicion, that a fund had to be raised for the purpose of paying the black mail which they know would be levied upon them. I do not like to say this if it hurts the feelings of my distinguished friend from Centre, but still I do not know how to avoid it, unless I say what I do not believe.

MR. CURTIN. Just put anything you have to say about me in a parenthesis and go on. [Laughter.]

MR. J. S. BLACK. Yes. [Laughter.] You shall have it any way you want it. I desire merely to deprecate the gentleman's displeasure. He has told us that he does not like to hear any evil spoken of the Legislature or its members, whereas I find it somewhat difficult to speak well of them. He may think it right to cover up their misdeeds, but I entreat him not to be offended if, upon proper and necessary occasions, I say what I verily believe to be true.

One word about the "raid." The claim that was made by the people of the border counties was as just, as honest, as fair and as legal against Pennsylvania and the United States, both, as ever was made by man against man.

It is a just debt, and if the Legislature (or the lobby) refuses to pay it that refusal will be repudiation, as base as ever blackened the brow of any government in the world. The people of that region were entitled to protection; they were promised protection by the compact expressed in the fundamental law of the State and the Union, both upon the sole condition that they would be obedient to the constituted authorities. They were obedient, and it was that obedience that caused their frontier to be left open and exposed.

In consequence, the tide of invasion rolled over them and covered their country with blood and ashes. Both governments having failed, either because they were not able, or because they were not willing to give them protection, there is no way of making a proper reparation except to pay them to the uttermost farthing for the losses that were thereby caused.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I move that unanimous consent be given the gentleman from York to proceed.

This was agreed to.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: I only want to refer to another case that has been mentioned here. The people of the town of Somerset made a claim upon the Legislature for a donation. I cannot help wishing that they would succeed; but my wishes are not based upon my patriotism, nor upon my convictions that they ought to succeed, but because I have a clannish love for my relations, and for the little town in which I was brought up. As matter of public and elementary law, if I must speak conscientiously, I can only say that the State of Pennsylvania is not an insurance company, and not bound to pay the loss that a man suffers when his house is burned down.

Mr. BARTHOLEMEW. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say a word or two upon this subject, not that I will give any new views to the committee, but, perhaps, I may enforce an idea or two that has been referred to in the argument. Now, sir, I yield to no man in a devotion to well directed charity. I believe that it is the duty of the government to lend a helping hand to the afflicted where, by reason of poverty, they have not, nor have their friends, sufficient to maintain and support them. I believe it proper and right for the State to uphold public institutions for the maintenance and for the restoration of those who are afflicted in all cases where private enterprise cannot furnish the necessary means to carry into effect the purposes of those institutions. But I do not agree with my friend from Philadelphia, (Mr. Woodward,) that charity is the result of the christian religion, and that the non-professing of this earth possess no charity. Nor do I believe that without the aid of sectarian organizations, charitable institutions would not be. I believe that charity was before Christ. I believe that charity was when the Israelitish religion was confined to the borders of the Mediterranean. I believe that charity existed wherever man existed, either in the colds of the Frigid, or upon the sands of the Torrid. I believe that it was just so expanded as man was cultivated, and elevated, and enlightened. I believe that it progressed as man progressed, and as man became enlightened, so his charity became enlightened; because thereby he had a realization of his duties to his fellow-men.

Now upon the question immediately before this House, it strikes my mind just as it struck the mind of the gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Sharpe,) that it is susceptible of two divisions. The first division relates to the appropriations to persons or communities; the second, to the institution, religious or charitable, which is controlled by a denomination.

On the first branch of this proposition I am opposed to the report of this committee. I am opposed to it, first, because I believe it to be the duty of a State to do that which is right to those who sustain her interests. It is right to give to the individual who leaves his home in time of peril and danger, and offers his life for the safety of the State. I believe that pensions should be given to individuals; I believe that bounties should be given to individuals; I believe that as long as national existence depends upon force—and until the millennium shall come it will—there should be a proper and exact reward for individual bravery, courage and devotion. I believe, also, in giving to a community where, by reason of the extent of the disaster, it becomes more than a particular municipality can bear. A riot may be suppressed by the sheriff by the aid of the posse comitatus; but if it extends and grows in proportion, the State is called upon. It is the protection to the individual; and while there may not be the same legal liability for protection to the individual in the case of a calamity, that there is in the case of force and lawlessness; yet, I say, it begets an equity, because this government, to a certain extent, is parental in its character, and stands loco parentis. Therefore, on that very proposition, when calamity spreads itself broadcast, and covers the whole community, and when there is no helping hand but that of the State, I say that the duty and the obligation of the State to the individual demand that it shall extend relief—that it should grant relief from the public purse, and I do it upon the proposition that such a grant is general in its character. It discriminates not between Presbyterian and Methodist; not between Baptist and Catholic; not between black and white; not between the European and the Esquimaux; but is given to all men alike in that community who have suffered. Upon that branch of the question I stand, and have stated my position but it is the least important.

The more important branch of this question comes upon the appropriation of moneys from the public treasury to denominational and sectarian associations. I say that this is against the policy of this government. I say it is against the principle upon which it was organized. The public fund is the result of taxation. Taxes are not levied upon Presbyterians as Presbyterians, nor upon Methodists as Methodists, nor upon Catholics as Catholics; but they are levied alike upon all, and upon the property that the citizens hold without respect to color, creed or faith.

The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) says, and I do not say that I could understand his logic, that because the great bulk or a large proportion of the taxation of this Commonwealth is obtained from corporations, and it goes into the treasury from corporations, therefore we might take that fund and appropriate and apply it to sectarian gifts and bequests; but he tells us in the breath after that if we do take from these companies it comes ultimately from the people. The people, he says, will have to stand it at last—that that is the ultimate source from which the wealth of the corporations comes, and if we take the corporation taxation and give it to these institutions they will only get so much more from the people. Therefore, I take it, it comes from the people. The gentleman should at least have alleged, or asserted, to make his arguments at all complete, that these corporations were Presbyterians, or Methodists, or Baptists, so that there would be some legitimate thing to put a sectarian hand upon to take the fund from the treasury. He does not do it. He leaves the taxation raised by the State in the treasury of the State. For what? Why for the purposes of government—for temporal government, and not for spiritual government. It is the old doctrine. If we once concede that the highest object of man is spiritual welfare, and that the State was organized for the highest interests of man, then it is the duty of the State, to make a man religious, and have the citizens baptized by the townships. It becomes the old doctrine of church and State. I say that the only proposition is that this fund is a State fund —belonging to all the citizens of this Commonwealth alike. They are not stockholders in a corporation, holding so much stock; they are not Methodists dividing and holding Methodist stock; or Presbyterians holding Presbyterian stock, but the fund was raised by taxation for the purposes of government.

It is true that it is the duty of the government to care for the helpless, the sick and the weak. Mere motives of self-interest would impel us to do that, because those who are unable to work may be able enough to steal; those who are fit for a hospital would disgrace civilization upon your public highways, and shame alone would make us shield them from the public gaze.

Now this question of charity being a common duty, not confined to religion; religion not begetting it; no faith bringing it into existence, but a common blessing—a blessing as common to man as the blossom to the tree or the rose to the bush; not to be divided, but a duty, a gift, given to us by God, an attribute of God himself, and He therefore having given us, that it is a duty that we must exercise without restriction and without regard. Is it to be said that because I am a non-professing christian I am therefore without charity? Is that the rule of my life, or is it the rule of life of any intelligent man? Is it the rule of life of any decent man? No; not so. Organizations of charities have been founded not through sectarian parties. Gaze on this State; look at Philadelphia; look at your Girard College; look at the thousand institutions that are spread over the land. Did they spring from a sectarian source? No. Some of them have come not only from non-professing men, but certainly one of them, as I have been informed, not even from an orthodox believer.

I come, then, to this fact and this proposition, that it is the duty of the State to take care of her helpless, her infirm, her blind, her insane and all those that have suffered or are heirs to such calamities as prevent them from taking care of themselves. This is a duty that is imposed upon the State, because she has that paternal care over her people, and for a thousand reasons that I can suggest. Therefore it becomes a public duty imposed upon the State to exercise charity, and that charity runs through the channel of the State officials. I am, therefore, in favor of public institutions and such charities as shall, in the wisdom of the Legislature, be established to carry out all the purposes which the government may think fit to give it for the care of those who cannot care for themselves.

When we come to the other question, the sectarian applies for charity. What right has he to apply? "I come," he says, "asa Presbyterian. I want fifty thousand dollars from the State treasury." "What for?" "A charity." "Aye, a charity!" "A charity" is a well-sounding phrase. Men sometimes forget what charities there have been in the history of the world. "Charity" is a word that appeals to the heart. It makes the feeling of men spring out, anxious to cling to that and do good. Every good nature is affected by it; every good nature should be affected by it. But there is no fund in this treasury that is a Presbyterian fund; there is no fund that was raised by Presbyterians. The taxation of this State was upon all, without regard to sect; and, therefore there can be no division of the fund of this Commonwealth for special, particular purposes. "Yes, but you forget your charity." I say we do not forget the well-directed charity that is in accordance with the principles of our government. We say the State shall care for its helpless. Charity shall be exercised, and State charity, like the law, is general in its application, and particular charities shall be attended to by the benevolent individuals. There are cases that public charity cannot reach; there are cases where it requires a private charity to allow a man to take the advantage of a public charity. These private charities should be encouraged—encouraged by the christian churches. I am opposed to the idea spoken of by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Woodward,) that we are ostentatious in our charities; that the Presbyterian or the Methodist shall erect the hospitals or build up their magnificent pile of buildings, and claim, "this is our place, we give here to the poor and needy, and we aid and relieve the afflicted," when the means whereby that aid is given comes, not from the Presbyterian or the Methodist, but comes out of the public coffers, and it is my tax and every other mans' tax in the Commonwealth. I say that ostentation of that kind, at the expense of the State treasury, I utterly denounce, and I am opposed to. I am opposed to it for the reason that it cramps and chills private charity. Instead of opening the heart to let all that is generous pour forth, it cramps it, because it says in effect that "charity shall not depend on the individual, but on the public coffers." Nay, more.

We have a clause in the Constitution of 1838, which prevents the giving of any preference to any religious organization. Now, it may be true that the construction of that article of the Constitution would simply apply to a place of worship; but let us look into the history of the past. Will you tell me that that society which has control of the coffers, and the public funds, founding her charities, and spreading them broadcast over this land, is not the most powerful for proselytism, is not the most powerful for extension, will not build her power and lay her foundation as strong as adamant, and that she will grow in greatness by reason, not of her faith, but by reason of power which she draws from the Commonwealth. Therefore, when I see a charity which is denominational, as this sectarian charity, and that one, and I know that they draw from the public coffers, I say it is not their charity; it is a lie upon its face; it is the charity of the people; it is the charity of the public, and to the public it should belong.

The policy of this Government from the beginning has been what? Look at the Constitution of this State, and at the Constitution of every State, and it will be observed that the framers thereof were anxious in their formation to be specially and particularly tenacious upon this subject of freedom and liberty of conscience, and the positive enactment that there should be no preference, the one over the other.

I do not care how you place it, whether you build a church or whether you build a charity that should be under the control of that church, it is one and the same thing. It is a violation of the principle of liberty, of conscience, for which this country has been so pre-eminently distinguished above all other lands.

Unanimous consent was given for Mr. Bartholomew to proceed.

Mr. BARTHOLOMEW. Gentlemen, so tenacious was was one of the founders of this government, upon this subject, Mr. Thomas Jefferson, that he left his seat in the Continental Congress and went to Virginia, for the purpose of taking a position upon the floor of the House of Delegates, that was then framing a State Constitution, for the very purpose of dismembering the church and the State. I say it is in the line of our teaching that there should be an absolutely equality of all sects and denominations; that they shall not appear above the surface one above the other; that there shall not be a recognition of such a thing as a sect in any official or governmental proceedings; that men shall stand alike before the law, and the Constitution, so far as their consciences and their religions are concerned; that there shall be no recognition whatever of a denomination; and I say woe to the day when this State, by her Constitution or by her legislative enactment, shall recognize sects at all, by dragging them into politics and permitting them to be the bases of political power. The reason for this is manifest. The moment that appropriations depend upon, or religious societies find that they can take from the treasury, appropriations of money, the means whereby they can effect that purpose are perfectly plain. They accomplish it by a cast of political power, by organization among themselves, by religious bodies loading down their spiritual welfare and attempting to enforce an organization of their temporal welfare, forgetting the teachings of Christ and turning after mammon and gold. That will be the result. Religious societies have done it in time past, and we are not now making a law for times of peace and apparent calm. We know from the history of the past that the conflicts between religious societies have been of the fiercest character. They have engendered the worst of passions and feelings, and have resulted in more bloodshed than any other cause, and they may again.

Let us, so far as we can at least, put the seal of condemnation upon such a course; let us follow the teachings of the past; let us live in the light of our own history; let us follow the guides who made this land a land of freedom of conscience, without recognition of condition or sect, and place all men, christian or unchristian, alike before the Constitution and the law. Let us not take that which belongs to the Presbyterian to give to the Methodist; let us not take that which belongs to the Jew to give to the Catholic. Let them all stand alike, without official recognition; let us not do that which will stamp charity as a public act when it claims to be a private one. I do not ask that the wells of private charity shall be dammed up, but I ask to let it be poured forth. There are occasions enough for it, but I do believe that public charities, under the control of the State, are the only legitimate recipients of the taxes of the people of the Commonwealth.

Mr. M'CLEAN. Mr. Chairman: It occurs to me that the necessity for the amendments offered by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Hay) and the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas) is obviated to a very great extent by the report of the Committee on Education, which has been adopted in committee of the whole. The final section in that report provides:

"Neither the Legislature nor any county, &c., shall ever make any appropriation, grant or donation of land, money or property of any kind to any church or religious society, or to or for the use of any university, college, seminary, academy or school, or any literary, scientific or charitable institution, or society controlled or managed, either in whole or in part, by any church or sectarian denominations."

Now it seems to me that the object of these gentlemen who are contending against appropriations by the Legislature for entirely sectarian or denominational purposes, is entirely reached by this section already adopted by the committee of the whole. It is general and comprehensive in its purport; too much so, it would seem, to be embraced in a report of the Committee on Education; nevertheless it has been adopted, providing that the Legislature shall not make any appropriations to any charitable institutions or societies controlled or managed, either in whole or in part, by any church or sectarian denomination. For that reason, sir, I consider that the amendments offered by both these gentlemen are unnecessary, and that they have been already passed upon and adopted by this Convention in committee of the whole.

Now, sir, I desire to direct the attention of the committee to this section itself, and not so much to the whole section as to the first and last lines of the section, taking them together, they being so framed as to be made a whole: "No appropriation shall be made to any person or community for any charitable, educational or benevolent purposes." This part of the section does not raise the denominational question at all; and it is to this view that I propose to direct my remarks.

It is surprising to me, sir, that any committee of any Constitutional Convention should ever report such a measure as that in its full significance and import. The proposition that you offer to present to the people of this christian Commonwealth, that no appropriation shall be made to any person or community for charitable, educational or benevolent purposes, is, I fear, not considered in its full signification and import. I submit, sir, that this proposition is hostile to christianity. It is intended to adopt a preamble to the Constitution which we are about framing, acknowledging the existence and sovereignty of Almighty God, Father of men, and seeking His guidance in our work.

It is a principle that no gentleman on this floor will deny, that all human laws are based upon the Divine, and from that derive all their force and validity, and yet what the christian religion and the law of God, and the better instincts of our nature prescribe to us as our duty—the great duty of charity, this committee, in this section, would prohibit. What is right in the individual they would not have done by the entire community, by the Commonwealth? It matters not that charity and mercy are prescribed to men; their existence and their obligation must be ignored and denied by the body politic, by the State. When faith, hope and charity are held up to us, and it is declared that the greatest of these is charity, this Convention, representing the people of the Commonwealth, is asked to wipe out from its organic law every trace of this great virtue.

I believe if the gentlemen who compose this Convention only gave this proposition full and careful consideration that they would not assent to it. It will certainly belittle the Commonwealth. How numerous are the instances that can be enumerated of the wrong that will be effected if this section is adopted. The State in this event shall never have the right to appropriate any money for any of the worthy purposes designated in the section. The State of Pennsylvania, for instance, could not vote a sword in recognition of the services of such a man as a Gen. Anthony Wayne, of revolutionary fame, or General George G. Meade, of recent time, or pension the crippled and wounded Pennsylvania soldiers who served their country during the time of our national troubles. Is it the intention to deny to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania the right thus, and in similar ways, to recognize the services of those who have rendered our State illustrious and glorious in the history of our nation? Are we going to deny the right of the State to be grateful to its faithful and gallant men? Are we going to deny the right of a pension to a poor widow of a soldier who may have fallen in the defense of his State and country? Suppose the visitation of a famine is apprehended throughout a portion of our State and country; should not the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania be permitted to imitate the government of Egypt in preparing to meet the wants and alleviate the sufferings which would be produced by such a fearful calamity? Numberless are the instances that might be detailed which would put the Commonwealth to shame if such a provision be inserted in the Constitution, and which would forever prevent the extending of her charitable hand in times of necessity and suffering.

The gentleman from allegheuy (Mr. Howard) has seen proper to indulge in a fierce and bitter attack against claims for compensation, for the loss of property sustained by a portion of our citizens during the invasion of the State by a common public enemy. I submit, sir, that this attack has been too fierce and bitter to be either wise or just. I propose to refer to his argument, and what is it? First, he states that improper measures were used to obtain an appropriation from the Legislature for the purposes referred to. I contend that an assertion like this is no answer to the object of this legislation, and because improper means may have been employed to procure this legislation, does that render any the less worthy the object of the legislation? I do not justify the employment of any improper means to influence the Legislature of our State in securing appropriations for such a purpose, but that is no reason why the State should deny justice to these claimants. Then the gentleman makes the amazing statement to this Convention that the Commonwealth is not the protector of its citizens.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman certainly misunderstood me.

Mr. M'CLEAN. The gentleman certainly said so, for I took down from his lips his identical words. Notwithstanding the citizen contributes his taxes, his property, his patriotism and his blood in the defence of the State, the Commonwealth owes him absolutely nothing in return, and although an enemy may invade his hearthstone and sweep away his property, he ought not to look to the State for compensation. Such a doctrine is incompatible with the spirit and the letter of the bill of rights of Pennsylvania, which provides in the tenth section that no man's property shall be taken for the public use without the consent of his representatives, and without just compensation being made. The gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Sharpe) eloquently remarked that he wished the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) could have been with him amidst the burning ruins of Chambersburg, and I, too, wish he could have stood with me in the battle of Gettysburg, that raged around my own fireside and my own native home, and witnessed that storm of fire and blood that laid waste our fields, destroyed our property and rendered our citizens poor, in some instances, for the remainder of their lives. The people of those devastated sections of our State were loyal to the core. They contributed a regiment and company after company to the defence of the government, and their fair daughters and mothers nursed the wounded and dying soldiers of the republic. Yet the gentleman from Allegheny would deny justice to these unfortunate people. He tells us what the State cannot do, or ought not to do, the United States government will do, and yet he mocks us and mocks these claimants for indemnity and compensation from the Commonwealth, by saying almost in the same breath that he knows the United States government will not recognize these claims. "The United States government never will recognize them," were the gentleman's own words. The gentleman not only proposes to deny justice to these sufferers, but he adds insult to their injuries. It is principally, Mr. Chairman, for the reasons which I have hastily and imperfectly presented, that I hope the Convention will not endorse such a wrong as is embodied in this twenty-first section reported by the committee, but that we will consign it to that oblivion which it so justly merits.

Mr. W. H. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: I do not desire to occupy the time of the Convention; but this section which is now under consideration leads me to make a few remarks upon the practice of European governments in dealing with this question. The greatest evil which has existed in regard to the governments of Europe is that they interfere entirely too much with the people. They have established in that part of the world what is known as paternal governments, and although they have been so styled the people who live under them call them despotic. William the Conqueror established just such a government as that.

The French people have lately witnessed the destruction of probably one of the best "paternal" governments that has ever existed, because it was administered by intelligent men, and at its head was one of the most remarkable men of the age—Louis Napoleon. That government meddled with almost everything. It laid out important public works, and taxed the wealthy classes of its citizens for the means to carry out its designs, in order that the poorer classes of the Empire could be furnished with employment. A tax was fixed upon every man and upon every loaf of bread that was manufactured. The very kind of reading published in the newspapers passed under the eyes of a censor appointed by this paternal government. Before the overthrow at Sedan that paternal government was administered as well as any government of the kind.

The principle of a paternal government, Mr. Chairman, seems to be this: It assumes the control of all your money, and the entire control of the public purse, and furnishes its subjects all that they require; but the subjects are compelled to keep the purse well filled. There is nothing more, or less, in that government. But the idea of comparing this sort of government to a paternity existing in a family, is simply absurd, because the head of a family exercises a different authority from that exercised by the head of a paternal government. The head of a family maintains his offspring, and relieves them according to their necessities out of his own resources. He builds a house for them, and protects and shields them from all danger; but a paternal government assumes to carry on its affairs out of the means furnished by its subjects, or its children.

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that any allusion has been made to the fire at Pittsburgh. To the honor and credit of that city, it can be said that she refused the fifty thousand dollars which was voted to her some twenty-eight years ago. I remember well the incidents that transpired after the fire. It was not twenty-four hours afterwards before the click of the hammer and the ring of the trowel could be heard in the rapid progress of rebuilding the desolated city, which had already commenced. Her citizens went to work at once, and did not wait for aid from the general government. There were, however, large sums of money received; but the greatest possible care was taken in its distribution, and the sufferers by the fire all received their just proportion.

However, what I want to say is, that we ought not to take Pittsburg as a precedent for giving money on occasions like this, because Pittsburg did not take that money, as I am informed and believe. The very worst almoner in the entire world is the State. It costs more to maintain an invalid in a State hospital, or hospital mainly supported by State appropriations, than in any other. It costs four times as much; indeed more than that.

As to the consideration that our government is "paternal;" I am opposed to this whole idea of making this government of ours so exceedingly "paternal." It can only be a stepfather, at best, to its people. It is like the father of the man in the play: "A little more than kind, and less than kind."

I would agree, Mr. Chairman, to modify this if it could be done at this time. There are amendments pending, however, and I cannot do it at present. I merely throw out the idea that I would agree that State appropriations may be made to stay the havoc of famine and pestilence; and sometimes, perhaps, to repair the devastation of war. Beyond that I cannot go, except, perhaps, to aid "blind asylums." It certainly is necessary to stop this corruption at Harrisburg in granting these appropriations to hospitals and sectarian schools. I do know that there is no greater abuse that has prevailed at Harrisburg than this particular one. Men have been hired to go there in the name of these institutions, and they have spent money. I do not know how they got their fees for what they did, but, of course, they got them, and of course, also, they were paid out of what they got from the Legislature. It is a very great abuse. I suppose it is as great now, if not greater, than it has been, and I know that five or six years ago it was fearful. I was astonished about that time, being then president of the board of inspectors of the western penitentiary, by a man coming into my office and saying to me, "are you going to Harrisburg?" I said "no, sir; I do not know that I am; I have no business at Harrisburg that I know of." "Why," he says, "did not you make out your report here for the penitentiary the other day, and send it on, and ask thirty thousand dollars (or some such amount) to be appropriated for that institution?" I said, "yes, I did; I sent on the report and asked for the customary appropriation to pay the officers." I believe that was all we had the right to get. "Well," says he, "you had better go on." Said I, "I have nothing to do with that." "But," he says, "people do not get these things at Harrisburg unless they go there and are on hand, and pay people to let them have the appropriation." "Well," said I, "I will not go; if the State of Pennsylvania has good reasons before it, and knows very well why a demand is made for money, and she does not care to pay her officers or support her criminals according, as the law directs, I have nothing to do with it, and am not to blame for it."

This incident only shows that in a matter of that kind, where even the whole routine was prescribed and laid down, some men supposed they might get out of the officers of that institution a fee for soliciting from the Legislature money that they were compelled by the law to appropriate. That was only part and parcel of the system of abuses which had grown up under this plan of giving to all such institutions. As I said before, I would be willing to add to this section a clause in favor of extending aid in cases of sudden calamity, or pestilence, or famine, where the money might be brought to the relief of the people to check the progress of the disease, or to repair some great public and sudden injury. Beyond that, I would oppose this indiscriminate giving, and would rather the section should stand as it is, than that the principle which it is intended to cover should be destroyed.

MR. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: The committee is impatient, and justly so, of this protracted debate; and I do not rise, therefore, with the view of entering into the discussion at large which has taken place. Much of it, it seems to me, has missed the true point which ought to have presented itself to the mind in determining this question.

I should suppose that there would be absolute unanimity in the committee as to the impropriety of directing grants for sectarian purposes to sectarian institutions. I must believe there would be absolute unanimity, or almost so, among the people of the State on that subject. I cannot suppose that any gentleman would deliberately rise in this committee and advocate the doctrine that the money of the State should be appropriated to the purposes of any sect or denomination. But I draw the broad line of distinction between those cases where sects or denominations are performing the grand work of christian beneficence, where they are doing that which the State ought to do, and is bound to do, in aid of the State; and those other cases where these denominational institutions may be supposed would be promoting their own sectarian purposes. For example, the Episcopalians have a hospital in the city of Philadelphia; the Presbyterians have a hospital in the city of Philadelphia. I may regret—I do regret—that these hospitals have been designated by denominational names. I think it were wiser that they should not have been so, and yet, after all, perhaps the large contributions of individual citizens which have created and endowed these particular hospitals, were more readily called forth by the adoption of those particular names, than would otherwise have been the case. But, then, it is to be understood that it is in the discharge of no sectarian or denominational purposes that these institutions exist. They are doing the great, broad work of christian philanthropy, without regard to sect or denomination, that which it is, in very truth, the duty of the Commonwealth herself to do. Every dollar of private charity and private enterprise which is contributed to plant and support these institutions is so much done in relief of the general burden which rests—and ought to rest—upon the whole people of the State. God forbid, therefore, sir, that by any provision in the Constitution of our State, which this Convention might adopt, we should debar the State from making these grants, or making such grants in aid of such institutions as these, as she has done in the past, and, I hope, will continue to do in our time and in the future. Just so far as private benevolence does this great, broad work of christian philanthropy, it does what the State herself should do, and is relieving the State, and therefore the State may, to the extent of their reasonable demands, assist them by contributions.

But that our Constitution should provide that the money of the State should not, by donation, be applied to the especial purposes of any particular sect or denomination within the narrow limits of sectarian doctrine, I cordially agree, as I suppose every one does. I would not grant the money of the State to aid a Catholic, or a Presbyterian, or an Episcopal school or any other that was established to teach all the peculiar doctrines of any particular sect; but when that sect engages in the great broad work of public philanthropy, I cannot consent, so far as my vote goes, to withhold the liberality of the State from institutions of that character. There, I think, is the true line.

Therefore I would object to the opening words of the last amendment, as proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Dallas,) and if they were stricken out I think, perhaps, the closing words will properly convey the idea that I have in my mind.

A single word more, which I am almost ashamed to utter, particularly because I have no words to express my surprise at that which fell from the lips of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Woodward,) and partly because I fear I might be betrayed or led into a position where gentlemen might suppose that I was an advocate of corporations here. But my friend from York (Mr. J. S. Black) came so gallantly to my aid this morning—having so gallantly assailed me on Monday last—I feel that I should not be in that sort of peril, and that therefore nobody will suspect me of a leaning towards corporations or of serving their cause, except, as the gentleman from York (Mr. J. S. Black) so well said some days ago, “when they have an honest cause and want an honest advocate.” I do not agree with my friend from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) although I so widely disagree with my friend from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward.) I do not quite accept the defence of my friend from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) made for an act of mine which, I suppose, was alluded to by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward.) I do not quite agree with the doctrine that there are not institutions where corporations may well give, and largely give, and generously give, of the money of their stockholders in benevolence. I refer to a grant of fifty thousand dollars—I would have been glad that it were larger—for the soldiers’ orphans of the Commonwealth. My learned friend would condemn that; yet I advised it. Why? Because they were the orphan children of the men who had fallen, in part, in defence of the very works and property of this company. Because, passing, as its lines did, into and along the borders of the State, and exposed to the peril of destruction by rebel raids, they had been gallantly defended by the soldiers of the Commonwealth. Why should not they provide with liberal hands for the orphans of those who had fallen under such circumstances. I have known that company to give, within a few months past, twenty thousand dollars, I think, to the hospitals of the State of Pennsylvania. The doctrine of my friend would condemn that. Not so, mine. In the actual operation of the works of companies like this, many men suffer. They become maimed, they are wounded, they die. Why should that company not give liberally to endow hospitals into which these people may be carried? I have known them to give with large liberality where property has been destroyed by fire, because from the communities in which the calamity occurred large business had come to the corporation, and great benefits had been derived.

There does rest upon these corporations in certain specified cases, the duty of a large liberality, from which I would not exclude them by any such doctrine as my friend (Mr. J. S. Black) contends for, although I would hold as high aloft as he would the duty of trustees not to divert the funds entrusted to them, by devoting them to purposes for which they were not contributed. Therefore I defend such action; but after all, a great corporation, notwithstanding what has been said upon this floor, is all the days of its life a charitable institution. Its works are all works of charity, in the true and broad and comprehensive sense of that word. If it be true that the man who makes a blade of grass to grow where none grew before is a public benefactor, what shall be said of those combinations of aggregated capital that cover the Commonwealth and the whole country with the fruitage of their liberal expenditure of money? If they promote the industries of the Commonwealth, if they employ her people, if they develop her wealth, if they increase her prosperity in the broadest and the truest sense of the word, they are charitable institutions, and should be treated and regarded as such. I did not rise, sir, with the expectation of saying as much as I have said. I rose only for the purpose of calling attention to what I consider to be the true line of demarcation, which is what I indicated in the opening of my remarks, and that is that wherever sects or denominations are engaged in the great broad work of christian philanthropy, where they are engaged in doing that work which rests upon our common humanity and aids and consoles the sorrows of our common humanity, I see no reason why the bowels of compassion of the State should be shut up, or she should be prevented from exercising a fair and reasonable liberality in the endowments of institutions of that character.

Mr. KATINE. Mr. Chairman. I simply rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the chairman of the committee of the whole to the fact that there does not appear to be a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask that the roll be called?

Mr. KATINE. I do.

The CLERK called the roll, and the following answered to their names:

Messrs. Achenbach, Alricks, Armstrong, Baer, Baily, (Perry,) Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bartholomew, Beebe, Biddle, Black, J. S., Bowman, Boyd, Brodhead, Church, Corbett, Craig, Curry, Curtin, Cuyler, Dallas, Darlington, Davis, De France, Dodd, Ellis, Ewing, Guthrie, Hanna, Harvey, Hay, Horton, Howard, Kaine, Landis, Lawrence, Littleton, MacConnell, M'Camant, M'Clean, M'Culloch, Mann, Mantor, Minor, Mott, Newlin, Porter, Pughe, Purman, Purviance, Sam'l A., Read, John R., Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, James L., Russell, Simpson, Smith, Wm. H., Stanton, Struthers, Walker, Wherry, White, Harry, White, J. W. F., Worrell, Meredith, President—63.

NOT PRESENT. — Messrs. Addicks, Ainey, Andrews, Baker, Bannan, Barclay, Bardsley, Black, Charles A., Broomall, Brown, Buckalew, Campbell, Carey, Carter, Cassidy, Clark, Cochran, Collins, Corson, Cronmiller, Dunning, Edwards, Elliott, Fell, Finney, Fulton, Funck, Gibson, Gilpin, Gowen, Green, Hall, Hazard, Hemphill, Heverin, Hunsicker, Knight, Lamberton, Lear, Lilly, Long, M'Allister, M'Murray, MacVeagh, Metzger, Niles, Palmer, G. W., Palmer, H. W., Parsons, Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Patton, Purviance, John N., Reynolds, S. H., Rooke, Ross, Runk, Sharpe, Smith, H. G., Smith, Henry W., Stewart, Temple, Turrell, Van Reed, Wetherill, J. M., Wetherill, John Price, White, David N., Woodward and Wright.

The CHAIRMAN. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I move the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the only report the chairman could make to the Convention, would be that the roll being called, there was no quorum present.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I move the committee rise and report the fact of no quorum being present in the Convention.

The motion was agreed to.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The committee of the whole have had under consideration the report of the Committee on Legislation, and upon the call of the roll it was ascertained that there was no quorum present, and for that reason the committee has arisen.

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. President: I move the Sergeant-at-Arms be sent for the absent members.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. President: I move the Convention do now adjourn.

The yeas and nays were required by Mr. Boyd and Mr. S. A. Purviance, and were as follow, viz:

Y E A S.

Messrs. Achenbach, Bear, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bartholomew, Beebe, Black, J. S., Bowman, Brodhead, Carter, Corbett, Craig, Dallas, Davis, Ellis, Ewing, Guthrie, Hanna, Landis, MacConnell, McCamant, Mott, Newlin, Porter, Read, John R., Simpson, Stanton, Struthers, Walker, Wherry, White, Harry, Woodward and Worrell—32.

N A Y S.

Messrs. Alricks, Andrews, Armstrong, Baily, (Perry,) Biddle, Boyd, Church,

Curtin, Cuyler, Darlington, De France, Dodd, Hay, Horton, Howard, Kaine, Lawrence, McClean, McCulloch, Mann, Mantor, Minor, Purviance, Sam'l A., Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, James L., Russell, Smith, H. G., Smith, Wm. H., White, J. F. W. and Meredith, President—29.

ABSENT OR NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Adicks, Ainey, Baker, Bannan, Barclay, Bardsley, Black, Charles A., Broomall, Brown, Buckalew, Campbell, Carey, Cassidy, Clark, Cochran, Collins, Corson, Cornmiller, Curry, Dunning, Edwards, Elliott, Fell, Finney, Fulton, Funck, Gibson, Gilpin, Gowen, Green, Hall, Harvey, Hazzard, Hemphill, Heverin, Hunsicker, Knight, Lamberton, Lear, Lilly, Littleton, Long, M'Allister, M'Murray, MacVeagh, Metzger, Niles, Palmer, G. W., Palmer, H. W., Parsons, Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Patton, Pughe, Purman, Purviance, John N., Reynolds, S. H., Rooke, Ross, Runk, Sharpe, Smith, Henry W., Stewart, Temple, Turrell, Van Reed, Wetherill, J. M., Wetherill, John Price, White, David N. and Wright—71.

So the Convention, at one o'clock and twenty-five minutes, adjourned until next Monday at ten o'clock A. M.

SIXTY-EIGHTH DAY.

MONDAY, March 17, 1873.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M., the President, Hon. Wm. M. Meredith in the chair. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SESSIONS OF THE CONVENTION.

Mr. DE FRANCE offered the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That this Convention will hereafter hold two different sessions, the first as follows: From ten o'clock A. M. to one o'clock P. M., and from three o'clock P. M. to six o'clock P. M.

On the question to proceed to a second reading and consideration of the resolution, it was not agreed to.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DARLINGTON asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Boyd for a few days.

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Turrell, for a few days.

THE ARTICLE ON LEGISLATION.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the committee of the whole having risen on Saturday, for a want of a quorum, the article reported by the Committee on Legislation is still in that committee. If it is desired that the Convention shall proceed to the consideration of the article, a motion will be necessary.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. President: I move that the committee now resolve itself in committee of the whole for the purpose of considering that article.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. Armstrong in the chair.

STATE AID.

The CHAIRMAN. The twenty-first section of the report of the Committee on Legislation is before the committee. The section will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 21. No appropriation shall be made to any person or community, nor to any denominational or sectarian institution, corporation or association, for charitable, educational or benevolent purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. To this section the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Hay) moved an amendment, which will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"No appropriation shall be made for any denominational or sectarian purpose, or to any institution, corporation or association, created and maintained for objects, limited or restricted by any particular religious, denominational or sectarian views."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas) moved an amendment to that amendment, which will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"No appropriation shall be made to any denominational or sectarian institution, nor for any denominational or sectarian object."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I have thus far abstained from saying anything upon this subject, but I have been approached by so many members of the Convention this morning with the request that I should state the object and scope of my amendment, that I find it necessary to rise simply for the purpose of explaining it, and I do not desire to occupy the attention of the committee any longer than is necessary for that purpose. The gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Ewing) did me the honor to say that I had prepared the amendment in a most skillful manner, so as to entirely emasculate the section as reported. Now, sir, I can only say that no such purpose was in my mind, and if my amendment would affect such a result, then so far from being skillful I have been most awkward in the expression of my intention, for whilst I did intend to take from the section a feature which, in my judgment, seemed to be objectionable, viz: That which would prevent the State from making appropriations in aid of non-sectarian charity, I did think the section was beneficial so far as it proposed to prevent a State appropriation for merely sectarian or denominational purpose. Therefore the amendment I have offered provides that no appropriation shall be made for any denominational or sectarian objects; but, sir, I think the amendment would be very inefficient indeed if it stopped there, because if we allow the State to make an appropriation to denominational or sectarian institutions, we might as well say that we will permit appropriations to denominational or sectarian objects.

It is true that very many and very worthy charities, although under the control of different sects, are not confined in their benefits to those who are of the denomination controlling the charity; still every charitable institution established and supported by the members of one denomination becomes a propagander of its faith. The hospitals which they endow, and even the schools which they establish, become monuments to the sects that endow or support them, and the teachers, physicians and nurses become the active and able missionaries of that sect to which the institution immediately belongs; and now, sir, while it is true, and while I agree thoroughly with all the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) has stated upon that point, that the charity of the State of Pennsylvania is largely, if not entirely, due to the efforts of christian denominations, and that all our christian churches are marching in the same general path of christian charity towards one end, still the corner stone of our political system is that the church and State should be disunited, and it is unfair and injurious to the churches themselves that they should be allowed to contend for appropriations from the State treasury in support of their several peculiar doctrines and peculiar faith, notwithstanding that it may be done under the sweet name of charity. Such aid can not forward charity; but the result must be that each church which proposes to build hospitals or other large and expensive buildings for benevolent uses, will undertake more than its congregation can support, with the hope that larger appropriations may be obtained from the State. Each church should endow its own charities and support them out of the contributions of its own congregations, and the charity of the State should be kept in the control of the State, and it's officers should manage and be responsible for its asylums for the deaf and dumb, the blind and the halt. If an appropriation is made to one church it will occasion trouble by being considered unfair to other denominations, and therefore the Legislature should be prohibited from making appropriations to any sectarian or denominational institution, and so place the whole subject permanently at rest. These, Mr. Chairman, are the reasons which have influenced me in offering this amendment. It is in substance that no appropriation shall be made to any denominational or sectarian institution, nor for any sectarian or denominational object.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I do not rise to trouble the committee with any extended remarks, after all that has been said upon this subject. I simply desire to place myself upon the record as being opposed to all sectarian appropriations. I am in favor of an entire, radical and complete separation of the church and State. Religion and politics should be kept as far apart as the poles, and it is utterly impossible for a government to legislate for sectarian purposes, directly or indirectly, without seriously menacing that freedom of conscience so indispensable in all good governments, and which should be so jealously guarded. It seems to me not only is it necessary to adopt that portion of the report of the committee, so far as it relates to sectarian appropriations, but I am of the opinion that all these appropriations are now contrary to the spirit of our institutions, and contrary to the present Constitution of the State. I can see no right or power in the Legislature, even now, to appropriate public moneys to any sectarian institution whatever. Why, sir, the result of permitting this kind of legislation, if carried to its logical consequences, would be to justify the establishment of a paternal system of government, as in France and other continental countries, wherein the governments legislate, not only for life and property, but for the comfort and morals of the people. Such systems have invariably ended in despotism. Again, in everything that is calculated to encourage and promote charitable objects, the fullest opportunity should be allowed, and is desirable; for the exercise of individual efforts, for when it is known that the government takes care of the poor and needy, and performs all the duties of our charitable institutions, the stimulus for personal exertion will be greatly lessened. I am opposed to that portion of the report of the committee which proposes to prevent the Legislature from appropriating money to individuals or communities, because there are cases in which it is proper that the State should pension those who have performed valuable services for it, and there are cases of great public calamity, in which I would leave it in the power of the Legislature to afford that relief which may be necessary and proper, but so much of the report of the committee as is opposed to sectarian legislation I shall support.

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: As much as I dislike to take up the time of the committee, I cannot forbear to say a few words on a subject which I esteem as of more than ordinary importance. Since this Convention commenced its sessions, last November, I have not taken up one-half hour of its time in presenting my views on the various subjects which came before it, and I should not now trouble the committee did I not infer from the tenor of the debate that the merits of the section under consideration were not estimated at their true value.

I shall not occupy the time of the committee on that part of the section which restricts the bounty of the State in cases of some great and sudden calamity by fire or flood, or the casualties of war, further than to say that I approved the spirit of it, and believe that it would prevent more evil than to reject it would ever do good. It is impossible for the State to relieve all such calamities without changing the very object and spirit of good government, and opening the flood gates of every species of corruption and speculation. If you cannot relieve all, then you cannot, in justice, relieve any. All the citizens of the State stand on an equality in this respect. If a fire burns down my house, or a sudden flood sweeps away my property, and leaves me impoverished, have I not as good a right to the bounty of the State as if one hundred or a thousand persons were ruined at the same time? Does the number who suffer increase the magnitude of the calamity to each individual? The old adage, that "misery loves company," is a true one. A calamity is harder to bear singly and alone, than if others around you partake of the same sufferings. Therefore if a severe blow falls upon an individual he has just as much claim upon the charity of the State as if the same blow fell upon a number of individuals. The war found Pittsburg with vast property—with her steamboats, her coal barges, her thousands of tons of coal, her enormous quantities of manufactures, her cotton, which she had bought and paid for, within the rebel lines, and all of which was speedily confiscated. Millions were lost in a day, and men in affluence went down never to rise again. Did Pittsburg ask the State to pay for these losses? No, sir; it was one of the incidents of the war which could not be provided against; and it was a loss which no government could undertake to pay without ruin.

But, Mr. Chairman, I leave this part of the subject to consider what I deem of more importance, the entire prohibition of State appropriations to charitable or educational institutions under the control of religious sects or denominations. And here let me say that I base my opposition to such appropriations on a somewhat different ground to that taken by the gentleman from Schuylkill. I do not, with him, believe that these heaven-born charities would flow as well without christianity as with it. On the contrary, I hold that all, or nearly all, the genuine charities which so ennoble humanity and bless our land are born of christianity, sustained by christianity, and that without christianity they would perish. Furthermore, I believe that the division of christianity into sects and denominations has greatly tended to increase the number and improve the character of charitable and educational institutions, and has opened up streams of benevolence which, but for them, would have been dry and arid.

I do not oppose christian benevolence. Would to God it were a thousand times more than it is. Would to God that the untold millions of money, worse than wasted upon the artificial appetite for strong drink in this city alone, were turned into streams of benevolence instead of into avalanches of ruin. But I oppose all connections, except the simple protection of the law, between the institutions of religion and the civil and political institutions of the State. The Great Teacher said, "My kingdom is not of this world," and He laid down His life in attestation of this sublime declaration. As a citizen, He worked a miracle to procure the means to pay a tax due the State, but after the State demanded of Him that He should subordinate His faith and His conscience to its dictation, He refused.

Connection between the church and the State has, in all ages, worked injury to the church, and I may say to the State also. Separated, each following their proper, and, I believe, God-given sphere, they have mutually benefited each other, and each has been stronger for the other. Bring them into adulterous connection, and indifferentism, hypocrisy, irreligion and downright infidelity is the unlawful progeny.

For the last three hundred years Europe has been struggling to throw off the fearful incubus of the union of church and State, which has trammelled both parties. Mr. Gladstone, the great prime minister, succeeded, partially, in divorcing the State church in Ireland from the control and patronage of the State, but he has gone down in trying to organize an Irish university, in which both Catholics and Protestants could be taught. Happily, we, in this country, are free from the complications which so fetter the State and dwarf the church in the old world. Our fathers, with consummate wisdom, confined our government to its legitimate sphere, and left religion free from all trammels and disabilities to work out its own grand uses and results. Of late years, and it is only of late years, denominational charities have been knocking at the door of the treasury, and demanding to share in the funds levied and collected for purely State purposes. It is to stop this evil, at almost its inception, that the section under consideration has been proposed. Our State has not suffered much from it yet, but a sister State has, and the warning should not go unheeded.

Let it be once understood that denominational institutions for charitable and educational purposes can be supported, in whole or in part, from the public funds, and the demands will yearly increase and be persistently urged. Each denomination will claim its share, and according to its voting power will finally demand that its claims be granted. The unholy scramble will dishonor religion, and impoverish the State, and worse than all the rest, will dry up the fountains of private benevolence.

There are certain great charities which peculiarly belong to the State, and which church or private charities cannot so well reach and manage; such as asylums for the insane, the blind, the deaf and dumb, and houses of refuge and other reformatory institutions. Add to these the common school, and while the necessity lasts, the soldiers' orphan schools, and there the State should stop. All other charities can be better managed by counties and cities, with their homes for the destitute, and by the different christian denominations, with their orphan asylums, their homes for the friendless, and the various other ways in which the true spirit of christianity reaches out to relieve and bless mankind. While the State furnishes to each child within its borders the facilities for acquiring a good common school education, it should not attempt, from the public funds, to establish and endow academies and universities. These should be left to associations, to religious denominations, and to the munificence of wealthy and benevolent individuals. Unless the State furnishes to all its youth the means of acquiring a liberal education, she cannot, in justice, furnish it to a part; and if she furnishes it to one city or county, all the rest have an equal claim.

The gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Hunsicker) says that if we adopt this section we shall array all the christian denominations against the Constitution. Never was a man more mistaken. It is the very protection which the Protestant denominations want, and which they have recommended and demanded in their papers, and assemblies, and conferences. If the State could dole out to each denomination the amount to which each was entitled from its numerical strength, or the amount of its voting or taxing power, there might be some thoughtless and shortsighted persons to be found in the churches who would favor it. But the church, in its aggregate capacity, comprehending its wisest and most devoted members and rulers, will say amen to this section; and I believe this to be true of the Catholic as well as the Protestant.

The church has never been so grand, so successful and so powerful, as when she has stood alone, untrammelled, unsupported by the civil powers. I have no doubt that the Catholic church in this country is to-day far stronger, and wields a greater influence over the minds of its votaries, than if, in any form, it was supported by the State. Would the great Methodist church of this country be what it is if it had leaned upon the State? I pray God to save it from any such terrible calamity as to become, in the least manner, a pensioner on the public treasury. Most of us are old enough to recollect the grand spectacle of two thousand Scottish ministers leaving their churches and their snug manse, and going out they knew not where, without churches in which to preach, and without houses to live in, because they could not conscientiously accept the bounty of the State with the conditions imposed. Thus was formed the Free Church of Scotland, through which to-day throbs the religious heart of that sturdy people. They have now more churches, more manses, more wealth, more power, than they had before, and do ten-fold more for the evangelization of the world and to advance the Kingdom of Christ,

Mr. Chairman, if it is desired to preserve the State from the machinations of designing men who put on the livery of heaven for their own selfish purposes; if it is desired to preserve the church pure, to promote its material as well as its spiritual prosperity, and to advance its moral power; if it is desired that all the noble and lovely charities which arise and grow and flourish in the churches, and, like a perennial stream, fructify and beautify the arid wastes of life, shall continue to prosper; if it is not desired that all private streams of benevolence should dry up, from the blasting effects of trusting in State aid, pass this section, and the christian people who shall fill all the valleys, and cover the hills, and spread over the plains of this noble Commonwealth, in the long years to come, will rise and call you blessed.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman: I imagine there must be some misapprehension in the minds of the members of the committee with regard to the question which is before us. The debate so far has proceeded upon the assumption that we have here presented for our consideration a question that is entirely new, whereas the very opposite is the truth. The debate in the committee of the whole for the last three days has been confined almost entirely to the question whether we shall embody in the Constitution, a proviso that there should no appropriation by the Legislature for sectarian purposes. Now, sir, this proposition is not a new one. The attention of the committee has, by several gentlemen, been called to the fact that the Committee on Education has already reported a provision of that kind; but, sir, I believe that it has not been fully understood by the committee, else this debate would not have proceeded to the extent that it has.

If gentlemen will turn to their files they will find that the fifth section of the report of the Committee on Education, as reported from the committee of the whole, reads as follows:

SECTION 5. Neither the Legislature nor any county, city, borough, school district or other public or municipal corporation shall ever make any appropriation, grant or donation of land, money or property of any kind to any church or religious society, or to or for the use of any university, college, seminary, academy or school, or any literary, scientific or charitable institution or society controlled or managed, either in whole or in part, by any church or sectarian denomination.

The committee of the whole has passed upon that proposition. It was amended in committee of the whole and was adopted. Now the question is, do we desire to embody in the Constitution a second proposition covering the same ground that this does? The section reported by the Committee on Education is far broader in its terms, and far more comprehensive in its grasp, than the one under consideration. Therefore I take it that those who are opposed to making such appropriations are prepared to vote against the section now, because it has already been provided for, whilst those who are in favor of such appropriations are equally prepared to vote against it because the section is against their views.

I do not desire now to discuss the question as to whether or not the Legislature ought to do this or not, because the committee having passed upon it, I think it is now a waste of time to do so. I, for myself, am in favor of restricting the Legislature so far as sectarian appropriations are concerned, not because I love the State too much, not because I love the objects of the bounty of the State too little, but upon the ground that I love the church more; because, sir, I take this view, that the very moment you allow the Legislature to make appropriations to this and that sectarian denomination you throw into the church a firebrand which will inflame and consume it. I do not, therefore, desire to discuss this part of the question; and if there was nothing else of the section now under consideration, there would be no difficulty about it.

There remains, however, the question whether this Convention should prevent the Legislature from appropriating sums of money to "persons" or "communities." Now, sir, I am opposed to restricting the Legislature in this respect. I think that this Convention ought to arrive at a proper conception of the dignity, of the responsibility, of the functions and prerogatives of the Legislature. For one, I am not in favor of dwarfing its power. I do not favor the proposition to rob it of that sovereignty which properly belongs to it. The idea of our form of government is that the sovereignty of the people, except such wholesome restrictions as the Constitution may impose, shall be vested in the Legislature; and the very moment you attempt to take away from it that power which naturally belongs to it, you impose upon it fetters which not only detract from its sovereignty, but to a great extent derogate from its dignity and its usefulness. Numerous restrictions may make it powerless for evil; but on the other hand, they may make it powerless for good.

I do not desire to discuss this question fully. I think it has already been fully discussed. There has been a great deal of time already consumed in debate upon it, and it occurs to me that the minds of members are made up to vote against the section and to vote against the amendments. For the reasons which have been stated, and for such reasons as I have now briefly repeated, I hope a vote may be reached during the morning.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman: As my native town of Somerset has been introduced into this discussion, I am compelled to give the reason for the vote that I shall give, and I here and now utterly deny that the question of international law has anything whatever to do, or could by any possibility have anything to do, with the question that arose between the border claims and the compensation which, it is claimed, the State is liable to make. That principle is one that must rest upon the reciprocal rights and duties of the citizen and the State. If the doctrine that has been proclaimed here by the gentlemen from Indiana is to be endorsed, then the next time you get up a rebellion, and you send him and others about this broad State to preach and plead, in the name of patriotism and loyalty, the people will tell you that they have adopted the definition of Doctor Johnson, that the plea of patriotism and loyalty is nothing more than the last refuge for scoundrels. Sir, if this State owes no protection to her citizens, when she claims the right to tax them, the right to take them from their families and place them beyond the borders of the State, in order to protect other people and other communities, then the relation ceases, and there should be no reason in law, as there is none in common sense, why any man should obey the command of the supreme power of the State. I say that the right for compensation for the citizens of the border counties exists as a matter of law and right. If they are to be taken away from their homes, and confronted to the public enemy's bullets, liable to be shot down at any moment, in defence of the institutions of the State, what consideration have they for such service? Why, sir, if in their absence their property shall be destroyed by an invading force, are they to be met, when they ask for reimbursement, with the answer: "No, you shall not have it, because when you come to the Legislature to ask for an appropriation from the State, so that the burden might fall lightly upon all this State, it may possibly be attended by some corruption." Upon whom does this liability for this corruption lie, (if there is any corruption used in the Legislature,) when men are asking appropriations for a purpose like that? Where the State is liable. I say it rests largely upon the gentleman from Indiana, who, in his holy horror for such contributions, will not stand up in defence of the right, but withholds his aid, and thereby makes it possible and necessary for men, in order to get their rights, to buy up a set of scoundrels. If the honest men of the Legislature had stood up to do what is right, they would possibly have limited the claim to a reasonable amount. But by withholding their votes from a just claim they may have made it necessary, if all be true that has been set forth here, to increase the bill, in order that they might raise money enough to pay some rascals whose votes were necessary to be bought.

I do not believe in degrading the Legislature of this great Commonwealth, but if you pass this, and other kindred iniquities, why not go farther, and get up a proposition to abolish the Legislature altogether. If the one hundred and thirty-three men that are annually sent there have not intelligence and morality enough to determine what is right or wrong, when a particular emergency like this arises, without requiring votes to be purchased for an honest cause, then abolish your Legislature, and give us a centralized power, and say that one man shall rule. I believe in no such doctrine, nor do I believe in the doctrine that has been promulgated here, that misery loves company, and that therefore a huge misfortune, that will devastate a whole section, is easier to be borne than where a single individual is stricken down. We all know that when any single man in the community is burned out, that his neighbors will all come to his rescue, and out of their own funds they will put him on his feet again. But when a whole community is stricken down, to whom will they look for aid, if the great State of Pennsylvania shall lock up the treasures that she has in her coffers? Do you want us to say that all that is worth preserving in the State is the almighty dollar? That the people themselves, upon whom all the greatness of the State depends, are not worth upholding and preserving? If so, then strike them down by endorsing this proposition, and say that all this people care for is money; that the people are nothing; that the morals and principles of this great State are nothing whatever, but all greatness depends upon the almighty dollar. That seems to be the drift of the argument here, but what amount has there ever been contributed at any one time in relief of the charities of the State? Why, sir, half a million of dollars will cover all that the State has paid in the last quarter of a century, for appropriations of this kind, a mere pittance, perhaps, of a shilling a voter. And who is complaining? If the State can do without communities, if it is by accident, and not fault that a community is stricken down, shall it be kept down, and shall it not lend its aid in the future, in the grand development and progress of the State? If so, then put this principle in the fundamental law and cut off all these charities.

But I go further, and I say that the entire section ought to be wiped out, as it is an insult to the age. It is yielding to the clamor of infidelity, that claims that there shall be nothing done in the way of public charity for the reason, forsooth, that the denominations which receive the charity are sectarian. Sectarian, though they be, and in this country all christianity is sectarian, they are yet institutions under the care of the christian religion, and I care not whether a man be Catholic or whether he be Protestant, if his religion is based upon Jesus Christ as the son of the living God, he is my fellow and my brother, and the cry that is gotten up against Catholicism, here to-day, can have no weight with me. As between Catholicism and Protestantism, I am a Protestant. As between Catholicism and infidelity, I am a Catholic, now and forever. I am for a religion always in preference to no religion. And now, sir, when the great mass of the people of this State believe in the doctrines of one or the other of the sects in existence among the christian churches, shall we restrict this charity in this form? Why is this advocated? Is it because of an article that we see now on our desks, headed, "the platform of the Liberals, or Free Religionists" of the country, a party organized, as that was, with a capital of $100,000, and which has sent to Europe for a man to come here and stump this entire State, at a salary of $15,000 per year, in advocacy of the right of independence and free feeling in religion, but really in advocacy of the doctrine of no religion at all? What is the demand of these "Liberals?"

"We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

"We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts, shall wholly cease.

"We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation, under the pains and penalties of perjury, shall be established in its stead.

"We demand that all laws, directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath, shall be repealed.

"We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of 'christian' morality, shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights and impartial liberty."

I admit that the gentlemen who are present here to-day do not suppose so, but they are unconsciously acting directly in the interests of an infidelity which is now ready to make an attack upon this great State. Is this Convention going to give over this great State to the infidels of Europe, on the pretence that this Government is founded upon religious toleration? I say, for one, never. If the hordes from Europe are deterred from coming here because of the religious sentiment of this State, let them stay away.

I can readily foresee that if this effort to surrender the moral and religious sentiment of this country to the infidelity of modern Europe, is persisted in, that the time is not far distant when an organization will arise, and, as a democrat, I shall be one of the first to join it, which will of necessity proclaim that "Americans shall rule America," and thenceforward the loose morals of other countries shall not be endured by adopting its advocates. For these reasons I hope the section will be voted down.

Mr. ALDRICKS. Mr. Chairman: It is difficult, at this distance, to get the eye of the chairman; but I fear it will be far more difficult to get the ears of the members of the Convention. Although this subject has been ventilated at some length, I apprehend it has not yet been properly considered. The power should be conferred on the Legislature to grant pensions and annuities to soldiers and their widows as heretofore; to make becoming mementoes for meritorious, signal, civil and military services, and, in the event of an inevitable calamity, to make an appropriation to meet the immediate pressing necessities of an impoverished community; but there should be no appropriation for a sectarian purpose.

Now, Mr. Chairman, some of our number are strongly in favor of conferring upon the Legislature the power of relieving the necessities of a community suddenly overtaken by a great calamity. The suffering which was occasioned by the great fire at Boston filled the hearts of that community with sadness, and the Legislature was quick to grant relief, but the Supreme Court of that State have said that the Legislature had no power in the premises, and that the law under which that grant was made was unconstitutional. Then, Mr. Chairman, it has been said that charity is one of the prerogatives of a great Commonwealth like that of Pennsylvania; but it has been well replied that the Commonwealth has her noble public charities, her institutions for the blind, the deaf and dumb and insane, and houses of refuge, &c. These institutions are all abundantly provided for in the section we have just passed. The gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Sharpe,) who addressed this Convention on Saturday, deprecated the idea that we should place hand-cuffs and manacles on the Legislature.

Now, Mr. Chairman, wherever we give them authority it ought to be to do something that will be for the public good, and wherever it will not be for the public good we should place a restriction upon their power. This Convention has been called here for the very purpose of placing restrictions upon the Legislature —if the gentleman prefers the word "manacles" he can use that term.

The impression appears to prevail here that the Legislature are the directors of a vast benevolent society, extending throughout the Commonwealth; and that the members elect are to disburse the public funds among the numerous applicants knocking at the door of the treasury; are, in short, elected for the purpose of relieving special wants. This, I apprehend, is a great mistake. The members of the Legislature are not commissioners of public charities; the people do not so consider it. If our legislators were sent to the State capital for that purpose, I think the difficulty might be remedied by placing that power in other hands nearer home, by committing it to the county commissioners, or to some other authority, instead of placing it in the hands of the Legislature, whose chief business is to make our laws. I therefore apprehend that it is a great mistake in supposing that the law makers are required to give so much of their attention to this subject of charity.

There was an exhibition here on Saturday which warned us of the danger of parties becoming excited, and as they will whenever the question of the appropriation of money is concerned. The gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) made some unfortunate allusion, which I did not hear, to an appropriation which had been made for the relief of Chambersburg. The remarks brought the gentleman from Adams (Mr. McClean) to the floor, who indignantly resented the attack, and the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) was also pursued by the ponderous blows of the distinguished gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Sharpe.) There was every probability of this peaceable body witnessing a border raid on a limited scale.

It is for the purpose of preventing the introduction into our Legislature of such exciting questions, that we should place a restriction upon the Legislature, and not throw open the treasury's strong box and bid the poor unfortunates throughout the State to walk in and help themselves, and such a course would bankrupt this Commonwealth. The Legislature is sent to the capital for the purpose of making laws for the people, and not for the purpose of devising means of relieving those who have been overcome by misfortune.

I was very glad to hear that the members of this Convention were almost unanimously in favor of divorcing church and State. I say that I am glad that we can meet upon common ground, and that we can agree on that question.

This brings me to the next division of the proposition before the Convention, that there shall be no appropriation for any sectarian purpose. That provision has been incorporated in the much-abused Constitution of Illinois, I hope the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) will permit me to say, and also in the Constitutions of Indiana, Wisconsin, Missouri, Michigan, Oregon and Minnesota. I apprehend therefore that we cannot be charged with tramping upon new ground, but that we are following in the way adopted in other States, and I, for one, would be disposed to say that if contributions are to be made under the direction of the State they should not be for sectarian purposes, but I do not know whether the proposition as it is now before the Convention entirely meets the views of all the gentlemen in the Convention. I would much prefer if it was placed in the following form, which I think would meet all the exigencies of the case: "Pensions and annuities may be granted to soldiers and their widows. Becoming mementoes may be made for past meritorious civil or military service, and in the event of a great inevitable calamity a reasonable sum may be appropriated only to supply the immediate pressing necessities of the impoverished community, but no appropriation shall be made for a sectarian purpose." I suppose the gentleman who has offered this amendment would prefer the phraseology in which it is couched, and I will not therefore press the amendment which I have suggested, although I am fully convinced that it would meet the case more fully than any which has yet been presented to the Convention.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: If I am able to comprehend the force of the arguments which have been made in opposition to this section, I think there is a very great departure on the part of some of the delegates from the spirit and purpose of the original founders of this government. This section now under consideration has been denounced in unmeasured terms by some delegates upon this floor, and one would think, from listening to them, that the members of the committee which reported it were heartless and unfeeling, and had no sympathy with the great charities of this Commonwealth. Why, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there is a great perversion of language upon the part of many delegates in discussing this question. For myself I utterly deny that the appropriations which have been made out of the Treasury of Pennsylvania by the Legislature are charities in any proper sense of that word, and I utterly deny that the appropriations that have been made under the name of charity have either blessed the giver or the one who received them; and if I am correct in this understanding of the fact, then clearly they are not charities, for charity always blesses the person who gives and the person who receives; but charity, in order to do this, must be the individual gift of the person who bestows it. It is not those who take money out of the Treasury of the Commonwealth who feel the beneficial influence of a charitable gift when they bestow it, and there has been a result connected with all the efforts made to obtain money from the State for all these purposes, as far as I am informed, precisely the contrary to the effect produced by private charity. The appropriations which have been made have not produced those happy results which flow from the free-will offerings of persons who gave their own funds. They have been obtained by importunities, and by means of an influence that has been brought to bear upon the members that ought to be kept entirely away from the Legislature.

I read in a morning paper yesterday, a dispatch from Harrisburg, which shows the character of the efforts made to get this money out of the treasury, and is, to my mind, a conclusive argument in favor of the purposes of the section under consideration. I ask the attention of the delegates to this dispatch to the Philadelphia Press. In speaking of the appropriation bill it says: "There was a frightful amount of money asked for local charitable purposes, in which the most invidious distinctions were made, well calculated to create dissatisfaction and mistrust." This is the difficulty that always enters into appropriations for these local charities. They can be, in no sense, called State charities, for they are always invidious, and are well calculated to create dissatisfaction. This is the universal fact, and it cannot be otherwise, for whenever the Legislature undertakes to make these appropriations for local and special charities, they are always of such an invidious nature that they confer relief upon a very few, while the great mass of the people of the Commonwealth are entirely deprived of the beneficial influences which are expected to result from them. This correspondent, who is the regular and trusted one, says that the applications made for appropriations to local charities in the present Legislature are frightful in their amount, and, Mr. Chairman, they will go on increasing from year to year, if some such provision is not inserted in the Constitution. They have been increasing rapidly for the last few years, until, as this record shows, they have become frightful in their amount. They are not of the character as represented by several gentlemen on this floor, insignificant and of no consequence. They have already become of the character described by this correspondent. Sir, they are invidious, creating heart-burnings, and dissatisfaction, and bitter opposition. That is not the effect of charity. No man can point to a charitable gift that has produced any such effect as that. Its whole influence to all persons that it operates upon, is precisely of the opposite character—beneficial—creating a healthy influence, and exerting a great moral effect for good. But these attempts to take money from the Treasury of the State are always of the character as described by this correspondent, invidious, creating dissensions and bitter oppositions. I say to the gentleman from Somerset, (Mr. Baer,) who spoke this morning about the improper influences that had been brought to bear in favor of appropriations to the district in which he was so much interested, that if the honest members of that body had given their support there would have been no necessity of applying to the dishonest ones. I tell the gentleman that he is mistaken; that nearly every honest man in the Legislature was opposed to the appropriation, and was driven into its support by the persistent efforts that were made, and for other reasons which I never quite comprehended.

Nobody denies that it is the duty of Pennsylvania to take care of the insane, and we have made provisions for that. There never was a voice in the Legislature in opposition to any honest and proper method of taking care of the insane, but to what extent does it go? Not to pay the expenses of maintaining the insane people. That is either done by the friends of the insane, or by the counties from which they come. Not in a single instance has the State of Pennsylvania been asked to pay the expenses of insane people, so that the statement the gentleman made in opposition to this section as to the shame of allowing these people to go at large or to be improperly provided for, is of no force. The State of Pennsylvania has never undertaken to do more than to furnish suitable buildings, and has done this with a lavish hand, and no one objects to it. All that is asked is that these institutions shall be properly located, and that the funds appropriated for their construction shall be properly expended, and that is all the duty which the State has ever undertaken to discharge towards these people; simply to pay the expense for erecting the buildings, and that is not a charity. It does not come within the meaning of this section by any fair construction of language. It does not touch any duty which the State has ever undertaken to discharge towards any of the unfortunate people of this Commonwealth.

The poor, the blind, the halt and the insane are not touched by any provisions of this section. They are to be provided for in the future, as they have been in the past, by furnishing suitable buildings, and paying suitable officers for the purpose of taking care of them. This appeal, therefore; this attempt to excite the prejudice of the delegates, by introducing that feature into this discussion, is absurd. This section is simply a recommendation on the part of the committee to prevent invidious appropriations to local individuals or communities. I say there is no ground or necessity for it. The greatest calamity which ever occurred on American soil by fire was relieved by private free-will offerings, as witness the spontaneous relief, from all parts of the United States, to the sufferers of Chicago, when she was burned to ashes. There has never been a failure to respond to calls for charity, and there never will be if the proper channels of charity are appealed to. The people will always respond promptly for the relief of all who deserve charity, without going to the funds in the Treasury of the State, or of the nation.

There is, therefore, no possible danger of any difficulty ever occurring by the insertion of this section into the Constitution. I agree with the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. Alricks,) that the section is not worded in the best form. Listening to his suggestion, I believe that I would have preferred the section to have been in the language which he proposed, but the spirit of this section ought to go into the Constitution.

The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) read, a few days ago, from the Declaration of Independence, the immortal document of Thomas Jefferson, wherein he states the reason why the colonies had a right to become free and independent, and among these was, that they had a right to do what independent States may, and of right should do, and therefore this section is wrong. While I subscribe very heartily to the statement of Thomas Jefferson read to us, I cannot, for the life of me, understand how it bears upon this section, for the committee which reported it think that this thing of making invidious appropriations for local charity is one of the things which a State ought not to do, and has no right to do. And the gentleman did not explain, so far as we could hear, by what right they should do it. The State should use the public funds, as the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. Alricks) said, for the good of all the people, not for a small part of them. We have arrived at that stage of jealousy in the use of the State funds which compels us to say that neither the State nor any county shall help construct public improvements. Now the building of public improvements comes far nearer to benefiting all the people than any of these local charities can do, and if any appropriation of the public funds for any outside legitimate purposes of the State should be made, it ought to be made for the opening of great public improvements, for that will benefit all the people.

Just see how these appropriations which this section is intended to put a stop to operate. There is an item in the appropriation bill now before the Legislature to give to a town $75,000. Now does anybody believe that that town has suffered more than many other towns in the Commonwealth, during the year? At the very time when the appropriation was being passed through the Legislature for the town of Mifflin, the business part of the town of Tioga, in Tioga county, was burned to the ground, and when the gentleman from that district moved to add an appropriation of $5,000 for the sufferers there, it was voted out, receiving hardly a dozen votes; and yet they were situated precisely alike. In both cases the whole heart of the town was burned up; but one received an appropriation of $20,000, and the other not a cent, and so it will always be. The town that can bring the most influence to its support will get the most money, and the towns that are out of the way, and not heard of much, will get none. This thing of towns being injured by fire is something that is constantly occurring. I am informed that another town in northern Pennsylvania, Blossburg, was burned last week. Here is an appropriation of $75,000 to the town of Juniata, and I will risk all the reputation I have that if Blossburg will make an effort to get $1,000, it cannot get a single cent. So it will always be; you will make flesh of one town and fish of another. These disasters by fire are constantly occurring, and to undertake to make the State of Pennsylvania an insurance company will be to destroy the character of the Commonwealth and to bring it into contempt.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas.) The amendment will be read.

The CLERK read:

"No appropriation shall be made to any denominational or sectarian institution, corporation or association, nor for any denominational or sectarian object."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALRICKS. I propose an amendment to the amendment.

The CLERK read:

"Pensions and annuities may be granted to soldiers and their widows, as heretofore. Becoming mementoes may be made for past meritorious civil and military services, and in the event of a great inevitable calamity, a reasonable sum may be appropriated, only to supply the immediate pressing necessities of an impoverished community; but no appropriation shall be made for sectarian purposes."

Mr. ALRICKS. Mr. Chairman: I ask for a division of the question on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The first division of the question will be read.

The CLERK read:

"Pensions and annuities may be granted to soldiers and their widows as heretofore."

The first division of the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The next division of the amendment will be read.

The CLERK read:

"Becoming mementoes may be made for past meritorious civil and military services."

The second division of the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The last division of the amendment will be read.

The CLERK read :

"And in the event of a great inevitable calamity, a reasonable sum may be appropriated to supply the immediate pressing necessities of an impoverished community; but no appropriations shall be made for sectarian purposes."

The last division of the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered to the original section by the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. Hay,) which will be read.

The CLERK read :

"No appropriation shall be made for any denominational or sectarian purposes, or to any institution, corporation or association created or maintained for objects limited or restricted by any particular religious, denominational or sectarian views."

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the section.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I offer an amendment to the section.

The CLERK read :

"No appropriations, except for pensions or gratuities for military service, shall be made for charitable, educational or benevolent purposes to any person or community, nor to any denominational or sectarian institution, corporation or association."

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I would suggest to the gentleman who has just offered the amendment, that the language is somewhat awkward, and I will call his attention to an amendment of the same nature which I was about proposing, which, I think, is better than his; and that is to amend, in the second line, after the word "community," by inserting the words "except in payment of a debt, or for services rendered." The section would then read: "No appropriation shall be made to any person or community except in payment of a debt, or for services rendered; nor to any denominational or sectarian institution, corporation or association, for charitable, educational or benevolent purposes." The meaning is clear and covers the whole ground.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I have no objection at all to the gentleman's amendment, but I do not think it is necessary, because this section will not prevent appropriations for the payment of debts.

Mr. BROOMALL. An appropriation to a person may be intended for the payment of a debt. I think this covers the whole ground for military services, and also removes from the section the difficulty that I suggest, that an appropriation to an individual may be in payment of a debt, or for some other service than military.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I would like to accept the amendment offered by my friend, but I submit, with all deference, that it seems to me to be confusing in its character. In the amendment which I have offered it is perfectly clear that appropriations can be made for pensions and gratuities. Then it applies to charitable, benevolent or educational purposes; then to persons and communities, and finally to denominational or sectarian institutions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White.)

The amendment was rejected upon a division, thirty-nine members voting in the affirmative, and twenty-six in the negative.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read :

SECTION 22. The credit of the Commonwealth shall not, in any manner or event, be pledged or loaned to any individual, company, corporation or association whatever; nor shall the Commonwealth hereafter become a joint owner or stockholder in any company or association or corporation.

The section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read :

SECTION 23. The Legislature shall not authorize any county, city, borough, township or incorporated district, by virtue of a vote of its citizens or otherwise, to become a stockholder in any company, association or corporation, or to obtain money for or to loan its credit to any corporation, association, institution, company or individual.

The section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read :

"SECTION 24. The Legislature shall not delegate to any commission of private persons, corporation or association, any power to make, supervise or interfere with any public improvement or to levy taxes, or perform any municipal function whatever."

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I do not desire to see this section passed without some modification. I therefore move to amend, by inserting after the word "not," the words, "without consent of the local authorities." I presume this section was intended to apply to cities, counties, boroughs, and all other municipal corporations. Now, when the subject of city charters comes before the Convention, the report of the committee will very likely contain a section relating thereto. This section, being broader, will apply to boroughs as well as to cities. In order to illustrate the objection I entertain to the broad language of this section, I would refer to the borough in which I reside. Under the section as reported by the committee, there never could be a commission for the erection of water works, or gas works, or any other public improvement in a city or borough. Those public buildings, or improvements, would have to be constructed by private corporations, or by the city and borough councils. Now, that can be done very frequently, in my judgment, a great deal better by a commission than by the city or borough councils. In the borough in which I reside we have an act of the Legislature authorizing a commission for the erection of the water works. Without that commission those works would have to be erected by the borough councils, changeable every year, without any permanency as to the members of the councils, and without any person being designated particularly to attend to the erection and supervision of those works. I am in favor of leaving this power in the hands of the Legislature, to create commissions for certain purposes, by and with the consent of the local authorities. In the case of cities, by and with the consent of the councils, and in the case of boroughs, with the consent of the borough councils.

I trust, therefore, that the section will not pass with the broad language in which it has been reported, and I think the amendment suggested will save and secure all the benefits to be derived from the section.

MR. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I hope that the amendment will not pass, and for this reason: If the councils of a city, town or borough desire to create a commission for a special purpose they have their full power to do so. If they desire to delegate a power to a commission on account of its permanency they can do it, and the language of the section will place this power in a body which is much better than the Legislature. I hope that all the power for creating commissions will be taken from the Legislature and placed in the hands of the proper municipal authority. There is where it ought to be placed, and there is where it ought to rest. I therefore hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. J. W. F. White) will be voted down.

MR. HANNA. Mr. Chairman: I only desire to refer the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. J. W. F. White) to section eleven of this report. That section prohibits the Legislature from passing any local or special law regulating the affairs of counties, cities, townships, wards, boroughs or school districts, and now we propose to prohibit that very legislation in the same direction to which the gentleman has referred. He refers to the case of a commission created in his town for the purpose of erecting water works. Now we propose by this section to prohibit this very kind of special legislation, and to prohibit in future the creation of commissions for this very purpose, on the ground that the Legislature cannot, by a general law, regulate those matters which should be governed by the local government. This is the idea of the gentleman from Allegheny, I have no doubt; but I must go farther and say, with reference to all local and special matters, the councils of cities and boroughs possess a better knowledge by far than the Legislature. It is true, however, that the city councils change from time to time, but the members are not, in all cases, changed at the same time. There are members elected from year to year, but the committees of councils remain the same, and so the management of these local improvements will be under the same direction. I therefore think that the general prohibition in this clause is very full, and we can do no harm in passing it, at least in committee of the whole.

MR. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say a single word, which may possibly throw some light upon this question, especially as it has not been adverted to during the discussion. In the city of Philadelphia there is a single commission, no single member of which was elected by the people, and the proceedings of which are in no way subject to be reviewed by the people. In addition to this, no wish of that commission can be refused by any department of the city government. Such a commission as this, which has been imposed, has increased the debt to some thirteen million dollars. I should think the statement of this fact ought to be a sufficient answer to a proposition to leave to the Legislature the creation of commissions in any event.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: I imagine that there will have to be several provisions made in regard to the local authorities of counties and cities, in addition to those which have been already reported. I am in favor of this section as it has been reported by the committee, and I think the amendment offered by my colleague (Mr. J. W. F. White) is entirely impracticable, and would have the effect of weakening the force of this particular section. I presume he means by the local authorities of a county, the commissioners, perhaps the controller, if there be one in the county, and what others we know not. This section is intended to strike at an evil which has prevailed to a very considerable extent in Philadelphia, and also in Allegheny county. Many of our citizens in Allegheny county, a few years ago, thought that a commission appointed by the Legislature, was the best plan for the purpose of making general local improvements, but since then there has been a complete change in the mind of every one, excepting those who are connected with these commissions and their immediate friends, who favor the appointment of a commission for everything. I believe some three or four commissions have been created in our county for this purpose, and there has been more money wasted by them than by all the other official authorities during the past twenty years. One of the most objectionable of these commissions is in the nature of a corporation, or association, appointed for the supervision of bridges to be built over the Ohio river, and this amendment would not reach that sort of a case. I think the saving clause my colleague (Mr. J. W. F. White) desires to be incorporated in the section, can be provided for when the Convention reaches the question of counties and county officers, cities and boroughs, and I hope, therefore, the amendment will not be adopted at present.

Mr. WORRELL. Mr. Chairman: I trust this section will be adopted, just as it is reported by the Committee on Legislation. I think it proposes one of the most important and most needed reforms presented to the consideration of the Convention. If we leave with the Legislature the power to create commissions, which shall absorb and exercise the proper and legitimate functions of the various municipalities, it would be wise not to attempt to reform municipal governments, and not to take any action affecting cities and city charters. The universal opinion is, that the new Constitution should guarantee to every municipality the control and regulation of its own internal affairs, and that the legislative body of each city, its select and common councils, should possess the supreme power of legislation upon all subjects affecting the municipality only. If the Legislature be vested with the right of quartering upon a city, without its consent, irresponsible commissions, to exercise any or all of the powers and functions of the municipal departments, it will practically nullify any provision intended to secure intelligent, independent and responsible government of the various political districts of the Commonwealth. No legislation has been more generally condemned than that which restrains a municipality in the exercise of the powers of local government.

Mr. Chairman, no local public improvement should be authorized or directed until the municipality has determined that such improvement is needed, and that the condition of the city finances will warrant the proper expenditure on that account; and unless these considerations are determined affirmatively by the municipality, the people should not be subjected to burdensome taxation by the Legislature or any other body, for the purpose of erecting unneeded improvements, or those which the public treasury will not justify. But the Legislature, in the creation of commissions for various purposes, determines these questions without any regard to the wishes or the necessities of the people, or to the condition of the city treasury. The commissioners are wholly irresponsible; no department is authorized to examine and to approve or disapprove their actions. They are generally without restriction as to their power to assess and levy taxes. I hope that this section will be adopted, and that it will be part of the fundamental law, "that no commission, corporation or association shall have power to make, supervise or interfere with any public improvement, or to levy taxes, or to perform any municipal function whatever."

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I am not here to defend any improper commissions in Pittsburgh or Philadelphia, nor anything of that kind. I suggested this amendment, because I was afraid the section was too general. By the eleventh section of this article, to which my attention was referred by the gentleman in front of me, from the city, (Mr. Worrell,) all special legislation upon the subject of regulating cities, boroughs, townships, &c., is prohibited, absolutely and unqualifiedly. Now, by the section before us, when we say broadly that the Legislature shall not delegate to any commission any power to do these things, I apprehend that it is prohibited, and that that power cannot be delegated by a general law. Because, previously, we have prohibited all special laws on the subject. Why, then, this prohibition, unless it extend to and operate upon the general law? It was for this purpose that I suggested this amendment. I dislike to have in one part of our Constitution a provision contradictory or in conflict with any other provision. Gentlemen from Pittsburg, and others, have suggested that this can be provided for when we come to the article on "cities and city charters." I proposed this here, so as to bring it into harmony with what we might do then; not to have an absolute prohibition here, to be qualified afterwards, when we come to consider the question of cities and city charters; that was all.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I am entirely in favor of the objects sought to be accomplished by this section, and I propose to go much further than this section goes. I think, from its phraseology, that if passed without amendment, it would probably prevent the organization of corporations for public improvements, which certainly was not the design of the committee that reported it. If the gentlemen of the Convention will take up the section and read it in this way, as a court would be compelled to read it, omitting all that does not pertain to the immediate subject, to which I desire to call the attention of the Convention, it will read thus:

"The Legislature shall not delegate to any corporation any power to make any public improvement." This section, as reported, certainly contains a prohibition upon the Legislature which would prevent them delegating to any corporation the power to make any public improvement. That certainly was not the intention of the committee. I apprehend that the intention of the committee was to prevent the Legislature from vesting in any commission or association of individuals, any municipal power, or any power within the municipal government of any city, town or county. And in order to get at the sense of the Convention on this subject, I propose to amend by striking out the section, and inserting as follows:—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must move it as an amendment to the amendment, if he moves it at this time.

Mr. GOWEN. Very well, sir. This is what I propose to insert: "The Legislature shall not delegate to any person, association, corporation or commission the supervision, management or control of any of the improvements, money, property or effects of any municipal corporation whatever, whether held in trust or otherwise, nor vest in such person, association, corporation or commission, as trustee or otherwise howsoever, the power to levy taxes, or perform any municipal duties or functions whatever; and the Legislature shall provide for vesting directly in the local authorities of every municipal corporation all such power as is herein above referred to, which now be exercised by any person, association, corporation or commission."

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: Before the gentleman sends that to the desk, will he allow me to make a suggestion of something that I am afraid the amendment will not cover. The term "corporation and association" was put in there, I think, to meet a case something like this: Two or three years ago the Legislature passed an act of Assembly giving to an association or corporation known as "The Coal Exchange" of Pittsburg, power to interfere with any bridge that might be made over the Ohio or Monongahela rivers in Pennsylvania, practically putting it in their power to prohibit the building of a bridge by any company that might be chartered by the State or any municipal corporation. I am afraid that it would not cover that case.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I think this does cover it. I think it prevents any corporation from having any municipal authority whatever; but as the section was originally reported the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in construing the Constitution of the State, would be obliged to declare that this section shall read, omitting all that is not material to the subject under consideration: "The Legislature shall not delegate to any corporation any power to make any public improvement." That is the way this section would be construed if it were adopted by the Convention as it has been reported. Now, I desire to say a few words in support of the amendment which I have sent up.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to rule that the amendment to the amendment cannot now be entertained, as it is not germane. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. J. W. F. White) will be read.

The CLERK read: "To insert after the word "not" the words, "without the consent of the local authorities."

Mr. GOWEN. Then I will withdraw my amendment for the present, and offer it at the proper time.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I call the attention of the Convention to the fact that the purpose of my friend from Allegheny (Mr. J. W. F. White) can very well be accomplished by the Legislature if you let the section be as it is. I will suggest, furthermore, that there is a misprint in the section as it is offered. There is a word omitted; that is the word "municipal." I would, therefore, move to add the word "municipal" after the word "public," in the third line, so as to read "any public municipal improvement," &c.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: That is a verbal correction, and, I hope, will be permitted without a motion.

There being no objection the insertion was made.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. J. W. F. White, it was rejected.

Mr. BIDDLE. I now move to strike out the word "public."

It was agreed to.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: The introduction of the word "municipal" and striking out the word "public" does cover some of the objections which I found in the original section as reported; but I do not think it is broad enough to cover every case. I do not know whether the construction of the courts would be that the devise to a city as a trustee for a charitable purpose would be considered municipal property. If it would not then this section would take away from the local authorities the power to control the property which was vested in the municipal corporations in trust. I desire, for a few moments, to call the attention of the Convention to a matter —

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: Before the gentleman proceeds, I would like to ask—because it relates to a matter that I had in my own mind—whether his amendment is divisible, so that the collocation of words here will be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) that no amendment is now pending. The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) has not offered any amendment.

Mr. GOWEN. I desire to offer one, sir. I will offer it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen.)

The CLERK read:

"The Legislature shall not delegate to any person, association or commission the supervision, management or control of any of the improvements, money, property or effects of any municipal corporation, whether held in trust or otherwise, nor vest in such person, association, corporation or commission, as trustees or otherwise howsoever, the power to levy taxes, or perform any municipal duties or functions whatever; and the Legislature shall provide for vesting directly in the local authorities of every municipal corporation all such power as is hereinbefore referred to, which may now be exercised by any person, association, corporation or commission."

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I desire to call the attention of the Convention to one matter of very great importance. It is a general subject, but we are making a general, broad, and comprehensive Constitution. We are not legislating; we are making an instrument that shall be the general supreme power and law of the land for, I hope, fifty years. It will not do for us to assume, in making this fundamental law, that the representatives of the government of this State, or of any municipality within the State, are forever to be corrupt. If this Convention is to base its action upon the assumption that the representatives of the people will always be corrupt, we shall be obliged to go into legislation and make a very long instrument. The great thing to be accomplished is, to select a representative government, in which the representatives of the people will be honest and faithful to their trust. The more power we vest in the Legislature or in the municipal authorities of any city or town, the more earnest will be the desire of the people to send good men to represent them. If we make a Constitution that dwarfs the man who represents the power of the State, or the power of the city, into a mere machine, and that ties his hands and stills his voice, and prevents him from exercising the functions of his brain in order to legislate for the good of the people who send him there, the people, themselves, will say: "It makes no difference who we send, for the Constitution prevents our representatives from doing us any injury." The more power you vest in those who are the representatives of the people, the more earnest will be the desire of the people to secure good and honest representatives; and when you do, as I believe we already have done, break down the fraudulent system of elections, and enable the honest people to determine who shall be their representatives, from that moment you can safely leave to the people themselves the power to determine who their representatives shall be, and you can vest great powers in these representatives.

Nothing can so surely bring a Constitution into contempt as to find that it has usurped the province of the Legislature, or the province of the local governments of the cities, and hedged them round with such restrictions that, in one or two years, there will be a desire to break down the Constitution, in order to prevent its trammels from entirely disabling the people's representatives. This is only a general view; it applies particularly to the Legislature, but it applies with equal force to the councils of a great city like Philadelphia, or to a city like Pittsburg, and even to the smaller municipal governments of boroughs or cities in the State.

It is very true, and we may admit it, that corruptions in local governments have induced the Legislature, for wise purposes, to vest in commissions almost the entire property of some municipal corporations. The commission is not responsible to anybody. It holds its office for a term of years, and in many cases it requires the most cumbersome machinery, in order to remove any of the commissioners. Their sessions are held in secret. There is no responsibility to the people that elects them, whereas the power, and the property, and the effects, and the public improvement of that very corporation, if they are vested in the local government of that corporation, can never be interfered with, except by public exercise of legislative power, which the whole community has a right to witness, and which the newspapers of the day spread before every voter within ten or twenty-four hours after the subject has been discussed. The power of these commissioners, originally adopted, probably for wise purposes, will lead to the vesting of all the power of the country in the hands of an association of people who are entirely irresponsible, over whom the community has no control, whose deliberations are held in secret, and who are not responsible to any elective power whatever. I am in favor, therefore, of amending this so there shall be no doubt about the subject, and of going still farther, and making it obligatory upon the Legislature to re-vest in the local authority of every municipal corporation any power which is now exercised by any commission heretofore appointed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen.)

Mr. MACVEAGH. Upon that I should like a division of the question. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that it, with all due deference to the Committee on Legislation, is more clear and distinct in its expression, and if it is so, one of the difficulties of interpretation, to which the gentleman from Philadelphia has alluded, is disposed of.

It is a difficulty that occurred to my own mind before he mentioned it, and if the impression that I received of it on its first reading is confirmed, and agrees with that of other gentlemen in the Convention, I trust it will be adopted as a substitute for the section as it now reads.

Upon the second portion of the question, if it is so divided, I think the Convention should consider well before adopting it, because it is legislative. It is destroying commissions created by the Legislature, and now existing. Not having lived in a large city, I am not of any decided opinions upon the subject, but it certainly is a subject of great gravity. It directly acts upon every act of the Legislature itself in the past creating commissions for any purpose.

Mr. GOWEN. For any municipal purpose.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Yes; for any municipal purpose—and vests them in the common council of the city. Some commissions exist, I believe, in this city—the park commission for instance. It may be the desire of the citizens that that should be transferred to the council; but it certainly is taking a very important step in advance of anything we have yet done. Our Constitution, up to this point, has looked wholly to the future. Now we propose to annul a large number of laws, dealing with very important subjects, concerning vast sums of money, and it seems to me that it is a question that it concerns the Convention to consider deliberately and carefully before it commits itself to any distinctive policy upon the subject. If the representatives of Philadelphia here, and the representatives of Allegheny, desire this legislation to be erased from the statute book, I do not know that I have any special objection to it, because I am not in a condition, really, to form a very intelligent opinion upon it. I only wanted to call the attention of the Convention to the fact that now, for the first time, we turn our faces to the past, and we erase what has been done then.

MR. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I do not know that I am at all authorized to say anything on a question of this kind, for it seems chiefly to concern cities, and in the small boroughs of the State we probably have nothing to say about it. But I suppose the object of the gentlemen who represent the city of Philadelphia is to get rid of some of the commissions that have been created, and to prevent the creation of others which are liable to be created by the Legislature, from time to time. We all know that they have a park commission, which, I believe, is reasonably acceptable, and a public buildings commission, which, I believe, is reasonably odious, to them in Philadelphia. They have also had a law passed which took out of the hands of the city corporations the control of the Girard trusts. To that I, myself, never would have subscribed. I do not know how the people here may look at it, but from the public character of some of the gentlemen appointed to the management of these trusts, I very much doubt whether they have improved the trust. Now, if the object of my friend from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) is, by this provision of the Constitution, to prevent all these commissions in the future, whether for arts, public buildings, the management of police, or for any other purpose, I am ready to vote for it. I think they are all vicious, and the whole control of all these things should be in the hands of the city. If they fail to elect the proper officers and get into difficulty thereby, let the misfortune be upon their heads. Let them take care to elect their best men to these offices, and the thing will be properly done. Now, as to any restricting of authority, I would be very glad to see a provision introduced here which would totally and utterly annul the legislation which took out of the hands of the city the management of the Girard estate, because I think it was a violation of the trust which Mr. Girard left in the city. He intended it to be exercised by the corporation. The Supreme Court has decided it to be within the constitutional power of the Legislature, I understand, to divest it, and have taken to themselves, under that law, the authority to appoint whom they please to manage these important trusts. If the city of Philadelphia wishes these commissions destroyed, destroy them. They should have the privilege of remedying the evil, if they deem it to be an evil.

MR. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: As I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from the city, (Mr. Gowen,) it will abrogate all existing commissions, and I do not know that I am prepared to go so far, yet I am perfectly satisfied that the only way to govern a city or town is to prevent all special legislation in reference to it, and to delegate to that city or town full and supreme power and control. Now, sir, we all know that different commissions which have been named on this floor, controlling certain of our municipal departments, are very properly administered. For instance, the park commissioners, alluded to, and a half dozen other departments that are, in a measure, indirectly under judicial control; but I would state to the gentlemen that there may be, and is, great danger in lodging so much power with the courts. The park commission, and the half dozen others which are managed by our very best citizens, and prudently, and judiciously, and economically controlled; yet the danger is, that if we give the courts so much power and patronage, in a very little while a combination may be formed, and by securing the nomination of the judge of the court, they would thereby hold the control of all the patronage under him, and it would become so powerful an instrument for evil as to overbalance the little good which the commissions do under present circumstances.

Now it seems to me that the only way this difficulty can be removed is to say to the people of all large cities: "Be supreme in the government of your own affairs." If it is necessary let no more commissions be placed in power, and if it is necessary let the present commissions be dissolved. We are able, I hope, to control and govern ourselves and I conceive that the danger which would arise in giving the courts so much power is so great that it would be a great deal better to remove it entirely from their control, and dispense with all these commissions, and confer the power in the government of all large cities upon the mayor and the city councils. They are the proper representatives of the people. The people elect them to take care of the municipal affairs, and if the mayor and the city councils fail or prove derelict in the performance of their duties the people have the remedy in their own hands. No matter how much we may attempt to palliate these evils by placing the remedy in the hands of the courts, it does not afford the true panacea according to my judgment. It is a great mistake to load down the courts with so much power and patronage, and it seems to me we should be extremely careful, because we may create such a combination which might eventually cast a slur upon the purity of the courts themselves. I am therefore of the opinion that the amendment should be voted down. You will recollect, sir, that a year or two ago the Legislature of the State imposed upon the city of Philadelphia a commission that was wholly irresponsible, and conferred upon it such powers and privileges as to make its creation extremely dangerous. Why, sir, this commission in the city of Philadelphia was empowered to pledge the faith and credit of the city for certain amounts of money in the creation of its office without any control or supervision whatever. Now, sir, if this section is not adopted, other commissions may be imposed upon this city of a like irresponsible nature, and possessing unlimited powers in the performance of their duty, a power, in my opinion, of a most dangerous character.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: One of the facts stated by the gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. J. P. Wetherill) will induce me to vote for the amendment offered by my colleague (Mr. Gowen) if it were for no other reason than the fact that it exists. There are commissions in this city, as the gentleman has mentioned, with unlimited power to impose any amount of debt upon the citizens of Philadelphia without their being able to utter a single word of remonstrance.

I cannot perceive that the section, as reported by the committee, will prevent the continuation of these commissions, possessed with the same unlimited power for the future, as they now are and have been in the past. The amendment offered by my colleague (Mr. Gowen) will cut them up by the roots, destroy their existence entirely, and restore back to the people their just rights, which have been wrested from them by the Legislature. I shall vote for the amendment which has been offered by my colleague for several other reasons, but principally for the following: While I believe one at least has done well, I do not suppose that there is a gentleman within the sound of my voice but who believes if the public building commission had been selected by the people of Philadelphia, either directly or indirectly, and were responsible to our citizens, that they ever would have dared to establish a building fifty years behind the age, closing up two of our great thoroughfares, and converting them into blind alley ways. I do not suppose there is a gentleman who will deny it. I have said before, and I now repeat, that there are children now born who will live to curse the men that have ruined two magnificent avenues of our city by the erection of the public buildings upon the intersection at Broad and Market streets, by the public building commission. It is for the reason that I think this amendment will destroy these commissions and restore this power to the people, of which they have been deprived, that I shall vote in its favor.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I rise for the purpose of saying that I cannot conceive that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) is so far legislative in its character that this Convention should not adopt it. There has been so much said during the progress of our sessions, not only by the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) but also by other distinguished gentlemen, in objection to any action by this body which, in their view, trenches upon the province of legislation, that I cannot help feeling that it is high time for some person to say that we are not sent here to perform the old-fashioned duties of a Constitutional Convention. I do not believe that we have been sent here merely to re-declare the declaration of rights, or to place into our fundamental law those general principles appertaining to the formations of a government which constituted the principle duties of our forefathers in framing the original Constitution. Those labors have been amply and judiciously performed, and I do not suppose it forms a part of the duties of this Convention to re-write the bill of rights, or to re-enact those fundamental principles that will be found in the Constitution of 1790, and of 1838, quite as strongly and ably expressed as we could do it. We were sent here as a Convention to supply such new constitutional restrictions as experience has shown to be needed. We were sent here to correct that wherein the Constitution has been found, from its generality, to be deficient, and to provide specific remedies for specific evils.

The Committee on Legislation would never have reported this section if special legislation had not already imposed upon this city irresponsible commissions, who have undertaken to govern, and have governed, this city in all its principal and most valued interests, and it is idle to say that we will provide against the future creation of such commissions, if existing commissions are to be allowed to continue. I do not say a word against the members composing the commissions. I am acquainted with but one or two of them, and of them I could say nothing but to their credit, but I say the principle is wrong, and because the principle is wrong the result is evil.

I also object most earnestly to the suggestion which has been made, that the power of appointing these commissions should be conferred upon the courts. I hope such a suggestion will not be adopted, and that the Committee on the Judiciary will report a section that the judges of this Commonwealth shall perform none other than judicial duties. I hope that in this I will not be disappointed, and that the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) will be adopted, so that the local government of our city shall at last be placed and left where it should be, with its own citizens and their own elected representatives.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I do not know that I entertain any objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Gowen,) but I do not think it is necessary to drag into our deliberations this local fight in the city of Philadelphia, for I fear that it may jeopardize the entire work of the Convention.

Mr. DALLAS. I would like to ask the gentleman what local fight he refers to.

Mr. LILLY. The gentleman on my left (Mr. Simpson) referred to it during the course of his remarks. I do not desire to meddle with the local affairs of Philadelphia, but if I was a Philadelphian I should probably be as much interested in the question as anybody else. I can say this, however, that I think it is simply outrageous, not only to the people of this city, but to all the people of the State, by destroying one of the finest thoroughfares in the city, by placing the public buildings at the intersection of Broad and Market streets. I consider it is a nuisance to the State at large and an eyesore to every Pennsylvanian that comes to Philadelphia. I presume the commission has spent so much money now that they are compelled to go on in the work. I do not desire, however, that this fight between that commission and this city should enter into this Constitution. This is briefly my reason for voting against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen.)

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I feel under considerable embarrassment in regard to this question, and I may say before I discuss it, that I heartily approve of section twenty-four of the report of the committee, and shall undoubtedly vote in its favor. The question seems to be whether we should now take a prospective view only or grapple at once with both sides of the question. If I could I would prevent discussion of the question at present, but it seems inevitable that it must be met now. I am in favor of the prospective limitation or prohibition; and now as to the past, I feel as strongly impressed as any one with the enormity of delegating to commissions the right to levy taxes upon the city of Philadelphia for the erection or establishment of municipal improvements, without any responsibility whatsoever to the tax-paying portion of our community. I concur heartily in all that the delegate from Philadelphia (Mr. Simpson) has said in reference to the particular commission to which he referred; and if the effect of the amendment was to strike out that commission alone, which, so far as I know, is the only commission that has the right to levy taxes, I would vote for the amendment.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. The South street bridge commission has also the right to borrow money—$800,000.

Mr. BIDDLE. Then it falls in the same category of vice. The law under which the right to erect that bridge was established was declared to be constitutional by a divided court; that is to say by three judges against two, the late Chief Justice Thompson and Mr. Justice Sharswood dissenting; but the commission has progressed so far in the work that it would be unwise, in an economical point of view, to discontinue its operation. The South street bridge commission is besides limited to the sum of $800,000, while the public building commission is entirely unlimited in its power to levy taxes.

If, therefore, this amendment could be so limited as to apply only to commissions that had the right to levy taxes, I would vote for it. But I doubt as to a great many others, and I will give my reasons. We have a park commission, which has no right to levy taxes. Their estimates must be submitted to councils—

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BIDDLE. Certainly. I want information.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. If the park commissioners should create a debt of ten thousand dollars, and the councils should decline to pay that money, would they not have it in their immediate power to collect it by mandamus in the courts?

Mr. BIDDLE. I should doubt it very much. I think those contracting with the park commissioners take the risk of the appropriation being passed. But I believe that that commission has been as well managed as a commission possibly could be. I regret very much, to-day, the absence of another delegate from Philadelphia, who is a member of the commission, (Mr. Cuyler,) and who could give us a great deal of information in detail, in regard to its management, which it is impossible for me to give. It has been, and it is now, composed of men who, for integrity, economical administration and devotion to the interests of the city, are not surpassed in the city of Philadelphia or elsewhere; and when I name the late General Meade, the Hon. Morton M'Michael, Eli K. Price, John Welsh, and men of that kind, I am sure every gentleman in the Convention will agree with me. I believe no complaint has ever been made on this score. I believe that this commission is better managed, and has been better managed, than it would have been by a committee of councils, without meaning to say anything in derogation of councils, because these men are all men of large views, great public spirit, great integrity, and most of them of very considerable leisure. Now I should be very sorry, and I will not, if I am called upon to vote to-day, vote for the amendment as it is presented, so that a commission, which I believe so valuable as this, will be struck down.

Now there are other commissions which, I presume, are also included. They have not the power of levying taxes. There is, for instance, a commission of which my friend from Philadelphia (Mr. John Price Wetherill) is himself a member, the board which manages the county prisons. I know from comparing, or rather from contrasting—for the contrast is a very sharp one—that the management of this institution by the present commission, is an enormous improvement, so far as economy and efficiency are concerned. It has brought down the expense of that institution to a minimum point. Now, this board will probably be affected. There may be many others, probably our board of local charities, in which is included the management of the Girard college, which, so far as I can recollect, numbers among its members some of our very best citizens—Henry M. Phillips, William Welsh, and men of that stamp. I cannot recollect, but possibly Judge Woodward himself may be a member of that board, but I am not certain, and he is not here to-day.

Therefore, as I said when I arose to speak on this amendment, I feel considerable embarrassment. If it was a new matter, I should probably vote for the amendment, and I intend to vote for the section. I think it is a valuable one. If it would be proper to include the building commission, which has this unlimited power of raising taxes, I would be very glad to do so, but I cannot say that I am prepared to vote for the whole amendment now. These are some of the reasons; others may suggest themselves to other gentlemen here, why I think we ought not to pass the amendment, but leave it open, and possibly we may get more information when we come to consider the report of the Committee on City and City Charters. By that time we may receive new light which will help us to come to a more definite conclusion upon this question. There are gentlemen who can give us information which we cannot get to-day because they are not here. We can vote for the section, upon which I believe we are quite concurrent in our views, and lay the other over for another day—

Mr. DARLINGTON. Will the gentleman tell us when the city members are likely to be here?

Mr. BIDDLE. I can only speak for myself.

Mr. NEWLIN. In point of fact, most of the large appropriations have been made by the city councils to pay debts contracted by the park commissioners. These appropriations have been made upon the spur of the necessity, for if the councils refused to meet the necessary charges the parties from whom the park commission had purchased properties could, by mandamus, compel the payment of the required money direct out of the city treasury. So that it was better that the city councils should appropriate the money in the ordinary way. It is a notorious fact that the great bulk of the appropriations, apparently made voluntarily by the councils, have been made through the force of the provision in the act of the Assembly, whereby the commission is enabled to compel the city to sustain its contracts, and pay for the damages incurred by the taking of real estate.

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. Chairman: My colleague from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle) has expressed my views so fully that I do not think it necessary to state them myself, and with his permission I will endorse his remarks, which will indicate the way I shall vote.

Mr. WORRELL. Mr. Chairman: I find, in looking at the financial statistics of this city, for the past year, that there has been an appropriation of $1,697,482 64 made by the park commissioners of this city, nearly twice as much money as was required for all the general expenses of the State of Pennsylvania. Now there have been many complaints made about this very commission. Money is expended by the commission, as many regard, in a very irresponsible and very improper way, and the funded indebtedness of this city is being increased to a large amount on account of expenditures made by this very commission. The people of Philadelphia have no power to determine just what additions are necessary to the public park. The people of Philadelphia have no means of saying whether these grounds are taken at a fair price or not, and in many instances it is supposed that the additions made to the public park are made at a cost largely in excess of that which would be charged to a private individual.

I addressed myself a few moments ago to the proposition as reported by the Committee on Legislature, but having heard the proposition from the gentleman from Philadelphia on my right (Mr. Dallas,) I think it covers the ground entirely. These commissions were never created at the wish of the people of Philadelphia. They are not responsible to the people of Philadelphia, and every commission which has been created in that way, and which is exercising these powers which should belong to the municipality, and which the people of Philadelphia desire to be exercised by the properly constituted authorities, should be abolished. Let the people of Philadelphia, in their own way, through their legislative assembly, exercise all the municipal functions of this city.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I have just a word to add to what has been so well said by my friend from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle.) I hope the committee of the whole will stand by the section, with one or two modifications, as it has been reported. It has been carefully considered before reported, and it occurs to me that the proposition of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) is so long that it may confuse the popular idea upon this subject, and may excite hostilities and controversies and antagonisms which we do not desire. It seems to me that our policy and province here is to enunciate a general principle, and then let future Legislatures predicate their conduct, as far as municipalities are concerned, upon this general policy. We want to avoid, as far as possible, all these causes of local disturbances.

I will call the attention of the committee of the whole to how it reads: "The Legislature shall not delegate to any commission of private persons." I propose, if this amendment be voted down, to strike out the words "of private persons" and add the word "special," which will make it read: "The Legislature shall not delegate to any special commission or corporation or association, any power to make, supervise or interfere with any public improvement, or to levy taxes or perform any municipal function whatever."

Now if you want to cover money and property, add the words "money or property" after the word "improvement." That seems to me wiser than to substitute a long section, such as has been proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen.)

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Gowen,) on which the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. Alricks) has called a division. The first division will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

The Legislature shall not delegate to any person, association, corporation or commission the supervision, management or control of any of the improvements, money, property or effects of any municipal corporation, whether held in trust or otherwise, nor vest in such person, association, corporation or commission, as trustee or otherwise howsoever, the power to levy taxes or perform any municipal duties or functions whatever.

On the question of agreeing to the first division, a division was called, which resulted thirty in the affirmative.

The CHAIRMAN. Less than a majority of a quorum vote in the affirmative.

Mr. WORRELL. Mr. Chairman: I ask for a call of the House.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I ask for a count of the "noes."

The CHAIRMAN. Those in the negative will rise.

The vote in the negative was thirty-five.

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty-five gentlemen voting in the affirmative, there is less than a quorum voting. The Chair will state at this point that the practice, as I have understood it and observed it in committee of the whole, is to decide a question carried by a majority, irrespective of a quorum.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there is a quorum here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark that, perhaps, it is a sounder parliamentary rule to hold that a quorum must vote in order to carry a question, either in committee of the whole or in the Convention, and there is no vote unless a quorum vote.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: Did not a quorum vote?

The CHAIRMAN. It did not.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman: I hope the Chair will take the vote again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not announce the decision, and will take the vote again.

Mr. GOWEN. Will the Chair have the division read again, so that the delegates may know that it is only the prospective part of the amendment that is being put?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I rise to a question of order. Less than a majority of a quorum having voted for this section, it was lost.

Mr. MACVEAGH. I say so, too.

Mr. MANN. It does not make any difference how many will vote for it at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would sustain the point of order if it were necessary at this time, for the rulings of the committees heretofore sitting in this Convention have not been different. But the Chair, upon objection, deeming it his duty to adhere to a different parliamentary rule, will, in this instance, order a different vote to be taken, inasmuch as the vote was not announced.

Mr. W. H. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: May I ask if this amendment is to supersede the section reported by the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will explain. The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) has offered an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, upon which a division has been called, and the first division has been read.

The vote on the first division was then again taken.

On the question of agreeing to it, a division was called, resulting: Thirty-four in the affirmative, and thirty-six in the negative.

So the first division was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The second division will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"And the Legislature shall provide for vesting directly in the local authorities of every municipal corporation all such power as is heretofore referred to, which may now be exercised by any person, association, corporation or commission."

On the question of agreeing to this division, a division was called, resulting twenty-five in the affirmative. Less than a majority of a quorum voting, it was rejected.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I ask unanimous consent to strike out the words, "of private persons," and to insert the word "special" before the word "commission."

Unanimous consent was given, and the section was so amended.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment: To add to the section as follows:

"And such powers as have heretofore been so vested are hereby abrogated, and the same shall hereafter be exercised in such manner as the city councils may, by ordinance, provide."

On the question of agreeing to the amendment, a division was called, resulting twenty in the affirmative. Less than a majority of a quorum voting, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DODD. Mr. Chairman: How does the section read, as amended?

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 24. The Legislature shall not delegate to any special commission, corporation or association any power to make, supervise or interfere with any public improvement, or to levy taxes or perform any municipal function whatever.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Legislation that he had better strike out the word "whatever" at the close of the section. It has no use there.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. It is emphatic.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I am afraid that this section does not cover one of the greatest evils. It only prevents a commission interfering with a municipal improvement or prevents it from levying taxes or performing municipal functions. Now there may be, and there often is, a large amount of money or property, belonging to a corporation, held in trust for charitable purposes, which might not come within this designation of municipal improvement, or its control might not come within the designation of performing municipal functions.

I therefore move to amend, as follows:

By inserting after the word "improvement" the words "property, money or effects, whether held in trust or otherwise."

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I have no objection to that myself. Several gentlemen who represent the large cities suggest that it be adopted without objection. I might accept the amendment, as it comports with my own idea.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana cannot accept the amendment.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Well, what I desire to say is that I concur in the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, as follows:

To strike out the last word "whatever."

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I do not desire to discuss this question. The word has no meaning where it occurs.

On the question of agreeing to the amendment a division was called, which resulted: Eighteen in the affirmative.

Less than a majority of a quorum voting, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I desire the section read with its amendment.

The CLERK read as follows:

"SECTION 24. The Legislature shall not delegate to any special commission, corporation or association, any power to make, supervise or interfere with any public improvement, property, money or effects, whether held in trust or otherwise, or to levy taxes or perform any municipal functions whatever."

The section as amended was agreed to.

THE TWENTY-THIRD SECTION RE-CONSIDERED.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman: If it is in order, I move to re-consider the vote by which the preceding section was adopted, for the purpose of offering an amendment. It was passed over very hastily.

The CHAIRMAN. It is competent for the gentleman to move a re-consideration.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. What for?

Mr. BOWMAN. I will suggest to the gentleman that I wish to insert into the section, after the word "obtain," the words "or pay" or, "or appropriate."

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I hope the gentleman will not press it. That section is in the old Constitution.

Mr. BOWMAN. I know it is, and that is the very reason why I want to have it amended.

The motion to re-consider was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The twenty-third section is before the House.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend, as follows:

To insert, after the word "obtain," the words "or appropriate."

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Chairman: How will the section read as amended?

The CLERK read as follows:

"SECTION 23. The Legislature shall not authorize any county, city, borough, township or incorporated district, by virtue of a vote of its citizens or otherwise, to become a stockholder in any company, association or corporation, or to obtain or appropriate money for or to loan its credit to any corporation, association, institution, company or individual."

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman: The reason why I offer this amendment is this: I am aware that the section is precisely as it stands in the present Constitution, article nine, section seven, but the section there does not meet what I desire should be reached. There is a question, and a very serious question, whether the councils of cities, towns and boroughs have not, under that section, the right to donate their funds. There is a bill now pending in the Legislature, which has already passed one House, by which it is proposed to pay over $80,000 of the public funds of the city of Corry, where I reside, to a certain firm which proposes to establish, in the city, the manufacture of engine boilers, &c. Now this constitutional objection is raised, and the ready answer is, that this giving of money is not "loaning its credit," but a simple proposition to donate this amount of money. I want to place this question beyond controversy or doubt hereafter, and I desire that this amendment be incorporated in this article.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I do not propose to discuss this amendment, but I hope it will not be adopted. With all due deference to my friend, the gentleman from Erie, allow me to state that this, which is a copy of the amendment of 1857, was properly designed to correct a great evil. It prohibits the loaning of credit, the piling up of debts upon municipalities for improvements. The appropriation of the funds they have on hand is not liable to abuse. That subject is under the immediate supervision of the people, and care will be taken, as it has been taken, to prevent the exercise of that power. I do not think it has ever been abused.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the twenty-third section as amended, and it will be read:

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 23. The Legislature shall not authorize any county, city, borough, township or incorporated district, by virtue of a vote of its citizens, or otherwise, to become a stockholder in any company, association or corporation, or to obtain or appropriate money for, or to loan its credit to, any corporation, association, company or individual.

The section, as amended, was agreed to.

THE REPORT RESUMED.

The CHAIRMAN. The twenty-fifth section will be read:

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 25. The Legislature shall not create offices for inspecting, weighing or gauging any merchandise, produce, manufactures or commodity; this shall not, however, affect any office created or to be created to protect the public health and safety, or for supplying the public with correct standards of weights and measures.

Mr. WORRELL. Mr. Chairman: I would like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Legislation if this section will abolish the office of inspector of pickled fish, that we have heard so much about lately? [Laughter.]

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I am not sure whether the words, "standard of weights and measures" will include quite all that it ought to include. I therefore move as an amendment:

To add the word "analysis" to the end of the section.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I have no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I call for a division of the question upon this section, the first division to end with the word "commodity."

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I rise to ask for light on the subject. We have been accustomed to have inspectors of several articles of manufacture and commerce, inspectors of flour, inspectors of leather, inspectors of whiskey, measurers of grain, &c. I have been taught that it is necessary to have these different inspections. We, in the country, have understood that the duties of the different inspectors were necessary, and that the public required this examination as a matter of protection. Therefore I ask the chairman of the committee why this section should strike them all out. I am not interested in the offices myself, in all or any of them, and I do not care a button about them one way or the other. But I ask for information.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman: I can scarcely see, with the gentleman from Carbon, (Mr. Lilly,) that the section will sweep away anything. The first portion of the section provides that "the Legislature shall not create offices for inspecting, weighing or gauging any merchandise, produce, manufactures or commodity." That is one part of the section. The other is "this shall not, however, effect any office created, or to be created, to protect the public health and safety, or for supplying the public with correct standards of weights and measures and analysis." Now, although in the first provision the creation of these offices is prohibited, yet under the second the power reverts to the Legislature, and they may do all that they are forbidden to do in the first. Under the pretense that it is for the public health they can create an office for the inspection of all the provisions of the Commonwealth. Under the words "public safety" they can inspect all the machinery of the Commonwealth, inasmuch as they may assert that if manufactured in a different way it may be injurious to the public safety, so that really the first portion of the section would be rendered entirely inoperative by the adoption of the second. I certainly am opposed to putting into the Constitution any clause, one part of which is in conflict with the other, making the section worthless.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say a word or two in explanation of this section, and give a reason why I think it ought to pass. I had the honor of presenting, some two or three weeks ago, a memorial from the Corn Exchange of this city, an institution representing a very large number of merchants, probably twenty-five hundred, asking for the passage of just such a section as this; for the reason that as trade now exists in the city of Philadelphia State inspections are of no value whatever. If a merchant desires to buy, if you please, one thousand barrels of flour, he goes to his broker and the broker goes to the commission merchant. The broker makes his own examination, and if he is satisfied with the price and the quality he reports both to the buyer, and the sale is closed. The State inspection is not regarded at all in the transaction. The broker does not even ask if the flour he purchased has passed the State inspection or not.

I recollect reading some time ago of a consignment sent from an interior town in two lots to two warehouses of the city of Baltimore, fortunately not in our own city. The State inspector went to the two warehouses and inspected the two lots of flour, both of the same identical quality and shipped by the same man, and put two different brands upon the two lots. He was so entirely ignorant of the quality of the flour that upon the same brand, from the same mill, of the same quality, he put one brand upon one lot and another brand upon the other. I would remind gentlemen that the merchants know very well the value of these inspections, and are satisfied that they ought to be abrogated, because trade regulations should come from trade associations.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman will allow me to ask him a question. Is not the consumer of flour interested in having the inspection?

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. No, sir; he never is. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Carbon, who knows something about the manner in which trade is now carried on, because he is a large operator himself. He knows that in olden times trade marks were almost unknown, but to-day almost every manufacturer has his own trade mark, and he makes his manufactured article live up to that trade mark. That was the reason why the maker of a fine brand of flour in the west put four acres on the head of his barrels. Why? Because in regard to the quality of that flour he wanted to maintain a lone hand. [Laughter.] And so it is in all departments of trade. Manufactures are governed entirely by the quality, and that quality is indicated on each particular article by its own trade mark. These trade marks are known to the entire trade of the country and of Europe, and speak for themselves. They are copy-righted and no one can interfere with them. They are just as sacred to a manufacturer as any other copy-right is to its holder, and the manufacturer, knowing his reputation is always at stake, makes the quality of his article come up fully to that trade mark. Therefore State inspections are valueless.

Why, sir, it was only a little while ago, before it was very properly abolished by the Legislature, that there was appointed for the city of Philadelphia an inspector of pork and an inspector of lard. And at that time, if you went into a packer's warehouse, you could find his stencil on his barrels, and immediately below, putting on the stencil of the State inspector, and, as the cooper finishes up the empty barrels, and puts on the head, and puts on the trade mark of the firm, right below on the empty barrel he puts on the stencil of the State inspector; and then the open barrel is filled with mess pork and it goes out into the trade. Nay, more, in many of the warehouses, where pork and lard were packed, the State inspector leaves his stencil to be put on by the coopers of the firm who pack their wares, and at the end of the week he comes around, asks "how much has been sold," and when he is told makes out his bill, notes down the amount and goes away with the fees in his pocket, without having seen a barrel of it, or inspected a package.

Again, another reason why these inspectors should be discontinued is because persons inexperienced in manufactures are appointed State inspectors. Men who know nothing whatever about the articles they inspect are placed in these positions, and they are forced to leave the matter to their subordinates. So with a flour inspector; when wanted you find an inspector appointed, though a very excellent man in the United States Internal Revenue office, thoroughly competent to perform all the duties there, yet what can he know about inspecting flour? What does a carpenter in the city of Philadelphia know about measuring grain? And what does a physician, thoroughly posted, probably, about the astringent qualities of the tincture of bark, know about the commercial value of quercitron bark? Any one who knows anything about the trade of Philadelphia will know to whom I allude, and can make the application.

A little while ago a very prominent, and doubtless a very worthy politician, who had rendered his party good service, went to the Legislature to find a place for himself, and in looking around he found all the nice positions taken up, and he was forced probably as the only position left, to take that important position, the inspector of pickled fish. [Laughter.] Well, when he came to Philadelphia, and looked around the fish market, he found that the packers of fish in New England were smart enough to have their own inspector, and that all the fish that came to this market in that condition had that brand upon them, and on inquiry he found that it was contrary to law to put two inspection marks on one package of fish, and therefore his occupation was, in a measure, gone, as far as the pecuniary benefit to be derived from the privilege of taxing the fish dealers for his inspection was concerned. But in a very little while afterward there was offered at Harrisburg, by a delegate from this city, who desired to put a little money into the hands of the inspector of pickled fish, a bill which added to the inspection of salt fish, baskets of clams, and shallop loads of oysters. And the inspector became very clam-orous to have the bill passed. [Laughter.] But the idea of charging a tax for merely looking at a basket of clams, and so much per ton for examining the hold of a shallop load of oysters was so preposterous that the gentleman who offered it very wisely and prudently withdrew it, and I hope that this effort will be the last attempt to place so useless a tax upon the trade and commerce of this city to secure this. I hope the section will be adopted.

Mr. BIDDLE. Before the vote is taken, had not we better consider the propriety of leaving out the word "safety?" I am in favor of leaving the word "health" in.

What I fear is this: I want to say but a word or two on the subject. I concur heartily with what has been so well said by my colleague from Philadelphia (Mr. J. P. Wetherill.) I am opposed to the Legislature interfering between buyers and sellers to make their bargains for them. There is no more need for an inspector of flour than there is for an inspector of dry goods. I believe all these things are useless; but I am afraid that if we leave in the word "safety," we will open a very wide door, through which a great many of these appointments will be allowed to creep, because it will be argued, very plausibly, when an appointment for the inspecting, weighing or gauging some new article is urged, and the Constitutional inhibition is spoken of as preventing it, that the words "or safety" will allow the Legislature to judge whether it is a safe thing or not to do it.

Mr. WHERRY. I suggest to the gentleman the insertion of the word "safety" after the word "life."

Mr. BIDDLE. The words "public health" cover that, because life is included in health. I am willing that the word "health" may stand, but I do not like the word "safety."

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: Is not this phraseology likely to create misunderstanding: "This, however, shall not affect any laws created or to be created." Why not strike out the word "created?"

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I am going to suggest this amendment, if the gentleman will allow me, to strike out the words "to protect," and add or insert the words: "Except for the purpose of protecting the public health and safety, or for supplying the public with correct standard weights and measures, and add "for protecting."

My friend from Philadelphia (Mr. Wetherill) has so well explained the purport of this section that I cannot add anything to what he has said. I might, however, add that it affects largely the section of the State in which I reside, and which I partly represent here, and I call the attention of gentlemen of the eastern counties to the difficulties under which a representative labors when, from time to time, he has presented to him in the Legislature a bill providing for the creation of an office of inspection in the interest of one of his constituents. I appreciate fully the difficulty which exists in matters of this kind, and the object of this section is to restrain the discretionary power of the Legislature, and at the same time to materially relieve that body from these incessant annoyances that are constantly presented from people who want an office made with some little salary attached to it. I would strike out the words "or safety," if it was not for the fact that from the experience at Avondale, and some of those other great disasters in the mines, the mining population have demanded the creation of the office of inspector of mines, and the word "safety" is inseparably connected with that office.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask the gentleman if he has examined the reports of these inspectors for several years, to know whether there has been a single life saved by them?

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I am not prepared to say anything about that.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I understand the subject, and am prepared to speak on it. There has never been a single life saved by the inspection by these inspectors of mines.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. That may all be so, Mr. Chairman. My friend from Carbon is, of course, a large operator in coal, and knows more about that subject than I possibly can. But the miners themselves have demanded the passage of a bill of that kind, and it is indispensable. It seems to me that we must yield to that demand. At all events I would allow the Legislature to exercise discretion in that regard. That is the reason why the word was left in.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: On the safety part of this question I want to say a word. The Legislature in 1855 passed an act creating an inspection of buildings for the city and county of Philadelphia; that is not for the protection of life and property merely, but for the saving of heads and limbs as well as life; and under this bill I am sure many lives have been saved in this community. I had been for many years before that time an active fireman in this city, and had gone day and night from my work to assist in extinguishing fires; had frequently been caught in traps myself and seen others caught also.

Mr. BIDDLE. If the gentleman from Philadelphia will allow the interruption; I do not object to the word "life" at all, and only objected to the word "safety."

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: There may be an injury suffered by an individual that would be more than losing his life; he might, for instance, be made an incurable cripple.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I was going to move to strike out the words "or safety," and insert "for the purpose of protecting life."

Mr. SIMPSON. I do not think that would be sufficient. My attention was particularly called to this subject just before I took a seat in the Legislature in 1855. I went out to a fire in the district of Richmond, in the upper part of the city, and I discovered a row of houses, fourteen in number, with but four outside brick walls to them, four inches in thickness; the division of the intermediate parts were but stud and lath partitions. The fire broke out at one end, and it swept to the other in a very few minutes. The whole row fell to the ground, barely allowing the people to escape, and two or three persons were injured before they could get out of the ruins, and may now, so far as I know, be living and suffering from the result of the injuries then received. My attention was also called to this subject by a fire in another place, in George street, between Schuylkill Sixth and Seventh, where the roofs of the houses were in one entire row. The fire broke out in the western end, and when I went with a stream to the other end to assist in extinguishing the fire, I was roasted out in very short order. That bill, providing for the appointment of building inspectors, was then drawn by myself, after an interview with a number of builders, and was presented to and passed by the Legislature. I know that it has worked very well in this city, and I know that the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle) would not be willing to part with it to-day.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I think, as the gentleman on my right (Mr. J. Price Wetherill) has said, that the Legislature has appointed an inspector for oysters and clams, as well as salt fish, there is very little use in this section, if intended to be confined to the creation of offices in the future. Though the present incumbents of these offices may die, the offices that now exist for the inspection of clams and oysters, salt fish, and the like, may remain eternally under the words of this section, which provides that the Legislature shall not create offices for inspecting, weighing, or gauging any merchandise, produce, manufactures or commodities. This shall not, however, affect any office created or to be created to protect the public health and safety, or for supplying the public with correct standards of weights and measures. I have no amendment to offer, but simply desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Legislation, if he will allow me, whether it is the intention to allow offices of that character to remain as they now are.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: In reply to the inquiry of my friend from Philadelphia, I will say that it was not the desire of the committee, in reporting this section, to legislate or repeal any act, but to announce a policy. When they announce this policy, of course the Legislature can repeal these offices.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: It seems to me that the last clause of this section entirely emasculates the first clause, and the argument which applies to the keeping in of the first clause must apply to keeping out the remainder. Take the case of the inspection of public buildings, or the inspection of mines, both of which are proper. When you say that "the Legislature shall not create offices for inspecting, weighing, or gauging any merchandise, produce, manufactures, or commodity," you do not prohibit the appointment of the inspector of mines, nor do you prohibit the appointment of the inspector of public buildings, both of which, I am willing to admit, are necessary and important. Therefore, if there is nothing in the first clause which prohibits the appointment of the inspector of mines, or the inspector of public buildings, it seems to me that it would be improper to adopt the whole section, as reported, because the adoption of the whole section would give the power to the Legislature, by an ingenious preamble, to appoint officers directly in contravention of the suggestions contained in the first clause.

Let us suppose that the Legislature, in its wisdom, should declare that public health and safety rendered it necessary that fish should not be cooked in a particular manner, and that they should appoint an inspector of cooked fish to visit every household and examine the culinary arrangements of every kitchen. Or, that the public health and safety required that no oysters should be cooked in a particular manner. Surely if you give the Legislature the power to make an office to protect the public health and safety, it is to decide what the public health and safety require. Certainly, there is a great deal of bad cookery in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. I think the public health and safety are as much endangered by bad cookery, as they are by purchasing diseased animal or decayed vegetable food, and if the public health and safety are to be consulted, you will have the Legislature appoint an officer to visit every household, to interfere with the private domestic relations of every family. There is no more tyrannical exercise of power than the appointment of these petty officers. Every professed politician, who cannot get an office in any other way, goes to Harrisburg, and endeavors to get his friends to appoint him an inspector of some commodity of known general use. It may be pickled fish, or it may be decayed clams, or it may be dough-nuts, or it may be sauer kraut, but it is something the people use, and do not want to be interfered with, and the entire object of the whole thing is simply to pension off some political hanger-on of one or the other parties. They do no good. Nobody pays any regard to their inspection. Nobody throws up a contract because their inspection is not satisfactory. Nobody buys anything because their inspection is satisfactory. But every man who buys, and every man who sells, relies upon his own judgment, and his own judgment alone, and all of these offices ought to be abolished, and, while we are about it, let us abolish them now and forever. Do not let us adopt any proviso which, upon an assumed regard for the public health or the public safety, will enable the Legislature to infest the community with these people.

But coming back to what I said at first, what I desire to call the attention of the committee of the whole to is that there is nothing in the first clause of this section which would prevent the Legislature from appointing an inspector of buildings, or an inspector of mines; by adopting the first clause alone, we accomplish all that is required, without the danger of perpetuating the inspectors of merchandise, produce, manufactures or commodities, which would follow the adoption of the entire section.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: Before the gentleman from Philadelphia takes his seat, I would like to ask him if it would include an inspector of dangerous oils, fluids and dangerous combinations?

Mr. GOWEN. Oh, yes; that would be included in the term "produce or commodity," unquestionably.

To conclude, I would therefore not pass this section unless you make it so strong:

First. That no such office now created shall hereafter exist; and Second. That no alleged benefit to the public health or safety can be made use of as an argument for foisting upon the community a class of non-producers, whose only object is to make money, without any benefit to the community, whatever.

I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Indiana, whether either of the words "merchandise, produce, manufactures or commodities" would cover the case of live stock, cattle, hogs, horses or sheep. I think not. I do not think you would call live stock "merchandise, produce, manufactures" or a "commodity." I would therefore suggest an amendment by inserting, after the word "merchandise," the words, "live stock."

Mr. HARRY WHITE. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White.)

Mr. EWING. What is that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be read.

The CLERK read:

To strike out the third line to and including the word "protect," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "except for the purpose of protecting."

The section, as amended, will read:

"The Legislature shall not create offices for inspecting, weighing or gauging any merchandise, live stock, produce, manufactures or commodity, except for the purpose of protecting the public health and safety, or for supplying the public with correct standards of weights and measures."

Mr. KAINE. I did not know, sir, that there was a law in Pennsylvania that required the inspection of live stock—either horses, cattle, sheep or hogs. I know that attempts have been made in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, while the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) has been a member of it, to pass laws of that kind, but I was not aware, nor am I aware now, that any such law exists on the statute book of this State. I understand from the discussion here that this section is intended by the gentlemen in favor of it to abolish all the existing offices of the kind named in the section. I merely want to know whether it is the opinion of those gentlemen, or of this committee, that this section will do that thing. These offices are now existing by the acts of the Legislature of this State. This section will certainly not abolish them, and if it does not, why they must exist as long as the law stands—it may never be repealed, and I suggest to the gentlemen who favor this section that they had better put something into it that will abolish these offices at once.

Mr. DARLINGTON. That can be very readily done if the committee see fit to insert the words "or continue."

Mr. JNO. PRICE WETHERILL. I would suggest, to the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) that his colleague has prepared an amendment, which, I have no doubt, will meet the point.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I do not propose to add anything to what has been said on this subject; but I desire to say that I entirely agree with what has been said by the gentleman from this city, over the way, (Mr. J. Price Wetherill,) and the other gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Gowen,) that the thing desired, if anything, is the total abolition of these offices; and what I want to observe is that the latter part, the last three lines, of this section, seem to me to be entirely unnecessary for any purpose for which they are intended: "This shall not, however, affect any office created or to be created to protect the public health and safety, or for supplying the public with correct standards of weights and measures." We have a standard of weights and measures, I am aware, at the seat of government, and they are furnished to the county. We have an officer in every county, appointed from time to time by the Executive, called the sealer of weights and measures, a very useful officer. He is enabled to go into our markets and see that the weights and measures are of the proper standard. He is an officer like clerk of the market in the city of Philadelphia or any other city, to occasionally go through the market and see that the weights and measures of the butter and other things that are there are correct, and thus protecting the purchaser, but that requires no constitutional provision. It does not affect the public health. There is no general law about supplying the public with correct standards of weights and measures, nor do we mean to interfere with the standard of weights and measures that exist in every county in the Commonwealth, nor with the sealer of weights and measures, who may be appointed by the Governor, as heretofore, in accordance with law. I think, therefore, that the best plan would be to adopt the two first lines and reject the balance.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend the amendment, and I trust that the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) will agree that this will be voted on before the division is called for, to insert after the word "commodity," in the second line, the words, "and all such offices are hereby abolished."

Mr. DARLINGTON. That is what is wanted.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I hope that that amendment will not prevail. I presume they have here in this city—if they have not we have in Pittsburgh—an inspector of meat, a very useful and very important officer for the public health. That officer will be stricken down by the amendment just now offered—the inspector of meat.

Mr. MACVEAGH. And the inspector of petroleum.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. I apprehend that if that section were modified as proposed that office could not be created, or would not be allowed to continue.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. Chairman: I suggest that that is a municipal office, and I would ask whether he is not appointed by the city authorities?

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Well, when we say that the Legislature shall not create, we mean that they shall not create directly or indirectly. ["No! No!"] Why, certainly, and you have prohibited all special legislation on these matters. When we say they shall not create an office of that kind, they certainly cannot authorize the city to create that office, because the city cannot create any office except what they are authorized to create by the Legislature. I cannot, for the life of me, perceive how you are to prohibit the Legislature from conferring a power, and then say that the city shall exercise that power. When you, by a particular section of this kind, expressly say that the Legislature shall not create an office, it does not say by special act, but broadly, the Legislature shall not have power to create such an office, yet say that a city shall create such an office. I cannot conceive that that will stand the test of our courts. If it is modified in that way it might do, but when you have a broad section such as that would be, if this amendment were adopted, it will apply to cities, and prevent them from creating, and prevent the Legislature from authorizing them to create such an office, I hope the amendment in its present shape will not be adopted.

Mr. WM. H. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: The inspector of meats in our city is a municipal officer, elected by the county. There is nothing in here to prevent a county from electing such an officer. But I suppose that this will apply to the office of sealer of weights and measures in our city, and abolish it. That is an office that is wholly useless; it is of no service whatever, and is nothing but a tax upon the merchants doing business there. It authorizes a man who has no acquaintance whatever with scales or weights, or materials for weighing, to make an inspection twice a year, and get his fees for it. It is of no use to the people, and is a tax upon every man who has scales in his house. I do not know that that office is abolished by this section; but I know it is an abuse, and I would like to have a word from the chairman of this committee as to whether the section would apply to such municipal offices as that and abolish them. I mean such officer as that of the sealer of weights and measures. It is of no practical use whatever, and is merely a sinecure enjoyed by people who are not fit to attend to it.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: As I understand the distinction intended to be drawn by the committee which has made this report, it is that there are two classes of inspectorships now recognized by the law of this State in its legislation. One is a class of inspectorships to protect the public health and safety, that is, to prevent diseased meats, and I suppose to prevent improper and unsafe petroleum, and to prevent unsafe buildings, and unsafe mines; in other words, matters which affect the public health and public safety and which affect cheating, as by false weights and false measures. These inspectorships are preserved to the Legislature; that is, the power of creating them, in their wisdom, is left with them. There is another class of inspectorships contemplated by the section which does not affect the public health or safety, but which, in some antecedent time, has been supposed to furnish a standard for the buyer in the market, and it is intended to say that for the future no such inspectorships shall be created. That seems to be an entirely intelligible distinction, and which I am certainly quite willing to adopt.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman; I would like to ask the third class to which the gentleman (Mr. MacVeagh) referred.

Mr. MACVEAGH. I said the inspectorship of weights and measures and the protection from cheating.

Mr. ELLIS. Those are the first and second. What is the third?

Mr. MACVEAGH. The third is a class of inspectorships, I infer from what one of the gentlemen from Philadelphia said, to give currency to articles of merchandise, simply to fix the relative grade and rank of these commodities. The merchants here say that these no longer serve their purpose, but have merely served the purpose of a house of refuge for needy politicians. I know nothing about that. I do not even know what is allowed by law; but these distinctions seem to me to be broad enough between the two classes. I suppose, if that is so, the Convention will be ready enough to see the distinction. But unless I did know what the effect of the repeal of the law would be I would not vote for it. I would hesitate before repealing legislation en bloc in this matter. Such a clause as that would require a controversy as to particular offices, and the controversy would be whether it was an office called for by the public health and safety or not. We should endeavor to so fix the section that it would end all confusion of that kind and all controversy.

Mr. SAMUEL A. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: It strikes me we are carrying this prohibition a little too far. I cannot see the necessity of this section at all. I think, sir, that no abuse has arisen from these appointments by the Legislature of certain officers of this kind. However it may work in the city of Philadelphia, I believe my colleagues will all join me in saying that, so far as regards the city of Pittsburg and the county of Allegheny, the system has worked well. There has been no complaint about it; and, sir, to pass this section in its present shape would give rise to very considerable doubt as to its legal construction. Our courts would be called upon to determine what was for the public safety and for the public health. Why leave a question like this open to be determined by our courts? What is the inspectorship of flour? Does not that inspectorship relate to the public health and safety? Certainly it does; and no gentleman will say that it does not. Of course, then, it becomes a matter for judicial interpretation. What does an inspectorship of beef amount to? The gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) goes for the direct exclusion of beef inspectors. I consider that so far as Allegheny is concerned, having a population of nearly three hundred thousand, it is a matter of the greatest importance to them that their beef should at all times be inspected.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: Allow me to state to the gentleman that I said I was opposed to the proposition for inspecting cattle yards—inspecting live stock.

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I know there are occasions when butchers of, perhaps, poor repute will go into a cattle yard, and there, perhaps, purchase a beef that has died from exhaustion, or from ill treatment, while on its way from the prairies to Pittsburg. When you require that all these things shall not be inspected, that is saying to the public that neither flour nor beef should be inspected. We have, also, in Western Pennsylvania, not confined to Pittsburg as a city—not within the municipal control—inspections of oil, and what are they? They are vastly important to the community for the purpose of preventing men from being defrauded of their rights. It is known that certain grades of petroleum are explosive and dangerous at a certain temperature, and sales are sometimes made of petroleum of that grade or that character. It is advisable to have persons for "inspectors of oil" who are skilled in the knowledge of this commodity, and who are able to deter, mine its quality and character; for suppose a case occurs where an investigation is desired as to damage resulting from such oil, these inspectors would be essential in order to fix the blame where it belongs. They have inspectors of oil at Oil City, and at other places, and outside of the control of any municipality whatever.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee now rise.

It was not agreed to.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman: Believing that the municipal authorities have all the power necessary to create boards of inspection, for the inspection of such articles as may endanger the public health or safety of the citizens of the municipality—

Mr. STANTON. There is no power in the city except what comes from the Legislature.

Mr. HEMPHILL. They will be able to get it under general laws. I think, sir, that such being the case, or that it could readily be made so by a general provision of the Legislature, applying to all cities alike, giving them the power to employ such officers for the health and safety of its citizens, I think the exception should be confined solely to an officer for supplying a correct standard of weights and measures, and I therefore offer the following, as a substitute, for insertion.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman (Mr. Hemphill) offer this as an amendment?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir; as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be read for information at this time; but it cannot be received, as there is an amendment to an amendment now pending.

The CLERK read:

"All offices for the weighing, gauging, measuring, culling or inspecting of merchandise, produce, manufacture or commodity whatever, are hereby abolished, and no such office shall hereafter be created by law; but nothing in this section contained shall affect the supplying of the public with correct standards of weights and measures."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen.)

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Chairman: This section and the amendments will affect my own portion of the State very largely. I am free to say that abuses have been introduced in the Legislature, by way of special bills, that bore very hard indeed upon us, and we regard it as an almost unmitigated evil; yet I do not think that that is a sufficient reason for taking away all power as to the appointment of proper inspectors in cases where protection might be required. The benefits of such inspections as are necessary to be here provided for should not be confined to cities, but should extend to the country districts as well.

There are officers, such as inspectors of oil, inspectors of steam boilers and other inspectors, the greater portion of whom are entirely outside of cities, and must be governed by general acts and action, if they are to be governed at all. I think this section in its limitations goes too far entirely. I subscribe to the doctrine of the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) that if we make any restriction let us make it in this section, but to undertake to do away with all these officers at a sweep would be to leave ourselves powerless against what may be a very serious evil. We are taking a leap in the dark. Let us not relieve ourselves of one grievance and then have occasion to grieve over another. Let the power be in the Legislature. We have been imposed upon, perhaps, more than any portion of the State by special bills, yet I am not in favor of taking away all power from the Legislature. Either vote down the section and leave the Legislature to act freely or leave it as it stands.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman: The section as proposed to be adopted reads:

"The Legislature shall not create offices for the inspecting, weighing or gauging of any merchandise, live stock, produce, manufacture or commodity, except for the purpose of protecting public health and safety."

If it is desired to affect the public health and safety, does it not then follow that the Legislature shall appoint inspectors for inspecting and weighing merchandise, &c.? The very desire of the Committee on Legislation is defeated by the section as it now stands.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I understand the distinction of the Committee on Legislation to be this: Suppose a cattle disease breaks out that requires a skilled inspector to ascertain whether the cattle or the meat is diseased; or, suppose the pork becomes diseased with trichinæ spiralis, and it requires the services of an expert to save the public health, then the committee leave it to the Legislature to appoint an officer of that kind.

Mr. LANDIS. If that is so then the whole measure is unnecessary, and we had better vote it down.

Mr. BREBE. Mr. Chairman: I offer this amendment —

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment cannot now be received.

The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Gowen,) to insert, after the word "commodity," these words, "and all such offices are hereby abolished."

Mr. DODD. Mr. Chairman: It is so near the hour of adjournment that I do not wish to take up the time of the committee, but I hope that the vote will not be taken on this to-day. My mind is somewhat unsettled in regard to it. It strikes me that it is an important matter, and there certainly is a misunderstanding about it. For instance, my friend from

Allegheny (Mr. J. W. F. White) asked the question whether the municipal authorities could create an office, provided it is not left to the Legislature. Certainly not. A municipal government is the creature of the Legislature. Whatever is prohibited to the Legislature is prohibited to the counties and cities. If we prohibit the Legislature from creating these offices no city or county could create them. The law is clearly laid down in "Cooley on Constitutional Limitations," which I have on my desk, and any gentleman who reads it will see that municipalities created by the Legislature cannot have a power which the Legislature itself has not got. Now, are we ready to give up these offices and say that we are not going to have any inspection of anything? I think the section, as it is before us, meets the case. They have all the power that they want under the general police regulations of the State for the general safety of the community. I am not certain but what we had better leave it there as it is, and not encumber the Constitution with details.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee do now rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

It was agreed to. So the committee rose.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President: The committee of the whole have had under consideration the articles submitted by the Committee on Legislation, and have directed me to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Leave was granted the committee to sit to-morrow-

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President: I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

It was agreed to.

The Convention then, at two o'clock and forty-five minutes, adjourned.

SIXTY-NINTH DAY.

TUESDAY, March 18, 1873.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M., the President, Hon. Wm. M. Meredith, in the Chair.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. H. W. PALMER presented a petition from citizens of Luzerne county, praying for the insertion in the Constitution of a provision prohibitory of the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

Mr. FULTON presented a petition from citizens of Westmoreland county, praying for the insertion of a similar provision in the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on Legislation.

PRINTING REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MACVEAGH presented the following resolution, which was twice read :

Resolved, That all the standing committees of this Convention be requested to present their reports in time, that the same may be printed before the adjournment of the Convention on the twenty-eight instant.

Mr. MACVEAGH. I move to amend the resolution, by inserting the words, "excepting the Committees on Schedule and Revision and Adjustment."

Mr. BOWMAN. I move to amend the amendment, by excepting also the Committee on Constitutional Sanctions.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I do not think it is desirable to accept this modification of the resolution, unless some reason can be shown for its necessity. The object of this resolution is that these reports of the standing committees shall all be printed, in order that we may be able to take them home when the Convention takes a recess, excepting those committees which cannot report until the final work of the Convention is completed.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman: The Committee on Constitutional Sanctions have not made their report as yet, and I do not think they will be able to report in time to comply with the requirements of the resolution. I hope, therefore, the amendment to the amendment will be adopted.

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the resolution, and it was agreed to.

Mr. J. M. WETHERILL offered the following resolution, which was twice read :

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to have printed a sufficient number of the reports of the committees, that each person and member of the Convention may be furnished with three copies.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman; It has not been long since a resolution was passed by the Convention, requiring three hundred copies of the reports of the various committees to be printed for the use of the members. I apprehend that this is a sufficient number.

Mr. J. M. WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I desire to remark that sometime ago made an application to the Sergeant-at-Arms for additional copies of some bills which had been printed, and I was informed that they had all been distributed. I think, especially as the Convention will adjourn in a short time, that a sufficient number of the reports of the committee should be printed in order to furnish all the members with copies. They are not only useful for reference for ourselves, but for distribution among our friends. I hope, therefore, that the resolution will pass.

The question being taken, the resolution was not agreed to.

THE ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that if it is the desire of the Convention to proceed to the consideration of the report of the Committee on Legislation, a motion will be necessary. The Chair mentions this fact because the orders of the Convention have become so numerous that the time of the Convention is unnecessarily consumed in reading them over.

Mr. HANNA. I move that the Convention resolved itself in committee of the whole, and proceed to the consideration of the article reported by the Committee on Legislation.

THE ARTICLE ON LEGISLATION.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole on the article reported by the Committee on Legislation, Mr. Armstrong in the chair.

STATE OFFICES.

The CHAIRMAN. The twenty-fifth section is before the Convention. It will be read by the Clerk.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 25. The Legislature shall not create offices for inspecting, weighing or gauging any merchandise, live stock, produce, manufactures or commodity; this shall not, however, effect any office created or to be created to protect the public health and safety, or for supplying the public with correct standards of weights and measures.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion has been made by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) to amend the section, by striking out the words "to protect," and inserting the words, "except for the purpose of protecting." The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) has offered an amendment to this amendment, by inserting after the word "commodity," in the first sentence, the words, "and all such offices are hereby abolished." The question is upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I withdraw the amendment I have offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will suspend remarks until the Chair ascertains the precise question. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws his amendment to the amendment, and the amendment will fall with it.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I now move to add the words, "live stock."

The CHAIRMAN. That was accepted.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following substitute for the section.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I desire to ask a question. Is it competent for the chairman of the Committee on Legislation to accept the amendment offered in the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment was not accepted by the gentleman from Indiana. It was proposed by him, and accepted by the House.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman: Has the gentleman from Indiana withdrawn his amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. He has. The question is upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. Guthrie,) which will be read.

The CLERK read as follows: The gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Guthrie) moves to strike out the section, and insert as follows:

"The Legislature shall not create any office for inspecting, weighing or gauging any merchandise, produce or manufactures, except such offices of inspection as may be necessary to protect the public health and safety, and to furnish correct standards of weights and measures."

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend as follows: To insert the words "live stock."

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Allegheny indicate at what point?

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman from Allegheny proposes to add "live stock" in the exception, I am willing to modify my substitute, so as to prohibit it. But I am not willing to accept as an amendment a law authorizing the State to appoint such inspectors.

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I want the words added, so as to keep them in the inspection.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute, as amended, will be read.

The CLERK read as follows: It is moved to insert the words, "including the inspection of live stock," after the word "inspection." The substitute, as amended, will read as follows:

"The Legislature shall not create any office for the inspection, weighing or gauging of any merchandise, produce or manufactures, except such offices for inspection, including the inspection of live stock, as may be necessary to protect the public health and safety, and to furnish correct standards of weights and measures."

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I have but one observation to add to what was said on the subject yesterday. I have no particular objection to the amendment or substitute offered by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Guthrie) for the original section. Delegates will observe it is the same in effect with the section as reported by the Committee on Legislation.

That section says:

"The Legislature shall not create offices for inspecting, weighing or gauging any merchandise, produce, manufactures or commodity; this shall not, however, effect any office created or to be created to protect the public health and safety, or for supplying the public with correct standards of weights and measures and analysis."

That is the original section. The substitute offered by the gentleman from Allegheny includes the first part of the section, striking out the latter part, and adding the words, "except such officers of inspection as may be necessary to protect the public health and safety, and furnish correct standards of weights and measures."

Now that is but another way of expressing what is already expressed in the original section. I am not tenacious about it, but it occurred to me that that had better be retained in the original section; certainly if the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. S. A. Purviance) is going to press his amendment, including live stock, I am opposed entirely, and in toto, to that inspection. That is one of the grievous evils of the times.

Now what is the purpose of this section? I admit that it is somewhat difficult to keep in mind the exact distinctions that are here proposed. There is an exception here in behalf of such offices of inspection as are necessary to protect the public health and safety. Some exception of that kind is indispensable. What is fully aimed at has been explained by the earnest gentleman upon my left, (Mr. John Price Wetherill,) who so eloquently reviewed the abuse on this subject in the city of Philadelphia. The Legislature yearly is tormented to create special offices of inspection for the obligation of this man or that man, and after the office has been created it is found to be a mere bagatelle. Then members of the Legislature are importuned to increase the perquisites so that it will be a paying office. The object of this section is to lay the axe to the root of this evil and make it impossible hereafter to create any offices of a commercial character simply to provide a place for an importunate politician.

It is said that we must have inspectors of diseased meats; well, that is under the regulation of the municipalities and is all right and proper. It is said that we must have inspectors of mines. That is for the protection of the public life and the safety of human lives, and that we cannot avoid.

But what we want to aim at is the creation of these offices for inspecting simply commercial commodities, or in order to give somebody an office. We have a bank inspector, a leather inspector; who can say for a moment that that is necessary for the protection of the public life or safety? Or who would say that the inspection of certain articles of dry goods, that the ingenuity of some office seeker may conceive proper to give him a place—would promote the general health?

It will be, therefore, apparent to every gentleman of this Convention, that the direct effect of this section will be to give the Legislature a rock to stand upon, so that when it is proposed to create these offices for the benefit of certain individuals, unless it can be plainly indicated that the offices are absolutely necessary for the protection of the public health or safety, the Legislature may defeat the bill, or it may be vetoed by the Executive. It is an assistance to the Legislature in preventing this abuse.

Mr. LEAR. Mr. Chairman: From the start, this section has been a mystery to me, and it is getting no clearer under the discussion. I confess that when I read that section, and after I had heard it discussed yesterday, I turned to the Convention Manual to ascertain the names of the members of this Committee upon Legislation. I knew the intelligent chairman of that committee, and that he was a gentleman of great ability and many accomplishments. But I knew, at the same time, that his legislative and constitutional making capacity was distributed between the State Senate and this body; and that by the performance of this dual duty, it was stretched out to an attenuated condition, by which it was scarcely able to bear the ponderous pressure of its own weight. But when I examined the names of the other members of this committee in connection with this subject, I made up my mind that this section was a huge joke. They ought not to undertake to palm off upon this Convention a joke of this kind. Some of us country men, who come from the rural districts, ought not to be taken advantage of in this way, by having our inexperience imposed upon by a section proposed to be put into the Constitution of this State to abolish inspections except for particular purposes, when it must be apparent that it is not in our power to do that which is proposed here.

Now this is a provision in restraint of the powers of the Legislature. The legislative power, as we say, and as we have always said, of the State of Pennsylvania, is in a general assembly. That is the people's body. The Legislature of the State represents the sovereign will of the people, and every provision that we put in our Constitution to circumscribe the power of the General Assembly is a restraint upon the personal and political freedom of the people of Pennsylvania.

When we undertake to restrain the legislative power by constitutional inhibitions, we should do it in such a manner as to make it become practical. I know nothing, by experience, as about fifty of the members of the Convention do, how an act of the Assembly is made. I never was present at its birth, nor witnessed the travail of that body; nor was I ever at the act, nor present in the hour of its parturition, but I have assisted as dry nurse of many of the legislative births, in the shape of statutes, which we have been for twenty years aiding and strengthening, until these imbecile and infantile creations which have been sent forth and cast abroad upon the community, until they have become strong enough to walk alone, or, in other words, so that the people of the State could understand, by judicial decisions, what they meant.

But we suppose that when the Legislature is about to pass a law, a bill is presented by some member who thinks he knows of some special grievance. It is passed through the two Houses and goes to the Governor for his inspection and approval or rejection. The Governor, if it becomes a question as to whether it is constitutional or not, calls in the aid of his Attorney General, and in doing so, if under this section some gentleman has provided for the creation of some inspector, he will ascertain, in the first place, whether that inspection comes within any of the exceptions provided in this section. What are those exceptions? This shall "not affect any office created, or to be created, to protect the public health and safety." Well, then the Attorney General must be a man of science, and he must have a laboratory in his office, because he is not to determine the constitutionality of the act by any of the constitutional tests that are applied to it, but he is to determine by some test involving matter of fact and, probably, scientific inquiry. An inspector is created to inspect some villainous compound that has been manufactured for the purpose of giving light to the people, and it must be analysed. In this instance you will have the spectacle of the Attorney General of the State, with his chemicals and his compounds, his weights and his scales, determining the constituents and ingredients of an article that is proposed to be inspected, and if he fails in that, as he will most probably, he must secure outside assistance, and obtain information from practice and experience.

I once heard of a physician who attempted to institute a new theory of medicine, and establish a system of therapeutics, and he started out to establish the soundness of his practice of medicine upon the inductive system. His grand specific for all diseases was roast beef and brandy. The first patient he had was a burly butcher, who had been attacked with a furious fever, and he administered his remedy, and the butcher got well. He immediately entered upon his diary, "roast beef and brandy cure a butcher." His next patient was a tailor, with the same disease, to whom he administered the same remedy, but the tailor died, and he then entered upon his diary, "but kill a tailor;" and if the Attorney General, in ascertaining whether roast beef and brandy were dangerous to the public health and safety, should inspect the diary of this man who had undertaken to establish his theory by the inductive method, he would be thrown into uncertainty, and would receive no light from his experience. If he could not ascertain in that manner the dangerous qualities of an article, he could consult the opinions of men of learning in their particular departments. For instance, there is the opinion, which was delivered in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania yesterday, by the present chief justice, who has determined, not judicially, because it happens to be a dissenting opinion, that Schuylkill water, mixed with Knickerbocker ice, is dangerous to the health of the people, and that the guests of the centennial exhibition in 1876 will have their health injured by the use of Schuylkill water, seasoned with Knickerbocker ice. Then there will come up a bill for an office for the inspection of Schuylkill water, and the Legislature will give the opinion of the Chief Justice in evidence before the Attorney General, to prove the necessity of having this water inspected.

Some enterprising member from the city, Samuel Josephs, for instance, or William Elliott, will get up a bill and have it passed through the Legislature, to provide for the inspection of bricks in the city of Philadelphia, and it will be submitted to the Attorney General to know whether that is prohibited by this constitutional provision. It will be said that bricks are not detrimental to the public safety. Ah! but says this solon from Philadelphia, we recently had a case in which one of the most valued citizens, in passing along the street, under the careless management of a hod carrier, had a hodfull of bricks tumbled upon him, which crushed him to death, and therefore bricks are dangerous to the public safety, and there must be an inspector of bricks.

Take a case from the smoke-enveloped city of Pittsburg. A citizen, passing along the street, drops dead on the sidewalk. A coroner's jury is summoned, and they bring in a verdict that he died of asphyxia; strangled with smoke. An intelligent member from that district rises in his seat in the House of Representatives, or the Senate of the State, and proposes that there shall be an inspector of smoke for the city of Pittsburg. I say that this whole section will end in smoke. There is nothing, not even flour itself, that cannot be used by ingenious politicians to defeat the constitutional provision. It is said that an old pastor said to his repentant and dying parishioner, quoting from the great Book, "man cannot live by bread alone." "No," said the dying man, thinking of the words of the text, "and I have just sent for a bottle of old Bourbon." Bread seems to be dangerous; man cannot live by that alone, and there will have to be inspectors of flour.

The gentleman from Indiana (Mr. White) says, how does leather affect the health of the people, and how can they get an inspector of leather under this section. The very fact that it is porous and insufficient against the dampness of the snow and the cold of the winter weather, and colds are taken, and pulmonary consumption results therefrom, and thus it is dangerous to the public safety, and there ought to be a leather inspector. If you can find anything by which the public safety is not endangered, by which ingenious politicians cannot create offices for their constituents, I am at a loss to see it. It has been judicially determined, by the present chief justice, that ale is a wholesome beverage, and it will, no doubt, be put in the syllabus of that opinion; but a cask of ale may roll over a man and crush him to death, and therefore it is dangerous to the public safety.

What I propose to show by this course of argument is that this is entirely too loose, and that we are undertaking to prohibit that which is not subject to prohibition, which is not of the character which we can prohibit, and because some people have been wronged by the inspectors of the city of Philadelphia, it does not follow that we should take away this great arm of the people for the purpose of protecting them against the machinations of men who would make money out of the health and safety of the people of the State of Pennsylvania. There are villainous compounds and vile substances mixed together, which, in their use, will poison the people. There is no doubt about the propriety, I suppose, of whiskey inspection, as long as we have whiskey. We have a case in point in our own county, where a man, within a month past, after taking a drink at a bar, fell and never rose again. It happened that he took a drink when the fluid had been reduced to nearly the bottom of the bottle, which had been shaken up a little, and the compounds which had settled there were too much for his physical constitution.

When we find these evils which we wish to remedy, do not let us go to the other extreme, but let us keep a fair mean between the two, for remember the rule of the Jehu tribe is, "Medio tutissimus ibis," and let us pursue that middle course in our action in this Convention, and see that we do not bring ourselves into ridicule by undertaking to legislate upon these subjects, which properly belong to the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, and which we can never remedy. It is out of the question; it is beyond our power to provide for what may be in future, for what may occur, for what may be invented, and for what may be discovered. It is out of our power to say that we shall never require inspectors for the purpose of keeping people from being cheated, as well as for the preservation of their health and their personal safety, by the inventions of men who desire to make money at the risk of the health and the strength, the life and the happiness of the people, as well as by imposing upon them with such things as they should be protected against, in the name, and possessing the appearance, of those articles which are generally deemed useful to the public.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. S. A. Purviance) to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Guthrie.) The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CLERK read :

Insert after "manufacturers" the words, "including the inspection of live stock."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentlemen from Allegheny (Mr. Guthrie.) It will be read.

The CLERK read :

Strike out the section, and insert, "the Legislature shall not create any office for inspecting, gauging, or weighing merchandise, produce, or manufactures, except such offices for inspection as may be necessary to protect the public health and safety, and to furnish correct standards of weight and measures."

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to insert after the word "produce," the words live stock."

The motion was not agreed to, there being, upon a division, twenty-eight in the affirmative, not a majority of the quorum.

Mr. W. H. SMITH. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment:

The CLERK read :

Strike out the section, and insert: "The Legislature shall direct the Secretary of Internal Affairs to prepare a system of weights, measures and gauges, for solid and liquid merchandise, and also the requisite implements, tests and instructions; and complements of these shall be furnished to each county or municipality, which may each for itself appoint offices for inspection of merchandise, manufactures, or live stock, but no State offices shall be formed for such purposes."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Guthrie.)

Mr. LILLY. I move to strike out the exception.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the portion proposed to be struck out.

The CLERK read :

"Except for such offices, for inspection, as may be necessary to protect the public health and safety."

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I agree with all that has been said by the gentleman from Bucks (Mr. Lear) upon this subject. The reason why I make this motion is that I believe it will be leaving the doors too wide open. If the section is adopted with the exception, you might as well adopt no provision in reference to the subject at all. I am not so particular about this, but I merely make the motion for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to the subject. If we can do away with these inspectors, it would be well enough, but if we have them at all, let there be no doubt about it. Let us fix it so that there will be no ambiguity about it, so that there will be no chance whatever for the Legislature to get around it, because I can tell this Convention from past experience, and most of the members will bear me out in what I say, that if there is any possible way of getting around it, if there is a place that you could put a pin into, they will very soon make it into a hole big enough to hold an inspector, and they will appoint all the inspectors they want. If we do not want these inspectors, and, as I said before, I am perfectly willing to dispense with them, we should get rid of them absolutely and perfectly; not hold out hope of a reform that will be entirely delusive. I am for and want absolute prohibition of unnecessary inspections.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I wish to call the attention of the committee to the great danger of going too far in this matter. If we propose to go so far as this amendment invites us to go, I ask whether it is not better to insert a clause at once, that there shall be no legislative branch of the government at all in Pennsylvania. That would protect us entirely, and there is no other way of affording the full protection that some gentlemen seem to desire. It is not necessary to close our eyes to the corruptions that have existed in our own State, and in almost all American States, and, for one, I do not propose to do so; but on the other hand, I utterly scout the idea that I am sent here to regard the future Legislatures, or the present Legislature of this State, as a nest of rogues, simply, who are endeavoring, somehow, to outwit the honest and worthy men gathered here. I am not acting on any such principle. I recognize, to the fullest extent, that there has been corruption in our State Legislature, and so much corruption that the result also is often corrupt, and legislation for private advantages is bought and sold. Are we, therefore, to have no Legislature at all? To tell me that you cannot trust your legislative department with deciding whether a necessity exists for some inspection or not, in order to protect the public health or the public safety, is to tell me that you cannot trust any legislation to the legislative branch at all, and that no reasonable discretion is to be left with it. If that department is not allowed to decide when inspectors, in its judgment, are necessary, it seems to me it would be better simply to move an amendment, abolishing the legislative department of the government altogether.

I shall vote for the section, because, as I understand from the chairman of the committee, it is intended to establish the line of distinction that I suggested yesterday—that the inspectors spoken of by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. J. Price Wetherill) are no longer required in the community, in order to fix the grade and the value of any article in the market, but that inspectors may be necessary to protect the public health and safety. I therefore trust that we will not seriously think of taking all the power to establish inspections from the legislative department of the government.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Carbon (Mr. Lilly) would abolish the office of mine inspector. That result would be very decidedly to the advantage of the owners of the mines, but not at all to be desired by the thirty thousand miners and laborers whose lives and safety depend, in some measure, upon it. It has been said before now that the law providing for the health and safety of persons employed in mines was the offspring of Avondale, where one hundred and eight men met a fiery and awful death in the space of half an hour. Any section that looks towards abolishing this most useful act, appointing a mine inspector, which was designed to protect the lives and health of men employed in the coal mines, I must vote against. The working of the law has been beneficial; under it a great many safety appliances have been placed in and about the mines and breakers. It has provided an intelligent supervision over these great operations, and, while it laid some small tax upon the operator, it has proved beneficial in a high degree to the operative. I am well aware that the time never has been, and, probably, the time never will be, when the capitalist will be willing to dole out of his great possessions any small pitance for the protection of his workmen.

The legislative power has seen fit to throw some safeguards around the men who are engaged in this dangerous occupation, and I trust this Convention will not, at the behest of mine owners, strike down that protection, nor make it impossible for any future Legislature to throw even additional safeguards around these operations, if ever the time comes when it may be found necessary.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I was at a loss to know what was the meaning of this section when I first read it, and I have listened very attentively to the debate that has sprung up on it, and the various amendments that have been proposed, and my mind is even now more confused than at first. It seems to me to be an effort to do what it is impossible to do. I can conceive of but one of two things possible for us. One is: To abolish all inspectors, and prohibit the creation of any such office in the future, or leave it to the sound discretion of the Legislature. All the efforts at trying to modify this seem to me to be utterly unavailing, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Bucks (Mr. Lear.) If I can get at what appears to me the meaning of this section, and the various amendments proposed, I think it may be embodied in a very short section, to take the place of this section, and, perhaps, of several other sections of the Constitution. Although not in order to move such a section now, I will read it for the information of the members. I believe it will be utterly useless, to put in the Constitution this section, or any of the proposed amendments, for they will be ineffectual in the way of restraining the power that must be vested in the Legislature, and in whose sound discretion some trust should be placed. I may hereafter offer this brief section, and I suggest to the members of the Convention that it might, perhaps, meet with unanimous consent and relieve us, not only of the difficulty that we encounter in this matter, but relieve us also of the difficulty of discussing a number of other matters in connection with our Constitution. The amendment I would propose is this: "The Legislature shall pass none except good and wise laws." [Laughter.] That principle covers all these things at once. There we have the very quintessence of the whole of these amendments. Why not, therefore, insert this, and in that way get rid of the difficulty which we find surrounding this section, and which we will, perhaps, find surrounding many other sections of a similar character.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I have a remark or two to make in answer to the proposition stated by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Harry White.) He stated in the course of his arguments that the Legislature wanted "a rock to stand upon." I undertake to say that the reasons pointed out by that distinguished delegate for that kind of legislation, of which we are speaking here this morning, were not sound; and I propose to state the reasons for my belief in that direction. All bills of a private character which are introduced into the Legislature—I mean of a specially private character—are introduced with a full knowledge of their real character. I make bold to say that if the Legislature and the Executive department were honest to the people, there never would be anything in the shape of special legislation. If I understand it right, when a bill, such as has been spoken of here this morning and yesterday, is introduced into either branch of the Legislature, it is a notorious fact that the other delegates in that branch of the Legislature, and in the other House also, dare not oppose its passage. I was told a few days ago by a gentleman who is a member of the Legislature, and who had an important bill to introduce, a bill of general importance to the people, that he was afraid to introduce it into the House of Representatives, for the reason that it would go to a certain committee, and upon that certain committee was a gentleman from the city of Philadelphia who would be opposed to his bill, unless this member who introduced the bill would vote for a bill which had been introduced by the other member in the other branch of the Legislature.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that this is one of the greatest sources and reasons of all this trouble, and I would like the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Harry White,) who has had such large experience in the legislative branch of this government, to say whether it is not the truth, when a member introduces these private bills into one branch of the Legislature, that the members, either in the same House or the other branch of the Legislature, are afraid to oppose them in any particular whatever, but upon the contrary that they render all the assistance they can to secure their passage. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, so much as to the rock upon which legislators would have to stand. Why talk to us in this Convention about giving to the legislator a rock upon which to stand in such matters as these. It is enough, I submit, to acknowledge either the weakness of the Legislature or its corruption at once. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this section if the proposed amendment is adopted, or if it is not adopted I am in favor of voting down this whole section, principally for the reasons stated by the gentleman from Bucks (Mr. Lear.) I think those reasons were stated in a more forcible manner than I could have stated them; and for the reasons he gave I am in favor of voting down this whole section, with the exception of the provision contained in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, proposed by the gentleman from Carbon, (Mr. Lilly.)

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I renew the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. Guthrie,) which will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

To be inserted, in place of section twenty-fifth: "The Legislature shall not create any office for inspecting, weighing, gauging or measuring any merchandise, produce or manufactures, except such offices for inspection as may be necessary to protect the public health and safety, and furnish correct standards of weights and measures."

The question being taken, the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman; I offer the following substitute for the section:

The CLERK read as follows:

"All offices for the weighing, measuring, culling and inspecting of any merchandise, produce, manufactures or commodity are hereby abolished, and no such offices shall hereafter be created by law; but nothing contained in this section shall affect the supplying the public with correct standards of weights and measures."

Mr. BEEBE. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following as an amendment, to be inserted after the word "affect," in the substitute: "Any office created, or to be created, to protect the public health and safety, or for supplying the public with correct standards of weights and measures."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on the substitute, and it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on section twenty-five of the report of the committee.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I call for a division of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The first division will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 25. The Legislature shall not create offices for inspecting, weighing or gauging any merchandise, produce, manufactures or commodity.

The question being taken, a division was called, which resulted as follows: Ayes, thirty-six; noes, thirty-eight.

So the first division was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it was doubtful whether the section could have been divided; but as it has been divided, the question must recur on the second division of the section. The second division will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"This shall not, however, affect any office created or to be created to protect the public health and safety, or for supplying the public with correct standards of weights and measures."

The question being taken, the second division of the section was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section of the report of the committee will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 26. No act of Assembly shall limit the amount to be recovered for injuries to person or property, and in case of death from such injuries, the right of action shall survive, and the Legislature shall prescribe for whose benefit such action shall be prosecuted.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment, to be added at the end of the section.

I. No act of Assembly shall prescribe any limitation of time within which suits may be brought against corporations for injuries to person or property, or for other causes different from that fixed by the general laws prescribing the time for the limitation of actions, and existing laws so prescribing are annulled and avoided.

II. No act of Assembly shall authorize the investment of trust funds by executors, administrators, guardians or other trustees in the bonds or stock of any private corporation; and existing laws so authorizing are annulled and avoided, saving such investments heretofore made in good faith.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle) to the fact that the second division of the amendment is not germane to the pending question.

Mr. BIDDLE. I will then withdraw the second division of the amendment, and will offer it as an additional section.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I desire to say one or two words in favor of the amendment which I have offered to this section. I entertain no feeling of hostility against corporations, so long as they are kept within the limits in which they ought to move. They are probably indispensable adjuncts to existing civilization; but I am absolutely opposed to different statutory rules affecting them than those by which the rest of the community is bound. The object of the section, to which I have offered the present amendment by way of addition, is to remove what seems to me is a great evil, and probably an evil which, if attempted to be remedied by judicial decision, will be found not to be within the limits of constitutional power. There is no more reason why one class of persons in the community—artificial persons—should have limitations made in their favor for injuries to persons or property, than should be made in favor of private or natural persons; and I suppose there will be little difference of opinion in regard to the section as it stands reported by the committee. In regard to the other object, which is not embraced in the amendment to this section, there is a great deal to be said on both sides. I intend to offer it as an independent section. Now, this being the case as to the main or principal subject, why should laws of limitations be different in their application to these artificial persons than to this class of natural persons. If there be a difference it ought rather to be the other way, because the artificial person has a permanency of being, and an order of succession which does not belong to natural persons.

Stale claims certainly are not to be favored, but it strikes me as a monstrous anomaly, as well as a great injustice, to allow a party injured in his person or property a reasonable time within which to bring his action against the person or party injuring him, while you cut the limitation down in regard to his right of action against these artificial persons to no time at all, or very little more than a nominal time. Why, for instance, if a man carelessly and negligently drives his vehicle against me in the street, shall he be subject to an action for six years, and if a conductor of a passenger railway car carelessly and negligently drives his car against me to my injury, shall the remedy be cut down to six months? Now, perhaps, gentlemen are not aware that the existing system of law is upon this subject. I have taken some pains to examine our statute books in regard to the subject embraced in the amendment or addition to this section which I have offered, and I have found that in the city of Philadelphia, in regard to all passenger railways whose routes lie wholly in the city, you can bring no suits against them for damages for injuries or for death caused by them, unless within six months from the time the right of action accrues.

This law was passed in 1868, about four year ago. Now, when I called this a monstrous anomaly, as well as a great injustice to the citizen, I think I was using language entirely proper and within due limits. I want to place these corporations—very valuable when confined within their proper spheres—on precisely the same footing as the rest of the community, and I wish to take from them no single right, properly conferred, but I do wish to take from them the privileges injuriously exercised against the rest of the community, and which, if suffered to remain, must ultimately redound to their disadvantage, if not to their destruction. So, also, in regard to death. This, we may say, being a statutory right, conferred for the first time by the Legislature, may properly be limited by the law which confers the right. I agree to that proposition. But when the right is once given I can see no good reason for limiting it unduly, either in point of amount or as to limitation of time. If it is said that the right of action for damage resulting from death as regards all classes of persons, private individuals as well as corporations, shall be limited to a smaller time than the right of action for injuries not so resulting, be it so. I will admit that there is a show of reason in this. Let us not, however, make a distinction in this respect between artificial and natural persons. It was only yesterday that a gentleman, to whom I showed the amendment which is now before the Convention, told me of a case which had occurred within his own knowledge, of a lady who was grievously injured by the death of a relative, on whom she relied for support, overstepping her time for suit one day beyond the year. Gentlemen will doubtless argue that this might have been, if the limitation had been extended over six years. That is quite true, and I am prepared to consider that as a valid objection, where the limitation affects all classes equally; but I desire that uniformity in this limitation should be established. I do not want the citizen to be perplexed by multifarious and inconsistent enactments in that which comes home so closely to him in his every-day life. I want him to feel that when he is dealing in this respect with an artificial person, he deals precisely on the same footing as with a natural person. I say, therefore, leave this question to the Legislature to decide what a proper limitation of time may be generally, but require that these enactments be uniform throughout the Commonwealth, and applicable to all alike.

MR. CUYLER. Mr. President: It is a grave question, when this Convention shall have finished its labors, and the people of the State adopt the result they arrive at, whether any corporation can survive in the State of Pennsylvania, and it is a difficult and grave question, which ought to engage our consideration, whether, in view of the limitation we are proposing to impose upon the Legislature, in the future, some ingenious mechanic may not devise a wooden mechanism that may perform all the functions of the Legislature, and save the Commonwealth all the expense and inconvenience that attends its existence. Now, I find myself wholly unable to agree with my friend from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) either in his defence of the section as reported or in defence of his special proposition. There are many reasons why there might be a different statute of limitations in reference to actions against corporations from those which exist against private individuals. Corporations—especially the larger railroad corporations of the State, deal with an ever-changing, shifting set of employees. When these corporations turn, after the lapse of two or three years, or as it may be under existing statutes, five or six years, to find the witnesses to be used in their defence against unreasonable claims, they find themselves unable to gather those witnesses together. The right of action exists to a citizen in every county in the Commonwealth; nay, he has the right through the process of a foreign attachment, or by service upon any general officer of a corporation, to seek the jurisdiction of courts in other States, and thus it is corporations are compelled to defend themselves against suits that may be instituted in a vast variety of jurisdictions at a great distance from where the occurrence took place which formed the basis of the action, and after a long lapse of time, when those who could have been summoned as witnesses, have either passed from their employment or become scattered over the State, so that it may have become impossible to gather together the testimony that may defend them against unreasonable claims. The very thought that underlies the statute of limitations is that, by reason of the fading memory of witnesses, the imperfect preservation of papers, the death of those who could have testified after the lapse of a little time, it comes to be impossible to arrive at the truth of the transaction, and there is reason therefore why the statute of limitations, as to actions against corporations, should be more restricted as to its time than the general laws of limitation. I agree with the gentleman, however, as to his criticism upon the limitation of actions against passenger railway companies, for none of the reasons I have spoken of apply to them. There is no justice in limiting the right of action against passenger railway companies to six months time, or in drawing a distinction so far as they are concerned between them and the usual suitors who defend themselves in our court of justice. I am willing to leave this question to the Legislature, where it belongs. I am in favor of letting the Legislature decide all such questions. If there are reasons why statutes of limitations should be broader as to corporations than as to individuals, leave the Legislature with the power to pass upon it, but do not take away from the Legislature, by Constitutional limitation, the power to do this at all. In regard to the body of the section itself, I would suggest what it seems to me is perfectly just. The right of action in the case of death is purely statutory.

It is scarcely thirty years that such action has existed in Pennsylvania at all, but at common law, in the event of death, there is no right of action. The same authority which generously gives the right of action may fairly limit and prescribe the terms upon which it shall be enjoyed. This limitation which exists, not merely in the laws of Pennsylvania, but in the laws of three-fourths of the States of the Union, limiting the right to recover to five thousand dollars in the event of death, speaks the common mind and sentiment of the whole country, arising out of the impositions which have been practiced upon corporations by the action of juries, rendering the enactment of such a law a necessity. It is the expression of the general and popular sentiment and conviction all over the country of the necessity for some limitation because of these impositions. There is no gentleman upon this floor who is a member of the bar, and who has been accustomed to practice in cases of this kind, but must know the peculiar findings of juries upon this subject. In one sense of the word, and very truthfully, no limit of value can be placed upon human life. Nothing can compensate for its loss; but juries decide the valuation of life with absolutely nothing to restrain their judgment, and the result of their verdicts upon railroad corporations especially is sufficient to paralyze and almost destroy them. I hope, therefore, that this provision which has been proved to be so salutary by common experience, and acknowledged all over the country, will not be taken away by a constitutional limitation imposed by this Convention. I have to say, in connection with the section as written, it is simply powerless to effect the result, and that it would be so pronounced in a court of justice.

MR. WORRELL. Mr. Chairman: As has been remarked by the gentleman who preceded me, there are two classes of these suits. The one, in which the right of action is a common law remedy, and the other, in which the right of action is conferred by statute. I suppose it is perfectly competent for the Legislature, which creates a liability and bestows a right of action which did not theretofore exist, to limit by statute the amount of damages to be recovered in the cases upon which the legislation is had. The question whether such limitation is wise and expedient is a matter for discussion; but my judgment is that such restriction is improper and injudicious.

But with regard to the other class of cases, that in which the remedy is at common law. I take it that the section now under consideration is nothing more than a distinct enunciation of one of the provisions of our present Constitution. Section eleven of the Declaration of Rights is in these words: "That all courts shall be open, and every man, for an injury done him in his lands, goods, person or reputation, shall have remedy by the due course of law, and right and justice administered without sale, denial or delay."

The Supreme Court of this State, in a recent decision, in an opinion by Judge Agnew, intimated their judgment that the act of 1868, limiting the amount of damages to be recovered in these cases was violative of that section of the Constitution which I have just read. In my judgment, the act of 1868 is as clearly unconstitutional, in so far as it repeals and destroys the common law measure of damages, in the common law class of actions, as any statute ever adjudged to be in contravention of the organic law.

It is a denial of right and justice for an injury done to the person. In every case to which the act of 1868 has been made to apply, and in which a suitor has been compelled to receive three thousand dollars in satisfaction of an injury inflicting damage to an amount exceeding that sum, the suitor has been refused his constitutional rights, the courts have not been open to him, and right and justice have not been administered without denial. Now this act of 1868 pleads the necessity of the provision now under consideration. The fact that the Legislature of 1868 departed from their just functions, and enacted the unjust and unconstitutional law to which I have referred, admonishes me that we should lay a strong hand upon the legislative department, and say to it, you shall not restrict the liability of a corporation or individual in these classes of cases. The prohibition of legislation should be clear, distinct and emphatic, so that there can not possibly be an evasion of its provisions. I thoroughly endorse the purpose and sentiment of this section.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman: I think the section as reported by the committee is one of the best sections in their whole report, and I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle) makes it still better. The gentleman from Philadelphia in front of me, (Mr. Cuyler,) has stated that there seems to be a popular feeling all over the country to have some legal provision, limiting the amount to be recovered in actions for damages on account of railroad accidents. I think it is just the contrary. The very fact that juries are disposed to give, as he calls it, "excessive" damages, shows that there is a feeling among the people that something should be done in cases of railroad accidents, to compel the companies, through fear of heavy verdicts against them, to keep their roads in such a condition that these accidents would not be continually occurring. The popular feeling is against any limitation of the amount to be recovered. These very verdicts of juries, excessive though they may be in some instances, are really a key to the popular feeling upon the subject. That feeling leads juries, sometimes, to give such damages as will teach these corporations a lesson, and will make their officers take such precautions that it will be next thing to impossible, that accidents, occasioned by gross negligence of their employees, should occur. I think that the law of 1868, the second section of which I will now read, is simply infamous, and now that we are considering the subject matter of that law, we should, if at all possible, provide that it shall be wiped out, and prevent the possibility of any such law being passed in future in this State. The section I have referred to reads as follows:

"In all action now or hereafter instituted against common carriers, or corporations owning, operating or using a railroad as a public highway, whereon steam or other motive power is used, to recover for loss and damage sustained and arising either from personal injuries or loss of life, and for which, by law, such carrier or corporation could be held responsible, only such compensation for loss and damage shall be recovered as the evidence shall clearly prove to have been pecuniarily suffered or sustained, not exceeding, in case of personal injury, the sum of $3,000; nor in case of loss of life the sum of $5,000."

In other words, it says that when a man gets on a railroad train to go from one place to another, and by the negligence of the railroad officers or employees, in not keeping the road in proper condition, or in not taking proper precautions against accident, suffers an injury to his person, by reason of that negligence or want of precaution, no matter how serious the injury may be, short of death, is only to be compensated by a sum not exceeding $3,000; and when a man's life is lost, his family shall only recover a sum not exceeding $5,000, which, at the current rate of interest, will give them but $300 a year, and a paltry sum like that is to compensate that family for the loss of their entire support and sustenance. Just consider the monstrous injustice of such a law as this. Every fair-minded man, who wishes to protect the rights of the people to their fullest extent, should desire to see such a law wiped out from our statute books. Let us then do what we can in this direction, by voting for this section and the amendment thereto, offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle.)

MR. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I do not rise to speak at any length upon this proposition. I simply do so to thank my friend and colleague from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) for the instruction which he invariably gives us when any matter concerning the railroad company of which he is counsel is before the Convention. Indeed, sir, whenever I hear his persuasive tones, and listen to the easy manner with which he seeks to convince us that the corporation which he represents is everything that is innocent, and good, and proper, and that its effects upon the public morals of the State of Pennsylvania has always been beneficial, I greatly admire his skill. The gentleman has referred to a popular feeling throughout the United States in favor of protecting the railroad companies against the people, and in favor of preventing juries from taking advantage of the helpless condition in which these companies find themselves when they have transgressed the rules of right and justice, as they so frequently do. If that gentleman had said "a popular railroad feeling," instead of merely "a popular feeling," I think he would more nearly hit the mark. I think, sir, that all that is proven by the fact that these "blood acts"—for that is the name by which they should be known—the only argument, the only thing which can be shown by the existence of these infamous acts upon the statute books of other States is that the same influence which was brought to bear upon the State of Pennsylvania to put that infamy upon our statute books was used in other States as well. It is a notorious fact, it is well known to every one in this community, that the act of Assembly of Pennsylvania which limits the liabilities of railroad companies, in cases of accidents; it is perfectly well known and notorious that that act was bought and paid for, and that it passed the Legislature of this State by corrupt means.

MR. DARLINGTON. Who bought and paid, and who received the money?

MR. NEWLIN. I say it was a matter of public notoriety at the time, that that bill was passed by corrupt means. It is not customary, I presume, for the parties interested to publish a schedule of what was paid for votes on such occasions. But it is very certain that no individuals could have got any such act passed, and I think that instead of leaving the matter where it is, if we, in aid of these helpless corporations, should put in a provision by which they may be authorized to kill as many people as they please in accidents, and without any price at all, it would be more logical. It is a matter of common notoriety that the agent of the road was on the floor of the House at the time this bill passed, going around looking for and soliciting votes.

MR. TEMPLE. State the name. Who was the man?

MR. NEWLIN. I do not propose to mention the name of a man who is not here, and who cannot have an opportunity of defending himself. I speak of matters of common notoriety, and there is no one here now who was then in the Legislature who will deny that it was a matter of common notoriety at that time.

MR. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I rise to a point of order. I submit that this whole discussion, in regard to the limit of liability in cases of railroad accidents, is out of order now. The subject has been under the consideration of the Committee on Railroads, and will be reported on in a few days, but it is not raised by any question now pending.

THE CHAIRMAN. An amendment is now pending to which the remarks which have been made seem to be pertinent. It is not for the Chair to determine the line of argument which gentlemen may take in opposition to a question pending, but the remarks seem to the Chair to be in order.

MR. WOODWARD. I understood that the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle) related to limiting the time for bringing an action against a corporation, and not to limiting the amount of damages.

THE CHAIRMAN. The twenty-sixth section is before the committee, and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle) was germane to that, and is now before the House. The Chair cannot sustain the point of order.

MR. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: There is no gentleman on this floor who is willing to go farther in regulating and restraining our railroad corporations than I am, and whenever it is necessary to interpose for the protection of the people against the aggressive character of all corporations—for all corporations are aggressive—I am ready to stand up for the people against the corporations. But, sir, this is to be said: We live in a railroad era, and in a country and at a time when we can no more do without railroads than we can do without a home, without houses or dwellings! If they are an evil, they are a necessary evil; they are inseparable from our condition and civilization.

I am no railroad advocate. I am the retained counsel of no railroad on earth. I own no share of any stock in any railroad, I have no interest in them which every citizen of the Commonwealth has not, but, sir, my learned friend from Philadelphia suggests that there is no reason why an artificial being like a railroad company shall be put upon a different basis of limitation, as to action, from a natural person. He will allow me to suggest that there is one reason. All these railroad companies, being corporations, are bound to render accounts for the deeds done in the body every year, to their constituents, and if there is to be a series of suits or possible suits outstanding for six years, in which illimitable damages may be recovered against them, how is it possible for any railroad company to tell its stockholders anything about the fiscal condition of its affairs until these damages are assessed? It is simply impossible to give any amount whatever.

The natural person renders an account for the deeds done in his body only once; he has got no stockholders over him, to whom he has to account; he does not make a balance sheet, unless it is for his own satisfaction.

This is a circumstance that distinguishes the natural from the artificial person, somewhat, and I think one which is entitled to some consideration. The Legislature seems to have attached some importance to it, for they required those having claims against railroad corporations to present them promptly, so that these companies should be enabled to show to the world and their superiors what their actual condition is. The reason given by the gentleman from Philadelphia, before me, (Mr. Cuyler,) for a distinction in the right of action between a corporation and a natural person, struck me as having much force in it, especially when applied to railroads that run into other States, and are doing business as largely as the Central railroad does. But now on this other point I wish to say a word.

The Committee on Private Corporations had the subject of limiting the amount of damages in cases of personal injury under consideration. Their commission did not embrace railroads, for you had a Committee on Railroads, of which my friend from York (Mr. Cochran) was chairman. But the commission of that committee did not embrace any other corporations than railroads; and yet there were many corporations whose employees might do injury, and against which actions might be brought. Under these circumstances the two committees felt themselves embarrassed, (as I knew in the beginning they would be, by splitting up the Constitution into so many fragments,) and they agreed to have a joint meeting. They met jointly, and this, among other matters, was considered. It does not become me, probably, now to state what was the result of the deliberations of this joint committee, because as yet neither committee has reported to this Convention; but the probability is that the Committee on Railroads will waive this whole subject, and the Committee on Private Corporations will report a provision denying to the Legislature the power to limit the damages which individuals, injured by corporations, may recover. That is what my friend here on the right, Mr. Campbell, and others seem to think ought to be done now.

The amendment and discussion, I think, are premature and out of place at this time, and ought to be postponed until the report of the committee comes in. But that the opinion of this Convention may not be forestalled, that we may, if we must pass upon it now, pass upon it in view of all the facts, allow me to say that if you do not allow the Legislature to impose a limit like that which they have imposed, you will ruin some railroad companies in this State. They cannot stand the wild verdicts of juries. It will simply be their ruin. I have seen some of these verdicts. I am told that the remedy for an injudicious verdict is in a motion for a new trial. But suppose you get a new trial, what better chance have you with a second jury than with the first? And will you get your new trial? That depends upon the judge, and my experience of forty years, and better, has led me to feel just as much confidence in juries as I do in judges. If judges were angels, and juries only men, perhaps an appeal from the jury to the bench would be something of value, but the mischief of it is that judges are no more angels than are jurors, and, in general, I think that jurors are just as sound on the question of damages as any body who sits on the bench, and yet we find, with the passionate appeals which counsels are able to make to juries, in those cases, extravagant verdicts are made. Why, sir, the first one that was rendered in Pennsylvania was rendered in behalf of some maiden ladies whose bachelor brother, a drover, was killed upon a railroad, and his whole estate went directly to them as a consequence of his death. We borrowed from the English courts the doctrine that nothing was to be given pro so lationem, by way of solace for the loss of a relative, but only as a pecuniary compensation for a pecuniary injury, and notwithstanding the rule of the law was laid down in that case I think the verdict was for four or five thousand dollars.

MR. J. S. BLACK. Was that recovery wrong?

MR. WOODWARD. I do not say it was wrong, but I say it was excessive, under the circumstances.

MR. J. S. BLACK. Well, I think it is wrong in law and in justice, and my friend (Mr. Woodward) went for it, and I went against it. Laughter.]

MR. WOODWARD. That only proves what the Convention has been told many times before, that my friend (Mr. J. S. Black) was never wrong and was always right.

MR. J. S. BLACK. I thought I was right then, at any rate, and you were wrong.

MR. WOODWARD. Well, I don't remember about that.

MR. J. S. BLACK. I do.

MR. WOODWARD. I know that Judge Lowrey, who was as wise a man as either of us, delivered the opinion of the court in that case.

MR. J. S. BLACK. I dissented, and you concurred.

MR. WOODWARD. I do not know how that was, but I think the gentleman will agree with me that that case was the one that brought this subject to the notice of the people. At that time we had no act of Assembly on this subject at all. There was the doctrine that nothing was to be given for the solace of friends; but only a pecuniary compensation for a pecuniary injury. The court stands upon that ground to-day. Here were ladies claiming pecuniary compensation for a pecuniary injury, whereas there had been no pecuniary injury; on the contrary they were pecuniarily benefited by their brother's death. No doubt they had been greatly distressed; no doubt their sisterly hearts were wrung by the loss of their brother, but there is not a word to be said on that point, because the judge tells the jury that they are not to measure damages by that scale, at all. It is simply a matter of pecuniary values. It is ridiculous to suppose that these ladies suffered any pecuniary injury by the loss of their brother, yet the jury gave them the sum of, I believe, four or five thousand dollars. My friend from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) who never forgets anything, will probably remember the exact amount.

Then the Legislature passed this act of Assembly. I do not know anything about its secret history. I do not know that it has any secret history, and I do not care if it has. In my humble judgment it is a wise law, and I shall be sorry to see this Convention abolish it; and for just this reason, sir, that if you throw the vast interests that are involved in these railroad companies into the jury box, under the lash of counsel's eloquence and persuasive appeals, you will ruin all the feeble railroads. You will compel the strong companies to buy up the feeble ones, and I do not know but, if it goes as far as some of them have gone, and I think some of them have gone up as high as twenty thousand dollars for a leg being broken, or some personal injury like that; if they go on at that rate I do not know but that the strong ones will be ruined also.

That is not my way of getting rid of anything. If we want to get rid of railroads, let us attack them in front. Let us restrain them by open, fair and manly means. This picking them to pieces, by means of excessive damages, is a paltry sort of persecution that I do not feel willing to submit railroads to. They are a vast convenience to our people. As I have said, we could not do without them. Those who have got their charters already have, it is true, large powers that I would be glad to cripple and restrain somewhat, if we could do so; but they have got their powers, such as they are, and we cannot take them away. But, sir, this attempt to make the existence of every railroad company depend every time upon the verdict of a jury, keeping them in perpetual agitation as to whether they shall be able to do business in this country or not, is a sort of oppression and persecution to which I do not feel willing to submit corporations of so much usefulness; and therefore I am opposed to this provision, whether it is offered now, or whether it comes from one of the committees. I am opposed to any provision that will deprive the Legislature of the right to impose limitations upon these verdicts.

Mr. ALRICKS. Mr. Chairman: I do not know that I am at all affected with cacosthes loquendi this morning, but I beg leave, however, to say a few words on this subject. I will vote for the section of the committee and for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) because of its eminent propriety. Can any gentleman on this floor show us why a different rule should be laid down for artificial persons from the rule prescribed for natural persons? I can see no objection to the amendment that has been offered. It is simply this: "When you bring a suit against a person for an injury done you, if it is a civil action, you bring it within a period of six years." Now, can any gentleman show me why a natural person should remain responsible for six years, and an artificial person should only remain responsible for five years, as is the limit in one case, or two years, as is the limit in another, or for six months, as the Legislature has provided, in a suit for any injury done by a passenger railroad company? Therefore, I can see no objection to the amendment. The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) has told us that it is difficult for railroad companies to secure the witnesses after a certain period. Why, I suppose that after a year or two has elapsed a natural person will find difficulty in hunting up his witnesses just as much as a corporation will. A corporation may have millions of capital, and I am sure that that is a strong instrument by which they can appeal to the members of the bar to aid them in securing their rights. A corporation receives moneys and has franchises that are not given to private individuals, and if you sue a corporation to recover damages for the wrong they have done you, you cannot get out a ca. sa. against them.

We are told that they have no souls. I am not certain, sir, that you can take out a fi. fa. against them. You must pursue them with your writ of sequestration, and then they can get rid of their property. I would like any gentleman in this house to show me the propriety of saying that if a natural person does you a wrong you can resort to a court any time within six years, but if it is a corporation that has wronged you, you must bring your suit within six months.

I have known this matter to work injuriously. I remember in our own county, where land had been taken by a corporation, which had been used by them for a period of years, after the parties had brought their action of ejectment for the recovery of the land—the husband was dead, and the title had been in his wife during all this time—they came into court and plead the act of Assembly, and showed that unless that suit was brought within three years the party had no right to recover. Very fortunately there was a provision in that act of Assembly which reached our case, because it was passed after our right of action had occurred; otherwise we would have been turned out of court.

I trust there is no gentleman in this Convention (unless he is tied to a corporation) who will not feel it to be his duty to vote for the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle.)

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I merely have a word to say in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) and in this connection allow me to say that I am exceedingly gratified to hear the expressions of approbation which have come from some members of this Convention as to the propriety of the original section. It is not improper for me to say that I had the honor of being a member of the State Senate in 1868, when the legislation complained of, limiting the amount to be recovered, was enacted into a law. I also had the honor to resist its passage by all the earnestness and what little ability that I possessed. I have thought from that time, and think now, that that legislation was unwise, and if the people of the Commonwealth had an opportunity to correct it, they would speedily do so. Enough as to that. I shall not further comment upon it.

I entirely approve the amendment offered by my friend from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) and hope it will be adopted. The only difficulty that I had was as to the propriety of adding it, in this place, to the section. The necessity for something of the kind is apparent. Only last winter—and I think I can look in the face of a delegate who was present at the time of its discussion—in the Senate of the State, a bill was offered and read in its place, seeking to change the statutory limitation with regard to personal actions, with regard to the action of assumpsit, if you please, from six years to one year, and it was with the utmost effort, by an appeal to the professional gentlemen of that body, that the passage of the act was resisted; and if some constitutional inhibition of this kind is not created, the day is not far distant when an entirely different rule of proceeding, and an entirely different rule of practice will be obtained by statutory enactment towards corporations, from that which now obtain towards individuals. Men of experience and observation see the wisdom of some such constitutional provision in this respect to preserve the rights, I might say the liberties, of the individual.

MR. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I understand, and I would like to know whether I am correct or not, that the amendment, which is now the subject of consideration, simply proposes to place corporations, with reference to statutes of limitation, upon the same ground as that occupied by individuals, and that it does not propose that the statute of limitation in the case of an action of assumpsit shall be the same as the statute of limitation in an action brought for the recovery of damages resulting in injury or death. I think I am right. If that is the scope of the amendment I am decidedly in favor of it, and I am in favor of the section as reported. There are some reasons which I consider of the utmost importance, not only to the people, but to the corporations of this Commonwealth, why there should be, in the estimation of the community, no difference whatever between the corporation and the individual. It is very well known that this right of action, for injury resulting in death, is entirely a creation of the Legislature; that, at common law, no such right exists. The right was given by the English Parliament in England, and it has been successively given by almost all the Legislatures of the American States.

When you once admit the right of the representatives and relatives of the deceased person to recover for injuries which resulted in his death, I am at a loss to find why there should be any distinction between a corporation and an individual other than that which is founded upon the glaring injustice which has frequently been done by juries in giving excessive damages against corporations; but excessive damages are always within the control of the court, and the injury resulting to corporations from excessive damages, in my opinion, is not nearly so great an injury as that which results from creating in the minds of the community a feeling of distrust and hatred against corporations because they are exempted from the rules which govern individuals. If this statutory right is given to the representatives of a deceased person, why should that right depend upon the character of the person who caused the injury? Why should they recover $20,000, if he is killed by a natural person, and only $5,000 if he is killed by an artificial person; and by what right or reason does the Legislature prescribe a Procrustean bed upon which the dead body of the person is laid, so as to give to the relatives of a man who earns $200 a year, $5,000, and the same sum to a man who may have been earning $30,000 a year. Is not the measure of damages much greater in the one case than in the other? Is not the family whose husband and father earns $20,000 or $30,000 a year entitled to more damages from the pecuniary loss, than in the case of a man who simply earns $200 or $300 or $400 a year, and who may have contributed nothing whatever to their support. If these general principles are right, it is hard to see, upon any reason, why the distinction should obtain between corporations and individuals.

Now, then, what reasons are there in favor of abolishing that distinction? There are two reasons which, in my own mind, are of the utmost importance. The conveyance of passengers in this country, and in all modern countries, is gradually being committed to the care of corporations.

In the origin of these corporations, especially railway companies, forty years ago, the railroad was simply a road way upon which an individual could put his motive power and his car, and transport passengers, and you had not only an individual liability in case of accident, but you had the privilege of having an individual inspect the machinery and the works, in order to see that they were proper and correct. But the course of trade, the necessities of commerce, require that all this shall be done by the railroads themselves. Therefore every passenger has to submit his person and his life to the custody of a corporation, over whom he has no control whatever. It is for the interest of the public that life should be sacred, and I think that nothing can so surely bring the corporate powers of this State to the realization of their duty than a proper degree of punishment where they have transgressed it. I know that very wild verdicts have been given, and I remember my friend from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) telling of very heavy damages that were awarded in suits in this State. I do not know what the amounts of the verdicts were, but they were very excessive.

Mr. CUYLER. Twenty-eight thousand dollars for a father, and eighteen thousand dollars for a mother, both killed at the same accident.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: There is no doubt that this was very wrong, but whose fault was it? It was the fault of the judge who tried the case, and who permitted such a verdict to stand. I doubt whether, in the whole length and breadth of this Commonwealth, you could have found another judge who would have failed to reduce that verdict, or to make a new trial the condition of its not being reduced. The fault is with the court. Let us have good courts. Let us have a pure judiciary, and if the judges in the country courts do not regulate these improper verdicts, let the Legislature vest in the Supreme Court, as an appellate court, the power to exercise a supervisory power over the verdict, but let us do this in the courts themselves, which the people look up to with much greater respect than they do to the acts of any other branch of the government. Let us prescribe some judicial proceeding whereby the evils of these large verdicts may be corrected, but do not let us place before the community the wealth and the power that has been accumulated by corporations, and say to an individual who has been injured that that wealth and that power is sacred from their touch. If you are killed by a man your family can get twenty thousand dollars, but if you are killed by a corporation, you can get but three or five thousand dollars. My recollection of the statute is that there is a difference between the individual and the corporation, so far as the right of action is concerned, and the amount of money that would be recovered in that action. It is only when it is a corporation that the statute of limitations refers to the time in which the suit shall be brought. If, therefore, the only argument that can be urged against this proposition is that juries give excessive verdicts, let us prescribe some method whereby, in the regular course of judicial proceedings, a higher tribunal may correct that evil, if the lower judge refuses to do it, rather than make this distinction.

The last reason which I have to offer, and one to which I have already adverted incidentally, is this: I want to divest myself on this floor, if I can, in the minds of the members of the Convention, of any interest that I represent outside of this floor. But if I came into this Convention as the representative of any incorporated interest in this Commonwealth I should urge the adoption of this proposition on behalf of that interest. And for this reason: That nothing can so directly and surely bring those interests into jeopardy, and into contempt, and into danger, as to array against them the hatred and ill will of the community from which they derive their powers. The very moment you draw the distinction, the moment the property of the corporation is more sacred than the property of the individual, that moment you create a feeling in the minds of the individuals against the exercise of corporate power, a feeling which does not belong to it, and which ought not to be there, and which cannot be justified upon any other ground than that you are giving to these corporations powers which you deny to an individual. And I take it that the corporate powers of this State will never be in any such great jeopardy. The property they represent will never be in any such great danger, and the interests that their officers are called upon to protect will never be so likely to be taken away from them as when you raise a whirlwind of storm and indignation in the minds of the people throughout the State, which no man can put down, and which no man can stand up against, and which, when it is once raised, will crumble into dust corporation after corporation, like all mob power does, without any regard to which was the offender, to which was in the right, or which was in the wrong. I take it that every man upon this floor who has the real interests of corporations at his heart, who has property invested in corporations, who may own stocks in them, will be in favor of withholding from the statute books of the State every law and every statute which gives to them an advantage which is not given to an individual. If this one evil of enormous, excessive, inordinate, outrageous and unjust verdicts against corporations must be controlled, let it be controlled openly and publicly by the judicial power of the State, which will always be respected, and not by the passage of laws through the Legislature, which the people are not so likely to respect.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: I desire to ask leave to withdraw the amendment which I have proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Philadelphia withdraws his amendment.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: There are certain observations which, it seems to me, are necessary to be made in approaching the consideration of this subject. I shall make no reply to the observations of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Newlin,) based upon the supposed evil influences brought to bear upon the Legislature in passing the law to which reference has been made, and I do not do so because his statement is wholly unsustained by any proof, and we are not at liberty to presume that this law was passed upon any such ground.

Then two questions present themselves, and they may be briefly stated.

First, are laws limiting the amount of damages to be recovered for injuries or for death, necessary and proper? Secondly, should the time within which such action is to be brought be limited in the manner in which the law now limits it?

In the first place, I dissent entirely from the idea which has fallen from my friend, the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Gowen,) that the life of any one man is any more important than the life of any other. I dissent entirely from the notion that any representatives of an individual are entitled to any more damages for the result of an accident which has caused injury or death, than are the representatives of any other individuals by reason of any difference in the amount of the incomes of the respective parties. A wealthy man is no more important to his family or to the community than a man who is not wealthy.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: Will the gentleman from Chester allow me to explain? A wealthy man who is worth $5,000,000, if he is only earning $200 a year for his family, his family could not recover anything like so much damages as a poor man who is not so wealthy. The question is, what a man earns, and if a poor man, by his professional skill, may be getting $20,000 a year, his family should recover more damages than the family of the wealthy man, who may only earn $200 a year. The question is not one of wealth, but it is the earning power.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I thank the gentleman from Philadelphia for his correction, and will devote myself to the question of the earning power. A man who is able to earn a support for his family in any other condition of life which might only secure five hundred or one thousand dollars, is just as important to his family, and just as important to the community as a man who is enjoying a salary of thirty thousand dollars a year. It may require, perhaps, that sum to support his family; but I dissent, in toto, from the notion that in providing a remedy for the loss of a man who is the head of a family, we are to be governed in the slightest degree by the amount which that man may earn for his family. I say this upon the well understood and acknowledged ground, recognised by our Supreme Court in cases which have come before them, that it would be unseemly to go into an inquiry before a court or jury, or anywhere else, as to whether the deceased individual was, or was not, of importance to his family. We cannot enter into that question at all. Otherwise we should be driven into the question whether a man who was drunken, and worthless, and thriftless, had better be killed than not; or, whether a man who is making money had not better be kept alive. Therefore you must exclude from the consideration of this subject all notion of one man being any better than another. In the language of the Marseilles hymn, "Man is man, and who is more?" We are all men, and we are no more, and if there be one idea for which I have more sovereign contempt than for all others besides, it is that any man should suppose himself to be better than another by reason of his having money. I despise a man, from the bottom of my heart, who supposes himself any better, or more important in the community, by reason of his possessing means. We are all upon the same level, and we must never forget it.

Now, sir, upon what is this right of action for the deceased relatives given? It is for the pecuniary damages which they pecuniarily suffer by his loss. Now that is precisely the same, or very nearly the same, in one case as another. But it will not do, on the one hand, to exempt the company from liability, because, during the life of the individual killed, the claimants were receiving no money, as in the case put by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Judge Woodward,) nor on the other hand, to mulct the company in large amounts because a large income was being received by the man killed. It is, therefore, as it strikes me, capable of some reasonable average in the public mind, and therefore those laws, in this State and elsewhere, which fix the average value of human lives at five thousand dollars, if you please, will be found to be, in the main, just and right. No man, by reason of the accidental death of a relative, should be allowed to recover more. It may be that it may be too much, or that it may be too little. I do not say that it is an inflexible standard, but it is an approximation to justice, and it is better that we should have a standard than that wild and uncertain verdicts should be given, which wild and uncertain judges will feel bound to sustain, and by which wild and uncertain injustice is inflicted upon those upon whom they are imposed.

I do not think, therefore, that the right to recover, and the amount to be recovered for an injury resulting in death, is to be affected in any degree by the condition of the individual in life; nor do I think it is to be affected in the slightest degree by any consideration of negligence or carelessness on the part of the railroad company who inflict the injury. It is a pecuniary loss to the family that is suffered by reason of the death, and they have to stand it. But that pecuniary loss is no greater, no less, whether there be malice on the part of the railroad conductors or not. The most innocent accident, the breaking of a rail on a frosty morning, which no man on earth can foresee, which no care can guard against, may result in the death of the head of a family. The drunkenness of an engineer, recklessly running over a rock on the road, which he ought to have seen and avoided, may produce the same result. But the injury to the family which loses its head is precisely the same in the one case as in the other, and could not in justice be affected in the slightest degree by the motives of those who conduct the train.

Mr. WORRELL. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask the gentleman from Chester whether, in the first case mentioned by him, there would be any right of action? If the accident is the result of any unavoidable occurrence, which no care could have prevented, does right of action lie in such a case against a railroad company?

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I will answer the gentleman from Philadelphia by saying that negligence is a question for a jury, and when it goes to a jury they always find negligence. They would consider it negligence in a railroad company to let a rail be used which would break, just as they would consider it negligence if the train was wrecked on a rock which fell from the hillside. A jury would say that the railroad company should have put a man there to keep the rock from falling.

Wherever there is a question of negligence, it will always be found by the jury to exist. As to the other question, there is no distinction properly to be made between the life of one man and the life of another. No injury can result to the wife of one man more than to the wife of another, by the destruction of her husband, and that cannot, and ought not, to be justly influenced by any consideration of impropriety of conduct on the part of employees, or by any consideration that the utmost care was taken by them in the management of the train. Still, if there is a right to recover, it must be a right to recover in one case as well as in another. Now what are you to do to prevent this unseemly exhibition of an inquiry into the value of a man's life to his family? Necessarily, if you let in evidence on the one side of that question, it lets it in on the other. If you can show that one man's life was more valuable than another's, you can show that another man's life was less valuable, that he was idle and thriftless, and earned no support for his family, and that his family is better off without him than with him.

Keeping these things in view, it is a question for the Legislature, in their wisdom, to determine what shall be the average sum, which shall not be exceeded, in damages allowed in cases of this kind. If these excessive damages can be imposed upon the railway corporations they result in excessive burdens on the people. The railroads that are compelled to pay these excessive damages necessarily increase fares and freights, and it becomes a burden upon the whole community, and injustice is done to all the people that injustice may be done to the party claiming these damages.

So much upon the general question. I am in favor, therefore, of a limitation, and if $5,000 is not the right one let the Legislature fix another. But should there be no limitation to the time in which a suit can be brought? Why, unquestionably, we will all say. There is no reason for delay. Different kinds of actions in the wisdom of the Legislature have been made subject to different limitations. An action on a book account may be brought within the six years. An action for slander, or a case affecting character, must be brought within one year; and an action for assault and battery, within two years. Society is protected just as much in the one case as in the other, and the principle is a correct one, that a fixed limitation of time should apply to a suit not only against a railroad corporation for damages, but against any one else. There is no reason why all suits should not be brought with more speed. It would be better for all concerned if they were, and while I would not object to the proposition of my friend from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) that they ought all to be put on the same footing, I would put that limit down, and I would require action to be brought within one year. There is no reason why it should not be so in this advanced stage of civilization. Put them all on the same footing, and the shorter the time the better. That is all I have to say on this general subject.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: I did not rise to make an argument, and would not do so after what has been said by the gentleman from Philadelphia, on my left, (Mr. Gowen.) His exposition of the subject is full and clear, and if it does not impress every man in this body, then we are not as receptive of the truth as we ought to be. I do not intend, therefore, to gild his refined gold.

The proposition that railroad companies should never be compelled to pay more than a certain amount of damages for violation of contract or failure of duty is an exquisite absurdity, when it comes to be viewed in the light of reason, law and natural justice. When a passenger goes upon a railroad train, with a ticket which binds the company to carry him a certain distance and let him down safely, the company makes a contract with him by which they agree not to commit any injury to his person, if it can be prevented by human skill and care. If they fail in the performance of their contract surely the passenger is entitled to damages, which will be a fair and a just compensation to him for all the injury which he has actually suffered, and there is no way provided by the laws of this country to ascertain what is a just compensation, except a trial by jury as in other cases.

Some persons think, and among others my friend from Philadelphia, that trial by jury is a failure in cases between injured individuals and railroad companies, who have committed the wrongs.

Mr. GOWEN. I did not say that.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. That is the inference from what he said. He spoke of enormous damages as having been unjustly given, in divers occasions, against railroad companies, for injuries of this kind. He proposed that the verdict of a jury should be over-ruled in some way, either by the judge who presided at the trial, or else by some superior tribunal. That is all a mistake. I admit that it is possible for juries, in the excess of their indignation against the railroad company which has been guilty of gross negligence, to let their feelings run rather wild, as they sometimes do in other cases of tort; but I have never heard of one case of excessive damages against a railroad company, where I have heard of hundreds of such cases against individuals for slander, for seduction, and for various other offences of that kind. When a jury gets its blood up it is intended that it should wield its lash with a good deal of power.

Remember that no railroad company is ever permitted to suffer one dollar except in cases where it is proved by the clearest evidence that it has been guilty of unquestionable negligence, and that there was no concurrent negligence on the part of the injured party. Is not that a fair and just case for vindictive damages? Can we blame a jury that sees a man mutilated, and his limbs broken up, and his body shattered for life by the gross negligence of a railroad company, for saying that the wrong doers shall pay heavy damages? They do say so, most righteously, not merely because one man has suffered, but in order that other men may not suffer hereafter.

Mr. GOWEN. I would not blame a jury if my friend, Judge Black, had to make a speech on behalf of the plaintiff. [Laughter.]

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Ought he to blame juries if they act upon their convictions of justice and propriety, no matter who makes the speech?

The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) is not afraid of being sued, because he permits no negligence on his road, and injuries of this kind are not committed there. But why? Because those heavy verdicts he speaks of have struck a salutary terror into the hearts of the Reading company, which makes it, and all its servants, careful.

But, Mr. Chairman, suppose I, or some member of the profession to which I belong, should go to the Legislature and ask for a law which would protect us when we do wrong, against the just indignation of courts and juries. Lawyers sometimes neglect their duty; sometimes they fail to pay over the money of their clients, which is very gross negligence. What would you think of a statute which would confine the client's right to recover within certain fixed limits, which might not reach to compensate the tenth of his loss. Juries are quite as much prejudiced against professional dishonesty as they are against the culpable negligence of common carriers, and it is just and proper in both cases, for it springs from the love of right and the scorn of wrong.

You cannot say that a man who has suffered an injury at the hands of another shall not recover full compensation without committing an outrage upon the elementary principles of justice. If you give him less than that you may say he shall have nothing. If a man who has suffered to the amount of $20,000, shall be permitted to recover only $3,000 or $5,000, why can you not say that he shall go uncompensated altogether?

But we all want to hear the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler,) who favors the license of railroad corporations to kill and maim men, women and children for a certain sum per head. We are already aware that, in his opinion, a railroad company, when it cripples a citizen's body, ought to be permitted, at the same time, to cripple his right of getting redress in the courts. But none of us understand the reason of the thing. We are anxious to know why such legislation as this should be tolerated, and unless he has some objection we would be glad to learn from the gentleman how this particular statute came to be passed. We expect him to lift the flood gates of his eloquence.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle.)

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I appeal to my friend (Mr. Biddle) to accept an amendment.

The CLERK read:

Strike out of the amendment the words, "no act of Assembly," and insert the words "nor shall any act."

Mr. BIDDLE. I accept the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. Biddle, as modified, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the section as amended.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I hope that the committee will give their unanimous consent to the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) to reply to these arguments.

Unanimous consent was granted.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I can scarcely say that I have any desire to speak upon this subject; but the kindness of the Convention entices me to my feet, and does not permit me to sit still, although I would desire to do so.

I hope nobody sympathizes with the feeling which the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Newlin) affects, that I am here as the representative of any other party than the people. I hope no one else thinks so meanly of me as to suppose I would come here as the representative of any corporation; and although he may not be capable of rising above the feeling that he is here as the representative of a client, I trust he will not continue to include me in that category. I am here as no man's representative, as the representative of no corporation, but as a citizen simply, having the interests of a citizen in the question that comes before this Convention. I say this much in justice to myself, although I think it is scarcely necessary that I should say it here.

One would suppose, from the remarks of my friend from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) that these corporations wantonly and with purpose assault the safety of those whom they carry, and yet no man ought to know better than he does that that is an injustice, and a great injustice, to such companies. No train ever passes over their roads in which the lives of their employees and the property of the company is not exposed to whatever risk or peril attends the passage. It is a matter of actual fact, that could be demonstrated by an examination of the returns of the Auditor General of the State, that there are few spots safer for any man within the Commonwealth than a railroad train in the State of Pennsylvania; that the hazards of life to an individual who walks up Chestnut street in the city of Philadelphia, from the fall of a brick from a roof, or the chance dropping of a stone or a piece of timber from a scaffold, are greater than the perils of life that attend those who travel in the railway trains of this country, as a general thing. Every train that runs requires, upon the part of the company, the largest possible precaution.

If no other motive dictated it, pure selfishness, alone, would lead to that result. Now there is a reason for the limitation which is placed in this section as to the extent of damages which shall be given in the case of death, and that reason is to be found in the fact that, in the case of death, there is no standard by which those damages can be estimated. There is no ordinary standard that can be applied. "Skin for skin; all that a man hath will he give for his life." No money can compensate for the loss of life; certainly none to the one whose life is lost, and surely none to those who survive and suffer in consequence of his death, whether it be in their feelings or whether it be in their fortunes. How then, and why then, should we hand over to the tender mercies of a jury, with unlimited control of the amount of damages they should give, not simply to a jury, but to a jury inflamed by the closing speech of eloquent counsel? Do the rights of men and the rights of corporations rest, or ought they to rest, upon so uncertain a basis as that? Is that the foundation on which any human right ought properly be placed? If a man's property is damaged there is a measure for that damage, and it is easily ascertained. If the wrong is repeated, to some extent at least, there is the punitive justice to the community, in the damages that are inflicted, as a warning against others indulging in the same offence; but where it does occur, as it does, in point of fact, in almost every instance of an action for damage against a railroad corporation, that accident has occurred after every precaution possible to be taken by men has been taken; we cannot inflict punitive, nor do we attempt to give compensatory damages, for we can not ascertain what they should be.

Mr. J. S. BLACK. Could the party in that case recover any damages at all?

Mr. CUYLER. I will come presently to answer the question of the gentleman, which is a very proper question indeed. I say it is impossible, by any ordinary standard, to ascertain those damages. A corporation must work through agents; it has everything to sharpen its capacity and to inspire its intelligence and diligence in the selection of proper agents; its own property and the lives of its own employees are imperilled on every train that runs; but, after all the care that is taken, men are liable to err. Switch tenders will become careless; engineers become nervous; it may be from a momentary condition of ill-health, which passes away. The most vigilant will sometimes sleep on their posts. Who is there who has not known of occasions wherein he himself has fallen below his own proper standard of what is right and proper, with reference to his own conduct? Now, we are to take a corporation, which must work through just such agencies as those which I have mentioned, and which has exercised the utmost prudence and care in the selection of those subordinates, and you are to hand them over, in case of an accident, against which every human precaution was taken, to the tender mercies of a jury, whose feelings are moved; whose passions are roused and inflamed by the eloquence of counsel, and who have no possible restraint to be found in any standard that can be presented to them by which they may measure the amount of their damages.

What then? You must average one life with another. You must say what, after all, averaging one case with another, is about the fair result. In some instances these juries have given enormous verdicts. In other instances they have given verdicts too low, but the experience of mankind has shown that the average of about $5,000 is a fair and reasonable compensation. There are cases in which it will not reach the justice of the case. There are cases where it far transcends the justice of the case. But, after all, it is by averaging these cases, one with another, that about the fair result is obtained. That I understand to be the theory upon which such statutes as this are framed.

I know of no other instance that can be presented in the law, in which a jury can be called upon to assess damages without any possible standard, except their own passions and feelings, inflamed to the last possible degree, just when they should be called upon to apply their judgments.

Mr. DODD. I would ask the gentleman how it is in breach of promise cases. Are damages not generally higher in those cases?

Mr. CUYLER. The gentleman's question admits of a very easy answer. Part of the evidence, as he as a lawyer knows, in every breach of promise case, has reference to the estate of the offending party, and in measuring the damages, the defendant's pecuniary ability is taken into consideration, and in no case more so than in actions of breach of promise of marriage. I ask the gentleman to tell me when you come to a case of death, how you are to measure the damages that should be allowed? By what possible standard can you do it? Many a man lives a burthen to society as well as a burthen to himself and to his family, and yet if you take that very case before a jury in a court of justice, when, inflamed by the artful appeal of eloquent counsel, the jury will give just as large damages as they would if my learned brother from York (Mr. J. S. Black) had been, to the great loss of the world, cut off, instead of suffering the damage he did to his arm. So it is, simply because there is no standard, and hence the law must make a substitute by creating an artificial standard.

There is, therefore, a necessity arising from the nature of the case of establishing an artificial standard by which such damages may be measured.

After all, Mr. Chairman, what does it come down to? Does any gentleman suppose that these outrageous and unreasonable verdicts which are given against railroad companies for damages fall, at last, upon the corporations? Not at all. They fall upon the community, upon you, and upon me, and upon the entire society; they fall as a burden upon the trade and business, the traffic and transportation of passengers and property, for the railroad company will earn a competent dividend for its stockholders; and if you burden the expenses of this company by unreasonable verdicts, you are at last but laying that burden upon the traffic and the general prosperity of the community in which you live. It comes ultimately to that. I do not appeal to this Convention in the name of corporations, but I appeal to the members as citizens, as men who have an interest in the general trade and prosperity of the community. Every burden you lay upon such a corporation comes, ultimately, upon the general business of the community, so that if no other motive than an enlightened selfishness should regulate the action of this Convention, that, of itself, ought to be felt to be sufficient. I am sorry to have taken up so much of the time of the Convention. I have spoken most unwillingly on this question, and should not have uttered a word had I not been absolutely enticed, compelled to speak, through the kind voice of the Convention, requesting me to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the section as amended.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman: I wish to offer an amendment to the section, which I will send to the desk.

The CLERK read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out the first line, and the second line up to and including the word "property," and insert in lieu thereof the following words, to come in at the commencement of the section: "No limitation of the amount to be recovered for the loss of life, or injuries to person or property, shall hereafter exist in this State; and in case of death from such injuries," &c.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman: I had no intention this morning of cutting off the gentleman from Philadelphia from addressing the committee; but as the rule has obtained here that only one speech of twenty minutes should be made by each member, I felt disposed to call the attention of the chairman to the matter, upon the principle that equality is equity, and I simply desired that the rule should apply in all cases, or none.

With regard to this amendment, I did not like the phraseology of it in the first place, because I was not certain, from its language, whether or not the case of loss of life was provided for. I wish to make that explicit, by putting it in words into the section, that there shall be no limitation imposed hereafter in cases of loss of life or injuries to person or property. I mean that no limitation should hereafter exist in this State. The section as read was unsatisfactory to me on that ground, and for that reason it is, sir, that I offer the amendment which is now pending before the committee. Nor do I deem it necessary, after having stated the object of the amendment, to go into the discussion of the matter which has been so thoroughly discussed already.

I am perfectly satisfied that there can be no good reason assigned why this limitation should continue to exist any longer. It has existed too long already in this State. We have already discriminated too long against individuals, and in favor of corporations; for in point of fact, although not in the express terms of the law, the limitation chiefly operates on them. Let us, then, make this matter explicit and clear, that this limitation shall no longer exist in this State, as to the amount of damages to be recovered.

It is unnecessary, it seems to me, to say to a body like this, that to attempt, as the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) has suggested, to impose an arbitrary limitation or to fix an arbitrary sum in a case of this kind, would be to go, not only against what is advisable and just, but against all the analogies which prevail in similar actions. This is always an action in the form of a tort, and the damages there are to be recovered according to the circumstances and rules that control the particular action. There is no reason in the world why we should attempt to impose an arbitrary limit here to the amount of recovery, more than there is in any other action which we bring in the same form. Let us put it on the same principle exactly, and under the same rules which govern all other such actions, and submit it to the same tribunal to which we submit other actions upon which our property, and our reputation, and all the other interests that are dear to us, are staked. Why should we make any discrimination?

It seems to me, sir, that the argument which says that this matter should not be left to a jury, which is said to be "dazzled" by the eloquent speech of the closing counsel for the plaintiff, is an argument that should never come in here. Why, sir, some counsel must close on one side or the other; the burden of proof is on the plaintiff, and he has burden enough to sustain an action against a wealthy corporation and against distinguished counsel, as already stated, when the courts are continually throwing in his way this doctrine of contributory negligence. He must make himself perfectly clear of the charge of having contributed in the slightest degree to the injury which he has himself sustained. Having cleared himself of that, why, then, should it be said that the closing speech of his counsel should not have its appropriate weight before the jury? Sir, it has no more appropriate weight before the jury than the closing speech of a counsel in a criminal case against the man who stands accused of murder, and is in peril of his life; no more weight than the concluding speech in any other case; and we submit these cases to precisely the same tribunal to which we submit the disposition of the question of life and death in other cases. Why, then, should we discriminate in cases like this, contrary to the usual manner and against the plaintiff, who has been injured by the negligence, the absolute, unqualified negligence, of a corporation, or an individual either?

It has been said that this remedy of a recovery for damages to life or limb is a remedy not of the common but of statute law, of statutory origin. We admit it, sir; but it was put upon the statute book because public sentiment, and that, too, of the entire community, required that it should be placed there. It was a concession—it was one of those points to which the principles of the common law would not extend, and the demand of public sentiment required that this should be imposed in addition to the remedies which the common law provided for other injuries. If the Supreme Court of this State has said, as has been stated here, by gentlemen of this Convention, this morning, that that part of the law which interferes to make the damages for personal injuries not resulting in death, is unconstitutional, why then is there any reason that we should impose a limitation, merely because the remedy is statutory in its origin, to the case where a man's life is taken, and his family deprived of the benefits and advantages of his labor.

I hope I have so phrased this amendment that it will be unobjectionable, and that by introducing these words we will remove from the section all doubt in regard to its operation, and make it so intelligible that there can be no mistake about the meaning and intention of this body.

MR. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I merely wish at this time to make an observation about the appropriateness of the amendment. I was going to remark that I would be very glad to accept the amendment of the gentleman from York, (Mr. Cochran,) in lieu of the first words of the section; but it seems to me not to be so comprehensive. It is but another way of expressing the same thing, and the remedy that is desired to be applied here, is to prevent the passage of an act of Assembly hereafter, or to prevent any present act of Assembly from limiting the amount of damages, and the expression in the section is, to by mind, more explicit and less liable to misapprehension than the expression of this amendment. As to the apprehension of the gentleman from York, (Mr. Cochran,) about a doubt as to the section prohibiting limitations for loss of life, or injury resulting in loss of life, I think there can be no doubt upon the subject. Listen to the section :

SECTION 26. No act of assembly shall limit the amount to be recovered for injuries to person or property, and in case of death from such injuries, the right of action shall survive, and the Legislature shall prescribe for whose benefit such actions shall be prosecuted.

The whole section is to be read together, and, of course, it comprehends the practical remedy, given by the act of 1845, for the loss of life.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: In addition to what has been said by the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Harry White,) I wish to call the attention of the committee to the wording of this amendment offered by the gentleman from York (Mr. Cochran.) As I read it, if this were adopted, and a case of the kind referred to in this section were on trial before a court and jury, the judge could not lay down any limit whatever, as a rule of law as to the amount to be recovered, for the amendment says that there shall be no limitation of the amount. Now, the verdict may be one hundred thousand dollars or one cent. Now I say that in all these actions there is a limitation by law as a part of the measure of damages. What we want to get at is to prevent the Legislature from limiting the amount by an act of assembly. I think, therefore, that the amendment offered is very objectionable on that point. I have not any doubt about the section as it stands here, preventing the limitation of the amount to be recovered in case of death. The right of action accrues at the very instant that the injury occurs, and if it survives it necessarily survives with all its incidents and liabilities, just as in any other case of trespass, or a case of "mesne profits," or anything of that sort. But this is certainly objectionable. I would suggest to the gentleman, if he will allow me to do so, that as chairman of the Committee on Railroads, he give the matter a careful consideration, and if he can report a section that will be more comprehensive and less doubtful, when it comes up on second reading the Convention can determine which one it will take. This section has been considered with care, and I think covers the ground.

Mr. DODD. Mr. Chairman: I think that not only is the amendment open to the criticism made, but if we change the language, as the gentleman from York (Mr. Cochran) suggests, we will have to change the language of the amendment already passed, because it refers back to the language, "no act of Assembly." I think that an amendment is required, which shall leave no question whether the section applies to injuries resulting in death. If delegates will refer to the section they will find, by the insertion of the words "resulting in death or" after the word "injuries," that there will be no further difficulty. I therefore offer to amend the section by inserting those words.

Mr. COCHRAN. I accept the modification.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Cochran, a division was called, which resulted as follows: Ayes, twenty-five; noes, thirty-seven.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I move to strike out the word "Assembly," and insert the word "Legislature."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question being taken the section as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I now offer the following as an additional section to the report :

No act of Assembly shall authorize the investment of trust funds by executors, administrators, guardians or other trustees in the bonds or stocks of any private corporation; and existing laws so authorizing are annulled and avoided, saving such investments heretofore made in good faith.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: By our original law, before the act passed, some four years ago, which I am about to refer to, certain specific investments were authorized which, if made in the manner pointed out, by persons acting in a fiduciary capacity, relieved them from all responsibility for the keeping of trust funds. Those investments were United States loans, our own State loans, and the loans and mortgages of the city of Philadelphia. From time to time the public loans of other municipalities existing in the State were added to the securities already named, because it was supposed that trustees residing in the immediate neighborhood of such bodies might naturally and properly prefer such investments to the investment of municipalities at a distance from them. It was supposed that they could readily understand the value and character of such investments. So the law stood until 1870, when a marked departure from its conservative principles occurred. Now, in what I am about to say I mean no reflection at all upon particular corporations to which I will have to refer, but it is necessary to enter somewhat into details. Until 1870, then, the first marked departure was made, and a new list was added to the class of investments which a trustee might lawfully make.

In 1870 the Legislature inaugurated a totally different policy, and in my judgment, one which was most inexpedient. The Legislature, authorized by the act of the 1st of April, 1870, which will be found on page forty-five of the pamphlet laws of that year, that the bonds of the Pennsylvania railroad company secured by its general mortgage, dated July 1, 1867, should be a trust investment. In 1872, and we see how very rapidly progressive such legislation is, by the act of March 29, to be found on page thirty-one of the pamphlet laws of that year, the bonds of the Philadelphia and Reading railroad company, secured by its general mortgage, were also made a trust investment. It requires no very prophetic eye to see, that once a change so radical is made in our law, trustees will be authorized to invest in the bonds and probably in the stock of all favorite private corporations, or rather private corporations favored by the Legislature; and thus the very security which was intended by the limitation passed half a century ago, will be entirely defeated. Now, what takes place when one of these improvement companies is sued upon one of its mortgages? I do not, of course, refer to either of the two corporations in which trust funds are now authorized to be invested. I hope we, in Pennsylvania, may never see the day in which their corporate property may be brought under the hammer; but what has been may be again, and it is to arrest this possibility that I have proposed this section, and desire to make these remarks in regard to it. I suppose there are not less than fifty gentlemen on the floor of this Convention, who are perfectly aware what takes place when a railroad is sold—which, by the bye, is not a very unfrequent proceeding—and for the benefit of those who may not be familiar with the subject, I will explain very briefly what does take place. When an improvement company is unable to pay the interest on its bonds, when the time stipulated in the mortgage passes and the usual expedients resorted to have failed, a combination takes place between the large bond-holders, and they agree to sell out and buy in generally on terms tolerably liberal to all the bond-holders; but it not unfrequently, indeed

I think I may say it invariably happens, by reason of the distance from the scene of action, or by ignorance, or from poverty, many of the smaller bond-holders are not reached or asked to contribute to the fund to be raised for expenses.

The corporate property, however, is sold and bought in by the large holders, and the company is usually re-organized upon what is supposed to be a better basis; but those who do not enter into the arrangement, into the combination, are entirely cut off, because it never happens that the fund is sufficiently large to reach all the claims that legally exist against it. Now, who are the persons most likely not to be reached if such a contingency occurs? It is the widow, the orphan, and their trustee. The shrewd business man, who has large sums invested in the bonds of the company, is on the look out. The man or woman with a small investment of $500, or a $1,000, is not heeded, and the result is frequently very disastrous. Now, I think we are bound to say to what extremes the Legislature shall be permitted to go in the regulation or changing of the class of investments in which trustees may properly invest the funds committed to their care for the investment and protection of those beneficially interested, or what the lawyers call cestuis que trustent. This Convention may say to trustees: "You may invest in the securities of the general government; you may invest in the loans of this Commonwealth; you may invest in the loans of this municipality; you may invest in mortgages, in ground rents, and in real estate, but you shall not commit the funds entrusted to your care to hazardous commercial speculations, which all improvement companies are more or less engaged in." I know it will be said in answer to this argument that a mortgage bond of a large improvement company gives all the security of real estate; but what kind of security is it?

In the first place, in regard to two of the instances to which I have just referred, the mortgage bonds are not first liens at all; they are not second liens, and I do not think in one case they are even third liens. In the first case which has been cited to me, the mortgage bond is a third lien, and it is liable, therefore, to be divested either under the first or second lien; but that is not the only objection. If the liens previously existing are small, this difficulty might be obviated. It is nevertheless, to a certain extent, a hazardous investment, and partakes and possesses none of the characteristics of a security afforded by a mortgage upon a farm, a house, or an improvable lot. It is wholly unlike the security afforded by the general, State or municipal governments, where taxes can be imposed upon all property to meet the interest upon their indebtedness. Mortgage bonds of improvement companies are essentially a speculative investment. I suppose it will be said that the two cases to which I have referred are beyond all possibility of a contingency. I hope sincerely that this may be the case; but with what reason can the Legislature, after granting the privilege to the Pennsylvania and the Reading railroad companies, refuse the same privilege to the Lehigh Valley, the Lehigh navigation company, the North Pennsylvania railroad, or any of the many improvement companies by the lines of which this State is traversed? The claims of these companies may be urged upon the attention of the Legislature, fortified by arguments that their property, in proportion to the amount secured upon it by first mortgages, is a much safer investment than the investment already authorized by the Legislature in railroad securities against whose property many sets of mortgages are held.

The claims of other roads will be urged with all that persuasiveness and pertinacity which persons having so much at stake usually adopt when their interests are concerned. I desire that this question of trust funds shall be placed on a perfectly secure basis. No class of cases appeals so strongly to our sympathies and to our sense of duty as the property of these persons, who are in a state of pupillage, not sui juris, and who thereby become, as it were, the children of the Commonwealth, to whom they rightfully look for protection, as their common parent. I might extend this argument very considerably, but I think I have said enough to show that when, in 1870, the Legislature departed from the rule which it had previously laid down, it made a radical and vicious change in the law, and one which should be arrested and corrected by a constitutional provision somewhat like the one just offered by me. I hope, therefore, Mr. Chairman, this section will be adopted as part of the article now under consideration.

MR. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: It seems to me the only question in regard to this matter of limiting the investment of trust funds is a question of safety. The first mortgage bonds of the Pennsylvania railroad and the first mortgage bonds of the Reading railroad are, in my opinion, just as good an investment as city sixes, and there can be no harm whatever in leaving the power with the Legislature to say whether they conceive them to be a good and sufficient investment for trust funds. The question, therefore, as I understand it, is purely a question of safety.

In the city of Philadelphia there are five or six large trust companies, and if I were to name the amount of trust funds held by these companies it would surprise a great many members of this Convention, for it would be found that it would amount to perhaps fifty millions of dollars. If they invest their trust funds in United States securities, they must pay 115 for them, so that they do not net six per cent. to the holder of the trust or the party benefited. If they invest in State funds they are compelled, in the same way, to pay a large premium for an investment which does not net six per cent. to the holder of the trust. The consequence is that a very large amount of these trust funds are invested in but one security; that is the loan of the city of Philadelphia, because the securities alluded to are generally above par, and the parties having trust funds to invest desire to, if possible, in the first place, invest them at par, and secondly that they should pay the recipient six per cent. interest, and therefore invest them in this one security. The consequence is that a very large amount of the trust funds, not only of the city of Philadelphia, but also of the State, are being absorbed by this one security, and no matter how good it may be, is not, therefore, a prudent course.

Now, sir, if this is the case, should we not be extremely careful how we direct by this section the investment of the trust funds held and to be invested by the different trust companies of the city of Philadelphia in one particular direction. I can see no harm in the Legislature, by acts of Assembly, assenting that the first mortgage bonds of these great roads is a good investment, and there is no doubt that the first mortgage bonds of these two roads will be just as surely paid at maturity as the investments fixed by law. If the first mortgage bonds of these two roads will meet their interest promptly, I cannot see why a trust fund invested in these two corporations is not as good as a trust fund invested in city sixes, a State or a govern ment loan. If they yield more interest, there is an additional advantage. If the general mortgage loan of the Reading railroad company pays seven per cent. interest, why should the Convention, by their action, deprive the holders of that trust of that one per cent. additional income—yielding to the beneficiary seven per cent., instead of six per cent. The whole question, in my mind, depends upon the security of the investment, and if the Legislature should so decide, it seems to me that it is wise and proper to leave it in their hands.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I think I speak within bounds when I say that there is no known instance in which the first mortgage bond of a large American railway company has ever proved a disastrous investment, or upon which the interest has not been paid. We all know to our sorrow, and some citizens of this State know it to their shame, that while private corporations have not repudiated their obligations, municipal corporations and territorial governments have frequently done so. I do not believe that there can be adduced a single instance in which trust funds invested by order of the court, in the first mortgage securities of any of our large railway companies, have ever turned out to be either worthless or to be depreciated. We know too well that trust funds, invested in the obligations of municipal corporations have time and again proved almost worthless. The question therefore is simply one of safety, as the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. J. Price Wetherill) has well remarked.

Unfortunately here in Pennsylvania, and especially here in Philadelphia, no large enterprise has ever struggled into existence and prosperity that has not met at the outset with opposition from our own citizens. We are in the habit of driving our money away from our State, and forcing it to seek investment elsewhere. There is to-day, in the city of Philadelphia, not one-third, or one-fifth, of the money for the legitimate purposes of business which is required by the demands of the business community. The reason is, that our rate of interest is lower than the rate of interest in adjoining States, and our money is sent out of the State in order to secure the large interest which is given by neighboring States. As allusion has been made this morning to both of the acts of Assembly, which gives to the trustee the power of investing trust funds in the loan which is practically a first mortgage upon property worth four or five times the extent of the mortgage. In both of these cases, the acts of Assembly require that the judge of the orphans' court, having control of the trustee, must approve of the investment before the trustee is relieved. Now, while I would be in favor of an amendment to the Constitution, which should prohibit the Legislature from making the securities of any private corporation an investment for trust funds without the previous sanction of the proper court, thereby making it a judicial act and permitting the courts to have some custody and control over the money, I am not in favor of the amendment as proposed, for the reason that it will destroy and prevent the power which a great many trustees now have, under the sanction of the court, of investing the money of their wards and the money of their cestuique trusts in securities that will give them one or one and one-half per centum more interest per annum than they could get if under the obligation to invest only in municipal securities.

Those of us who are lawyers, here in Philadelphia, know very well what the operations of these two statutes have been. I know myself that I can speak of one of them, with a more thorough knowledge of it than any other man in the world, because the act was prepared at my direction, and it was prepared at the urgent request of two or three large corporations in this city, who are large holders of trust funds, and who wanted an opportunity of investing their trusts. They were responsible for their trusts. They have amply guarded them, but they were obliged to go to court in order to have their investment approved, and these trustees, these large trustees, like the Fidelity company, the Pennsylvania company for the insurance of lives and granting annuities, and three or four others, that are the strongest and best in the city, and in the whole State, were anxious for the opportunity of investing these funds in this very class of securities.

But how did it operate on the courts? The courts looked with a little distrust upon any innovation of the old established custom. The court in Philadelphia very properly selected a board of skilled financiers, gentlemen thoroughly conversant with the business, and requested them to report to the court the names of such corporations whose obligations were made legal investments as would be perfectly safe, and I apprehend there is no instance of any wrong having been suffered, that there is no one who will venture to assert, that so far as this system has already gone, there is no possibility of any instance happening in the future. Why then should this system be interfered with when it is a notorious fact that in the past no wrong or injury has resulted from it?

If there is an amendment proposed to this effect, that the Legislature shall not authorize the investment of any trust funds in any corporation, or in any private corporation, without the sanction of the proper court, then I should vote for it. But I earnestly trust that unless their is some such amendment as that effected, it will not succeed.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman: Before the gentleman sits down I would like to ask him this question: When has any municipal corporation north of the Ohio river repudiated or dishonored its obligations?

Mr. GOWEN. The Allegheny county bonds is an instance.

Mr. BOWMAN. The Allegheny county bonds were paid to the last dollar.

Mr. GOWEN. They were paid at last. But did not the county repudiate them for years? The interest could not be collected, and did not they go down to forty cents on the dollar?

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman: Does not the gentleman know they were paid?

Mr. GOWEN. They were not paid until the authorities were compelled by law to pay them. Butler county and Lawrence county repudiated their bonds, and for years and years the widow and the orphan who relied upon them for investment were deprived of their income, and forced by their poverty to sell the bonds for thirty or forty cents on the dollar, to the wealthy capitalist, who, when recourse was had to law, and the counties were compelled to pay, reaped the benefit of their purchase.

Mr. KATNE. Mr. Chairman: I look at this section as now offered as one that is calculated to prevent the very worst kind of special legislation, notwithstanding what has fallen from the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen.) Everything that he desires that trustees or executors or administrators should have a right to do, they have a right to do already under the general law of this Commonwealth. If a trustee or executor desires to make an investment of any funds in his hands, he can do it without the action of a court or any body else, upon his own responsibility. But if he desires to be relieved from personal responsibility in that regard, all that he has got to do is to go into the orphans' court of the county of Philadelphia, or in any other county in the Commonwealth, and get an order, which he can get upon proper cause shown, to invest the money of his ward, or the trust money in his hands, in the bonds of Reading railroad company, or in the bonds of the Pennsylvania railroad company, or in the bonds of any other institution in this State, if the court think it proper and right. There is already a statute on the books on that subject, a general law.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: Does not this amendment wipe that statute out, except so far as any investments which have already been made?

Mr. KATNE. I do not think it does. I do not think it will interfere with any general law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the objection I have to that kind of special legislation is this, that any corporation, no matter how insolvent or how ruined, goes to the Legislature and gets an act passed that their bonds shall be a legal investment for trust funds of any kind, thereby giving them a false credit in the market, and giving them a credit which they are not entitled to at all. This is a kind of judicial legislation that ought never to have existed, and I hope that this Convention will now put in the Constitution something such as is proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) to prevent it hereafter. If the general law is not sufficient on this subject now, it is very easily made so. I would prefer having this provision put in the eleventh section, "that the Legislature shall pass no special law regulating the investment of trust funds," which, I think, would cover everything that the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) desires. I submit to my friend from Philadelphia, whether that would not cover the case? At any rate, I think the latter part of his provision is entirely unnecessary, and I would suggest to the gentleman the propriety of striking it out.

Mr. BIDDLE. Which part do you refer to?

Mr. KATNE. I refer to that part which provides that all laws upon this subject now in existence shall be repealed thereby. Mr. Chairman, let us have that read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"And existing laws so authorizing are annulled and avoided, saving such investments heretofore made in good faith."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Fayette offer that as an amendment?

Mr. KATNE. Mr. Chairman: No, sir; but I take it that a provision of this kind, "no obligation or liability of any railroad or any act of Assembly shall limit the amount to be recovered," would render nugatory and of no account, after the adoption of the Constitution, any law that may be in existence at the time it was adopted. I throw out that suggestion to the gentleman from Philadelphia who has offered this amendment and who seems to have a very great interest in it, but I decline to make any motion.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman: I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman who has offered this section, that he will insert before the words "private corporations" the words, "railroad, canal or any other," so as to make it as explicit as possible.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I think it is sufficiently explicit, but if the Convention thinks it is not, I have no objections. I want to make it explicit.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I, at the proper time, will move this. I read it now only for information:

"The Legislature shall not pass any law authorizing the investment of trust funds in the bonds of any municipal or private corporation, without the sanction of the proper court."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the section proposed by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) which will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION —. No act of the Legislature shall authorize the investment of trust funds by executors, administrators, guardians or other trustees, in the bonds or stock of any private corporation, and existing laws so authorizing are annulled and avoided, saving such investments heretofore made in good faith.

The section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the twenty-seventh section, which will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 27. The power to change the venue in civil and criminal cases shall be vested in the courts, to be exercised in such manner as shall be regulated by law.

Mr. KATNE. Mr. Chairman: I think that this section is unnecessary, after what we have adopted in the eleventh section, which I will read. We have already adopted, in the fourth paragraph of that section, that:

"The Legislature shall not pass any local or special law changing the venue in civil or criminal cases."

Mr. ALRICKS. Mr. Chairman: I appreciate the difficulty suggested by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, and, in order to meet it, I will move to amend the section, by inserting before the last word, "law," the word "general." That, I think, will put this section in its proper shape and prevent us from re-enacting the same section.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: The two propositions which gentlemen seem to regard as similar are entirely distinct, and intended to reach an entirely different result. It is provided under the eleventh section of this article reported by the Committee on Legislation, that the Legislature cannot, by special or local law, change this venue of any civil or criminal case. This section provides that the power to change this venue shall be vested in the courts as shall be regulated by law. Now, of course, "law" in this case means "general law." It cannot mean special law, for the Legislature is prohibited from passing any special or local law on this subject.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: If you were on the floor and not in the chair, I expect you would say what I am going to say. This subject of the change of venue properly belongs to the Judiciary Committee, and is under consideration by that committee, and they will most certainly report a provision upon the subject. Now, I am not at liberty to allude to what will probably be the report of the Judiciary Committee, but there will be a report from that committee, as the chairman very well knows, on the subject of a change of venue, that I trust will obviate all necessity for legislation on that subject. Meanwhile, what is the wisdom of adopting this provision? The provision is:

"The power to change the venue in civil and criminal cases shall be vested in the courts, to be exercised in such manner as shall be regulated by law."

Well, but we propose to vest it in the courts, to be regulated in such manner as the Constitution shall prescribe, not that it shall be regulated by law, for that is exactly the evil now. Parties go to the Legislature and get a change of venue by an act of Assembly.

The Judiciary Committee will probably report a scheme to give parties a change of venue when they ought to have it, by the action of the judiciary, independent of the Legislature, and therefore, in my opinion, this section ought to be re-committed until we get before us the report of the Judiciary Committee. But this body seems to be so much in love with everything that this Committee on Legislation has reported, that I suppose they will not part with any of its provisions. They have amended their report in one or two instances; but they have refused to vote down anything which the Committee on Legislation has submitted. Therefore I will not move to strike it out; but I tell the gentlemen who compose this Convention, that we will embarrass our future action on this matter if we now adopt this section as it stands.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: I do not desire to discuss this section at all, but to state my belief that the views of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) should prevail at this time. The present methods of obtaining change of venue are justly subject to great criticism, and, probably, we all agree that some change should be made. Under existing acts of Assembly a railroad company may obtain a change of venue from the county, where a cause of action arises, to some distant county through which their road does not pass, and thus force a party, plaintiff, to transport his witnesses a great distance, at an expense which, possibly, he may not be able to bear. Courts have no discretion on the subject. An affidavit on the part of the company that justice cannot be obtained, is sufficient. Discrimination is thus unjustly made between classes of citizens. It is quite desirable that such evils may be remedied, but perhaps the Committee on Legislation is not the proper one to deal with this subject. The Committee on the Judiciary, it is understood, are prepared to report a section on the subject. Would it not be wise to await the report of that appropriate committee, and for the present vote down this section?

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: An additional reason why the committee ought to adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Judge Woodward) has been made by the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer.) That is, that the section proposes to confer upon the courts the right to change venue in criminal cases. Now, that will be found to be slightly in conflict with the provisions of the Bill of Rights, from the committee on which we have no report. The Bill of Rights provides that every man accused of a crime shall be entitled to a speedy trial by a jury of the vicinage in which the crime has been committed, and that has always been understood to be the place where the offence has been committed, or, at least, in the county. Now this change of venue may take a man accused of crime, out of the county where a crime has been committed, into another county, perhaps one hundred miles distant. These are considerations which, with me, have influence, and inasmuch as the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on the Bill of Rights have not yet reported, I think the section as offered ought to be voted down, with the understanding that we do not get rid of the subject, but only postpone action on it now to let it come up again in its proper place hereafter.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I hope the committee will not vote down the section. That is not the remedy. If a better section is reported by the Judiciary Committee, the Convention will have it in their control on second reading. I hope the committee will adopt the section as it is, or amend it, if they can suggest improvements, but leave it stand until the Judiciary Committee shall report. I have no wish that the Committee on Legislation should do anything that it is the province of that committee to do, or take away from that committee anything that belongs to them, and if they report a plan by which this subject will be vested in the courts, and in the courts alone, and take it altogether away from the Legislature, even by general law, to regulate it I will support that plan. I am in favor of that. It is not because I oppose anything of that kind that I ask this committee of the whole to adopt this section. When it comes up on second reading we may have other propositions from these other committees which have been referred to. But we have this section now, and it is all we have. Let us adopt it; afterward, if anything better be offered, it will be easy to make the substitution.

Mr. CHARLES A. BLACK. Mr. Chairman: I was not here when the previous part of this report was before the committee of the whole. But it seems to me that if what was done in reference to the eleventh section was right, then this or something like it should be adopted now. You have already, by the fourth paragraph of the eleventh section, taken away from the Legislature the power to change venue in criminal and civil cases by special law. That has passed this committee. Then of course, having done that, you must say who shall exercise this power. Somebody must have the right to say so in cases where it not only is important, but necessary, that the change of venue be made, and hence this section ought to be adopted. We have already taken away this power from the Legislature, and now we should adopt this section, or something like it, to say who shall exercise this power, and this it seems to me is the proper time to say it.

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I hope we will take final action on this subject now. The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) seems to entertain the idea that if we do not vote down the section, and await the report of the Judiciary Committee, that it will produce great disarrangement in the transaction of our business. I confess that I am not aware that the Judiciary Committee, will make any report on the subject of a change of venue. I think it has not taken action on that subject, and even if it had it seems to me that we ought not to pass this section ever now.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: Only an additional word to what has been said in favor of the adoption of the section as it stands. The committee of the whole have already adopted a clause which prohibits any special legislation on this subject of changing venue. Now this section simply provides that, by a general law, power to change venue shall be vested in the courts. If the Convention is opposed to that method of changing venue, then this section ought to be voted down. If not, then it ought to stand as it is, and I submit to the committee of the whole, what subject ever came more properly before the Committee on Legislation than this one. The matter of changing venues in the Legislatures has been an evil.

Mr. KAINÉ. Mr. Chairman: Before the gentleman leaves that branch of the subject, will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. KAINÉ. When we have placed in this Constitution a provision that the Legislature shall not pass any special law on the subject of changing venue, does that not imply that they have the right to do it by a general law, and if they have that right what is the use of putting it in the Constitution?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I will answer that by saying that the Committee on Legislation thought it was better to say to the Legislature that they should put it in the courts, to provide some mode of changing venue. The Committee on Legislation was of the opinion that the matter of changing venue should be vested in the courts. If the committee of the whole think differently let them vote the section down. But clearly, if this section is not adopted the Legislature may by general law regulate the matter as they may deem best, and they may provide some other mode of changing venue. The Committee on Legislation thought the courts were the proper channels to regulate that subject.

In answer to the gentleman from Ches. (Mr. Darlington) I will say that it is now the practice for the Legislature to change venues in criminal cases. They do it now, but it seemed to the Committee on Legislation that it was an improper exercise of power; that it was improper for parties to go to the Legislature, asking them to change venue in criminal cases. But changes have been made in the venue in criminal cases.

Mr. DARLINGTON. At the instance of the accused, however!

Mr. MANN. It does not make any difference at whose instance it was done. The Legislature has exercised that power, and it seemed to the committee that it was improper to be done by them, and ought to be done by the courts.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I merely wish to say, in confirmation of what my friend from Potter (Mr. Mann) has said, that I hope the committee will pass the section. There is no one subject which has tormented the Legislature more than this subject of the change of venue. Every session of the Legislature there are repeated applications to change venues in numerous cases, and it was to prevent such a recurrence after this that the section was adopted. About it, Mr. Chairman, there was no division of sentiment in the Committee on Legislation, and I apprehend there is no division of sentiment in the minds of any gentlemen who have observed the course of legislation in this regard. It is clear, then, that there ought to be some general law on the subject, and it was deemed wise and proper, inasmuch as it was the duty of the Committee on Legislation to prevent the passage of special acts by constitutional provision, that the same committee should also indicate the tribunal where the power of changing venues should be reposed. Now, it is wise and proper that it should be vested in the courts. I am not sure but that the courts, if the Legislature should refuse to pass any general law on the subject, might not have the power to change venues themselves, by virtue of their own inherent power to make their own rules. But, of course, this is an admonition direct to the Legislature to pass a general law upon the subject, as soon as the Constitution is adopted.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I desire to explain. I find, upon conversing with my friend, the gentleman from Pittsburg, (Mr. S. A. Purviance,) that I was under a mistake regarding the statement that I made just now. I supposed that the report of the Committee on the Judiciary would contain a provision on this subject. He tells me that the report is prepared. It must have been done at a meeting when I was not present, and that it contains no provision on that subject. The Judiciary Committee have, however, had before it a proposition that does cover this whole subject, and I supposed before the final report can be agreed upon that question would be passed upon by the Judiciary Committee. I am informed, however, that such is not the fact.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: This is the first I have heard of a report from that committee.

Mr. WOODWARD. There is an amendment before the Judiciary Committee, which covers this subject, and I trust before the final report of that committee is made the proposition, in some modified form, will be presented. The report may be made without touching the subject, and if so an appropriate amendment will be moved.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I trust the committee will pass this section.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I am in favor of the principle contained in the section, but shall vote against it because I regard it as utterly useless in the Constitution. We have already adopted a section which prohibits the Legislature from passing any special law on the subject, which necessitates a general law. We do not need a section to give power to the Legislature to pass a law of this kind. They possess that power, unless we prohibit it. We have prohibited it in special cases, leaving it open for a general law. Now, it is true that the Legislature might confer this power to change the venue in the King of England or of France, and that is just about as likely as they will vest it anywhere else than in the courts of the State. I am opposed to putting in our Constitution any useless provision, or making it any longer than it need be. I fear that one of the evils which we will commit in this Convention will be the putting of useless and unnecessary provisions in the Constitution.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does not this section vest the power in the courts, instead of the Legislature?

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. No, sir; it says the Legislature shall vest it in the courts.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon; he has not read the section. "It shall be vested in the courts."

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. I should object to that, because the Legislature will not, in all human probability, place it anywhere else than in the courts. They will have to pass a law upon the subject, even if you, by a provision of your Constitution, say that it shall be vested in the courts; it will require an act of the Assembly to place it there.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does not this section vest the power absolutely in the court, and whether, under that, they might not exercise it without any act of the Legislature?

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. The section reads: "The power to change the venue in civil and criminal cases shall be vested in the courts, in such manner as shall be regulated by law." Now, until an act of the Legislature be passed, the court cannot exercise that power, even under this constitutional provision. We must have an act of the Legislature to carry it into effect. I oppose this section, therefore, because I believe it to be useless, and I shall oppose every unnecessary provision in the Constitution, making it long, cumbersome and objectionable.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the section.

The section was agreed to; there being, on a division, forty-nine in the affirmative, and fifteen in the negative.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read :

SECTION 28. No money shall be paid out of the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and on warrant drawn by the proper officer in pursuance thereof.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I will ask the intelligent chairman of that committee whether the word "pursuance" is not the proper word, instead of "consequence?"

Mr. HARRY WHITE. In answer to the intelligent gentleman from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) who was a member of the Convention of 1837, I will remind him that that is the exact expression of that famous Constitution.

Mr. KAINE. I will also ask the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Harry White,) what is the necessity of adding to the section the words "and on warrant drawn by the proper officer, in pursuance thereof?" That is not in the old Constitution.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. That is true, and I would say in answer to the intelligent gentleman from Fayette, (Mr. Kaine,) that that was put in as an additional caution. Very frequently money is paid out of the treasury without being paid on a warrant signed by the proper accounting officer of the Commonwealth, and this provision is to make such a course hereafter impossible, if it can be done.

The twenty-eighth section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read :

SECTION 29. No obligation or liability of any railroad, or other corporation, held or owned by the Commonwealth, shall ever be transferred, remitted, postponed, or in any way diminished by the Legislature; nor shall such liability or obligation be released, except by payment thereof into the State Treasury.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman: I move to amend that section, by inserting between the words "be" and "transferred," in the second line, the word "exchanged."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUYLER. I do not want to say anything against the passage of the section, but I wish gentlemen to understand that whatever stocks and bonds are in the sinking fund of the Commonwealth will be utterly incapable of being disposed of, but must remain there until they are redeemed. In other words, if the Commonwealth, exercising the wise sagacity that a private owner of such stocks and bonds should exercise, should feel it would be promoted by disposing of them, because there might be peril of the failure of the corporation in which they were vested, or other causes might arise where the Commonwealth would be powerless to do so, but will have to stand by and see these assets perish, by reason of the constitutional provision which we now propose to adopt.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Just one word of explanation. What the gentleman has stated is quite clear. It occurs to some gentlemen, who have had to vote from time to time upon different propositions made before the Legislature, which are commonly known as bills, that the present Constitution prohibits the Legislature from changing or affecting those securities.

Mr. CUYLER. In Gratz vs. Philadelphia and Erie railroad, the Supreme Court decided differently.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. In that case Judge Strong delivered an opinion, that where the security was perishing, and to save the security from loss, the Legislature might exercise its discretion and thus save it. What constitutes the sinking fund to-day? Some nine millions of dollars, 3,400,000 of which are a loan upon the Allegheny Valley railroad, endorsed by the Pennsylvania Central, the Northern Central and the Philadelphia and Erie, which certainly are good endorsers. The other $6,000,000 are on the Columbia branch of the Pennsylvania Central railroad, which yields an annual revenue to the State of $460,000. This is all that Pennsylvania has to-day in the sinking fund, and we have no reason to be afraid that it can be affected hereafter. I, for one, as a citizen of the Commonwealth, am perfectly willing to take the risk, and I would be unwilling to let the legislative discretion hereafter be exercised in changing or affecting those securities, and if this section passes and goes into the Constitution, we will never hear any more of the $9,000,000 steal.

Section twenty-nine was then agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read :

SECTION 30. No bill shall be passed giving any extra compensation to any public officer, servant, employee, agent or contractor, after services shall have been rendered or contract made, nor providing for the payment of any claim or part thereof, now existing or hereafter created, against the Commonwealth without previous authority of law; and all such unauthorized contracts and agreements shall be void.

The thirtieth section was agreed to.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 31. Every bill which shall have passed both Houses shall be presented to the Governor; if he approves he shall sign it, but if he shall not approve he shall return it, with his objections, to the House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon their Journals, and proceed to re-consider it. If, after such re-consideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, with the objections, to the other House, by which likewise it shall be re-considered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall be a law; but in such cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill, shall be entered on the Journals of each House respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the Governor within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Legislature, by their adjournment, prevent its return, in which case it shall be a law, unless he shall file the same, with his objections, in the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, and give public notice thereof, by proclamation, within thirty days after such adjournment.

Mr. CORBETT. As this section is covered by two sections adopted in the report of the Committee on the Executive, I presume the better way to dispose of it will be to vote it down.

The thirtieth section was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

Mr. HAY. Before the next section is read I desire to offer an additional section.

The CLERK read:

When the General Assembly shall be convened in special session, there shall be no legislation upon subjects other than those particularly mentioned in the proclamation of the Governor, as reasons for holding such session.

Mr. HAY. I simply desire to say that is substantially the same section that I offered as an amendment to the report of the Committee on Legislature, which was not accepted because it was thought that it should come up as an amendment to the report of the Committee on Legislation. It is substantially the same amendment, which then seemed to meet the views of the committee.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I trust the committee will not hastily adopt a provision of this kind. We have not experienced any evil from this in the past. This is an innovation, and some objection has been made to legislation. It occurs to me that it would be wise and proper to let the future take care of itself in this regard. I pause to hear the gentleman who offered it, or some other gentleman, to state some flagrant instances calling for a change of this kind.

Mr. HAY. I do not think it is necessary to state such an instance in order to show the necessity for the adoption of some such amendment as this. If we are to have biennial sessions of the Legislature, we ought to provide that there shall be no other sessions than biennial sessions, unless some great public necessity exists for holding such sessions. There ought to be no legislation upon subjects which are not of sufficient public importance to justify the Governor in convening the General Assembly in public session.

The amendment of Mr. Hay was agreed to, there being, on a division, forty-one in the affirmative, and twenty-six in the negative.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 32. No corporate body for banking or discounting privileges shall be created or organized in pursuance of any law, without three months previous public notice, at the place of the intended location, of the intention to apply for such privileges, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law. Nor shall a charter for such privileges be granted for a longer period than twenty years, and every such charter shall contain a clause reserving to the Legislature the power to alter, revoke or annul the same whenever, in their opinion, it may be injurious to the citizens of the Commonwealth, in such manner, however, that no injustice shall be done to the corporators.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I move to insert, as an amendment, in the fourth line, after the word "intention," the words, "with the names of the applicants."

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I hope that amendment will be adopted. We have several instances in our county where bills have been passed which nobody was willing to father, and after they have been passed by the Legislature have been hawked about the streets by irresponsible parties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the section as amended.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I desire to offer an amendment.

The CLERK read:

After the word "privileges," insert the words, "and every stockholder shall be individually liable to its creditors."

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: It seems to me that there should be a certain liability of stockholders, and for this reason I offer the amendment.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I hope that we, making a Constitution for the State of Pennsylvania, will not adopt a clause of this kind. You will remember that this is the clause of the Constitution adopted in 1837, when the prejudice against the banking system was on tip-toe in Pennsylvania. This is only changed so as to make it possible to organize banks under general laws. Now we have a number of banks in Pennsylvania, and will doubtless have a banking policy. We certainly, as citizens of Pennsylvania, do not wish to discriminate in favor of national banks and against our own. This is a more stringent provision than the provision with regard to national banks. I would allow every case to take care of itself. No doubt a general law will be adopted, and provisions made with reference to individual liabilities, but if this amendment is made the liability of the individual is unlimited, whereas the national currency act of 1863 only requires a liability to the extent of the individual stockholder. I trust that, as Pennsylvanians, we will not discriminate against our own institutions in that regard.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I see the chairman of the Committee on Private Corporations (Mr. Woodward) is present, and I suppose he will call the attention of the committee to the fact that that committee has the subject of this section under consideration. I think they properly belong to the Committee on Private Corporations, and had better be passed over until we get a report from that committee.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I would remind the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. J. W. F. White) that they are put in here because they are under this title in the old Constitution.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I am aware of that, but at the same time they certainly would be far more appropriate in the article on the subject of corporation. There they legitimately belong, much more so than in this article on legislation, and it will be saving time if the committee will vote down these two sections, and let them come up when the Committee on Corporations makes its report. If we undertake to discuss them here, we will have to go over the same subject again when the Committee on Corporations makes its report, because there would be some other provision then brought forward, not now embraced in these two sections. I thought we would hear from the chairman of the committee (Mr. Woodward.)

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I do hope that, as this is an important matter, we will not act upon it hastily, and we might, as suggested by the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. J. W. F. White,) vote down this section, and take up the subject in the report of the Committee on Corporations. In reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Harry White,) I will say that all stockholders of national banks are liable to the amount of their stock, and the stockholders of State banks, under some charters, are not. The charters granted by the Legislature for State banks, in my opinion, do grant improper privileges. They allow no individual responsibility of stockholders. They allow discounts at any rate of interest, and other privileges, which I think are pernicious, and I do hope, before we act upon this matter, that there will be some delay, and that the matter will be fully considered.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. The gentleman has made the statement that stockholders of national banks are liable. The gentleman is aware that they are only liable to the amount of their stock. They lose their subscriptions.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. They are liable, as prescribed by law, just exactly as the liability that I desire to put on the State bank.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I beg pardon. The gentleman's provision makes them liable to all their creditors to any amount.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Not at all.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That is the reading of it.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I call for the reading of it.

The CLERK read:

"No corporate body, for banking and discounting privileges, shall be created or organized in pursuance of any law, without three months previous public notice at the place of the intended election, of the intention to apply for such privileges, and every stockholder shall be individually liable to its stockholders, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law."

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: Then it is unnecessary.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: This subject is before the Committee on Private Corporations, and they will report a provision, applicable not only to banks, but to all corporations, on this subject, and the evil of considering it now and taking a vote upon it at this time is, that gentlemen commit themselves to a particular view of the subject, when they have got but one part of the subject before them. If they would reserve their judgments until they get the whole subject before them, I would think that a better decision would be likely to be arrived at.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: The trouble is, now, that if you vote down this section it is gone. How are we to have it before us again in committee of the whole after you go through this report and adopt what is not rejected? It will be reported to the Convention, and then the section will be gone. Now, there is a way to meet this, without placing ourselves in any difficulty, to amend this section, adopt it and report it, and if there is a section reported by the committee of which the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) is chairman, which is better than this, on second reading it can be adopted; the other can then be stricken out, and that will relieve us of all difficulty. In that event the striking out of the section depends altogether upon what provision the other committee will report.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman: I suppose that the gentleman from Clarion (Mr. Corbett) is aware of the fact that it is perfectly competent to amend this or any other section, when the article is before the Convention, on second reading, or to introduce any new section without going into committee to do so; when the article reaches its third reading, then it can only be amended by sending it to the committee of the whole for that purpose, so that if these two sections be voted down now, and any member desires so to do, they can be offered again when we reach it on second reading in Convention. In corroboration of what has been said by the chairman of the committee, (Mr. Woodward,) I have here a printed report of what has been already passed, and is ready to be reported, and which will probably be reported within a very few days from to-day. The sections in the article on private corporations cover all that the thirty-second and thirty-third sections do, in more brief and comprehensive terms, and I think it will be far more satisfactory to the Convention than either of these two sections can be, and it will cover all the ground covered by both of them. I trust, therefore, that the committee will vote down these two sections and let the matter come up in the report of the other committee.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I think the difficulty spoken of by the gentleman from Clarion (Mr. Corbett) would be gotten over by one plan, and that is to move, as I now do, that the thirty-second section be referred to the Committee on Private Corporations.

The CHAIRMAN. That cannot be done.

Mr. GOWEN. Then I move to postpone it for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. That cannot be done either.

Mr. JOHN PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: Under the supposition that the Convention will vote down the section, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the question recurs on the section as amended.

It was agreed to.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee do now arise.

It was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The thirty-third section will now be read.

The CLERK read:

SECTION 33. The Legislature shall have the power to alter, revoke or annul any charter of incorporation now existing and revocable at the adoption of this Constitution, or any hereafter to be conferred by or under any law, whenever in their opinion it may be injurious to the citizens of this Commonwealth, in such manner, however, that no injustice shall be done to the corporators. No law hereafter enacted shall create, renew or extend the charter of more than one corporation.

It was agreed to.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee do now rise.

Not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The thirty-fourth section will be read.

The CLERK read:

"Every order, resolution or vote to which the concurrence of both Houses may be necessary, except on the question of adjournment, shall be presented to the Governor, and, before it shall take effect, be approved by him; or, being disapproved, shall be passed by two-thirds of both Houses, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill."

It was agreed to.

Mr. J. R. READ. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee do now rise.

Not agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING. Mr. Chairman. I move to postpone this section for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. That cannot be done.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I trust we will all read this very carefully, and understand what it means before we pass it, for it seems to me that as this section reads, it would give to any court in Pennsylvania the right to annul an act of Assembly, notwithstanding the fact that the court of a neighboring county had declared it to be binding; and you might have fifty decisions in Pennsylvania upon one act of Assembly, twenty-five of which would be in favor of its validity and twenty-five against it. Can you give to a court the power to annul an act of incorporation not only when it is not the subject of judicial investigation, but on a suit of the private party, on a collateral question, without its being put on the pleadings at all? You give to the court the power to declare that an act of Assembly is void. I speak now as a lawyer, and I speak in favor of the solemnity of judicial proceedings, which Pennsylvania, with one or two other States in this Union, has always adhered to.

Mr. DUNNING. Will the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) give way to a motion that the committee now rise?

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. Chairman: This is a very important question, and the section seems a very dangerous one.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I give way.

Mr. DUNNING. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee do now rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Agreed to.

IN CONVENTION.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President: The committee of the whole have had under consideration the report of the Committee on Legislation, and have directed me to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Leave was granted.

THE INDUSTRIAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE BLIND.

The PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Industrial association for the blind, inviting the members of the Convention to a musical entertainment to be given at the institute of the association, 3921 Locust street, this evening.

Mr. JOHN PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. Chairman: I move that the invitation be accepted, with the thanks of the Convention.

It was agreed to.

Mr. STANTON. I move that we adjourn.

It was agreed to.

The Convention then, at two o'clock and fifty-four minutes, adjourned.

SEVENTIETH DAY.

WEDNESDAY, March 19, 1873.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M., the President, Hon. Wm. M. Meredith, in the chair.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. James W. Curry.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. BROOMALL presented a petition from the citizens of Delaware county, praying that a provision be inserted in the Constitution extending the right of suffrage to females, which was referred to the Committee on Suffrage and Election.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CORBETT asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Andrews for a few days.

Mr. CHURCH asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Finney for a few days.

Mr. McCLEAN asked and obtained leave of absence for a few days.

THE COMMITTEE ON IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. BIDDLE presented the following report of the Committee on Impeachment and Removal from Office, which was read and ordered to be printed.

ARTICLE XII.

OF IMPEACHMENT AND REMOVAL FROM OFFICE.

SECTION 1. The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeaching.

SECTION 2. All impeachments shall be tried by the Senate; when sitting for that purpose the Senators shall be upon oath or affirmation; no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

SECTION 3. The Governor and all other civil officers under this Commonwealth shall be liable to impeachment for any misdemeanor in office; but judgment in such cases shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust or profit under this Commonwealth; the party, whether convicted or acquitted, shall nevertheless be liable to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment, according to law.

SECTION 4. All officers shall hold their offices only on the condition that they behave themselves well while in office, and shall be removed on conviction of misbehavior in office or of any infamous crime; appointed officers may be removed at the pleasure of the power by which they are appointed; elected officers, other than Governor, Lieutenant Governor, members of the General Assembly and judges of courts of record, shall be removed by the Governor for reasonable cause, on the address of two-thirds of the Senate.

THE ARTICLE ON LEGISLATION.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I move that the Convention resolve itself into committee of the whole on the article reported by the Committee on Legislation.

The motion was agreed to.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. Armstrong in the chair, and proceeded to the consideration of the article reported by the Committee on Legislation.

ACTS OF ASSEMBLY.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the thirty-fifth section, which will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 35. Any bill passed in disregard of the provisions and directions prescribed in this article shall be void and of no effect; and when the validity of any law passed by the Legislature is questioned in any court of record, it shall be competent for such court to inspect the Journals of either House, and if it does not appear thereon that all the forms of legislation, in both Houses, as hereinbefore prescribed, have been observed in the passage of such law, the same shall be adjudged by such court to be void.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: At the adjournment, yesterday, I was about to call the attention of the Convention to the fact that this section introduced an innovation into the established judicial proceedings of this Commonwealth.

What have those proceedings been in the past? If it was alleged that an act of Assembly, creating a corporation or creating a franchise, was unconstitutional, it was the settled law of the land, and very wisely so settled, that nobody but the Commonwealth, upon the relation of the Attorney General, could inquire into the validity of those franchises; and I say very properly settled because any other system of judicial investigation than the one which confines the subject matter of investigation to one particular tribunal, to be commenced in one particular manner, would lead to the greatest possible evil.

Let me suppose that this section is adopted into the Constitution. It says that, "when the validity of any law passed by the Legislature is questioned in any court of record." Now, a corporation owes its existence to the act of Assembly which created it. That corporation brings suit against the individual, and the individual questions the validity of the act of Assembly incorporating the company. By this section any court is authorized to send for the Journals of the House, and pass, so far as that case is concerned, upon the validity of that act of incorporation, and if the judgment of that court is against the act, the corporation has no existence before that tribunal, although twenty other courts in Pennsylvania may decide directly the reverse, and you may have the anomaly presented of a corporation claiming its franchises under one act of Assembly, which, in one judicial tribunal of this Commonwealth, is void; and in another, perfectly good. It will not do, therefore, to permit such an act of Assembly to be questioned, except where it is the direct subject of judicial proceedings, and except where there are proper parties upon the record, so that the decision of the court, made one way or the other, is final for all purposes over the State, and that no two conflicting decisions upon the same subject matter may be had in different courts.

I remember a very funny story in reference to a justice of the peace out in the mountains somewhere, during the reign of General Jackson, who felt a great deal of animosity against the Bank of the United States. One day an action for debt was brought before him to recover five dollars, which had been loaned to some one; and, upon the trial of the case, it appeared that these five dollars had been in the shape of a bill of the Bank of the United States. The justice, out of deference to General Jackson, immediately entered a judicial decision that the charter of that bank was void, and, from that day until his death, I believe that nobody could ever convince him that the Bank of the United States had any existence, because, he said, he knew it had not, for he had decided the matter himself.

Now, just such a system will result from adopting this section. You will have three or four or five or six different decisions upon the same subjects by petty tribunals, where the act is not the direct subject of controversy, where the decision is upon a matter not thought of probably at the time the suit was brought, but a collateral issue, which never ought to be considered.

Again, suppose there is a contested election case of a local officer in one of our courts, one party claiming, and the other party holding, the office. One says that the act of Assembly which requires a particular form probably to protect the ballot-box, was not passed according to the constitutional forms, and, in a decision simply to test the right, the court, in order to give this office to the one person or the other, may send for the Journals of the House, and overturn the whole act of Assembly.

Again, let me call the attention of the committee to this great peculiarity. "When the validity of any law passed by the Legislature is questioned in any court of record, it shall be competent for such court to inspect the Journals of either House, and if it does not appear thereon that all the forms of law, &c., the act is to be declared void." In other words, the Journals of the Houses are to be not only prima facie but conclusive evidence of the validity of the act of Assembly, and a dishonest or corrupt clerk, by falsifying the Journals or failing to record thereon the proceedings of the tribunal, has it in his power to overturn the whole legislation of the Commonwealth, no matter if you bring every member to prove that the bill was properly introduced, read the proper number of times, and every form complied with, yet if the clerk fail to record the fact upon the Journal, the Journal is conclusive evidence of the invalidity of the act. Surely this cannot be proper. Surely it ought not to be in the power of the clerk, by failing to do his duty either as an act of omission, or intentionally, to defeat the will of the Legislature.

Why should courts have this power upon a collateral question? What is the necessity at all for adopting such a section as this in the Constitution? Surely the courts have the power now to declare an act of Assembly unconstitutional, but it must be done according to known judicial proceedings. Suppose you leave this out, Mr. Chairman? You remember, and the gentlemen who are lawyers will remember, that a few years ago the Constitution of Pennsylvania was amended so as to require that no bill should contain more than one subject matter, which should be clearly expressed in its title, and from that time to the present courts have the power and have exercised it, of inquiring into the constitutionality of any bill which it was asserted had been passed in violation of this provision; and if you leave the whole section out, the courts will still have the power, in a proper manner, to inquire into the validity of every act of Assembly, but it must be done according to the known usages of judicial proceedings, and in many cases, especially when a franchise is created, it must be the direct subject of the investigation. It dare not be brought into question on a collateral issue; it must be a writ of quo warranto, issued upon the relation of the Attorney General. Now if it is necessary to provide, in addition to the well-known powers of the courts as they at present exist, any constitutional method whereby the validity of an act of Assembly can be tested, let us provide that it shall be done only when the act itself is the direct subject of investigation, and only upon the relation of the law officer of the Commonwealth. That would be all that it would be necessary to make any change in reference to the subject, but if this provision is adopted any court, in a collateral proceeding, can over-ride the will of the Legislature, and break through a solemn enactment, simply because the clerk who kept the Journal of the House had failed properly to record the proceedings of the body of which he was an officer.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment:

The CLERK read:

Strike out the section, and insert: "The Governor shall not give his approval to any bill until he shall have ascertained that all the forms of legislation, as prescribed in this article, have been observed in the passage of the same, and in his approval he shall so certify, and his certificate shall be conclusive that all the forms prescribed have been observed."

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I am satisfied that this section, as it stands, will be found to work very mischievously in practice, yet I am satisfied that there should be some one, whose duty it should be to ascertain, carefully, before any bill shall receive the signature of the Governor, whether all the forms prescribed have been complied with. Undoubtedly it will be the duty of the Governor, under the general provisions we have already provided, to ascertain that the forms of law had been complied with; yet if it were required that he should attach his certificate as a part of the approval, that all these forms have been complied with, he would make it his special business to examine the Journals, or cause them to be examined, so that he would be able to certify that all the forms of law had been complied with. Then, after that examination, that certificate should be conclusive.

It seems to me to be very unwise that, at any time, perhaps ten, fifteen or twenty years after the passage of a law, the question might be raised, in any action in a court of justice, that some form had been lacking upon the part of the Legislature. Great injustice would arise in this way, and I hope that this section, as it now stands, will not be adopted by this committee.

The suggestion of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) that the question, if raised at all, should be on the part of the Commonwealth to test specifically the validity of the act itself, and not leave it to be raised upon some collateral question, and by any person, and at any time, years after the passage of the act perhaps, when hundreds of thousands of dollars, perhaps millions of dollars, are interested under it; I think it would not be so dangerous, or liable to work such great injustice, but I am opposed to either plan, without a saving clause to protect vested rights under the act.

Mr. WORRELL. Mr. Chairman: This question has been the subject of judicial decision, but the decisions have not all been in the same line in the various courts of the United State. I think the Supreme Court of Illinois has determined that it is competent for the judicial department of the government to inquire and decide whether the proper forms of legislation have been adopted in passing an act of Assembly. The Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania has taken the other ground, that the certificate of the legislative department of this Commonwealth is conclusive, as to all the forms which the Constitution requires for the passage of a law, and this has also been the determination of the Supreme Court of the United States. Having regard, therefore, to the decisions in this Commonwealth, and the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, it is not competent for the judicial department of this Commonwealth, in the most glaring case of fraud, to inquire and determine whether a bill had been properly and constitutionally passed, if the party sustaining the bill presents a formal certificate from the legislative department.

Now, I agree entirely with the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) that, if the proper passage of a law is to be the subject of judicial inquiry, it should be when the law itself is the specific subject of investigation, and if gentlemen will refer to the pamphlets of propositions offered in the Convention, page sixty-four, they will find that I offered, early in the session, a proposition which will entirely cover this objection. I think that the judicial department of this Commonwealth should have the opportunity to inquire and decide whether the forms of the Constitution have been adhered to in the passage of a law, and I desire to offer now, as an amendment, what I proposed in the early portion of the session, to strike out all after the word "article," in the second line, and insert as follows: "Shall be avoidable, and the Attorney General of the Commonwealth shall have authority to proceed by scire facias in any of the courts of the Commonwealth, to try and determine the validity of any act of Assembly."

MR. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: I suppose there will be very little difficulty in regard to the propriety of adopting this particular section reported by the Committee on Legislation. The manifold evils that will attend the adoption of this section are apparent, and now it seems to me the only question is whether it will be wise to allow the courts, under any circumstances, to investigate the facts of an illegal bill procured by corruption in the Legislature. I understand it has never been possible heretofore in this Commonwealth for any court to investigate questions of fact as to whether an act has been passed through the Legislature by means of the proper and ordinary forms which are required to be observed. Now, the main question is whether it will be prudent to open that door and give the courts that power. If it is to be done, most unquestionably the law, as provided, is to be carefully considered, and with a view of meeting the difficulties of the case, and at the suggestion of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) and other members of the Convention, I have drawn a section which I intend offering as a substitute for the section now under consideration. The substance of it is that the trial of any case in a court of justice of the validity of an act of Assembly, when called in question, shall be based upon the proper affidavit of the party making the application, and if the court shall be satisfied that there is prima facie evidence in the case, they shall direct a feigned issue to be framed, under the direction of the Attorney General, to try the allegation contained in the affidavit; that the trial shall be had by a judge of the Supreme Court in such county as he may direct, and if it shall appear on the trial that the forms provided in the Constitution shall not have been observed, or that improper or undue means to effect the passage of the act have been used, it shall be declared null and void. Now, the advantages which will attend the adoption of some such plan as this will be obvious.

In the first place, all trials of the validity of acts of Assembly will be had before one tribunal, and it will not, therefore, be possible to have fifty or sixty interpretations of the same act. There will be uniformity; and in the second place, the trials will be had at the suit of the Commonwealth in relation to the party interested, and can only be instituted upon sufficient grounds.

Now, it seems to me that it will be quite prudent and quite wise to provide some method by which acts of assembly procured through improper or undue means may be set aside. It seems to me to be quite useless to prescribe a variety of forms in the Constitution as to the manner in which acts of Assembly shall be passed and certified, unless some method is provided for the enforcement of these forms. They will be as efficacious as the Pope bull against the comet, unless some method is devised for this purpose. If a bill approved and signed is conclusive evidence of its passage through the Legislature, it is, of course, a matter of very little question whether the Legislature ever complied with any particular form or not. During the debate upon the main question, I should like to hear the arguments as to whether it would be wise or prudent to open this door and give the power to the courts to declare acts of Assembly that are passed by means of corruption, or any undue influence, unconstitutional and void, and if so, what is the best method of providing a remedy there for this evil? With a view of reaching this question I offer the amendment to which I have referred as a substitute for the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute will be read.

The CLERK read as follows :

SECTION —. Whenever, in any judicial proceeding, either party shall claim, under or by virtue of any act of Assembly, and the other party, upon proper affidavit, shall allege that such act of Assembly was passed in disregard of the provisions and directions prescribed in this article, or by fraud, bribery or undue means, and the court before which such judicial proceedings is pending shall be satisfied prima facie that such allegations are well founded, it shall be the duty of the said court to order a feigned issue to be framed, under the direction of the Attorney General, upon proper pleadings, in which the Commonwealth, upon relation of the party in interest, shall be plaintiff, and the party claiming, under such act of Assembly, defendant to try the truth of the allegations in said affidavits contained and the validity of such act of Assembly; and said issue shall be certified to the Supreme Court and tried by one of the judges thereof, in whatever county he may direct; and if it shall appear to the court and jury, upon such trial, that all the provisions of legislation in both Houses, as hereinbefore prescribed, have not been substantially observed in the passage of said act, or that the same has been procured by bribery, fraud or undue means, such act of Assembly shall be adjudged null and void, either party to have the right to a writ of error, as in other cases.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I acknowledge it is desirable that some means should be provided to compel the enactment of laws in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution; but I think if all the amendments which have been proposed are considered, the Convention will agree that it is better to have no provision at all upon this subject than to adopt the one provided by the committee or any of the proposed modifications of it. If an act of Assembly that is all right upon its face, that carries with it no suspicion of a want of constitutionality, is to be questioned in any court of common pleas in the Commonwealth, and declared void after it has been acquiesced in and operated under for ten or fifteen years, and after titles to land, for example, have vested under it and passed by sale or descent possibly many times, it would look more like repealing laws, ab initio, than deciding upon their validity, and it would place the laws of the Commonwealth upon a very unsafe foundation. No man would know how the courts would pronounce upon the various acts of Assembly when called in question. No lawyer could form an opinion upon what is or what is not law in any given case.

I think it is better that the system under which we have been living so long should be continued, and that a judge should not have the right to go behind an act of Assembly and inquire into the means by which it has been obtained. In the case of acts of Assembly granting powers to private corporations, it would not do so much harm if the means by which these laws were obtained were permitted to be inquired into, and the laws pronounced null and void if fraudulently procured. But this section applies to public acts, acts affecting the whole Commonwealth, and under which the vested rights of a citizen may be overturned by a decision in any part of the State, without any notice to him whatever.

The proposition seems to me to be monstrous, that where I hold my title to land under an act of Assembly, the very act upon which my title depends may be called in question by a court in Erie.

Now, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer) is not open to quite all the objection that the original section is because that amendment proposes to allow these acts of Assembly to be questioned only in a single tribunal, and at a single place, and it allows a possible opportunity for the citizen who has perhaps held his title good under such an act for twenty years to obtain some notice of the pendency of such action in the court, and to prepare to defend his rights. In regard to the other objection to the section, that after an act has been considered valid, and has been acquiesced in, it should not be questioned in this way, it seems to me that the proposition of the gentleman from Luzerne is quite as bad as that of the committee. He is altogether mistaken in the functions of a court in considering an act of Assembly. He seems to think that the courts are to declare a law void. That is a mistake.

The business of the court is to decide a question between the parties when it arises; and although the constitutionality of an act may come up and may rule the case, yet the action of the court only binds the parties. The same court, in a case between other parties, when the validity of the law is questioned, may decide the other way, holding the law good. To allow the court the power to declare a law absolutely null and void, no matter whom it may affect, is to constitute a third branch of the Legislature, with a veto power over both Houses, and the Governor also. I know very well that some of these objections would apply to an act declared unconstitutional on account of its provisions, and that, too, where it is so clearly unconstitutional that there is no danger of the court reversing its decision; but in the case of a law, unconstitutional upon another ground than the want of some formality in its passage, there is something upon the face of the law itself to excite attention. In the class of cases contemplated by the committee, there is nothing to call attention to the law; nothing on its face to excite suspicion. I submit that we should take some other means of compelling the Legislature to observe the necessary forms in the passage of bills by prescribing, for instance, a punishment upon the officers and members of the Legislature, if they should fail to obey the requirements of the Constitution in this particular. I think, Mr. Chairman, we had much better take an act of Assembly as we find it promulgated, and then the community will always know what a law is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has been examining the proposed amendment to the amendment, suggested by the gentleman from Luzerne, (Mr. H. W. Palmer,) and upon careful examination the Chair is disposed to hold that it is not at this time in order. It is not an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PALMER. I withdraw it, then, for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard.)

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman: I move the following as an amendment to the amendment, and a substitute for the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Chair correctly understand the gentleman that it is a proposed substitute for the entire section and amendment?

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not at this time in order. No amendment is in order except an amendment to the pending amendment. The gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) has a right to have the amendment passed upon by the Convention. It will be in order after the present amendment is disposed of.

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I hold in my hand an amendment that I propose to offer when it shall be in place, but as I understand the ruling of the Chair now, this amendment is not in order at this time. I will read it, however, in order that the members of the committee may know what it is that I propose. I propose to strike out of the section as reported by the committee all after the word "void," in the second line, and insert these words: "And the journals of the two Houses shall be conclusive evidence of the facts in the case." I think, Mr. Chairman, that the principle aimed at by the section before us is an important one. If we intend that the limitations and restrictions we have imposed upon the Legislature, and their mode of passing bills, shall be of any validity or any force, we must have some means of ascertaining whether they have complied with the directions or not.

The mere fact that we declare in the Constitution that certain forms and certain modes of proceeding shall be observed in the passage of laws is of no use, unless we enforce these modes, or unless the act passed in defiance of them shall be declared void. The only way that I apprehend that the question can be raised at all, will be by having some constitutional provision on the subject. I believe it has been decided, and correctly decided, and acquiesced in throughout the State, that when a law is passed, or at least when it is certified by the Secretary of State, and has been published in the pamphlet laws as one of the enactments of the Legislature, the courts do not go behind that to inquire whether the bill was properly passed or not.

I differ very widely with the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) when he says that the Journals shall not be looked to, to see whether the law has been passed in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, because a clerk might put something in that Journal not in accordance with the fact. It must be remembered that the clerk is a sworn officer, and, besides, the second section of our Constitution requires that the two Houses shall keep a Journal of their proceedings, and publish that Journal daily. That Journal ought to contain all that is necessary to show whether an act has gone through the forms required, and whether the Legislature has complied with all the requirements of the Constitution. Every member of the Legislature can see, when the Journal is printed and laid upon his desk, whether it contains evidence that the bill has gone through the necessary form. In addition to that, every person who looks at the Journal to see how the act of Assembly has been passed, if he desires to know whether the question can be raised as to its constitutionality, can see from the Journal whether the Legislature has complied with these requirements.

The courts then would require no evidence outside of that Journal, as to the facts in the case. The Journal would be conclusive as to these facts. I would enable the courts, therefore, to look at these Journals, and at them only. We know that the Journals are printed officially, and copies of them are to be found in every part of the State. When a question of fact is raised in court, the question of the constitutionality of the law would be decided precisely in the same way that questions of constitutionality are now decided by the courts. I think it would be far more simple and effective than any of the suggestions made here.

MR. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: After reading this section very carefully, and listening attentively to all that has been said upon it, I have come to the conclusion that it is entirely unnecessary, and, indeed, a very improper requirement to place in a Constitution. The only necessity at all for it is to prevent a bill becoming a law that has not passed through the regular forms. We commence, in the first place, by saying that the bill shall be signed, after the title is read in the presence of the two Houses, by each presiding officer. If the bill is not properly passed, every member sitting in his seat should be ready to object to it. When passed, it goes to the Governor, and he signs it. I take it to be the duty of the Executive of the Commonwealth, before putting his name to a bill, to be sure that that bill has passed through all the forms required by the law or the Constitution. If you make a section—if this committee, or the Committee on the Executive, should make a section, requiring the law officer of the Commonwealth to see that each law has passed through these constitutional forms in the making of the law, that would, probably, cover the point, and would be all that would be necessary. To take this matter into every court of the Commonwealth would, it appears to me, be a monstrosity. It would unsettle and upset every kind of litigation going on in the courts. The law is now considered to be a great uncertainty; but the uncertainty would then be multiplied a hundred, and even a thousand fold, and it will make the operations of all the courts in the Commonwealth, "confusion worse confounded." I think that every amendment to this section should be voted down, and the section itself be then voted down without any hesitancy whatever. It must be apparent to every delegate here that the section is a very improper one, and that it never ought to be agreed to.

MR. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman: The question immediately pending before the Convention is on the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. Howard,) which does not involve in itself those considerations with regard to judicial action upon acts of Assembly which have been so much discussed here this morning. There is an evil here that ought to be met and remedied. You have passed several sections requiring certain forms of legislation to be pursued and adopted in the passage of laws. How are you going to enforce these provisions? How are you going to see that these forms have been complied with? Why is it necessary that any provision of this kind should be made at all? The reason is because very often laws are passed which have not only not passed through the forms of legislation, but sections have been actually interpolated into the very body of these laws, which sections have never been acted upon in either House at all; and this by some "hocus-pocus" which I do not profess to understand. We ought, sir, to have some provision which is calculated to have these matters looked into, to have it understood whether or not those laws have actually passed through the necessary forms of legislation, and whether the whole law has been passed by the Legislature under the forms prescribed in the Constitution.

The original section I believe nobody favors, so far as I have been able to gather the expression of the Convention. The amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) goes far to supply the deficiency, but, at the same time, I think that it is not exactly in the best form. I proposed, if I had had an opportunity, to have offered an amendment to his amendment, or perhaps, should that amendment not be adopted, to offer an amendment to this section, which, I think, will act fairly and provide a constitutional protection in this particular. I propose, first, that when a bill is passed in the Legislature, and has been presented to the Governor for his signature, the Secretary of the Commonwealth shall inspect the Journals and see whether or not the forms prescribed by this article have been complied with.

Mr. McVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I trust the gentleman from York (Mr. Cochran) will read his substitute, so that the committee may hear it. I think it will meet very nearly the views of the committee.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman: I will first state its objects and then read it. The Secretary of the Commonwealth is to inspect the Journals of both Houses of the Legislature, and if it does not appear from these Journals that all the forms of legislation in both these Houses, prescribed by the preceding sections of this article, have been observed in the passage of the law, then the same shall not receive the Executive sanction and approval, but it shall be returned to the Legislature accompanied by a statement, in writing, of the reasons which induced its return, and it shall not become a law unless it shall be enacted according to all the forms prescribed, and shall then have been approved by the Governor in the usual way.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it must be very evident to gentlemen here that if we were to adopt any more stringent provisions than that, a law might be defeated because of defects or omissions innocent in themselves. For instance, something might be innocently, not to say purposely, omitted from the Journals. The mere omission of a clerk would defeat the law entirely and absolutely. But here is an opportunity afforded, that if it should be found, on inspection, that the Journals do not show that the forms prescribed have been pursued, the law may be returned to the Legislature, in order that it may advisedly reconsider it, and pass it through all the prescribed forms, and then send it again to the Governor.

This section, Mr. Chairman, let me say, does not in the slightest degree interfere with the established rules with regard to the action of courts, or the proceedings of the Legislature, which have heretofore been adopted. This section does not require the courts to act upon the constitutionality of these laws, and to look into the Journals of the Legislature. It is very evident that if the courts are to be required to inspect the Journals of the Legislature on every trial that comes before them, it will add a great annoyance and a great delay to the trial of cases. This placing upon them a duty which is not properly judicial does not belong to their department at all. This is a matter for the Legislature and the Executive, and when they have acted upon it, it seems to me that it is right and proper that that action should be conclusive, as it is now, so far as the proper passage of the act is concerned. Now, sir, I should propose, if the opportunity should be presented, to offer a substitute for the section in these words:

"It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, whenever any bill requiring the signature of the Governor shall be presented to him, to inspect the Journals of both Houses of the General Assembly, and if it appears thereon that all the forms of legislation in both Houses, as hereinbefore prescribed, have been observed in the passage of such bill he shall so certify thereon to the Governor; but if it shall not so appear the Secretary shall so certify in like manner, and the bill shall not receive the Executive approval or signature, but shall be returned to the House in which it originated, accompanied by a statement of the reasons which induced its return, and shall not become a law unless it shall thereafter be passed through all the requisite forms of legislation, and be approved, as in other cases, by the Governor, whose approval shall be conclusive that said act has passed through all the required forms of legislation."

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Chairman: I think, sir, that it is very manifest that our duty to the people requires us to provide that laws shall not be ambulatory as to place or time—valid to-day and invalid to-morrow, right in one county and wrong in another. On looking over this article I find it will be very difficult, perhaps practically impossible, to carry out any provision like this particular section, or even the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. J. W. F. White.) Now, if we rely on the Journals of the two Houses we will find, it occurs to me, more difficulty than we will if we rely on almost anything else. In this connection I call the attention of the committee to some of the other provisions of this very article, in order to enable us to see where we will land. It will be observed that section thirty-five, now under consideration, requires the Legislature to conform every bill to all the provisions and directions contained in this article, and that a bill shall be valid only when all these forms have been complied with, and that the Journal must show the same. If the Journal does not show that these forms have been regarded the bill is void.

By turning to section eight of this article it will be observed that it requires, among other things, that all amendments to any bill shall be printed before the final vote shall be taken. Now, sir, we have amendments to offer of every size and form, coming in at every conceivable stage of legislation, in committee of the whole or on second reading and elsewhere, amendments of a single word, amendments to the amendments, and I imagine that according to this article each amendment must be printed, and it must be printed before the bill passes. Now, sir, if we are to take the Journals of the House as conclusive evidence as to what has been done in this respect, we are to require every judge of every court in the State, upon the request of any suitor, to look over the Journals and see whether all these matters of mere form have been regarded? It is possible that the validity of a law of this State, involving large amounts of property, should depend upon the recollections of a clerk as to what is not in the usual line of his duties, and his failure to state that an amendment of a single word was not printed, and that, too, before the bill passed. I take it that we, as Constitution makers, would be unworthy of our position, if we sent down to the people such a Constitution as that. I call attention, therefore, to that provision as one which it is utterly impossible to carry out.

Then, as to another provision of the same section, that "every bill be read at length on three different days." The clerk must state these things in the Journal. If he happens to forget it, it is all wrong, and could be brought up twenty years afterward to destroy the act. Without dwelling upon that, I pass to another section.

Section seven of this article recites that no bill shall be passed containing more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, except appropriation bills. Are we going to send down to each section of the State a Constitution declaring a law unconstitutional, because this has not been complied with, or because the clerk does not so state? One man may think that it is complied with, while another man may think it is not. One judge may think there is but one subject, another that there are two, and the clerk is made a judge for all. If you make a directory clause essential, you endanger the rights of suitors.

Then, passing to another section of this article. Section five provides that "no bill shall be so altered or amended, in the course of its passage through either House, as to change its original purposes." Is the clerk to state that on the Journal as to each bill, and if he fails to do it, is the law to be held void? Or if he does so state, is it to be conclusive? He is made a judge to construe, and then a clerk to record.

It seems to me that if this section, or anything like it, is to be adopted, that there is a similar difficulty there.

Then passing still to another section, section three, we find that "each House shall keep a Journal of its proceedings, and publish them daily, except such parts as may require secrecy." Who is to decide what requires secrecy? Is the clerk to do it, and is the fact that the rest is not stated by him to have been published daily, to vitiate all the laws of the session? Is the clerk to know the fact that they were published daily, and if he fails to know that fact, is a law to become null and void, because the proceedings were not published daily? That is the way the article provides and the way it must stand, if we depend simply upon the Journal.

Then passing to section thirteen. Section thirteen requires that the presiding officer of each House shall sign all bills publicly, in the presence of the House. How is that to be ascertained? Is the clerk necessarily to know that fact? Is he to note that on the Journal? He may note it and he may not, and if he does not is a law not so signed to be void? Or if so signed but not so stated, is it to be void? His Journal, as to a bill, is closed before such signing oftentimes. Is he to go back and change what the House has declared to be complete? We are making confusion worse confounded.

Then, again, turning over to section forty which, it is true, has not yet been adopted, but may be; that section says that a member who has a personal or private interest in any measure or bill proposed or pending before the Legislature, shall disclose the fact to the House of which he is a member, and shall not have the right to vote thereon. How are you to find that out? Is the clerk to note upon the Journal whether all the members are interested or whether they are not? It is utterly impossible. He cannot know it—yet he must state it—and will he undertake to state what may be false? And if he does not state that all are disinterested as to each law, such laws are void.

Let us, by committing it to the Governor, as is suggested by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) or to the Attorney General, or both in connection, require them to perform such a duty that when a law has been finally passed, signed by the Governor, published and sent to the people, its constitutionality as to matters of mere form cannot be affected. Its constitutionality, in its substance, of course is always open, but there ought to be an end as to questions of legislative form. I think, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) contains the right substance. Perhaps it ought to be changed in phraseology, but I rose simply to point out these difficulties, and to show the absolute necessity that the law itself, so far as form is concerned, shall be completed before it is published to the world.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I think a moment's reflection will satisfy this committee that the suggestions of the gentleman from York (Mr. Cochran) and the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) are altogether unnecessary. I take it, before the Executive signs a bill he is fully aware of what it is, and how it will operate, and no other officer is necessary to assist him perform the duties of his office, so far as the signing of bills is concerned, unless the Governor himself summons some one of his executive counsel to his aid. The proposition of the gentleman from York requires that this Constitutional Convention shall impose upon the Secretary of the State a duty which is now imposed on the Governor. The duties of the office of Governor require him to procure information as to whether a bill is right and proper, and if the substitute of the gentleman from York were adopted it would take away part of the duties of the Executive. That seems to be altogether useless.

Now, the same objection applies to the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny. It seems to me that we are undertaking to put something into the Constitution without knowing the meaning and effect of it. What necessity is there that the Constitution should contain a clause which says that the Secretary of State shall advise the Governor of the correctness of an act of Assembly before he puts his signature to it? It strikes me that this is the sheerest nonsense. If gentlemen will look at this for a moment, and particularly the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) who has manifested so much interest in this special subject, they will see that the scope of this proposition will be to take away part of the duty of the Executive. It is not necessary for the Constitution to contain a clause directing him what course he shall pursue in order to ascertain whether an act of Assembly is correct and proper or not.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I dislike very much placing in the Constitution anything at all which looks like going beyond the enrolment of a law. I think it will be found very difficult, if not impracticable, to carry out such an idea. But if it be the intention of the committee of the whole and of the Convention to make some provision which shall authorize an inquiry whether the law has been passed through all the forms prescribed, by some tribunal, I do not think that that tribunal should be the one suggested by my friend from Allegheny. I say so for the reason that it would be simply impossible for the Governor, or for the Secretary of the Commonwealth, no matter how great their knowledge of legislation may be, to go through the Journals and ascertain whether the forms of the Constitution have been complied with in every particular case.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: Will the gentleman from Chester allow me to make a suggestion? We propose, under our present plan, that we are to do away, in a great measure—I judge, with nineteen-twentieths—with all the forms of special legislation; perhaps more. Under the force of that suggestion, I would ask the gentleman whether it would be a mistake to charge the Governor with the duty of ascertaining what is simply a clerical duty, before a law shall go forth as a cheat and a snare upon the public, whether the forms of law have been complied with, and that his certificate on that point shall be conclusive on that point that the forms have been complied with, before he shall sign it?

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I will answer that by saying that the Governor is supposed to carefully examine every law that comes before him, and he is presumed, also, to rely upon the fact that all the necessary forms have been complied with.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask the gentleman from Chester, if the Governor attaches his signature to an act of Assembly without knowing what its contents are, if it would not be a misdemeanor?

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I do not know that the Governor does any such thing, and therefore I do not presume that he commits any misdemeanor. His duty, of course, is to examine the bill; but it is not his duty to examine whether it has passed through all the stages on the days prescribed. He has to assume that each co-ordinate branch of the government does its duty, and we could get along with no other system than that. You must assume that your Legislature, in each branch of it, will discharge its duty. Recollect, we are purifying that body. We have got it nearly pure already, and before we have completed our labors we will have it entirely pure. There will be no dishonest men in it. The voters will all be pure, and therefore we must assume, as honest men, that the Legislature will properly reflect the will of the whole Commonwealth. Very well; you cannot base your government on any other theory than that it is to be administered by honest men, and therefore you must assume that every Legislature, and each branch thereof, will conform to all the requirements of the Constitution. You might as well allow the Legislature to inquire whether the Governor has done his duty in examining a law before he signs it, as to allow the Governor to inquire whether the Legislature has done its duty in passing it. You must assume that each branch of the Government has done its duty, and it will be simply impractical, I say, to require the Governor to examine into all the forms of legislation through which the law has passed.

The gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) suggests that we will not have many laws when we have done with special legislation. Do not let us hug that delusion to our bosoms. There certainly will be special legislation, or we will be a nation without any laws at all, for we must have, and we cannot avoid having, a certain amount of legislation. The people of Pennsylvania certainly will not deny themselves the privilege of having such laws passed as their interests require.

Now, what is the evil intended to be remedied? It is said that certain laws have found their way into the Governor's Chamber, and have been signed and placed upon the statute book which never actually passed the Legislature. I do not know how numerous they may be. There may have been one law, there may have been two or there may have been ten in the course of the last seventy or eighty years. Now, rather than hedge around these bodies so that they can pass no law with any hope of its being valid, had we not better submit even to the partial inconvenience, if such it be, of a law getting upon the statute book which never passed, and making it necessary for the next Legislature to repeal it? Occasionally we had better submit to this than to deny to ourselves the power to do good. I do not think that the evil requires so vigorous a remedy, but if it be designed by this Convention to keep open the question whether the law is constitutionally passed or not, how long? Certainly not so long as that titles may pass under it without notice, money be invested and rights acquired, for you would do infinite wrong by this. You must, therefore, if you adopt any principle like this, fix a limit, and that, too, a very short limit, within which this question can be raised. Now, who is to raise it? Not, I take it, individual suitors in the contest between man and man. I trust individual contests will not be arrested in their progress by raising side issues as to whether the law under which they claim is constitutionally passed before their rights are decided; otherwise in all the laws that you have throughout the Commonwealth, incorporating banks, insurance companies, water companies, gas companies and thousands of others—if any man is sued for a note upon which he has borrowed money from a bank, or any man is sued for the gas which has been sold to him, he may raise the question that the law is not constitutional under which you are claiming and say "I want that decided first by your court before you shall recover your debt of me." That is all wrong. It is certainly a well settled principle of jurisprudence in Pennsylvania that no man can stop the progress of a cause for such collateral issues as this. A water company organized by act of Assembly or by decree of court cannot be stopped in the trial of such a case by the inquiry, whether it is properly incorporated or not. That question can alone be raised, as the law now stands, by a writ of quo warranto, issued, not at the instance of a private individual, but issued by the law officers of the Commonwealth. The question whether a man intrudes upon or claims the franchises of the Commonwealth is only to be decided between the Commonwealth and him, in a proceeding to be instituted by the Commonwealth or at the instance of a private individual in the name of the Commonwealth.

The Commonwealth alone can say whether she has been encroached upon. She alone is entitled to go into court and see if she has been encroached upon.

I, therefore, would not tolerate the idea that any man, before a justice of the peace or before the court, litigating private questions between themselves, might raise the question, whether the law under which the contract arose was or was not constitutional. That is a question to be decided otherwise.

Now, sir, if it be the intention of this Convention to repose this authority in the courts, then I have a suggestion to make at the proper time, following the example of some other gentlemen, which I suppose to be a better remedy than those which have been suggested. I will propose, at the proper time, to amend this section, by striking out all after the word "void," in the second line, and inserting, so that it shall read thus: "Any bill passed in disregard of the provisions and directions in this article shall be void, and may be so declared in any legal proceeding instituted for that purpose, on behalf of the Commonwealth, within one year after its passage."

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: We have in the past few days been passing numerous and very radical sections to prevent hasty and fraudulent legislation, and to correct the many evils which all admit have grown up by reason of the manner in which the legislation of this State has been conducted. Those sections have been passed with almost entire unanimity. The differences have been rather as to the wording than as to what was to be accomplished. Now, I suppose that the Convention does not intend to leave the Constitution in such a shape that those sections shall be but a dead letter. I shall not enter at large into the objections made by some of the gentlemen to allowing the validity of an act of Assembly to be inquired into. The gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Gowen,) I think, has stated the objections with as much clearness, at least, as any other gentleman who has objected to the section. He raised the objection yesterday, that in any case on trial in a court, without any notice whatever, the question of the passage of an act of Assembly might be raised in a court, and the party sustaining the act be unprepared to meet it. Now, I think he made a mistake in that. I think there are two classes of cases in which the validity of an act of Assembly may be called in question in court; one of which is a case where a defect is apparent on the face of the act; there it need not be pleaded specially, but I suppose that in every case where a defect is not apparent on the face of the act it must be plead specially, and full notice given to that effect.

Mr. GOWEN. How in the case of a public statute? The rule of pleading, I think, is that a private statute, only, must be specially pleaded, and a public act need not be.

Mr. EWING. No, sir; not an objection that the law has not been passed. That very point has been decided in three or four cases in the State of New York, and I wish to call attention to those hereafter. The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowan) also says that a case may be decided one way in one county, and another way in another, until twenty decisions may have been obtained, each of different import. The same thing has occurred with regard to the interpretations of wills and many other cases, but they go up to the Supreme Court, and at last a decision arrived at, which generally settles the case, but not always. We have the Supreme Court, upon the very same act of Assembly, deciding one way at one time, and another way at another time. The same objection would apply equally to other litigated questions.

I wish to call the attention of members to what, in my opinion, would be the effect of striking out this section. We have passed different sections, in this same article, some of which are merely directory. Strike out this section and, I presume, that a bill passed in disregard of these provisions that are merely directory, would be good and valid, that it could not be inquired into unless specially provided that that shall be the case; otherwise if you strike out this section you destroy the life from those sections that are merely directory. I cannot agree with the positions taken by several of the gentlemen, that if you strike out this section the certificate of the Secretary of the Commonwealth that a bill has passed and has been signed by the Speakers of both Houses, and by the Governor, would be conclusive that the act was legally passed. I do not think that the provisions will bear that interpretation. Those in regard to the passage of an act of the Assembly, by a majority of all the members elected to each House, and those which require a different vote on some other matters, are practically copies of the New York Constitution on the same subject. We have no such provisions in our present Constitution, and consequently our courts very properly decided that the mode of the passage of a bill, and its validity, cannot be inquired into, or anything connected with its passage. So of the decisions spoken of by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Worrell,) as having been made in the United States court.

There is no such provision in the Constitutions in question, but in New York their Constitution of 1821 contains a provision of this nature, with regard to a series of acts, some of them for municipal corporations, some of them in regard to general tax laws, requiring a special vote, and the record of that vote on the Journals. The New York Constitution of 1846 provided that "no bill shall be passed unless by the assent of a majority of all the members elected to each branch of the Legislature, and the question upon the final passage shall be taken immediately upon its last reading, and the yeas and nays entered on the Journal." The same Constitution provides that "on the first passage of the question in either House of the Legislature, on any act which imposes, continues or revives a tax, or creates a debt or change, or makes, continues or renews any appropriation of public or trust money or property, or discharges or commutes any claim or demand of the State or county, shall be taken by yeas and nays, which shall be duly entered on the Journals, and three-fifths of all the members elected to either House shall in all such cases be necessary to constitute a quorum therein." There are numerous other provisions in the Constitution similar to that, requiring a three-fourths vote, if I recollect aright. Now, for fifty years the manner of the passage of these acts has been brought under the consideration of the New York courts from time to time, and I believe that it has been uniformly held that it must appear from the Journals that there was the requisite vote recorded there to pass it. And I have yet to hear from any person, or see it suggested in the report of any of these cases, that any evil has arisen from that being the constitutional law of New York. On the contrary, it appears to be a provision that suits them. I see that in the revised Constitution of 1867 they propose to leave in similar restrictions. It is true, as a gentleman behind me says, that that Constitution was voted down, but they had had provisions of that sort for fifty years. They had had decisions of their courts running through a long series of years. It had been a matter of discussion in courts and with the public, and it does not seem that any one thought of changing the provisions on the subject. I do not think, from the experience of New York, that we will find the great evils that some gentlemen imagine will arise, if in a case on trial in a court one of the parties is allowed to allege that one of the acts presented there was not properly passed, and provide for the proof.

In addition, I may say that the Supreme Court of New York have also decided, on a similar provision to this that we have already adopted, that the Journals are the evidence of this vote, and if the Journals show that the proper vote has been taken on the bill, then it has been properly passed so far as that vote is concerned. If the Journals do not show it, it has not been passed. We have the same provision, but a little stronger, in what we have already adopted here; and, for one, I would be very unwilling to leave that question so that it could not be tested in the court. I imagine one examination of the Journals would decide it. Probably the question would never again arise, and I think it a very safe provision. In regard to these sections which are merely directory, a very different question arises, and it may be that some better provision can be gotten up than this section under consideration; but it strikes me that to have no provision in regard to this would render these directory sections which we have already passed, almost entirely worthless. I would be entirely satisfied with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. J. W. F. White.) I think it would cover all that probably is necessary. My objection to the amendment offered by the other gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) is, that it weakens the force of the provision in regard to the vote that must be had for the passage of any bill. I would rather, so far as that section in regard to the final vote is concerned, that the whole section now under consideration should be voted down, because I think that without it, it would still be the rule that the journals must say, affirmatively, that the proper vote was had upon the bill, and that that question could be inquired into in a court, and besides, I think that it is making the certificate of the Governor have an effect that it should not have. It would require him to certify to facts not within his knowledge. I would prefer, if it has to come in that way, a certificate from the Speaker of each House attached to the bill, that the forms of legislation had been complied with.

MR. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: Before the gentleman (Mr. Ewing) takes his seat I would like to ask him one question upon this section. The gentleman seems to think that such matters as are merely directory are not covered by this section. The section reads thus: "Any bill passed in disregard of the provisions and directions." I would ask whether that word "directions" does not cover the directory clauses as well as any other?

MR. EWING. Mr. Chairman: The gentleman (Mr. Howard) misunderstood me. I did not say that the directory provisions were not covered by this section. I have no doubt that they are. I said that there were directory provisions in other sections, and that there were provisions which were mandatory, and that if this entire section was voted down and no substitute placed there for it, the mandatory provisions would be binding, and that a law passed in disregard of these would be invalidated and could be inquired into in the courts, but that a law passed in violation of the merely directory provisions could not be inquired into in the courts, if this section was voted down.

MR. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I beg the attention of the committee for a few moments, while I suggest what I think will meet their views; not that it exactly represents my own, but from the tone of debate while this section has been under consideration I think it will meet the views of a majority of the committee. That is, to recognize the broad division between the directory clauses of the Constitution, as we propose to frame it, and the other question, much graver and more extensive, that of the use of corrupt means to secure the passage of a law. I think the majority of this committee does not intend to hand over to the court the decision of the question, whether the directory clauses have or have not been literally complied with; but, on the other hand, I think that the majority of this committee is entirely prepared, is anxious, as well as willing, to allow any suitor to allege that his adversary bought the law under which he claims to deprive him of his rights.

If anybody in this Convention secures a decree, even of the highest court of the land, against his adversary, that decree may be impeached everywhere by the allegation that it was obtained by the use of corrupt and fraudulent means; and if, instead of going to the courts, or while in the courts, a litigant steals away to the State Capital and buys a law, then your courts of justice are dumb before that outrage and refuse to hear even the question whether any redress is due.

I trust, therefore, that the amendment to be proposed in time by the gentleman from York, (Mr. Cochran), which imposes upon the Secretary of the Commonwealth the duty of ascertaining, once for all, that the directory clauses of the Constitution have been complied with, will be adopted, for it is entirely true that we must, in framing this organic law, always bear in mind that other departments of the government are to be trusted to perform the duties that we devolve upon them, and surely if we make it an express constitutional duty of a constitutional officer to see that these directions are complied with, under the stringent and complete terms of the proposed amendment, we have done all that we ought to do before we clothe a law with the solemnity of a statute. Then if, after that, any person asserts that law and brings it into a court of justice, I trust we will insert a clause, substantially such as I have drawn, that when the validity of any law passed by the Legislature is questioned in any court of record, it shall be the duty of the judge of such court to investigate and decide, when required so to do, whether bribery or corruption was used to secure the passage of said bill; and if it shall be judicially established that bribery or corruption was so used, the said law shall be adjudged to be null and void, as to all persons claiming thereunder, who had or ought to have had knowledge of such bribery or corruption.

Certainly such a clause can do no harm. It is but simple justice. It is no longer singular for an adversary in a litigation to go to the Legislature and get a law which cuts away his opponent's rights of action; and though he may not approach the court with corrupt propositions, he may get his law by corrupt means, and the courts have decided that without express constitutional sanction they cannot inquire into the use of these corrupt means. Now, that does not affect every body. That does not affect investors, for instance, in gas companies, and in order to get the vote of my friend from Chester (Mr. Darlington) I will agree that gas companies shall not be affected by it, as he is a large owner of gas stock. [Laughter.]

MR. DARLINGTON. I want to ask the gentleman what he means by the clause he is about to submit to the committee. Whether in any private suit, civil or criminal, before a judge in a court, at the instance of either party, he means that judge must stop to inquire into these proceedings at Harrisburg?

MR. MACVEAGH. I mean this: That whenever a party in a suit presents now the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, even the decree of the Supreme Court of this Commonwealth, the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington) knows that he is at liberty to impeach it collaterally for fraud. That doctrine is, at least, as old as the Dutchess of Kingston's case, and is undoubted law; but if instead of getting a decree against him, his adversary has obtained the passage of a law against him, which has been done in repeated instances within the last half dozen years—done in cases in which I was myself concerned as counsel—he may not inquire whether that adversary bought the law. Now, I say I would not put an act of the Legislature on higher ground than the supreme and solemn judgment of your court of final judicature, because I do not think that, as a general rule, laws are passed with more consideration, or with greater regard to law and equity, than the decisions of your Supreme Court are attained. Even to-day the Legislature of this State is investigating whether a most vital and radical supplement to a law, changing its entire force, as I am told, was not affixed in the rooms of one of the clerks, never having been seen by the eye of more than a single member. I say it ought to be possible to investigate these matters, when a party claims under the law, and when you allege that he has, or ought to have had, knowledge of the corruption or the fraud. What rule of justice does it violate, or what rule of the common law does it impair? I grant that I would not put these questions of directory provisions before the courts of law. I think they belong to the political departments of the government, and I accept therefore, in the fullest spirit, the amendment that is to be proposed by the gentleman from York, (Mr. Cochran,) making it the duty of the Secretary of State to see that these provisions have been complied with, and therefore making the signature of the Governor final upon these questions; and I think that provision, if I am not mistaken, avoids many of the difficulties suggested by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen.)

MR. HOWARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

MR. MACVEAGH. Certainly, sir.

MR. HOWARD. I would ask the gentleman whether the fact that the Secretary of the Commonwealth shall ascertain that the forms of law have been complied with will make it any better than it will, if we say that it shall be the duty of the Governor himself, before he signs that bill, to ascertain that these forms have been complied with, and that, in his approval, he shall make it a part of his certificate.

MR. MACVEAGH. I do not object to making it the duty of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, or the Governor, if the gentleman prefers the latter officer, to go and examine these Journals. It seems to me more in harmony with the relative duties and dignities of these offices that the duty of going to the one House and the other, to inspect the Journals and to discover the methods by which a bill passed, should be imposed upon the Secretary of the Commonwealth. If gentlemen think that the Governor should be charged with the duty of going to the clerk's room of the House, and of the Senate, and from one body to another, and find whether these things have been done, they will move to substitute the Governor for the Secretary of the Commonwealth. But I think the gentleman from York (Mr. Cochran) was happy in the suggestion that this should be the express constitutional duty of the Secretary of the Commonwealth. I am quite willing that he should make a certificate to that effect as an officer. But the broad line of demarcation still remains, which I hope the committee will at least appreciate, even if they do not adopt, and I earnestly hope they will adopt it, to put the duty of seeing that there is a compliance with the directory provisions upon an officer of one of the political departments of the government, and to give every suitor affected by a rotten law an opportunity in a court of justice to prove its utter corruption and rottenness.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: I would like to ask the gentleman a single question before he takes his seat, and call his attention to what we propose to do in this matter. The gentleman has spoken of special legislation, and of acts that have been passed in special cases. I know that perfectly well. We propose, however, to provide against this kind of legislation by saying that no local or special bill shall be passed unless sixty days public notice of the intention shall be published in the locality where the matter or thing to be affected is situated.

Mr. MACVEAGH. The gentleman will remember that long ago I stated to the Convention, what I am sure other gentlemen who have had larger experience believe, that in correcting our evils by destroying special legislation we are, at least, five years behind the lobbyists. They, long since, have discovered that it was far easier to secure a corrupt end by general than by special laws, and many instances have occurred in which the worst and most corrupt laws have been general and not special.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman: I rise simply to express my concurrence with the proposition which has been offered by the gentleman from York (Mr. Cochran.) It certainly must be evident to this committee that we are getting very much at sea in the discussion of the present section of this article.

Now, I think we ought clearly to keep in view, as we proceed in the consideration of this section, that portion of the Constitution to which it expressly and particularly refers. Many of the propositions that have been suggested are purely and entirely matters that should be considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, in defining the duties, powers and jurisdiction of the courts.

There is another matter that ought not to be forgotten, and it is that the Convention has created a Committee on Constitutional Sanction. From that committee we expect some action that will harmonize the provisions of the Constitution which we shall adopt on the subject of sanction. I entirely agree with the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) that if a bill has been passed through the Legislature by corrupt means, it should be declared unconstitutional, but in our haste to cure these evils we should be careful before we insert in the Constitution a provision which affects materially the jurisdiction that ought to be prescribed and well defined between the legislative department and the judicial department. Now, the proposition of the gentleman from York (Mr. Cochran) is a simple, plain and proper one. It is that in these matters it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to inquire and examine into all bills passed by the Legislature, before they shall be signed by the Executive. This duty will constitute one of the most important functions of his office, and will prove a check upon the legislative department. This being evident, the amendment offered by the gentleman from York (Mr. Cochran) is very plainly and clearly within the scope of the duties of the Executive department. This far, I think, we can go in this article with perfect safety, but I submit anything further than that would be very dangerous in its effect. I rose, Mr. Chairman, simply for the purpose of expressing my concurrence in the provision contained in the amendment which has been offered.

Mr. HUNSICKER. Mr. Chairman: I desire to add a single word in condemnation of the section and in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard.) So far, I believe, there has been but one gentleman found courageous enough to defend the section, and that has been my valiant friend from Allegheny (Mr. Ewing.) An examination of the section will show this: There are thirty judicial districts in the State of Pennsylvania, and whenever the validity of an act of Assembly is questioned before any one of those tribunals the Journals of the Legislature shall be inspected. Now, suppose that some suitor alleges that the names appearing upon the Journal are forgeries? What, then, becomes of the question? It becomes, then, purely a question of fact, and the court wherein the act of Assembly is thus questioned directs a feigned issue to be tried by a jury, as in other cases. Then suppose the jury should find that the signatures on the Journals were forgeries? This would compel that court to declare the act void. Then suppose a similar issue was at the same time tried in another county, and the verdict should be the other way? In this latter case the court would be compelled to declare the act valid. Thus you would have two judgments equally binding, the one sustaining, the other annulling the act.

Then suppose, again, that both cases be removed to the Supreme Court of the State by writ of error. That court would review the records, and, not finding any error of law, for it does not review facts, would affirm both judgments. Thus we reach the anomaly of two decisions of the Supreme Court of the State—the highest judicial authority of the State—one declaring the act void, and the other declaring the act valid.

This seems to me quite sufficient to dispose of the section. That some mode securing the observance of the constitutional provisions by the Legislature is required, is undeniable.

Mr. EWING. I would like to ask the gentleman if he supposes a case of the kind to which he has referred, by which the Supreme Court of the State would both affirm and deny the validity of an act of the Legislature, could ever occur?

Mr. HUNSICKER. I was endeavoring to explain the anomaly which would be presented if such a case should ever arise. Suppose in one county the names upon the Journals were alleged to be forgeries, and that were to be a question of fact for the jury, and —

Mr. EWING. The gentleman does not appear to understand my question. It has been ruled, over and over again, in New York that the official Journals of the Legislature itself is conclusive evidence of the fact of the passage of an act.

Mr. HUNSICKER. I am very well aware of that fact; but the section under consideration does not so prescribe. Now, let me go one step further. I think I have made myself understood upon the point to which I referred. Whether I am right or wrong time will determine. Now, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) meets the whole question, and I think it should receive the support of the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) and of the gentleman from York (Mr. Cochran.) I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Dauphin to the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) reads as follows: "The Governor shall not give his approval to any bill until he shall have ascertained that all the forms of legislation, as prescribed in this article, have been observed in the passage of the same, and in his approval he shall so certify, and his certificate shall be conclusive evidence that all the forms prescribed have been observed."

Mr. MACVEAGH. The only difference between myself and the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) and the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Hunsicker) is, that I think this duty had better be imposed upon the Secretary of the Commonwealth, but of this I am not at all tenacious.

Mr. HUNSICKER. I suppose, then, we can consider you as a co-worker for this substitute?

Mr. MACVEAGH. In substance, yes.

Mr. HUNSICKER. I will now resume my remarks. You must trust somebody; why not the Governor? Have you any safeguards? You will have an iron-clad oath for the members of the Legislature, an iron-clad oath for the clerks, and an iron-clad oath for the Governor. Notwithstanding all these oaths, it is proposed to scrutinize every act of Assembly that is passed by that body, to see if all the forms prescribed have been observed, and, if I understand the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) aright, it is further proposed to try the questions of fact in courts whether the act was passed through corrupt means, or by undue influence. I would like to know whether legislation, under this kind of restriction, would amount to anything, and whether you would not be bothering the courts, from year to year, by trying questions of fact, as to whether these acts were corruptly passed or not, and thus keep the people in suspense. There must be an end somewhere to this kind of legislation in this Constitutional Convention, and I think we had better "endure the ills we suffer than to fly to others that we know not of." I trust the committee will consider the proposition that has been offered by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard.) It seems to me that by adopting this substitute we will make a Constitution that will not keep us in constant suspense and anxiety, until we shall be relieved by the final judicial judgment that an act of Assembly is valid, but will make an act valid and unquestionable so soon as it is certified and signed by the Governor. If any better mode can be devised, I shall be free to support it. This is the best yet offered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: The several provisions in this article regulating the passage of bills require a sanction, require that some means for their enforcement independent, of the Legislature, should be provided; but, sir, in my opinion the committee has reported a section which will be of very little value if it shall be agreed to by the Convention, and adopted by the people. A mere inspection of the Journals of the two Houses will, in almost every conceivable case, be quite insufficient to reach the evil aimed at, and to extirpate it from our legislative proceedings. Most commonly these frauds committed upon bills, and which eventually take the form of law, do not appear upon the Journals, and the Journals afford no means of detection. Let me illustrate: A bill, with a given title, is introduced into the House. The Journal shows that the House went into committee of the whole and amended the bill, and that it passed afterwards. The Journal of the Senate will show again that the Senate went into committee of the whole where amendments were made, and then passed the bill. The Journals might show further, that upon a conference between the two Houses the bill underwent further modification. That modification might certainly appear in the report of the committee on conference, but suppose a bill that has gone through the proceeding I have described is carried into the transcribing room on the last night of the session, and some transcribing clerk, or assistant, or the clerk to the committee to compare bills, is paid fifty or one hundred dollars by a party, to add a section to the bill. That section is simply added to or interjected into the transcribed copy, and goes to the office of the Secretary of Commonwealth, and inadvertently the Governor signs the bill. That, sir, has happened over and over again. It is the common, the accepted mode in which frauds in legislation are committed, and yet an inspection of the Journals of both Houses will not detect the fraud, and a provision that they shall be inspected is of no value whatever in a case of this kind.

Now, sir, I know the cases of two or three bills in which fraud was detected, not by the Journals of the two houses, but by going to the original manuscript bill, as introduced originally into one of the Houses, and to the proper bill which was sent from one House to the other, because thus you are able to find the original marks made by the clerks of the respective Houses upon all amendments when they are offered and when action upon them is had. In that manner, in the cases to which I have referred, we were able to ascertain that certain amendments had not gone at all through the hands of the principal clerks of the Senate and House, and yet they were foisted into those bills, which, being sent to the Governor and signed by him, became laws of the Commonwealth, and no power of this State was able to touch them, except the Legislature, at a subsequent session by repealing them, should strike them from the statute book. I remember my experience in one case where a fraud was detected. The repealing bill was passed through the Senate upon the showing of the original records of the two Houses, not the Journals, but the other records of the two Houses, and the bill was sent to the House of Representatives, and there there was a grave and earnest debate, and the repealing bill was manfully voted down. The law stands there yet upon the statute book; a law passed by a transcribing clerk of the House, and by no other authority whatever.

But I need not go over the history of sundry cases of that sort. There ought to be some section in our Constitution, not to render the two Houses honest in their observance of the principal forms, because they will be observed, but to protect the two Houses and the honest officers thereof, as well as the people of the State, from the introduction into our laws of enactments that never received the proper lawful assent.

But the Committee on Legislation have reported a section that all the courts in the Commonwealth shall set at work, at the pleasure of any party before them, to overhaul the proceedings of the Legislature. The courts in Greene, in Wayne, in Philadelphia, in Dauphin and in Northumberland, possibly all at work at one time, at one law, to test its validity. Why, sir, that will not do. It seems to me that, of all absurd propositions of amendment, of all remedies, this would be about the worst.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) has touched another subject which is not covered by this section, but which is more important than anything which this section covers—the case of a bill passed by fraud. These cases are not only possible, they are actual. We all rest under a moral conviction which is immovable—the conviction that laws are passed in this manner—and one of our principal efforts here should be to stop them hereafter, and yet, so far as I can discover, this long and elaborate article provides no remedy whatever.

My idea is this: That here, upon the face of the Constitution, you should place the provision that a party or an interest that obtains the passage of a law by corrupt means, or that expends one dollar corruptly to that end (whether the result is achieved by the corrupt means or not) shall take nothing by the enactment; that upon proof shown (you must have it judicially shown, you cannot investigate it in any other way) that a party or an interest has pledged or paid one dollar to take that which is a part of the sovereignty of this Commonwealth—because our laws are an emanation of the sovereignty—upon that showing the enactment, with reference to which the outlay has been made, shall be void. But, sir, I would not put all the courts of the Commonwealth in action to reach this object of purification and amendment. I would proceed by proper regulations. I would provide somewhat after the fashion of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington.) I would provide that within a certain time after the passage of a law, say one year after its publication, that it shall be the right of the people of the State, or of an officer of the State representing them, or of a certain number of citizens interested in the subject, to apply, if you choose, to the judges of the Supreme Court, or to one of them, and upon showing probable cause that a law was passed by corrupt means, or in violation of any of these provisions of the Constitution, that an investigation shall be ordered, the investigation to be regulated by statute, of course, that shall provide all the details necessary to a prompt, efficient, thorough and just prosecution of the investigation, and with complete power at the end of it for the court exercising the power of the people, to pronounce the enactment void, and to punish the parties concerned in its enactment, or order their prosecution in the proper courts of the Commonwealth.

I see nothing of all that, or anything like it, or looking to that end, on the face of this elaborate article reported by the Committee on Legislation. Of course now, in the midst of debate, it is not convenient for me, or for any one else to put ideas of this sort in form, and propose them to the committee of the whole. Therefore at present all that I can say is, that for reasons already given I shall vote against this section, thinking it unimportant and useless. A mere examination of the Journals of the two Houses would be of little account. And I shall also vote against the amendment to the section, which is subject to the same remarks, and open to the same objection. But if any gentleman will propose a proper section—

Mr. WOODWARD. There was one offered, which the Chairman ruled out of order at this time.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I am only speaking of what is before the committee. If any proposition shall be presented, looking to the objects of which I have spoken, I shall most cheerfully support it, both now and when the article shall be upon second reading.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I simply desire to suggest to the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) that, as he and I seem to be in thorough accord about the end we desire to reach, I shall not be tenacious of the method. I do not see the wisdom of requiring the opponents of a corrupt measure, the parties who are to suffer from it, to take the burden of attack upon them before they know it is to be used against them. Nor, on the other hand, do I see the justice of including in the consequences parties who have been wholly innocent.

The section I propose has no limitation as to time, because it is, in my judgment, indispensable that whenever a corrupt law presents itself anywhere then the right should exist to strike it anywhere. But I protect the rights of all persons who are presumed not to have knowledge of the corrupt means which have procured its passage.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I was not arguing the proposition stated by me. I was simply stating it. The reasons why a limitation of time should be imposed in the Constitution, or in a statute passed under it, is a matter that will properly arise when we have that proposition before us. But I will suggest one thing: A vast number of private rights may grow up under a statute in the course of a few years; a vast amount of money may be invested under it, and it would be extremely inconvenient, after the lapse of any considerable period of time, to permit the statute, and everything that has taken place under it, to be declared void.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: Before the gentleman from Columbia takes his seat, I wish to call his attention to the substitute which the chair ruled out of order. I am so struck with his views of this whole subject that when he tells me he did not hear the amendment which the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer) submitted to the Chair, I would like to have that amendment read for information, that the gentleman from Columbia may see if it does not exactly meet his views.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute will be read for information.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION —. Whenever in any judicial proceedings either party shall claim, under or by virtue of any act of Assembly, and the other party, upon proper affidavit, shall allege that such act of Assembly was passed in disregard of the provisions and directions prescribed in this article, or by fraud, bribery or undue means, and the court before which such judicial proceeding is pending shall be satisfied, primo facie, that such allegations are well founded, it shall be the duty of the said court to order a feigned issue to be framed under the direction of the Attorney General upon proper pleadings, in which the Commonwealth, upon relation of the party in interest, shall be plaintiff, and the party claiming under such act of Assembly defendant, to try the truth of the allegations in said affidavit contained and the validity of such act of Assembly; and the said issue shall be certified to the Supreme Court and tried by one of the judges thereof, in whatever county he may direct; and if it shall appear to the court and jury upon such trial that all the provisions of legislation in both Houses, as hereinbefore prescribed, have not been substantially observed in the passage of said act, or that the same has been procured by bribery, fraud or undue means, such act of Assembly shall be adjudged null and void, either party to have the right to a writ of error as in other cases.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: Nearly every gentleman who has spoken upon this section; I believe every gentleman with one exception, has admitted the necessity of some such provision in the Constitution as the one reported. True, they are not satisfied with this section, and no two gentlemen who have proposed amendments are agreed as to what shall be substituted in place of the section reported by the Committee on Legislation. No two gentlemen agree as to the precise form of the remedy. Now, sir, this clearly indicates the difficulty which the Committee on Legislation had to agree upon this section, and it seems to me, with great deference, to the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) that a portion, at least, of this section ought to be agreed upon by this committee of the whole. That will preserve the principle, that if the forms of legislation required by this article are not complied with, a bill shall be void. I think nearly all of the gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject are agreed upon that.

We have in previous sections said that no bill shall become a law unless it has been read three times on three separate days. Now, that is a mere declaration, and under the construction which has been given by the courts it will not be valuable without the operation of the twenty-fifth section; and I ask the members of this committee, before they vote down this section, to consider of what value are the requirements that we have made in previous sections without this declaration that a bill passed in disregard of them shall be void. So much of this section, I trust, this committee will endorse. If it shall stop at the second line, at the word "void," for one, I am satisfied, for that covers the whole principle of the section; and let me ask you if we ought not to assert so much that "no bill passed in disregard of the provisions and directions prescribed in this article shall be valid." If we are agreed upon that let us say so this morning, and when the article comes up on second reading, if more is required, there can be a consultation and agreement as to what more is needed. Let us say that much; that will be an assertion of the principle that we intend to put into this Constitution, a provision that will enforce these requirements.

If we accept the statement made by the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) that it has come to be the common practice that some of the most important provisions of law in this Commonwealth have been passed in the transcribing room, and under the construction of the courts there is no remedy whatever, then this section is a necessity. A bill is now upon the statute books, affecting vitally the interests of this Commonwealth, passed in the transcribing room, and with this fact staring us in the face, shall we hesitate to provide a remedy? The section under discussion will furnish a remedy.

for the gross outrages which have been described by the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew.)

I am satisfied, with the adoption of two lines, additional requirements can be provided before this Constitution shall be passed upon by the Convention, and it is very easy to add the other idea insisted upon by the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) and the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) that fraud shall also vitiate the passage of the bill. It will require but a simple amendment to insert that in this same provision. "Any bill passed in disregard of the provisions and directions composed in this article, or that shall have been procured by fraud, shall be void," will assert the principle, and the method of the remedy can be taken care of afterwards.

I trust, therefore, that the principle asserted in this section will be passed upon by the committee, and to enable us to do that without injuring the principle of the section, I hope all the amendments will be voted down; then we can come to the square issue of whether we shall provide a remedy for the outrages that have been committed upon the people of this Commonwealth, by injecting into a bill sections that never were passed. It seems to me there is no difficulty whatever of asserting this principle, this morning, in this section, without encumbering or prejudicing, in any way, the remedies that are sought to be provided for.

MR. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I do not intend to occupy at any great length the time of the committee. It is evident to every person that this discussion has taken a very wide range. The section reported is not intended to cover all the propositions here made. All that was intended by the section was to provide for the enforcement of previous sections reported by the committee, and which have been adopted by the committee of the whole. Now, I am not very particular myself about the wording of the section as it is here. I am perfectly willing to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. White.) I am willing to adopt his proposition, strike out all after the word "affect," and add as he proposes. There has been much said about the Legislature, and about corruption. Now, for my own part, I think there are but few members of the Legislature who have been corrupt, either in the present or past Legislatures; but one thing in legislation has enabled a bare majority of a quorum to pass bills; consequently many members do not vote, and bills are passed by probably a little over one-fourth of the House. Corruption in instances of that kind has a large power, and is enabled to pass very iniquitous laws. We have provided in a section adopted by the committee that laws shall only be passed by a majority of the members elected to each House. Now, there is an evident necessity that this provision of the Constitution shall be enforced. If it is merely directory and not obligatory, and laws are to be held of full force and effect as they have been heretofore, merely because they are enrolled, the necessary consequence will be that this provision will be of no effect whatever.

The section as reported is not intended to cover the case of bills or laws passed by fraudulent means; the section covers only the other sections reported by the committee, and is intended to enforce those provisions. As to corrupt legislation, if a remedy is needed, it is left to the Committee on Constitutional Sanction, and it will be sufficient, Mr. Chairman, when that committee reports for us to discuss these questions with reference to what sections or provisions will be necessary in the Constitution in order to meet fraudulent and corrupt legislation.

I ask the committee now, at least, to put some provision here, and in this place, so as to enforce the different sections that already have been adopted by the committee of the whole with reference to legislation; and if you do not do it, and leave them merely as directory, they will be of no avail and of no benefit.

Objection has been made that this will lead to difficulty. I confess, for myself, I do not see it. The Journals of the Houses are written evidence. Why those Journals should not be resorted to, in order to determine whether the provisions of this article have been complied with, I cannot perceive. The section does not propose to go outside, and to admit parole evidence. It allows, where a bill is enrolled, and where it has received the signatures of the officers of each House and of the Governor, that you may go to the Journals for the purpose of seeing whether the provision, with reference to a majority of members elected to each House voting in its favor, has been complied with, and also as to the other provisions adopted with reference to hasty legislation. Now, if there is not something adopted so as to enforce those several provisions with reference to legislation, all our work, thus far, on this article has been of no effect whatever.

Mr. ALRICKS. Mr. Chairman: It is admitted by every member of this committee that wherever the constitutionality of the law is to be tested, it must be before the proper court, and that the proper law officer of the Commonwealth must be employed for the purpose of investigating the matter. There is only one thing that has escaped the attention of the gentleman who offered this amendment, and that is this, that all our statutes are to the effect that wherever proceedings are to be commenced at the suit of the Commonwealth, they are to be commenced in the county court in which the capital is located. I, therefore, propose an addition to the amendment that has been offered by the gentleman from Luzerne, (Mr. H. W. Palmer,) directing the proceedings to be commenced in that court. I do not know whether it is in order here to move to strike out the amendments that are before the Chair and offer a substitute. That is the rule, I believe, in our national Congress. I submit to the Chairman whether it is in order or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send up his amendment to the desk, as the Chair cannot decide whether it is in order or not, without seeing it.

The CLERK read:

"On a petition, in writing, made under oath or affirmation by a party interested, to the Attorney General, representing that the said alleged act of Assembly was invalid or fraudulently enacted, it shall be the duty of said law officer of the Commonwealth, who may have private counsel associated with him, to sue a writ of scire facias out of the court of common pleas of Dauphin county to determine the validity of said reputed statute, and any parties who would be benefited by said alleged law shall be made defendants."

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order at this time. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard.) It will be read.

The CLERK read:

"The Governor shall not give his approval to any bill, until he shall have ascertained that all the forms of legislation prescribed in this article have been observed in the passage of the same, and in his approval he shall so certify, and his certificate shall be conclusive that all the forms prescribed have been observed."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment properly in order will be the one proposed by the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer.)

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: I move the adoption of that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The CLERK read:

"Whenever in any judicial proceedings either party shall claim, under or by virtue of any act of Assembly, and the other party, upon proper affidavit, shall allege that such act of Assembly was passed in disregard of the provisions and directions prescribed in this article, or by fraud, bribery, or undue means, and the court before which such judicial proceeding is pending shall be satisfied prima facie that such allegations are well founded, it shall be the duty of the said court to order a feigned issue to be framed under the direction of the Attorney General, upon proper pleadings in which the Commonwealth upon relation of the party in interest shall be the plaintiff, and the party claiming under such act of Assembly defendant, to try the truth of the allegation in said affidavit contained, and the validity of such act of Assembly, and the said issue shall be certified to the Supreme Court, and tried by one of the judges thereof in whatever county he may direct; and if it shall appear to the court and jury, upon such trial, that all the provisions of legislation in both Houses, as hereinbefore prescribed, have not been substantially observed in the passage of said act, or that the same has been procured by bribery, fraud, or undue means, such act of Assembly shall be adjudged null and void, either party to have the right to a writ of error, as in other cases."

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I arise to support that amendment.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Will the gentleman permit me to offer an amendment?

Mr. WOODWARD. Certainly.

The CLERK read the amendment as follows:

Strike out the words, "in disregard of the provisions and directions prescribed by this article."

Mr. WOODWARD. I am authorized by the gentleman from Luzerne, (Mr. H. W. Palmer,) who moved this amendment, to accept this modification. It has been agreed on all hands that there is need for a constitutional provision on this subject, and that the report of the committee is entirely inadequate to meet that need. I believe that those two things are conceded by almost every gentleman who has addressed the Chair this morning. Then it comes down to the question of modes. Well, sir, some of the modes which have been suggested are impracticable. For instance, the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Worrell) proposes that, in case of the doubt of the validity of an act of the Assembly, the Attorney General may issue a scire facias to try the validity of that act of the Assembly. That, as a remedy, I think is entirely inadequate. In the first place, a scire facias is not adapted exactly to the question that we have to try, and, in the next place, the authority of the Attorney General to move in the matter would involve all the political considerations that might be touched by the act of the Assembly, and he would, or would not, act just according to his views of the political interest of the party to which he belongs.

What is wanted, sir, is this: When in any judicial proceeding, in any court of justice, one of these purchased acts of Assembly which the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) explains so well, is produced, and the party stands in that court of justice, claiming under the corrupt act of Assembly, some judicial power in this Commonwealth should be able to determine whether that act of the Assembly is a law or not. Some judicial power should determine the question. It is not a political question; it becomes a judicial question instantly. If the question is the constitutionality of the law, it certainly is a judicial question. If the question is whether it was obtained by bribery and corruption, it is a judicial question because fraud vitiates all things, and this question of fact ought to be tried by a jury under the direction of a court of justice. Now, according to the law of Pennsylvania, fraud vitiates all things, except an act of Assembly. It does not vitiate that, for in the Commonwealth against Biddis, reported, I think, in the sixth Binney, you will find it decided by the Supreme Court, that these blue covered pamphlet laws which are distributed all over the Commonwealth are the evidence of the statutes of the State. The courts receive those blue covered pamphlets as final and conclusive evidence upon the question of what is statute law of Pennsylvania and what is not.

Now, when a gentleman goes into a court of justice with one of those sickly looking pamphlets under his arm, there is no judicial power in Pennsylvania that can apply the principle which can be applied to a decree or a judgment of any court of justice, or to a deed or a mortgage, or a will or any other instrument or writing, to wit, that fraud vitiates everything. It is immaculate, sir, and the most infamous wrongs and frauds have been perpetrated, and courts of justice have felt themselves degraded in being made the instruments of carrying out those frauds, when they have moral convictions upon the subject that are just as clear as a demonstration of Euclid, but have no power. Now, sir, I propose to give them the power, and if this Convention allows this opportunity to go by without planting in the Constitution somewhere an efficient remedy for this evil, why, sir, we make ourselves parties to these enormous wrongs for all time to come.

The Supreme Court of the United States decided in Fletcher vs. Peck, that the validity of a statute law cannot be drawn into question collaterally, and if it can be passed upon by the judiciary at all, it can only be at the suit of the Commonwealth, and that I understand to be the law of the Supreme Court of the United States to this day, and therefore all these palliatives which gentlemen suggest in the form of amendments, if they were to be adopted, would not prove worth the paper they are written on, because the Supreme Court of the United States would hold them to be unconstitutional. We can no more violate the Constitution of the United States by constitutional provisions of this State, than we can by an act of the Legislature of this State. Now, we must meet these objections. We must provide a mode in which the Commonwealth shall be the party, and in which the inquiry shall be a direct inquiry, and not a collateral one. This amendment, sir, is drawn to meet all these conditions. I do not know whether other gentlemen were impressed as I was, but my friend who sits behind me, (Mr. Buckalew,) and who told me that he had not seen or heard of this amendment, and yet his clear and logical mind, in discussing this subject, and presenting it to our consideration, presented every single point that is in that amendment. The only one about which he suggests any doubts, is that there shall be some time limited, within which judicial inquiry should take place. Now, to his mind, that amendment had not suggested any ideas at all, because he had not heard it, and yet his mind, drawn ent on this subject, resulted precisely in that amendment, with the exception of the limitation of time. I have suggested to him since, privately, that it would not do to limit the time of this inquiry, because the moment that you do that the rogue will not institute his judicial proceedings, until that time has expired, and then investigation would be shut out, and hence there ought to be no limitations in favor of fraud. There are none now, and we ought to put none into this Constitution.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Will the gentleman allow another suggestion?

Mr. WOODWARD. Certainly.

Mr. MACVEAGH. I desire to have his judgment, in reference to this proviso, and I ask the attention of the committee while I read it: "Provided, That no rights shall be impaired, which shall theretofore have been acquired by fraud, of said act or , in good faith, and for a valuable consideration."

Mr. WOODWARD. I do not know that I have any particular objection to that. Here we are brought face to face with this great subject, and we have had no graver question before us since we met. Now, shall we meet it and plant in the Constitution a remedy for it? Everybody seems to be agreed that we ought. What shall that remedy be? I tell you it must be a remedy in which the Commonwealth is a party, and in which the proceeding is a direct and not a collateral proceeding. The amendment which I am supporting meets both those points. I do not, at present, see that the proviso of the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. MacVeagh) would impair the force of this amendment, but I would rather that he would offer it as an amendment to the amendment. If there is any better way, sir, of obtaining this end that we all have in view, I am ready to embrace it when any gentleman points it out. I am ready to travel any better road if any gentleman will show a better. But what I beg of gentlemen, is to bear in mind all the necessary conditions of the case.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WOODWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Suppose a law of public nature is passed by corrupt means, which might be done, and rights are vested in good-faith under it, should there be no limitation as to the time that the Commonwealth should seek to avoid the law?

Mr. WOODWARD. The amendment provides, that in any judicial proceeding the party claiming under any act of Assembly, be it a public law or a private law, goes into court to claim any rights under it, that act of Assembly is open to this inquiry.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: Does the gentleman contend that private rights, vested in good faith under a public law, ought to be in any case divested by the fraud in the passage of the law?

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I do not see that that question belongs to this subject. If private rights have vested, undoubtedly they cannot be divested. The courts will be very careful not to divest them. But I do not see that that touches the question that is now before the committee of the whole, which is a remedy for purchased and bribed legislation.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: If the gentleman from Philadelphia will allow me to make a suggestion, he does not appear to see the point of the inquiry of the gentleman from Chester. Suppose a bill incorporating a company is passed by fraud, or suppose any other bill be so passed, and then innocent parties have acquired property under the conditions of that bill, by purchasing shares of stock or anything else. Now, subsequent investigation, under this provision as it now stands, may establish this fraud in the passage of the bill, and the bill may be declared null and void, and all the rights acquired by innocent parties, without any knowledge of the fraud, will fall with it. That is not intended, certainly. The rights of purchasers who have acquired property without knowledge of fraud are not to be affected.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: What I meant to inquire was this: Whether the gentleman proposes to invest any court with authority to declare a public law void under which private rights may have vested, because some individual interested in getting the public law through may have had a hand in corrupting and bribing the Legislature to get it?

Mr. WOODWARD. Well, sir, I do not still see that the question is applicable here. Either an act of Assembly obtained by bribery or corruption is to be sustained, or it is to be defeated. If you can prevent an investigation and a defeat by issuing a bond or certificate of stock to somebody, and calling that a vested right, why then we are in the hands of the Philistines, and still have no remedy.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman; Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WOODWARD. Certainly. I believe in interlocutory discussions.

Mr. BROOMALL. Suppose the law of descent of real estate should be changed by improper means, or by some means in violation of the provisions of this act, and the matter had run on for twenty years before it was inquired into. Would the gentleman declare that law void, and divest the titles of all the persons who were claiming real estate under it?

Mr. WOODWARD. Certainly not.

Mr. BROOMALL. Yet the provisions of that section would go that far.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Not with my proviso.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: When we are attempting to restrain wrong, we must be very careful that we do no wrong. Nobody desires to do any wrong. Vested rights are not to be divested.

Mr. BROOMALL. That may be, but if a law is void it is void from the beginning.

Mr. WOODWARD. Well, then, if that is the condition to which this discussion must reduce the advocates of the amendment, then I accept it, and I say that there is no time that sanctifies a fraud. There is no statute of limitations in behalf of fraud, and in the case of Jackson vs. Summerville, with which the legal gentlemen are familiar, a fraud of, I believe, more than twenty years old, certainly a very venerable one, was ripped up from stem to stern, and a valuable estate, supposed to belong to Mr. Jackson, to wit, the town of Gaysport, was delivered over to its proper owner, Summerville.

Mr. RUSSELL. Jackson had notice of the fraud.

Mr. WOODWARD. I do not know that, but it made no difference. The Supreme Court decided it was immaterial whether he had notice or not. They decided that it was immaterial what consideration had been paid. They placed themselves upon the broad moral ground that fraud vitiates anything it touches, and vitiates it forever.

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Was not that case of Jackson and Summerville afterward over-ruled by the case of Pearsol and Chapin, from Elk county?

Mr. WOODWARD. I was not aware of that; I have heard the case of Jackson and Summerville cited in the Supreme Court this very week as good authority, and I have heard no judge of the Supreme Court except to it. I admit that it was a very rank case. It was a case in which violent remedies were needed, but the court did not hesitate to apply them. They did not talk as gentlemen do here about vested rights. There can be no vested rights under a vile fraud.

Mr. Chairman, I do not presume that the extreme case put by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) ought to scare anybody from supporting this amendment. If extreme cases are arguments you can imagine any sort of cases; but the principle on which I plant myself is that this is a fraud of the most grievous and iniquitous character. It cannot be sanctified by time nor by the issuing of a certificate of stock to some convenient friend and calling that a vested right, and therefore, in any judicial proceeding that may arise, it is a question for the courts to investigate the validity of that law.

Mr. CORBETT. Can you inquire into fraud, even into actual fraud, after twenty-one years? Did not the case of Kribbs and Downing settle that? If over twenty-one years it is presumed to be right.

Mr. WOODWARD. I cannot speak about the case to which the gentleman from Clarion alludes, because it is not in my mind.

Mr. CORBETT. I think your Honor was on the bench.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman: I do not think there is any statute of limitations in Pennsylvania in favor of fraud. I am not aware of any. I do know that the most solemn judicial record may be impeached for fraud. I could name an instance of that. I do not know how old it was, but it was after some time had gone by. Judge Read, at nisi prius, decided that an issue should be formed to try the validity of a previous judgment on the alleged ground of fraud. That issue came on for trial before another judge at nisi prius, and the fraud was sustained and found and the whole proceeding was set aside. That has been the course of the judicial proceedings in these cases. The judiciary have tried to confine everything to this maxim, that "fraud vitiates everything it touches." We have got to trust this thing to the judiciary by a direct open inquiry or else let it remain as it is. However, Mr. Chairman, I have been led to say more than I intended by these questions addressed to me, and I leave the subject.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I do not know whether this debate has arisen out of the resolution which I introduced into the committee some weeks ago or not. Several weeks ago I offered the following proposition, to be found, No. 270, in the volume of amendments and propositions, presented to the Convention, or suggestions made in committee, page 143:

"No act of Assembly passed in violation of the foregoing provisions, or which shall have been procured by bribery, fraud or corruption shall have the force and effect of law. The Supreme Court shall prescribe by general rules the method of investigating and ascertaining whether any act of Assembly is invalid by reason of bribery, fraud or corruption used to procure its passage or by reason of a failure to observe the requirements of the Constitution in its passage."

I introduced that proposition and it was referred to the Judiciary Committee, from which committee no report has yet been made. It seems to me that the subject belongs very properly to the province of that committee, and that, perhaps, it were better to dispense with action upon it here until that committee, to which the subject was specially referred, make its report.

I will venture to state to this committee of the whole why I introduced that proposition. I had just returned from arguing, in the court of Chancery of New Jersey, a question of that character. There a bill had been introduced into the Legislature of New Jersey to incorporate what was called the Stanhope railroad company, to build a short line of railroad, seven miles long, from the base of the Wallkill mountain to Lake Hopatcong, in the northern part of New Jersey. The bill was printed in two forms. In the one form it was a bill which simply provided for what I have just stated. Two copies were printed, however, in another form, and in these two copies there was inserted, under the name of an addition to the eighth section, a clause which, it was contended, transformed the Stanhope railroad company into a corporation, with the right to build a through line of railroad between New York and Philadelphia.

The clerks of the Legislature were taken into the conspiracy. On the desk of each member was laid the truly printed bill. The clerks of the House and of the Senate held in their hands the bill with the fraudulent section, and when they read the bill they read only the portion which corresponded with the printed bill on the tables of the members. Thus it passed both branches, and the bill was certified by the committee to compare bills. The page containing the real eighth section was then slipped out, and a page containing the fraudulent copy slipped in, and the certified copy taken to the Governor, and a gentleman who was interested in this fraud, carrying the bill to the Governor for his signature, represented it as a very harmless bill, benefiting only the people of his region of the State. The Governor asked if it had been compared, and he said no, but it could be compared then. The true bill was given to his clerk, and the false bill retained by this gentleman, who read it, omitting this fraudulent section, and then the Governor signed it. It was taken to the Rolls office of the Commonwealth, and a certified copy taken, and then, in this litigation, it was held high up before the court that the fraud, though substantially admitted, could not be remedied. The answer made to the counsel was, how do you propose to remedy it? Do you propose to go behind the great seal of the State, which declares this bill to be a genuine bill? How will you get redress? That was one of the great questions of that cause, and it was after the argument of that case that I offered this proposition here.

Now, that fraudlike this one proved in New Jersey could be possible in our Legislature, of course none of us could endure the thought of for a moment. That it is the high duty of this Convention to provide some method by which it shall be prevented, is equally clear. What that method shall be is the question. The principal objection to the one under consideration in the committee is, that it seems too long and cumbersome, and I think that if the committee would vote it down that a substitute of this character might reach the evil:

"No act of Assembly passed in violation of the foregoing provisions, or which shall have been procured by bribery, fraud or corruption, shall have the force and effect of law. The Supreme Court shall prescribe, by general rules, the method of investigating and ascertaining whether any act of Assembly is invalid by reason of bribery, fraud or corruption used to procure its passage, or by reason of a failure to observe the requirements of the Constitution in its passage."

I would move this as a substitute for the article under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot move it as a substitute now. There is an amendment to the amendment pending.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman: I think we are not doing exact justice to the Committee on Legislation, nor yet are we doing justice to ourselves in passing, if we should pass at this point, the different amendments, or any one of them, touching the question of fraud. The clause that is now under consideration, section thirty-five, is exclusively confined to the forms pointed out in the preceding section. It begins: "Any bill passed in disregard of the provisions and directions prescribed in this article shall be void."

Now, what we want is a substitute for that, for I agree with every gentleman who has spoken here, that in its present shape it ought not to pass. What we want is a provision by which it is to be ascertained that all the forms required in order to pass a bill or resolution have been complied with.

It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from York (Mr. Cochran) more nearly approaches that than any that has been offered. Perhaps that of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard) is as good. But what we are after now, Mr. Chairman, is to see that all the matters of form have been complied with, and that, too, not after the bill has been signed by the Governor, and enrolled and become what we call a law, but before it is signed, before it is enrolled, in order that the general public may know that the forms of legislation have been complied with. Then when that is provided for, the bill is signed by the Governor, and is enrolled and becomes a law. We are to treat it, so far as the form is concerned, as an act of Assembly.

It is another question, and an essentially different question, and a more important one than that which is agitated by the amendment now before us. Let us pass either the amendment offered by the gentleman from York, or the amendment offered by the gentleman from Allegheny.

Mr. MACVEAGH. That has been voted down.

Mr. WALKER. Then the amendment offered by the gentleman from York, providing that the requisites to legislation have been complied with. And when that is done, let the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer) introduce his resolution as to fraud. There is no gentleman in this body, I presume, that will not go to every extent to root up and kill every possibility of fraud being practiced upon the Legislature. But we do not want, Mr. Chairman, and that is what I am speaking about now; we do not want to mix up that question with the question that is presented by the Committee on Legislation. That is a question of fraud. Now, sir, every gentleman has his own panacea, and I have one myself. I do not think that it is any better than that of the gentleman from York, but every one is fond of his own child.

This is what I would propose: "It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, when a bill or resolution is presented to the Governor for his approval, to inspect the Journals of each House, and if the Journals say that all the forms have not been complied with, and that fact is so certified by the Secretary to the Governor, then he shall withhold his approval. But if the Secretary certifies that all the forms have been complied with, and the Governor approves the same, it is enrolled, and its enrollment shall be conclusive that all the forms of legislation have been complied with." I think this is substantially the same as that of the gentleman from York. Now, do not let us, Mr. Chairman, do injustice to the Committee on Legislation. Do not let us say that they are providing against fraud when that is a subject matter that they may yet have to act upon. It is important that the public shall know, and know before the Governor puts his signature to a bill, before it is enrolled, that all the forms have been complied with. When that is done, then for all purposes of form it is a law. But if outside of that there is fraud, guard against that by the section of the gentleman from Luzerne, drawn with just care enough as is necessary to reach and cut up the fraud.

In my judgment this is the way we ought to dispose of this question. Let us now vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Luzerne, that is before the Convention, not with a view to kill it, not with the view that the opinion of this committee is against it, but because it is not now in its place. Then offer it immediately after as an additional clause, and I shall most cheerfully and heartily sustain it.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: I am quite satisfied that the proposition of the gentleman from Erie (Mr. Walker) is the correct one, and for the purpose of carrying out his ideas I desire to withdraw this section, for the purpose of allowing the section reported by the Committee on Legislation to be voted upon. I see that there are two propositions contained in this section. One is a matter of form, and the other a matter of substance. Now, as mine is one of substance and not of form, and as I am satisfied that there must be some additional safeguards thrown around the matter of form, I will withdraw the proposition for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Luzerne withdraws his proposition.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman: I move the following as an amendment:

"It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, whenever any bill requiring the signature of the Governor shall be presented to him, to inspect the Journals of both Houses of the General Assembly, and if it appears thereon that all the forms of legislation in both Houses, as hereinbefore prescribed, have been observed in the passage of such bills, he shall so certify thereon to the Governor; but if it shall not so appear, the Secretary shall so certify in like manner, and the bill shall not receive the Executive approval or signature, but shall be returned to the House in which it originated, accompanied by a statement of the reasons which induced its return, and shall not become a law unless it shall thereafter be passed through all the requisite forms of legislation, and be approved, as in other cases, by the Governor, whose approval shall be conclusive that said act has passed through all the required forms of legislation."

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: I suggest to the gentleman from York, (Mr. Cochran,) that he modify his amendment in a small particular. After the words which have fallen from the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) this morning, it is clear that frauds in legislation, or in passing bills through the Legislature, get beyond the Journal. In order to reach them we must get at the manuscript bills. The modification that I suggest to the gentleman from York is, that he include in his amendment, "manuscript bills."

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman: I wish simply to state, in reply to the gentleman from Carbon, (Mr. Lilly,) that this section provides that when it does not appear on the Journal that everything necessary to be done has been complied with, the Governor shall not sign the bill. Now, if there is a section inserted in that bill, surreptitiously or otherwise, and it does not appear on the Journal, then the Governor is not to sign it, but to return it. The very fact that it does not appear on the Journal is the reason why it shall be returned.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman: That is all right, as far as it goes. The Journals, we all know, are matters of public record, but this amendment does not reach the evil described by the gentleman from Columbia. The fraudulent insertion may appear on the Journal when it would not appear on the original bill.

Mr. MACVEAGH. The Journal is to be read as a protection.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. A substitute cannot be offered at this time. When the section is before the House it is competent for any gentleman to move a substitute, which is to strike out the section and insert; but if an amendment is pending a substitute cannot be offered to the amendment. An amendment to the amendment will be in order, but not a substitute.

Mr. WALKER. What I propose is not an amendment, but another substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order at this time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I ask that it be read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to read it for information, and the Clerk will read the substitute.

The CLERK read as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, when a bill or resolution is presented to the Governor for his approval, to inspect the Journals of each House, and if the Journals say that all the forms have not been complied with, and that fact is so certified by the Secretary to the Governor, then he shall withhold his approval. But if the Secretary certifies that all the forms have been complied with, and the Governor approves the same, it is enrolled, and its enrollment shall be conclusive that all the forms of legislation have been complied with."

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I have but a very few words more to say. Our government is one of distributed powers, and the true philosophy, I suppose, in framing a Constitution, would require us to see that those powers are not encroached upon, but are kept separate. My objection to the pending amendment is, that it takes away from judicial inquiry that which comes properly within the range of judicial inquiry. It puts it in the power of the subordinate bodies, wherever they may charge fraud against the passage of an act of Assembly, to take wholly out of the reach of judicial inquiry that which is a legitimate subject for such investigation and inquiry. If it can become apparent to the sense of every man who opens the Journal that the requirements of the Constitution have not been complied with, then a fraudulent and bribed clerk, certifying that this has been done according to these provisions, will forever remove the whole thing from the possibility of investigation.

I am not willing to do that, for two reasons:

First, because it is taking away from the judiciary a power that properly belongs to them; and second, because it is depositing with a subordinate clerk a power that I am not willing to deposit with him, where it may, under any circumstance, be a subject of criticism and dispute.

It is not in order for me at this time to offer an amendment, but I will read, as part of my remarks, what seems to me to cover the ground in this case entirely:

"No act of Assembly passed in violation of the foregoing provisions, or which shall have been procured by bribery, fraud or corruption, shall have the force and effect of law. The Supreme Court shall prescribe by general rules the method of investigating and ascertaining whether any act of Assembly is invalid by reason of bribery, fraud or corruption, used to procure its passage, or by reason of a failure to observe the requirement of the Constitution in its passage."

That is putting the whole subject just where it belongs, in a system of government like ours, namely, in the hands of our judiciary, and it is not permitted to a clerk, a mere subordinate who may be bribed or mistaken, by his certificate, to over-ride the whole justice of the case, and counteract the common sense and fair intelligence of all the people of the State. It is putting it in the hands of the judiciary, where it ought to rest, and I propose, if the record assumes a shape to permit me, to offer it as an amendment at some future time.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I trust the committee will adhere to the distinction which seems to be generally adopted, that is, of putting these directory provisions where the gentleman from York (Mr. Cochran) proposes to put them.

I dissent from the doctrine of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler.) I do not think it was ever a judicial question, whether the preliminary forms of legislation have been complied with, and I think we have to trust the legislative and Executive branches of the government with these preliminary matters. We cannot attack the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction because of irregularities in the decision. You can, however, go to the root of it for fraud, bribery and undue means. Let us preserve this doctrine and treat the legislative branch of the government, reformed and purified as we hope it will be, with the respect that is due to a co-ordinate branch of the State government.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I agree with the gentleman from Dauphin (Mr. McVeagh) that we should treat the two subjects separately. With that view, the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer) withdrew his amendment relating to the general question of fraud in the passage of bills. But this amendment seems to me to be defective.

I do not understand what the Governor is to do with the bill in case the requirements of this article should not be complied with. I take it for granted he can only veto it. He cannot certainly pocket it, although the amendment makes no provision in that regard.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Yes, it makes a provision that he is to return it with his reasons.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Well, he has to veto the bill, and then suppose they pass it by a two-thirds vote?

Mr. MACVEAGH. No, but he returns it with his reasons.

Mr. BUCKALEW. But suppose the Legislature, along with the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) and others, shall hold that these clauses of the Constitution are directory, and not imperative, and that two-thirds of them, on that construction, vote for the bill, what becomes of the check?

Mr. MACVEAGH. The provision itself distinctly states that a bill shall not be a law until it has passed through all the required stages of legislation.

Mr. BUCKALEW. That is just what I say. It will take a two-thirds vote.

Mr. MACVEAGH. No, sir. It has nothing at all to do with a two-thirds vote.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Then the bill has to start again?

Mr. MACVEAGH. Yes.

Mr. BUCKALEW. And go through the same process?

Mr. MACVEAGH. Yes.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Well, that would certainly be bringing a novelty into legislative practice.

Mr. MACVEAGH. That is the proposition. That is what is wanted.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Well, I am only inquiring what the amendment is. It is open to investigation, surely.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Certainly. Is there any objection?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Well, the Secretary of the Commonwealth, it seems, is to examine the Journals. I suppose he will have to run all over Harrisburg, to the State Printer's, where the written Journals usually are for the first ten days after they are prepared by the clerks, and he is to inspect these Journals. What then? Why, a great many things required in this article, of course, never appear on the Journals. For instance, the seventh section says that "no amendment shall be agreed to, or acted upon, or added to a bill, until it has been printed." That is one of the solemn requirements here. The Journal will not show anything about that. The twelfth section states that "no local or special bill shall be passed unless public notice shall have been given for three months," and due and adequate proof, of course, produced to the committee of the House who report the bill; but the fact whether publication has been made or not, will not appear on the Journal. So in regard to the passage of banking bills—bills establishing banking institutions or corporations, with discounting or other banking privileges, notice should be published for three months; and there are a number of other requirements in this article, compliance or non-compliance with which will not be shown by the Journals. It seems to me that matters will stand, after you have adopted this proposed amendment, very much as they do now. The Governor of the Commonwealth, if he be fit for his place, if he be a vigilant public officer, and desirous of performing his duty, will make reasonable inquiry in the most convenient manner, which, upon experience, he will find open to him to ascertain whether a bill, as it comes to him, has the sanction of the Constitution. I do not see, sir, that putting such a section as this in the Constitution will give us any guarantee which we do not now possess. If you put it in, it will be understood that after the Secretary has walked down to the Public Printer's and read over the Journals, and hears nothing against the bill, the Governor is to take everything as right, and sign it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from York (Mr. Cochran.)

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: I desire only to say that the present Constitution, and the one we propose, require that all bills shall be signed by the Speaker of each House, and when the Speaker of each House signs the bill he certifies that all these forms have been gone through with. Now, I very much doubt the propriety of allowing any officer connected with the Executive department to question the certificate of the Speaker of the House upon matters of form.

The question being upon the amendment of Mr. Cochran, it was rejected.

Mr. CUYLER. Mr. Chairman: I now move to substitute the following:

"No act of Assembly passed in violation of the foregoing provisions, or which shall have been procured by bribery, fraud or corruption, shall have the force and effect of law. The Supreme Court shall prescribe, by general rules, the method of investigating and ascertaining whether any act of Assembly is invalid, by reason of bribery, fraud or corruption, used to procure its passage, or by reason of a failure to observe the requirements of the Constitution in its passage."

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman: I am unwilling that a vote should be taken on that without calling the attention of the committee to what I conceive to be a blending of two entirely distinct objects here. This report of the committee contemplates merely a conformity to the forms of legislation without any regard to the question of fraud. The proposition of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) is to insert a provision against fraudulent legislation, which, of course, he does not mean to apply, I presume, to the case of a public bill, and therefore it is improperly drawn.

Mr. CUYLER. My object is to provide a method of investigation into those circumstances, be they what they may, that render an act of Assembly invalid. A failure to observe the requirements of the Constitution in the method of its passage would be attested, as every question of that character is in the courts, by an inspection of the record. If the Constitution says that a bill shall pass by yeas and nays, recorded, and an inspection of the Journal is necessary, the Supreme Court would prescribe that method in its general rules.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I understand that; but the proposition goes further. It is to invalidate laws which are passed by fraud, and without regard to whether they are general and public in their nature, as they may be, or the result of mere private cupidity, because special legislation, it is well known, has very frequently taken, and will again take, the form of public law.

A man has a grievance which he wishes to remedy in his particular case, and he thinks a public law, covering all cases all over the State, of similar character, would be the right way to do it, and in order to get that law, in which he has a special interest, passed, he may use corrupt means. Now, surely, although that may be the case, and although it may be passed by corrupt means, yet if it to be a general law, of general utility, I would not have it declared fraudulent and corrupt, at any remote distance of time, and without regard to any rights which might be vested under it. I think we had better dispose of this now, in so far as it affects merely the forms required. Let us have the most stringent provisions, as they may be proposed hereafter by some gentlemen who have the matter especially at heart, carrying out precisely the idea of the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) that no company or individual shall obtain legislation by fraudulent means, and benefit by it. For that object I will go with the gentlemen, but, as to this, it is a general provision.

The question being upon the amendment of Mr. Cuyler, it was rejected.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I now propose to amend, by striking out all after the word "void," in the second line, and inserting the following: "And may be so declared, in any legal proceedings instituted for that purpose on behalf of the Commonwealth, within one year after its publication."

Mr. CUYLER. Then, if I may be pardoned one remark more, I would say that all that is necessary is, that the person desiring and securing the passage of a bill by fraud, shall "salt down" his bill for twelve months, and then raise it.

Mr. DARLINGTON. It does not raise the question of fraud at all.

The question being upon the amendment of Mr. Darlington, it was rejected.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Chairman: I now move to strike out all the section after the word "effect," in the second line, and make the section read, "any bills passed in disregard of the provision and directions prescribed in this article shall be void and of no effect."

Mr. J. W. F. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I move to add as an amendment to the amendment, after the word "effect," the words, "and the Journals of the House shall be conclusive evidence of the facts in the case."

It was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Mr. Chairman: I trust that the committee has the full effect of this proposed amendment before them, because it really would leave us at sea. No law, as it seems to me, could possibly be worth anything to us in Pennsylvania under such a provision. No man could take title or anything else by virtue of any law.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I simply want to say that my object in offering this amendment is to leave the principle on the face of the bill, so that on the second reading gentleman may have an opportunity to mature their propositions.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) to come in after the word "effect." "And every bill, after it has been transcribed shall be submitted to the Speakers of the two Houses, who shall certify to the Governor that all the forms and requirements of the Constitution, in its consideration and passage, have been complied with in their respective Houses."

It was rejected.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. Buckalew, a division was called for and resulted, in the affirmative forty-two, in the negative thirty-nine.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. I now move the following as a substitute for the section.

Mr. LILLY. I rise to a point of order. We cannot now go to striking out what we have just voted on and adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. A motion to amend can be made, if the amendment be coupled with such other matter as may make it substantially a new proposition. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer.)

The CLERK read :

"SECTION —. Whenever, in any judicial proceedings, either party shall claim, under or by virtue of any act of Assembly, and the other party, upon proper affidavit, shall allege that such act of Assembly was passed in disregard of the provisions and directions prescribed in this article, or by fraud, bribery or undue means, and the court before which such judicial proceeding is pending shall be satisfied prima facie that such allegations are well founded, it shall be the duty of the said court to order a feigned issue to be framed under the direction of the Attorney General upon proper pleadings, in which the Commonwealth, upon relation of the party in interest, shall be plaintiff, and the party claiming under such act of Assembly defendant, to try the truth of the allegations in said affidavit contained, and the validity of such act of Assembly; and the said issue shall be certified to the Supreme Court and tried by one of the judges thereof, in whatever county he may direct; and if it shall appear to the court and jury, upon such trial, that all the provisions of legislation in both Houses, as hereinbefore prescribed, have not been substantially observed in the passage of said act, or that the same has been procured by bribery, fraud or undue means, such act of Assembly shall be adjudged null and void, either party to have the right to a writ of error as in other cases."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I rise to a question of order. The section, as now amended, refers entirely to the forms of legislation, and the amendment proposed changes it entirely and makes it refer to fraud.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot sustain the point of order. It is competent for a gentleman to change a proposition before the Convention so as to make it an entirely different proposition, if it relates to the same general subject.

Mr. S. A. PURVIANCE. Mr. Chairman: I offer the following amendment to the amendment, to come in before the proviso :

"And a certified copy of the Journal relating to the law in question shall be referred to as prima facie evidence that the requisitions of the Constitution have been complied with, and the law, if assailed for fraud in its enactment, shall be contested in a public proceeding under the direction of the Attorney General of the Commonwealth, as may be prescribed by law."

It was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. W. H. Palmer.)

Mr. W. H. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: This is the main question of the case. For the purpose of passing on the question of mere form I withdraw the amendment, as it seems that the Convention has seen fit to vote down that section, or at least to emasculate it so that there is nothing of it left. Now, the question arises whether we are willing to meet the pinch of this issue—whether we are ready to say that the rule which has heretofore prevailed in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania shall continue to prevail—whether we are ready to say that an act of Assembly which was procured by bribery, fraud and corruption shall remain unimpeached and unimpeachable.

I do not know whether this amendment is in the best form or not. I do not know but what some other gentleman may provide some better and more expeditious means of reaching the difficulty. If that can be done I am not tenacious about the form. I only desire that the principle shall somewhere be inserted in this Constitution, and I therefore appeal to the Convention not to vote down this substitute, but to pass it, so that the principle may be inserted here, and on second reading, or at some future time, if anybody can conceive a better plan, I should be ready to adopt it. But I hope that this Convention never will adjourn until it makes some provision by which these infamous acts that are procured by bribery, fraud and corruption, may be set aside by the proper tribunals, to wit, the courts. If you are ready to allow matters to go on as they hope gone—to allow the courts to be put in the position which they have heretofore occupied—then vote down the substitute; but if you are willing to engraft this new principle in the Constitution, which is founded in justice, which can do no man harm, because the proviso takes care of innocent parties, who have acquired rights for valuable considerations and without notice, and who have not been concerned in the passage of the bill, and only strikes at the fraudulent and guilty parties, who have prostituted the forms of legislation for their own purposes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman: I am a little surprised that this amendment should be again pressed by the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer.) I should be glad to vote for it if submitted as a separate proposition, but as now submitted I cannot do it, for it proposes to strike out the provision that a bill passed in disregard of the forms of legislation shall be void. It proposes to strike out the entire subject of this section, and introduce a new subject and a new section. Here is a proposition requiring the Legislature to observe all the forms of legislation required in this article, or their action to be void. The gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. W. H. Palmer) moves to strike that out, and if this amendment is adopted, then every proposition of this Constitution may be disregarded, and laws may be proven to have been passed without the necessary form of legislation, and yet they cannot be questioned, because there can be no fraud proven. I undertake to say that a hundred acts of Assembly may be passed in disregard of the necessary forms of legislation when you cannot prove any fraud. Yet you give validity to just such acts of Assembly as was referred to by the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) because you cannot prove the fraud, for under the provisions of this section the fraud must be proved.

The section reported by the Committee on Legislation does not require such a stringent rule. It requires that the forms of legislation shall be complied with or the acts are void, and it does not put upon the Commonwealth or anybody else the necessity of proving fraud. The amendment will destroy the very object aimed at by the section, and it will be impossible under it to declare any act of Assembly void.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Will the gentleman allow one moment's interruption?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MACVEAGH. I am sure the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer) and a number of other gentlemen, feeling the same way, accepted the vote of Convention on the amendment of the gentleman from York, (Mr. Cochran,) as their judgment that they did not desire further guards, as to the directory provisions—the matters of form; and that, therefore, this was offered, because they did not desire to vote on that section. If it is believed by anybody to be the sense of the Convention that that section would be adopted the amendment, I have no doubt, would be withheld for the present.

Mr. MANN. I simply desire to ask this committee whether they will say that the Legislature shall observe the forms of legislation or not? It was just as easy to submit this amendment as an independent proposition, as to put it in here. I want to vote for some such proposition, but I do not want to vote so as to say that the Legislature may disregard the forms of legislation. You could not prove in any court that acts were obtained by fraud. The act of Assembly which took from the State the ten thousand dollars annuity which the Erie railroad should have paid to the State could not have been proven to have been obtained by fraud, but it could have been proven that it was passed in violation of the forms of legislation. If such an amendment as this is adopted that money would be kept perpetually from the Treasury of the State, and without a remedy.

Mr. KAINE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. KAINE. Suppose the amendment he refers to, voting to another railroad the ten thousand dollars which was to have been paid to the State by the Erie railroad, was put upon the bill in committee of the whole, would it appear on the Journals anywhere that such an amendment was ever before the House?

Mr. MANN. This section as now amended does not refer to the Journal. It says that "any bill passed in disregard of the provisions of this article, shall be void." That bill was passed in violation of the forms of legislation, and is to be void.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: I am quite convinced again, by the eloquence of the gentleman from Potter, (Mr. Mann,) and will withdraw my substitute, and will allow the House to vote on the section, with the understanding that I am to offer it as an independent proposition. I desire to bring the Convention, some time or another, in the course of this mortal life, to a vote on this proposition. I withdraw it for the present.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman: The amendment having been withdrawn by the gentleman from Luzerne, I offer the following as a substitute for the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"In all cases of the passage of any bill the Speakers of both Houses shall certify to the Governor that all forms prescribed by law have been complied with by the respective Houses, and the Governor shall not give his approval to any bill until he shall ascertain that all the forms of legislation, as prescribed in this article, have been observed in the passage of the same, but in his approval he shall so certify, and his certificate shall be conclusive evidence that all the forms prescribed have been complied with."

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Mr. Chairman: I am opposed to the original section and to every amendment that has been offered in the Convention to-day. I do not think either the original section or the amendments are needed to secure honest legislation. If you look at section eight, which has been adopted by the committee, you will find it reads as follows:

"Every bill shall be read at length on three different days in each House; all amendments thereto shall be printed before the final vote is taken, and no bill shall become a law unless, on its final passage, the vote be taken by yeas and nays."

Now, the Journals are always right. We never find any fault with the Journals. A bill cannot be passed through the Legislature unless it is read at length on three different days, and unless it is printed, and unless the yeas and nays are taken on its final passage. Now it is well known by those who are conversant with legislation, that the Governor has a printed file of every bill that is introduced into the Legislature, and as no bill and no amendment can be passed without its being printed, the Governor and the Secretary of the Commonwealth, by simply looking at the printed file of bills, can discover whether any fraud has been committed after the bill passed the Legislature. It is a clear and definite way of testing the question at once, as there can be nothing inserted into the bill if the Governor or the Secretary of the Commonwealth examine the file of printed bills. Previously, bills were not printed, and in a great many instances were introduced and rushed through the Legislature without being printed, and without being read, except by its title. According to the practice which we have agreed to establish, all bills and all amendments must be printed. How can any fraud be committed if the Governor exercises any care or diligence in the examination of bills placed upon his files?

Mr. KAINE. Suppose the gentleman from Allegheny desired to offer an amendment in the Legislature and desire to have that amendment printed, is there any provision in this section that it shall be printed?

Mr. D. N. WHITE. I will read the section which has been passed by the Convention. It reads as follows: "Every bill shall be read at length on three different days; all amendments thereto shall be printed before the final vote is taken."

Mr. KAINE. It is not so then.

Mr. D. N. WHITE. The section says distinctly, "all amendments thereto shall be printed before the final vote is taken." Of course, if the Governor is provided with a file of printed bills, he can tell, by an examination, at a glance whether any fraud has been perpetrated since the passage of the bill through the Legislature.

Mr. HAZZARD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Suppose these bills are printed, but that two of them should be printed in a manner referred to by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler,) either by mistake or by manipulation, in the manner he narrated this morning. How will this section provide for such a case indicated by that gentleman?

Mr. D. N. WHITE. Well, Mr. Chairman, there will be more difficulty in inserting snakes where the bills are printed, and the final vote is taken by yeas and nays, because amendments made to bills in committee of the whole, on second reading or third reading, will have to be printed before they are passed, and a bill on second reading, a bill on third reading and a bill with amendments will have to be printed, and if there is anything inserted in the bill that is not printed, the Governor will know that there has been a fraud committed.

Now my experience in legislation has showed me that the Journals always conform to the action of the House on bills, or its purported action. It is true that bills, in very rare instances, have been passed through both Houses of the Legislature without ever having been read at all, and without ever having been voted upon, but the Journals were in order, and gave a description of the different forms of its passage. If, therefore, any one thinks a mere provision that the Journals shall be evidence of a passage of a law, he will be mistaken. It will not in any manner prevent frauds from being committed. The provision we have adopted in this article, that the yeas and nays must be recorded on the passage of every act, will be one of the strongest preventions of fraud that we can adopt. Besides that, in the large House it is proposed to create, any two members can call the yeas and nays on any stage of the bill, and as the yeas and nays must be taken upon the final vote, it will be very difficult indeed to commit any fraud. I do not believe that such a thing would be possible. I do not believe, under the provisions which will be incorporated in this reform Constitution, it will be possible to commit such a fraud as this section is intended to prevent. I am therefore opposed to this section, because it might produce a great deal of trouble. It might, possibly, invalidate a bill after the Legislature had acted upon it, and large interests had been vested under its provisions. I consider the section not only useless, but dangerous, and I am therefore opposed to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard.)

The question being taken, the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman: Before the vote is taken I only desire to say that if this provision is placed in the Constitution, that all bills passed in disregard of the provisions and directions prescribed in this article shall be void; no man will know what the law is in Pennsylvania. No man will be able to depend upon the validity of any act of Assembly, and I am afraid that the people of the State will think the one hundred lawyers composing this Convention have not been unmindful of their own interests, and have been desiring to get up litigation in order that each one of them may go to Harrisburg at his client's expense, and hunt over the records there to see whether all the formalities have been observed in the passage of laws.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. Chairman: I understood when the motion was made by the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) to strike out that portion of the section which has been stricken out by a vote of this committee, it was with the understanding that some other gentleman who was conversant with this subject should offer a section, to be inserted at the proper time or upon the second reading of the article. It was with that understanding that I voted to strike out that portion of this section, and I think that was the understanding of other gentlemen of the committee—that a new section prepared upon this subject should be offered when the section comes up on second reading.

While I am up I desire to say a single word upon this section. I do not think the section as it is reported by the committee will be worth anything to prevent what is intended. Now the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. D. N. White) thinks that every bill and amendment will be printed in regular order, and in a perfectly honest manner, according to form, but I do not anticipate anything of the kind. I calculate after we have made every amendment to the Constitution on the subject of legislation, that the same things will be done at Harrisburg that have been done heretofore, notwithstanding the vigilance of the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. D. N. White,) and the gentleman from Potter (Mr. Mann.)

Mr. D. N. WHITE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, and it is whether he does not know that the rules cannot be suspended except by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. KAINE. They can get three-fourths if necessary.

Now, sir, it is the intention to surround the legislation of this State with all kinds of guards, and I will go with the member of this Convention that will go the farthest in that direction. But I do not desire, so far as I am concerned, to put anything into the Constitution that will be of no value whatever. I take it that it is the duty of the Executive, before he signs bills passed by the Legislature, to examine them, in order to ascertain whether they are correct, and I do not think a provision of this kind is required in the Constitution. There is a committee of this Convention that has been referred to in the debates very frequently. Now, Mr. Chairman, that committee proposes to report an oath of office, and I submit to the Convention whether it will not be found sufficient for all the purposes proposed in this section. It reads as follows: "Members of the Legislature and all judicial, State and county officers, before entering upon the duties of their respective offices, shall take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation: I do solemnly swear or affirm that I will support, obey, and defend the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of this Commonwealth, and discharge the duties of the office to which I have been elected with fidelity."

Now, after the Executive of the State has taken an oath of that kind, if it should be adopted by the Convention, it would then be his duty to examine all bills passed by the Legislature to see that the provisions in regard to the passage of bills contained in the Constitution had been strictly complied with.

I feel a deep interest in regard to the other branch of this question, which proposes to provide a remedy when a fraud has been perpetrated upon the people by the Legislature. When an act has been placed upon the statute books without having been passed at all by the Legislature, this provision will afford no other means of prevention than have existed heretofore. When an act has been passed through the Legislature I would provide a tribunal of some kind which shall decide the act null and void, if corruption or undue means were used in obtaining it. I do not care where this power shall be placed in the Constitution, but I desire to see some provision of this kind incorporated into our organic law.

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: I have already spoken once upon this subject, but I understand the amendment which has been passed gives me the opportunity to do so again. The section as amended removes the objection which was originally urged against it, that it introduced new forms of judicial procedure. That objection has been removed, and I take it under that section no act of Assembly could be decided to be unconstitutional, except in pursuance of the known rules of judicial proceedings. That is to say, that a private statute can never come before a court unless it is specially pleaded. That is to say, that an act of Assembly creating or incorporating a company, or creating a franchise, can never be determined to be unconstitutional except upon the relation of the Attorney General and upon a writ of quo warranto. Therefore the amendment already adopted removes this section from so much of that objection as was directed to the interminable proceedings at law, but it is still open to this objection; it is open to the objection that an act of Assembly is to be determined void, simply because some mere direction of form has not been pursued.

Upon what principle do we assume—what right have we to assume—that hereafter the members of the Legislature, who swear to obey and defend the Constitution of Pennsylvania, intend to violate their oaths, and that the judges who take the same oaths intend to keep them. Why draw that distinction in the future? I take it that upon the adoption of this Constitution the halcyon days of the republic are to return, and that we are to have as members of the Legislature such gentlemen as the gentleman from Fayette, (Mr. Kaine,) who, after the confession he has just made for the good of his soul, I think deserves, at the hands of this Convention, plenary absolution for all his past offences. If it is true that such gentlemen as my friend from Fayette, (Mr. Kaine,) and other gentlemen in the Convention, were in the Legislature many years ago, and who, probably, have some hope of returning there again, after the adoption of this Constitution, by what right do their fellow-members assume that when they take the oath to support the Constitution of Pennsylvania they intend to break it; but, forsooth, the judge when he takes the same oath to keep it. I do not think we are assembled here to legislate, or to make a Constitution upon the assumption that every man who is a representative of the people in this State is hereafter to be considered as a perjured scoundrel. If we are not here to do that, why not permit all these matters of form to rest conclusively upon the certificate of the Governor, as suggested by some gentlemen in this Convention?

Mr. CORBETT. I would like to ask the gentleman this question. The Convention has adopted a provision requiring a majority elected to each House to vote upon a bill. I ask if this is not a reform? Or is it a mere matter of form?

Mr. GOWEN. Certainly, it is a matter of form.

Mr. CORBETT. Then a bill passed by less than a majority would become a law?

Mr. GOWEN. No. Because members of the Legislature are prohibited from passing such a law, and therefore it could not be declared as passed. They are as much prohibited from passing such a law as the judge, who, in deciding upon its constitutionality, would be compelled to declare it unconstitutional. Therefore, the distinction I would draw, is this: A distinction between matters of mere form and matters of corruption. Now it is well known that our own courts have no power, either to declare an act of Assembly void for a failure of the preliminary forms, or for the fact that it was obtained by corruption. That is well known. The first is right, for I submit if the representatives of this great State of Pennsylvania, having sworn to obey this Constitution, which prescribes these forms are not to be trusted with carrying them out, there will be no safety left in the courts.

If we are to place upon our records the solemn opinion of the members of this Convention, that in the future it is impossible, within the length and breadth of this Commonwealth, to select one hundred and thirty-three members of the Legislature who will not violate their oaths, then we had better disband, go home, and every man pack up his bag and clear out of the limits of the State as quickly as possible. Is the administration of law, as well as the administration of justice, a mere mockery and farce, and are the representatives of the people for all time to be considered as perjurers? Is a bill to be passed, a right to be vested, an office to be created, and a corporation to be launched into existence, and fifty years afterwards, when every man who had any hand in securing the passage of that act, shall have gone to answer before a higher tribunal for the crimes he has committed, and when every person who owns one dollar of that property is as innocent as a child unborn of any crime, is that act of Assembly, I say, to be declared invalid? Is the wealth and property held under it a mere phantom to be exorcised at the will of a judge, because fifty years before a man corruptly secured the passage of the act? Certainly not. Why should it be? Upon what principle of right is the innocent holder of the property to be dispossessed on account of the crime of a man with whom he had no connection, and over whom he had no control?

Therefore, upon these mere matters of form, let the certificate of the Governor of the State be conclusive that every form has been complied with. Let us hold our titles to property secure from a constant repetition of such inquisitorial investigation. Interest republica ul sit finis librum—is a good maxim of law. But if this provision to the Constitution is adopted no man who holds lands under a title created by the State, no man who holds stock in an incorporated company created by the State, will ever be safe from the inquisitorial vengeance of a judicial tribunal. So much then as to mere matters of form, but now as to bribery and corruption. I admit that the Constitution requires an amendment in regard to this subject, and the one amendment I would suggest would be this: That courts shall have the power to declare acts of Assembly unconstitutional if procured by bribery and corruption, provided that justice shall be administered according to known usages, and provided that no act of Assembly shall be declared unconstitutional for corruption and bribery unless so declared within a given number of years after its passage. That, I take it, would cover everything, but if you do not hedge it in—

Mr. MACVEAGH. Why not allow him who is to suffer by a law fraudulently passed to assail it whenever it is used against him? Why not allow the blow to be given to destroy the law whenever the law is to be used for attack?

Mr. GOWEN. Because the party guilty of corruption may have so slight an interest in the subject matter of legislation that it would be manifestly unjust that ninety-nine innocent men should suffer on account of the guilt of a single person? Where the law affects solely one person then the right to investigate might be without limitation. But where that would exist in one case, in a thousand cases the guilty author of the corruption would either have ceased to have any interest in the act or would have an interest so slight that it would be manifestly unjust to punish the innocent for the crime of the guilty.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Then, ought that ever to be allowed, even within six months, or within any time after the passage of a bill? Ought an innocent purchaser for value, under a public statute, ever to be deprived of the rights he has acquired?

Mr. GOWEN. Yes, and for this reason: That where this statute of limitations as to the power of a court to investigate exists by virtue of a constitutional amendment, there never is an innocent purchaser, for every purchaser takes his property, subject to the right of the court to investigate the title by which he holds his franchise, within a given number of years from the time at which the corporation was established; therefore, he buys with full notice. If no act of Assembly is safe from the searching investigation of a judicial tribunal, until two or three years after its passage, there is no innocent holder without notice under that act, for any clause in the Constitution of the State affecting it, is part of the contract between the supreme legislative power and the individual who is benefitted by it. This is the answer to that objection. Now, unless we hedge this power about, so that it must be exercised according to known judicial proceedings, we will have the anomaly in this State, to which I referred this morning, that exists in the State of New York. Let me dissent most earnestly from the remarks of the gentleman from Allegheny

(Mr. Ewing) that we are to be governed by the decisions of the courts of New York, or by the judicial proceedings of that State. Do we not know that in New York, and in some other of the States of the Union, the course of judicial proceedings has been so modernized that you can file a declaration in an action of assumpsit for recovery of goods sold and delivered, and in that form of action you can obtain an injunction in equity, to prevent the building of a railroad. It is a known fact. I have had a client from Massachusetts come to me to consult me on corporation and mining law. I suggested a bill in equity, but he sent me back a declaration in assumpsit, with the common counts added, and at the bottom a prayer for relief in equity; he filed this declaration in a common law court, and got an injunction in equity to restrain the working of mines.

God forbid that we should ever go so far back of our old English precedents as, in the State of Pennsylvania, to get mixed up in medley of that kind. To return to the subject, let this Constitution make bribery and corruption a hissing and a scorn. Hang the man who offends if you want to. Take the franchise away from the company whose agents have been guilty of corruption in procuring it, but let this justice be administered according to old established usages. Do not let every Tom, Dick and Harry throughout this Commonwealth, in every petty tribunal that you may create, investigate the title by which a large corporation holds its franchise.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: By what known usage in this Commonwealth, or by what usage of proceedings, can a general act of Assembly be impeached now?

Mr. GOWEN. Mr. Chairman: A general act of Assembly can be impeached now, at any time, whenever it comes properly before the jurisdiction of the court. Add bribery and corruption to the causes which will enable the court to declare it void, and let justice be administered according to known precedents. Why, only two weeks ago we had a law that is general in its operation, I refer to the local option law, investigated before the courts in this city. That was a general law. Add bribery and corruption to one of the causes for which the courts have the right to declare an act of the Legislature unconstitutional, and you accomplish all that you want to accomplish.

Then, if a corporation is created upon an act of Assembly obtained by fraud, you go to the Attorney General, and, upon his relation, a writ of quo warranto is issued to show cause by what title it holds its franchise. The corporation, by its counsel, pleads the act of Assembly creating it. A replication is filed by the Attorney General that that act of Assembly was obtained by fraud, and is not, therefore, valid. An issue is joined upon that, and the case goes down for trial as all other cases do.

Mr. WOODWARD. Suppose the Attorney General refuses to issue the writ?

Mr. GOWEN. That is not to be supposed, and I say with great earnestness we dare not suppose it.

Mr. WOODWARD. It has been done a great many times. You will find that he never will issue a writ of quo warranto when it is likely to injure the party to whom he belongs.

Mr. GOWEN. I doubt that very much. I think there never could be an Attorney General of this State—the leader of the bar of Pennsylvania—who, upon an affidavit, properly made before him, by a private individual, that an act of Assembly was procured by bribery or corruption, would dare to hesitate to issue a writ of quo warranto. I have known, over and over again, where upon the instances of private parties, the Attorney General has issued units of quo warranto, although he himself was doubtful of the propriety of the movement, and when the case came on to be argued in court, had to say to the court that he could not urge it, but that he thought it was his duty as a public officer of the Commonwealth to issue the writ.

Amend the Constitution by making it obligatory upon the Attorney General to issue this writ, and you accomplish everything you desire. Do not give to the courts the power to declare an act of Assembly void for the mere omission of some form. Give them the power to declare it void for bribery or corruption, but let that power be exercised so that the decree will be made according to the known usages of judicial proceedings.

Mr. WOODWARD. I would like to know how, if the court in Wayne county should declare the law to be void, for bribery and corruption, and the court in Greene county declare it not void, for bribery and corruption, what would be the condition of the people in the central part of the State?

Mr. GOWEN. Neither decision would be respected until the case came before the Supreme Court.

Mr. WOODWARD. The Supreme Court do not touch the question of facts. The forms of law would be observed by both courts.

Mr. GOWEN. Therefore it is that it is wrong to permit such a state of things to exist. There should not be such a difference of decisions. It should be made impossible. Take the case of a large corporation. Take the Pennsylvania railroad, that owns property in almost every county in the State. Is it to exercise its franchise in Dauphin county, because the court has decided its acts constitutional, and not to exercise them in Allegheny county, because the court has decided them the other way? Why should we permit such a state of things to exist if it be possible to prevent it?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I move that the gentleman have unanimous consent to preceed.

Mr. LILLY. I object.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: We are again running wild in this discussion. The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) comes in, and he opens up all this discussion again. Having been out he does not understand what had taken place. Now let us proceed and do something. The gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) has moved an amendment. He moved that amendment for the purpose of letting the balance of the section stand until it came to a second reading, so that it could be amended. The gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) comes in and opens up the whole discussion. We do not expect this to stand as it is now and be perfect, but, I presume, when it comes to second reading, gentlemen who have had a great deal of experience will offer something which will perfect the section. It can be voted down, if it is not amended so as to render it unobjectionable.

Now I want to say a word further: The provisions that we have adopted in this report already are numerous. Some of them are of substance, and some are merely directory. I will say, speaking for myself, that so far as the provisions are merely directory, I care but little about them, but as the argument of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Gowen) shows that there are others of substance. Now, for myself, I am unwilling that any law shall stand upon the rolls in the Secretary of the Commonwealth's office as the the law of the State of Pennsylvania that was not voted for by a majority of the members elected to each House.

One word further: I am totally opposed to the adoption, at this time, of the proposition presented by the gentleman from Luzerne, (Mr. H. W. Palmer,) and I will state my reasons. When the time comes I shall vote for any fair mode of determining an act to be void that has been obtained by fraud. I say that now, but I am totally opposed to taking up this subject at this time, the members of this committee generally having thought nothing about it, and it having not emanated from any committee. I do not think there is anything in the fact that it does not come from a committee, except that it is more likely to be matured. I am totally opposed to adopting any additional section at this time. We have a Committee on Constitutional Sanctions, with a very able gentleman at the head of it, whom I know has this matter at heart.

I want to see what that committee will report. I want a section on this subject to be reported by some committee, and well matured.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Will the gentleman allow me to make a remark?

Mr. CORBETT. Certainly.

Mr. MACVEAGH. I think I do not err in saying that the proposed section of the gentleman from Luzerne (Mr. H. W. Palmer) has been carefully considered, and has had the advantage of the experience of one of the most able and distinguished gentlemen of this body; and as it will be best, as the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) proposes, to adopt this section in its most complete form it would be well to put this in it, in order that the proposition may, on second reading, be complete; for I believe it is admitted not to be complete in its present form. If it is adopted at once, as I hope it will be, the Convention will be prepared, on second reading, to make it complete and satisfactory.

Mr. CORBETT. If that proposition has ever had the sanction of the gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) I am much mistaken.

Mr. MACVEAGH. I did not say that it had.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman: I do not propose to go into a discussion of this matter at this time. It is got up certainly on the spur of the moment ; it is ill-digested. The idea that when in a trial at law a party comes in and states by affidavit that a certain act is unconstitutional, the case has to be continued and the whole thing gone over again, and you are to go to Harrisburg and present your affidavit and obtain some proceedings to be instituted by the Attorney General, and the matter is then to go before the Supreme Court, and they are to designate one of the judges, and he is to order a trial in some county, and, of course, it must be a trial at law. Why, it is evident that the scheme is ill-digested. I say this with all respect. I want some definite and matured plan.

I say here that the proposition of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) was much better than this. I hope this committee will adopt no additional section of that kind at this time. I hope they will let it lie over, and let it be well matured and well digested. When it is brought forward in proper shape I will vote for it or some similar proposition, but I cannot support it now, thrown in here, as it is, on the spur of the moment, and in the midst of this other matter.

The question being upon the section as amended, it was rejected.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. Chairman: I now offer my proposition, to come in here as a new section.

The CLERK read :

SECTION —. Whenever, in any judicial proceeding, either party shall claim under or by virtue of any act of Assembly, and the other party upon proper affidavit shall allege that such act of Assembly was passed in disregard of the provisions and directions prescribed in this article, or by fraud, bribery or undue means, and the court before which such judicial proceeding is pending shall be satisfied prima facie that such allegations are well founded, it shall be the duty of the said court to order a feigned issue to be framed under the direction of the Attorney General upon proper pleadings, in which the Commonwealth, upon relation of the party in interest, shall be plaintiff, and the party claiming under such act of Assembly defendant, to try the truth of the allegation in said affidavit contained, and the validity of such act of Assembly, and the said issue shall be certified to the Supreme Court and tried by one of the judges thereof, in whatever county he may direct, and if it shall appear to the court and jury upon such trial that all the provisions of legislation in both Houses, as hereinbefore prescribed, have not been substantially observed in the passage of said act, or that the same has been procured by bribery, fraud or other undue means, such act of Assembly shall be adjudged null and void, either party to have the right to a writ of error as in other cases.

The question being upon the section, it was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read :

SECTION 36. A member of the Legislature shall be guilty of bribery, and punished as shall be provided by law, who shall solicit, demand or receive, or consent to receive, directly or indirectly, from any corporation, company or person, any money, testimonial, reward, thing of value, or of personal advantage, or promise thereof, for his vote or official influence, or with an understanding, expressed or implied, that his vote or official action in any way is to be influenced thereby, or who shall, after his election and during his term of office, consent to become or continue to act as the agent, attorney or other employee of any corporation or person, knowing such corporation or person has or expects to have any personal or special interest in the legislation of the Commonwealth.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman: As has already been stated in the Convention, there was a difference of opinion in the committee on this, among other subjects, and while the minority on this question did not deem it necessary to present a minority report upon the subject, I suppose I do not betray any confidence when I say it was distinctly understood at the time that we reserved the right to express our dissent from this section.

Mr. LILLY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, as he is relating what the committee does. Do they expect to exempt railroad passes in that section?

Mr. EWING. I am not responsible for this section, nor am I authorized to speak for its friends. This section and the next section relate to the subject of bribery, a subject that is an unpleasant one, but bribery of the legislators is a thing that we have heard a great deal about here. If one thousandth part of what has been said on this floor is correct, it is a very important subject, and one to which the Convention should give its attention, and if any remedy can be found for it it should be adopted. I am not one of those who think that all the virtue of this world belonged exclusively to our grandfathers, and that all the vices and corruptions of the world are concentrated in the people of the present day. I am not prepared to suggest or to say, nor do I believe, that the Pennsylvania Legislature is worse than any other body. That there are many corrupt men in it and have been there, I have no doubt. That many measures have been passed in the Legislature of Pennsylvania by corrupt means, I have no doubt, and even to those gentlemen who have a superabundance of that charity that thinketh no evil and believeth no evil, and who believe that even the "repeal of the tonnage tax" was not passed by corrupt means, and do not believe that these great corporations have ever been guilty of bribery, I would suggest that some remedy be adopted in this Constitution to prevent this public scandal and to prevent people from talking as they do about corporations and the Legislature. I believe that corruption, to some extent, among Legislatures will usually follow where there is a great concentration of wealth, where there are measures to be passed in which a large amount of money, or property, or capital is to be specially affected. The States that have great cities have been usually those States whose legislators have been charged with corruption.

The gentleman from York, (Mr. J. S. Black,) a few days ago, gave us Louisiana as a special example to show us to how deep a pit of corruption legislators could sink, and, in that connection, instanced the rapid progress which negroes and carpet baggers could make in that direction. If I am not misinformed, however, long before negroes or carpet baggers had anything to do with legislation in Louisiana, some of the legislators of that State were none of the best, and I have been told of things that occurred there, in times past, that would excite admiration in the breast of the most illustrious "rooster" or pincher at Harrisburg at the present day.

In latter times the great corporations, with their concentrated capital and great power, and with no corporate conscience, if such a conscience there be, seem to be the great sources of corruption in the different States. Perhaps the corrupt influence exercised by these corporations has, for the most part, arisen as intimated by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler,) who so frequently has told us that "he does not on this floor represent any corporation." He intimated the other day that the Pennsylvania railroad might have sometimes procured legislation, or bought legislators, not to pass laws that it needed, but to prevent the passage of bad laws against the company. They did it in self defence, I believe, if I understand him aright, very much as a good brother in a certain church who fell from grace one day in a quarrel, and was guilty of profanity, and when brought up before the church court he claimed that he had sworn in self defence. Everybody knows that bribery is not usually committed under the name of bribery. Human ingenuity is taxed to devise means that will evade the statute on the subject, and to appease the consciences of those who take the bribes. I suppose that something more specific and more comprehensive than this section should be adopted in order to stop bribery. If you want to set a trap for game of any kind you must study the habits of and ascertain the haunts of the animal. So, if you are enacting a provision in regard to bribery of legislators, you should take into consideration the manner in which such bribery is usually accomplished.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to the first portion of this section, thirty-six, as reported by the committee, provides that a member of Legislature shall be guilty of bribery and punished therefor, if he takes a gift, money, reward, or thing of value, for his official influence with the understanding, expressed or implied, that his vote or official action is in any way to be influenced thereby. What legislator ever took a gift with any such understanding as that? Of course he never understood the gift to be to "influence his vote." It was "a matter of friendship, fee for services, an opportunity to make a profitable investment." We have a statute already on the subject. I will not take time to quote it. The members of the Convention can examine it for themselves. They will find that it is just as broad, if it is not a little broader, than this section. The minority of the committee think that when a member of the Legislature takes a gift from any party that has a private interest in legislation, he ought to know that it is intended to bribe him. He ought to know that it is intended to influence his vote on some particular subject. He ought to know that a gift perverted judgment, and he has no right to take a gift.

If a member of the Legislature is employed and given a fee or retainer by any person or corporation having a special interest in legislation, he ought to know that it is intended to influence his official conduct. If he is already so employed he ought to know that his views as to his public duty are likely to be influenced by his continuance in that employment.

Now, the minority of the committee propose to change this section, and say when a man who has been elected a member of the Legislature, and during the term of his office shall accept a gift from any party, having a private interest in legislation, that that of itself is bribery, and that when he is prosecuted in court, that it shall not be necessary to prove what the understanding was. We also propose to define some of these parties, who so commonly, who so uniformly, have a special or private interest in legislation, that it is to be presumed, as a matter of law, that they have such an interest in legislation, that we propose to say to the members of the Legislature, that they must not receive gifts from those persons and corporations. We also propose that those worthy gentlemen, who make their abode in Harrisburg, for the purpose of procuring for pay the passage of bills, and who are known as the third House, and as paid professional lobbyists, shall be prevented from privately soliciting members on any subject connected with legislation, and that it shall be a penal offence so to do; and we propose to make it a criminal offence for a member to knowingly and willingly listen to such private solicitation. In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment to the section:

AMENDMENT TO SECTION THIRTY-SIX.

"A member of the Legislature shall be guilty of bribery and punishment as shall be provided by law, who, after his election and during his term of office shall solicit, demand, or accept or consent to receive, directly or indirectly, upon any pretence whatever, for himself or any other person, from any candidate, person, association or corporation having a special or private interest in legislation, any gift or promise of money, property, office or thing of value, or personal advantage, or shall make any contract which gives him a private interest in the legislation of this State, or who, after his election and during his term of office, shall consent to become or continue to be and act as the agent, attorney or employee of any person, association or corporation, knowing that such person, association or corporation has, or expects to have, any private or special interest in the legislation of the State.

"All corporations holding franchises by grant from the State or doing business in the State, their officers, agents, attorneys and employees; all contractors or persons having an interest in contracts with the State; all officers, judicial, Executive and ministerial, of the State and of the United States; all candidates for any office in the gift of the Legislature, including candidates for the Senate of the United States, shall be conclusively presumed to have a special interest in legislation.

"All persons who engage themselves for hire or reward to promote or oppose the passage of any measure by the Legislature, shall be conclusively presumed to have a special interest in legislation. No such person shall address to any member of either House any private solicitation, speech or argument, orally or in writing, to influence his vote on any subject whatsoever; both the person offering such solicitation, and the member who voluntarily and knowingly hears it, shall be taken for criminal offenders, and punished as the law may provide."

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. Chairman: I move that the committee rise and report progress.

The motion was agreed to.

IN CONVENTION.

The committee then rose, and the President resumed the chair. The Chairman of the committee, Mr. Armstrong, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again, and to-morrow was named and agreed upon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. NEWLIN. Mr. Chairman: I move the Convention do not adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

So the Convention thereupon, at two o'clock and fifty minutes, adjourned.

ERRATA.

On page 611, eighteenth line from bottom of second column, for "endured" read "endorsed."

On page 618, fourth line from top of second column, for "too" read "two."

On page 621, thirteenth line from top of first column, for "denounces" read "announce."

Debates of the Convention to Amend the Constitution of Pennsylvania (1873) – Volume 6

DEBATES
CONVENTION

TO AMEND THE CONSTITUTION OF PENNSYLVANIA:

CONVENED AT HARRISBURG, NOVEMBER 12, 1872;

ADJOURNED NOVEMBER 27,

TO MEET AT PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 7, 1873.

VOL. VI.

HARRISBURG:
BENJAMIN SINGERLY, STATE PRINTER.
1873.

332

DEBATES

OF THE

Convention to Amend the Constitution.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SIXTH DAY.

TUESDAY, June 24, 1873.

The Convention met at nine o'clock A. M., Hon. John H. Walker, President pro tem., in the chair.

Prayer by Rev. Jas. W. Curry.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MANTOR asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Craig on account of ill health.

CORPORATIONS.

Mr. STANTON. I move that the Convention proceed to the consideration of the article reported from the Committee on Private Corporations, report No. 21.

The motion was agreed to, and the Convention resumed the consideration or second reading of the article on corporations.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. When the Convention adjourned yesterday the question was on the eighth section. It will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 8. No banking or other corporation shall receive or pay directly or indirectly a greater rate of interest than is allowed by law to individuals.

Mr. FUNCK. I move to strike out all after the word "section" and insert the following:

"The legal rate of interest shall be six per cent. per annum; and banks of issue shall not be allowed to pay interest on deposits."

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. FUNCK. Mr. President: I conceive it important that the rate of interest should be fixed by this Convention. An immense number of "shaving shops" are daily springing up over the country, and they are oppressing the business of the country very greatly. If there is any source from which the community at large suffers, it is from this extortion; and if this Convention will adopt some method by which they can get relief, it will be a great blessing. Banks of issue, regularly chartered, in consequence of the pressure which has been brought to bear upon them by these "shaving shops," have entered the money market and all of them have become borrowers; and in consequence of the course which they are pursuing, all the money of the community finds its way into their vaults. There it is held. No business man any longer is able to go to his neighbor and borrow money at six per cent. or five per cent. interest as was customary heretofore; but every man who goes into business without having capital enough of his own to carry it on is obliged to submit to a shave in order to prosecute it.

These banks first make money scarce, and afterwards take advantage of that scarcity to run up the rate of interest, and consequently no new enterprises are springing up in the State; no forges, manufactories or other industries are built and prosecuted, because of the scarcity of money. Real estate is selling below its actual value because there is no desire for it. If a man wants to buy a farm and has two-thirds of the money necessary he cannot buy it, because he does not know where to get the balance of the money; consequently the business community is impoverished through this system; and when we reach the proper stage of our deliberations I shall offer a section to the report now before the Convention, calling upon the Legislature to annul the charters that have heretofore been issued to these "shaving shops," in such manner, however, that no injury to the corporations shall be done, and to prevent the Legislature hereafter from granting like privileges to corporations of that character. I believe they are an unmitigated nuisance, from which the country desires to be delivered. If individuals seek to engage in business of this kind, let them do it on their individual responsibility, because it is a business utterly selfish in its character. The community derives no benefit from it. If it were some manufacturing or productive industry that was to be advanced, by which laborers were to be employed and the community benefited, it would be different, but it is a privilege to individuals only for their exclusive benefit, to the detriment of the community. For this reason I hope the Convention will think favorably of the amendment I have offered and adopt it.

Mr. NILES. Mr. President: I am opposed to the amendment and to the section. I would have had no particular objection to the section if the Convention yesterday had put the word "private" in before the word "corporation;" but if we adopt this section as it is pending to-day, it will be utterly impossible for any municipal corporation in this State to erect any public buildings or to borrow money to build school houses or anything of that kind. Now, sir, if we are to limit any corporations whatever in this State—I am speaking particularly about municipal corporations—if they are to be limited to six per cent., it will either prevent the loaning of a dollar by one of these corporations, or it will succeed, as the delegate from Columbia told us yesterday, in forcing the rate of interest up to a point that will satisfy all the corporate bodies of the State. That is just exactly what this proposition is to result in, to force up the legal rate of interest to a point that will be acceptable to the corporations, or else it will prevent the building of additional improvements in the State from this day henceforth. I, sir, am unwilling to go upon the record as voting for this proposition. It is to tie up all the industries of this State from this day henceforth. We are putting here into the organic law a proposition that no delegate on this floor can begin to comprehend the final results of. It is in my judgment the worst species of legislation. It has no business in the Constitution; and if we were in the Legislature it would be an article of very exceptional propriety.

For these and for other reasons I hope the Convention will vote down this proposition. And if anything of this nature is needed, let it be done by law that can be repealed if found to work disastrously to the best interests of the people.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. President: I am not so much opposed to the amendment as I am opposed to its taking the place of the section, which, as it reads now, is to my mind a most valuable one and one that ought to have a place in the organic law. The gentleman who has just taken his seat says that if this section is passed as it stands, no corporation will be enabled to live in effect and make its improvements. I want him to tell me why. If it is true, it is because at present they are enabled to sweep the money market and no individual is allowed to compete with them. If it is true, it is because the rates of money by the laws of trade are at this time higher than individuals are allowed to give openly; and if he wants this kind of favoritism for the corporations, either public or private, to be continued, I am perfectly willing that he should be allowed to cast his vote for that unrighteous discrimination.

I do not want corporations to be deprived of a fair chance in the money market. What I want is that they should not have all the chance. What I want is that individuals should have a fair chance with them. If you want to make the community rise in a mass and by revolution put down these giant bodies that have so long ruled them with an iron hand, only keep on discriminating in their favor; only continue the process by which I, if I want to borrow, must sneak into the money market at the back door and deal with the first scamp who chooses to ask me an extortionate rate, while the agents of corporations can go in boldly at the front door and take money at the rate which the laws of trade fix, and sneer at me because I cannot compete with them.

Sir, this unfair discrimination has existed too long. In my county such a thing as borrowing upon mortgage by a private individual at the rates at which private individuals can deal by law is a thing of the past; it is heard of no longer. I grant that the farmers there get money, some of them must get it or be broken up, but they get it how? They get it at an enormous shave; they get it at twelve per cent. and from that down to eight, and sometimes up to fifteen, while the corporations, with no better security, can get it for seven or eight; and why is this difference? Because the corporations are allowed to go in at the front door and openly bid, while we must sneak in at the back door and deal with those who are dishonest enough to take advantage of our unfortunate situation.

Now, sir, let this section go in; and what will be the result? Not that corporations will be crippled unless, indeed, they are afraid of the competition of individuals, unless, indeed, they want all the capital of the country and are not willing to let individuals come in and get their share. That I do not myself believe. I believe they would be satisfied with their share, though they have an unfair advantage as the matter now stands, because undoubtedly if individuals are allowed to deal openly, they will get no more than their share of the money of the country. But what will happen if we put this in? Simply that the corporations which have, as gentlemen say, controlled the Legislature, will force the money market open for us as well as for themselves, and the laws of trade will regulate the rates of money; and why not? This section does not say that corporations shall be limited; it only says that corporations shall be limited if individuals are. This section puts no clog upon the operations of corporations; it only says that individuals shall not be clogged unless corporations are. This section does not forbid corporations from borrowing; it only says that if you shut the money market to me, you shut it to all the world. I demand the right to buy in the markets of the world at such rates as are allowed to others. I deny your right to say that I must not buy flour when flour gets to eight dollars a barrel, but that the rich corporations shall still live. I deny your right to say that I must violate the law if I can get money at more than six per cent., and hence must pay for the risk of that violation of the law in one way or another; and yet that the gentleman's favorite corporations, about which he seems to be so particular, should be allowed to get money at the market rates often at half the price which I am compelled to give. I hope the section will pass as it is.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President: The question now before the Convention is not at all that which has been discussed by the gentleman from Tioga, (Mr. Niles,) as I understand it, and especially not that which has been discussed by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall.) It is simply whether this amendment shall be substituted for the original section or not. Now, sir, it seems to me that the argument which was well stated by the gentleman from Lebanon (Mr. Funck) ought to prevail. What is the object of this amendment? The object of the amendment is to prevent corporations from forestalling the money market just as you would prevent people from forestalling any other market. They go to work and draw into their vortex the money of the country; and having it there, when individuals come to borrow from them they have to pay exorbitant rates of interest in some form or other by which the provisions of the law as it exists are evaded or violated. Now, the object of this amendment is to leave the corporation and the individual on the same footing at the legal rate of interest and no other, and not to allow the individual borrower to be put at a disadvantage.

Mr. President, this is opposed by the gentleman from Tioga, as I understand, on the ground that it would prevent municipal corporations from obtaining the funds necessary to enable them to make their improvements. Such has not been my experience or observation in the section of the State from which I come. Municipal corporations in our section of the State have always been able to get money at the legal rate of interest. They have got it heretofore; they can get it to-day; and the reason is, because the people have confidence in the security that is offered to them, and they will take the bonds of the county of York, or the obligations of the borough of York, and lend money on them at six per cent. Why, sir, the county of York is indebted in the sum of nearly $300,000, on its own bonds, and on that sum, as I understand, it pays no more than the rate of six per cent. interest, and it always has been able, except in cases when there was suspicion thrown upon it, to obtain money at that rate; and so has the borough of York on the few occasions when it has had to borrow money. I do not believe that it is necessary for any well managed municipal corporation which has the confidence of the public to pay one cent more than six per cent. interest, and I believe I am sustained by the experience of the section of country in which I live.

But, sir, we understand the purpose for which this section was framed, which was well pointed out yesterday by the gentleman from Columbia. It is an attempt to reach indirectly that which this Convention has refused to allow to be done directly; and that is to put power in the hands of those who wish to raise the rate of interest in this State which will enable them to work with force upon the Legislature. The idea is to compel the Legislature to do that which they have never been able to make them do yet: and that is to increase the legal rate of interest, and thus, by bringing the force and power and influence of all the great corporations in this State to bear upon the Legislature, to compel them to raise the rate of interest. Now, that is the open and undisguised purpose, and it has been avowed here, I may say, by the gentleman from Delaware this morning. What, farmers pay thirteen per cent.! Farmers pay twelve per cent.! Why, sir, no man who pays twelve per cent. as a farmer can live under it; he must go down inevitably; and my observation has been that I have never known farmers who were compelled to pay these rates of interest who were able to survive. They went into the hands of the sheriff or their property into the hands of assignees, or they go now into the court of bankruptcy whenever they are compelled to pay these rates. A farmer had better at once sell his farm and give up before he borrows money at such rates of interest. I protest here on behalf of that interest, an interest which is the foundation of all the wealth and all the prosperity of this Commonwealth, and not great corporations or any other class of the community. I protest on behalf of the agricultural interest of this State against any provision which will have the effect, directly or indirectly, of compelling them to submit to the exactions of money-dealers at the rates which they choose to place on the money which they lend.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. President: I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Lebanon and I am opposed to the proposition of the committee, and I think this Convention would do wisely to take the suggestion of the chairman of the committee and vote the section down. I think it would be unwise for us to make any provision in the Constitution whatever on the subject of interest unless we are prepared to say that the Legislature shall not at any time fix any rate of interest. This is a restraining provision. The Legislature have entire power over the subject and will act exactly as the people desire them to act from time to time unless we think it wise to take that power away. I do not; but that is the only thing we ought to say if we say anything.

Now, what would be the effect of fixing in the Constitution either the rate of six or seven per cent.? Remember that we are making an instrument for a long series of years. Such a provision might not be acceptable to the people for a year and would require to be changed. The rate of interest for money would change probably with every varying year. It might be too great now; it might be too little next year; and therefore it is unwise to fix it in the Constitution.

Now, as I am not in favor of saying that the Legislature shall never fix the rate of interest for the non-payment of money, and because I think it is wise there should be a limit fixed when a debt is unpaid what the damages shall be for non-payment, I believe such a provision is wise and should be retained. It is, therefore, that I am opposed to denying the Legislature the power to fix the rate of interest. As they have fixed it wisely and as it does suit our circumstances, I shall be entirely opposed to saying that they shall never fix any rate, and thus leave that open. I think, therefore, the best thing we can do is to negative the proposition of my friend from Lebanon and then negative the report of the committee itself.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President: In the interest of labor, whether it is agricultural, manufacturing, or of any other description, I beg of the Convention to vote this down. It is the very worst sort of legislation. We seem to be going around in every direction to find opponents to make opposition to the Constitution, and if you go on piling them up one after another—you did a great deal in that direction yesterday—we may just as well adjourn. It is utterly impossible that our Constitution shall ever be adopted unless we put an end to this system of legislation. We were appointed here to revise a Constitution and not to make laws. We have been making laws all the time, and we are now making worse laws than we have made yet.

I beg and pray that this whole question of money may be left out of the Constitution. It belongs to the Legislature. For years and years this has been pushed and urged on the Legislature, by the money-lenders, the men that want nine, ten, fifteen and twenty per cent. They have been begging the Legislature; but the Legislature has steadfastly refused to give them the power they want. They now tell us the reason is that the people are so stupid that they cannot understand it. Sir, the people understand their true interests. The people do not believe in paying ten per cent. or twenty per cent. The people do not believe in building up the fortunes of city millionaires, or country millionaires either.

Now, we have in this city forty thousand houses of working men, that are under mortgage. Are you going to enlist all those people against your Constitution? Are you going to compel every man who thinks as I do, that this is an abomination, to go into the field against you when the Constitution is submitted? I say distinctly, that you may make a Constitution as good as you can, you may make it as perfect in all other respects as you can, and if you put in these provisions that are asked for, they will so far counterbalance all the good there is in it that I shall feel it my duty to advise everybody by speaking and by writing to oppose the Constitution, and I will do it. I know one thing is certain, that the working men of the State will believe in me. For one vote that the gentlemen who urge this can command in this city on this subject, I will engage to furnish a thousand.

Now, are we to go around and beg and pray people to oppose the Constitution? Are we to seek everywhere opponents for the Constitution? Would it not be a great mistake? Remember, I am not asking you to omit anything that ought to be put in the Constitution. I am asking you not to legislate on this, the most important question that can come before us. Let us make a Constitution and let us quit the idea of making laws. Then we shall have some chance of having the Constitution adopted.

Mr. MACCONNELL. I merely rise to say that I desire to call the attention of the Convention to the tenth section of the article on legislation, which has been already adopted. It reads thus: "The Legislature shall not pass any local or special law fixing the rate of interest." It seems to me that that covers the whole ground. If you will make a law authorizing corporations to pay more or receive more interest than individuals, certainly that will be a special law, and it is prohibited by the provision that I have read.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. President: I do not intend to discuss this subject; I merely rise to say that I think this amendment to the section and the section ought both to be voted down.

Mr. CAREY. Yes; let us vote them down.

Mr. WOODWARD. The reason presented to my mind why this should be done, is not exactly the reason that my venerable friend from the city (Mr. Carey) has put forward. All this legislation to interfere between the relations of borrower and lender is injudicious. We must leave our fellow-citizens free to make their own bargains. I suppose that a constitutional provision which would regulate the manner in which these young men shall court and marry their wives would be judicious; but if that were proposed they would answer that they preferred to attend to that business in their own way. And we should leave this matter of borrowing and lending money to be regulated by the parties who sustain those relations. If one man has money to lend and another wants to borrow, let them agree upon the terms on which they shall borrow and lend. I object to a constitutional provision on the subject.

In justice to the Committee on Private Corporations, let me say that they have reported no such section. It has been interpolated upon us. I am going to vote against it, and I hope the House will vote it down.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEAB. I propose to say a word on the section. There seems to be an intention on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Private Corporations (Mr. Woodward) to inform the Convention that this section crept into this article without the aid of that committee, and he says that it was interpolated. I believe that it ought to pass, if not in its present, in some other form. Whatever effect it may have upon the Legislature with regard to this question of interest we may not be able to foresee, nor do I consider it important; but I consider it important for the financial and the business interests of Pennsylvania that there should be some regular established rate of interest by law in the State, and that that rate of interest should be left so that we can enforce it. For that reason it is that I think we should not have these shaving shops that have been sprinkled all over our State, paying interest for deposits and shaving the people at enormous rates of interest, when the regular monied institutions, the national banks of the State, are prohibited by an act of Congress from charging more than six per cent. for the money which they loan.

Why should there be this great difference? Why should these private banks be allowed to charge ten or twelve or fifteen per cent. for their money, which enables them to buy up all the deposits at the legal rate of interest, five or six per cent., which the national banks ought to have for nothing, in order that they may accommodate the whole business community with money at the regular legal rate of interest in this Commonwealth? I am connected myself with an institution of that kind, and in discounts in one year in a little bank in our county we have reached the sum of two millions of dollars, on notes that did not average three hundred dollars each, and all those discounts went to the farmers, mechanics and laboring men to pay their hands, and purchase stock and materials, at the season of the year when their means are small, because they are receiving no return from their crops, and in their regular course of business. Now, this money was diffused throughout a whole community for the regular business purposes of that community at six per cent. But there may be a bank upon the opposite side of the street, that pays six per cent. for its deposits, and loans its money, not to all the people of the community, but to a few favorites, or lame ducks who are engaged in some irregular pursuit or speculative employment, by which they can pay a rate of interest which would be ruinous to a regular and legitimate business, and thus enable the shaving banks to buy up all the deposits at interest, which the national banks ought to have for nothing in order to furnish the business community with the necessary means to carry on the legitimate trade and traffic of the people.

We look to the national currency as the best currency we have. Our national banks are prohibited from loaning more than ten per cent of their respective capital to any one individual. These private banks may loan any sum they please to a single party. I was connected, in a professional way, not long since, in collecting money against an estate where it appeared that a private bank in a neighboring county had loaned one man $80,000, and that at enormous rates of interest. I say this is all wrong. It is wrong to allow these private banks to do that, and it is proper that we should put into our Constitution some rate of interest which will regulate these transactions between borrowers and lenders. It ought to be a fair rate. I do not care whether it is six per cent., or seven, or eight, or five; but there ought to be a fair and equal rate for every man as well as every corporation, for every firm as well as every company; and I also do not see how there can be any objection to prohibiting these banks from receiving, directly or indirectly, a rate of interest which allows them to buy up at a legal rate all the money of the community, and thus keep it out of the business channels of the State.

I want the section to go further. I want to say that Jay Cooke & Co., Drexel & Co., DeHaven & Bro. and E. W. Clark & Co., and all the other private banks shall not go into the market with their money and say, "here, you can have money by discounting this paper at ten per cent." You can go to Third street to-day and buy the notes of corporations or of individuals, or of private banks. You can buy the paper, of a man who has recently been quoted in the public papers of the State as being worth twenty millions of dollars. I allude to Ario Pardee. You can buy his paper, guaranteed by the Lehigh Valley railroad company, at a discount of ten per cent. You can buy Asa Packer's paper guaranteed by the Lehigh Valley railroad company, at a discount of ten per cent. Yet gentlemen say that the legal rate of interest in Pennsylvania is six per cent. So it is, but if you have a legal rate of interest, that is not or cannot be enforced, it is no legal rate at all, and there is no legal rate of interest when you can buy all these men's paper at this large discount. The national banks cannot do that, and they are the banks on which you rely, the banks that have not only to deposit dollar for dollar with the government of the United States, the bonds of that government as security for their notes, but can then only issue notes to the extent of ninety per cent. upon those deposits, and hence their paper is as good in California as it is in Philadelphia. Even if one of these banks, by some mismanagement, or some dishonest conduct upon the part of its officers, should fail, the notes of that national bank will still sell in the market at a premium after it has failed. Yet you cripple these institutions for the purpose of building up speculative interests, for the purpose of building up private corporations, for the purpose of building up those men and firms who are amassing enormous fortunes, who should be looked to as a portion of the oppressive power upon the poor in this Commonwealth, for we should not look to corporations alone.

I am opposed to them all, all of them having a different rate of interest in this State from that which the law allows. I say that we should confine them all, and let us put in a prohibition that no banking company and no corporation shall receive more interest than the legal rate fixed by the law of the State; and, if you please, I am willing to fix it in the Constitution if they are afraid that it will drive the Legislature to fixing a higher rate of interest. Why, we have to-day $50,000,000 and probably $100,000,000 invested by the trust companies of Philadelphia in Missouri and Illinois, where they have their agents regularly appointed to invest their money and collect their interest, and that money goes out of the material interests and the enterprises of Pennsylvania to where they can get a higher rate of interest, and that is because we are looking to that narrow and contracted policy, as I think, that we prohibit parties from making a bargain for the rate of money they shall have directly instead of indirectly.

Everything else has raised in price. I say that I am in favor of raising the rate of interest, and if we have a rate of interest let us have it universal and not partial. I am in favor of raising the rate of interest because I believe it would be to the interest of those very working classes with whom the gentleman from Philadelphia has not associated more than I have. He knows nothing more about the agricultural interest of this State, although he has theorized it, and wrote about it for years; but a year's experience is worth a life of dreaming, and I would not give a farthing for all the theorizing, unless it was based upon well-established and sufficiently proved facts or personal experience; and I know what our farmers, laborers, mechanics and business men require, and need, from actual observation and in the practical business of life.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President: I desire to say only a few words on this question. I think it is highly injudicious that this section should pass. Prior to 1723, as is very well known, the legal rate of interest in Pennsylvania was eight per cent. In that year it was reduced to six per cent. This section I think would be wholly nugatory, it could not be enforced, and is therefore useless, and would be a mere incumbrance to the Constitution, and as such would be a reproach to the Convention which should insert it. The section prohibits any banking or other corporation to receive or pay, directly or indirectly, a greater rate of interest than is allowed by law to individuals. It is the law as to banking institutions now, and it has been over and over so held by the Supreme Court that they may purchase paper at a discount, and yet that is only a mode of receiving interest. So also corporations when they make their bonds and put them into market sell them at what they are worth. They have a certain market value and selling them at a reduced rate is their privilege to do. It is not usury and they have the right to do it, and when they cannot get more than a certain selling rate they would be forced to sell at such rate or stop their work. The law would be evaded in that respect by a hundred devices which no law could prevent.

But it is said that they shall not receive or pay a greater interest than is allowed by law to individuals. By the act of 1857 commission merchants and agents of parties not residing in this Commonwealth may contract for interest at seven per cent. Thus we find that it would be the easiest thing in the world for the Legislature to render a provision of this kind nugatory by simply enacting that some individual or class of individuals might receive interest thus and so. I think it is far wiser and safer to leave this provision under the protection of that section which we have already adopted in the article on legislation, that no local or special act fixing the rate of interest shall be passed. It is safely vested there, and any act or any provision of the Constitution which undertakes to carry it beyond that will be an entire failure, because the modes of evasion are so easy that such law could not be enforced.

The two many reasons why it ought not to pass, but to my own mind these reasons are conclusive.

Mr. BIDDLE. I am in favor of this section. I have listened with great attention to the arguments for and against it; but I think it is right to place in the fundamental law a provision of this kind. What does it tell us? Simply that equality is equity. Simply that no distinction shall be made hereafter between the private corporation, the bank or the railroad company, and the individual.

Now, sir, I do not propose to discuss here whether it be wise or not to establish in the fundamental law a specific rate of interest; probably I should vote against that; but I do say that so long as you adhere to the principle of having a fixed rate of interest, of prohibiting a free traffic in money, no distinction should be made between the individual and the corporation. The corporation starts already with many advantages over the individual. It has got rid of the principle of individual liability. It starts on the principle of liability only to the extent of the stock, whereas an individual in business is obliged to jeopard every cent of his property. Now, what reason is there for the distinction? If the corporations, as we are told by their advocates, cannot compete in making lines of public improvement without borrowing at a higher rate of interest than that established by law, then I appeal to the common sense of every man here if it is not an irresistible argument against laying down a fixed rate of interest. Let the rate of interest be fixed by the Legislature, and expanded and contracted according to the exigencies of the community; but if you do fix it, say to the corporations, "you shall deal and be dealt with just as the individual." I cannot see a single argument against this section, and I see many for it, and I trust it will receive the sanction of the House.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Does the gentleman know that it has not been fixed in reference to individuals at all in the Constitution?

Mr. BIDDLE. I am perfectly aware of that. I started with saying that it had not been, and that I thought it unwise; but ever since we have been a people, ever since we have been a province and a republic, this State has from time to time by enactments regulated the rate of interest beyond which it is illegal to go.

Now, I do say that if it is wise to regulate the rate of interest at all, it is wise to apply the limitation to everybody alike, and there is no reason why a great corporation should be allowed to lend or borrow, I do not care which, (take it in the alternative,) at a higher rate than the rest of the community. I therefore earnestly hope the section will pass.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman from Philadelphia allow me to call his attention to the fact that it is avowed by the friends of this section that the expected effect of it will be to compel the Legislature by the influence of corporations themselves to raise the rate of interest?

Mr. BIDDLE. I do not understand that it is so avowed by the friends of this section. I listened with great attention to the argument yesterday and to-day. I know well that the gentleman from Columbia presented that as a new view of the question; but I never heard it avowed by the friends of the section that that was its purpose. I do not care if it is its purpose, if it is right that a large portion of the community should have the right to traffic in money at a rate different from that established by law, then it is right and fair for all; and gentlemen cannot get out of this dilemma. If they vote against this provision, they are saying to the individual undertaker of an enterprise, "you start handicapped and handcuffed in the race of commercial enterprise, but the great corporations shall be entirely discharged from the obligations to obey the law, and they may distance you in the race. Compete with them if you can under this great disadvantage." I can not imagine anything fairer than such a provision as this.

Now, as I am about to sit down, I do not intend to answer any more questions. Gentlemen may discuss the subject as they choose.

Mr. MACVEAGH. I simply rise to protest against such morality for the guidance of a Constitutional Convention from such a source. It seems to me that it is unworthy of the distinguished gentleman whose candor has been such a charm in his arguments in this Convention to tell us that it is perfectly right, after we have agreed to leave the entire question of the rate of interest to the Legislature, after we have rejected a provision fixing the rate of interest, that we should then insert a provision having no necessary or proper relation whatever to it in order to put a compulsion upon the Legislature to compel them to legislate as he desires them to do.

It appears to me to be an unworthy view, come from whatever source it may. If we want to say that no law shall be passed regulating the rate of interest, it is our duty to say so, and if a majority of this Convention decide that they will not say that, it is not worthy of him to ask us by an indirect and cowardly provision to put that in the Constitution which will, he thinks, compel the Legislature to pass such a law.

Now, it is perfectly right for men to differ on the question of usury laws. We heard elaborate arguments upon both sides of that question. We were asked to put a provision in the Constitution by the gentleman from Philadelphia on my left, whom we all respect so thoroughly, (Mr. Knight,) forbidding the Legislature to regulate the rate of interest, and we listened to elaborate arguments from the gentleman from Delaware and other gentlemen in favor of that proposition. We heard an elaborate and exhaustive argument from the gentleman from Philadelphia on my right, (Mr. Carey,) whose studies in this direction have given him a fame all over the civilized world. And upon a balance of the arguments this Convention decided to leave it to the Legislature without a binding provision in the Constitution. Now, I say it is not wise, according to my view of things, to take an indirect, unworthy and cowardly method of securing a proposition that upon a direct vote we voted down. I understand that this proposition was declared yesterday by two or three gentlemen in favor of it to lead directly to that result, to secure the repeal of the usury laws by indirection, by compelling the great corporations, I suppose, to buy their repeal from the Legislature and thus re-inaugurate some of the worst evils we are endeavoring to escape.

Mr. LILLY. Mr. President: I do not desire to add very much to what has been said on this question; but I believe in the truth of what was said by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) and the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle;) and it must be very refreshing to this Convention, as it is to me, to hear the gentleman from Dauphin, (Mr. MacVeagh,) like satan, rebuking sin. Instead of meeting the question fairly and arguing it, he undertakes to say it is cowardly and sneaking to vote for such a thing as this. It is only putting corporations on an equality with everybody else, and it is right and proper to do it, and I will stand by it. The gentleman from Lycoming (Mr. Armstrong) talked about the corporations selling their bonds in the market at the market rates. You will not allow an individual to do that; it is usury for an individual to do it. All we ask is that individuals shall stand along side of corporations on the same basis.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. President: I am somewhat surprised at the language of the gentleman from Dauphin—

Mr. CARTER. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The delegate from Lancaster will state his point of order.

Mr. CARTER. It is that the gentleman from Delaware has spoken once.

Mr. TEMPLE. Only on the amendment, which has been voted down.

Mr. BROOMALL. I have not spoken on the section since the amendment was voted down.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The gentleman's remarks before were on the amendment, and he is now entitled to the floor on the section.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. President: I had the honor to offer the provision in this section which has been characterized in language so extraordinary, at an earlier stage of the business of this Convention. If there is anything sneaking or cowardly in it, it belongs to me. I take the responsibility of having offered the provision. I trust the gentleman from Dauphin knows the district I represent and one of its representatives well enough to know that it is not he who should import Harrisburg morality to set up against the morality of the district of Chester and Delaware! He knows both places too well. He knows that there is nothing sneaking or cowardly in this proposition. He is too shrewd a man not to see that if there is anything sneaking or cowardly, it is a sneaking and cowardly blow, nay, more than that, a bold blow in the face of Harrisburg borers who made money by getting legislation for the benefit of corporations and against individuals. If this is passed, no longer can the agents of corporations go to the men skilled in manipulating legislators and say, "if you will get us a special privilege that is not allowed to individuals in the way of entering the money market, we will pay you so much money." If it is a blow at anything, it is a blow at that business; and if that business is sanctioned by Dauphin county morality, I trust that this Convention will not incline much to it.

Sir, this proposition is an open one and a fair one. It is nothing more than every individual has a right to demand of his government, and to denounce his government if it does not give it to him. It is nothing more nor less than that every individual has a right to take up arms even against his government to get—and that is equality in the law and before the law—the right to do under and before the law what every other individual or individuals associated together have the right to do. "Sneaking!" "Cowardly!" When those who represent men upon this floor demanding rights come here to say that corporations shall not have special privileges in order that they may traffic in Harrisburg law, when delegates come here and demand for individuals the same rights that these favored creatures of Harrisburg legislation have, we are to be told that we are acting sneakingly and underhandedly, and that we are making a cowardly attempt. Sir, I deny it. It is a bold attempt, and it is the boldest blow that has been struck at corrupt legislation for years and years.

Sir, you know when this thing began, when the first corporation got a special privilege to allow it to enter the money market by the front door and boldly crowd out private individuals. Then it was that this government had disgraced itself by its legislation. That was the worst of all special legislation and the business has gone on from that day to this, until to-day the only bidder that is excluded from the market of one of the most important commodities of the world is the man, the individual, the citizen, and he is excluded by these Harrisburg creations who undertake by their representatives to foist Harrisburg morality upon this Convention.

I hope this section will pass, and I hope that every man who votes against it will go home to his constituents and say to the poor farmers who have to give twelve and fifteen per cent. for their money, while the corporations can get it for eight and nine, "we have done the deed; we have crushed you for years and you cannot get from under the load that we have placed upon you." We have given these corporations a lease of life, and a lease of all you own that will hold until at least the time arrives when another change in the Constitution can be made.

Sir, if there is anything that we have a right to demand of this Convention, it is equality before the law for every man in the community, and that at least, if there is to be any inequality, the inequality be in favor of the individual and not in favor of the corporation.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. President: If this section is to pass, it seems to me that it requires modification. I should be in favor of a uniform law, if it were possible to make one that would put all business transactions upon an equality. I am not prepared to say that such a thing is possible. I will state my amendment. I move to amend by striking out the words "to individuals," the two last words in the section, and inserting after the first word "no" the words "individual firm or," so that the section will read:

"No individual, firm or banking or other corporation shall receive or pay directly or indirectly a greater rate of interest than is allowed by law."

Mr. President, the gentleman from Bucks (Mr. Lear) is in favor of putting the national banks upon a par with other bankers in the State by limiting all to the legal rate of interest, in discount charges. Now, I doubt very much whether any gentleman could go into the county-seat of the county which the gentleman from Bucks represents on this floor and obtain the discount of a note at six per cent. interest, the present legal rate. If I were to present myself at the national bank with which the gentleman is connected in his county town and were to ask to have a note discounted at six per cent. interest I would be told, "No, sir, you must keep an account with this bank before we can discount your note. We discount only for such as keep deposits with us." It is a rule that is well understood by every business man. No notes are discounted at six per cent. The rate is nominally six per cent., it is true, but unless a deposit is kept in the bank which makes the discount equivalent to eight, nine, ten or twelve per cent., as the market value of money runs, you can get no discount. I appeal to the experience of every member on this floor at all acquainted with business transactions with national banks to say if this is not so.

A section of this character, in my judgment, is simply void and of no effect. It is folly to put into the organic law anything which is inoperative. If it were possible, as I said in the outset, to make a uniform provision that would be operative and of any reliable validity I should be in favor of it. I believe it would be a wise and judicious measure of reform because we should then have a rate of interest fixed in this Commonwealth that would retain our money here and not as now, drive it out of our State into other communities by illiberal restrictions. If this section is to pass I hope my amendment will prevail. It widens the scope of the section and makes it apply to all alike. I hope it will be made as uniform in this respect as language can make it if it is the purpose of the House to adopt it, though I firmly believe it will practically prove inoperative.

Mr. HUNSICKER. I move further to amend by inserting after the word "other," the word "private."

Mr. TEMPLE. That was voted down yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The amendment is not in order. It was moved yesterday and voted down.

Mr. HUNSICKER. This is an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Lehigh.

Mr. AINEY. I accept the amendment if it is in order for me to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The gentleman from Lehigh modifies his amendment by accepting the suggestion of the gentleman from Montgomery.

Mr. DALLAS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the word "general."

Mr. AINEY. I misapprehended the amendment of the gentleman from Montgomery. I do not accept it in that form. That would shut out municipal corporations. I desire them to be included in the provision.

Mr. HUNSICKER. Then I renew the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. It is not in order.

Mr. DALLAS. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Lehigh by inserting the word "general" between the words "by" and "law" in the second line, so as to make it read:

"No individual, firm, or banking or other corporation shall receive or pay, directly or indirectly, a greater rate of interest than may be allowed by general law."

To leave it as it is would be to permit a special law to allow it.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, to insert after the word "by" the word "general."

Mr. DALLAS. Otherwise the amendment of the gentleman from Lehigh would leave it for the Legislature to make it valid by law; by a special act in any case. We certainly do not mean that.

Mr. ANDREW REED. If this section would have the effect which its friends on this floor claim for it, I should be in favor of it. As the section read before it was amended, and as it was reported from the committee of the whole, the object intended was, I think, a good one. I see no reason why a corporation should have an advantage which a private individual has not. But I do not think, in the manner in which the original section stands, it will have the effect for which its friends contend; it will be entirely nugatory. I agree with the able speech which the gentleman from Bucks (Mr. Lear) made on the floor. He has stated that you can go to Third street now and get the paper of the best men in the State at nine or ten per cent. Will this section have the effect of remedying that? Clearly not. It only prevents banking and other corporations from paying any greater rate of interest than is paid by individuals. You will not by this section prevent the buying of paper at a discount. A man can sell the paper of another person which he has, at any rate that it will bring in the market, and that is the way it is done. That is perfectly legal; it is not amenable to the law of usury; and what will be the effect then of this section? It will be that we shall then have no bonds bearing a greater rate of interest than six per cent., but we shall have bonds selling on the market at ninety per cent., at eighty per cent., or perhaps at seventy-five per cent.; whenever there is an industry which requires money that can pay such a rate of interest for its development, that industry will get the money. They will sell their bonds at a great sacrifice, for that they can do, and that will be the effect of this section. A railroad company will trade its bonds and pass them over to a broker, and the broker will sell them for what he can get, and in that way, indirectly, the corporations will get their money. It is true that the amendment of the gentleman from Lehigh would make the section more effective; but what will be the effect of that? It will be to cripple the interests of this whole State. It is just the same as saying that unless a person can get money at the rate of six per cent., he must do without, unless by giving his commercial paper in such a way as to avoid the law, or by some back-door arrangement.

This will not be done where it can be avoided, and it can be avoided by going to another State. Our people will go to New Jersey or New York or some other place outside of the State, and pay there seven or eight per cent. for what money they need. The effect will be to drive capital out of the State. It is, in my opinion, the worst provision that could be put in the Constitution, because the Constitution is not the place to regulate this question of the value of money. Money may be worth six or seven percent. at one time or in a certain section of the State, and at another time or in another section it may be worth eight. Far better leave the subject to the Legislature, to be controlled at different periods, according to the requirements of the time. The best thing that this Convention could do would be to leave money free between the lender and the borrower up to a certain rate, which would be inconsiderable, and within which it should be restricted. Then individuals and corporations would be on a par. If you want to borrow money, you go to a man who has it and you give him what he is willing to take. There should be, I concede, some limit which would protect persons from unconscionable contracts, the effect of which they did not see at the time they were entering into them; but outside of that the best provision that could be made, and which would do away with all these evils, would be to let persons agree upon the rate of interest between themselves, face to face. For that reason I must vote against this section, because, in the first place, I think if the section is amended so as to make it effective, it will have a bad effect; and in the next place, if we pass the section as reported from the committee of the whole, I do not think it will have the effect intended by its friends, but will be a mere brutum fulmen.

Mr. BAER. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Philadelphia, who moved to insert the word "general" before the word "law," to the fact that there can be no necessity for adopting that amendment. We have already provided in the tenth section of the article on legislation against legislating either by general or special law on the subject of the rate of interest. Therefore there is no necessity for the word "general" in the section.

Mr. AINEY. If in order at this time, I would like to modify my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. It will be better to take the question first on the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas) to the amendment.

Mr. BIDDLE. I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. It is to insert the word "general" before the word "law."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. J. R. READ. I would suggest to the gentleman from Lehigh the insertion of the word "or" before "firm," so as to read: "No individual or firm, or banking or other corporation," &c. I think that will read better, and accomplish what the gentleman desires.

Mr. AINEY. I accept the modification.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Upon this amendment I desire to say that I do not see that it prevents special privileges being granted to corporations. This is legislation—

Mr. AINEY. If the gentleman will allow me, I wish to modify my amendment so as to withdraw that portion of it and strike out the words "to individuals."

Mr. MACVEAGH. Then let us have it read as modified.

The CLERK read as follows:

"No individual, firm or banking or other corporation, shall receive or pay, directly or indirectly, a greater rate of interest than is allowed by law to individuals."

Mr. MACVEAGH. The objection I see to this section still, as it occurs to my mind—although in that I may be entirely mistaken—is that it is direct legislation and that the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broomall) is entirely mistaken in the consequences of the adoption of it. This section will require immediate action by the Legislature. It repeals the laws now existing. It repeals the privileges given to corporations, or to individuals if you choose, to sell their securities indirectly at a higher rate of interest, and thus it compels the great corporations to go to Harrisburg to lobby for a law to suit them; and it was in that direction, after the speech of the gentleman from Columbia, (Mr. Buckalew,) and the adoption temporarily of that argument by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) that I made the remarks I did. The suggestions of the gentleman from Columbia were that the section was urged for this reason, and it seemed to me to be so wide a departure from the tone of arguments I had formerly heard in this body, that when the gentleman from Philadelphia openly avowed that reason I was greatly surprised. I am told by a gentleman on my right that in the heat of that discussion I used adjectives or epithets that I should not have used. If I did use them, I withdraw them as to the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Biddle.) I would withdraw them as to the delegate from Delaware who became so excited, (Mr. Broomall,) except that I had not in my mind the idea that he was the father of the section. In fact I did not know that he had introduced it at all, or spoken in favor of it—I did not happen to be in the room when he spoke. I was alluding exclusively to the argument he made on the subject of the usury laws when that question was before the Convention; I thought I was complimenting him all the time and that he was smiling his gratification about it. I had no idea he was applying to himself remarks which had no shadow of reference to him. His excitement was wholly unnecessary.

My objection is this still, that it is an indirect way of getting at the result that this Convention decided, when directly offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia, not to adopt. Now, will it prevent corrupt legislation, because that we are told is one of its objects? I may be mistaken, but remember this is an act of Assembly you are putting in the Constitution. It says that the moment this Constitution goes into effect no bond shall be sold above the rate of interest allowed by the statute. What does that compel? It compels every railroad corporation and every other corporation—railroads are not alone in this matter—to go to Harrisburg and lobby for a change of that law—and to continue corrupting the Legislature as they have been doing.

Do they need any special legislation now? They need buy nothing now. But if you put this in the Constitution then they will need to buy legislation. If this Convention wants to prevent any laws regulating the rate of interest, the gentleman from Philadelphia has a section that does that in a fair, square, manly way, and if it is desired to adopt any such measure, that could be passed. But I cannot conquer my repugnance to this method of doing it, and I do not believe that under the laws we have passed that the Legislature will pass one set of laws for corporations and another for individuals. If that is what is meant, to require all laws relating to the rate of interest to bear equally upon corporate and individual enterprises, I have no objection to that, none whatever, but I have objection to putting a repealing statute in the Constitution that will compel these corporations to go to Harrisburg and purchase legislation, for they will be driven to the necessity of doing that by such a section as this. Therefore, as we voted down the other section it seems to me that we ought to vote this down also. Even if I was in favor of the repeal of the usury laws I would not consent to secure their repeal by this indirect method.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Lehigh (Mr. Ainey.)

Mr. AINEY. I call for the yeas and nays.

More than ten members rising to second the call, the yeas and nays were taken with the following result:

Y E A S .

Messrs. Ainey, Baily, (Perry,) Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bannan, Biddle, Boyd, Brodhead, Broomall, Cochran, Cuyler, Davis, De France, Ellis, Fell, Gibson, Gilpin, Harvey, Hemphill, Kaine, Knight, Lamberton, Lear, Lilly, M'Clellan, M'Culloch, M'Murray, Mann, Patton, Purman, Read, John R., Reed, Andrew, Runk, Russell, Smith, Henry W., Wherry, White, Harry and Wright—37.

N A Y S .

Messrs. Achenbach, Alricks, Andrews, Armstrong, Baer, Bardsley, Black, Chas. A., Bowman, Brown, Buckalew, Bullitt, Calvin, Campbell, Carey, Carter, Church, Clark, Corbett, Corson, Cronmiller, Curry, Dallas, Darlington, Dodd, Dunning, Edwards, Elliott, Ewing, Finney, Fulton, Funck, Guthrie, Hall, Hanna, Horton, Howard, Hunsicker, Lawrence, Littleton, Long, MacConnell, MacVeagh, Mantor, Metzger, Mott, Niles, Palmer, G. G., Stanton, Stewart, Struthers, Temple, Turrell, Walker, Wetherill, John Price, White, David N., Woodward and Worrell—67.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

ABSENT—Messrs. Addicks, Baker, Barclay, Bartholomew, Beebe, Bigler, Black,

J. S., Cassidy, Collins, Craig, Curtin, Green, Hay, Hazzard, Heverin, Landis, M'Camant, Minor, Mitchell, Newlin, Reynolds, Rooke, Ross, Sharpe, Smith, Wm. H., Van Reed, Wetherill, J. M., White, J. W. F. and Meredith, President—29.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question recurs on the section.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President: Now that we have come back to the section itself, I hope that the Convention will vote it down. It is just one of those things which are in themselves mere brutum fulmen; they amount to nothing substantially; and although I voted for the amendment because I supposed if the section was to pass it would be an improvement upon it, I earnestly hope that the section will be voted down. The inevitable result of passing a section of this kind is to bring to bear upon the Legislature of the State the very worst kind of influence, that kind of influence which obtains special legislation under the color and cover of general laws, and there has been as much mischief done in the way of legislation by such laws as there has been by the most narrow private individual laws that have been enacted at any time by the Legislature.

Now, sir, the idea of its creating an equality between individuals and corporations, and taking away from the latter a special privilege or capacity which they now enjoy, although it has been sustained by the distinguished gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) whose opinions I always receive with profound respect, appears to me to be entirely delusive. The laws now make no such distinction except as they are based upon special enactments. Those enactments are passed, and we have no further control over them; they are gone; and for the future we have established all the equality which we can establish by the section in the article on legislation to which the attention of the Convention was called by the gentleman from Allegheny this morning, and there is no necessity for inserting in this Constitution an article of legislation like this, for it is that if it be anything, or what is, in my opinion, a section which has no force, no effect and scarcely any meaning whatever. It will tend to no good, and I hope, therefore, that the section will be voted down.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the eighth section.

Mr. HUNSICKER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, ten delegates rising to second the call.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken by yeas and nays with the following result:

Y E A S .

Messrs. Achenbach, Ainey, Alricks, Andrews, Baer, Baily, (Perry,) Bannan, Biddle, Brodhead, Broomall, Bullitt, Campbell, Curry, Cuyler, Dallas, Davis, De France, Dodd, Fell, Finney, Gibson, Gilpin, Guthrie, Harvey, Hay, Hemphill, Horton, Howard, Knight, Lear, Lilly, Long, MacConnell, M'Clean, M'Culloch, M'Murray, Mann, Mott, Patton, Russell, Smith, H. G., Smith, Henry W., Stanton, Struthers, Temple, Walker, Wetherill, Jno. Price and Wright—48.

N A Y S .

Messrs. Armstrong, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bardsley, Bigler, Black, Charles A., Bowman, Boyd, Brown, Buckalew, Calvin, Carey, Carter, Church, Clark, Cochran, Corbett, Corson, Cronmiller, Darlington, Edwards, Elliott, Ellis, Ewing, Fulton, Funck, Hall, Hanna, Hunsicker, Kaine, Lamberton, Lawrence, Littleton, MacVeagh, Mantor, Metzger, Niles, Palmer, G. So the section was rejected.

ABSENT.—Messrs. Addicks, Baker, Barclay, Bartholomew, Beebe, Black, J. M., White, J. W. F. and Meredith, President—29.

The CLERK read the next section as follows:

SECTION 9. All insurance companies incorporated by other States, and doing business in this State, shall be subject to the same rate and measure of taxation as similar companies incorporated by this State.

Mr. EWING. Mr. President: When a new section on a new subject is incorporated in the Constitution, there should be some good and sufficient reason for it; it should be intended to remedy some existing evil, which legislation apparently will not remedy or cannot remedy, or to promote some great public good. I was absent when this article was disposed of in committee of the whole, and have been at a great loss to understand why some of the provisions reported by the Committee on Corporations were stricken out and this one left in; and in the absence of knowing those reasons, I can only suppose that the Convention must have got in the way of voting down everything at one time and voting in everything again at another time.

Now, here is a section applicable to the manner of taxation of foreign insurance companies. Why they should be selected out rather than all foreign corporations, I am unable to see; or why foreign corporations at all should be touched in this article. Has there ever been any great evil in the State from foreign companies being overtaxed? I do not believe there has been. My own belief is that our own domestic corporations have been taxed at a higher rate than the foreign corporations have, and I can see no advantage in incorporating this section in the Constitution, and I can see several reasons why this should not be here and wherein it may be found to be very disadvantageous to the State.

We can tax our own insurance companies in a great many different ways. We can tax their capital stock; we can tax their entire business; we can tax their entire receipts. We have them and their property entirely within the control of the legislation of the State, but we cannot so tax the foreign insurance companies. About the only tax we can put on them is on the business that they do in the State or a license, and this section would probably prevent the taxation of the business of a foreign insurance company, or a license for it at a higher rate than that of a domestic insurance company, leaving it free from all other taxes, and our own companies being subject to numerous taxes; and, in fact, the Legislature might under this provision be compelled either to remove the taxes on our own companies or to give the foreign companies a very great advantage. I can see no necessity for putting any such section here in the Constitution. If there be any evil in this State arising from the question of insurance that has not been met by legislation, I take it to be this, that we have had until very recently—

Mr. MACVEAGH. Will the gentleman allow me? Perhaps there is nobody earnestly in favor of this section. It is a matter of legislation purely. If there is not, we might take the vote at once. If there is I do not want to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. EWING. It is only from the fact that it had gone through the committee of the whole that I rose to say a word. I think the only subject on which there was any doubt about the necessity of a constitutional provision was this: Heretofore the Legislature of this State has not provided for the inspection of insurance companies so as to make them safe; and I venture to say that two-thirds of the companies doing business in this State are unsafe either as life insurance companies or as fire insurance companies. They have no sufficient capital paid in. Recently there has been an act of Assembly passed which looks towards curing those matters; and I think the whole subject may be safely left to the Legislature.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. President: This section was put into the report of the committee at the instance of a delegate from Allegheny county. Now, another delegate from Allegheny having convinced me and the whole House that it never ought to have been put in, I trust the House will vote it down.

The section was rejected.

Mr. WOODWARD. I offer the following amendment, as an additional section:

"It shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide by general enactment that any five or more persons, citizens of this Commonwealth, associated for the prosecution of any lawful business, may, by subscribing to articles of association and complying with all requirements of law, form themselves into an incorporated company, with or without limited liability, as may be expressed in the articles of association, and such publicity shall be provided for as shall enable all who trade with such corporations as adopt the limited liability to know that no liability exists beyond that of the joint capital which may have been subscribed."

I want the attention of the Convention for a very few minutes while I explain this subject. You are aware, sir, that our venerable friend from Philadelphia, (Mr. Carey,) the oldest man in this body, and who ought to be the wisest, and perhaps he is, was the chairman of the committee to whom the industrial interests of this great State were referred. That gentleman made a report which was printed and which I have read attentively and carefully. That report concluded by recommending a constitutional amendment to the effect of that which I have offered. I have before me a printed copy of the very text which his committee recommended, and I am going to ask that it may be read in order that the Convention may have both before them. In drawing and submitting the section which I have offered, I did it because I preferred the phraseology which I have used to that which is in the section reported by the Committee on Industrial Interests; but they are both designed for the same purpose.

Now, what is that purpose? They are intended to introduce into Pennsylvania a principle of legislation that has long prevailed in England and in New England, and under which a vast amount of development has taken place, both in old England and in New England—the right of any number of citizens (which I have put at not less than five) to associate and become a corporation, with limited or unlimited liability as they shall agree and stipulate in their articles of association, for the purpose of prosecuting any lawful business that they may be disposed to engage in. If gentlemen will read the report of Mr. Carey they will see something of the development to which this principle has led in New England and in Great Britain; and assuredly there is reason for introducing into Pennsylvania a principle that has worked so well in those localities. We need it, for we have industries to be developed equal to theirs. True, they have been developed to a great extent; but not at all to the extent that they ought to be, and I trust will be in the immediate future.

Mr. President, we have the partnership law, which is entirely inadequate for these enterprises; we have the limited partnership law; and we have our mining and manufacturing acts of Assembly; and without going into a minute analysis of all this legislation, it is enough to say that none of them, singly or together, are adequate to the wants of Pennsylvania in this regard. If this amendment be adopted, the Legislature will be enabled to provide the people of Pennsylvania such a law on the general subject as will accomplish the results that have been accomplished under the British statutes and in several of the New England States.

Now, sir, for anything more that can be said in behalf of this amendment, I refer the Convention to the gentleman who is really responsible for the proposition (Mr. Carey.) I am in no wise responsible for it; he inspired it; I am only acting as his agent in bringing it before the Convention; and in order that the Convention may have his thought in his own language, I ask the Clerk to read the proposition as reported originally by him, and they will then choose between his language and mine, or reject both as they think proper.

The CLERK read as follows:

"The right of the people of the State to associate together for all lawful purposes, and for trading on principles of limited or unlimited liability, shall not be questioned; but it shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide by law for the organization of associations, and for securing a publicity so complete as to enable all who trade with those which adopt the limited form to become familiar with the fact that no liability exists beyond that of the joint capital which may have been subscribed."

MR. BIGLER. Mr. President: I think well of this proposition. I think it would answer the business interests of our State admirably. We have, it is true, some laws on this subject; but they are full of confusion—the limited partnership law and our mining and manufacturing laws. We need something more simple, more efficient and thorough, or rather more searching. I am inclined to favor this proposition; but I desire to suggest to the chairman of the committee an amendment which, in view of the sensitiveness that has existed on the subject, I think ought to be incorporated. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the section moved by the gentleman from Philadelphia:

"Except that the stockholders shall be liable in their individual estates for all debts due to labor."

This is a subject that has been discussed for many years in Legislatures, ours and elsewhere. I am aware that the opinion is entertained by some gentlemen of large experience that the omission of this clause will be harmless, but I do not think so. The usual escape from its responsibilities is attained by by-laws which forbid entirely the creation of debts for labor. There ought to be no such thing in any corporation or association for ordinary business purposes. They ought to make provision for prompt payment for labor; every week I prefer to a longer time. So far as I have had any connection with organizations of this kind, I have insisted on that kind of payment of labor. I do not think the clause would be restrictive.

MR. MACVEAGH. I should like to know if the gentleman does not think that the preferences already given by the general law to laborers is amply sufficient in that regard. It gives them, in case of the inability of a company, corporation, or individual in this State to pay its debts, a preference now to the extent of two hundred dollars of back wages.

MR. BIGLER. I am aware of that large protection; but this refers to a new system; this has reference to a law which shall spring out of this provision.

MR. MACVEAGH. But those laws will still apply.

MR. BIGLER. Those laws will apply if they are not repealed; but they may to some extent be superceded by the law which will grow out of this provision.

MR. CAREY. MR. President: The proposition contained in the article reported by the Committee on Industrial Interests is somewhat different from that offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia; and for myself I prefer it, for the reason that I think it more properly goes into the Constitution. It is a declaration of a right, with an instruction to the Legislature to carry that right into effect, whereas, the other is legislation. Nevertheless I accept with great pleasure the section just exactly as my friend (Mr. Woodward) has proposed it, and am perfectly willing to agree to it. What I want to see established is the right of the people to associate and to so associate freely. The grand difficulty in this State has been throughout, the imposition of liabilities of every sort and kind, by which capital has been driven and forced out of the State. Now, labor and land need to invite capital; and all these restrictions that are put, like the one that my friend from Clearfield has just presented, have a tendency to prevent people abroad from taking an interest in our improvements. Two years ago the Legislature passed an act by which the liability was restricted to the property of the company, and I believe that is all we want in the interest of labor for the purpose of bringing capital to the aid of labor. That is what I believe we ought to do; we ought to leave the law just as it stands now on the statute book.

No man likes to become a member of a concern where he is liable to be called upon for contributions over and above those which he has agreed to make. We have been piling one restriction upon top of another, and in preparing the report referred to I had occasion to look at our various laws; and from year to year they have been changed and twisted and turned until it seemed to me almost that it would require half a dozen Philadelphia lawyers to understand what a man's real liabilities were as a member of a corporation. Now, in the English law there is no liability of any sort or kind beyond the property of the company. But there is nothing in this proposition connected with that. That question is for the Legislature. All I want to see established is the right of two, three, five, ten or twenty people to come together and do business on such terms as they may agree with their neighbors. Nobody will doubt for a moment that my friend and I might come together and agree to be responsible for ten or twenty thousand dollars apiece, provided we got all the people to come and write their names down and agree to it; but that would be very troublesome. The English law has done very much better. The English law says that the word "limited"—and that is what we ought to do—shall in all such cases be the last word in the name of the company. No man doing business with them can ever doubt the fact that he is dealing with persons subject to a limited liability. Going to its office the word "limited" stares him in the face. He gets a note, a bond, a bill of lading, or anything of that company, and there is the word "limited." He is cautioned that there is a limitation; and it is his duty, his business, to take care of himself. Now, the more you require people to take care of themselves and think for themselves, the better. In all the charters we grant, a large portion of the people imagine that the Legislature has done something to take care of them, and consequently they do not take care of themselves; but the moment we provide that in all cases the word "limited" shall be used in the title of these companies, no man can make a mistake, and every one will take notice. All that is left for the Legislature. What is provided by either of these articles is the declaration of the right of the people to associate, and I believe that the adoption of this section will be of more use to the State than almost anything else this Convention can do. It will do more towards bringing capital into the State, towards aiding in developing our resources than almost anything we can do.

Look around in this city and see how many hundred people there are who are now in subordinate positions who are perfectly capable of being heads of establishments. They have not money, but if they could go around to half a dozen men who know them, and say "here, I want you to give me a thousand dollars apiece and I will make ten or twenty thousand for you," there is no difficulty, they can get plenty of money. But the difficulty is not only with the small people, but with the large ones. The owner of one of the largest chemical establishments in this city said to a friend of mine, "we could double and treble our business if we had capital, and if we had limited liability we could have all the capital we want." I know it. These difficulties in our laws now are so great that we need some one principle established that will put an end to them.

Now, as regards these two propositions, I am entirely indifferent which is accepted. They both have the same effect; but I prefer my own for the simple reason that as a declaration of right it is better in my opinion than the other, which is legislation.

Mr. STEWART. I move to amend by striking out all in the first line—

The PRESIDENT pro tem. There is an amendment to the amendment pending, which is that offered by the delegate from Clearfield (Mr. Bigler.)

Mr. BIDDLE. I wish to say a few words on this proposition. More than thirty years ago the Legislature of this State, having in view the propriety of allowing persons to associate together with limited liability, passed the statutes which we find in our digest of the laws of the State under the head of "Limited Partnership." From time to time various amendments have been made to the original act of 1836. The principle of that act was this: That a man of capital might embark his whole, or so much of his capital as he desired, in any commercial enterprise, without incurring a greater liability than the sum staked by him—a principle certainly very wise and very adaptive to the interests of this country, and of this State in particular, with its very varied classes of interests. It was found, however, in consequence of many of the provisions by which it was hedged, that it was only applicable to a very limited class of cases; indeed it never had anything like a very general trial. For instance, a provision which is found in the original law and which still remains is to this effect: That while the special partner, (that is the limited partner; the man who put in a specific sum beyond which, theoretically, he was not to be liable,) might advise as to the management of the business, he should transact no business on its account, nor be employed for that purpose as agent, attorney, or otherwise; and if he interfered contrary to this provision he was to be deemed a general partner; that is to say, the effect of this limitation was that the old, retired merchant or manufacturer of vast business experience and ability was practically prevented from interfering at all in the management of the concern; and while he might have twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty thousand dollars at stake under the language of this act, if he interfered beyond advising—and it was difficult to say how far he might go in that direction—he made himself liable generally. This was found to be a great defect. It was tantamount to saying, "you may enter into a special or limited partnership; but if you give your experience, if you give to the firm the benefit of the enlarged business views you have been for many years acquiring, if you interfere at all, you shall become a general partner." This was found to be a very serious evil; and twenty-five years ago the British government, looking to the importance of allowing persons to embark in any enterprise no matter what its character was, established this principle of limited associations, which were nothing more than partnerships in which the liability of each partner was fixed in advance, so that the whole world might know precisely how he was dealing. From time to time we endeavored to apply this principle to mining and manufacturing associations; but owing, as the chairman of the Committee on Industrial Interests has shown, to the very complicated and sometimes inconsistent provisions of the law, it did not tempt capitalists to embark in the way they should. Instead of the small dribbets of capital which are invested in savings funds and in other institutions at low rates of interest being used to foster and develop the large interests of the State, they were practically locked up.

Now, this proposition comes before the Convention recommended by the experience of more than a quarter of a century in a country which is eminently practical. It comes before this House recommended by a principle which we adopted nearly forty years ago, but which, unfortunately, we placed in a condition in which it could not work. It says in effect that you may make partnerships to any extent you like, putting in just such sums as you like, restricting the liability to the sum originally embarked, provided you forewarn the whole community that your liability shall not be beyond the sum placed in, by adding at the end of the name of the association, and probably by adding on all the business announcements of the association, the bill heads, the promissory notes, the engagements, and all the different classes of paper which they emit, the same principle of limited liability. I can imagine, after having read with some attention the very able report of the chairman, (Mr. Carey,) giving as it does the experience of Great Britain now for more than a quarter of a century on this subject, an experience which has led them to expand rather than to contract the whole system, nothing more valuable; and I trust, therefore, that we shall be allowed to try it unhampered at all.

While I am not at all unmindful of the claims of the laborer for his wages, yet I wish to start this principle entirely untrammelled. There is no more danger of the laborer being deceived, if he is employed by a partnership of this limited liability than of anybody else being deceived. It is difficult sometimes precisely to discriminate between different classes of laborers. The amendment of the gentleman from Clearfield, it seems to me, would be going a great deal too far. "Provided," he says, "that individual liabilities shall apply to labor." Now, what is labor? An associated company like this buys, if you please, a steam engine from a firm which embarks in that kind of business. When you say that labor shall be a specific charge upon all the property of the association, as well that which is specially placed in the firm as that which they have outside and beyond it, you mean the whole labor which makes the machine valuable, you mean everything over and above the mere crude material that is employed in the manufacture. I apprehend that the gentleman does not intend to go so far. He probably would confine his provision to the mere wages of labor, although he does not say so, and if we are to pass it it ought to receive that limitation.

I, however, for one, would be disposed to give this system—knowing that advantages have resulted from it for more than a quarter of a century abroad; knowing the success it has there obtained; knowing that instead of hampering it abroad they are giving it greater development and expansion—a fair trial here, and I am disposed to vote for it as it is found in the original provision. I trust that this Convention, mindful of the powerful arguments which have been presented in support of the provision contained in the report of the Committee on Industrial Interests, which I trust has been read substantially, if not absolutely, by every member of the Convention, will allow this provision to be adopted precisely as it is, as a declaration of the right of the people of this State to associate together for all lawful purposes, whether associated on principles of limited or unlimited liability.

Mr. MACCONNELL. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him.

Mr. BIDDLE. Certainly.

Mr. MACCONNELL. Why confine it to associations of five or six? Why not extend it universally?

Mr. BIDDLE. The gentleman is referring to the article as presented by the learned chairman of the Committee on Private Corporations. I am referring to the article originally reported by Mr. Carey, of Philadelphia, as the chairman of the Committee on Industrial Interests and Labor. I will read it to show that it contains no limitation.

"The right of the people of the State to associate together for all lawful purposes, and for trading on principles of limited or unlimited liability, shall not be questioned; but it shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide by law for the organization of associations, and for securing a publicity so complete as to enable all who trade with those who adopt the limited form to become familiar with the fact that no liability exists beyond that of the joint capital which may have been subscribed."

I prefer this article, because, as was so well said by the gentleman from Philadelphia, the chairman of the Committee on Industrial Interests and Labor, when he spoke a little while ago, it is a declaration more suitable to the organic law. It merely starts out with the enunciation of the great principle of allowing people, provided the public is sufficiently cautioned in advance, to deal on the limited principle, and gathering into one heap all their little hoards of capital, to foster and promote the general interests of the community, leaving to the Legislature afterward the laying down from time to time of such restrictive clauses as in their wisdom may seem best.

I trust, therefore, the section will pass in this shape. Of course, in saying this, I do not wish in any way to trench upon the understanding which seems to exist between the chairman of Industrial Interests and Labor and the chairman of the Committee on Private Corporations. I merely indicate my preference. If the gentleman who has this subject so much at heart is willing that the article should be presented in the shape in which it comes from the Committee on Private Corporations, so be it. I am merely indicating my preference between the two plans. I think, for instance, that it is wiser not to put into the organic law any condition as to the number of associators. As was well asked by the gentleman from Allegheny, (Mr. MacConnell,) why not extend it to three as well as five? I can see no reason why it should not be so. I would go for the smallest possible number. I would go for no restrictions of any kind except so thorough a caution, in advance, to all who deal with the association when formed, that they may be said to have fairly become familiar with the fact, in the language of the original article, that "no liability exists beyond that of the joint capital which may have been subscribed." I trust, therefore, that the article will be adopted in this shape.

Mr. BIGLER. I desire, with reference to my amendment, to say that I intended it simply to apply to the wages of labor, but as I am exceedingly interested in the question, and desire to have this measure untrammelled, I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. AINEY. I now move to amend by inserting after the word "persons," the words "a majority of whom are."

Mr. CUYLER. If the gentleman would enlarge that amendment by striking out the words "five or more," so that it would read "any persons, of whom a majority are citizens of this Commonwealth," I think his amendment would be in better shape.

Mr. AINEY. I think that would be an improvement, and I therefore modify my amendment accordingly.

Mr. WOODWARD. I have no objection at all to these suggestions if they will recommend the subject to gentlemen. But allow me to say that the original amendment was most carefully prepared. Our mining law mentions "five," and we are all familiar with the Pennsylvania mining law, and therefore this number was selected as the limit for an association. One of the great objects of this provision is to encourage the laborer to become a partner with the capitalist in the prosecution of a common enterprise, and that would be a curious enterprise in which the capitalists and the laborers did not amount to five. There is no good reason why the number should not remain at five. In my opinion, five is exactly the right number. I do not think the Legislature ought to be called upon to incorporate companies of less than five capitalists and laborers. The probability is that in process of time these gentlemen will act generally upon that principle, and the number will be largely increased instead of ever presenting any necessity for its being reduced. However, I have no feeling about five or more. I only believe it would be unwise to make it less.

Mr. KATNE. Will the gentleman from Philadelphia allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. WOODWARD. Certainly.

Mr. KATNE. I suggest that you strike out the word "enactment" and insert the word "law" so that it would read: "It shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide by general law."

Mr. WOODWARD. Oh; that is hypercriticism. [Laughter.]

Mr. AINEY. I desire to say that my object in moving this amendment is to require only a majority of the persons associating themselves together in business to be citizens of this Commonwealth. I would allow the benefits of this provision to be extended to people of other States, so as to allow citizens of New Jersey or New York, or any other Commonwealth, or of any other country, to come in here and use their capital for the development of our resources.

Mr. DODD. The question has arisen whether the benefits of this article could not be applied to two as well as to five. I would like to ask why it should not be applied to one as well as to two. In other words, sir, why should corporations or associations have greater rights than individuals? That they should not have has been the principle for which I have labored and voted since I took my seat in this Convention, both as a member of the Committee on Private Corporations and as a delegate on this floor. I consider it only fair and right that individuals should have under the law the same liberties and privileges that are allowed to corporations. If this principle of limited liability should be applied to associations then it should be applied to individuals; and if it will not bear that test there is something wrong about it. If two or five men who desire to put capital together and start an iron mill have the right to limit their liability by so stipulating in their articles of association, why have I not that right as an individual if I want to enter into the same enterprise? What right have five men, associated together, to have a principle applied to them as to their liability which should not be applied to me as an individual operator in the same business?

Individuals have or should have the same rights, in entering into business, as associations or corporations. If men associated together so conduct their business that they can have no losses above a certain sum there is no necessity for this section; but if they so transact their business that there will be losses above the sum to which their liability is limited, that loss must fall on some one, and the simple question to be tested here is whether the loss shall fall upon those who contracted the debts or upon those who trusted the association, "not wisely but too well?"

The unlimited right to associate together is already granted by the sections adopted. We have required the Legislature to pass general laws and have prohibited it from incorporating any company by special law. In enacting that general law the Legislature may fix a limited or unlimited liability as it sees fit. But this experiment had better be left to the Legislature. Let it experiment on the subject, and if it does wrong it can correct it by speedily changing the law, which we cannot do.

It is argued that this favors the association of capital. Capital will always associate itself together whenever the business is safe, and if it is not safe let the capitalists suffer and not the laborer. I object to this section because it is a dangerous experiment and because it is class legislation in favor of capitalists. It cannot favor laborers to any great extent. It will rob them of their labor on one hand, and on the other will induce them to enter into dangerous associations which will rob them of their little capital.

If this is a rule proper to be applied to individuals I will consent that it be applied to associations of two or more individuals. I am in favor of putting everybody on the same level, whether laborers or capitalists, whether individuals or association of three or more individuals make all liable in the same manner, give all the same rights, make no distinctions whatever. I hope that no such dangerous experiment as this will be adopted here. Let the Legislature do as it sees fit in regard to this matter. If it makes mistakes it can correct them. If we make mistakes they will last for years.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment of the delegate from Lehigh (Mr. Ainey.)

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question recurs on the section.

Mr. STEWART. I move to amend by striking out all of the first line and inserting before the word "subscribed," the last word in the section, the words "invested or," so as to read, "joint capital which may have been invested or subscribed."

The purpose of this is to leave it simply as a declaration of right. The amendment as offered provides that it shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide by general enactment so and so. The amendment I have proposed, if adopted, leaves it simply a declaration of right and in constitutional form, as I think.

SEVERAL DELEGATES. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The clause will be read as it will read if amended.

The CLERK proceeded to read as follows:

"Any five or more"—

Mr. STEWART. "Any two or more." It is so in the original I used, and it should read, "any two or more." I include that in my amendment.

The CLERK. The clause will then read:

"Any two or more persons, citizens of this Commonwealth, associated for the prosecution of any lawful business, may, by subscribing to articles of association and complying with all requirements or law, form themselves into an incorporated company, with or without limited liability, as may be expressed in the articles of association, and such publicity shall be provided for as shall enable all who trade with such corporations as adopt the limited liability to know that no liability exists beyond that of the joint capital which may have been invested or subscribed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DALLAS. I move to amend by adding after the word "know," on the next to the last line, the words, "the amount of capital subscribed and," and striking out all after the word "that," in the same line, and inserting "amount," so that it will read:

"And such publicity shall be provided for as shall enable all who trade with such corporations as adopt the limited liability to know the amount of capital subscribed, and that no liability exists beyond that amount."

My amendment extends only to this purpose: That in addition to the publicity of the fact that no liability exists beyond the amount subscribed, publicity shall also be given of the amount subscribed, so that every person dealing with the corporation shall know not only that its liability is limited to its capital, but what its capital at the outset was. That does not require extended argument, in my opinion, but a simple statement, and I leave it to the Convention.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Allow me to suggest to the gentleman from Philadelphia to put in the word "invested" instead of "subscribed."

Mr. DALLAS. Well, put in "invested or subscribed."

Mr. DARLINGTON. There is no more fruitful source of fraud than just that one thing. Insurance companies and companies of every kind say "subscribed capital," so much. But what I want is invested capital paid in.

Mr. WOODWARD. They are liable for all they subscribe. What larger measure of liability can you have? Whether they have paid it in or not, if they are responsible for what they subscribe, you have the very largest liability.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I want the largest.

Mr. KNIGHT. The subscriptions may be made by irresponsible parties, and you cannot hold them liable.

Mr. FELL. "Subscribed and paid."

Mr. DARLINGTON. "Subscribed and paid" is better.

Mr. MACVEAGH. That weakens it; that prevents their being responsible for the stock not paid.

Mr. WOODWARD. If gentlemen would have a little confidence in their own language, they would find that the largest liability is expressed when you say they shall be liable to the extent of the stock subscribed.

Mr. FELL. I would rather have any man's money than his subscription, I do not care who he is.

Mr. CAREY. In all these cases it is provided that the stockholders shall be liable for the whole amount subscribed. That is the extent of their liability. They may have paid ten per cent. or twenty per cent. or fifty per cent., but they must pay up to the last dollar as the measure of their liability. It seems to me the whole ground is covered by the words used here; and all these changes weaken it rather than strengthen it.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas) to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUYLER. I move to amend by striking out in the third and fourth lines the words "of association and complying with all requirements of law," and inserting the words "expressing the conditions and purposes of their association," so that it will read:

"Any five or more persons, citizens of this Commonwealth, associated for the prosecution of any lawful business, may, by subscribing to articles expressing the conditions and purposes of their association, form themselves into an incorporated company," &c.

My object in the amendment is simply this:—

Mr. CAREY. I accept it.

Mr. CUYLER. My venerable friend (Mr. Carey) permits me to say that he approves the amendment. My object in it is chiefly this: The use of the words "and complying with all requirements of law" has a tendency to clothe the Legislature with a power which may practically destroy the value of the section. They may prescribe so many conditions and limitations, and of so difficult and obscure a character, that the value of the law would be practically taken away. Now, my own estimate of the value of this provision is that there is nothing which this Convention has acted upon which is more important to the development and prosperity of the State than this very section; and that it is founded upon a wise thought, because I think the thought that underlies this section is simply that those who deal with corporations are put on their guard and are taught that they are to rely on the character, and the integrity, and the standing of the men who control them, rather than upon enactments of the Legislature, which are after all but deceptive traps that lead to destruction.

I do not believe that any of those laws which have been from time to time passed, which were intended to provide special protections for laboring men and for the humbler classes of men, have amounted to anything else than mere delusions which have led them to their destruction, and I think the thought that underlies this is therefore wise and prudent.

Mr. WHERRY. It strikes me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia goes much further than perhaps he is aware of. The words to be stricken out are, "of association and complying with all requirements of law."

Mr. CUYLER. The gentleman will pardon me, I propose to follow it up by another amendment adding, in the third line from the end, after the words "provided for," the words "by law."

Mr. WHERRY. That meets the objection I was about to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia.

Mr. WHERRY. I still think this amendment is objectionable. It is putting in the power of this association to lay down the conditions upon which this notice shall be given.

Mr. CUYLER. Not at all.

Mr. WHERRY. Clearly so, to express the conditions and purposes of the association.

Mr. CUYLER. The gentleman will pardon me—

Mr. WHERRY. It certainly gives the very widest door for fraud.

Mr. CUYLER. Will the gentleman pardon me for calling his attention to the subsequent clause: "Such publicity shall be provided by law." The publicity shall be provided for by law.

Mr. WHERRY. Yes, the publicity is to be provided for by law; but still the conditions and purposes for which that association was formed may be concealed under words and phraseology, in the articles of agreement and association, so as to blind the public as to what the purpose and condition are. Now, I claim that the Legislature shall exercise a supervision over these articles of association so as to declare on what conditions these associations shall be formed.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler.)

The amendment was rejected, there being on a division, ayes thirty-seven, noes forty-six.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President: I have very strong sympathy in the purposes proposed to be accomplished by this amendment. I believe that the material interests of the country have largely outgrown the capabilities of merely private capital, and that there are vast interests of the county which require associated capital to accomplish them in their best form, and to meet the necessary competition of other States and other interests.

I propose an amendment to the section which I believe preserves all that is valuable, and will strike at much that I think is of no importance. In the first place, I do not like that form of expression in a Constitution which simply provides that it shall be a duty of the Legislature to do so and so. I prefer that the expression of the Constitution shall be imperative, so that the amendment I propose will read thus:

"The Legislature shall provide by general law that any five or more persons, a majority of whom shall be citizens of this Commonwealth, may form themselves into an incorporated company, with or without limited liability, as may be authorized by law and expressed in the articles of association; and such publicity shall be required as shall enable all who trade with such corporations who adopt the limited liability to know that no liability exists beyond that of the joint capital which may have been subscribed."

I have no objection to making it "three or more" if gentlemen desire.

Mr. STEWART. I think any language that is directory on the Legislature is objectionable. I think the best possible shape to put this in, is to make it the declaration of a right. Now, the proposition of the gentlemen from Lycoming just offered requires the Legislature to pass a general law for this very thing. It would be a great deal better simply to make it a declaration of right on the part of the individuals. Let it read: "That any two or more persons, citizens of this Commonwealth, or a majority of whom shall be citizens of this Commonwealth," shall have a right to do so and so. That is preferable, I think.

Mr. MACVEAGH. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "five" and inserting "any citizens of this Commonwealth."

The PRESIDENT pro tem. This is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. MACVEAGH. I trust then the mover will modify it. We voted that in on the amendment proposed.

Mr. EWING. I trust the gentleman from Lycoming will not modify it so as to make it less than five. That is a small enough number to be allowed to go into any association of the sort. One of my principal reasons for allowing five or more to go into such an association would not apply to a smaller number. Ordinarily, where there are but two or three, they can give the business a personal supervision and should be responsible.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. President: I hope the House will understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Lycoming leaving it to be provided by law will bring special legislation into each one of these corporations. Now, the amendment as originally drawn intended to exclude that. The gentleman's amendment as expressed will introduce special legislation.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If the gentleman is correct in his criticism, I shall certainly desire that it should be amended, for I do not wish that there should be special legislation in the case; but it is to be observed that the first clause requires that the Legislature shall provide by general law and the second clause where it speaks of "being provided by law" is in subjection to the first, which requires that it shall be a general law; but if there be any doubt about it, I have no objection to making the proper modification.

Mr. WOODWARD. The introduction of the second clause has reference to the liability, limited or unlimited, as the Legislature shall direct. That defeats the very object.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The Chair would call the attention of the delegate from Lycoming to the fact that the first line of the original amendment has been stricken out by the motion of the delegate from Franklin.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. But I am offering an amendment now which stands by itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment of the delegate from Lycoming.

Mr. H. G. SMITH. Mr. President: I have paid some attention to this question; and as the debate has gone on my mind has reached the firm conviction that this Convention ought not to give power to do what is asked in either one of these propositions. The power to go as far in that direction as the wants of this Commonwealth demand exists already in the Legislature, and it can be exercised by the Legislature from time to time as the interests of the Commonwealth demand, and will no doubt be so done.

There was much force in the argument urged by the gentleman from Venango, (Mr. Dodd,) and it must be remembered that in this day of ours throughout this Commonwealth, individual enterprise is called upon to make what seems to be fast becoming a hopeless fight against combined capital. I am opposed, not to the Legislature going as far as it may be proper from time to time in this direction, but I am certainly opposed to putting any imperative requirement of this kind in the Constitution and saying in the fundamental law that the Legislature shall provide for associations of a certain kind with certain privileges. Having come to that conclusion, I shall vote against both these propositions in the shape in which they are presented, or either one of them; and I think if the members of the Convention will reflect seriously on this question, they will be perfectly willing to leave this matter in the hands of the Legislature, feeling assured that coming from the people from year to year as it does, it will provide for the material interests of the Commonwealth and go as far in this direction as may be necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is upon the amendment of the delegate from Lycoming (Mr. Armstrong.)

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question recurs on the section as amended.

Mr. HUNSICKER. I rise to ask the gentleman who is the author of this section whether by this section the joint assets of the corporation are liable for all the debts, or whether it limits the liability to the joint capital subscribed, because I think if it is not included, an amendment of that kind should be added, so that the entire assets of the corporation shall be liable for its debts.

Mr. WOODWARD. The liability is to be measured by the subscription, by the amount subscribed. Each stockholder is to be liable for the debts of the company to the extent of the stock subscribed.

Mr. HUNSICKER. What is to become of the surplus capital?

Mr. BIDDLE. The word "invested" includes that.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Woodward) as amended.

Mr. EDWARDS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, more than ten members rising to second the call.

Mr. TEMPLE and others. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The amendment as amended will be read before the yeas and nays are called.

The CLERK read as follows:

"Any two or more persons, citizens of this Commonwealth, associated for the prosecution of any lawful business, may, by subscribing to articles of association and complying with all the requirements of the law, form themselves into an incorporated company with or without limited liability as may be expressed in the articles of association, and such publicity shall be provided for as shall enable all who trade with such corporations as adopt the limited liability to know that no liability exists beyond that of the joint capital which may have been invested or subscribed."

The question was taken by yeas and nays, with the following result:

YEAS.

Messrs. Armstrong, Baer, Baily, (Perry,) Barclay, Biddle, Bigler, Bowman, Boyd, Brodhead, Broomall, Bullitt, Calvin, Carey, Carter, Cochran, Corbett, Corson, Cronmiller, Curry, Curtin, Darlington, Dunning, Edwards, Ellis, Ewing, Fell, Finney, Fulton, Guthrie, Hemphill, Horton, Howard, Hunsicker, Knight, Lear, Lilly, MacVeagh, M'Clean, M'Culloch, Mann, Mantor, Newlin, Palmer, G. W., Palmer, H. W., Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

ABSENT.—Messrs. Achenbach, Addicks, Baker, Bardsley, Bartholomew, Beebe, Black, J. S., Campbell, Cassidy, Collins, Craig, Cuyler, Dallas, Green, Hanna, Hazzard, Heverin, Landis, Littleton, M'Camant, Mitchell, Purviance, Samuel A., Reynolds, Rooke, Ross, Sharpe, Simpson, Smith, Wm. H., Van Reed, White, J. W. F. and Meredith, President—31.

Mr. FUNCK. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

"The Legislature shall take immediate steps to annul all charters heretofore granted to individuals and corporate bodies, with banking and discounting privileges, other than banks of issue, but this power shall be so exercised as to do no injury to corporators; and hereafter the Legislature shall confer such privileges only upon banks of issue.

Mr. President, I have myself very decided opinions upon the subject-matter covered by this amendment. Under the twenty-sixth section of the article on the Legislature in the Constitution of 1838, with the amendments, it will be found that the Legislature has authority to revoke the privileges conferred upon corporations for these and other purposes. This is a direct blow at the "dime savings institutions" and "banks of deposit" that have been springing up all over the State. I have heretofore had occasion to advert to this matter, and I now bring it before the Convention in a specific form, so that the sense of this body can be ascertained on this question. I believe that the interest of the community requires that these institutions should be wound up, and for the purpose of bringing about this end I have submitted this section as an amendment. It will be observed that, if it be adopted, it will take from the Legislature all authority in the future to create institutions of this character.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment of the delegate from Lebanon (Mr. Funck.)

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I offer the following as an additional section:

"The Legislature shall have the power to alter, revoke or annul any charter of incorporation now existing and revocable at the adoption of this Constitution, or any hereafter to be conferred by or under any law, whenever, in their opinion, it may be injurious to the citizens of this Commonwealth, in such manner, however, that no injustice shall be done to the corporators. No law hereafter enacted shall create, renew or extend the charter of more than one corporation."

This is the identical section which I offered yesterday, and the section of the present Constitution with a saving clause in it. The only difference from the old Constitution is that the amendment of 1857 allows the Legislature to alter, revoke or annul charters of corporation hereafter granted, and I do not want the Legislature to lose the power over the acts of incorporation passed between 1857 and 1838. Hence the words "now revocable."

Mr. MACVEAGH, I trust the proposition will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOODWARD. I offer the following amendment and ask gentlemen to give me the yeas and nays without saying one word upon it:

"No suspension of specie payments shall be permitted or sanctioned by law."

I ask for the yeas and nays on it.

The yeas and nays were ordered, more than ten delegates rising to second the call.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The Clerk will call the names of delegates on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were taken and resulted as follows:

Y E A S.

Messrs. Baer, Bannan, Church, De France, Ellis, Gilpin, Guthrie, Harvey, Hemphill, Kaine, Long, M'CLean, M'Murray, Metzger, Smith, Henry W., Wherry, Woodward, Worrell and Wright—19.

N A Y S.

Messrs. Ainey, Alricks, Andrews, Armstrong, Baily, (Perry,) Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Biddle, Bigler, Black, Charles A., Bowman, Brodhead, Broomall, Brown, Buckalew, Bullitt, Calvin, Campbell, Carey, Carter, Clark, Cochran, Corbett, Corson, Cronmiller, Curry, Curtin, Darlington, Davis, Dodd, Edwards, Elliott, Ewing, Fell, Finney, Fulton, Funck, Gibson, Hall, Horton, Howard, Hun-sicker, Knight, Lamberton, Lawrence, Lear, Lilly, MacConnell, MacVeagh, M'Culloch, Mann, Mantor, Minor, Mott, Newlin, Niles, Palmer, G. W., Palmer, H. W., Parsons, Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Patton, Porter, Purman, Purviance, Jno. N., Purviance, Samuel A., Read, John R., Reed, Andrew, Runk, Russell, Stanton, Stewart, Struthers, Turrell, Walker, Wetherill, John Price, White, David N. and White, Harry—77.

So the amendment was rejected.

ABSENT. — Messrs. Achenbach, Adicks, Baker, Barclay, Bardsley, Bartholomew, Beebe, Black, J. S., Boyd, Cassidy, Collins, Craig, Cuyler, Dallas, Dunning, Green, Hanna, Hay, Hazzard, Heverin, Landis, Littleton, M'Camant, Mitchell, Pughe, Reynolds, Rooke, Ross, Sharpe, Simpson, Smith, H. G., Smith, Wm. H., Temple, Van Reed, Wetherill, J. M., White, J. W. F. and Meredith, President—37.

Mr. T. H. B. PATTERSON. I wish to call the attention of the Convention for a single moment to the fact that the twenty-fifth section of the present Constitution was reported as section thirty-two of the article submitted by the Committee on Legislation and was stricken out with the understanding that it was to go into the article on corporations. Section twenty-five provides for six months' advertising for applications for banking privileges, limits the bank charters to twenty years and provides that they shall always be revocable at the pleasure of the Legislature. In accordance with what was the understanding at the time this section was before the Convention, I now offer section twenty-five of the present Constitution as a new section of this article.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The new section will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

"No corporate body shall be hereafter created, renewed or extended, with banking or discounting privileges, without six months' previous public notice of the intended application for the same in such manner as shall be prescribed by law, nor shall any charter for the purpose aforesaid be granted for a longer period than twenty years, and every such charter shall contain a clause reserving to the Legislature the power to alter, revoke or annul the same whenever, in their opinion, it may be injurious to the citizens of the Commonwealth, in such manner, however, that no injustice shall be done to the corporators. No law hereafter enacted shall create, renew or extend the charter of more than one corporation."

Mr. MACVEAGH. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that he strike out the revocable clause. We have just passed it in express terms in the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. T. H. B. PATTERSON. I am satisfied to withdraw that part of the section, if it has been passed before. This section is one that I think the Convention ought to retain. It provides for matters that we have not provided for in any other section or article. It was stricken out of the report of the Committee on Legislation by the committee of the whole, with the understanding that it would be re-inserted in the article on corporations. Instead of reporting this section the Committee on Corporations reported another section, in a very different form from this one, which was also voted out in committee of the whole. The section ought now to be introduced. It was reported by the Committee on Legislation as necessary in addition to all the other restrictions which have been put in. At least the substance of this section ought to be here preserved. If delegates wish to amend the language of the old Constitution that is another matter, but I move to insert it here in order that the Convention may vote, fairly and squarely, whether they will retain this section or not.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. I move to amend by striking out all after the word "years."

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The Clerk will read the part proposed to be stricken out.

The CLERK read as follows:

"And every such charter shall contain a clause reserving to the Legislature the power to alter, revoke or annul the same whenever in their opinion it may be injurious to the citizens of the Commonwealth; in such manner however that no injustice shall be done to the corporators."

Mr. HARRY WHITE. We have just reserved to the Legislature the power to alter or revoke any charter granted under any law whatever. That was done by the adoption of my amendment, and that meets the entire situation. If my amendment now be adopted, it will leave the section read:

"No corporate body shall be hereafter created, renewed or extended, with banking or discounting privileges, without six months' previous public notice of the intended application for the same, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law. Nor shall any charter for the purpose aforesaid be granted for a longer period than twenty years."

This is almost an exact transcript of the present Constitution in this regard, and the propriety of some provision of this kind must be manifest to every member of the Convention. There is nothing in which the business public is so much interested as in the laws providing for the charter of banking institutions. Undoubtedly we shall have a general banking law authorizing the creation of banks of discount and savings institutions, and it is only right that the public shall be advised by an extended advertisement of an intended application for a charter, and of the terms of the association of the persons who are to be thus associated. That is just what this provides.

Mr. LILLY. If I heard this amendment read aright by the gentleman from Allegheny, it was one which was tacked on in the committee of the whole to the report of the Committee on Corporations and after a full discussion was voted down, or at least a portion of it was. That was that no corporation should extend over twenty years. It was discussed very thoroughly, understood fairly and deliberately voted down. The article that was rejected in the report of the Committee on Corporations said that all corporations except railroads, canals, turnpikes, &c., should expire at the end of twenty years. It was shown then that there were other corporations, besides railroads and canals, which would be greatly injured by stopping their chartered privileges at the end of twenty years. If this amendment, which I heard imperfectly when it was read, applies only to banks, I have no objection to it. If it is intended to reach the case of other corporations, I am entirely opposed to it.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. The gentleman from Carbon will observe that it applies only to banking institutions.

Mr. LILLY. Then it is all right.

On the question of agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. Harry White, a division was called for, which resulted sixty in the affirmative and ten in the negative. So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to say that I never saw any occasion for the introduction of this section into our Constitution, in view of the fact that we have already restricted the Legislature from granting any charters in the manner indicated by this amendment. We have provided for general laws; all these charters must be granted by general laws. On reference to section ten of the article reported by the Committee on the Legislature, line forty-five will be found to read as follows:

"The Legislature shall not pass any special or local law creating corporations or amending, renewing or extending the charters thereof."

It would seem to me incongruous to introduce this amendment now in view of the action taken by the Convention on this section of the article on legislation.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. If the gentleman will allow me I will explain—

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. The statement of the delegate is perfectly correct, but the section to which he has referred does not contain the prohibition that it is intended shall be given by this section now under consideration. That is intended to prevent any special law being passed to create or extend the charter of any corporations. This present section applies only to banks and corporations of discount, and simply provides that notice shall be given to the public of the manner in which their organizations shall be effected. Even suppose the provision does exist, there must be an organization under the general law, and this requires a publication of the intended application and all the details thereof. These are necessary for the protection and the information of the public.

Mr. STEWART. Then if that be so, the phraseology of the section is certainly unfortunate, and it ought to be modified.

Mr. HARRY WHITE. If the gentleman from Franklin will read the section carefully, he will see that it is all right.

Mr. MACVEAGH. Oh, yes, it is all right.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to inquire whether the limitation is three months or six.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. It is six months.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Then I move to strike out "six" and insert "three."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The article is concluded. The question is, shall it be transcribed for third reading?

Mr. WOODWARD. Before that vote is put I wish to offer an amendment that I have not yet had the opportunity to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The Chair will receive the amendment.

Mr. WOODWARD. I offer this amendment as a new section:

"The term 'corporations' as used in this article shall be construed to include all joint stock companies or associations having any of the powers or privileges of corporations not possessed by individuals or partnerships."

The committee introduced that section into their report, desiring it to stand at the head of this article; but the Convention in committee of the whole struck it out. A question arose in debate afterward as to what would be a corporation under the provisions of this article and what would not, showing the necessity of defining what shall be held by the courts to be corporations. I propose to put it in here. It is entirely harmless. It encounters no man's prejudices. It is a rule for the courts. It makes all these associations corporations for all these purposes, and I can see no possible objection to putting it in; and if it is put in I hope the Committee on Revision will put it at the head of this article. That is all I have to say.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOTT. I offer the following amendment as a new section:

"That no incorporated company organized for mining purposes or possessed of mining privileges shall own, hold or possess the soil or surface right of more than one thousand acres at any one time, exclusive of lands held for the right of way for railroad purposes, by due appropriation of law."

I ask for the yeas and nays.

More than ten members rising to second the call, the yeas and nays were ordered and taken with the following result:

YEAS.

Messrs. Achenbach, Alricks, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bigler, Black, Charles A., Buckalew, Campbell, Cochran, Dodd, Ewing, Finney, Funck, Gibson, Gilpin, Guthrie, Howard, Kaine, Long, M'Culloch, M'Murray, Metzger, Mott, Palmer, G. W., Patterson, D. W., Porter, Purman, Russell, Simpson, Smith, H. G., Smith, Henry W., Stewart, Temple and Turrell—33.

NAYS.

Messrs. Ainey, Baer, Bailly, (Perry,) Bannan, Barclay, Biddle, Bowman, Boyd, Brodhead, Broomall, Brown, Bullitt, Carey, Carter, Church, Corbett, Cronmiller, Curry, Curtin, Darlington, Davis, De France, Edwards, Elliott, Ellis, Fell, Fulton, Hall, Harvey, Hay, Hemphill, Horton, Hunsicker, Lamberton, Lawrence, Lilly, MacConnell, MacVeagh, Mann, Mantor, Minor, Niles, Parsons, Patterson, T. H. B., Patton, Pughe, Purviance, John N., Purviance, Samuel A., Read, John R., Reed, Andrew, Runk, Stanton, Struthers, Walker, Wetherill, J. M., Wetherill, Jno. Price, Wherry, White, Harry, Woodward and Worrell—60.

So the amendment was rejected.

ABSENT—Messrs. Addicks, Andrews, Armstrong, Baker, Bardsley, Bartholomew, Beebe, Black, J. S., Calvin, Cassidy, Clark, Collins, Corson, Craig, Cuyler, Dallas, Dunning, Green, Hanna, Hazzard, Heverin, Knight, Landis, Lear, Littleton, M'Camant, M'CLean, Mitchell, Newlin, Palmer, H. W., Reynolds, Rooke, Ross, Sharpe, Smith, Wm. H., Van Reed, White, David N., White, J. W. F., Wright and Meredith, President—40.

Mr. BIDDLE. I move that this Convention take a recess until half-past three o'clock.

Mr. LILLY. I move to reconsider the vote on the sixth section. I do not ask for a vote on it now.

Mr. BIDDLE. I insist on the motion for a recess. It is one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The hour of recess is at hand. The Chair therefore now adjourns the Convention until half-past three o'clock this afternoon.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at half-past three o'clock P. M.

CORPORATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question pending is on transcribing for third reading the article on corporations.

Mr. HALL. Mr. President: I desire to move a reconsideration of the vote by which section six of this article was adopted, and I ask leave to state the reasons on which I make the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. Did the delegate vote with the majority?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir. I ask leave now to state the grounds on which I make the motion. ["No."]

The PRESIDENT pro tem. Is the motion seconded?

Mr. LILLY. I second the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the reconsideration.

Mr. LILLY. I hope the gentleman will have a chance to make his statement.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I should be glad if the gentleman from Elk should have liberty to make his statement, so that we may know the reasons for the reconsideration. ["No; no."]

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is not debatable.

Mr. MANN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COCHRAN. I second the call.

The yeas and nays being required by Mr. Mann and Mr. Cochran, were as follow, viz;

YEAS.

Messrs. Ainey, Armstrong, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Bannan, Barclay, Biddle, Black, C. A., Bowman, Boyd, Brodhead, Broomall, Brown, Buckalew, Church, Clark, Corson, Curry, Curtin, Darlington, Elliott, Ewing, Fulton, Gibson, Gilpin, Hall, Hanna, Harvey, Hay, Hazzard, Hemphill, Hunsicker, Kalne, Knight, Lamberton, Lilly, M'CLean, Mantor, Palmer, G. W., Palmer, H. W., Pughe, Purman, Purviance, Samuel A., Reed, Andrew, Reynolds, Runk, Russell, Simpson, Smith, H. G., Stanton, Stewart, Struthers, Temple, Walker, Wherry, White, David Woodward, Worrell and Wright—59.

NAYS.

Messrs. Alricks, Andrews, Baer, Bailly, (Perry,) Campbell, Carter, Cochran, Cronmiller, Dallas, De France, Edwards, Ellis, Funck, Guthrie, Horton, Howard, Lawrence, Long, MacConnell, M'Murray, Mann, Metzger, Mott, Niles, Patterson, D. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Purviance, John N., Smith, Henry W., Van Reed, and Wetherill, J. M.—30.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

ABSENT—Messrs. Achenbach, Addicks, Baker, Bardsley, Bartholomew, Beebe, Bigler, Black, J. S., Bullitt, Calvin, Carey, Cassidy, Collins, Corbett, Craig, Cuyler, Davis, Dodd, Dunning, Fell, Finney, Green, Heverin, Landis, Lear, Littleton, MacVeagh, M'Camant, M'Culloch, Minor, Mitchell, Newlin, Parsons, Patton, Porter, Read, John R., Rooke, Ross, Sharpe, Smith, Wm. H., Wetherill, J. Price, White, Harry, White, J. W. F. and Meredith, President—44.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The section will be read.

The CLERK read as follows :

SECTION 6. No corporation shall engage in any other business than that expressly authorized in its charter, nor shall it take or hold any real estate except what may be necessary and proper for its legitimate business; and the Legislature is hereby prohibited from depriving any person of an appeal from any preliminary assessment of damages made by viewers or otherwise; the final determination of the amount of such damages shall in all cases of appeal be determined by a jury.

Mr. HALL. The reason why I have moved the reconsideration is this: The latter clause of this section so provides that in the case of an appeal from a view for damages, it is imperative that the trial shall be by jury. While I believe that the right of trial by jury should remain inviolate, I do not see the propriety of compelling the parties in a case like this to submit to a trial by jury when they might be better pleased with some other mode which the Legislature may provide for determining difficulties between them. Another mode may be less expensive, less tedious, and more convenient to all concerned. It is, of course, proper that the right of trial by jury should remain to either party; but the parties ought not to be compelled to accept what may be a tedious, troublesome and more expensive mode.

I therefore move to amend the latter clause of the section so as to read, "the amount of such damages in all cases of appeal shall, on the demand of either party, be determined by a jury."

That will save the right without making the mode of trial compulsory.

Mr. CORSON. I submit whether it would not be better to say, "shall on the demand of a party."

Mr. HALL. I have said "either" party.

Mr. CORSON. There may be three parties, and would it not be better to say "on the demand of a party."

Mr. DALLAS. "Any party."

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move to further amend by inserting after the word "damages," in the fifth line, the words, "against a corporation."

But a word: I mentioned on second reading that the language as it now stands in this section would apply to an ordinary assessment of damages. The observation is correct. What is intended is an assessment of damages against a corporation. It is not necessary to say "a private corporation" here, because the chairman of the Committee on Private Corporations has added a section to the end of the article which defines the meaning of the word "corporation" wherever it is used in this article. Therefore it will be simply necessary to say "damages against a corporation."

On the question of agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. Buckalew, a division was called for, which resulted fifty-six in the affirmative and one in the negative.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I move further to amend by striking out the words, "the final determination of." As it stands now the Convention will perceive that "the final determination of the amount of such damages shall in all cases of appeal be determined by a jury," which is a little awkward as a scholarly expression, and I suppose crept in by inadvertence. I propose to so amend as to make it read:

"The amount of such damages shall in all cases of appeal be determined by a jury."

On the question of agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. Darlington, a division was called for, which resulted fifty-two in the affirmative and three in the negative.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the section as amended.

Mr. HOWARD. Let it be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 6. No corporation shall engage in any other business than that expressly authorized in its charter, nor shall it take or hold any real estate except what may be necessary and proper for its legitimate business; and the Legislature is hereby prohibited from depriving any person of an appeal from any preliminary assessment of damages against a corporation made by viewers or otherwise. The amount of such damages shall, in all cases of appeal on demand of either party, be determined by a jury.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The section as amended is before the Convention.

The section as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. President: I move to reconsider the vote adopting the third section.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. Did the delegate vote in the affirmative?

Mr. BOYD. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. Is the motion seconded?

Mr. BIDDLE and Mr. H. W. PALMER. I second the motion.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to, there being on a division ayes forty-nine, noes twenty-seven.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The section will be read.

The CLERK read section three as follows:

"The exercise of the power and the right of eminent domain shall never be so construed or abridged as to prevent the taking by the Legislature of the property and franchises of incorporated companies and subjecting them to public use the same as the property of individuals. And the exercise of the police power of the State shall never be abridged or so construed as to permit corporations to conduct their business in such a manner as to infringe upon the equal right of individuals or the general well-being of the State."

Mr. BOYD. Mr. President: I propose to amend this section, in the fourth line, after the word "companies," by inserting the words, "not in actual use."

Mr. President, I will state the effect of this section, if I comprehend it aright, and I think I do because I have consulted with a great many gentlemen who are authority and who concur with me in opinion. I will read it:

"The exercise of the power and right of eminent domain shall never be so construed or abridged as to prevent the taking by the Legislature of the property and franchises of incorporated companies."

Now, I apprehend that under this section, the Legislature would have it in their power to incorporate a company who would have the right to take the entire property and franchise of another company to their use, for public use. For instance, a large railroad company could get an act of the Legislature authorizing them to build a railroad where there is now one in existence, say between Philadelphia and Norristown. Under such authority, such corporators would have the right to take the present railroad, which belongs to the Philadelphia, Germantown & Norristown railroad company. So it would give a right to take away from a turnpike company their road. We all know that turnpike roads are often built and for very many years no dividend is paid, no profit is made; and just after it is established and likely to be a success, another company comes along with a charter from the Legislature authorizing it to build a turnpike between the same points, and this new company can take away the property and the franchises of that turnpike company; and so as to a bridge, or a canal, or a gas company, or a water company. That can be done cheaply by depressing the value of the stock previous to such action as this, and the compensation would be assessed according to the market value of the stock, so that when the new company came to settle the damages, or have a jury to settle and determine them, the measure of damage would be such market value of the stock, so that the owners of this stock would lose the advantage of the profits of the near future, which they should have after incurring all the risk of failure.

My amendment proposes that the Legislature shall have the right to take away the property and franchises of any incorporated company not in actual use. If a railroad company have more ground than they have in actual use, and another company comes along and wants to build a railroad, it can take the ground of that company which they have not in actual use, and build their road; and if you allow this section to stand they can take away the actual roadbed and the entire property and the franchise of such a company. I am perfectly convinced that there are not half a dozen gentlemen in this body who design to do anything of that kind; and yet as the section stands it can be done. A company incorporated under this section could go and take a portion of the property and franchise of a railroad company or any other corporation, just enough of it to destroy the whole of it, and in such a way as that could get the control of it. So that if they would choose to do so and the Legislature should see fit, they could make the larger fish swallow up the smaller ones all the time. Therefore I have thought it wise to introduce into this section these words so that no company shall have more property and franchises than are actually necessary to operate their own road and all over and above that can by the Legislature for any other public use. The section will read with this amendment:

"The exercise of the power and the right of eminent domain shall never be so construed or abridged as to prevent the taking by the Legislature of the property and franchises of incorporated companies not in actual use."

Mr. CUYLER. I should be very glad to go with my friend, the delegate from Montgomery, at all times, if I could; but I cannot go with him upon this matter. The law of Pennsylvania to-day is, and it always has been, in exact harmony with this section as it reads. It cannot be that there should exist anywhere within the Commonwealth any property, be it a franchise or be it property of any description, which should be wanted for public use, which the State cannot take. The law of Pennsylvania to-day is that the State may take the franchise of any corporation she thinks proper to take, making compensation according to law. That always has been the law. But I cannot consent, for one, that there shall be any property within the bounds of the Commonwealth which the public may want and which it cannot have, making compensation for it. I think therefore that the section is an unnecessary one, because the law would be as the section places it if the section were never written into the Constitution; but it is not objectionable on the ground taken by my friend from Montgomery.

Mr. BIDDLE. Undoubtedly under the law as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States the franchise or any property of a corporation can be taken for public use; but there is no reason why we should not put some limitation here against the abuse of such a power as that. The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States is negative; all they have said is that it is no violation of a contract to take a franchise or the property of a corporation for public use. But it has never been said that we cannot limit this principle. All that we are asked to do by the amendment of the gentleman from Montgomery seems to me eminently fair and proper. A small company may have made its improvement, may have laid down its road, if it be a railroad company, and may be operating it to the profit of itself and to the advantage of the community. Then a large company comes along which has a covetous eye upon the franchise so used and so operated, goes up to the Legislature, and gets the right to take hold of this smaller franchise, this small improvement, making compensation.

If adequate compensation were in all cases made, perhaps there would be no objection to it, although it seems to me that even then it would be a hard case, when, after years of struggle against adversity, a small company is just coming into the full fruition of its privileges, to take them from it at a fixed price. But I say if adequate compensation could be always obtained it would not be so hard; but how is this compensation settled? It is settled by a court and jury, and it is an extremely difficult thing to ascertain how a franchise which is swallowed up shall be exactly paid for. In nine cases out of ten it is destruction to those who have embarked in the enterprise; and while I do not object to seeing the surplus land, the surplus property of any kind of a corporation taken for public use, I should think it eminently wise and proper to say by a declaration fixed in here that that which is not actually used by a corporation operated to the advantage of the public, should not be swallowed up by a power greater than itself. I shall, therefore, vote for the amendment.

Mr. CORSON. Mr. President: I agree to the remarks made by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Biddle,) and favor the amendment proposed by my colleague, (Mr. Boyd,) but it seems to me it would be better to insert the word "dispensable," in the third line, immediately preceding the word "property," so that they cannot take any indispensable property or franchises of incorporated companies, but may take that which is dispensable. Property might not be in actual use and yet it might not be dispensable; and it seems to me they ought to have the right to take that merely which was dispensable, which they could do without. If the words, "not in actual use," comprise the full scope and meaning of my colleague, it would be a better term to use; but it does seem to me that the word "dispensable," in the third line, would cover the question more comprehensively.

Mr. DALLAS. Mr. President: I cannot concur with the views expressed by the two delegates from Montgomery and by the gentleman from Philadelphia, who last spoke, (Mr. Biddle.) If I were in the actual occupation and use of a warehouse, and any corporation, authorized by the State of Pennsylvania, should require it for their business, that corporation, upon paying me due compensation, under the Constitution, might take that warehouse from me for their warehouse purposes as a freight depot, notwithstanding the fact that it might be in my use and indispensable for my purposes; and I can see no good reason why corporate property should be put on a basis separate from that of the individual.

Mr. President, the question is not between large corporations and small corporations. I think the gentleman from Philadelphia, who last spoke, and the gentleman from Montgomery have mistaken the question in presenting it in that way. It is a question between the State of Pennsylvania and all corporations, that the people of Pennsylvania, through their Legislature, shall have the right and the sovereign power of eminent domain over all property in the State, whether it be in the hands of large corporations, small corporations or individuals, that is presented by this section. I trust, therefore, that the Convention will view it in that light and will consider that it would be improper, unjust and unfair to engraft into the Constitution that we are now framing a provision that the property of every kind in this State may be taken by the people of the State for any public use upon payment of just compensation, but that the property of corporations, large or small, because they happen to be corporations, shall be free from the exercise of the right of eminent domain in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. President: I am sorry that I cannot agree with the gentleman from Philadelphia, who spoke next to the last, (Mr. Biddle,) and the mover of this amendment, (Mr. Boyd,) and I cannot think that the gentleman from Montgomery sees the full extent to which his amendment goes. It is that under the right of eminent domain the State shall not be able to take any property or franchises of corporations while in actual use. If we pass that, it will be impossible to lay out a public road across a railroad that is actually used.

Now, it may be that the gentleman from Philadelphia, who first spoke, (Mr. Cuyler,) is right that the provision is not necessary; that is, that there is no property which cannot be taken by the right of eminent domain; but it would be dangerous to put in this provision, by virtue of which, I take it, we could not take property that was not actually used by corporations under this power. Hence I say that it will not do to pass this provision, because then it will prevent us from taking any property that is in use by corporations, even for the purpose of laying out a public road.

But again, is the provision as it stands in the section at all dangerous? Can any damage be done by the Legislature under it? We have provided that nothing of this kind can be done except by virtue of general laws. The gentleman from Montgomery talks about one railroad absorbing the property of another. Suppose it did; it must be by a general law that will allow that other to turn about and re-absorb it again, so that no damage can be done.

I take it, therefore, that the section should stand as it is, or if amended at all, we ought to take the view of the gentleman from Philadelphia, who first spoke, (Mr. Cuyler,) and strike out the whole provision; but by no means let us put in this amendment.

Mr. HUNSICKER. We passed a section this morning, which I will read:

"The Legislature shall have the power to alter, revoke or annul any charter of incorporation hereafter conferred by or under any special or general law, whenever in their opinion it may be injurious to the citizens of the Commonwealth, in such manner, however, that no injustice shall be done to the corporators."

That section, it seems to me, covers all that is intended to be covered by the section now under consideration. I am not in favor of the amendment offered by my colleague; but I do think that the section which I have just read covers all that is meant to be covered by section three.

Now, let us see. It is not certainly meant by this section that the Legislature shall grant charters of incorporation one year and the next year by general law take them away? It is not meant that a corporation shall have no rights at all by virtue of its act of incorporation? It is not meant that there is to be nothing like a contract between the State and the corporators. It is not meant that a charter of incorporation is to be granted to a company to-day—and after the corporators have invested their money in the enterprise the next Legislature may repeal that charter without giving them compensations, or what is worse than all, take away the property and franchises and subject them to some other public use, or give them to some other corporation. The language of this section is, "to take away the property and franchises of a corporation and devote the same to public use," &c. What are the franchises of a corporation? They are its special privileges; its permission under the sanction of the State to do certain things under which and by authority of which they invested their money; and now you propose by this section, as I read and understand it, that the Legislature may take away, either by general or special law (it makes no difference which) all the property and all the franchises which have been conferred upon a corporation. I like the spirit of the section, and if it were so amended as to prevent the slaughter of corporations who have conducted their business upon just and fair terms in such manner that no injustice should be done to the corporators, I should be willing to vote for it.

Mr. ALRICKS. It behooves us to be careful here, and do nothing that will render us ridiculous. We have passed a section in which we declare that the Legislature shall have the same power over the franchises of a corporation that they have over the private property of an individual. I apprehend there is nothing strange in this declaration; but we have been told, and by able lawyers, for example by the delegate from Philadelphia, (Mr. Cuyler,) that by virtue of the right of eminent domain the Commonwealth always has control of the franchises of corporations just as it has control of the property of an individual; that it can take the one or the other, where either is necessary for the public good.

With great respect to my friend from Montgomery, (Mr. Boyd,) who is a great joker, I was not certain whether he was serious in this matter or not. History has told us of a piece of witicism that was practiced in the English Parliament, and I did not know but that he was attempting to repeat something of the same kind here. When William Pitt was in Parliament a subject of discussion was the militia bill, and a gentleman offered an amendment that the militia should never go out of the kingdom. William Pitt moved to amend "excepting in case of actual invasion," intimating that they might run off. (Laughter.) I certainly cannot comprehend my friend from Montgomery, if he desires us to say that we shall never take the franchise or the property of a corporation unless they have no further use for it. I cannot support his amendment. I think it would put us in a false position before the public.

Mr. HOWARD. If I understand this section it simply asserts a clear principle of law, that is now the law of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and I agree with the distinguished delegate from the city of Philadelphia, that he has stated the law as it is, and I know no reason why it should be placed in the Constitution unless it is to save and secure to the people this important principle of law by incorporating it into the Constitution so that the Legislature shall not have the power to barter it away or the courts to construe it away. It is simply asserting a principle of law absolutely essential to every Commonwealth, namely, that all the property of that Commonwealth shall be subject to the public necessity and to the public use.

The distinguished delegate who moved this amendment says that under the section as reported certain things might be done which would be mischievous. I grant you the best thing in the world can be abused and always has been; but why should it be said that the property of a corporation may not be taken for the public use? The citizen holds his property by as high a title as a corporation, and the citizen may have his in actual use, too. He may want to keep his farm intact; but he cannot do it. This amendment provides that all that a corporation may have in use cannot be touched, if the public necessity is such that they may need it for some other purposes. All that they have in actual use, if this amendment is to be adopted, is to be totally, wholly and forever exempted from the public use. We cannot accept such a proposition as this. It would be far better to strike down the whole section and then take our chances with the Legislature, who may possibly barter away this great principle of law unless we incorporate it in the Constitution. It would never do to accept such an amendment as the proposed, and I hope it will be rejected.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I move to amend in the second line, a mere arrangement of words, by striking out the words, "or abridged," and inserting them in a different place, after the word "be." The sentence will then read: "The exercise of the power and the right of eminent domain shall never be so abridged or construed," &c.

And again, in the seventh line to strike out the word "upon," so as to make the sentence read:

"Corporations shall conduct their business in such manner as not to infringe the equal rights of individuals or the general well-being of the State."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is upon the section as amended.

The section as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WHERRY. I move to reconsider the vote by which the fourth section was adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. Did the gentleman from Cumberland vote in the affirmative?

Mr. WHERRY. He did.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. Who seconds the motion?

Mr. CHURCH. I second it. I voted in the affirmative.

Mr. CUYLER. I ask leave to say a single word by permission of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is not debatable.

Mr. CUYLER. I only desire to say that this ought to be reconsidered—

Mr. CAMPBELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CUYLER. I can demonstrate that this thing is wrong, even for the purpose which gentlemen had in view when they adopted it. I ask them to pause and listen for a single moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The Chair must remind the gentleman from Philadelphia that the question is not debatable.

Mr. KAINE. Mr. President: I move to postpone indefinitely the motion just made. That motion is debatable, and now the gentleman from Philadelphia can go ahead.

Mr. CUYLER. Gentlemen will observe that this section was originally written so that the last clause which was adopted, was dependent upon a preceding clause, which was stricken out. The section reads: "In all elections for the managing officers of a corporation, each member or share-holder shall have as many votes as he has shares, multiplied by the number of officers to be elected."

That was in the original section and it was adopted, but the clause that followed it was voted down. Now the remainder of the section is, "and he may cast the whole number of his votes." What votes? The votes that were indicated by the very clause that was stricken out. As it stands now it is entirely meaningless. It only fails to accomplish any purpose whatever. It leaves the thing precisely where it stood before the section was proposed at all.

I say nothing with regard to the merits of the proposition itself. I had an opportunity of discussing that yesterday. It is impossible for any gentleman to estimate upon this floor the extent of the misery and the annoyance that this section, if carried out in the manner in which it was originally planned, must inflict upon every corporation in the State. It proposes to plant in the bosom of every board of directors of every corporation in the Commonwealth a hostile party, a personal enemy, a person devoted to destroying and annoying the business of the corporation. But that is upon the merits of the question, and I shall not recur to that. I simply ask any gentleman to state what the meaning of the section is. "He shall cast the whole number of his votes." How many votes has he? He has just one vote for each director; and that is all he has now. You give him no more. You do not alter the law a particle, but you leave it precisely where it stood before; because having stricken out the previous portion, on the motion of the gentleman from Bucks, (Mr. Lear,) you have stricken out the part which defines what votes are meant, so that at present there is nothing in the section to explain it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CUYLER. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I would like to ask the gentleman in case the vote is reconsidered what amendment he proposes?

Mr. CUYLER. I am asked to state what my amendment is. My idea of an amendment to this section is to vote it down, believing it is inherently wrong in its own nature.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I am astonished at the remarks just submitted. This change was made on the motion of the gentleman from Bucks (Mr. Lear) with the distinct understanding that its only effect on the section was that it could not affect certain old charters in the State by which the number of votes of certain large stockholders was limited. As the section now stands, whatever number of votes belong by law to any stockholder he shall cast in this manner.

Mr. CUYLER. The number of votes is just one for each director.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I heard the gentleman state that before. A stockholder holds one share of stock, and if there should be six directors he has six votes; by law he casts one vote for each of six persons at present. It does not change the number of his votes at all. Under this plan he could give them to three persons instead of six. If he has more shares of stock than one, the number of his votes at present is increased six times for each share. I cannot understand what trouble is on the gentleman's mind. This is as simple as simple can be. It leaves to the Legislature the power, to be sure, of saying how many votes a stockholder shall cast. They can, if they please, limit the number that a man can give on shares beyond a certain number; or they can provide, as they have ordinarily provided, that for each share of stock he shall have as many votes as there are directors. This section has nothing to do with the subject of the number of votes. It is simply a provision that whatever number of votes the stockholder has by law, he may concentrate upon a smaller number than the whole number of managers to be chosen; and I do not believe that the English language affords words which if written down here would make it plainer.

One additional remark:

If this section is to mean nothing, is to have no effect, I do not understand why the gentleman is exercised about it. If it is entirely innocent of any of those dire results which he instanced to us in a former debate, why should he desire the section defeated? He has instanced the attempt of the late Mr. Fisk to secure control of the Pennsylvania railroad company. Let me tell the gentleman that if this section had stood in the Constitution of New York, the gigantic swindles by the great railroad men of the city of New York would have been impossible. The English stockholders and the estates, the widows and the orphans in New York, and other cities, would have had in the management of the board of directors of the Erie railroad company men who would have exposed the nefarious transactions of Fisk and his colleagues, and called in the aid of the courts before the mischief was consummated, and millions that were plundered from the stockholders would have been saved to them.

I think the gentleman is raising here a phantom which has nothing in it. If he is, however, correct in his construction of this section, it is perfectly harmless.

Mr. KAINE. The motion which I made having accomplished its object, I now withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The motion to postpone indefinitely is withdrawn.

Mr. COCHRAN. I ask for the reading of the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The section will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 4. In all elections for the managing officers of a corporation, each member or shareholder may cast the whole number of his votes for one candidate, or distribute them upon two or more candidates as he may prefer.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which this section was adopted.

The motion was not agreed to, there being on a division ayes thirty-four, noes fifty-two.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the article be referred to the Committee on Revision and Adjustment.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on transcribing the article for third reading, and the delegate from Luzerne moves that it be referred to the Committee on Revision and Adjustment.

The motion was agreed to.

EDUCATION.

Mr. WHERRY. I move that the Convention now proceed to the consideration on second reading of the report submitted by the Committee on Education.

Mr. LILLY. I move to amend by saying, "the article on railroads."

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The motion is not amendable. It may be voted down if the Convention so desire.

The question being put, there were on a division ayes forty-nine, noes thirty. So the motion was agreed to and the Convention proceeded to the second reading and consideration of the article on education, reported from the committee of the whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The first section of the article will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 1. The Legislature shall provide for the maintenance and support of a thorough and efficient system of public schools wherein all the children of this Commonwealth above the age of six years may be educated.

The section was agreed to.

The next section was read as follows:

SECTION 2. The Legislature shall appropriate at least one million of dollars for each year, to be annually distributed among the several school districts according to law, and applied to public school purposes only.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I am inclined to the opinion that inasmuch as we have nowhere, so far, in the Constitution prescribed any sum at which salaries should be fixed, nor undertaken to decide what sum would be right for all future time, the second section had better be negatived, leaving that to the Legislature.

Mr. EWING. I hope also that this section will be negatived. I believe it is the only place we have undertaken to put in a sum of money, and I think it is inexpedient that it should be put here. It may not be too much now. It is more than has been appropriated in any one year before this time. It may not be enough hereafter. But for one I hope that the time is coming when there will be neither necessity nor propriety in the State making any appropriation whatever and when the different districts will raise their own money for educational purposes.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. When the time comes that the Representatives of the people cannot be trusted to educate their own children and raise money for it, we shall not need any schools in the State, and, therefore, I am against this section.

Mr. LILLY. I am in favor of this section as it is, for the reason that I think it will help to pass the whole Constitution. I think the people, if they see a million of dollars are going to be appropriated to educational interests, will vote for it. I do not know that it is of a great deal of consequence, as many other things we have done here, except that it will assist in passing the Constitution before the people.

Mr. ALRICKS. I move to amend in the first line by striking out "at least one million of dollars" and inserting "make a sufficient appropriation." It will then read :

"The Legislature shall make a sufficient appropriation each year to be annually distributed among the several school districts according to law and applied to public school purposes only."

Mr. MANN. I hope this amendment will not prevail. This section as it is now is the most important section that has been reported from any committee and will secure for this Constitution the most votes of any section in the entire Constitution. It is one that appeals to the best class of people throughout this whole State, and every friend of education in the State has already read this section and has become enlisted in favor of this Constitution because of this liberal devotion to the interests of the education of the children of the State. A million of dollars to-day is not as large an appropriation as was made to the common schools when the system was first established, and the Legislature has never kept up with the prosperity of the Commonwealth on this question of education. It lags behind now and has for twenty years lagged behind the appropriations that were made when the present system was first brought into existence, and it is because the Legislature has not come up to the demands of the interests of education that this ought to stand as it is. It is but $300,000 above the amount now appropriated, it is true, but it is the endorsement and the pledge of this Convention that the cause of education is to receive a new impetus, that makes this section important. I therefore earnestly hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Dauphin will not prevail and that the section as it stands will be adopted by the Convention.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KAINE. I do hope that the Convention will vote this section down. A section of this kind certainly ought not to go into the Constitution of Pennsylvania.

Mr. EWING. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the section.

Mr. NILES. I second the call.

The yeas and nays were taken and resulted as follow :

YEAS.

Messrs. Achenbach, Alricks, Andrews, Armstrong, Baer, Baily, (Perry,) Bannan, Barclay, Biddle, Black, Charles A., Boyd, Brodhead, Broomall, Brown, Calvin, Carter, Cassidy, Church, Clark, Cochran, Curry, Curtin, Cuyler, Dallas, Davis, Dodd, Dunning, Edwards, Elliott, Ellis, Fell, Finney, Fulton, Funck, Gilpin, Guthrie, Hall, Hazzard, Horton, Hunsicker, Knight, Lamberton, Lawrence, Lilly, Long, MacConnell, M'Clellan, M'Culloch, M'Murray, Mann, Mantor, Metzger, Minor, Newlin, Niles, Parsons, Patterson, D. W., Patton, Porter, Pughe, Purman, Purviance, John N., Purviance, Samuel A., Read, John R., Reynolds, Runk, Russell, Simpson, Smith, H. G., Smith, Henry W., Stanton, Stewart, Struthers, Temple, Turrell, Van Reed, Walker, Wetherill, J. M., Wherry, Worrell and Wright—81.

N A Y S.

Messrs. Ainey, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Black, J. S., Bowman, Buckalew, Bullitt, Campbell, Corbett, Corson, Cronmiller, Darlington, De France, Ewing, Gibson, Hanna, Harvey, Hay, Kaine, Mott, Palmer, H. W., Patterson, T. H. B., Reed, Andrew, Wetherill, John Price and Woodward—24.

So the section was agreed to.

ABSENT. — Messrs. Addicks, Baker, Bardsley, Bartholomew, Beebe, Bigler, Carey, Collins, Craig, Green, Hemphill, Heverin, Howard, Landis, Lear, Littleton, MacVeagh, McCamant, Mitchell, Palmer, G. W., Rooke, Ross, Sharpe, Smith, Wm. H., White, David N., White, Harry, White, J. W. F. and Meredith, President—28.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The next section will be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

SECTION 3. No money raised in any way whatever for the support of the public schools of this Commonwealth shall ever be appropriated to or used by any religious sect for the maintenance or support of schools under its control.

Mr. CORSON. I move to strike out the words "in any way whatever," in the first line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The section as amended was agreed to.

The CLERK read the next section as follows:

SECTION 4. The Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He shall hold his office for the term of four years, and his duties and compensation shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. DARLINGTON. There should be a verbal correction there. The word "The" should be "A," so as to read: "A Superintendent of Public Instruction."

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Chester.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIN. I would call the attention of the Convention to the fact that we have provided in the report on the executive department for the election of a Superintendent of Public Instruction.

Mr. DARLINGTON. No, sir; that was stricken out.

Mr. CORSON. It certainly was agreed that this officer should be elected somewhere or other.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the section.

Mr. COCHRAN. I should like to hear the section of the report of the executive department relating to this subject read.

Mr. CURTIN. I think the Convention had better pause until we ascertain that. My impression is that it has already passed.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. The article on the executive department provides that:

"The Superintendent of Public Instruction shall exercise all the powers and perform all the duties devolved by law upon the Superintendent of Common Schools, subject to such change as shall be made by law, and the office of Superintendent of Common Schools shall cease when the Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be duly qualified."

That is the way it passed on second reading.

Mr. WHERRY. It was clearly understood when the report on the executive department passed on second reading that that section should be voted down for the purpose of retaining this clause in the report of the Committee on Education. That was certainly the understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the section.

The section was agreed to.

The CLERK read the next section as follows:

SECTION 5. Neither the Legislature, nor any county, city, borough, school-district, or other public or municipal corporation, shall ever make any appropriation, grant, or donation of land, money, or property of any kind to any church or religious society, or to or for the use of any university, college, seminary, academy or school, or any literary, scientific, or charitable institution or society controlled or managed, either in whole or in part, by any church or sectarian denominations.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President: I hope that this section will be voted down. I would suggest to the chairman of this committee, that there is a section in the article on suffrage and elections which ought to be transferred to this article. I refer to the section which provides that women may be elected directors of common schools. I hope the Committee on Revision and Adjustment will make the transfer.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I thought about that and it will probably come before the Committee on Revision and Adjustment. We had better adopt this section here.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the section.

The section was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. I was requested by a delegate not now in his seat to offer an amendment to this article when it came before the Convention; and I now offer the following amendment as a new section:

"No board of school directors shall have power to issue bonds for any township, road or school district."

Mr. DARLINGTON. If the gentleman will indulge me a moment, there are two or three amendments agreed to in committee that I want to come in first.

Mr. HAY. I prefer to offer this. I was requested by Mr. William H. Smith, of Allegheny, to offer the amendment. I regret that he is not here to explain it, because he has not explained to me the reasons which actuated him in framing it. I leave the question to the Convention.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment of the delegate from Allegheny.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I move a new section to come in as section six.

SECTION 6. The arts and sciences may be encouraged and promoted in colleges and other institutions of learning under the exclusive control of the State.

I wish to say one word with regard to this and two other amendments that I am about to offer, and they are amendments which were agreed upon by the Committee on Education; but when the article came before the committee of the whole we found ourselves with a very small body here, not even a quorum, and they were lost on that account.

Mr. CUYLER. Allow me to ask the gentleman what he means by the words "under the exclusive control of the State?"

Mr. DARLINGTON. Under the control of nobody else—under the control of no religious society.

Mr. CUYLER. My instinct would have led me that far, even without the aid of the gentleman from Chester; but I want to know what he means by adding those words to the section. Does he mean, for example, that taking an institution like the university of Pennsylvania, an utterly unsectarian institution, administered by a board of trustees elected in accordance with its charter—does he mean that that institution could not receive aid from the State because it is not under the exclusive control of the State?

Mr. DARLINGTON. All I can say in answer to the gentleman is that after careful consideration by the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, these were precisely the terms in which the section was couched; and the object distinctly was that no appropriation should be made of school funds to any sectarian school or any institution not under the exclusive control of the State.

Mr. CUYLER. I move to strike out the words "under the exclusive control of the State."

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DODD. This amendment and some others which I suppose will be offered were before us on a prior occasion and were voted down simply because they were utterly unnecessary. The Legislature already has this power, and it is useless to put it in the Constitution.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia to the amendment of the gentleman from Chester.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Chester.

Mr. WHERRY. The distinguished gentleman from Venango (Mr. Dodd) is entirely mistaken when he gives the House reason to believe that these sections were voted down because they were deemed unnecessary. I trust gentlemen will recollect the history of this report when it was before the committee of the whole. These sections were lost simply because there was not a quorum of the House present and because the distinguished chairman of the committee of the whole refused to accept a majority vote of those who were present as carrying the sections. They were lost because there was not a majority of a quorum to vote for them.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I should like to have the amendment read.

The amendment was read.

Mr. H. G. SMITH. I hope this amendment will not prevail. Let the institutions of the State rest on their own basis. If we give this power to the Legislature, we do not know where they will land.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I move this amendment as a new section:

"SECTION. 7. The Legislature may establish industrial schools, and require the attendance of vagrant, neglected and abandoned children."

Mr. WHERRY. I move to amend the amendment proposed by striking out all after the word "section" and inserting:

"The Legislature shall establish industrial schools for the education and training of delinquent and neglected children."

"No child in this State shall be permitted to grow up in ignorance, idleness and vice." [Laughter.]

Mr. DALLAS. I simply rise to ask the mover of this amendment a question; that is, what he means by "delinquent children;" and second, how he proposes to enforce the latter branch of the amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. I trust I shall have the floor on this amendment.

Mr. H. G. SMITH. I wish to vote intelligently on this amendment, and I should like to ask the gentleman from Cumberland what he means by the word "delinquent" in this amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. The gentleman from Cumberland desires to explain this proposition if he has an opportunity to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President: I respectfully ask the indulgence and the attention of the Convention for a short time, not for my own sake but in view of the grave importance of the subject I am about to present. The question as it presents itself in the proposition now under consideration is narrowed down to this: the right and duty of the State to secure the moral, mental and industrial training of orphan, destitute, neglected, vagrant, truant, incorrigible, apprenticed, pauper and criminal children; children whom parents and guardians, society, the church and the schools fail to educate and train to usefulness and happiness, and who are learning in the streets, from countless teachers of vice, aided by those grim masters—hunger and want and despair—the malign arts that render the property of our households, the virtue of our women, and the health and happiness of our people insecure.

But we are met at the very threshold of the discussion by the question put to me the other day by the gentleman from Washington (Mr. Hazzard)—"Are there any such children in this State?" I answer, yes, thousands of them. There are thousands of helpless children in our midst, growing up in ignorance, idleness and vice, trained from infancy to crime or suffered by neglect to fall into it, foredoomed from their birth to the police court, the prison and the gallows! Thousands who have never, so far as they can see, or I can see, received anything from society except the wretchedness of being, and owe it, of course, nothing in return but deadly enmity.

Let me call attention briefly to some well-authenticated statistics, and to some authorities of unquestioned weight.

The ninth census, that of 1870, reveals the startling fact that there are in this enlightened christian Commonwealth of Pennsylvania two hundred and twenty-two thousand three hundred and fifty-six persons above the age of ten years who acknowledge that they are unable to read and write. Of course the census-taker did not examine citizens as to their mental qualifications, nor did he qualify them as to the truth of their statements. It is fair to presume that the actual number who can not read and write is much higher than the number reported. So good authorities as Hon. John Eaton, Commissioner of the National Bureau of Education at Washington, Hon. J. P. Wickersham, Superintendent of Common Schools in Pennsylvania, Hon. J. D. Philbrick, of Massachusetts, and other eminent educationists, agree that if to the number returned by the census marshal was added the number who did not tell the truth, and to that again the number unable to read intelligently even in the lowest degree, the aggregate number of illiterates in the State of Pennsylvania would be nearly, if not altogether, doubled. That would make, in round numbers, four hundred thousand persons above the age of ten years without any education of practical value. If these life-long educators are not grossly mistaken (and it is scarcely possible to conceive how they could be, having every motive to make the best showing possible for their own work) we may be able at least to conjecture where the root of that cancer lies about which the distinguished gentleman from York (Judge Black) is so sorely exercised.

But of course we comfort ourselves with the thought that most of these illiterate persons are foreigners, immigrants, old persons, too, who will soon die off and leave behind them more intelligent children. It is a thin delusion, perfectly transparent in the light of truth and fact. That same census report shows that of this number of illiterates actually reported as unable to read and write at all, thirty-one thousand five hundred and thirteen are between the ages of ten and twenty-one! In addition to this, our able and distinguished State Superintendent (who, I repeat, could have no motive for misrepresentation) declares in his report of 1872 that the actual number of children in the State between the ages of ten and twenty-one who cannot read and write at all is not less than seventy-five thousand! Think of it, honorable gentlemen, statesmen. Think of it! Seventy-five thousand children in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania growing up to manhood and womanhood, to the dignity and sovereignty of freemen and the sanctity of motherhood, who, in the language of the Superintendent, are no better intellectually and morally than degraded heathens.

"But where are these children," members have frequently asked me. Well, sir, I will tell you where they are. There are not less than twenty thousand of them in this city alone. The honorable president of the Board of Public Education for the city of Philadelphia, the fifty-third annual report of this Board of Education, and the astounding report made by an able and impartial committee of this same board at a meeting held Tuesday, March eleventh proximo, fully bear me out in the assertion. Think of it! Nearly a thousand of these degraded beings raised to the privilege and duty of the elective franchise every year in this city alone! Is it any wonder your elections are impure, any wonder bad men are lifted to high places of honor and trust, any wonder honest tax-payers are plundered of a million dollars or more a year whilst the insatiable thieves go unwhipped of justice. Think of it, Honorable Mr. President and members of the Board of Education, who control the finest school system to be found on the face of the earth! Think of it, honorable members of this Convention, who have trouble about your grammars and spelling-books and other like weighty matters! Think of the twenty thousand children in your christian city who by no fault of theirs are doomed—doomed to lives of want and crime and woe through ignorance!

But these helpless ones are not all here. Fifty thousand of them are scattered elsewhere throughout the cities and boroughs and counties in the State. There are seven hundred and fifty, on an average, in each county outside of Philadelphia. You will find them in wretched homes, under cruel, venal and debased guardians, in the open streets, on the public highways, in mills and mines, in factories and workshops, in almshouses, in jails, in penitentiaries, everywhere that human existence is possible. If members will take the trouble to examine the report of public charities for the year 1872, laid on their desks a few days ago, they will discover some facts with reference to their particular counties that will probably astonish them. Hundreds of these children are to be found in every county in the State.

There is not a single exception.

Less than one half the counties have provided either secular or religious instruction for the children in their county almshouses. There are seventeen thousand seven hundred and ten permanent paupers in the county almshouses of this State, two thousand of whom are children under sixteen, growing up in these hot-beds of vice and sinks of corruption and fraud—the county poor-houses—and one half of them receive no learning for this world and no light for the next. But besides these permanent paupers, there are thirty-eight thousand eight hundred and twenty-one habitual tramps, one-fifth of whom at least are children, and you have eight thousand more homeless, hopeless, helpless ones.

The PRESIDENT pro tem, The gentleman's time has expired.

MR. NILES. I move to amend the amendment, by striking out all after the word "children."

MR. WHERRY. Mr. President: There are in the State three hundred and thirty-six townships providing for their own poor. Of these only four provide educational means for the children under their care. Only sixty-two require the attendance of the pauper children at the public schools, and these for a term averaging but four months. But—tell it not in Gath—only twenty out of these three hundred and thirty-six christian communities provide, or require the attendance of their wards upon, religious instruction. God have mercy on the Commonwealth if we longer shut our ears to the cry of suffering and sinning humanity that goes daily up to Heaven!

But there are other motives than simple humanity to urge the State to a full measure of her duty in the matter of education. The relation of education and labor is a great economic question now receiving the consideration of the best minds in this country and Europe. Much valuable information on this subject will be found in the report of the National Bureau of Education for the year 1870. I will give but a brief statement of the results of the inquiries in this direction, and in the language of the Commissioner:

"1. The increase of the laborer's wages on account of the simple knowledge of reading and writing, as estimated by observers, employers and employed, was put at an average of twenty-five per cent.

"2. The increase of wages caused by a better education, including a technical training in the particular mechanical occupation, was put at an average estimate one hundred per cent."

But I pass this over to the reflections of the Convention that I may call attention at greater length to the relations of education and crime. Here, too, I cannot but express the regret that the modicum of time allotted to me under the rules will necessitate a very brief and hurried outline of the subject.

Every man of any discernment whatever must have observed that the seeds of mature criminality are sown in childhood. Often, however, the fruit ripens on a tender bough. Mr. Mundella, a member of the British Parliament, asserts that in England one child out of every three hundred is a delinquent; that more than twenty-five per cent. of those poor wretches who barter the sanctity of woman for the wages of lust are under sixteen years of age. In the name of humanity can it be true? More than twenty-five per cent. of the vilest crime known to man or God committed by boys less than sixteen years old!

Authenticated records show that three-fourths of the petty larcenies committed each year in New York city are committed by children under eighteen. I doubt not the statistics of this city, if they were to be had, would make a similar showing.

There are now in the prisons of the United States twenty thousand convicted criminals—more men than the great Washington ever commanded in battle. Eighty per cent. of these are persons without education whatever. Ninety per cent. of them have never learned any trade or acquired skilled labor, even in the most common occupations. Ninety-five per cent. of them either had no homes, or else came from ignorant, idle or vicious homes. Five per cent. of the population commit thirty-five per cent. of the crime, whilst less than one-fifth of one per cent. is committed by those who are educated. Or, as Dr. Wines curtly but forcibly expresses it, "One-third of the crime is committed by two one-hundredths of the population."

But I have said enough on this point. Volumes have been written and will yet be written on the relations of crime and education. We know enough—or can know enough if we take the pains to do it—to show us a straight path of duty in the rescue of ignorant, helpless children, even to the end that not one of them shall be permitted to grow up in ignorance, idleness and vice.

Mr. President, the time has gone by to question the right of the State to demand and command the moral, mental and industrial training of every child within her borders. Sir, if parents fail of their duty then must education be made compulsory. There are other rights to be observed besides those of a degraded parent. The child himself has a right to such training as will fit him for usefulness and enjoyment in life, just as much as he has a right to care and protection and food and raiment. The parent who abandons his child to physical want is punished; so ought he to be punished who starves to death his mind and soul. And when the parent fails and the child is about to die from physical want the State steps forward, in loco parentis, and gives him life. For what? To live in ignorance, in wretchedness and in toil; to curse society by his crimes, and reproach it by his blighted life for the evils it might have and should have prevented.

Society, too, has rights. It is of the highest interest to you and to me whether our fellow-citizens are ignorant or intelligent. We stand with shame at the ballot-box and see our ballot cancelled by some ragged sot too ignorant to comprehend the ballot he casts. The tendency of all civilized nations is to a full recognition of the truth that it is the right and the duty of the State to educate her neglected population. And she has the right to see that her supreme purpose is not defeated. What we need in our Constitution is a positive and immutable mandate of the people that the ignorant and vicious shall be instructed and subjected to wholesome reformatory discipline, and their children saved from their follies and their crimes.

Well may we tremble when we remember those burning words of the great champion of universal education—"An uneducated ballot is the winding-sheet of liberty." The human imagination can picture no semblance of the destructive potency of the ballot-box in the hands of an ignorant people. The Roman cohorts were terrible; the Turkish janizaries were incarnate fiends; but each was harmless as a child compared with universal suffrage without mental illumination and moral principle. The power of casting a vote is far more formidable than that of casting a spear or javelin. In the uneducated ballot is found the nation's greatest danger; but the educated ballot is the nation's main tower of strength. Has society no power to protect itself? Has the republic no right to live? Shall she continue to nurse in her bosom the viper which will one day sting her to death? If these questions are not answered by the representatives of the people, answered by the enactment of a wise and just provision for the education of all the children of the nation, the historian will answer them for us when he portrays the downfall of a once mighty nation which forgot its origin, derided its destiny, sold its birthright and ended its career in shame and disgrace.

I accept the proposition of the gentleman from Tioga (Mr. Niles) and ask that my amendment as modified be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CLERK. The proposition is to amend the section offered by the delegate from Chester (Mr. Darlington) by striking out all after the word "section" and inserting:

"The Legislature shall establish industrial schools for the education and training of delinquent and neglected children."

Mr. MANN. I do not suppose a single delegate here present would take any issue with the very eloquent effort of the gentleman from Cumberland, (Mr. Wherry), as to the necessity of educating every child in the Commonwealth. We have already made provision for the very thing which the amendment he has offered aims to accomplish. The first section of the article under consideration, says that the Legislature "shall provide for the maintenance and support of a thorough and efficient system of common schools wherein all the children of the Commonwealth above the age of six years may be educated." Are there any other children than those provided for in the first section, wherein all the children of the Commonwealth may be educated? If the gentleman desires to change the word "may" to "shall," I will very cheerfully vote to reconsider the section so as to say they shall be educated. But it certainly is a multiplication of words and of sections, first to provide that the Legislature shall establish common schools throughout this State, wherein all the children may be educated, and then go on to single out a particular class. The first section includes all the children, every child in the Commonwealth, no matter what its condition, rich or poor, favored or unfavored, clothed or unclothed. There can be no other children to be provided for, under the section offered by the gentleman from Chester as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Cumberland, and it is an indication that this first section means nothing, to adopt another. Why, sir, I suppose this first section means all that it says and that it is an admonition to the Legislature to carry it out and provide that hereafter there shall be no children in the Commonwealth not taken care of and educated. That is what I suppose the first section means. If it does not mean that, blot it out; let us have no unmeaning sections in this grand article in relation to the education of children.

I am opposed to the proposed section for another reason. I assert that the true way to reform and to bring up into proper manhood these children now neglected is to bring them into the common schools of the State and not to build houses here and there about Philadelphia and other cities written upon them, "for neglected and abandoned children;" for that very thing will make them abandoned. You cannot reform children in that way. They are to be brought into the common schools of the State, or they are to grow up abandoned and criminal, and it is for that reason that I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Cumberland.

You cannot take the favored children of a ward in Philadelphia and put them into one school and the poor and unfortunate into another school and give them the advantages that the system of education is intended to accomplish. All this separation and distinction of children is against the unfavored class; and in behalf of the poor and unfortunate children I appeal to this Convention to vote down both the amendment and the original section. If this first section does not cover the ground, reconsider it and amend it so that it will cover the ground and will compel the Legislature of Pennsylvania to provide for all the children, rich and poor, favored and unfavored. Let us have no distinctions, no separate provisions for one class of children over another; provide for them all in the same section and all alike.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question recurs on the amendment of the delegate from Chester (Mr. Darlington.)

Mr. DARLINGTON. One single word, Mr. President. This section is intended to provide for such children as it is true are admissible into the public schools, but who may not have the means to clothe or feed them to get them there. It is intended for a class neglected and abandoned by their natural protectors, to whom the State owes a duty not only to feed and clothe but to educate, and not only to educate but to feed and clothe. It is therefore that we have proposed to give to the Legislature the authority, and so far as our injunction shall go to enjoin upon them the duty of providing for the care and sustenance, maintenance, education, and clothing of this class of people who would otherwise grow up in ignorance and vice. I need say no more, I am sure, to commend this section to the favorable consideration of the Convention.

Mr. KNIGHT. I move to amend by striking out "may" and inserting "shall."

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. Do ten gentlemen rise to second the call for the yeas and nays?

Ten gentlemen not rising to second the call, the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. KNIGHT. I merely want to say, that in my judgment, the children alluded to in this section are very much neglected, particularly in this city, and I think if more attention were given to them, and more money spent to educate that class of the community, and less of it distributed for the higher branches of education in schools to which many children are sent when their parents are fully competent and able and sufficiently wealthy to educate them otherwise, it would be a great thing in the future for the State of Pennsylvania. I quite concur with the gentleman from Cumberland (Mr. Wherry) in the remarks he has made this afternoon, and I hope the Convention will give them full consideration and agree to put in the amendment that the Legislature shall not permit children to grow up in ignorance, idleness and vice.

Mr. HAZZARD. Mr. President: When the proposition was first read to the Convention it created some merriment, because it struck the Convention, I presume, as it did me, that the desire of the delegate was that there should be no more bad boys in the State; that no vicious persons should grow up in Pennsylvania. If it were possible that we could pass such a section and then find means to carry it out, it would be first-rate; but I think the section now under consideration will meet with the favorable, sober thought of this Convention.

Mr. President, there comes before the hotel at which I board a little girl, probably four years old, almost every night with her brother, perhaps about ten. They pretend to give us music. They have what I presume they call a harp, and the little girl has a triangle. They tinkle upon the triangle and play upon the harp; but they do not produce as much music to me as I used to make myself with a corn-stalk fiddle. I have talked to that boy. He presses his begging to the people in the house, and seems to be sorrowful and sad when he does not get pennies. I asked him one day how he came to be in this business. He said: "I have a master; I am bound to that master by my parents." Perhaps some unshaven wretch that sits in some dark corner in this city of churches and of schools and wealth, and in dissipation and debauch spends the money earned by these children. This boy told me: "If I do not obtain from you and from others forty-five cents to-day, and every day, I get a whipping." That little Italian boy and that little Italian girl are sent upon these streets to make their music for charity, and unless they acquire it they are whipped, and thus they grow up with nothing but a street education. Should there not be something put into the Constitution to restrain such things as this? Are we wise enough to do it? Are we capable of doing it? Does it not demand our serious attention rather than our sneers?

I do not know that this will be compulsory. I have not had time to examine it; but when I catechised the gentleman from Cumberland on its consideration before in the committee of the whole, I was not aware that this State had its seventy-five thousand uneducated children training for our prisons, training to rob our houses and steal our property; and I told him that I had known but a very few in Washington county, the county of colleges and of schools, and was astounded when he showed me the figures, as reported in the report of the common schools, of over twelve hundred in Washington county, and I would not have believed it had he not shown me the figures. Why, Mr. President, there are two boys in my town, and the only ones I knew at that time, who could not read or write. These figures are upon the books that are on the desk of every delegate here, and either the figures are falsehoods or we must believe them; and if this be so, can we not make some provision to alter such a state of things or alleviate the evil to some extent?

I said there were two such boys in our town. I went to the father of those two boys; I knew they could neither read nor write; and I asked him if he would not send them even to Sunday school, and that I would go there and undertake to teach them and any others who wished to learn to read and write. He told me he believed that reading and writing, and education generally, only made rascals, horse thieves and counterfeiters. One of these boys to-day, perhaps, may be able to read; but they are both vagabonds, they are rowdy boys, and have to be restrained by the police. And so it is all over this land. Twenty thousand in this great city, did I hear? Twenty thousand! From the ranks of these will be replenished the cells of your prisons; from these will your poor-houses be filled. You must lock your doors at night; you must provide all these trammels and devices to restrain those that are trained in this identical way upon your streets to rob your entries, to break into your banks, to kill and murder your citizens. Is there any way to stop it? Shall we not hesitate, shall we not pause rather than sneer at such a proposition as this? Shall we not pause and consider if this body, the intelligence of Pennsylvania here represented in this Convention, cannot in some way devise a remedy so that such things shall not exist any longer? or if not altogether remedied such things shall be restrained to a considerable extent. A street education prepares the girls for brothels, and the boys for prisons. Industrial schools with limited educational advantages, would furnish ten thousand skilled artisans to the State, and instead of being so great an expense, as some have said, in the end the Commonwealth will be greatly the gainer, and thousands of neglected children furnished with the means to earn a respectable living.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President: I have a single observation to make. I do not think there is a provision in this amendment that is not covered by the first section of the article reported by the committee, except the compulsory clause. The first section is very general in its terms. Its language is "all children;" and in referring to the education, it is "public school." There is nothing that compromises the character of public schools in any way at all. They may be industrial schools or they may be schools of another character. The only new provision that is added by this amendment is the compulsory clause. Now if we are to have that, do not let it be applied only to these industrial schools that it is proposed to establish, but to all. If it is good for one, it is good for all. If the amendment contemplates anything more than that—

Mr. DARLINGTON. I am going to offer another on that point.

Mr. STEWART. Then it has not been yet offered. I am going now to refer to the remarks of the gentleman from Chester. He indicated the purpose of this amendment as being the maintenance and support of these children by the Commonwealth. Under the language of this amendment, that cannot be done. I insist upon it, if that is its purpose, it falls far short. It simply requires the attendance of these children at these schools. It does not impose on the Commonwealth the duty of maintaining and supporting them at all. It simply requires their attendance; that is all; and if it is the purpose to throw on the State the obligation of supporting and maintaining these children, this amendment is not what it ought to be.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President: I desire to say that I have full sympathy with the object intended by this amendment, and hope that it will receive the respectful consideration of this Convention.

If there is one thing in which the State bears the relation of loco parentis it is in this matter of the neglected children of this State, the poor, the abandoned. I am in full accord with the remarks of the gentleman from Cumberland and I was touched by the remarks of the venerable gentleman from Washington, (Mr. Hazzard.) I hope that we shall not steel our hearts against the argument of one and the appeal of the other.

As to the reasons why this would be proper action on the part of this Convention, I wish to be permitted to say but a few words. If it be necessary that the State shall see to the education of the children of the State at large, it is imperatively necessary that the effort of the State in that direction should be directed to those that most require it; that is, to the poor, the neglected and the abandoned who have not parents and friends to care for them.

We all know, I presume, something of the character of the board of charities and of Mr. Harrison, its president. He chanced in here the day after we had voted down this proposition in the committee of the whole, and expressed the greatest regret at our action. Said he, "I could scarcely sleep at night when I thought that the Convention had passed over that matter in that way."

We have a perishing class, Mr. President, soon, alas, most certainly to become the dangerous class. That class increases, I am sorry to say, with the apparent growth and prosperity of our communities; and it behooves us not merely for the sake of humanity, not merely for the sake of those little children that are growing up, as the gentleman from Cumberland said, with no other prospect or future before them except the poor-house and the prison, or perchance the gallows. To that class, which has no protection, it is the bounden duty of the State to look to their interests, and to do something for them.

Why, sir, the despotism of Prussia has a compulsory system of education for all, believing that it is necessary to the interests of the German Empire that her children shall be educated. If that be true there, how much more true is it in regard to this country where every man is a voter, an equal and a freeman? I wish this Convention to take this view, that we have a numerous class, and a continually increasing class, to whom we should extend the protecting ægis of the State. I hope that the Convention will not vote down thoughtlessly this most eminently wise and humane provision.

A word in regard to the view taken by the gentleman from Potter (Mr. Mann.) They are not embraced, it seems to me, in the first section. It is true that the class referred to are those who can avail themselves of the advantages of the public schools. But there is another class, the class whose claims I am now advocating and presenting in this manner before the Convention, who cannot avail themselves of the public schools. Their parents may be inclined, as in the case of these Italian or other children, to prevent them from going to school, wishing to avail themselves of their poor services. Or they may be prevented by poverty, by many causes, and it is to this class that education should be so far compulsory. I am opposed to the compulsory education of all the children of the State. If I were opposed to it for no other reason it would be that the people of this Commonwealth are not prepared to endorse so strenuous a measure, and it would bring ruin and defeat on the work of this Convention; but I draw a distinction between the children of the Commonwealth at large and this poor, wretched, miserable class which is appealing to us with their poor, wan cheeks and sunken eyes. Our cities are crowded with them. For us to take them under our charge is due to them and for the safety of the State.

MR. CURTIN. Mr. President: I listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Cumberland (Mr. Wherry) with quite as much interest as I have to the remarks of any of the intelligent gentlemen of this Convention upon any of the questions which have been brought before it for its deliberation. I regard his amendment as the most important yet offered in this body, and so far as I am concerned, I endorse every sentiment that he uttered.

The statistics that that gentlemen offered to this Convention are wonderful and alarming, and in advocacy of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Knight) to the section offered by the gentlemen from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) the chairman of the Committee on Education, to put in the word "shall," I would supplement the statistics offered by the intelligent gentlemen from Cumberland with one I read in a newspaper in this city the other day. That column of figures reported that there are ninety-two thousand skilled workmen in the city of Philadelphia, there are thirty-five hundred apprentices, and there are twenty-three thousand abandoned boys on the streets without any visible means of living, occupation or support.

How is this army of children, otherwise uncared for, to be educated? It will not do to say that the Legislature can do it. There was in the Constitution of 1790, power given to the Legislature to establish a better system of education, and yet before that power was exercised by your Legislature, forty-five years had elapsed, from 1790 to 1835, and then it was only by the courage of the executive, George Wolf, and the wonderful eloquence of the great advocate of education, Thaddeus Stevens, in the Legislature of this State that induced the government to accept the system. And we all understand after that system of education was adopted, how it was rejected with scorn and contempt in many of the counties of this Commonwealth, how it struggled through an uncertain existence, and how it received so grudgingly from the Treasury of the State, year after year, its small pittance until it worked itself into popularity; and now the members of the Legislature, the representatives of the people, are liberal and generous in their donations to the system of public education. So now if you put into this new Constitution a provision that the Legislature may do more than it has done, forty-five years may elapse before they will meet your wishes in this regard, and in that forty-five years destitution and ignorance and abandonment will be growing continually upon you, keeping pace with the increase of the population of the State; and these wretched boys, who are now without occupation, may find their places in your poor-houses, your jails or your penitentiaries.

Besides that, you need skilled labor and the highest morality; the most rigid economy that the people of this rich State could practice would be to take these children from the highways and the by-ways, the lanes and the alleys, and erect institutions for them and put them there and give them education and teach them skilled labor to supply the place of the skilled labor you now have and which could be supplied in no way except by emigration. The gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Carter) says that he is opposed to compulsory education. I do not know that compulsory education would receive the approbation of this Convention. I scarcely think from the disapprobation with which the proposition of the delegate from Cumberland was treated that it can. But it does no harm, as gentlemen are in the habit of expressing personal opinions upon this floor, for me to say as a delegate that I am in favor of compulsory education.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman allow me to explain?

Mr. CURTIN. With pleasure.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman did not understand me correctly. I merely meant that I was opposed to a general system of compulsory education throughout the State. Of course I think that these neglected children, the abandoned miserable waifs and outcasts of society, should be taken under the protection of the strong arm of the State and educated. Certainly I am in favor of that. What I objected to was a general system of compulsory education which would not only include all these but all other children.

Mr. CURTIN. I do not still agree with the delegate from Lancaster. Where the common schools are opened as they are in this State to receive all the children of the Commonwealth and parents send the children to be educated, it is well so far as it prevails. Where a parent has ability, and does not send his child, the law should compel the attendance of that child. Where a parent has not that ability then the first, the highest and the holiest duty of a rich and prosperous people is to take the child and save him from abandonment and crime, to put him in an institution, to educate him and to teach him skilled labor that in the future he may earn an honest living, that he may be an ornament and support to government and society instead of an abandoned wretch and an inmate of the poor-house, or worse still, the jail or the penitentiary. I trust that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia will prevail, and we will not be content with the article until we have carried it further. I hope that the good sense of the Convention will come back to the sound principle and to the true morality and duty of the sentiment of the delegate from Cumberland. I shall give the amendment offered by the delegate from Philadelphia my hearty support, and will vote for it with great pleasure.

Mr. HUNSICKER. I am in perfect sympathy with this amendment, and I may say here that this is not the first reform that has been greeted with sneers or ridicule. Nearly every measure of reform when first broached was received with disfavor, and if you desire to accomplish a reform and if this Convention is prepared to take a long step in that direction, let us make this section obligatory upon the Legislature. If you adopt the section as it stands and leave it optional with the Legislature to introduce this system, it will be a mere brutum fulmen, because the Legislature may do it without our recommendation if we do not prohibit it from so doing. If you desire to adopt this reform, say that the Legislature shall provide for the education of the neglected children of this Commonwealth.

I also have had some little experience on this subject, and I was in favor of the first part of the proposition of the gentleman from Cumberland from the time that he broached it. I was prosecuting attorney of Montgomery county for three years, and during that time a large portion of those who were convicted in our courts and sent to the penitentiary were children under twenty-one years of age. The fruitful source of pauperism and crime amongst children lies in the fact that they are neglected and have no education. We have trades unions now existing which preclude trades people from taking apprentices. We no longer bind our children out to learn honest trades, and if the great State of Pennsylvania is now prepared in this enlightened age to take hold of these abandoned and neglected children and educate them to useful trades, she will make them ornaments to society, and Pennsylvania will be the pattern State of the Union.

I trust that this subject will receive the serious consideration of this Convention. I trust that every member will not be anxious to save the public time but that this question will be discussed until it is thoroughly understood. If this plan is not free from objection let it be matured. Let us get the best plan, and what we do want is that there shall be a plan devised by means of which the State shall be saved from this disgrace.

MR. STANTON. Mr. President: As I understand the question before the Convention, the section offered by the gentleman from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) the chairman of the Committee on Education, provides that the Legislature may establish industrial schools and require the attendance at those institutions of children who are neglected or abandoned. The question immediately pending is the amendment of my colleague from Philadelphia (Mr. Knight) to render this imperative by changing "may" to "shall." There seems to be a difference of opinion in regard to what shall be done with this section, and many gentlemen favor the proposition offered by the chairman of the Committee on Education. As that is proposed to be modified by the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia to provide a safe and broad system of compulsory education, I would undoubtedly favor it, and I am also in favor of the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Cumberland (Mr. Wherry.)

I am certainly in favor of compulsory education, and if we cannot get that then let us have the next best thing to it. In reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Cumberland, I endorse every word that he has said. He has referred to an investigation made under the direction of a committee of the Board of Public Education of the city of Philadelphia with reference to the number of children in this city who are deprived of the facilities for obtaining education. His statement was correct. A committee was appointed by that board who carefully gathered the necessary data from every quarter of the entire city, from the by-ways and alleys of its populous districts and from its more rural portions, and they disclosed the alarming fact that there are over twenty thousand children in this city of christian influence and christian liberality who have no education and are receiving none, and who have no other means of maintaining themselves than by selling matches or small fruits in the public streets, or else by begging or stealing.

In one of my reports to the Board of Public Education, I discussed this question of compulsory education. I differed with some of my colleagues upon the subject, but I recommended the Board to urge the Legislature to establish a series of schools to be called rescue schools, and the plan then suggested still presents advantages to my mind. I did not then care, nor do I now have any preferences as to where these schools should be located. They might be placed in the interior of the State or near this city, but wherever they can be most useful there they should be located, and to them the destitute and deserted children of the city should be gathered, should be educated and should be taught practical trades. The expense of such a plan would be no serious difficulty and would mainly consist in the first cost. Under proper management, in the course of a very few years the State would receive sufficient revenue from the results of the labor of these children for their maintenance, and the institutions would become self-supporting. As it is now, they are without education and without home training. Many of them have no home. They lie at night in market houses, sleep upon cellar doors, and seek shelter in any convenient shed or out-house.

The subject has been neglected too long already. Every day the numbers of these children increase, and the consequences that must follow the rearing of this army of vagrants will one day return to plague us for our inattention and recklessness. We must prepare a place for them, and the sooner we attempt to curb this evil, the easier our task will be. Our excellent ex-Governor (Mr. Curtin) has spoken of skilled labor, and shown you that with ninety-two thousand skilled workmen in our city to-day, we have only three thousand five hundred apprentices, but little over one apprentice to thirty workmen. The only way in which we can reach this labor problem, is by the education of our wandering vagrant children, and only with education can any mechanic in this country make his calling effective and his work appreciative.

I have not time to illustrate this thought and do not believe it at all necessary to do so. To one practical lesson in this direction which has carried the subject home to my mind with convincing force, I may however, be pardoned for advertising. Some three years ago, under the direction of the board of Public Education in this city, a series of schools were instituted which were called Artisan Night Schools. They furnished to mechanics and laboring men the opportunity of receiving evening instruction in the ordinary elementary branches of education, and the result has been that those who availed themselves of this means have increased the value of their labor from twenty-five to fifty per cent. Education, even in a limited sense, increased their usefulness, and while it made them better members of society, and increased their respect for law and the usages of a civilized community, it made their work more productive. The same result would attend the education of the children. I do not care what their habits or associations may be. I do not care if they are vagrants or vagabonds, or even thieves. Even an educated convict on the dock receives more consideration than an ignorant one.

But all that could be said on this broad subject will not add to the force of what has been so well presented by the gentlemen from Cumberland. Education is the fundamental groundwork of our government. Let us strengthen the foundations of our own Commonwealth, and let us provide that all our outcast children shall be educated and trained to useful trades. If we do that to-day for our twenty thousand children who are growing up in ignorance and crime, our society will be so strengthened and improved that the generations of the future will find no such statistics at their doors.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President: The new section proposed by the delegate from Chester raises a question much broader in its scope than would be implied from its language. I rise only for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the section, but desire to make a few brief remarks in regard to it. In the first place I desire that the section be read.

The CLERK read the section as follows:

"The Legislature may establish industrial schools, and require the attendance of vagrant, neglected and abandoned children."

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question now before the Convention, is the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Knight) to the amendment, to strike out "may" and insert "shall."

Mr. GIBSON. I move to amend by striking out all after the word "schools."

The PRESIDENT pro tem. That would be an amendment to the section and not an amendment to the amendment. There is an amendment to the section already pending.

Mr. GIBSON. Then, sir, in regard to the word "shall," I trust I may be indulged in a few remarks, and my amendment may be hereafter offered to the section. I think that the wants of the people of this Commonwealth, and the good of the Commonwealth itself are not entirely contained in this word "education," or what is understood by the term "education." Every one understands what the word education means. It is being taught in those branches of knowledge which are to fit persons for the useful duties of life. It is to teach them the ordinary branches of reading, writing and arithmetic and such other additional branches as the laws may provide shall be taught in the public schools. But there is nothing in this term "education" or in the term "public schools" which implies what is meant by the term "industrial schools," where children may be taught trades, and not be left when they have taken the ordinary branches of education, to seek for clerkships or for professional employment of some kind, in order to earn a living; or to be on account of their education above learning useful trades.

Citizens of this Commonwealth, respectable, and well-to-do men, have endeavored to have their sons taught trades by apprenticing them or by placing them in our mechanical shops and have failed to do so, because of secret and arbitrary trade rules, or could only attain that end by submitting to the conditions which are imposed upon all persons who seek to do so by the rules that govern what are known as the trades unions. I think, sir, that not only are the vagrant, abandoned and neglected children of the Commonwealth to be taken care of in this respect, but the children of respectable parents are to be taken care of. Sir, I shall adopt the words of an article that has been handed to me from a newspaper, which expresses much better than I can express it, an argument in favor of teaching children trades, which I submit to this Convention and which I am willing to adopt as my own. It reads as follows:

"THE PROBLEM OF THE HOUR.—Philadelphia has eight thousand manufactories and workshops, says the Star, in which are employed ninety-two thousand one hundred and twelve journeymen, and only six thousand five hundred apprentices, and of these latter perhaps not more than one in twenty regularly indentured. At the same time, it is stated that there are about twenty-five thousand boys and girls between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one in the city who are without useful employment."

"This is a startling statement. It challenges the attention of every man interested in the future of the rising generation, and in the prosperity of the skilled professions of our country. As has been stated on a number of occasions, the large majority of our skilled workmen are from foreign countries.

"It is safe to assert that not more than one in five of the regular journeymen employed in American workshops and manufactories are of American birth, and under the present system the disparity must daily become greater, until finally an American skilled workman will be a rarity.

"This is a subject of overshadowing importance and the discussion of which is imperatively demanded in order that there may be a satisfactory solution to the problem—What shall we do with the boys?

"The same conclusions will apply in Columbia (the place of publication of the newspaper from which this article is taken.) An advertisement for a "clerk wanted" will receive from one thousand to twenty-five hundred applications or answers in Philadelphia. In Columbia a similar advertisement will receive proportionately the same number, while the trades go begging for good apprentices. Honest labor is respectable, and the sooner our boys are impressed with the truth of this, the better for them and the community.

"Among the hundreds of men that crowd our prisons, and women that throng the chambers of death and hell, are few who have learned honest trades. Industrious persons with trades know what they can do, and know just where to go for steady and remunerative work. But others, who in early life spend much and earn little, who are too proud to learn trades, and too lazy to do drudgery, of course, look out for an easier way of getting a living; and while men, by theft, swindling, robbery and murder, work out the legitimate result of early idleness, extravagance and pride, women plunge into the depths of shame and infamy, and bid adieu to hope and joy for time and for eternity."

Thus for the article, and it certainly expresses in very strong language the very great want that is felt in this country for American skilled workmen, and also that there is arising in this community a class of young persons who are above the learning of honest trades.

Now, sir, I also wish to add as part of my remarks a letter from a gentleman of some distinction in this State, and I do not mention his name because it might not be his desire that it should be mentioned; but it also expresses in very strong language an objection to the provision that is added to this proposed section with regard to vagrant children:

"I was greatly disappointed in reading the section of Mr. Darlington's report on industrial schools to find it coupled with a clause implying that these schools were intended for vagrant, neglected and abandoned children.

"Depend upon it, you could not more effectually prevent all other classes of children from attending these much needed schools than by attaching to it a provision of this kind. Our old Constitution contains a clause requiring the Legislature to establish schools where the poor should be taught gratis, and our public schools were a complete failure until this invidious distinction was abandoned, and the same evil fate will attend the industrial school if this unhappy clause is retained. Let the power to compel this class of children to attend schools be inserted in a separate section, and let the Industrial schools be open for all who choose to attend them, and we may hope to see a reduction in the number of unhappy young persons who grow up without having learned how to earn their own living."

I think, sir, that I could not add anything to the arguments contained in these two papers. I therefore submit to this Convention that if we are about to adopt a provision with regard to industrial schools, we should do as we do with regard to the schools for public education—open them to all classes of the community. Let the son of the rich man, as well as the poor vagrant, be entitled to go in, learn his trade, and not let him be subject to rules and conditions which must exclude him or with which he cannot comply, and let our skilled labor of America compete with that of foreign countries.

I have nothing further to add. As soon as the amendment to the amendment is passed upon, I shall ask that the section be so moulded that it may include all classes of persons, and, if necessary, to compel the attendance of vagrant children, and I hope that may be adopted in another section or by some sort of proviso.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. Mr. President: I desire to say a word upon this subject, and touch upon a matter which has not been touched upon by any gentleman who has spoken.

No one living in Philadelphia can be more impressed with the importance of just such a section as this than those who have seen the trouble and distress by which we are surrounded. And, sir, I speak for Philadelphia when I say that the vagrant and neglected children of Philadelphia have not been overlooked, but they have been as far as is possible cared for and protected. The vagrant children of the city of Philadelphia can be taken to the mayor to-day and the mayor can send them to the homes of which there are some seven or eight scattered over the city of Philadelphia, and the vagrant and neglected children can be cared for in those homes, and the councils of the city of Philadelphia appropriate every year thousands of dollars to those homes for this privilege. Any vagrant child can be taken by a policeman, or by the gentleman from Allegheny, if he sees fit, to the mayor, and a good home and an honest trade can be given to that vagrant child. But by the action of this Convention to-day that privilege has been taken away from the city of Philadelphia, and no other equal remedy has been provided, and therefore I stand in my place and urge that something may be done by a section of this sort to take the place of the only remedy at the hands of the councils of the city of Philadelphia, the only remedy they seem to have been able to secure, so that they may take care of these poor and neglected and vagrant children. This remedy we have taken from the city of Philadelphia by our action to-day.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. What section?

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. We have just passed a section by which no municipal corporation can grant or donate land or money to any church or religious society, or to any charitable institution managed by any church or sectarian denomination. These homes are supported by sectarian denominations; and the mayor of the city of Philadelphia, and the councils of the city of Philadelphia have seen fit to secure their aid and their help so that the vagrant children of the city of Philadelphia might be cared for, and might be protected and have a secure and comfortable home. The councils of Philadelphia, with a praiseworthy liberality, do appropriate year by year thousands of dollars in order that the mayor may secure that privilege; but we to-day have by our action closed the door of that charity to the mayor. We to-day have said to the councils of the city of Philadelphia, "Your vagrant children and your neglected children must continue to wander houseless and homeless through the city."

This is the condition in which by our action this city is placed, and shall we say that the State shall provide no remedy? I hope not. It is true that we have to use denominational benevolent institutions for this purpose; but the State gives us no remedy. The evil is pressing upon us; something must be done for the vagrant children of the city of Philadelphia, no matter by whose hand protected, and no matter by whose hand cared for. The necessity is upon us, and the councils of Philadelphia were bound to secure the remedy at hand, and have for years made the appropriations to which I have alluded. By our action to-day these appropriations can no longer be made. By our action to-day we are helpless in the matter of appropriations, and therefore, we as a Convention are bound, in my opinion, to provide a remedy, having deprived the city of Philadelphia of the privilege which they have heretofore enjoyed.

Again, sir, the city of Philadelphia spends every year $1,400,000 in the education of her children. Let any one look about him in his walks through the city of Philadelphia, and he will find dotted here and there thick over its broad expanse school houses of which any city might be proud, and of which the people of this State may well be proud. These school houses cost the city of Philadelphia millions upon millions of dollars, and they would be filled to overflowing if these 20,000 children to which allusion has been made were sent to school; but the good effects to be derived therefrom will be secured if we pass a section of this kind, or reconsider our action when the article on public education was up before, and reinstate the section which this Convention saw fit to reject.

Now, sir, I hope that the section will be passed, and I understand that the gentleman from Chester will follow it up by another section setting forth that the Legislature may pass laws compelling every child in this city and in this State to be educated. Pass that section and we shall have secured the desired result. Do this and the school houses which the city of Philadelphia has built with a free and liberal expenditure will be filled. Do that and the twenty thousand children now uneducated and without any visible means of support will be cared for, will be educated, and will hereafter secure substantial means of self-support. Let us do what the Committee on Education saw fit to recommend us to do and let us reinstate these two sections, the one now before us and the one which will be offered in a little while by the gentleman from Chester, (Mr. Darlington,) and I think we shall have performed to-day a good and noble work.

Mr. MANTOR. Mr. President: I am more than pleased this afternoon with the course of this Convention, better pleased I believe than I have ever been since I have taken a seat in this body. The effect of introducing this subject before the Convention and calling the minds of the delegates that are assembled here from the different parts of the State to one of the most needed reforms, in my opinion, that could interest the minds of the delegation that has assembled in this Hall from day to day, has been beneficial. But what is their real duty? I have ever held it to be a principle in this government that if we succeed in establishing that grand foundation on which this government has been based, education is certainly necessary, and therefore I have always favored "compulsory education."

This proposition this afternoon reads that the "Legislature may establish industrial schools and require the attendance of abandoned and neglected children;" with the amendment which was offered by the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Knight,) inserting the word "shall" for "may," I most heartily concur in. Sir, it is not the city of Philadelphia alone that this question appeals to but it is to the whole State. The necessity shows itself everywhere; pauperism and crime are the sure result of a neglect somewhere in society. A well ordered system of public schools such as we have in this State goes far, very far, towards eradicating many of the evils that we have to contend with; and yet they do not meet the entire demand. We have a class of persons in every city and almost every community who fail to do their duty to those who are placed under their charge. It is for the benefit of this class and to this class that this proposition refers. I feel quite sure that if such schools are established in this State thousands and thousands of now neglected and abandoned children will be provided with suitable homes, will have the opportunity for a fairer race in life, and at the end of such race, society will have been benefited a thousand times, ten thousand for all the pecuniary cost it may be to the State. It is a duty the State owes to itself; and proud will be the day when we shall endorse this principle.

Mr. President, I did not arise for the purpose of making extended remarks, but for the purpose of endorsing and seconding this proposition, and I sincerely hope that this Convention may adopt this or some similar section.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. President: If I resided in the city of Philadelphia it is quite likely that I should vote for this proposition, for the necessity of it seems to be confined to the city of Philadelphia; the advocates of the measure are almost entirely from the city of Philadelphia; the statistics that have been furnished us are almost entirely of the city of Philadelphia. I shall vote against it because I object—

Mr. KATNE. Will the gentleman give way for a moment?

Mr. BOYD. I should rather go on while I have the heat up.

Mr. KATNE. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Education, who has this article in charge, has just informed me that he had to leave here a few moments before half-past six and could not be here to participate further in the proceedings upon this question? Therefore, if agreeable to the Convention, I will make a motion now that this Convention adjourn. I move that the Convention adjourn if the gentleman gives way.

Mr. BOYD. I do not give way. ["Go on."]

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The gentleman from Montgomery will proceed.

Mr. BOYD. I was going on to say that I shall vote against this proposition because I object to the counties who have none of these delinquents, or at least very few of them within their borders, paying the expense, and I am opposed to my county paying large sums of money in the future for the education of this class of people. I hold it to be the duty of the city of Philadelphia to incur that expense, if it should be necessary.

I have yet to learn that there existed in Montgomery county to any extent the class of persons that this section is intended to provide for and protect; and the people of Montgomery county, as I have said, will never agree to be taxed for the support of this class in the city of Philadelphia or any other large city where they are numerous.

Mr. KNIGHT. I would suggest to the gentleman, if he will allow me, that Norristown will soon be a large city.

Mr. BOYD. Norristown is a city; but we have no statistics from that city nor can any be obtained from that county showing the exhibition, or approaching it even, which has been furnished to us by gentlemen residing in the city of Philadelphia and the majority of the counties in this State.

Mr. WHERRY. I desire to ask the gentleman if he has ever seen the statistics of Montgomery county on this subject.

Mr. BOYD. No, I have not.

Mr. WHERRY. I will show them to the gentleman if he will come to my desk.

Mr. BOYD. I shall be very happy to see them, and I doubt very much that you can show to any great extent that class of people in the county of Montgomery.

Mr. WHERRY. I can show the gentleman that there are twelve hundred children in his county between the ages of eight and twenty-one who cannot read and write.

Mr. BOYD. I have no doubt of that, and so you can in almost any county in the State of the same population. But they are not the class of people you are undertaking to provide for as I understand it, but a class of people whose morals have been neglected and where no efforts have been made to redeem them and make them moral, and you seek now to impose on the broad Commonwealth a tax for the purpose of maintaining and supporting an evil which exists mainly in the city of Philadelphia.

I take it that my remarks will apply to the majority, yes, nine-tenths of the counties of this State, that the people of this State are not burdened with that class at all; and wherever they do exist, as they must exist in every county to some extent, ample means and provisions are always ready to be made to take care of them, and I maintain that it is extremely unjust and unfair to impose a burden of this kind on the counties throughout this State who have a very inconsiderable number of that class of people to support. It is for these reasons that I shall vote against the whole thing from top to bottom.

Mr. KATNE. Mr. President: I should have preferred in this article on education to have adopted simply the first section:

"The Legislature shall provide for the maintenance and support of a thorough and efficient system of public schools wherein all the children of this Commonwealth above the age of six years may be educated."

That would be a sufficient charter, in my opinion, for the Legislature to establish all kinds of schools for the education of all the children in the Commonwealth and also the kind of schools provided for in this amendment. It was with the view of giving the Legislature the largest liberty on the subject of education, that I voted against the second section of this article providing that the Legislature should appropriate a million of dollars annually for the support of common schools. I feared that a provision of that kind in the Constitution would be taken by the Legislature as a limit, and that it would appropriate that sum and no more; that for years to come that would be looked upon by the Legislature as a limit beyond which they would not go. I know it says "at least;" but I know that the Legislature on the subject of appropriations for common schools and educational purposes has been very careful to make the sums very small. The sums heretofore appropriated by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth for the purposes of common schools have been a mere pittance, nothing more than enough to keep the establishment at Harrisburg going. I hope to see the day, and that not very far distant, when a much larger sum than a million of dollars—yea, thrice that sum—will be appropriated by the Legislature of Pennsylvania for the support of the common schools of this Commonwealth.

I therefore would rather have confined this article to the first section; but it seems to be the desire of the Convention to do otherwise; but I am not willing to go with the gentleman from York (Mr. Gibson) to provide for establishing general mechanical establishments by the Legislature of the State for all persons. I want to confine it, if at all, to the kind of people that are named in this section, those that are found in cities like Philadelphia and other large towns and cities in this Commonwealth. They are persons that ought to be provided for. They are the persons that I suppose are intended to be provided for by this section—poor, indigent and neglected children, such as have been described here so well by the gentlemen on my right from Washington (Mr. Hazzard)—those foreign children that are now in the streets of Philadelphia and other towns and cities of this Commonwealth. If put in educational establishments where they can be fed and clothed and educated and learn mechanical occupations, they will then become important and valuable citizens to the Commonwealth. I am not like the gentleman from Montgomery; (Mr. Boyd;) I do not care whether they come from Philadelphia or Pittsburg, or from any other county in the Commonwealth. If they are the kind of children that are contemplated by the section under consideration, they may be placed in institutions of this kind.

Our system of common schools as now conducted under the acts of Assembly of this Commonwealth will not accomplish this purpose. The common schools have no power to clothe children and feed them and teach them mechanical occupations. That requires a different kind of system from any that we have ever had in Pennsylvania or any that we desire to have for the general education of our people. I do not desire that the children of all persons, as is contemplated by the gentleman from York, should go there, but just such as are contemplated by this section.

The gentleman from York is mistaken, and the gentleman whose letter he read is mistaken, in regard to the system of common schools in Pennsylvania. The letter from which he read states that it was not until the Legislature provided that all should be taught together in the same schools, that up to this time the common school system of Pennsylvania had been a failure. Sir, up to 1831, there had been no common school system in Pennsylvania. The article of the Constitution of 1790, which authorized the Legislature to provide a system of common schools at which the poor should be taught gratuitously, had been on the statute book for forty-one years before anything was done under it except a provision in an act of Assembly of 1825 that made some provision for the creation of a common school fund; and it was not until 1831 that an act of Assembly was ever passed under the Constitution of 1790 providing for the establishment of a system of common schools. Forty years had that constitutional provision been in force in Pennsylvania and nothing done under it. Strange as it may appear, and strange as it is, the Convention of 1837-'38 adopted that provision from the Constitution of 1790 verbatim et literatim, added nothing to it, let it remain as it was, although the common school system of Pennsylvania then was in its infancy.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, striking out the word "may," and inserting "shall."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The President pro tem. The question recurs on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I hope this amendment will not prevail. I should like to call the attention of the Convention to where they are drifting. When the gentleman from Cumberland (Mr. Wherry) first offered the amendment, the Convention laughed at him. There was a universal —

Mr. WHERRY. Will the gentleman give way until I make an explanation which is really due to myself? The words which caused the merriment were really no part of the amendment at all, but were hitched on by my friend from Tioga (Mr. Niles) thoughtlessly, for the very purpose of being stricken off in order that I might make my speech. [Laughter.] I make this explanation in justice to myself.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Very well. Now, Mr. President, what will be the practical effect of this section? If it be adopted, we shall declare that the State of Pennsylvania is to provide schools enough to take care of, feed, clothe, and educate, all those children that gentlemen here denominate as "vagrant, neglected and abandoned." This of itself is a huge undertaking; and I would ask the members of the Convention to look at it seriously before they commit themselves finally to vote for it.

Can the State of Pennsylvania do this thing? Can it, year after year, appropriate immense sums of money for the purpose of carrying on these industrial schools? Can we, out of the Treasury of the Commonwealth, provide schools for these twenty thousand children in the city of Philadelphia, that are so pathetically spoken of? Will the people of the Commonwealth submit to be taxed for such enormous appropriations as will be required for the support of these schools?

Mr. President, outside of the money consideration involved in the establishment of such a system, there is another matter to which I wish to call the attention of members. How will the administration of this proposed scheme be carried into effect? How will these vagrant and neglected children be collected and put into these schools? Is it intended merely to provide schools and then invite vagrant children to come to them? That of itself would be an absurdity. If they are the class that they are represented to be, you cannot get them to go to school voluntarily; you must provide your State officers, your State agents in every county to take them from the streets and put them into the schools. Then, after you do provide your State agents, your State police, or whatever you choose to call them, you have to make your schools prisons; if you allow them to have open doors the children will go out again; in plain language, you have to establish numerous houses of refuge throughout the State at the public expense for the maintenance and education of neglected and abandoned children. Are we prepared to do that? Are we prepared to say to the people of Pennsylvania that their Legislature must every year appropriate money for the establishment of prisons in which to incarcerate the children taken from the streets, or, perhaps, taken from their homes, and in which such children will be provided for, clothed, fed and educated?

Mr. President, there is another feature of this proposed scheme which to my mind is the most dangerous of all. It will, under color of reclaiming vagrant, abandoned and neglected children, allow your State agents, who may become the mere officers of religious denominations, to go into the houses of private citizens, and on the plea that the fathers or the mothers or the guardians do not educate in the proper way the children entrusted to their care, take them out of their homes and put them into the proposed prison schools. Will you permit that? Will you permit the State to be turned into a machine for religious persecution? That will be the effect of it. That will be one of the first results of it.

I believe that the first section of this article is a good one. In my opinion we should provide ample means for carrying on our public schools. I am perfectly sincere in my belief that the public school system of Pennsylvania is a good one. I myself owe my education to it. I have been educated in public schools from the time I was six years of age until I was seventeen, from the lowest up to the highest of them, and I believe they are good institutions. I believe that the State should appropriate all the money that is necessary for perfecting the common school system and making it still more useful. But I do protest against the passage of the section now before us, incorporating as it does a principle of compulsory education of the kind proposed into the Constitution of Pennsylvania. What the gentlemen who advocate this section declare they wish to effect, can be accomplished by having your school system so perfected that it will invite of its own accord all the poor children of the Commonwealth to come to the public schools provided for them. The reason now that such a large percentage of your population will not attend your public schools, is because your public schools are run in many instances in the interest of sectarian denominations. You will find that large numbers of the people do not regard them with favor because the religious faith of their children is tampered with and attempts are made to pervert those children from the faith that they believe in; and, Mr. President, that is the danger that we have to fear from a section of this kind. If we have the danger under our present system as it is now, when it is not compulsory, how much more danger will there be when it will be compulsory. How much danger will there be when you will allow a State officer to go into a man's house, take out a child and put that child into a house of refuge, or perhaps allow him to walk into a religious orphan asylum and on the plea that the children in that orphan asylum have been neglected and abandoned, take those children out of the asylum and put them into a State institution?

I tell you if you attempt to enforce anything of that kind, the people of this State will, sooner or later, reverse your action.

I do protest against the passage of this section, and I hope the good sense of the members will lead them to vote it down. We voted it down in committee of the whole, and I hope we shall do so here. The true course is to so perfect your common school system as to remove all sectarian influence from it and make it inviting to all the people of the State to send their children to reap the benefits to be derived from it. By doing this you will get clear of your difficulty, and have your large class of neglected and vagrant children provided for.

MR. ANDREW REED. I desire to state the reasons for the vote which I expect to cast. Were I in the Legislature I should vote for a section of this kind. I am in favor of its principle; and had the section remained as originally moved by the chairman of the Committee on Education,

(Mr. Darlington,) I should have voted for it; not because the Legislature would not have the power without it, but for the sake of showing the favor of the Convention to that measure. But this Convention having adopted the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia, (Mr. Knight,) making it compulsory on the Legislature to do it, I shall vote against the section, because I believe the matter should be left to the Legislature, and then if it does not work well it can be repealed.

MR. HANNA. Mr. President: I fear that quite a number of the members, in discussing this question, have confounded compulsory education with the establishment of industrial schools. The subject before us is not compulsory education, but a section requiring that the Legislature shall establish industrial schools where neglected children shall be taught mechanical pursuits.

That is a very different question; and for one I am not prepared to vote in favor of compelling the Legislature to do this very thing. The first section of this article covers the entire subject; and as has been well stated by the gentleman from Mifflin, this is a question entirely for the Legislature. Why, sir, what are we about to do? Authorize the establishment and the location in four, or five, or half a dozen different sections of the State of institutions governed by State officers, with their agents and their police authorities. Why, sir, they cannot be organized without it, and I submit they will in time become unpopular and the source of complaint.

Again, it will impose a vast burden of expenditure upon the State at large. As my colleague from Philadelphia referred to that subject, I will not again advert to it, but I do insist that the State now, the people at large, are not prepared to introduce into the Constitution of the State any such principle as this. Why, sir, our soldiers' orphans' homes and other institutions under the charge of the State have been from time to time the source of very serious criticism. Time after time have charges been made in the Legislature against the improper management and control of those institutions; and for one I am not willing to increase the number of such institutions. I think that all the State at large has to do is to provide for the expense of our common schools, and as regards compulsory education, I submit that is a question which should be left to the school authorities of the several school districts of the State. Let the Legislature confer upon the boards of education throughout the State such authority as will enable them to introduce compulsory education, in such a manner as will meet with the favor and approval of the people.

In the State of Massachusetts they have a form of compulsory education which as far as I know meets with the approval of the people, but they make no distinction between the children. They have their truant officers going about the streets of Boston and other places throughout the State, and they have the power whenever they see a boy they think should be at school to question him, to examine him, and if they find him to be a truant to conduct him back to his school-house. That is as far as we should go.

I cannot close without alluding to another remark of my colleague (Mr. Campbell) from Philadelphia. In referring to our common schools, he has pronounced them to be under sectarian rule and government. That, sir, I deny.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to an explanation. I did not say any such thing. I said that in many instances schools are run in the interest of sectarian denominations, and I say now that this sectarian influence is becoming so general that at least one religious denomination has withdrawn its children from the public schools.

Mr. HANNA. The gentleman has attempted to explain; but he did, in his seat, say that the common schools of Philadelphia were sectarian institutions and that the effect of them was to pervert the children from the faith of their fathers. That, sir, I deny. From the earliest establishment of the common schools of Philadelphia no one ever complained of them but one single denomination. Why? Because the Holy Bible was read in our public schools; that is all, and if that is sectarian, I should like to know it.

Now, in regard to the question before us, I do submit that this proposition should not be agreed to, because it belongs to the Legislature of the State to make such rules and regulations, to pass such acts of Assembly as will perfect our common school system. This is provided for in the first section of the article.

Mr. GIBSON. I offer an amendment to the amendment. I move to strike out all after the word "schools," and insert the following:

"For the children of the Commonwealth the Legislature shall provide by law for the selection of proper skilled mechanics and the establishment of proper places and buildings at the public cost, in which said children may be instructed in the arts and mysteries of useful trades."

Mr. C. A. BLACK. I move that we adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and at six o'clock and fifty-four minutes P. M. the Convention adjourned.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SEVENTH DAY.

WEDNESDAY, June 25, 1873.

The Convention met at nine o'clock A. M., Hon. John H. Walker, President pro tem., in the chair.

Prayer by Rev. J. W. Curry.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DARLINGTON asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. D. N. White, for a few days from to-day.

Mr. WHERRY asked and obtained leave of absence for himself, for a few days after to-day.

PLACE FOR SUMMER SITTINGS.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. President: I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the President to inquire what facilities are afforded by different places for the sitting of this Convention during the summer months, and report at their earliest convenience.

On the question of proceeding to the second reading and consideration of the resolution, a division was called for, which resulted ayes 37, noes 31.

The resolution was read a second time and considered.

Mr. J. N. PURVIANCE. I move to amend by striking out "five" and inserting "three" as the number of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LILLY. I move to strike out "five" and insert "the committee of the whole."

The PRESIDENT pro tem. That is not in order.

Mr. KNIGHT. I move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The question is on postponing the consideration of the resolution.

The question being put, there were a division, ayes 34, noes 38.

Mr. BOYD. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. EDWARDS. I second the call.

Mr. STANTON. I trust the Convention will either accept it or postpone it, and not spend another day on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The yeas and nays are ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The yeas and nays being taken, resulted as follows:

Y E A S .

Messrs. Achenbach, Andrews, Bailly, (Perry,) Bannan, Bardsley, Bigler, Black, Chas. A., Boyd, Broomall, Bullitt, Calvin, Carter, Darlington, Edwards, Fulton, Guthrie, Hall, Hay, Hemphill, Kaine, Knight, Lawrence, Lilly, Littleton, M'Camant, M'Culloch, Mann, Mantor, Mott, Palmer, G. W., Palmer, H. W., Patton, Porter, Pughe, Purman, Purviance, Samuel A., Rooke, Smith, H. W., Stanton Turrell, Wetherill, Jno. Price, Wherry and Wright—43.

N A Y S .

Messrs. Ainey, Alricks, Baer, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Beebe, Black, J. S., Bowman, Brodhead, Brown, Church, Cochran, Corbett, Cronmiller, Curry, Curtin, Davis, Dunning, Elliott, Ellis, Ewing, Funck, Gibson, Gilpin, Greene, Hazzard, Horton, Hunsicker, Lambertson, Long, MacConnell, M'Clean, M'Murray, Minor, Niles, Parsons, Patterson, T. H. B., Purviance, John N., Reed, Andrew, Runk, Russell, Struthers, Van Reed, Walker, Wetherill, J. M., White, J. W. F., and Woodward—46.

So the question was determined in the negative.

ABSENT.—Messrs. Addicks, Armstrong, Baker, Barclay, Bartholomew, Biddle, Buckalew, Campbell, Carey, Cassidy, Clark, Collins, Corson, Craig, Cuyler, Dallas, De France, Dodd, Fell, Finney, Hanna, Harvey, Heverin, Howard, Landis, Lear, MacVeagh, Metzger, Mitchell, Newlin, Patterson, D. W., Read, John R., Reynolds, Ross, Sharpe, Simpson, Smith, H. G., Smith, Wm. H., Stewart, Temple, White, David N., White, Harry, Worrell and Meredith, President—44.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The motion is not agreed to.

Mr. BIDDLE. I desire to vote.

Mr. WOODWARD. I object to that vote being recorded. It was given after the Chair had declared the result.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. If objected to, it cannot be recorded.

Mr. BIDDLE. I rose and addressed the chair before the vote was announced.

Mr. WOODWARD. What I stated was absolutely true. The vote of the gentleman from Philadelphia was cast after the decision of the chair was declared, and I object to any vote being received after the Chair has announced the result.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The vote cannot be received, as objection is made. The question recurs on the resolution.

Mr. J. PRICE WETHERILL. On that question, I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUNSICKER. I second the call.

The yeas and nays were taken, and were as follow, viz:

YEAS.

Messrs. Ainey, Alricks, Bailey, (Huntingdon,) Beebe, Black, J. Stewart, White, David N., White, Harry, Worrell and Meredith, President—36.

Mr. H. W. PALMER. Mr. President: I have received a telegram, which I ask may be read.

The CLERK read as follows:

WILKESBARRE, June 24, 1873.

H. W. Palmer, Constitutional Convention, Philadelphia:

The city of Wilkesbarre invites the Convention to hold its sessions here. Every provision will be made for the convenience and comfort of its members in and out of session.

H. M. HOYT,
G. M. HARDING,
STANLEY WOODWARD,
CHARLES PARRISH,
W. LEE, JR.

Mr. EWING. I move that the communication be referred to the committee to be appointed under the resolution just passed.

The motion was agreed to.

EDUCATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The first business in order is the consideration of the article on education, the question being on the amendment offered by the gentleman from York (Mr. Gibson) to the amendment of the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington.) The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CLERK. The amendment to the amendment is to insert after the word "schools," the words, "for the children of the Commonwealth, and shall provide by law for the selection of proper skilled mechanics and the establishment of proper places and buildings at the public cost to which said children may be instructed in the arts and mysteries of useful trades."

Mr. PURMAN. Mr. President: The section as proposed by the delegate from Chester provided that "the Legislature may establish industrial schools and require the attendance of vagrant, neglected and abandoned children," and the amendment follows in its wake.

Mr. President, I regard this proposition as a very mischievous and dangerous proposition for several reasons. In the first place, it employs terms that are exceedingly vague and undefined. What children are "neglected" so that the strong arm of the Commonwealth should be employed for the purpose of picking up a child here and there on the streets and in the townships throughout this Commonwealth? Where would the line begin when you should say a child was not neglected and where would it end where you would say a child was neglected? The whole theory of our government is based upon the idea that the parents have the right to control their children, and not until they have ceased to make any provision for them whatever, has the State a right to come in and take the children out of their hands, and say to them, they have been neglected. What I might regard as gross neglect on the part of parents as to the industry of the child or the education of the child, my neighbor might regard as the highest care. The State has no right to compel the children of the State to labor as long as the parents maintain them. The State has no right to compel any citizen of the Commonwealth to labor as long as he may maintain himself.

This is not merely for "abandoned" children, such as may be found in the streets of the city of Philadelphia and other cities of the State, but it is for those who are "neglected" by their parents. "Neglected" in what? Neglected in their religious training? My good Presbyterian neighbor would come along to me and say, "I am sorry that you are so unmindful of the interests of your children; here you have a son and a daughter which have reached fifteen or sixteen years of age, and those children have not yet been baptized. Why should you be so neglectful of the best interests of your children, for their morals here and their life hereafter?" I would smile in the gentleman's face and I would tell him that those waiting at Jerusalem for the promise made to their fathers baptized none but believers, and that I had an abiding confidence in that doctrine; I was holding fast to the doctrine of the fathers.

I might come along and say to my Catholic neighbor, "Why do you carry your children off to the Cathedral and point them to the cross and the Virgin Mary, and all the balance of the paraphernalia of that Church? Are you not likely to destroy the moral and religious sentiments of your child?" He would answer, "Why, sir, this is the mother Church. This I regard as the highest teachings my child can receive."

Has the Convention thought for a moment where this proposition will lead us? It is mischievous indeed, and would lead to the destruction of the power of parents over their children, lead to religious conflicts the end of which no man can foresee. Perhaps this argument may excite a smile on the faces of delegates and may not reach their thoughts, may not be sufficient to arouse their energies and make them reflect what they are about to do. I want it to appear in the Debates of this Convention that the mischievous and dangerous consequences of this section was most fully pointed out, and then let the Convention do whatever it may see proper. This is a rock upon which the State will burst into fragments—a stumbling block and a pitfall. The principle involved in this section is a total disregard of the inalienable right to the enjoyment of life, and the unfettered pursuit of happiness. It violates the natural rights of parents over their children, and the rights of conscience of both the parents and the children. The first section of this article establishes "a thorough and efficient system of public schools wherein the children of this Commonwealth may be educated." From this it will be seen that ample provision is made to educate all the children of the State, but the section of the gentleman from Chester proposes to "require" the attendance of all the children. This would enable the Legislature to pass laws authorizing such authorities as it might create to enter the house of each man and enquire how he was educating his children, and finally to carry them away if they supposed they were neglected in their education. This I submit violates all the principles of religious freedom and equality. This article contains in it the spirit which drove Rodger Williams out of Massachusetts, and are akin to Smithfield and Oxford. This system of compulsory education and compulsory moral reform, however plausible on the outside—inasmuch as they profess to cure ignorance, idleness and vice; infirmities and evils detrimental always to public life and destructive of the common welfare—is one of great difficulty and delicacy, but in its vigor and life is destructive of the liberty of men and women to keep their children at home and educate them in their own way.

Mr. BAER. Mr. President: I am heartily in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Chester; but I voted yesterday in favor of striking out "may" and inserting "shall." On mature deliberation I have come to the conclusion that that vote was wrong. Much as I am in favor of all that is contemplated there, I cannot conceive that it would be proper for the members of this Convention to incorporate such a provision in the fundamental law. I fear that to do so will have the effect of estranging many of the friends of the instrument from voting for it when it comes before the people for adoption. The eloquent address of the gentleman from Cumberland, (Mr. Wherry,) and the simplest story told so well by the gentleman from Washington, (Mr. Hazzard,) had the effect yesterday to unman this Convention, and they were on the very eve of doing what they would regret in the future by incorporating in the fundamental law a principle which may or may not be of great advantage to the State, but which it is not wise in the Convention to insert here. For that reason the word "may" should be restored if you go so far as to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Chester, and I now move, in order to bring this matter before the Convention, a reconsideration of the vote by which "shall" was inserted and "may" stricken out, so that "may" shall again be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The gentleman rises to a privileged question.

Mr. BAER. Yes sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The gentleman from Somerset moves a reconsideration of the vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Knight) to the amendment of the gentleman from Chester striking out "may" and inserting "shall."

Mr. LILLY. I second the motion.

Mr. DARLINGTON. That is not in order at this time. We have another matter under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. The motion will be a subsequent question. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from York (Mr. Gibson) to the amendment of the gentleman from Chester (Mr. Darlington.)

Mr. DARLINGTON. I want to say one word before the vote shall be taken on this amendment. Some gentlemen seem apprehensive —

The PRESIDENT pro tem. I believe the delegate spoke to this point yesterday.

Mr. DARLINGTON. Not on this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. If the gentleman did not, he will proceed.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I was about to say, and I will say it in a very few words, that the apprehension of some of the gentlemen as to the difficulty of determining who are vagrants, who are neglected and who are abandoned children, is rather fanciful than real. I do not think the community have any difficulty in deciding when a child is a vagrant child, any more than a magistrate, the least informed in the country, has in deciding who is a vagrant grown person. What is meant by "neglected children?" Those whose parents or natural protectors do not afford them necessary protection and care, everybody understands. "Abandoned" are those whom their parents and guardians abandon to the charity of the world. No more difficulty exists, therefore, in the Legislature defining, or in the officers of the law who may be entrusted with the duty, determining who are vagrant, neglected and abandoned, than there would be in determining who now is a pauper and entitled to charity.

I apprehend, Mr. President, there is no more sacred, no more holy, no more imperative duty resting upon the community than to take care of the poor and neglected and abandoned. No more holy duty rests upon us than to see that every child in the community shall be educated so as to fit him for the duties of citizenship. Does any gentleman fear that if this Convention shall merely recommend to the Legislature or choose to order the Legislature to take care to provide for instruction in the industrial arts of neglected, vagrant and abandoned children, we thereby endanger the safety of this Constitution? It is probable that any gentleman within the sound of my voice has any fear about the response that will be given by the people of the State with one universal voice on a question like that? If we suppose that the people of this Commonwealth are in favor of ignorance, vice and crime, then let us make the worst Constitution that we can, and go home and submit to our fate. But if we are here as statesmen to provide what is best for the whole community, let us not flinch or hesitate in doing that which every man in his conscience believes ought to be done. The State has the duty of the care of the poor. As the Scripture says—and I am not apt to quote it often—the poor we always have with us, and we probably always shall have the poor with us; and those who are more fortunate have the
